Senator Stollery: —because of the transportation element involved. In fact, it would be interesting to do a comparative study on that particular tool. I find it interesting that Senator Barootes and others support a tax which clearly discriminates against people in their own region. After all of the things we have heard for years about the power of Ontario and Quebec, the government is proposing a tax that would make those two provinces more competitive and outlying regions less competitive. What an oddball approach to government from a party that has prided itself on representing the disadvantaged in the outer regions of Canada. I wonder how the voters in Alberta will like that. Do you think that is the reason why that other party seems to be doing so well?

I have a couple of other issues that I would like to deal with. Because of my background as a retail merchant, I do not like the fact that the GST is an invisible tax. I am sure members opposite are waiting to jump up and tell me that I do not understand the manufacturers' sales tax because it is also invisible, and that is true. I am not making a case for the manufacturers' sales tax, but this tax is much worse, because it is no substitute. We have heard many stories about countries that have a value-added tax, such as Europe and New Zealand. I do not know about New Zealand, but in Europe it is a visible tax, just like the sales tax in Ontario. When one buys an item, the VAT is added at the bottom. That does not appear to be the situation in Canada.

I do not know what the retail merchant will do, because I do not think the Department of Finance or the officials who promoted this scheme have any idea of the complexities of inventory and the element of overhead involved in prices. When I was a retail merchant, we calculated the overhead every week. We knew what everything cost to one-tenth of a per cent and what it would cost to sell. One of the reasons Canada has an uncompetitive atmosphere today is the fact that the retail business in particular has lost control of its overheads and inventories. That is a serious problem in the chain stores across this country.

Now one merchant can include the tax on the cost of the merchandise—make it one price including the VAT—whereas the next merchant can sell the item at a price separate and apart from the tax, which would be added on at the time of purchase. Personally, I would sell the item at its cost plus the tax because that would be more competitive.

Senator Buckwold: Woolworth's say they will not.

Senator Stollery: Senator Buckwold says Woolworth's will not. That is one way of getting a little more money out of the customer, because the customer cannot do any comparison shopping. It will be difficult for him or her to determine if the same item being sold down the street will have the tax included in its price or if it will be added at the time of purchase. The consumer has no way of economizing. The government has taken a tremendous weapon away from the average consumer. I do not think the people who thought up this scheme have any idea what goes on in the mind of the average citizen.

The government talks about the rebates it will provide, and, of course, all of these things can be readily done away with in a year or two; but that is not nearly as important as the citizen's ability to shop for himself or herself and have an idea what he or she is paying for the item. If someone goes to Canadian Tire to buy a tool, which included the GST in the price, he will not know what effect the tax has had on the markup. I think a merchant will sell more if he lists the price and then adds the GST in a visible manner. I thought the government would have guaranteed that. I thought that as an article of faith merchants would have to show the price plus the GST.

Senator Barootes: You are saying that customers are stupid!

Senator Stollery: An article of faith would be lost on Senator Barootes.

Senator Cools: This government has no article of faith!

Senator Stollery: I hope he will be able to explain this to his neighbours in Saskatchewan, because I am having great difficulty explaining it to mine. I am trying to explain it to Senator Barootes, and if he would sit still and listen, perhaps I could. He might actually learn something.

Senator Barootes: I must be as stupid as the customers you are talking about!

Senator Stollery: I think that the visibility of the tax is an important element, and I am surprised that the government has not taken that aspect more seriously. I do not see that as some great government evil. I do not think the government realized the importance of this to the average man or woman who goes shopping.

Honourable senators, my final criticism—and others have different criticisms of the tax—is that it is inefficient because we live in a federal state with ten different provincial tax structures. Some of them have sales taxes and others do not. We have different rates of taxation.

• (1720)

In the majority of cases, this tax does not appear to be harmonized with provincial sales taxes. As I understand it, in Newfoundland, compounded with the 12 per cent provincial sales tax, it will amount to a tax of 20 per cent! My goodness, a tax of 20 per cent! We will soon see a tax in Newfoundland of 25 per cent. Imagine the effect on the economy. Inevitably, as sure as I am standing here, within 24 months there will be a 25 per cent tax on everything in the province of Newfoundland. That is becoming a very heavy rate of taxation and will not do the Newfoundland economy any good at all.

In Ontario there will not be that problem, because Ontario has an 8 per cent sales tax. Even if using the same increase, and without a calculator it is difficult, we are looking at a 15 per cent, and very soon a 20 per cent sales tax, on everything we buy in Ontario.

As I said in my opening remarks, it has to be remembered that today 60 per cent of family expenditures are not taxed. With 60 per cent of the average family's expenditures being taxed, it means that they will be paying a huge rate of taxation. In the short term this will have a devastating effect on the commercial economy, and I do not think there are many people opposite in the commercial economy.

One cannot forget what that will contribute to the underground economy. Faced with a 25 per cent tax every time they turn around, how many Newfoundlanders will pay the person who puts a deck on their house with a cheque? Not very many. They will be giving cash, as is done now to a large degree. However, when faced with a 25 per cent difference in the price, they will certainly not be paying by cheque.

Today, in Toronto, if a tradesman is paid 30 dollars an hour, the same tradesman will work for 20 dollars cash. The standard rate in the city of Toronto today is 30 dollars an hour for a tax receipt, and 20 dollars an hour for cash. The underground economy is very large, and in some areas of the economy there is nothing but the underground economy.

However, can senators imagine the situation when these combined taxes are 25 per cent in the province of Newfoundland, or Ontario, or Quebec? The underground economy in Quebec will go through the roof. I do not know, but I respect the word of our chairman that already Quebec has the largest underground economy in Canada. I would think Quebecers, being intelligent people, quite possibly would have a large underground economy. Their taxes are very high, so why wouldn't they? If I were a Quebecer, I certainly would.

Senator Murray: High compared to what?

Senator Stollery: Everyone knows about the underground economy. I am sure senators here are not so insulated from the world as all that. I suppose some senators opposite are, but I am not. Of course, honourable senators, there is the question of where is this money really going to go.

In closing, I would like to refer to the observations of Senator Buckwold. There were 370 witnesses who appeared before the committee, 209 of whom expressed outrage at the GST, and 130 asked the Senate to overrule the House of Commons. I do not remember the reply of Senator Poitras to those 130 who seemed to feel that the Senate did not have the strength it should have. I believe that the Senate must meet the expectations of Canadians and do everything in its power to defeat the GST.

Hon. Senators: Here, here!

Senator Barootes: Senator, would you accept one question?

Senator Stollery: No. I have a rule, Senator Barootes, that I never accept a question. You make your speech and I make mine. That is the answer that any former member of the House of Commons would give you.

Senator Doody: It's not in the script.

Senator Barootes: Thank you very much for your graciousness. Perhaps you would permit a comment.

Senator Stollery: You have the floor.

Senator Barootes: I was listening to your talk about the regional impact at the periphery of the country. Unfortunately, my information is that it is not totally right. In fact, it is wrong.

Those parts of the country which depend on capital intensive resource industries, such as the west, will be much better off with the GST. The average regional output gains from this sales tax will be 1.4 per cent for Canada. For Quebec it will be 1.0 and for Ontario it will be 1.1, well below the federal rate. On the prairies it will be 2.5 per cent, which is considerably higher—in fact, double; in British Columbia it will be 1.3; in the Atlantic provinces it will be 1.4 per cent. I would point out that the output gains with this reform are considerably better than indicated in your address.

Senator Lucier: I wonder if Senator Barootes would entertain a question?

Senator Barootes: Do you want me to tell you about the north, too? I have those figures.

Senator Lucier: I was only wondering if you would entertain a question.

Senator Barootes: When I give my two hour address tomorrow I will take questions.

Senator Lucier: Perhaps I will make a comment, Senator Barootes, the same as you did. If the west will be better off with the GST, why are British Columbia and Alberta taking the government to court on it? Why are Saskatchewan and Manitoba both diametrically opposed to it?

Senator Simard: Just federal bashing.

Senator Lucier: If everyone in the west is going to be better off, why do they hate it?

Senator Frith: He was referring to other than those four provinces.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, as an introduction to the speech I prepared on Bill C-62, I would like to read Alain Dubuc's editorial in La Presse of October".

By an extraordinary coincidence, this editorial illustrates perfectly well the remarks I want to make today.

The title is "The homework of unruly students".

> With their tasteless mayhem, the Liberal senators succeeded in overshadowing the fact that their noisy fight against the GST was the end product of long term efforts.
> All summer long, the senators criss-crossed Canada, devoting many days to hearing what Canadians had to say about the GST. After their field investigation, the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce published a bulky report containing more than 200 pages.
> We tend to forget that it is because of the conclusions of that report that the Liberal senators decided to kill the GST instead of proposing amendments to it.
> Why is it then that that document, which played such a central part in this crisis, has not been cited, analysed, commented upon?
> By reading the report—

Goes on Dubuc:

> —one can see why. If the senators are unruly students, they also botched up their homework. The liberal majority's long paper is an endless, simplistic and partisan manifesto contradicting everything that we have heard on the senators' rigour and research capacity.
> In fact, by choosing to listen to groups having something to say about the GST, the senators envidently drew the attention of all the lobbies against the tax, with an over-representation of the West, fiercely opposed to it, and of local unions.
> The bulk of the document is not a report, but a catalogue. It is however useful for one thing: it identifies the victims of the GST and underlines the bill's contradictions. However, the senators' attention to detail leads them to concern themselves with trivialities such as the problems of the Newfoundland Legion and the sale of poppies, the sale of flowers by wire service or the GST's effect on transport costs of Nova Scotia Christmas trees.
> But where they really get off the track is in the analysis section.

And I insist on that sentence.

> In the chapter on recommendations, the senators merely draw a list of the demands of all lobbies which they heard from, without commenting in any way on their demands, without presenting them in any way, as if parliamentarians had decided to give up their duties and become stenographers. No point in looking for an analysis of the VAT impact in countries where it exists—the senators did not bother to do that;

There is no point in looking for > an in-depth study of the economic impact—there is none;

There is no point in looking for > alternatives—they are summed up in another list without conclusions.

> In short, the conclusions of the report which must have cost a fortune to the taxpayers—I imagine you will discuss this with Senator Simard—were foregone from the very beginning. No wonder that after such a dreadful exercise the Liberal senators would scream rather than debate the issues.

Honourable senators, you already know—but it needs repeating, as Senator Poitras did earlier today—that the committee members did not have time to read, analyze or discuss the Buckwold committee report. I got the French version around noon, barely an hour and a half before the committee was scheduled to meet at 1.30 p.m. Still, I read this on page 185, article 514, chapter XXVII entitled "Rejection of the GST":

> "When the government introduced its tax reform White Paper in 1987, it promised taxes which would be fair and equitable, visible and supportive of the economy. The GST has been touted as a tax which meets all of these criteria, but from the evidence the committee has heard and the analysis we have undertaken, it fails to pass the test." That is the analysis made by the committee. In fact the committee did not make any such analysis nor did it study the report. For the past three weeks my colleagues opposite have been abusively talking for hours on end about freedom of speech. Yet in committee you did not even allow the Conservative minority to examine the report last September 24. I think that was a blatant breach of democracy. As it was, the chairman saw fit to lower the boom and gave us only a few hours to make a final decision on the original document which then ran to 300-odd pages. The decision, flying in the face of basic democratic principles, was to reject Bill C-62. This is why as member of the committee I dissociate myself from this false, uncontrolled, unproven and unsubstantiated statement that the report was the result of "the analysis made by the committee". Your unending "follybusters" gave me time to read the final 215-page document and to make a few comments.

My first question has to do with the actual number of witnesses heard by the committee.

On page 185, article 515, the number is 370 witnesses. Then on page vii of the preamble the number is up to 380. In Appendix A on page 1484 of the Debates of the Senate appear the names of 241 groups or individuals, in alphabetical order. In Appendix B beginning on page 1507 I counted the names of 349 witnesses or groups, according to the location of the hearings and again in alphabetical order. So, all in all, the figure sits anywhere between 349 and 390.

Those various figures about groups or witnesses heard and mentioned in the report show a glaring lack of rigour that, with much leniency, I would attribute to the haste in its drafting. Well, the Committee could have corrected the presentation of those figures if only it had been given the time to do it.

As one of the members of this Committee who heard witnesses in Montreal, Toronto, Edmonton, Yellowknife and in Ottawa, both before and after the trip, I would like to point out a few aspects of the report that I found particularly amazing.

In Section 515, page 185, it states: "It must be acknowledged that the current FST is flawed. Most of the 370 witnesses heard during the Committee's cross-country meetings agreed with this assessment" and a little further on, in Section 607, page 215, "This Committee acknowledges that the current FST is flawed and should be replaced". But when if says the Committee, it should be understood that it is the Liberal majority and its chairman that acknowledge that the FST is flawed and should be replaced. Senator Poitras and others have quoted reports of numerous committees and commissions that had come to the same conclusion over forty years. The problem is that no government up until now had the courage—and "courage" is the word—to "replace" what the Committee and the witnesses view as a bad tax. We have here new evidence that it is infinitely easier to criticize and demolish than to create and build. The Buckwold report is no exception in this regard since it bluntly rejects this new tax scheme without suggesting any alternative one. I will get back to that in a moment.

Let us return to the number of witnesses who asked the senators, all the senators on the Committee that is, to reject the Bill.

In Appendix B of the Report, we notice that:

> On 349 witnesses, 59 (17 percent) either gave their «unqualified support» to the Bill or supported it «with changes», 125 (36 percent) requested that the Senate reject the Bill and 165 (47 percent) made suggestions or recommended amendments to the Bill.

These figures do not add up to the 370 or 380, as I explained earlier, but they nonetheless were the basis for this analysis. Are we to conclude that the 21 or 31 witnesses not accounted for had no opinion?

Elsewhere in the document, more precisely on page 185, paragraph 516, it is indicated that 130 witnesses, instead of the 125 reported in Appendix B, asked the Senate to overrule—now, that is quite clear—the House of Commons and reject Bill C-62 completely. The fact that 130 witnesses made such a request to the Senate is an indication of the extent of the opposition to the GST. That translates into 35 percent, based on a total of 370. That is to say that 35 percent of the witnesses asked the senators to reject the Bill.

In other words, when it recommended the complete rejection of the Bill, the Liberal majority on the Committee decided, on its own authority and without even reviewing or examining the report per se, to ignore the 65 percent of witnesses who did not favour such an extreme measure.

The democratic thing to do would have been not to recommend the rejection of the Bill but to examine carefully the amendments and proposals that were likely to respond to the objections raised by those who agreed in principle with the Bill but wanted it to be improved.

Those are suggestions and comments that were made yesterday by Senator Kelly. On this October 24, it is clearly much too late to do anything and the Liberal majority of the caucus is fully responsible for the situation we are now in.

From what I have just told you, nevertheless, keep in mind that the recommendation of the committee to reject Bill C-62 outright does not reflect the opinion of the majority of the witnesses but that of the majority of Liberal senators associated with the 35 per cent of witnesses who were in favour of that alternative.

Chapter XXVI is a summary of the recommendations to amend Bill C-62 and goes from page 149 to page 193.

Part of the first paragraph of that chapter reads as follows:

"The following details the major problems raised by witnesses during the course of the Committee's investigation and their recommendations for change. We present these recommendations without editorial comment as to their merits."

Is a committee acting in a serious and credible way when they present the recommendations made by witnesses without commenting or analyzing them?

Careful reading of that chapter shows clearly those are suggestions made to the committee by witnesses and, fortunately, not recommendations brought out by the committee . . . The ambiguous title of the chapter in itself speaks volumes about the credibility of the report.

Allow me to make a few points regarding sectors that I know perhaps better than others, for instance, health care and long-term care facilities.

Paragraph 531, page 190, states that Bill C-62 provides for an 8 per cent GST rebate for institutions of the public sector, a rebate of 50 per cent for non-profit organizations such as charities, and no rebate for the private sector.

There semms to be some surprise that all health care sectors or health care institutions are not put on an equal footing.

[Senator David.]

I believe this policy is coherent because those three types of institutions, at least in Quebec, are financed according to different criteria. Nevertheless they all wish or hope for as large exemptions as possible.

An examination of that issue would have been interesting, but the committee did not do that either.

Paragraph 532, page 191, refers to the grievances of health care practitioners and lists some of them: psychotherapists, massage therapists, dieticians, social workers, Christian scientists and veterinarians.

It is useful to recall—and the committee members knew it full well because they had been told about it—that psychotherapists accredited by their corporation such as medical psychologists are also exempt from the GST.

Other practitioners among those listed are also exempt when they work in public institutions, which is the case of the large majority in some of the professions cited.

On the other hand, it seems logical and coherent to me that self-employed men and women be subject to the tax that will be paid by their clients. Because even in the health care area, I submit at the risk of shocking you, there are limits to the generosity of governments that are already hard-pressed to pay for our "free", universal and generous systems.

Let us talk about doctors whose comments appear on page 200, paragraph 533. We listened to the complaints of physicians who will have to pay the GST on their purchases without being able to pass it on to their patients because their fees are regulated by the provinces.

I think one must take these grievances with a grain of salt. Doctors already pay the federal sales tax on their office furniture and equipment. In addition, as everybody knows, professionals with private offices can deduct all their expenses from their personal income.

However, their insurance premiums have gone up substantially in recent years because of what was happening in the United States. This did not prevent physicians from practicing but, in the negotiations that followed, the provincial governments did their part to compensate them for the unexpected increase in these premiums now adding up to several thousands of dollars annually.

I just found out recently that some accommodations had been found between the ministers responsible and the Canadian Medical Association.

I think a problem such as this could have been solved at the table in five minutes if the people involved had taken the time to study the grievances of my colleagues. And even though they have my sympathy, their average income does not make me feel sorry for them.

Talking about physicians, let us have a look at funeral services, not because it is a consequence of seeing doctors but because it is a fate we cannot escape whether we see them or not.

It is said on page 200, paragraph 535:

> The Funeral Service Association of Canada told the Committee, "We believe that every Canadian has a right to a burial or a cremation according to the rites and practices of his or her religion and cultural heritage.

I wonder who would question such a statement. Besides, the Committee does not question it and neither do I. But they add:

> —and that Canadians find it offensive for the Government to tax those services."

I want to point out that many witnesses who were against GST advocated restoring succession duties as an alternative. I really wonder that those same grieving families would think that whether they would rather prefer this 7 per cent tax to the much heavier succession tax of yesteryear. If Committee members had taken time to study such alternatives, I think they would have come to a quick conclusion. Again, Committee members did not have time to study anything in this report.

In Section 574, page 204, the report deals with tourism:

> Of all the tax alternatives presented to the Committee, none is as damaging to the Canadian tourist industry as the GST.

That is what can be found in the resport. Such a categorical statement would have deserved a more thorough analysis on the part of committee members.

The article states also that the GST would encourage Canadians to take their holiday abroad and discourage foreigners from journeying in Canada.

That is a very interesting observation. This leaves the impression is that when Canadians travel abroad, they do not have to pay the GST, but what is the VAT if not the GST under a different name? When they travel for instance to Austria, they find that the VAT amounts to 20 per cent, something the committee knew full well, for it appears in Clause 599; 22 per cent in Danemark; 18.6 per cent in France; 14 per cent in Germany; 18 per cent in Italy; 20 per cent in Holland and 23.46 per cent in Sweden. Was that enough to discourage Canadians from travelling to Europe? I do not think so. I believe that over the past few years Canadians have travelled to Europe in record numbers in spite of the VAT.

As for discouraging foreigners from coming to Canada, they are already unknowingly paying the federal sales tax on the purchases they make. They keep coming, even if they pay taxes in restaurants, entertainment places and hotels. The new legislation provides for the reimbursement of taxes as well as the setting up of tax free stores which do not exist today. I suggest these are positive rather than negative factors.

I am sure that if the committee had taken the time to look into these concerns, it could have easily eliminated such inconsistencies. I suggest that when deciding to travel or not, exchange rates weigh a lot more than a possible GST or VAT. Travel is characterized by one's own standard of living, which means that the lower the standard of living, the lower the travelling expenses.

● (1800)

In section 593, page 211, the minister of Finance from British Columbia is reported as saying:

> It is no secret that the federal government sees the GST as a solution to stem the red ink and slow the growth of the mountain of debt.

That is a wonderful statement that made me very happy. But I did not like so much what he added:

I am frustrated by the federal mindset that sees a tax grab as the only solution to our fiscal dilemma.

I do not easily accept the word "grab" in this statement, because it condemns the 48 countries that have such a tax, most of which are among the most industrialized and civilized countries in the world.

I also noted that Section 595 says this:

> The U.S. does not have this kind of tax and has deliberately rejected it in the past.

It was quite interesting to watch them denounce, in this case, the Canadian behaviour towards our main trading partner, when they were insisting, during the free trade debate, that we ought to be careful not to become dependent on our neighbours. The rationale of the Liberal Party does indeed vary, depending mostly on how many political points they can score with a particular bill.

Chapter XXV, which is entitled "Options", is about 20 pages long, not an awful lot out of 228 pages. It runs from page 127 to page 143. In those pages are described the 10 options and alternatives Senator Buckwold referred to in his speech yesterday, so I will not mention them again.

But it is interesting to see that each of the first nine alternatives is followed by short paragraphs entitled "Advantages" and "Disadvantages". That is almost the only analysis I could find in this report, where something is analyzed, either positively or negatively. Except for the description of those ten alternatives, nothing much in that chapter can be seen as an analysis of the advantages and disadvantages of the GST.

Nevertheless, the report is still interesting since I counted, on the whole, 27 advantages and 27 disadvantages that Senator Buckwold and his researchers listed from this set of proposals. Frankly, I found that to be of a remarkable neutrality.

Therefore, we can conclude that the set of proposed alternatives offers the same amount of advantages and disadvantages. Let us keep in mind that there are ten proposed alternatives.

We can easily imagine how difficult it was to get a possible concensus on replacing a bad tax, the MST, by a better one, the GST. Based on that finding, we can presume that since a tax is always inpopular, no proposed alternative providing the same amount of advantages and disadvantages would have been accepted by the Liberal Party since they rejected the GST on the basis of its inpopularity.

It would have been more realistic on the part of the Liberal Party to offer a single alternative since they recognize that the current MST is bad and must be replaced. It would have been interesting to see, then, how people would have reacted to the liberal alternative.

Now, to conclude, I would like to examine what is, in my opinion, the biggest problem in Canada. This problem has never been discussed in Committee. Just as a reminder, there has not been a single moment when the report could have been studied, analysed and commented.

I submitted the problem many times to the witnesses who had presented a memoir. I must add that, apart from the economists and the B.C. Minister of Finance, I never received a positive answer from any of the witnesses. It seems to me a very serious problem, that is, the annual deficit and the cumulative debt.

Honourable Senators, I am talking about the cumulative debt and the annual deficit, and I think it is worth mentioning.

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if we can agree not to see the clock? Senator David needs a few more minutes.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator David: To give you an idea of how the situation has evolved, I will quote numbers taken out of a table which appears on page 7 of a book entitled: "Resolving the Deficit". It was published by L.N.C. and written by Jack Biddel. The book came out in 1990, so we can't say that it's outdated.

Let's start with annual deficits. For each of the last 12 years, that is from March 31 1979 to March 31 1990, we have had a deficit, that is to say our expenses have been higher than our revenues. The deficit, which, on March 31 1979, totalled 11.7 billion, has increased every year, reaching a maximum of 36.1 billion on March 31 1985. That Liberal record has very much taken its toll, and it still has negative consequences today. Since we are in government and as of March 31, 1989, the annual deficit has gone down from $36.1 billion to $27.7 billion, with an estimated rise to $30.5 billion as of March 31, 1990.

Concerning interests on the total debt, they have gone up from $7.1 billion as of March 31, 1979 to $22.6 billion as of March 31, 1985. That represents an increase of 218 per cent or a 36 per cent annual arerage. That probably sets a record in the history of Canada's economy and demonstrates the irresponsable administration of the Liberals.

From March 31, 1990, interest on the national debt have gone up from $22.6 billion to $39.4 billion, that being a global increase of 74 per cent and an annual average of 15 per cent.

• (1810)

Honourable senators, 15 per cent represents less than half of what happened under the Liberal Government.

As for the national debt, from March 31, 1979 to March 31, 1985, it has gone up from $55.8 billion to $191.4 billion, representing a total increase of 243 per cent or an average annual increase of 40 per cent.

Under our Government, it has gone up from $191.4 billion to $351.4 billion, that being an increase of 83 per cent, or an average annual increase of 17 per cent. That is less than half the average annual increase registered by the Liberal Government.

Nevertheless, that figure of $351.4 billion remains in itself a disastrous figure and justifies the numerous measures taken by the Mulroney Government and its Minister of Finance to try to reduce it.

The conclusion seems clear to me: Our national debt grew dramatically between 1979 and 1985, when a Liberal government was in place. Since this government came to power, the rate of growth of the debt is still monstruous. Such a legacy is disastrous for the Canadian economy, particularly for the people who have to bear the costs.

Considering the size of the debt and the fact that the public has lost touch with the very meaning of the word "billion", I made a few calculations to show you how huge the problem really is.

Let us take a look at the revenues the government needs to generate in order to pay only the interests on this debt. It needs $1,000 per second, which means $3,600,000 per hour, $86,400,000 per day, $604,800,000 every week, $2,721,600,000 per month and $32,659,200,000 a year.

That is not even the estimated deficit for the current year. I though that using the example of $1,000 per second would make it easier to figure things out. I hope I am not wrong.

So using this example, if we reduce the annual deficit—and it does seen enormous—by $5 billion annually—it would take six or seven years to balance the federal budget. If we go on at the same rate, it would take another sixty years to get rid of the cumulative debt.

In the circumstances, honourable senators, I believe it would be irresponsible and disastrous to delay or even amend Bill C-62.

Further delay caused by seeking an alternative to the GST is certainly not the way to deal with an urgent economic situation the government is trying to correct with a great deal of courage, intelligence and energy, unfortunately making itself unpopular in the process as a result of unfounded statements by the opposition parties.

It is my opinion, and I would like to take Senator Buckwold's call to unity he made yesterday and reverse its focus, that the opposition parties in this Chamber should work with the government, and do so quickly, to reduce our national debt and our annual deficit, and enable the government to pursue its tax reform, by passing the bill before us today as soon as possible.

Otherwise, the debt virus will create a situation that will require increasingly drastic treatment, whose side effects will be increasingly painful for the patient, in other words, for all Canadians and for every business in this country.

These comments were intended to explain my objections to the report and to the logical consequence of its recommendations, which would be to vote against this bill. Thank you for your attention.

THE HONOURABLE RICHARD B. HATFIELD

SEVENTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF FIRST ELECTION AS PREMIER OF NEW BRUNSWICK—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I seek the floor for a few minutes on a question of privilege to bring to the attention of my colleagues in this chamber a significant anniversary in the history of New Brunswick and Canada.

Indeed, on October 26, 1970, the honourable Richard Hatfield was elected provincial Premier by the citizens of New Brunswick.

The honeymoon between the people of New Brunswick and Premier Hatfield was to last for 17 years. He broke the records of all his predecessors and was re-elected for four consecutive terms.

[English]

The following statement from a letter of the Prime Minister of Canada to Richard Hatfield, dated October 13, 1987, is to the point. I quote:

> During your remarkable four terms in office, you became not only the Dean of the First Ministers' Conference, you also became its conscience, demonstrating remarkable leadership on national issues such as the Constitution.
> Your initiatives, for the further advancement of the recognition of New Brunswick, as Canada's only officially bilingual province, will go down in history as an important and lasting contribution to the unity of this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Simard: Richard Hatfield remained victorious even in defeat on the evening of October 13, 1987, when he said:

> I want to say how much I have loved the last 17 years of serving the people of New Brunswick and that is what fills my heart tonight.

[Translation]

The 26th Premier of New Brunswick will be remembered by historians for having upheld the rights to equality of both French- and English-speaking people; at the provincial and national levels, for having made a significant contribution to Canadian unity; and for having worked unceasingly to patriate Canada's Constitution.

The honourable Richard Hatfield was successful in formalizing, in facts, the linguistic and cultural duality of the province.

Today still New Brunswick is the only officially bilingual province in Canada.

Democracy has always prevailed under his administration. Over the years he never did miss an opportunity to consult with his people.

Remarkable among his many achievements was the electoral system restructuration through the creation of single representation ridings, and the enactment of legislation on the financing of political activities.

Not only did Richard Hatfield succeed in democratizing his party, he also managed to break up the traditional borders of the New Brunswick Conservative Party with respect to the geographical context as well as to the realm of political ideas and trends.

[English]

Richard Hatfield appointed New Brunswick's first woman to a cabinet position. I am pleased to note that three women, former cabinet ministers of the Hatfield years, are sitting in this House, the Honourable Brenda Robertson, the Honourable Mabel DeWare, and the Honourable Nancy E. Teed.

[Translation]

For Senator Richard Hatfield, whose political career goes back to June 1961, and for the people of New Brunswick, it was a time of mutual love and respect.

New Brunswickers have always appreciated his warmth and generosity, and the time he spent getting to know them.

His patience, his tireless determination to fight prejudice of every kind, his vigorous defense of the rights of all human beings, his grace in adversity, were all invaluable adjuncts to a brilliant career.

It is because of his personal and professional qualities that people from all corners of the province, from the Madawaska to Charlotte, from the Acadian peninsula to Saint John, from Moncton to Restigouche, welcomed him into their homes and their hearts, with respect, but also with pride, as a friend and brother.

Honorable senators, it is therefore not surprising that Richard Hatfield's appointment to the Senate was applauded by the people of New Brunswick and by all Canadians.

Richard Hatfield is a great Canadian citizen.

I am proud to pay tribute to him today for his incredible contribution to the well-being and quality of life of his fellow citizens.

THE HONOURABLE J. MICHAEL FORRESTALL

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP IN SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to add a few words to the privilege saga in which Senator Forrestall and I have been involved, in order to keep my honourable colleagues up to date and informed.

Honourable senators will recall that yesterday I said I did not have the wording of the will upon which the qualification question turns. I have since received a copy of the will. I did not obtain it from the administration; however, I am advised that it is a certified copy.

Incidentally, since Senator Forrestall is now in his seat, I wish to make something very clear in all of this. I do not say or suggest that Senator Forrestall does not believe that he is qualified. I am not suggesting that he is telling an untruth when he says that he believes that he is qualified. I am sure he believes he is.

The will states in part:

> A joint life interest to THOMAS P. FORRESTALL and ESTHER FORRESTALL to run for the life of the survivor of the two and on the death of the survivor of the two, the remainder in fee simple to the children of THOMAS and ESTHER FORRESTALL, who shall be living at the time of my death, as Joint Tenants and not as Tenants in Common.

I can understand why a quick reading of that paragraph might persuade someone that Senator Forrestall was qualified.

The difficulty, honourable senators, is that the Constitution uses very specific words. It states in section 23, "He shall be legally or equitably seised . . ."—a very important word—"as of Freehold for his own Use . . . or seised or possessed for his own Use and Benefit of Lands or Tenements . . .". The textbooks are very clear on the point; and I understand that a professor in Nova Scotia agrees that the law seems quite clear that on the will's wording, Senator Forrestall would not be "seised" in the sense that it is used in the Constitution. Obviously, we will not settle this matter now.

An Hon. Senator: Why not?

Senator Frith: Be patient, and you will see why. On the basis of that information—and I am prepared to table any of it if necessary, although I do not think this is the time to do so—I will be introducing a motion in due course.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to section 67 of the Official Languages Act, I have the honour to table the special report of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

L'ASSOCIATION INTERNATIONALE DES PARLEMENTAIRES DE LANGUE FRANÇAISE

REPORT OF THE ACTIVITIES OF THE CANADIAN SECTION

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I have the honour to table the tenth report of the Canadian section of the Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE HONOURABLE J. MICHAEL FORRESTALL

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP IN —SENATE NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as I said a few moments ago, the question of Senator Forrestall's qualification affects very directly the balance of votes in this house, because the recommendation made by the Prime Minister to Her Majesty the Queen for the appointment of eight additional senators must mean eight additional qualified senators. The Constitution does not give the Prime Minister or the Queen the authority to appoint seven qualified senators, only eight or four.

Senator Simard: Another smoke screen.

Senator Frith: Therefore, the question of Senator Forrestall's qualification raises the question of the qualification of Senators Ross, Lavoie-Roux, Berntson, Grimard, Johnson, Keon and Meighen.

Senator Simard: It is amazing.

Senator Frith: That is, in all, eight potential and decisive votes in this chamber. Therefore, I give notice that tomorrow, October 26, 1990, I will move:

> That the question of Senator Forrestall's property qualification and the qualification, therefore, of Senators Ross, Lavoie-Roux, Berntson, Grimard, Johnson, Keon and Meighen be referred to the Committee appointed to consider the Orders and Customs of the Senate and Privileges of Parliament; and
> That, notwithstanding any other rule, provisional rule or order of the Senate, the Committee meet in this Chamber within the twenty-four hours following the adoption of this motion.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO INSTRUCT COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE BILL C-43

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: In view of the wide interest and gravity of the subject of Bill C-43, I rise to give notice that I will move:

That an obligatory instruction be given by this House to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to give particular study to the individual flaws of Bill C-43 as identified, for instance in my speech on June 26; and

That the Committee give full study and call expert witnesses to address all issues that are cognate to the Bill including the legal, constitutional, ethical, sociological, and scientific implications of this Bill, and to consider appropriate amendments to Bill C-43.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Friday, October 26, 1990, at 9:30 o'clock in the forenoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL FINANCE

MONETARY POLICY—EFFECT ON ECONOMY—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise this house and the Canadian people if any extraordinary action will be taken by this government in view of the findings of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that we have now reached record-breaking bankruptcies, of both corporations and individuals, in Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am not in a position to discuss the preamble to the honourable senator's question, because he has not put forward the comparative statistics. I can, however, tell him that Canada's economy has grown by 23 per cent in real terms since September, 1984. Rather than highlighting bankruptcies, which are a normal part of economic activity in the country, I would think he would be rejoicing in the unprecedented rate of economic growth that we have enjoyed for the past six years.

Senator Olson: I would like to advise my honourable friend that people, particularly those who live in the region of Canada from which I come, are intensely concerned about the possibility of going bankrupt and the prospect of more bankruptcies. Whatever else the honourable leader may wish to put forward, the fact is that the Minister of Finance has admitted that he deliberately caused a slowdown in the economy, resulting in record-breaking bankruptcies both for individuals and corporations in Canada. That is the question these people are interested in.

I have asked the Leader of the Government a direct and pointed question. Is the government planning any extraordinary action to reverse or remedy the problem that is causing these bankruptcies and the severe stress that goes along with them?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator says that he asked a very pointed question. He clearly wants a very pointed answer, and I will give him one. He talks about the part of the country from which he comes, which I believe is the Medicine Hat area of Alberta. That is a farming area. I have to tell the honourable senator that farm bankruptcies were down 39 per cent in 1989 from what they were in 1984, the last year that he and his friends held office.

Senator Perrault: That is because there are so few farms left.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my honourable friend gave that reply yesterday during Question Period. I would like him to know that it is not much comfort to the many people who will be the next group listed by Statistics Canada. He knows, as I do, that this is only the first flush of the consequences of the policy deliberately embarked upon by the government. If he chooses not to answer the question, then that is what I will have to report to those people. However, if there is not to be a change in monetary policy particularly—and government economic policy generally—in order that this distressful kind of activity will be remedied, then I will accept that answer.

Does the government plan to modify the monetary policy that has led to most of these problems, so that several thousand more Canadians will not be facing the bankruptcies that were revealed in the last few days and that are showing up every month on an escalating basis?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my honourable friend is making a broad and sweeping generalization which he cannot really document. The fact of the matter is that there has been an increase in the number of bankruptcies generally, although, as I have pointed out, farm bankruptcies were down 39 per cent in 1989 over what they were in 1984. Those statistics are from the same source that my honourable friend cites.

When I speak of bankruptcies as being a normal part of economic life in this country, the other side of the equation is that while some firms go out of business, new firms are created to carry on new economic activities. Last year there were 350,000 new businesses started in this country. I would think my honourable friend would take some satisfaction in hearing the other side of the story.

Senator Olson: It is interesting to note that the Leader of the Government says that it is perfectly normal that there be bankruptcies under a Tory government. Until now my generation had not learned that, but the generation preceding me had slogans such as "Tory Times are Tough Times."

One of my colleagues has handed me a note which says that during the period 1984 to date there has been an inflation rate of 24 per cent. The minister has indicated that there has been an equivalent growth of 23 per cent. In this case there is 24 per cent inflation against 23 per cent growth in the economy. So you can see where we are.

I want to know if the Minister is going to answer my question. If he does not want to answer it, or if he wants to give me an answer to a different question, that is up to him. Most of the people I talk to believe it is this monetary policy, followed by this Minister of Finance and this Governor of the Bank of Canada, that has led them into the difficulties they are having, which has a consequence of bankruptcy, both for individuals and corporations. As I said, they are now occurring in record-breaking proportions. Is the government planning to take any remedial action to ensure that the situation will not continue?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I pointed out to my friend the other day—I think it was Friday—that in the 1989 and 1990 budgets the government, through the Minister of Finance, made it clear that a slowdown in domestic demand was expected and necessary because the country could not sustain the unprecedented rate of economic growth that had been occurring for some years. So some slowdown in economic growth was forecast and expected in the 1989 and 1990 budgets. The fact of the matter is that we do not expect any positive economic growth in the second half of the present calendar year, which is now drawing to a close. However, we expect the economy to rebound in the calendar year 1991, and when it does it will do so with far less inflationary growth than has recently been the danger in this country.

So my friend should not expect—and I am sure he does not expect—that there will be a repeat of the horrendous economic recession we experienced in this country under his party's leadership in the early 1980s.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I take it, then, that I can report to the people who expect me to do so that the government is not yet satisfied, that it is going to cool the economy more and exacerbate an already difficult situation. At least, that seems to be the reply with respect to the next six months or two quarters. The government does not intend to significantly modify monetary policy, which would remedy the problem. If that is the government's answer, I am sure a lot of people in Canada would be interested in knowing about it.

Senator Murray: I spoke about the second half of the present calendar year. If I am not mistaken, this is the 25th day of October. There are a little more than 2 months left in this calendar year. As I have told the honourable senator before, we can expect interest rates to ease, as, indeed, they have been easing. The trend line has been down for many months.

Senator Olson: Down 1 per cent from 15. That is great.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator knows that the trend line has been down for many months, and interest rates will ease further as the threat of inflation eases. That is the policy. That is the reality in this country.

• (1430)

Senator Olson: I guess a lot of good, hard-working Canadians are going to have to take that, but it is not very good news.

BANKRUPTCIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The Leader of the Government in the Senate is suggesting that the current economic situation, with these bankruptcies, is not as bad as it was in 1981 or 1982. From that I would assume that it is perhaps not as bad as the situation in the 1930s. Perhaps if we were to go back another 50 years we might find that the situation was even worse. However, I think we expect more today. It seems to me that the question that was asked was whether anything was going to be done about these bankruptcies. Perhaps after another five or six or ten years of this process we will have no further businesses or farmers to go bankrupt. That may certainly be true in my part of the country. I read a report saying that last month bankruptcies in the province of Ontario were up 50 per cent over the previous year.

My question to the Leader of the Government is whether he or his your government cares about the situation, or are these additional 5,000 or 10,000 or 20,000 bankruptcies just figures? Does he or his government not care about the people who are affected? It does no good to compare this situation with what happened in 1981. We are worried about our people today. Will the Leader of the Government tell us whether he or his government gives a dam about what is happening?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, we care so much that we are determined to stay on course with an economic policy that has brought six years of unprecedented prosperity to this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: It has resulted in real economic growth in this country of 23 per cent since 1984.

Senator Sparrow: I was thinking about this problem last weekend when I was at home. If I get home this weekend I will be thinking about you when cleaning out my bull corrals.

PERSIAN GULF

COMMAND OF CANADIAN NAVAL FORCES—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, yesterday the Leader of the Government in the Senate said that our Canadian ships were floating around the Gulf "on consensus;" that in the same way that the Senate operates, they are operating on consensus. That is somewhat difficult for me to believe, but I believe the minister because what he tells me I must believe. I cannot say anything other than that he is telling me the truth.

However, there are 555 ships over there from the American Navy, including aircraft carriers, battle groups, and six or eight nuclear submarines. There are 12 ships in the area from Britain, and 14 ships from France, including an aircraft carrier. There are eight ships in the area from Saudi Arabia, two from Turkey, two from Argentina, four from Italy, three from Canada, three from Australia, and three from Belgium. Does the minister still say they are under the control of a consensus, in the same way that the Senate operates, so that the ships are just going helter-skelter with no one coordinating their actions?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The honourable senator should obtain a copy of Hansard, when it is available, to confirm what I said. I spoke of the rules of engagement provided by Canada to the armed forces serving in that area. I indicated further that while there is not a single command, there are frequent on-going consultations between Canada and other nations whose forces are serving in that area—consultations at the military level, in the course of which, by a process of consensus, the roles and activities of the various forces are decided upon. A question was raised about the French. I am told that they do not attend the meetings. Canada would not attend the meetings if we wished not to attend them. Canada does, and, by a process of consensus, we are sharing the work with the other nations that have responded.

The overall objective, as the honourable senator knows, is to deter further aggression on the part of Iraq and to support the international sanctions that have been imposed following resolutions by the United Nations Security Council.

Senator Bonnell: I have a further question, honourable senators. I have here an article from Sunday's New York Times of October 21, 1990, which states:

> 'We've got an entire command dedicated solely to keeping track of everyone,' said an American colonel involved in military planning here.

That, apparently, is his statement, that the Americans are completely in control. It states further:

> The overall field commander for these forces appears to be the United States General Norman Schwarzkopf. But no one is putting that in bold black and white terms.

Is this general in charge of our ships in the Persian Gulf?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can only repeat what I said yesterday. Canadian ships are under Canadian command, period. I agreed yesterday to try to obtain further information on rules of engagement, if they are available, and on other matters raised by the honourable senator and the Leader of the Opposition. I shall do so at the earliest possible opportunity.

Senator Bonnell: In ascertaining that information, perhaps the government leader will also obtain information about our planes. Apparently there are 500 planes in the area from the United States, in 30 different air bases. There are 58 planes from Britain, more than 75 planes from France, 180 planes from Saudi Arabia, 8 planes from Italy, 8 planes from Canada, and 18 planes from The Netherlands. Who is coordinating the air power in cooperation with naval power and the ground troops? There are over 250,000 troops on the ground. Is there no overall commander of those forces at the present time?

Senator Murray: The principal responsibility of the Canadian air force personnel who have been sent there is to provide air cover for our Canadian ships. That would also be done in consultation with our Allies, because at times they would perhaps be providing air cover for our ships and we would for their ships. But it is not beyond the ingenuity or administrative capability of the officers of those nations' forces to come together and agree on an appropriate division of labour.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I understand that the American general states that there is need for a lot more planning, coordination and joint command control, and that from the ground it appears that much remains to be done to coordinate the many forces in the area before any battle actually begins.

Senator Murray: Before what?

Senator Bonnell: Before they go into battle. Should a war break out, they would require more joint operations under the United States Commander. If that does not take place, then I do not know what is likely to happen. I will wait to find out.

DEPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES—POSSIBILITY OF WAR—ARRANGEMENTS FOR COMMAND

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I assume that the Canadian forces were sent to the Gulf because of the possibility of serious hostilities. What arrangements have been made against such a possibility? I assume that "consensus" will not be sufficient if in the event there is a large fighting war in the Gulf. What arrangements have been made against that possibility?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Canadian forces were sent there in the first instance to join with the forces of other countries in demonstrating a concerted multinational response to the aggression of Iraq against Kuwait and a response to the United Nations Security Council resolutions, of which there were at least two before the decision was made to send our forces.

The honourable senator's question is a fair one, though hypothetical, and I will inquire what information on that matter can properly be placed on the public record at this time.

APPLICATION OF NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a related question. When we reassembled after the summer recess I immediately asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate when he would bring forward the government's position with respect to initial involvement of Canadian forces in the Gulf pursuant to the National Defence Act.

As I believe I brought to his attention, it is incumbent upon Parliament—certainly upon this chamber—to deliberate on this matter at the earliest possible opportunity. That is an implicit assumption in the National Defence Act.

If I recall correctly, Parliament was not in session just before the First World War, but was immediately summoned. I think that within days of the Second World War, when Parliament was not in session, it was immediately summoned. Just after the Korean conflict began Parliament was summoned. I believe it took some 22 days after the start of hostilities in Korea for Parliament to be reconvened to deal with the issue of dispatching Canadian troops.

In the instance of the Gulf crisis, 44 days passed before the order was issued. I think it is now in excess of 30 days since Canadian forces were ordered to the Gulf, and yet in this chamber we have not had a debate on this issue.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): A debate on what?

Senator Grafstein: A debate on this issue. It is difficult for us to elicit information by asking questions. I think a much more appropriate procedure would be for the government to indicate what its policy and position is so that we can respond at the earliest possible opportunity.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it may be that because Hansard is not available my honourable friend has not seen the replies to some of these questions that were tabled the other day by the Deputy Leader of the Government. I would draw his attention to that document.

Secondly, as I pointed out yesterday, there were three United Nations Security Council resolutions dated August 2, August 6 and August 9 that were passed before the decision was made by Canada to send ships to join the multinational effort. Further resolutions by the Security Council were passed on August 18 and August 25.

The honourable senator knows that those ships were dispatched under an order in council signed by the Governor General, and I believe that was also tabled here. That order in council was signed by the Governor General on September 15.

I am sure the honourable senator also knows that we have provided an opportunity for debate through a Notice of Inquiry put on the order paper by Senator Macquarrie. He is quite anxious to get on with that debate at the first opportunity. I believe there will be an opportunity even though we all know that we are preoccupied, and have been for some time, with Bill C-62.

Senator Macquarrie is ready to launch that debate. He is not bound by cabinet solidarity. His speech was not written by the Department of External Affairs. We are ready to take part in that debate and deal with any questions raised by honourable senators respecting Canada's position on this matter.

Senator Grafstein: Respecting the chronology as best I recall—and I am speaking from memory—on or before August 2 the Prime Minister attended on the President of the United States, and the press reports immediately following that meeting were to the effect that Canada was going to support, by all reasonable means, American efforts in the Middle East.

That, I believe, took place prior to, and in aid of, the resolution that was subsequently promulgated largely by the United States in the Security Council.

As I understand my reading of the National Defence Act, there is an explicit obligation on behalf of the government to immediately recall Parliament, assuming that Parliament is not in session and that Canadian forces may be engaged in hostilities.

We have now passed the event. I do not think it is appropriate or consistent with good parliamentary practice for the matter to be left to a senator to provoke the issue by a Notice of Inquiry. Surely the appropriate procedure would be for the government to lay down a written statement immediately as to its position. That would allow all honourable senators to respond at the earliest possible moment.

Senator Murray: I may be mistaken, but I believe the Notice of Inquiry that Senator Macquarrie has put on the order paper is virtually in the same terms as the motion that was placed on the order paper in the other place by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The fact that Senator Macquarrie has put a Notice of Inquiry on the order paper does not preclude me, or anyone designated by me, from putting forward the official position of the government in this chamber. Meanwhile, of course, the honourable senator does have recourse to the Debates of the House of Commons and to the declarations made by the Prime Minister and other cabinet members on this matter.

Senator Grafstein: Events have overtaken us yet again. It is my understanding, from reading the debates of the other place, that parties on the other side have come to a formal agreement with respect to Canada's position dealing with the acts taken unilaterally by the government.

I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to reconsider whether or not the more appropriate practice would be for the government to lay down a statement of policy in this place so that we do not have to respond to policy declarations made in the other place. If the government's position were placed on the record in this place, we could then respond in the way we choose.

DEPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES—POSSIBILITY OF WAR—COMMAND STRUCTURE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is supplementary to that asked by Senator Bonnell.

If I understand the procedure correctly, the honourable senator is saying that, at the moment, the command is through consensus. I find that a strange and dangerous way to conduct a military operation. But if that is the way it is, then that is the situation. However, in the event of the outbreak of hostilities—and let us hope that will not happen—and the possibility of war, what would be the command structure? What has the Canadian government agreed to, because surely it must be prepared for that possibility. What has the Canadian government agreed to with respect to the command structure?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable speakers, first, I shall undertake to obtain from the military at the earliest possible date a fuller description than I have given to the Senate of the way in which the consultations take place, and the labour as divided among the various national forces present in the Gulf.

The second part of the honourable senator's question is, as I said to Senator Stewart a few moments ago, a fair question, if hypothetical. I will see what information on that matter can properly be placed on the public record at this time.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate endeavour to ascertain, and inform us at the earliest possible opportunity, from whom the units of the Canadian navy and the Canadian air force are taking their command now and in the event of a war? Is it from President Bush, President Mitterand, President Hassad of Syria or the Secretary General of the United Nations? Would the minister be more precise in giving us an answer to those questions?

Senator Murray: None of the above, honourable senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: They are taking their instructions from qualified Canadian military officers.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question to ask following upon Senator Grafstein's. Will the government not take its responsibility and obligation under the National Defence Act to lay before Parliament the order in council and to initiate a debate on that? Or is the government going to wait for some back-benchers, however qualified they may be, to take up this responsibility for the government? That is not in compliance with the National Defence Act.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend, the Deputy Leader of the Government, assures me that he tabled that order in council some considerable time ago. I can only express my regret that it has escaped the attention of Senator Olson.

Senator Olson: When does the government intend to initiate a debate on that order in council, something which is required under the National Defence Act?

Senator Murray: That was the purpose of the Notice of Inquiry put forward by Senator Macquarrie some time ago, which is, I believe, in exactly the same terms as the government's resolution in the other place. We are all anxious to get on with it. I look forward to hearing Senator Olson's views on the matter at that time.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Olson: I have a great deal of respect for Senator Macquarrie and his views. However, I also realize that there is a responsibility under the act which this government is now passing off to one of its supporters, nevertheless a back-bencher. Does that satisfy the government's obligation in the view of the Minister?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I thought it was appropriate to ask Senator Macquarrie to place that Notice of Inquiry on the record, first, because he is so interested in foreign policy; second, because he has such a particular interest in that part of the world; and, third, because he is one of our best known internationalists.

Having said all that, I have not attempted, nor could I, to bind him to cabinet solidarity. His Notice of Inquiry, put forward in the same terms as was debated in the House of Commons, is simply to provide the opportunity for Senator Olson, and perhaps for myself, to take part in the debate, which will take place inevitably.

Senator Olson: The Leader of the Government can waffle around as much as he likes, which is exactly what he is doing, but the government has an obligation under the National Defence Act to lay on the table a statement of the government's position, and then to initiate a debate. So far there has been no effort to comply with that requirement, as Senator Grafstein has pointed out so well.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is mistaken.

Senator Olson: I do not think so.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

COST OF GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Hon. Azellus Denis: I would like to put a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Before the debate ends on Bill C-62 and the GST, is there any way we could find out how many millions of dollars were or will be spent on government advertising concerning the GST?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will make inquiries. I will do my best to get the information for Senator Denis and other honourable senators.

Honourable senators, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Senator Denis. I noticed that last October 14 marked the anniversary of his first election to Parliament in 1935. The senator has been a member of the Parliament of Canada for 55 years, and I wish to offer him my congratulations.

Senator Denis: I want to thank the Leader of the Government for his kind words. However, by mentioning my age he just ruined my chances with the ladies. However, just because he mentioned I was first elected in 1935 will not keep me from asking him questions. After all, he could have said I was elected under Sir John A. MacDonald!

In any case, the Leader of the Government should know approximately how much, how many millions and I am not talking about hundreds of millions, I am talking about millions this has cost so far. You know all the trouble we had to find out how many millions were spent on free trade. We were never able to find out exactly how many million dollars were spent. There was no mention of briefs, radio advertising, tv advertising, seminars, and so forth. We never knew exactly how many dollars were spent on advertising for free trade.

We have now spent several days considering Bill C-62, and you want me to believe the government does not know today, approximately how many millions of dollars this advertising cost? Can you tell us more or less how much it cost?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Denis certainly doesn't expect me to carry these figures around in my head. I will make inquiries. I should be glad to enlighten the senator in this respect.

However, I would like to point out that all the polls clearly indicate that the vast majority of Canadians want to be better informed about the GST. So that is the focus of the government's advertising campaign.

As for the amount involved in these campaigns, I will make inquiries. I will table a report before the House, at the appropriate time.

Senator Denis: You may skip the dollars and cents. I asked how many millions. You must know approximately how many millions it cost, without having to make inquiries in the departments and hiring additional staff. You know but you won't say it because the figures are horrendous. There might be a scandal!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I don't like Chamber. I would like to check all these figures with my colleagues. There are several departments involved. I have no figures to disclose today, that's all.

THE ECONOMY

CORRELATION BETWEEN NATIONAL ECONOMIC GROWTH AND NATIONAL DEBT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I was rather astounded by the great pride shown by the Leader of the Government earlier in Question Period when talking about the economy. Of course, his comments were accompanied with great applause from the claque on the other side. The leader said that the country has enjoyed six years of unprecedented growth. My question is: If we have just had six years of unprecedented growth, why has the gross national debt gone from $200 million—

Senator Murray: Have I got an answer for you.

Senator Buckwold: —when you took over, to almost $400 million? Please do not answer by saying that you inherited it, because in that six years your debt has grown more than the entire debt in the history of this country—and after six years of "unprecedented growth." Would the honourable senator please try to correct that anomaly in my mind and correlate this great growth with the fantastic debt that has accumulated under his government's leadership?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my friend knows the answer to that question as well as I do, because he has heard numerous exchanges on the matter between Senator Olson and me.

Senator Steuart: They spent too much!

Senator Murray: The interest on the debt, which we inherited from our friends opposite, more than accounts for the annual deficit, and that is a fact.

Senator Thériault: Come on!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the current accounts of the government show that we have turned a $13 billion deficit into a $9 billion surplus.

Senator Perrault: Tell that to the bankrupt companies!

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, this is what we are up against when we ask for any kind of government statistics, whether they be on the goods and services tax, free trade, predictions made by the Department of Finance or whatever. Why does the government not admit that the debt has doubled? It has, and there are figures to show that. It has doubled in the same past six years in which there is supposed to have been unprecedented growth. Why do they always confuse these questions with statistics about how this went up and that went up and how wonderful everything is?

My question now to the Leader of the Government is: Is the honourable senator prepared to utter the "R" word as Mr. Wilson has now done? Is the honourable senator prepared to say that the country is in a recession, or is he ready to admit the real truth, that we are into a serious depression and that it will take a long time for us to recover from it?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have already indicated the position of the government. As honourable senators know, the technical definition of a recession is negative growth in two consecutive quarters; so I have no difficulty in uttering the "R" word and neither does my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

Senator Thériault: It took a long time!

Senator Murray: Neither he nor any other qualified person with whom I am acquainted is suggesting that the current slowdown would be anywhere near as deep, as long or as serious as the recession in the early 1980s which, as honourable senators know, was worse in Canada than it was in any of the developed nations of the world.

Senator Thériault: It was not made in Canada like this one!

Senator Murray: Perhaps not, but it was contributed to mightily by the policies of my honourable friends opposite, their anti-investment policies, their energy policies and all the others. There must be some reason why the recession was worse in Canada than in any other developed country—

Senator Robichaud: Of course, Brian Mulroney!

Senator Murray: —and why it was the worst recession in Canada since the 1930s. To come back to the present situation, my honourable friend should look at the recent report of the Economic Council of Canada. While it was critical of some government policies, and I acknowledge it as fair criticism, it also indicated that in its judgment we are heading for real economic growth, in the 3 per cent range, very soon; and further to that—

Senator Cools: Hogwash.

Senator Murray: Of course, my friend, Senator Cools, would immediately decide not to read that, because it does not conform to her prejudices.

Senator Cools: You don't have to think for me!

Senator Murray: However, I am commending the report to the relatively more open-minded Senator Buckwold—

Senator Cools: You can think for those beside you, but you don't think for me!

Senator Murray: —who is interested in these matters. He will find that while the Economic Council of Canada, in its recent report, was critical of some aspects of government policy, it also forecast that there will be an economic rebound and growth at the rate of 3 per cent. It supports our regional development policy, our labour force development strategy and, by the way, the GST.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, it supported free trade as well—

Senator Murray: It was good for the economy.

Senator Buckwold: —with all its subsequent disasters. It is supporting the GST, in spite of the fact that most Canadians realize that it is not the right direction to take, at least at this time.

Senator Murray: You have made that speech.

Senator Buckwold: In supplying that so-called 3 per cent growth factor, again the Leader of the Government has taken economic figures out of a hat in which any number—

Senator Murray: Come on! Where do you get yours?

Senator Buckwold: Let us not fool ourselves.

Senator Murray: Where do you get yours?

Senator Buckwold: I suggest that we look at all of the other statistics that are given by other think tanks and other people who do not support what the government has to say. However, I have not received an answer that tries to correlate the six years of unprecedented growth with the same six years that have doubled the debt of Canada from $200 million to almost $400 million.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate unduly on this matter, because it is really a matter of debate, but I think I should point out, as I did without putting the figures on the record a few moments ago, that in 1984 the government incurred an operating deficit—the difference between revenue and spending—on all programs other than interest costs of $16 billion. This has been changed into an operating surplus of $13 billion. I think that speaks volumes for the competent and frugal management of the nation's finances by the government.

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, the honourable gentleman cannot have it both ways. He has claimed that from the time his party took the reins of government, over the past six years, there has been an unprecedented economic boom. I would like to ask the honourable gentleman to make the following comparison: In 1981-82 we had a world-wide recession, and that is when the previous government incurred a deficit. The present recession is a home-made recession, as stated by the Conference Board of Canada and other blue chip study groups that analyze the economy from time to time. Given that the honourable senator has claimed that his government is responsible for this economic boom, what did his government do in 1984, other than to have the Prime Minister say that there would be a new civility in government and a new spirit of reconciliation? We prepared the terrain for you. Rebut that, please.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend should examine the response of the Canadian international business and investment community to the decisions taken by the Government of Canada—

Senator Thériault: We are not prepared to sell out to the Americans, and that's all!

Senator Murray: —from September 1984 on, in which we dismantled most of the anti-business, anti-investment, anti-growth policies of the previous government.

Senator Thériault: You sold out to the United States!

Senator Murray: The entire private sector in this country and internationally knows that there is a government in this country that places a high priority on economic growth and the creation of jobs and not one with the narrow-minded, excessively nationalistic policies pursued by our predecessors.

Senator Thériault: You sold out to the Americans.

• (1510)

Senator Bosa: The honourable senator must admit that those policies did not go into effect until 1985 and the boom was already under way. Please admit that you inherited the economic boom from the previous government.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROTOCOL OF VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, yesterday I brought to the attention of Senator Murray the increasingly difficult situation that exists in relations between the federal government and the province of British Columbia. I gave him some rather good political advice, and Senator Murray cast aspersions on both the facts and the advice.

First, as to the facts, I stated yesterday that there was a deplorable exercise between Premier Vander Zalm and Prime Minister Mulroney as to who should be asking whom for a meeting to discuss some of these difficult problems that exist today in the relationship. Senator Murray questioned the issue and I refer him to an article that appeared in The Vancouver Sun on Tuesday, October 23 on page A7, which states:

> Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's staff was scrambling Monday night to try to arrange a meeting today with Premium Bill Vander Zalm.
> When contacted Monday evening about Mulroney's comments that he would be happy to meet any time with Vander Zalm and just hadn't been asked, the premier said his staff had been trying to set up a meeting since August.
> "It is hoped that a meeting can be arranged before he concludes his public-relations tour," Vander Zalm said through his press secretary, Ian Jessop.
> When told by a reporter that Vander Zalm's staff has been trying to arrange a meeting with the prime minister for some time, a spokesman for the prime minister's office said he had spoken to the premier's principal secretary, Jerry Lampert, on Monday and they were attempting to set up a meeting for today.
> However, the spokesman said it was going to be difficult to arrange because Mulroney is "on a tight schedule."
> Mulroney is scheduled to leave this afternoon after officially opening the Inter Comm '90 trade show and speaking with B.C. native leaders.
> But that's not what Mulroney has been telling reporters. On four separate occasions, in English and in French, Mulroney has been asked whether he is going to meet with Vander Zalm.
> Each time, Mulroney has said no meeting is set.
> "If he'd like to meet with us, we'd be happy to arrange it," the prime minister told reporters late Monday afternoon. And that's what he said earlier in the day and on Sunday just after his arrival for a three-day visit.
> Mulroney's apparent low regard for Vander Zalm and his government was in evidence when the premier suggested last winter that rather than having one distinct society—Quebec—a new constitution should have 10 distinct societies reflecting the 10 regions of Canada.
> The prime minister laughed at the suggestion, but later issued a press release saying that when he laughed it was not at that question, but at something else that was said.
> The cool relationship between the two government leaders is reflected in the court challenges B.C. has filed against the federal government in the past year.
> B.C. went to court and won over Via Rail cutbacks on Vancouver Island. The province also went to court and won over the issue of cuts to federal transfer payments. And B.C. is involved in a court challenge to the appointment of eight additional members to the Senate and over the constitutionality of the goods and services tax.

Honourable senators, I also pointed out the problem with the financing of the KAON project. There are many other issues, including the settlement of native claims and the participation of the federal government and the provincial government with respect to any compensation which is ultimately agreed to.

In his capacity as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, I am saying to Senator Murray, it appears that relations between the federal government and the government of the province of British Columbia have reached an all time low. I would hate to see Senator Murray unaware of these conditions, as he seemed to be yesterday, and I would urge him again to become personally involved, as he is held in good regard in British Columbia, and to move quickly on some of those problems, perhaps beginning with the financing of the KAON project in British Columbia.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do believe that I answered that question yesterday. There are a number of outstanding issues between the two governments that are being discussed on a ongoing basis between the responsible ministers in the federal and provincial governments.

As for Premier Vander Zalm and the Prime Minister, I have not had an opportunity to consult with the Prime Minister since he returned from British Columbia to ascertain whether he had spoken with Premier Vander Zalm. As I stated yesterday, no Prime Minister in history has been more accessible to provincial premiers than Mr. Mulroney has been. I think Premier Vander Zalm knows that it is not at all difficult to reach the Prime Minister and other ministers in the government of Canada simply by using that instrument that was invented by Alexander Graham Bell so many years ago.

THE HONOURABLE PAT CARNEY

REQUEST FOR APOLOGY FOR ALLEGED INSULT TO ITALIAN COMMUNITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, has the Leader of the Government had an opportunity to speak to Senator Carney in connection with the question I raised recently about the Italian community? I saw Senator Carney in the chamber and she did not respond and the leader said she would respond.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have not. Subject to checking the record, I do believe what I stated was that this does not come under my ministerial responsibility. If the honourable senator has something further to say, he should say it in the presence of Senator Carney. She may or may not wish to add to the statement she has already made in the house. The fact that Hansard is not available makes it difficult to check the record on these matters, but I shall do so, and if I undertook to take any further steps in this connection, I shall certainly get back to my honourable friend.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised by Senator Spivak on Wednesday, October 24, 1990.

(The answer follows:)

THE ENVIRONMENT

RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA DAMS PROJECT—ABILITY OF GOVERNMENT TO ALTER CANADA-U.S. AGREEMENT ON FLOOD CONTROL IN SOURIS BASIN

The United States government has not formally indicated that it believes the Rafferty-Alameda dam project must proceed regardless of the outcome of the environmental review.

The Canada-U.S. Agreement obliges Canada to provide flood storage to the USA by completing both the Rafferty and the Alameda Dams. However, Canada's obligations under the agreement are subject to the laws of Canada, including laws respecting environmental impact assessment.

The Canada-U.S. Agreement is an international treaty which cannot be altered by one party without renegotiating the agreement.

If an environmental review panel finds that the Rafferty-Alameda project must be stopped to avert serious environmental consequences, Canada can stop completion of the project. This would however, entail a breach of the Canada-U.S. Agreement, and possible compensation to the United States.

I would like to point out to Honourable members that my legal advice is that a reasonable delay in the construction of the dam to allow for completion of the environmental assessment would not constitute a breach of the Canada-U.S. Agreement.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRTEENTH REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

[Senator Murray.]

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, for the adoption of the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Bill C-62, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act), presented in the Senate on 26th September, 1990.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, in May of this year I made a speech on this bill and spoke favourably about the GST.

I have read the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee. I listened with great admiration to the speech by the Honourable Senator Buckwold—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Everett: —who comes close to the end of his time in this chamber. In the years that I have been here with Senator Buckwold, he has graced this chamber as well as anyone I have known while I have been here.

• (1520)

The question I have to answer is whether the report of the committee and the speech given by Senator Buckwold would cause me to change my mind in respect of the GST. I will not repeat my speech, but I would like to deal with a couple of economic aspects to which the GST applies.

First, the question is whether or not the GST will be inflationary. That will depend on the setting of monetary policy in Canada. The government estimates that there will be a one-time increase of 1.25 per cent. The Governor of the Bank of Canada says that if it were to exceed that amount, he would not accommodate it with an increase in the money supply. One should remember that the increase, whether it be 1.25 per cent or more, is a one-time increase. It is not a rate as we express it when we talk about an inflation rate.

We have to look at the effect of this one-time increase. We can find a proxy for this in the increase that we recently had in the price of oil, which has gone from $18 to $40 and perhaps back to $30-odd today. If the central bank does not accommodate that oil price increase by increasing the money supply, while that price increases and its effects permeate the economy, other prices must adjust downward because there is no more money in the economy to accommodate any overall increase in prices; and that is what happens.

When the Governor says that beyond a 1.25 per cent one-time increase he will not accommodate a greater increase with an increase in the money supply, that means that prices will go up by virtue of the GST, but they will come down by a reduction in either costs or profit margins. Indeed, over the last while there has been a reduction in corporate profit margins. That means that corporations cannot pass onto their customers their cost increases in the form of price increases. Profits in the second quarter of this year are down 29.1 per cent. That is the fifth consecutive quarter in which there has been a decline in the profits of corporations. That indicates that what is going on is the redistribution of prices that I talked about a moment ago.

Senator Frith: And the unprecedented prosperity that the Leader of the Government was referring to.

Senator Everett: I do not know that I will talk about unprecedented prosperity today because, indeed, if we are not in a recession, we are on the threshold of one.

Senator Frith: Are you going to speak about the effect of the GST on that?

Senator Everett: Yes, I hope to speak to it on that basis. In fact, one raises the question that was raised by Senator Buckwold yesterday: Is a recession the worst time to introduce this tax? In political terms, clearly it is. The political fallout from doing it, when you are on the lip of a recession or in a recession, is clearly the worst time to introduce such a tax. However, in economic terms it is probably a better time than any other time, because through the operation of monetary policy the increase in costs can be accommodated and they can be spread to lower profit margins.

I want to deal with the effectiveness of our monetary policy, because it ties in, in the long run, with my view of the GST. As honourable senators know, monetary policy is operated by the control that the Bank of Canada has over short-term interest rates. If they raise those rates, obligations are purchased by people and money is taken out of the economy. That is a reduction in the money supply. If, on the other hand, they lower those short-term rates, then obligations are sold and money flows into the economy. That is how the bank controls the operation of its monetary policy.

If we look at those short-term interest rates, we can get an idea of how monetary policy has been operating over the last while. The best proxy to look at is the rate on three-month treasury bills. In 1988 the average rate was 9.92 per cent; in 1989 it had jumped to 12.02 per cent; in the first quarter of 1990 it was 12.68 per cent; and in the second quarter of 1990 it was 13.54 per cent. One then has to look at the effect of those rates on the growth of the monetary aggregates.

In order to determine what is happening, we tend to use M2 and M2p. They have a relatively stable relationship with spending in the economy. If we look at the growth in those aggregates over the same period of time, we find in respect of M2 that it went from 7.6 per cent in 1988 to 13.1 per cent in 1989. However, in the first quarter of 1990 M2 dropped to 3.1 per cent, and in the second quarter of 1990 it dropped further to 1 per cent. There is an almost exact correlation with M2p.

It is interesting to note that in June of 1990 the growth of M2 was below 10 per cent for the first time in two years. This indicates that the increasing interest rates have drawn money out of the economy and the aggregates have performed as expected.

There is a clear indication of the fall-off in demand in the economy. The three-month treasury bills have now dropped from a 13.54 per cent average down to 12.45 per cent. In the second quarter, domestic demand fell in all major components. Final domestic demand is down by 3.6 per cent. Consumer spending is down by 1.5 per cent. Residential investment is down by 15.1 per cent, and business fixed investment is down by 11 per cent.

One wonders why it took so long for the aggregates to fall and for monetary policy to work. Part of the reason is momentum. It takes a long time for businesses to realize that they cannot go on raising prices and always expect their customers to pay them. In time that truth, in the tightening economy, becomes an awareness. There is also the question of expectations. When we have inflationary growth over a number of years, people begin to believe that it will go on forever. Indeed, if we look at the hyperinflation rates of some of the South American countries, we find they are based on the strong expectation that inflation will never end in their economies. So actions are taken, not for investment or productive purposes, but to protect oneself against the certainty of ongoing inflation.

What is another reason it has taken so long? Perhaps it has something to do with foreign borrowing. That could be offsetting the effect of a restrictive monetary policy. One has to look at the size of foreign borrowings in Canada. Canada's net foreign debt is $230 billion, or 35 per cent of the gross domestic product. Non-resident holdings of marketable debt totalled 28 per cent of the debt in 1989, which is up from 18 per cent in 1985. This was caused by the high interest rates associated with a tight monetary policy, and, as a result, money has flowed into Canada, creating a high exchange rate.

Before I get to the point I would like to deal with, I would like to mention the of erosion of Canada's competitive position. Over the last ten years, if we take the trade weighted exchange rate, in the 1979 to 1981 period which was equal ten years ago to what it is today—and therefore it is a good proxy—our competitiveness in Canada has fallen 15 per cent. That is due to increases in labour and other costs. Even today unit labour costs in the second quarter were up 6.6 per cent over the same quarter in 1989. The gross domestic product deflator was up by 3.1 per cent. Exchange rates should have adjusted to that 15 per cent loss of competitiveness. They have adjusted to a certain extent to the falloff in demand in an economy that is either entering a recession or in a recession. The interest rate differential on short-term rates between the United States and Canada has dropped from 565 basis points in May to 450 basis points in September.

The U.S. exchange rate of the Canadian dollar dropped from 88.58 cents in August to 85.58 cents today. The overseas index, which takes into account all currencies other than that of the United States, has dropped from 86.74 per cent in June to 81.26 cents in September. However the rates should have accommodated the full erosion of our competitiveness and they have not.

Somehow we must reduce our reliance on foreign borrowing. The falloff in demand, which, while less than the falloff in competitiveness, gives us an opportunity to be able to reduce that reliance, because we need to borrow less to bridge the gap between domestic demand and output. If we do that, we will have a reduction in interest rates. Clearly that would make our monetary policy more effective and improve our competitive position, because the exchange rates would reflect the true parity value of our currency, and we would stop suffering from an over-valued currency, which is having disastrous short-term and possibly long-term effects on our trading patterns.

If we are going to adopt that policy of lowering our reliance on foreign borrowing, that clearly involves a reduction in our deficit. That is the only way we can do it. The deficit is the most pernicious of taxes. The cost of servicing the debt, which is the accumulated deficit, takes so much from the revenues of the government that it reduces the government's ability to create other services for people in the economy. That is the difficulty with a heavy debt that has to be financed and is producing a deficit. If you take in so much money on taxes and you have to take a good chunk of that money off to service the interest rate on the debt, you clearly have much less to do the things you want.

In the climate in which we find ourselves today, it is interesting that this government has reversed the deficit on program spending—that is, all spending except the interest on the debt. Today the revenues taken in are producing $9 billion surplus over and above the cost of program spending. In 1990-91 that figure is estimated to increase to $12.6 billion. Also, since 1984-85 the average annual increase over the last five years in program spending has been 3.6 per cent annually, which is less than the inflation rate.

However, debt servicing is a different matter. The public debt now stands at something in the order of $380 billion. The interest cost on that debt is in the neighbourhood of $40 billion, so the shortfall after we take off the surplus on program spending is about $30 billion. There is no question, whether it is a household, a business or the government, that debt charges must be met or they will eat us alive. So it becomes a very central matter of policy that we must reduce those debt charges.

Now, it is true that if the policy is followed and interest rates fall, those charges can be reduced quite dramatically. A one per cent decrease in interest rates will produce a reduction in the deficit, in the first year, of $1.7 billion; in the second year, of $2.6 billion; in the third year, of $3 billion; and, in the fourth year, of $3.5 billion. So if we can put in place a policy that lowers interest rates within the context of a reasonably tight monetary policy, then we can enjoy very dramatic decreases in the cost of servicing that debt.

I would really prefer to see that reduction in the deficit achieved by a reduction in spending. It is a difficult thing to do in the political climate in which we live. I have spent most of the time that I have been in this chamber working in that particular area, because one of the mandates of the Finance committee was to see if there were means by which we could reduce expenditures in government. It can be done, but the political fallout from it is extremely dangerous.

[Senator Everett.]

To take a case in point, no one would want to do away with medicare, but it might make some sense to have user fees, and to allow extra billing if the doctor who extra billed got a lesser amount than the one who did not. We could probably have a reasonable reduction in the cost of medicare under those circumstances, but would that be politically acceptable? Obviously, so far it is not, so it is very difficult to talk about spending reduction. That does not mean that it should not happen.

In proposing the GST, it is clear that the government should lay out a clear program for the reduction of government spending including a growth in the surplus that is achieved over program spending and a continuation of the holding down of the increase in program spending below the rate of inflation. What that means, then, if we want to reduce the cost of the debt, is that we have to have some sort of a tax increase. The question is: what kind? Should it be an income tax or a consumption tax? My belief is that we should have both.

An income tax is a graduated tax, and so the ability-to-pay concept is part of that tax; and that in itself is sound, provided the rates do not get so high that they skew decisions away from sense towards nonsense based on just saving taxes. A consumption tax should be part of it in order to keep the rates of income tax under reasonable control, and there is the added fact that a consumption tax favours investment, because if you do not consume but, instead, invest, then you do not pay the consumption tax.

So I find myself, on my economic argument alone, in favour of a consumption tax.

However, I think this government has handled things very badly. For example, they said that the tax would be revenue neutral. Well, if we go back to my speech in May, I stated then that I did not think it would be revenue neutral except in the first year, that the experience throughout the world is that far more people register for the tax than had been previously thought, and that after the first year, and in subsequent years, the tax would probably bring in much more revenue than had been predicted for the first year. I have never believed that it would be revenue neutral and, indeed, I do not want it to be revenue neutral. What the government should have done—and I think it would have got a lot farther had it done that—is to say that it was going to bring in a consumption tax—a GST, a value-added tax, whatever we want to call it—that will not be revenue neutral, and that it would use that tax to reduce the deficit and reduce the cost of the public debt.

So that is where I end up, feeling that, on the one hand, the tax that is proposed here is flawed, but that, on the other hand, were we to kill it, doubting that we would ever again get the chance to bring it in. I think it is an essential policy tool, given the situation we are in, where we have a large annual deficit that arises solely out of our inability to pay the interest on the public debt. Therefore, I believe that, even as flawed as it is, we have to have it.

I would put perhaps three conditions on it: first, that over time the government will improve the GST; secondly, that it will have a plan in order to reduce spending and, thirdly, that it use the additional revenues to reduce the deficit, that the government make it plain to people that that is what it is going to do, and that they will live up to that promise.

On that basis, I cannot find anything else that I can do but support the tax.

Hon. Peter Bosa: May I ask a question? The honourable senator has stated that he would be in favour of allowing the dollar to become lower than it is today in relation to the American dollar. He has not commented on the impact it would have, for example, on the foreign debt, nor on the fear that has been expressed by the Governor of the Bank of Canada that lowering the Canadian dollar would fuel inflation.

A second question that I have—

Senator Everett: Honourable seantor, why not let me answer the first one before I forget what you said. It seems to me that what you say about lowering the exchange rate is absolutely right: it would be inflationary. What I was explaining was that the conditions which obtain today allow us to take a policy option that we would not otherwise have been able to take. Demand has fallen off in the economy which, as a result, opens the policy option to us; but it is only available if we reduce the domestic deficit. The two things go hand in hand. There must first be a falloff in demand, and then we must be willing to reduce the domestic deficit. If we are prepared to do those two things, we can then be less dependent on foreign borrowings. If we are in that position, we can lower interest rates and lower the exchange rate.

● (1550)

Senator Bosa: My second question relates to the fact that the honourable senator kept repeating the "consumption tax." He made only a slight reference to the GST, but never said "consumption and services tax." There are two components to the tax that has been proposed here. Was he intimating that perhaps he would prefer to see the tax split in two? In other words, there would only be a consumption tax on goods and not on services?

Senator Everett: No, not at all. I was using the word "consumption" in the generic sense. It is very often used to cover the waterfront in respect of a tax that taxes consumption of both goods and services.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Would Senator Everett permit a question or two?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Senator Stewart: You defend the proposed goods and services tax largely in terms of its potential impact on the deficit. As you point out, much has been made by the government of the fact that the proposed tax will be revenue neutral. However, you say that it should not be revenue neutral and that the rate should be at a level where it has a considerable impact on the annual deficit. Could you give us some idea of what rate would be suitable to produce the effect that you want, in terms of the model that you have used throughout your speech?

I have two further questions. However, you may like to deal with that one first?

Senator Everett: Thank you; I appreciate that. If you looked at my May speech—I would not recommend it, however; it is rather soporific—I stated that the rate that is proposed is revenue neutral for the first year, but that the experience in other countries is that the incidence of tax is much greater than that predicted. Therefore, I have never thought that we were talking about a revenue neutral tax.

I believe this will be a somewhat productive tax, but obviously not in the first year. Certainly, starting in the second year, and in subsequent years, I think it will throw off more of the tax than the costs associated with it, and with the abolition of the MST.

Senator Stewart: You are stating that even at 7 per cent the tax will not be revenue neutral after the "run in" and that it will be adequate to have an appreciable effect upon the deficit.

Senator Everett: That has been the experience in other countries which have imposed that tax. I suspect it will be the experience here also.

Senator Stewart: You have put considerable emphasis on the inflationary consequences that you say would be about 1.25 per cent. Inflationary consequences will take place where there are strong bargain hunters and where there is strong demand for goods and services.

Have you taken into consideration the possibility, particularly in a period of recession verging on depression, how ever you want to call it, of the dampening economic effect on economic activity in Canada of the increase in costs and services? To give you a rather trivial example, which may be revealing, will people go somewhat longer between haircuts, for example, and things like that? There will be a dampening effect inevitably. Have you taken that into account in your thinking?

Senator Everett: Certainly over the last two or three weeks senators have been going longer without haircuts.

Senator Stewart: But not because of the tax.

Senator Buckwold: Because they do not have hair!

Senator Everett: Perhaps, for all we know, it is a result of the economic recession. Incidentally, I would not have called it a depression; at this stage I think we are in the early stages of a recession.

I would have to say that the honourable senator is correct. If the governor will not accommodate a one-time increase over 1.25 per cent by increasing the amount of money in the system, then there will be a slowdown in the rest of the economy. If you push the prices up, then something else has to suffer, because there is no more money in the economy to accommodate those increases. The result is that profit margins are lower. That could cause reductions in costs by businesses in whatever way they can do it. I have to agree with the honourable senators that this is one of the fallouts of the GST, if the Governor will not accommodate it with increases in the money suply.

It may be that the falloff in demand at this point is great enough that the Governor can accommodate a slightly higher, or even a somewhat higher, inflation blip in respect of the GST. That remains to be seen. It is a rather arcane process and the Governor will have to decide whether or not he allows the money supply to increase a little bit because already demand has fallen off to a sufficient amount, or whether he says, "No, I will keep it the same." If he does, then there will be adjustments in other parts of the economy by virtue of that, and that will tend to exacerbate the slowdown that we are presently experiencing.

Senator Stewart: I wish to shift to a different area, Senator Everett, but one to which you made reference at the beginning of your remarks.

You said that the introduction of a new tax such as this would probably have some political fallout. I was hoping that you would go on to explore the implications of that remark, but you moved off that topic. I suppose that suggests that you think the economic benefits of the tax, which you have adduced, are such as to make the political fallout relatively unimportant.

Let me put this to you, Senator Everett! The present government pushed through the Free Trade Agreement by quite a legitimate process that was politically costly. The present government then went ahead with the Meech Lake Accord. Whatever one may think of the elements of the Meech Lake Accord, it has to be agreed—particularly after the Ontario election—that that was extraordinarily costly to all those who were not out on the lines fighting against the accord. The present government brings in belatedly an attempt to deal by way of a tax increase with the deficit. I ask the Honourable Senator Everett if he has considered the possible consequences of this on the next federal election for both parties represented in the Senate.

Senator Everett: Yes and no is the quick answer. I am aware from the mail I have been receiving that public sentiment is running very much against the tax, and, from a political point of view, the government is taking a great risk and may be committing political suicide, for all I know.

Let me express my view of my function here, not anyone else's function. I am insulated. I am here until I am 75 years old. I am paid, I am privileged. You cannot really get at me.

If I am insulated, then it seems to me the criterion on which I make a decision is not necessarily related to what the public wants at that particular time. The criterion on which I would make a decision, without trying to impose it on anyone else, is based on what I think, to the best of my ability and knowledge, is best for the country in the long run. That is the argument I have tried to postulate today.

I have been saying—and I have been saying this in this chamber for the past four weeks—that if we are here to react to public opinion, if we are here to argue these things on the basis of partisan advantage or partisan disadvantage, then do not insulate me any longer. Make me go every five or six years to the public and ask them to decide whether or not I should continue in this place.

Senator Stewart: I think the senator did not take my question in the serious way that I put it to him. He says that what the government is determined to do may well have political consequences, but that since he is insulated from those consequences it is not his business to take that into consideration when he decides how he will vote.

I suggest to the honourable senator that it is an ostrich approach. Surely the economic factors he mentioned are of importance, but it would seem to me that a member of the Senate of Canada has to take into account the future good government of this country, and if by passing a bill which in economic terms—let us concede that for the sake of simplifying the argument—is good, but the ultimate political consequences are utterly disastrous, surely it does not require any great logical perception to reach the conclusion that a senator ought not to vote for that package.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, first of all, I have the greatest of respect for the knowledge and intelligence of the honourable senator. I would say to him that this is a very serious matter, an extremely serious matter. I do not take the attitude that it is not my business. But if what I am doing is to determine what the future government of the country should be, who am I to decide that? Where did I get that right? I came here by way of appointment. I was not elected by the people, nor will I be removed by the people; therefore I take a different view from that which you take. My obligation is to look at the legislation on the basis of what I think is in the best interests of the country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: The honourable senator thinks—and he may be right—that he is here to ensure that the right government, the best government or good government, is installed in the country. I just say—and I hope I have not misinterpreted the honourable senator—that that is not my obligation nor my right.

Senator Stewart: I believe the honourable senator has now got to the point of my question. Let me just say, in conclusion, that I do not think, as a Canadian citizen, whether I am a senator or not a senator, I have any right to opt out of important political decisions which will affect the long-term good government of this country.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I do not think that what I am doing is opting out of political decisions. I am laying my neck on the line just as everyone else is.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, listening to the erudite and knowledgeable presentation made by Senator Everett has left me very much perplexed, because until almost his last sentence his speech was almost a restatement of my lengthy speech of a couple of days ago.

Senator Everett was present for a good part of that speech. I apologize to him for not having it in print, but basically, in a short time, and probably in a much more able fashion, he outlined most of the problems I discussed.

An Hon. Senator: Question!

Senator Buckwold: Did I hear someone ask for the question?

Senator Simard: Yes.

Senator Buckwold: I won't deal with that, since I am asking a question. I am concerned with the effect on the inflation rate. I am concerned with the reaction of the Governor of the Bank of Canada who has said that he will accommodate a 1.25 per cent increase in the inflation rate next year, after which interest rates will go up in order to react against the inflationary aspect of the GST, which is also a concern of the Honourable Senator Everett.

I emphasize the importance of the national debt. I spoke about the regressivity of the tax, to which the honourable senator referred. I said that both income taxes and consumption taxes are required; but one must keep in mind that we have a consumption tax, a major consumption tax.

The honourable senator carried on with his argument and led up to the assumption that the major problem of the country is the national debt and the cost—-

An Hon. Senator: Question!

Senator Buckwold: It is coming; hold your horses.

Senator Kelleher: There are others who want to participate in the debate.

Senator Buckwold: We have a long day ahead of us.

All of this comes to the reduction of the debt. The honourable senator supports his stand, after all the verbiage, that the real problem of the country is the national debt and the cost of servicing it and the impact on the economic life of the country; and we are in complete agreement. That is what I talked about for some considerable time.

Senator Simard: You said that already.

Senator Buckwold: It does not hurt to repeat it.

Senator Simard: Why did you not allow such debate to take place on September 24?

Senator Buckwold: This comes down to the whole question of what the GST will do to the national debt.

At all of the committee meetings, from Mr. Wilson, the Minister of Finance, to the members of the committee—with one exception, whom I will refer to in a moment—it was emphasized a hundred times that this was a revenue neutral tax. I believe Senator Kelly said that in his opening speech back in May.

Senator Simard: For the first year.

Senator Buckwold: Now they are into the first year.

Senator Simard: You said that already.

Senator Buckwold: I am coming to my question. The only honest man was Senator MacDonald who finally could not stand it any longer. In Whitehorse he came out and said: "Let's stop kidding ourselves." I admire him. He said that we are going to get lots of money and that it will be used to reduce the deficit. I remember saying to him privately afterwards that had this been the government's line at the beginning, we may have had a different outcome. However, it was not, and it still is not.

My question for Senator Everett is this. Seeing that we are both on the same side, that we both gave the same speech and used the same evidence, how has he reached a different conclusion than my own? Where did we part company? What is the difference in the conclusion that I came to and the conclusion he reached?

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I would not presume for a moment to suggest that my speech came anywhere near the grandeur of the honourable senator's speech. I am glad to note that we are both honest men, that we look at the situation and conclude that the facts are the same. On that we do not disagree. What we disagree on is, perhaps, the conclusion.

I made the case, which I hope was convincing and sound in economic terms, that a consumption tax is a necessary corollary of an income tax and the requirement for more revenue which should be used to reduce the deficit, most especially since the component of the deficit about which we are concerned today is interest on the debt. That was the case I tried to make. I did not for a moment say that the GST was revenue neutral. If the honourable senator will recall, I referred to my May speech in which I said that it may be revenue neutral in the first year but after that it will be a productive tax. All I am saying is that it should be imposed and the revenue should be used to reduce the deficit. Along with that, there should be an undertaking by the government to keep spending under control and, if possible, to reduce program spending.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Senator Everett, you talked about the tax being revenue neutral. Yet you believe that there will be other reportings which will bring in excess money to what is being estimated at the moment, which money would then go to debt reduction. I presume that is what you are saying. If that does not happen and the figure stands as it has been estimated, and since you propose that it should reduce the debt, what figure do you see the tax going to in the next one, two or three years? Even to cover the deficit it would be necessary, instead of having a 7 per cent tax, to be faced with a 14 per cent or an 18 per cent tax in the next two to three years to make any great effect on the deficit. Are you suggesting that if the revenues are not increased, something which the government is not estimating, then in your opinion the tax should be raised to 9 per cent, 12 per cent, 14 per cent or 18 per cent in the future?

Senator Everett: My program says that it is possible to reduce reliance on the foreign holding of our debt. If we do that, we can reduce interest rates by virtue of the fact that we find ourselves in a climate of reduced demand. That reduction of interest rates will have an immediate effect on the reduction of the cost of servicing the debt and, by virtue of that, it will reduce the deficit.

Concerning any increase of the GST tax rate, I have said, and my investigations have shown, that the experience throughout the world where this type of tax has been imposed has been that revenue far exceeds the estimates at the time the tax was implemented. With respect to New Zealand specifically, I must say that I am vague on my figures, but I believe it was thought there would be 180,000 registrants when, in fact, there were 270,000.

I am castigating the government for saying that it is revenue neutral. It is only revenue neutral, if that is the case, in the first year. After that, I think it will be revenue positive.

Taking the program that I have outlined and relating it to the reduction in interest rates which will come out of a lower reliance on foreign debt, plus the reduction of the deficit which can come out of the increased revenues from the GST, I think the reduction in the deficit will be quite dramatic. I am confident of that. You may prove me wrong, but from my studies I feel reasonably confident of that. I do not think it will be necessary to raise the rate. While there may be adjustments to the way the tax works, and there should be, I think the time will really be spent not in looking at raising the rates but in integrating the provincial sales taxes into the system.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I would like to ask a question of Senator Everett, if I may. Given that one of the main and original purposes of the Senate was to provide for regional representation, I wonder what value Senator Everett puts on the impact of this tax from a regional standpoint. The fact is that in the prairie provinces the impact of the tax because of weather and distance will be substantially heavier on our region than on regions which have a better climate and are closer to the centres of production. If we consider the regions represented by Senators Lucier, Adams or Watt, we see that the situation is compounded.

Senator Everett: I do not think an answer is particularly necessary at this time. I think there are other senators who wish to get on with their speeches.

Hon. P. Michael Pitfield: I would like to congratulate Senator Everett for his remarks, particularly those concerning his role in the Senate, remarks which I think were very well stated.

We are here questioning whether or not we should reject the GST. There is no doubt that the Senate has the power to reject government legislation if it wants to do so, even a money bill. I think all the authorities are clear on that, and so too, as I shall show in a moment, is our own recent practice. Some senators do not like this. They think the Senate should be only advisory, and preferably only when the government asks them to. I have listened with care as Senator Roblin and Senator Murray have occasionally tried to make this claim. I regret to hear them do this because I respect them both. I respect them, but I think that in this case they are both quite wrong. The role that they urge for the Senate flies in the face of the role the law gives it. What they describe would be a significant change in the law.

[Senator Everett.]

If the law is to be changed, it should be done by due process. Like them, I would like to see changes made—somewhat different changes perhaps, but I agree with them that the existing situation has become and has been, for some time, difficult to say the least.

● (1620)

What the Senate has done best—improving legislation—it is increasingly unable to do. What the Senate is vitally needed for, and uniquely equipped to do—its federal-provincial role—increasingly it is far away from being able to do. Like many senators, I deplore this and fervently wish for Senate reform. That is why I came here. A change is long overdue.

However, many of the senators who say that the Senate is useless, like Senators Roblin and Murray—and the other day I heard Senator Doody saying it—are also the senators with the influence in the present government to start the ball rolling toward reform. I wish that they would do so. In the meantime, those of us who are senators today must act in accordance with the Senate as it is in the Constitution today. We must use our best judgment in the exercise of its powers. To abdicate is not to resolve the problem. It would simply be to pass the problem on to someone else. So long as we are here, we must act according to our oath of office. Our job is to fulfil the law.

We now have before us the GST. More particularly, at this stage we have a committee report, urging the rejection out of hand of the government's proposal of the GST. I have long supported the concept of a value-added tax, and I am not about to change my position now. Such a tax is an important and increasingly essential instrument of tax policy. This has been my view since I served in the early 1960s as a secretary and a research supervisor to the Royal Commission on Taxation. It is a view that I advocated in a series of speeches I made after leaving the public service in 1982. Of course, that was in the context of proposals for a reduced deficit that would have permitted lower interest rates, increased investment and lasting growth. Instead of that, we have had marked increases in taxation, higher interest rates, higher levels of expenditure, increasing public debt and growth, which, I suspect, is about to be blown away by a very serious recession. Now is a bad time to bring in a value-added tax, at least from the individual's point of view, and maybe also from an economic point of view, if the model is not perfectly competitive as Senator Everett seems to think it is.

Moreover, as our committee's report makes abundantly clear—and it is a very good report, and I congratulate Senator Buckwold on it—the value-added tax that we have been given is badly designed and poorly drafted, complex beyond understanding, plagued with administrative discretion, expensive, regressive, out of sync with other governments, provincial and municipal, and opposed by almost all of them. In short, the bill is in violation of all the rules of sound tax policy. It comes unmitigated by an informed, just and sensitive social policy. It is supposed to be revenue neutral, but it probably is not. We have been told that it will not go higher, but the imperatives of government finances almost certainly will make it that way. It has very little credibility in the country.

Like many other senators, I have been deluged with mail about this legislation. Never have I seen anything like it. This is no organized campaign; this is an outpouring of deeply-held personal feelings, a plea for understanding from the people of this country. There are deep cleavages developing all over the country. Those who disregard what is going on out there do so in peril, not only of themselves and not only of ourselves, but of the country itself.

Does all this mean that the Senate should reject the GST out of hand? We have the power to do so, but that power must be exercised with care, particularly in the case of a money bill. In recent weeks we have heard a lot of instant constitutional opinions, a lot of sweeping generalizations with regard to constitutional conventions. Many of them have been very dubious indeed. Nonetheless, I am sure that we can all agree that the defeat of a money bill has a special constitutional import. It is to defeat the government, and although that may not cause an election, it would contribute mightily to forcing one. For the unelected to do this to the elected calls for very special justification.

I spoke about this matter in this chamber some years ago during the free trade debate. I tried to set out some of the tests that have to be met to justify the Senate in rejecting a money bill. I said that it must be a matter of great importance; properly where the government had no express mandate from a previous election and preferably late in the government's term. There shouldbe no natural urgency for the government to act, as in a state of war or monetary crisis, and the enactment of the proposed legislation should, in practical terms, be virtually irreversible by a subsequent Parliament. These criteria were largely satisfied in the case of the free trade issue. That proposal was stopped in the Senate, subsequently upheld by the electorate, then quickly passed by the new Parliament. There was no great crisis about it. Indeed, the people seemed largely satisfied with the process.

So it is clear that the Senate can reject a money bill. The proposal to reject the GST, however, does not meet these criteria. That it is of great importance, there is no doubt, but in this case the government does have something of a mandate. It is still comparatively early in its term and the proposal can be changed or even repealed by a subsequent government. This suggests to me that, at the very least, the GST cannot be dismissed out of hand as our committee suggests it should. Our committee did excellent work, but it should have suggested improvements.

That there will be efforts by the Opposition to improve the GST legislation is implicit in the recently adopted provisional rules. I should perhaps point out in this connection that the provisional rules seem to be written in a world, it seems to me, where there are simply two political parties and all the world revolves around them. We have had something of a demonstration of that just from the attempts of independent senators to speak in this debate. I do not complain of this focus on partisanship. Partisanship is a necessary and central characteristic of our parliamentary institutions. As my old friend, former Senator Grattan O'Leary, used vigorously to assert, the parliamentary system is built on partisanship. Among its many merits, one of its minor utilities is the sustenance that party structure gives to the individual member in his judgments, the way in which ones comrades reinforce the courage of ones convictions and, perhaps, on occasion, soothes one's doubts. I would that I had some of that elixir now.

However, all the system is not about parties. The leaders on both sides of the chamber must also bear in mind the privileges of the independent senator. The independent senator has a role in this chamber that is technical, expert or moral, as the case may be, and that is useful. The independent senator is also the bedrock on which is built the rights and privileges of every individual senator, whatever his party, and that is essential. In this sense, the independent underwrites the party system.

The provisional rules are highly structured. They turn on the whips and "the Senator who occupies the Chair." But the independents have no whip; and given the response, or lack thereof, to my inquiry the other day, I take it there is no longer an independent Speaker. Hence, in the revision of the provisional rules, I trust that independents will be taken into account, or perhaps even consulted.

In the meantime, as we go forward under the provisional rules, amendments should be dealt with seriously, just as the offer of a conference on the UIC Bill should have been taken seriously. The government's refusal to conference with the Senate is unacceptable for the same reasons I mentioned with regard to the positions of Senators Roblin and Murray. The government's position in refusing to conference is essentially anti-Constitutional. For the government simply to steamroller the GST through this house of Parliament would also be anti-constitutional.

That said, the Opposition must now demonstrate the shortcomings of the bill before us in debate, and how to improve upon it.

At the end of the day, however, we must recognize that the GST is a fundamental element of the government's financial policy. The bill still may be defective, even gravely so; the tax probably still will be intended to yield more than has been admitted of it; the tax almost certainly will still be charted for the earliest possible increase; but, in the final analysis, I put it to the house, that it is almost unthinkable that the GST could be junked at this stage. Things have been managed so that the country's financial policy would be in chaos if this were to happen. Does anyone seriously envisage putting the country through such a crisis? Can any political party stand the opprobrium of initiating such a catastrophe? I do not think so.

In effect, the Senate has been deprived of the opportunity to contribute to the amelioration of a thoroughly bad bill. That is regrettable, from many points of view. However, the other side of the coin is that it is for the government to meet the judgment of the public on this issue.

Thus I conclude, on legal and on practical grounds, that this is not an issue on which the government should be defeated by the Senate.

This will be no consolation to the many people who have written to us; but we must act wisely and responsibly as well as with sensitivity. Partly what I see going on in the country comes from the tax; but partly also, I think, it comes from people being simply fed up. People are fed up with the intervention in their lives, with the complexity of public policy, with manipulation, with cynicism, and with the lack of integrity in public life.

We have heard the message of the people, we have heard it clearly, and we understand it must be demonstrated. That is vital and urgent. But it must be demonstrated in other ways than by rejecting the GST, and not simply by the Senate.

Much as I deplore those senators who are forever putting down the Senate, it is also true that the Senate must not take itself too seriously. The Senate cannot do everything. In what it can do, there is much for it to do. In addition to the examination of the government's legislation, there is a host of committee work to do. It is not glamorous, but it is useful. There is Senate reform, for surely it is unthinkable that the Senate should make no input into its own reform; and there is the job of assessing the impact of government legislation, such as free trade and, in due course, the GST.

In government great issues rarely end. The GST will be back again. I suggest that the Senate must get on with its own business.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee. Before commencing my remarks, I would like to commend and thank our Chairman, Senator Buckwold, for a magnificent job. I would also like to tell Senator Buckwold that despite the fact that he may never be Mayor of Beirut, he has certainly carried on the tradition of the chairmanship of the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce committee that was followed by our esteemed former colleagues such as Senator Hayden and Senator Sinclair.

Senator Simard: No comparison.

Senator Cools: I will come to you in a moment, Senator Simard.

The Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce committee has been one of esteemed importance. In this particular study, and particular set of conclusions, the chairman has done all of us a great service; he has also done the committee and the position of chairmanship a great service, and I highly commend him.

The last two speakers evoked certain sentiments, thoughts and feelings. I will not attempt to respond to both of them, but will place a few comments on the record so that, as we approach the home stretch in our consideration of the report, the record might perhaps be set straight on one or two things. I will not pretend that we can correct much of what has been said, and I know that the minds of honourable senators opposite are cast in stone in many ways; however, there has been a lot of false information circulated that needs to be corrected. I believe the word currently used is "disinformation." I would like to put a few things on the record in the hope that perhaps some "disinformation" may be rectified.

[Senator Pitfield.]

The first matter on which I would like to clarify the record follows on the heels of our discussion of privilege some two weeks ago. We all expressed concern that Section 26 of the B.N.A. Act had been invoked and, in a clandestine manner, eight people had been called to the Senate and had been sworn in with secrecy.

• (1640)

When Sir Alexander Mackenzie attempted to invoke section 26, in 1877, matters were handled a little more openly and candidly. There was much more public discussion. I should like to refer to the Sessional Papers (No. 68) for the Senate, for the year 1877. It is entitled, "(No. 68.) RETURN To an ADDRESS of the HOUSE OF COMMONS, dated 1st March, 1877;—For copies of all correspondence between the Dominion and the Imperial Governments from the month of October, 1873, to the 31st December, 1874, and relating to the appointment of Senators for the Dominion."

I should like to refer to page 130 of the Senate sessional papers, and to read from the resolution that was moved by the Honourable Mr. Campbell and seconded by the Honourable Mr. Wilmot:

> To Resolve, 1st. That by the 26th clause of the British North America Act, 1867, Her Majesty the Queen is empowered at any time in her discretion, and upon the recommendation of the Governor General, to direct that three or six Members be added to this House, provided that the persons so summoned to a seat therein represent equally the three divisions of Canada.
> 2. That in the opinion of this House this power was only intended to be exercised upon the occurrence of some grave political emergency, and with a view to the removal of serious differences which should actually have arisen between the Senate and the other House of Parliament, and are not susceptible of satisfactory adjustment by any other means.

In other words, there is no possibility of conferences, discussion or debate, or of any meeting of the minds. The third point is the essence of the reason I am speaking, and I continue to quote:

> 3. That it appears by Papers laid before this House . . .

That is, before the Senate chamber,

> . . . during the present Session, that on the 23rd December, 1873, the advisers of the Crown in this Dominion moved His Excellency the Governor General to apply to Her Majesty to direct that six Members should be added to the Senate, pursuant to the above-mentioned clause of the British North America Act.
> 4. That by a despatch from Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies dated the 18th February, 1874, it appears that inasmuch as no sufficient reason had been alleged to justify such an interference with the constitution of this House, Her Majesty's Imperial advisers declined to recommend a compliance with this request.

> 5. The House desires to express its high appreciation of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in refusing to advise an Act for which no Constitutional reason could be offered; and to record their opinion that any addition to the Senate under the provisions of the 26th clause of the British North America Act which is not absolutely necessary for the purpose of bringing this House into accord with the House of Commons, in the event of an actual collision of a serious and permanent character, would be an infringement of the constitutional independence of the Senate, and lead to a depreciation of its utility as a constituent part of the Legislature.

Honourable senators, I bring this resolution to your attention to indicate clearly that the way Section 26 at this point in time has been handled is not fitting nor harmonious with the tradition and practice of this country. Furthermore, I would ask honourable senators, if they have a moment, to look at the records and to read them, because what is especially important is that Her Majesty, under the advice of the Colonial Secretary, declined to make those appointments. The Colonial Secretary who advised Her Majesty to decline to make those appointments is the same Colonial Secretary who insisted that section 26 be included in the B.N.A. Act in the first place.

In addition, the honourable senators did vote on the resolution. In those days, they did not say "yea" and "nay". They said "contents" and "non-contents." Some of the honourable senators who would have been voting on this measure were the original individuals who became members of the Senate in 1867. Many of them would have been legislative Councillors from the previous governments of the uniting privinces.

Lord Carnarvon, was the Colonial Secretary. He was the very same gentleman who wanted section 26 inserted into the B.N.A. Act of 1867 for reasons of representing the Imperial government.

Honourable senators, this is an interesting and fascinating situation. I heard Senator Pitfield talk about money bills; I heard Senator Everett talk about public opinion; and I heard Senator Poitras talk about the legitimacy of the Senate. I tell you, honourable senators, that we have been led down the garden path for a very long time. On closer examination of some of these matters, it has been established that if any of these individuals were to be called upon to tell us what a money bill is, they would soon find themselves in tremendous difficulty. Dr. Eugene Forsey and Mr. Graham Eglinton have said repeatedly that the term "money bill" is not useful or helpful within the history or the constitutional practices of this particular country.

Honourable senators, in the interest of continuing in the same vein as Lord Carnarvon's insertion of section 26 into the B.N.A. Act of 1867, I should like to read into the record the dispatch that he sent to Sir John A. Macdonald and the others.

I would like to make sure that this dispatch is on the record. The dispatch obviously was sent after Lord Carnarvon had examined the Quebec Resolution with some seriousness. Lord Carnarvon says in the dispatch:

> The second point which Her Majesty's government desires should be reconsidered, is the consitution of the Legislative Counsel. They appreciate the considerations which have influenced the Conference in determining the moad in which this body, so important to the constitution of the legislature, should be composed. But it appears to them to require further consideration, whether, if the members be appointed for life and their number be fixed, there will be any sufficient means of restoring harmony between the Legislative Counsel and the popular assembly, if it shall ever unfortunately happen that a decided difference of opinion shall arise between them.

Those are some words from the dispatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

As well, I would like to share with honourable senators more evidence of his insistence that this clause be inserted to protect against any vagaries or wanderings of the local Canadian government. I would like to read a letter into the record, which was written to Lord Carnarvon by Sir John A. Macdonald, dated January 30, 1867. It is as follows:

> My Dear Lord Carnarvon,
> Our propositions were:—
> 1. That the tenure of office for the Senate should be for life.
> 2. That to preserve sectional interests, each of the three sections should be equally represented.
> We left the case there, but Your Lordship called our attention to the chance of a deadlock. To meet Your Lordships's views, and, as we understand it, the opinion of the Cabinet, we offered this suggestion . . .

There is a lot of misinformation and confusion about, and I am hoping that at some point we will bring some clarity. I see Senator Keon looking at me diligently, and I hope he is listening.

In the House of Lords debates of February 19, 1967, in his speech on the occasion of second reading of the British North America Act, Lord Carnarvon says as follows:

> In laying before your Lordships the details of one of the largest and most important measures which for many years it has been the duty of any Colonial Minister in this country to submit to Parliament, I must unaffectedly ask for the forbearance of the House.

He continues:

> It is enough to say that, in one form or another, it has for many years been before the public mind in the British Provinces of North America. Lord Durham, when he proposed in his most able Report the legislative union of Upper and Lower Canada, distinctly contemplated the incorporation of the Maritime Provinces.

Honourable senators, as we go into this it will become clear that despite the Colonial Secretary's insistence on the insertion of section 26, the discussion and consensus at the time clearly intended that there would be no swamping powers and that the Prime Minister and the cabinet of the Dominion would not have the capability to swamp the Senate. That is important.

I continue reading from the House of Lords debates of the day:

> Of all problems to be solved in the creation of a Colonial Constitution, none is more difficult than the composition of an Upper House.

We now begin to understand that this chamber was never intended to be a miniature House of Lords. In point of fact, it was given greater powers than the House of Lords and was given great powers in the area of financial legislation. Continuing reading from Lord Carnarvon:

> To attempt, therefore, a close and minute imitation of the English House of Lords is, I think, to court failure. There are, in my opinion, two broad principles to be kept in view in the creation of a Colonial Chamber: first, that it should be strong enough to maintain its own opinion, and to resist the sudden gusts of popular feeling; secondly, that it should not be so strong that it should be impenetrable to public sentiment, and therefore out of harmony with the other branch of the Legislature.

It was clearly intended that the Senate be attentive to the public interests. Lor Carnarvon continues:

> But as it is obvious that the principle of life nomination, combined with a fixed number of Members, might render a difference of opinion between the two Houses, a question almost insoluble under many years, and might bring about what is popularly known as a Legislative dead-lock, a power is conferred upon the Crown—a power, I need not say, that would only be exercised under exceptional and very grave circumstances . . .

He continues to describe that power, which is section 26.

Honourable senators, in much that has been said, in this chamber, the word "legitimacy" is often used. In noting the constant usage of the word legitimacy, I found myself searching to find out why certain words are being used in reference to this particular piece of legislation, and why they are being used in discussion on the appointment of the eight senators; which is the Prime Minister's attempt to swamp the Senate. I found myself musing and wondering about the terms "legitimacy" and "illegitimacy," and I found myself concluding that this is bastard legislation—this Bill C-62.

Honourable senators, many of us long ago would have forgotten what is a bastard. Many of us would be thinking that a bastard was simply a child born out of wedlock; but we would be wrong. It is not simply an illegitimate child. Understand that modern society has now so advanced that all children are legitimate. However, a bastard was never just an illegitimate child. A bastard was an illegitimate child conceived outside of any regard for human love, human emotion or human relationship. A bastard was the child of a rape, or the conception of untutored, primal sexual brutish impulses. Traditionally a bastard was an illegitimate child that was not even conceived in bed. Traditionally it meant that this poor creature was conceived behind a barn somewhere. I tell you, honourable senators, much pain and anguish was visited upon those poor children who were unfortunate in life to have been bastards. I tell you that this is bastard legislation, because it is, as other honourable senators have said, ill-conceived. It was conceived, and there is now an attempt to have it implemented, outside of what we in this chamber have normally considered to be tutored, informed, civilized and intelligent consideration. What progeny!

Tonight I looked up the word "bastard" and found the definition interesting. The dictionary said things like "counterfeit" and "improper" and "unauthorized." This Bill C-62 is bastard legislation.

I should like to speak to the legitimacy of the Senate. Honourable senators, we listen and at all times try to be sensitive, because despite the fact that we sit on different sides, we have some regard for the fact that all of us here have made some sort of significant contribution in life. I see my honourable friend across the way, Senator Beaudoin, one of the constitutional experts in this house. As a matter of fact, the honourable senator is known to give constitutional advice to the government. I observed during the last week of the Meech Lake debate that his name was among those on the legal opinion that was submitted to the government on the question of the "distinct society" clause.

An Hon. Senator: It was a good opinion!

Senator Cools: Well, it will never be tested now, senator. I should like to continue by citing what the Speaker of the House of Commons cites from time to time, what Senator Beaudoin cites from time to time, what Minister Harvie Andre cites from time to time, what many others cite from time to time, and what Senator Pitfield was alluding to in his discussion on money bills. I should like to place on the record sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution of Canada. Many people cite those sections as limitations on the powers of the Senate vis-a-vis money bills. Some day I will ask Senator Beaudoin to define a "money bill" for us, but I should like to draw honourable senators' attention to the fact that the term "money bill" exists nowhere in our Constitution. The words have no statutory recognition in this country, neither do they have any constitutional recognition in this country. I want to put this on the record. Section 53 says:

> Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

I shall come back to that in a moment. Section 54 says:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

Honourable senators, we have been hearing a lot of poppycock about these sections. If we were to examine Bill C-62 we would find that it comes with no royal recommendation. Furthermore, section 54 is not a limitation on the powers of the Senate. Section 54 is a limitation on the members of the House of Commons, because the intention of section 54 was to ensure that all those ordinary, members of the House of Commons could not introduce bills that would cause expenditure. And senators opposite, talk about democracy! The intention of section 54 is to limit the powers of the members of the House of Commons. It is to limit the powers of the Commons, the backbenchers, and to enhance the powers of the Ministry, the cabinet. It is no limitation on the powers of the Senate. Look as we may, we will not find a Royal Recommendation on Bill C-62. Section 54 deals with the House of Commons. It does not say anything about the Senate. What we have been hearing from time to time is a lot of piffle and rubbish.

Section 53, on the other hand, is a limitation. I should like to share with honourable senators the fact that in the discussions leading to the writing and the passing of the BNA Act, it was the only limitation that the Fathers of Confederation accepted. That is very fascinating, honourable senators, because Sir John A. Macdonald was a very clever fellow. He was so terribly clever that he anticipated the actions of many Tories in the future. He understood how Tories think, and he crafted a lot of this with the express intention of protecting us in the future from the mentality of those who want to grab and accumulate more power, because he knew that that was the nature of humanity, the nature of the House of Commons and the nature of the cabinet. Section 53 is the only limitation. Section 53, honourable senators, has its origins in a resolution of the English House of Commons of 1661.

I would also like to share with you Sections 91, 17 and 18 of the Constitution Act. Perhaps there is not enough time today, but we can return to this later in debate at third reading.

Section 91 is something that I wish to put on the record, because it is the reason why I am prepared to accept the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and it is the very reason why I am prepared to accept the advice of the Banking committee of the Senate. Section 91, which is under Part VI entitled "DISTRIBUTION OF LEGISLATIVE POWERS", says something quite different from what Senator Everett and many others have been saying. Section 91, under Powers of the Parliament, states:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada . . .

I ask you, honourable senators, is Bill C-62 for the peace, order and good government of Canada?

An Hon. Senator: Yes!

Senator Cools: Peace, honourable senators? Canadians are different from Americans. When Americans wrote their constitution they used a lot of poetry. When they wrote their documents, they contained a lot that was poetic. It meant nothing, but they loved it. For example, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal." Well it was not self-evident then and it is not self-evident today. But not so in Canada. Not so for Sir John A. Macdonald; not so for George Brown. They were not interested in poetry. They were interested in the constitutional bottom line. They said that "it shall be lawful to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada." Well, honourable senators, Bill C-62 is not about peace, order, and good government. That is why I will vote in the way that I have decided. That is the reason that I shall vote in support of the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee.

For those who insist that the Senate does not have the powers that it has, and for those who insist that Sections 53 and 54 were intended to bridle, fetter and encumber the Senate in some form or fashion, I should like to put Section 18 on the record. This is important, because Section 18 shows clearly that when the Fathers of Confederation were trying to determine the maximum of power for the Senate, they chose the comparison to the House of Commons and not the House of Lords. I repeat not the House of Lords, but the Commons. I shall read Section 18, which is under Part IV entitled "LEGISLATIVE POWER". It states:

> The privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the Members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that any Act of the Parliament of Canada defining such privileges, immunities, and powers shall not confer any privileges, immunities, or powers exceeding those at the passing of such Act held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the Members thereof.

I should like to close by quoting George Brown. I hope somehow that perhaps I have made some contribution to dispelling the mythology that the House of Commons and the Prime Minister of Canada has the right to drag the Senate under them. I shall read from the Confederation debates and I am quoting George Brown, who says—and it was the opinion of many, that:

> The desire was to render the Upper House a thoroughly independent body—one that would be in the best position to canvass dispassionately the measures of this House, and stand up for the public interests in opposition to hasty or partisan legislation.

> . . . can it be anticipated that our Upper Chamber would set itself rashly against the popular will? If any fear is to be entertained in the matter, is it not rather that the Councillors will be found too thoroughly in harmony with the popular feeling of the day?

Honourable senators, the time is passing and I will be quite happy to defer to others who must speak, but there are many more things that I wanted to say. There shall be ample opportunity to say them, but I would like us in this chamber to begin to dispel some of this mythology that the Senate is not a legitimate body and that it does not have the proper powers and the proper authority to do what it is doing. I want to see if we cannot dispel some of the misinformation and bring clarity to these questions. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I rise somewhat reluctantly and certainly sadly in this chamber, which has just made history—unfortunately, history of the wrong sort. The events of the last couple of weeks have dismayed me and, I am sure, disgusted a great many people in this country.

After the extraordinary performances witnessed here, we have finally come to the item of business which has been waiting, namely, the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee on the goods and services tax, Bill C-62.

I should like to congratulate Senator Buckwold for his excellent speech in support of the motion to accept his report. It was a real tour de force. I would like to say that I benefited greatly from it, and I hope that he will still be my friend after this evening.

I am sorry if I am repetitious, but the last time I spoke was three weeks ago at 3 o'clock in the morning, and in the course of that effort I was interrupted some 36 times. Please forgive me if I bore you.

This report distressed me because, in my humble opinion, the Senate did not do its duty. As I mentioned on October 4, the practice of "prestudy" which we call the "Hayden Formula" gave this chamber enough time to study legislation and deal with it in a more thorough way than was ever possible before. Those of us who have been here for a length of time can remember how often we would receive legislation just before an adjournment or a parliamentary recess with the request or instruction to pass the legislation within a matter of days, or sometimes even hours. By introducing study of the subject matter of legislation in one of our committees as soon as it was introduced in the House of Commons usually gave us the time we needed to deal competently with any complex matter.

To return to the matter of the committee's report, Bill C-62 was introduced in the other place on January 24, 1990, but was not dealt with in the Senate until mid-April. Then about three months were spent on travelling. There can be no denying that hearing the views of the people across the country is a splendid thing, and it would be nice if all legislation could similarly be dealt with in a reasonable time. In this case, the Senate having discontinued the practice of prestudy there was not enough time left to deal with this complex bill.

However, had the practice of prestudy been continued, there would have been adequate time—some eight months—for the Senate to hear and study enough evidence to have carried out its traditional responsibility of improving the legislation and making the task of governing the country by Parliament more viable. It was just too obvious in this case—a very unpopular tax bill and such a great political weapon—that the decision was taken early to block it and consequently win more points against the government, which had already slipped enormously in the polls.

The decision not to try to improve legislation by amending it, but rather simply to defeat it, can only be justified under the most extraordinary circumstances.

I know that it will be argued that the bill is so bad that defeating it is the way to protect the public. But I also know that this form of taxation, if properly planned and adequately explained—and in use in so many countries—is one which could lead to an improved taxation system and be the means of beginning to cope with our tremendously overwhelming debt.

Honourable senators, this country, living the way we do, is heading for bankruptcy. We have to find a way to pay our bills. I know how much the deficit has increased under the present government. I also know how great was the accumulated deficit built up under previous governments. Converted at constant dollars, that figure would look pretty onerous today.

A great deal of the past performance has been responsible for the high interest rates of today, and I would suggest that trying to lay the blame on one another is an exercise in futility. We have for years spent beyond our means and, like anyone else, sooner or later we have to pay our bills.

This brings me to my view of the report under consideration. My view is that the committee should have recommended valid amendments to the bill, no matter how many, and not simply recommended its defeat. Amendments to protect those who can least afford to pay and to load more on those who can afford to pay would have been appropriate. There are obviously many ways in which amendments should have been put forward. The present plan to propose amendments at this late date is completely unworkable. For its part, the government should have given far greater assurances, some certainty, of reducing expenditures on a substantial scale, and the public should have been assured of plans to bring that about.

I am not happy with the GST bill as it now stands, and I would like to see it properly amended. I have had dozens of letters and telephone calls condemning the bill. I quite understand and sympathize with the public who object to the government legislation. We are heavily taxed and there is the impression that the GST is simply adding further to the load.

I cannot accept the report of the committee, which was so obviously planned to win the war between our main traditional political parties.

It looks probable that the present situation will lead us along the road to a splintered Parliament with several parties. Having seen the problems in European, South American and other countries created by parliamentary minorities, coalitions and efforts to govern, it will be a sad day if the result of our Senate impasse is that depressing outlook.

As honourable senators know, I have been, and acted, as an independent for 35 years, since being appointed at the same time as Senator Croll by the Right Honourable Louis St-Laurent. Now, for the first time, the partisan battle in the Senate gives an undue weight to the vote of independents. Under normal clear-cut situations this might be acceptable, but when the issue is between unpopular tax legislation and a committee report which has not attempted to make the bill workable and more equitable, I simply cannot accept the role of helping to decide whether the government or Senator MacEachen should direct this country's fiscal policy.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, in rising to close the debate on the committee's report on Bill C-62, I had intended, had more time been available, to comment on and to give, particularly for members opposite who were not involved in the committee hearings, some illustrative examples of the kind of testimony which the committee received as it travelled across the country—because, as we went from St. John's, Newfoundland across each of the ten provinces and up into the northern territories, we heard witness after witness, from all walks of life, and representing all types of organizations, comment on what they thought was the inherent unfairness of the bill.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Did the honourable senator speak earlier in this debate?

Senator Kirby: No, I have not spoken on the report stage.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

Senator Kirby: You asked that because there were a number of speeches I was involved in at an earlier stage.

Senator Doody: There were indeed.

Senator Kirby: Honourable senators, rather than detail some of the comments received by the committee as it travelled across the country, I thought it appropriate, in light of the remarks which Senator Pitfield made earlier, that I make some comments at least in reply, because I think, as many honourable senators know, Senator Pitfield and I have had the privilege of working together for many years. In normal times I respect the nature of his argument, yet I was frankly very surprised by the argument he put forward today. I thought that it required at least one or two comments in reply.

In his opening comments, Senator Pitfield observed that the Senate in fact had a legal right to defeat any piece of government legislation. He went on to say that he wished that were not the case. He also observed that he hoped that Senate reform would occur, which would, in fact, limit the ability of this chamber to actually defeat a bill. Nevertheless he recognized the right, and the legal and constitutional authority, of this chamber to do that.

He then went on to say that there were three criteria which had to be met if the Senate were to exercise its power. The first criterion was that the issue had to be important. With respect to the GST, he made the observation that there is little doubt that the GST is an issue of major importance to Canadians. In his remarks he conceded that, in terms of meeting his criteria of importance, that criterion was definitely met by the GST.

His second criterion was that before the Senate should decide to defeat a bill, it needed to be a bill which, once implemented, would, in effect, not be repealable, or unable to be changed, once it was in place. The example which Senator Pitfield gave of a bill which met that test was the free trade bill. He pointed out that he favoured the delay of the free trade bill, which took place in this chamber in 1988, because he believed that once the free trade bill was in place it could not be repealed.

When he attempted to apply that criteria to the GST, Senator Pitfield said two things which, in my view, are inherently inconsistent. The first point he made was that as a tax measure the GST could, in fact, be repealed and changed eventually. He made the argument that therefore the GST did not meet his test of being a bill that once in place could not be changed. Later on in his remarks, Senator Pitfield stressed that one of the reasons he was going to support the GST was the fact that this chamber had no option but to pass the bill because of the financial situation of the government and because of the fact that the private sector had invested money in preparation of the bill being passed.

It seems to me to be an extremely inconsistent position to argue, on the one hand, that we must go ahead and pass the bill because of the cost to the private sector, and, indeed, to the government, in failing to pass it, when the government's own spokespersons tell us that many people and companies have not yet registered, while, on the other hand, they take the position that this is the kind of bill which, in fact, can subsequently be repealed. That clearly is an inconsistent position. If it is okay to repeal a bill two or three years after it is in place, then it is clearly much less costly to the Canadian economy, to the government, and indeed to the private sector, to repeal the bill before it is ever put in place. That part of Senator Pitfield's argument, to be kind about it, seems to me to be fairly weak.

The third observation which Senator Pitfield made repeatedly was that Bill C-62 is a piece of legislation which clearly is in need of very significant amendment. I point out that he did not tell us what those amendments should be. I can only presume, of course, that in the course of third reading debate he will propose a number of amendments to clear up the flaws, whatever they are, which he clearly indicated exist in the bill.

He went on to add, that with respect to amendments, that he thought it was important that they be taken seriously. I can assure him that members on this side of the house will be very happy to take seriously, and indeed to debate seriously, whatever amendments he decides to introduce.

He also observed, quite correctly, that the provisional orders concerning the process by which Bill C-62 will be handled do not take into account the presence of independent senators in the chamber. I share his view that there is very good reason why the role of independent senators should be taken into account. It has been clear, from public comments made by members on this side of the house as well as by government senators, that we understand there is an important role in this chamber for independent senators, that they will have an opportunity to introduce amendments as we get into debate on third reading, and that those amendments will be taken seriously and will be debated and voted on by members of this chamber.

POINT OF ORDER

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Kirby would yield to a point of order which I wish to raise?

The house order with respect to Bill C-62 provides:

> . . . at not later than 5.45 o'clock p.m., on Thursday, October 25, 1990, the Senator then in the Chair shall, if required, interrupt any proceedings then before the Senate and shall proceed to put forthwith and successively, without any further debate or amendment, all questions necessary to dispose of the report stage of the said Bill;

Before those questions are put and that interruption takes place, I have two points that I should like to have clarified for the record with regard to voting, because it is expected that a vote will follow the putting of those questions.

The first point deals with the question of the Speaker's voting. Because, on the basis of the research I have done, the Speaker has not voted for some time, it is worthwhile to draw the attention of the Senate to the procedure that is followed. It has always been followed, but I think that often we have not noticed what that procedure is.

It is put forward in Bourinot's on page 379:

> In the Senate the speaker says—"The contents will now rise." Then the clerk or clerk-assistant, standing at the table, proceeds to call the names—first looking at Mr. Speaker, who remains seated, and indicates by an indication of his head his desire to vote, or his intention not to vote by the absence of any movement on his part. In all cases the speaker's voice should be first recorded on the side on which he wishes to vote.

The research I have done says that the last time that a Speaker so indicated was in 1933. As far as I know, the senator presently in the Chair has never voted. The Speaker at that time was a Senator Blondin. As reported at page 167 of the Debates for that day it shows that he voted. Speaker Blondin voted again on March 14, 1933 and again on June 30, 1935, a Saturday. May 29, 1935, as far as I can see, is the last time that a Speaker voted. Of course, there is no question that under the rules the Speaker is entitled to vote. However, he might want to apply Senator Kelly's rule for the exercise of constitutional rights which is, "if you don't use it, you lose it." He applies that rule when it comes to the Senate defeating a piece of legislation, but he does not apply it to the use of section 26, and I do not know whether the Speaker intends to use it with reference to this vote.

● (1740)

Senator Barootes: Are you trying to intimidate the Speaker?

Senator Frith: My second point also relates to the question of the vote, and is with regard to the vote of the eight senators appointed pursuant to section 26. I ask them to refrain from voting—

Senator Murray: Harrumph!

Senator Frith: —while their constitutional right to do so is under serious question and while the Senate is being asked to investigate their qualifications pursuant to section 23 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as enacted by the Constitution Act, 1982.

Senator Simard: Good try.

Senator Olson: You don't want to vote under a cloud.

Senator Simard: Strike three, Royce.

THIRTEENTH REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION—DEBATE CONCLUDED

Hon Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, if I may, I should like to finish off the point I was trying to make with regard to Senator Pitfield's comments. Senator Pitfield had commented about how bad the bill is and about its clear need for significant amendment; but he did not indicate what those amendments should be. It seems to me that it is only reasonable to make two assumptions with respect to his comments. First, during the course of third reading debate presumably he will be introducing amendments that will bring the bill into line with his concerns about its being such a poor piece of legislation. I would be very surprised if someone of Senator Pitfield's intellectual ability did not at some point in time indicate how the bill could be made better.

My second observation, on the very strong comments made by Senator Pitfield with respect to what a poor piece of legislation this bill is, is that if the amendments he proposes are not passed, or if we do not end up with a bill with those major areas of concern removed, it seems only logical that he will not vote in support of the bill. I raise those two points because I think they are important. No matter how much individual senators may think that the bill could be made acceptable with certain changes, in the end, despite the incredible intransigence shown by government members, both when the bill was before the committee in the other place and while under debate in the other place, and by government members on the Banking, Trade and commerce which travelled across the country this summer, senators opposite will have to judge in their own minds whether they are prepared to support a bill that is weak, or whether they are prepared to conclude, as members on this side of the house have concluded—and, indeed, as members in the committee concluded—that in the absence of significant change the bill should be defeated. I realize that there will be plenty of time to discuss what those specific changes ought to be in the weeks and months ahead.

I will make one final comment as we approach 5:45. I make this comment on behalf of those who served on the committee this summer, keeping in mind all of the comments and criticisms we received on the bill. The reason the committee reached the conclusion it did is because it ultimately came to the conclusion that the bill would require so many amendments, such massive rewriting and such total restructuring, that it was better for Canadians, and indeed for the government, simply to abandon it in its current form rather than to try to rewrite it or tinker with it. It is on that basis, after listening to witnesses all summer long, that we came to that conclusion. It is not possible to tinker with this bill, to deal with its unfairness and regressivity by amending it to make it palatable, and that is why I, along with my colleagues on this side of the house, will be voting in support of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee and the motion to adopt this report and kill the GST.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THIRTEENTH REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, due to special order of this house, I shall now put the question.

It was moved by the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, that this report be adopted.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "Yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "Nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "Nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors of the chamber be locked.

Honourable Senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury:

> That the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Bill C-62 an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act), be now adopted.

Motion of Senator Buckwold negatived on the following division:

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Nil

The Hon. The Speaker: I declare the motion lost. Let the doors be opened.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Kelly: At the next sitting of the Senate.

On Motion of Senator Kelly, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the continuing point of order, I want to be sure that it is clear on the record that Senators Forrestall, Ross, Grimard, Lavoie-Roux, Keon, Meighen, Berntson and Johnson, all appointed under Section 26, voted in spite of the point that was raised as to their constitutional right to do so. If they had refrained from voting, the motion would have carried 51 to 49.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that all remaining orders, motions and inquiries stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 9.30 a.m.

THE SENATE

The Senate met at 9.30 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE HONOURABLE THÉRÈSE LAVOIE-ROUX

TRIBUTES ON RECEIPT OF DOCTORATE—HONORIS CAUSA

Hon. Mario Beaulieu: Honourable senators, last October 23 the University of Montreal Faculty of Social Sciences honoured Senator Thérèse Lavoie-Roux by awarding her a doctorate honoris causa in social sciences for her outstanding contribution during her political career.

As you know, Senator Lavoie-Roux was President of the Montreal School Board, one of the largest in Canada. She was the first woman ever appointed Minister of Social Affairs in Quebec, and she always played a leading role in the development of social sciences in the province.

I congratulate her and I am sure this chamber will want to pay tribute to her.

THE HONOURABLE CLAUDE CASTONGUAY

TRIBUTES ON RECEIPT OF HONORARY DOCTORATE

Hon. Mario Beaulieu: Honourable senators, I want to take this opportunity to point out that another one of our colleagues, Senator Claude Castonguay, well-known businessman and minister in Quebec, received two doctorates recently. On September 13, the Royal Military College of Saint-Jean awarded him a doctorate in business administration. He received the second doctorate the day before yesterday, but was unable to attend the ceremony.

THIRTEENTH REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION NEGATIVED ON DIVISION—POINT OF ORDER

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I wish to make a correction to remarks I made yesterday regarding the voting of His Honour the Speaker. I was incorrect. The last time that a Speaker had voted was not in 1935, as I had stated. I am obliged to my colleague, Senator Austin, for telling me there was an incident in 1946, which can be found at page 540 of the Debates of The Senate, Second Session, Twentieth Parliament, 10 George VI, when a speaker, Senator King, voted with the "noncontents" on that date.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SEVENTIETH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Friday, October 26, 1990

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

SEVENTIETH REPORT

Your Committee recommends that a supplementary estimate of $2,527,000 for the fiscal year 1990-1991 be requested from Treasury Board at the next opportunity.

The estimates are needed for the payment of operating expenses resulting from the appointment of new Senators and to authorize, and implement during the current and subsequent fiscal years, the Forty-first Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, Second Session, 34th Parliament, adopted by the Senate on June 5, 1990.

Respectfully submitted,

ROMÉO LEBLANC
CHAIRMAN

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator LeBlanc, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

COSTS OF EXTENDED SITTING—DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, responding to an item that has been raised, I wish to table a letter from the Clerk of the Senate regarding the question of incremental costs for the extended sitting hours of the Senate. The letter has explanatory notes. It also includes a table spelling out those incremental costs.

I am sorry that Senator Simard, who raised the issue, is not in his seat. However, I did inform him yesterday that I hoped to table this letter this morning.

Senator Molgat: Could the honourable senator tell us what the amount is?

Senator LeBlanc: There are costs which have not yet been included, such as those of other agencies of the government which provide services. I refer to the costs incurred by the Secretary of State which department provides translation services. Apparently, the average per day was $13,500, which, if I can be partisan for a moment, appears to be a rather modest sum considering the estimated cost of collecting the GST, which is roughly $1 million per day.

Senator Molgat: Thus it is nowhere near Senator Simard's estimate of $150,000 per day; is that correct?

Senator LeBlanc: I do not want to give a final judgment, because there are a few extra costs which I cannot yet indicate. However, let me put it this way: It is less than 10 per cent of the figure stated in the house in a rather feverish climate.

Document tabled.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, by way of explanation, we anticipate Bill C-44 being refered to the committee sometime later this morning. In anticipation of that, we propose to meet with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who will be available at 11 a.m. If the Senate proceeds as I anticipate, we would like to be sitting in committee at 11 a.m., and accordingly, I make this request.

Senator Roblin: Could my honourable friend tell me in what room the committee will meet?

Senator Hays: The proposed meeting will take place in Room 257 of the East Block.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT

PROPOSED SALE BY BOEING—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT AS GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate in connection with the proposed sale by Boeing of the de Havilland Division.

As the Minister will be aware, there have been news reports to the effect that Aerospatiale, which is a European company controlled by the Governments of France and Italy, has been reviewing the assets and business of de Havilland. Boeing has said publicly that it wishes to dispose of those assets if a favourable price is received. Today de Havilland is a division of Boeing, at one time it was a stand alone company owned by the federal government. The de Havilland company employs 5,000 people directly, with a multiplier of perhaps another 7,000 people across the country, including 400 people in British Columbia who make parts for de Havilland products.

My question is this: Has the government decided, as a matter of policy, to accept the possibility of foreign government ownership of de Havilland? Further, is the government taking any steps to ensure that de Havilland retains its technological and marketing capacities for Canada in the manufacture of airframes, so that Canada will continue to have the opportunity to negotiate for offsets as it acquires a commercial airfleet over the years? That has been our habit and the way in which we have preserved Canadian employment.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall obtain as full a report as I can on this matter and table it in the Senate very shortly.

THE ENVIRONMENT

RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA DAMS PROJECT—REIMBURSEMENT OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in his capacity as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, and it refers to the Rafferty-Alameda Dams project.

On May 17 and May 23 I asked questions regarding that project. On June 6 the Deputy Leader of the Government, in replying to my questions, stated:

> Canada has made four payments of $1 million each to compensate Saskatchewan for the financial costs of construction delays for the project during the Panel investigations.

If I remember correctly, the government had agreed to pay Saskatchewan up to $10 million on this basis.

Can the minister inform us how much, indeed, has been paid to Saskatchewan at this point? In view of the fact that Saskatchewan has decided to proceed with construction, against the agreement that had been made, will the federal government be requesting whatever has been paid out to Saskatchewan to be returned?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, as my friend knows, the matter is now before the courts. I shall obtain a report from my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, on the honourable senator's specific questions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR TO IRAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. The government announced some days ago that it was closing its embassy in Kuwait. Not long afterwards it announced that it was posting an ambassador to Tehran, Iran, following many years of non-diplomatic Canadian presence in that country, although it said it had never closed the embassy there.

In recent days Iraq and Iran have rejoined forces against outsiders to the Gulf incident. I should like to remind honourable senators that Iraq engaged in one of the bloodiest and dirtiest wars in the Middle East. It is now rejoining one of the most repressive states in the Gulf.

Canada is engaging in what is tantamount to open warfare with Iraq, following the declaration yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the Leader of the Government explain to me the logic, if there is any, in the move to reinstate an ambassador in Tehran in the present circumstances?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not follow the logic of my honourable friend's question.

Senator Corbin: I am asking about your logic, never mind mine.

Senator Murray: I also do not see the connection between the two decisions. First of all, let me say, with respect, that the honourable senator should choose his words more carefully when he talks of Canada waging "open warfare" on Iraq. He might be interested in reading a copy of the statement made yesterday, October 25 to the House of Commons Committee on External Affairs and International Trade by the Right Honourable Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would be glad to table that statement.

With regard to our diplomatic representation in Iran, I can only say that it has never been Canada's position, under any government of which I am aware, that we play a useful role in the world by withdrawing diplomatic representatives from a country or by cutting off diplomatic recognition of a country. We have found that we can play a more useful role in the world by maintaining our representation around the world.

Senator Corbin: If that is the case, why has Canada not maintained its embassy in Kuwait, as other nations have done?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we have conceded no principle whatsoever in withdrawing our people from the embassy in Kuwait. We have withdrawn Canadian diplomats from there because the practical situation of living there has become quite intolerable. I repeat, we have conceded no principle whatever. We continue to believe, together with just about all the rest of the world, that the annexation of Kuwait by Iraq was and is illegal. The problem is that our diplomats could not continue to live in Kuwait in any—I was going to say "comfort", but that is not the word. It simply became impossible for them to live there, given the situation with regard to food and fuel and the most basic amenities of life. Again, I repeat, we have conceded no principle in withdrawing those individuals.

Honourable senators, may I be permitted to table Mr. Clark's statement to the House of Commons Committee on External Affairs and International Trade?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government said that I used unfortunate words when I referred to the Secretary of State for External Affairs as "waging war." War can be waged in many ways.

Senator Frith: Against the GST for example.

Senator Corbin: After hearing, through the news media, what the Secretary of State had to say yesterday, and paying good notice to the many commentaries that were made following that declaration, I have come to the conclusion that you can wage war by shooting with your mouth, which is what the Secretary of State did yesterday.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I invite the Honourable Senator Corbin to read attentively the declaration that was made by Mr. Clark at the House of Commons committee meeting yesterday, to examine also the questions and answers in that committee, and finally to read Hansard of the House of Commons for yesterday when Mr. Clark elaborated upon and amplified his statements before the committee. Taken as a whole, my honourable friend will see that there is no change in the essential policy of the Canadian Government on this matter.

We want to see a diplomatic solution to the problem. Meanwhile, we quite understand that strength may be the only language that Saddam Hussein understands, and we have been in the forefront, from the very beginning, in emphasizing the need for a multinational response to the problem and a multinational presence in that area in order to discourage further aggression on the part of Iraq and to support the sanctions that have been mandated by the United Nations Security Council.

Senator Corbin: Not necessarily accepting the honourable leader's responses to my questions, I will leave that for this week and come back to it next week, because I know that senators are anxious to get on with the Hibernia bill.

PERSIAN GULF

COMMITMENT OF CANADIAN LAND FORCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate state clearly this morning whether Canada has committed itself, or promised any power, including the U.S., or any other government, or the United Nations, to send land forces to the Persian Gulf area to take part in an offensive attack against Iraq? I am talking about land forces.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the answer to that question is in the negative.

Hon. Joan Neiman: On that question, honourable senators, I would like one more reassurance from the government leader that our position remains unchanged, that we are there in a defensive capacity and that our forces, and those with whom we are allied, will not, as it were, fire the first shot.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I hesitate to venture out into that territory, as the honourable senator wishes me to do. The other day I had a discussion in this house with the Leader of the Opposition concerning the rules of engagement which have been given to the Canadian military. I undertook to ascertain how much information can properly be placed on the public record at this time, and I shall do so; but the honourable senator is getting into a rather sensitive area.

I again confirm that our forces are there, first of all as part of an unprecedented international effort to discourage further aggression, and also in support of sanctions.

In support of the sanctions, it is necessary for our ships to intercept those of other countries, and in some cases to board them. It has not been necessary to fire any shots, but we have intercepted quite a few vessels of other countries, and, in some cases, have boarded them.

Other than that, I will do what I said I would do the other day, which is to ascertain what instructions we have given our forces in that area and determine what I can properly place on the record at this time.

[Senator Murray.]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REGULATIONS

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is about another war which I find very disturbing, a war that, although undeclared, seems to be getting steadily worse. I am referring to the dispute between Francophones and Anglophones, and because I am so cocerned about the situation, I would like to put the following question to the Leader of the Government.

In 1988, the government passed or rather amended the Official Languages Act, with a great deal of hoopla. Nearly two years later, in April or May, if I remember correctly, the Commissioner of Official Languages was so . . . words cannot describe what he felt, but in any case, he even threatened to resign. Yesterday or the day before, another report by the Commissioner of Offical Language was tabled in the House. This time he did not threaten to resign but, like all Francophones, in this country, expressed his concern about the fact that two years later, the regulations to implement the legislation had not been tabled.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, like Senator Thériault, I regret the delay in tabling the regulations rising from the new Official Languages Act. This is a very complex area, as the senator well knows, the federal government remains firmly committed to tabling these regulations in order to provide equitable services to Anglophones and Francophones across Canada. I expect the regulations will be tabled very shortly. However, I may remind the hon. member that bilingual services are available at more than 1,600 locations across the Country.

If the senator is willing to be patient for a very short while, I am confident that the regulations will be available and that they will be laid on the Table of this Chamber.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am willing to wait but I can assure the government leader in the Senate that a lot of French-speaking Canadian, especially outside Quebec, are worried as they remember with bitterness the 1988 election campaign when the Prime Minister himself said, on several occasions, that the 1988 law would apply to Francophones outside Quebec. These people wonder if there is a problem with tabling the regulations related to the protection of Anglophones in Quebec.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, in all honesty, I must remind the hon. senator that the Official Languages Act was passed by Parliament in 1969.

Between 1969 and 1988, successive Commissioners of Official Languages, as well as the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, insisted that the Trudeau government make amendments to his Act, but it never did.

Then, in 1988, the Mulroney government asked the House of Commons and the Senate to approve very substantial amendments to this legislation. The new law was welcomed by every minority group in the country.

All that remains to be done is table regulations under this law. I want to assure the hon. senator and all those interested that the government's commitment in this regard is as strong as before.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I, for one, would like to see the government leader in the Senate get rid of his obsession with Pierre Trudeau. As far as I know, the Official Languages Act was passed in 1969 but we did not wait two years for the regulations to be tabled.

Since 1988 we have had an Official Languages Act which is an improvement on the old one but which does not accomplish anything. I am willing to be patient but I can tell you, honourable senators, that a lot of Francophones outside Quebec are tired of waiting.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not want to be unfair to the previous government, the Trudeau government. I praise him for putting through the Official Languages Act in 1969. However, as joint chairman of the Joint Committee on Official Languages for four years, I have received and kept on file letters in which Prime Minister Trudeau told me not only that the government, his government, did not believe the Act needed to be amended, but that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms would be enough in that regard.

That goes to prove the differing views of the previous government and this government on this issue. I can however assure the honorable senator that the Mulroney government remains committed to setting out Official Languages Regulations. All I ask from my hon. friend is to bear with us; these regulations will be tabled in the House in a short while.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, could the government leader in the Senate tell me what he means by "a short while"?

Senator Murray: I mean, certainly not today, honourable senators. The decision is not only mine; this is a very complex jurisdiction. We consulted with linguistic minorities, the Public Service and other interested parties across the country. Quite frankly, I expect the regulations to be tabled shortly.

THE ENVIRONMENT

OIL SPILLS IN CANADIAN WATERS—UPGRADING OF TRAFFIC MANAGEMENT EQUIPMENT AND CAPACITY TO DEAL WITH OIL SPILLS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. A year ago September the Interim Report of the Public Review Panel on Tanker Safety and Marine Spills Response Capability was issued. The report, as senators will recall, was very critical of Canada's capability to prevent and clean up spills, and there were problems with outdated vessel tracking technology. There was an un-updated and incomplete inventory of Canada's equipment to clean up spills.

Since the Senate will be discussing Hibernia today, in the chamber, could the Leader of the Government advise us when the final report, which it was announced was due last December, will be forthcoming? Could he explain also why there has been such a long delay in the issuance of that final report.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I must confess that, preoccupied as I have been with other matters, I have had an opportunity only to read the media reports concerning the question raised by the honourable senator. I do not seem to have a note on the matter. I shall have to inform myself and get back to the honourable senator.

STORAGE AND DESTRUCTION OF TOXIC RUBBLE—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government. It has been over three years since the PCB fire at St-Basile-Le-Grand. The toxic rubble from that fire is still stored in containers in the town centre. There has been no movement on the part of the government towards cleaning it up although we were assured at the time that this would be done expeditiously.

We have been waiting for the promised transportable incinerator. In April I asked the government leader when the incinerator would be operational, and I have not yet received an answer. I will ask the question again: When can we expect the incinerator to be operational? When will the toxic rubble at St-Basile-Le-Grand finally be cleaned up?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): There again, honourable senators, my briefing notes are incomplete. I shall inform myself and advise the honourable senator in due course.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer moved the second reading of Bill C-44, respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to rise in the Senate today, to speak on second reading of Bill C-44, which concerns the Hibernia Development Project. The situation has changed a great deal during the past ten months, since the initial tabling of the bill last November. The document escrow and closing agreements were signed on September 14. This event has locked in the business deal and is only subject to final approval by Parliament.

The Hibernia development project will contibute to the ongoing diversification of Canada's energy supply sources. The effects of this development will also be long lasting, not only for the people of Newfoundland, but for Canadians across the nation. We believe that Hibernia is only the first step in building the new skills, the expertise, and technology required to meet the challenges of frontier development.

Although the binding agreements have been finalized, they are being held in escrow by an independent third party until one remaining hurdle is cleared, the passage of Bill C-44. There has been much debate over the matter of federal participation in the Hibernia project. It has been clear for some time that the Hibernia project is simply too costly and massive an undertaking to proceed without public support.

In recognition of this, in 1988 the Government of Canada joined the Government of Newfoundland and five private sector firms in signing a statement of principles to develop Hibernia.

Bill C-44 will authorize the government to enter into legally binding agreements to fulfil its commitments made in the statement of principles.

More than $5 billion Canadian will be spent bringing Hibernia into production. Approximately $3 billion will be spent in Canada, including $1.6 billion in Newfoundland.

In addition to the $5.2 billion in capital spending needed to bring Hibernia to production there will be a further $3.5 billion expenditure over the life of the project. This project, while extremely important for Newfoundland, is obviously a project that has national importance.

● (1010)

[English]

Honourable senators, as was outlined in the statement of principle, the Government of Canada will provide the consortium with a cash contribution of 25 per cent of eligible preproduction capital costs up to a maximum of $1.04 billion dollars Canadian. It will also guarantee loans for 40 per cent of those costs to a maximum of $1.66 billion dollars.

There has been some confusion in the press as to the true cost of the federal loan guarantees. I should like to emphasize that the guarantees are a backstop to be drawn down only if the project revenue is insufficient to repay the debt. I can assure honourable senators that the government would not agree to provide those guarantees if there were any concern about the ability of the project to repay the loans.

Benefits emanating from the development of Hibernia for all Canadians will be great. Hibernia will play an important role in enhancing Canada's oil supply. The project establishes a new frontier for Canada. It will diversify Canada's oil supply and offset the expected decline in conventional light oil production for western Canada.

With production of 110,000 barrels per day, Hibernia will account for approximately 12 per cent of Canada's light oil production by the year 2000. The development of other offshore resources will further assure the diversity of Canadian domestic supply.

[Senator Ottenheimer]

The project will dramatically bolster Newfoundland's economy. Every dollar invested in this project will yield several dollars in primary and secondary benefits. It is estimated that approximately 10,000 person years of work will be created in Newfoundland during the construction phase. Perhaps even more important over the long term, new technical skills will be developed in the province's workforce skills that will position the province to take advantage of future offshore development in other areas of Canada and elsewhere. These newly-acquired skills will also be valuable assets in developing and diversifying other sectors of the Newfoundland economy.

In early 1989 the Hibernia consortium undertook to redesign the topsides facilities of the project. The main support frame was eliminated and the number of modules was reduced from 20 smaller units to five super modules. As a result of this redesign, the industrial benefits provisions outlined in the statement of principles were renegotiated in a way that would provide significant benefits for all of Canada. The agreement goes beyond the statement of principles as a result of the consortium's agreement to undertake an additional two million person hours of metal fabrication work in Canada. These new commitments are approximately the equivalent of two super modules.

From the outset the governments of Canada, Newfoundland and Labrador have pursued a regional objective package for the province. As a consequence, the Hibernia consortium has agreed to fabricate one of the super modules in Newfoundland and will use its best efforts to build a second super module in Canada.

Honourable senators, clearly the impact of Hibernia on the province will be enormous. It is accepted that the total Canadian participation in the Hibernia project will equal 55 per cent to 60 per cent of project costs. In every region of our country plants and industries are poised to meet the engineering and construction demands that will flow from the project.

The Government of Canada is acutely aware of the environmental impact of energy production, transportation and use, and it is committed to ensuring that environmental considerations are integrated into the government's energy policy process. Environmental assessments are a crucial component of the government's overall evaluation of any energy project. All such projects are subject to detailed environmental scrutiny and review designed to minimize potential adverse consequences. The government has made it clear that projects will not proceed if they are not acceptable in environmental terms.

[Translation]

I should like to emphasize that the Hibernia project provides Canada and Canadians with an unprecedented opportunity to acquire additional expertise in the development of offshore resources. The design and construction of Hibernia facilities will offer a whole array of new commercial undertakings to companies from coast to coast.

This project is a challenge to the skills of Canadians and its realization will push the leading edge of progress further still. The firms that meet the exacting standards which a venture such as Hibernia commands will be in a position to play an even more important role in future projects to be carried out in Canadian offshore waters and elsewhere throughout the world. Thanks to this initiative on the part of the two governments and the private sector, we are on the verge of reaping the huge economic benefits which will flow from Hibernia.

[English]

As a senator from Newfoundland, I should like to point out a few of the employment and economic data of Newfoundland to attempt to show honourable senators the importance of this project within the Newfoundland context. In so doing, I repeat that this is a project of national importance-that is, Canada-wide importance. There will be benefits for Newfoundland and Labrador, and there will be benefits for the other Atlantic provinces, as there should be. There will benefits also for Quebec, Ontario and the western provinces.

I wish to make that last point very clear. As Newfoundlanders, we wish to have benefits for all Canadians. The money going into the project is money from the Canadian treasury. It is a Canadian project located in off-shore Newfoundland. There will be considerable Newfoundland benefits; but there will also considerable benefits throughout the country.

From the Newfoundland perspective, I should point out that according to Statistics Canada the adjusted rate of unemployment in Newfoundland for the month of September—the latest month available—was 16.9 per cent. The Canadian average was 8.4 per cent. The province next in the least enviable position from the point of view on unemployment is PEI, with 13.5 per cent. It is significant that last month's rate of unemployment in Newfoundland was 16.9 per cent—just slightly double the Canadian average of 8.4 per cent.

I wish to refer to another statistic which emphasizes the importance of this project. The number of persons employed in Newfoundland last August was 14,000 less than in the preceding August. To illustrate the sensitivity of the economy, there was a decrease in the Newfoundland labour force of 17,000 during the past 12 months.

One other factor which I would like to emphasize concerns of youth unemployment. The figure I am about to give refers to people aged 15 to 24 years of age who are in the labour force—that is, those not attending educational institutions. The unadjusted youth unemployment figure at this time is 26.1 per cent.

I draw the attention of honourable senators to these statistics to indicate how extremely important this project is for Newfoundland in terms of its future and its ability one day to cease being a recipient but, rather, a contributor in the equalization process.

I would like to conclude my remarks by reminding honourable senators—those who may not be aware of it—of the motto of Memorial University in Newfoundland. I am sure that senators from Newfoundland are aware of it. The motto is proveluto in ahum which means "launch forth into the deep." This is certainly an occasion for Newfoundland and all of Canada to launch forth, in a very real sense, into the deep, in terms of challenge, geography, imagination, technology and forward thrust.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, first, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Newfoundland, Senator Ottenheimer, on his excellent explanation of the bill. His is a hard act to follow. However, in this case, after the way things have been in this chamber in recent days, he and I have no problem today. I hope that the rest of the senators feel the same way.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Petten: When we vote on Bill C-44, we will vote to give final parliamentary approval to a project that has gripped the imagination of the people of my province of Newfoundland for the past quarter of a century. When we vote on Bill C-44, we will give final parliamentary approval to a project that will provide economic nourishment to my province for the next quarter century.

I can recall, some 25 years ago, when Prime Minister Pearson granted the first permit for exploration of oil off the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador. It was a great time for Premier Smallwood who some months earlier had a plaque placed on the floor of the Grand Banks claiming its resources for the benefit of the people of Newfoundland. A life-long friend, Professor H.D. Lily, of Memorial University at St. John's, Newfoundland, was the one who physically placed the plaque on the floor of the Grand Banks. Unfortunately he died some two years later in a tragic automobile accident.

The hopes of Newfoundlanders have ebbed and flowed many times in the last 25 years. Throughout the first 13 years of exploration we prayed that each discovery well drilled would be the big one. Then, in 1979, the sixtieth well was drilled—Hibernia, P-15. Spirits rose tremendously throughout the province. Perhaps they rose too quickly. Perhaps we were a bit ahead of ourselves; but we knew that Hibernia would help Newfoundlanders achieve the great economic success of other Canadians.

It took five more years of surveys and appraisals to determine the extent of the Hibernia field. It has taken several more years to iron out the extraordinary complex legal and financial arrangements necessary to allow our country's first major offshore project to proceed.

Many people have worked tirelessly to bring the Hibernia project to reality. There has been enormous goodwill from people in numerous walks of life, from all levels of government. I hope my honourable colleagues will forgive me for singling out my premier, Clyde Wells, who finalized the deal, who brought us to a point where legislation to enable Hibernia construction to begin is finally before us. I am proud of Premier Wells and all others who are bringing Premier Joey Smallwood's dream to reality.

As exciting and, at times, as turbulent as the last quarter century has been for the Hibernia project, the next quarter century promises to be equally so. The undertaking is enormous. As Senator Ottenheimer has said, it is the largest conventional oil project in the history of our country. The Hibernia field holds at least 525 million barrels of recoverable oil. Over $5 billion will be spent to build a functioning oil and gas producing fixed structure in some 270 feet of water 180 miles off the coast of Newfoundland. Over $3 billion in additional capital expenditures will be made after production of oil begins.

The Hibernia production platform will include facilities for drilling, oil and gas processing, and accommodation, all atop a giant concrete base. This type of platform is called a gravity base structure, which will be built in Great Mosquito Cove in Bull Arm, Trinity Bay, Newfoundland.

I know that despite my enthusiasm, and the enthusiasm of all other Newfoundlanders, for this project, it will cost the Government of Canada a great deal of money. This has been explained very well by my colleague. The legislation we are discussing commits the government to spend up to $1,040 million in construction costs, and further commits the government to loan guarantees of up to one and two-thirds billion dollars. The taxpayers of Canada have a right to know what they will get in return for that kind of investment.

There are three powerful reasons why this legislation deserves your support and the support of all Canadians. Quite simply, the first one is jobs. Some 13,000 person years of employment for Canadians will be created during the next six years of pre-production development. The majority of those jobs will be in my province of Newfoundland and Labrador, but there will be real opportunities for shipyard workers, cement producers, equipment suppliers and a score of other occupations throughout Canada. Once Hibernia is up and running, it will provide another 1,100 full time jobs for Canadians.

Senator Ottenheimer has gone very thoroughly into our unemployment problem in Newfoundland. I come from a province where, at last count, 42,000 people were unemployed. Our unemployment rate is the highest in the country. Hibernia offers a real chance to thousands of these unemployed Newfoundlanders. It offers a real chance to keep our young people in the province. It offers a real chance finally to link our province and our businesses with businesses in other parts of Canada.

Sixty per cent of the pre-production jobs for Hibernia will go to Canadians, and an equal percentage of the vast supplies and equipment required will be provided by Canadian businesses. That compares favourably with the first oil and gas projects in the North Sea, where local businesses in Great Britain and Norway supplied only 25 to 40 per cent of the goods required.

The second powerful reason for supporting this legislation is energy security. At this time of crisis in the Persian Gulf, every Canadian knows the risks involved and the price we pay by overdependence on Mid-East oil. By the year 2000, Hibernia will be producing 110,000 barrels per day or 12 per cent of Canada's light oil production. Hibernia will diversify Canada's oil supply and offset the expected decline in conventional light oil production. Hibernia is our country's new energy frontier.

The final vital reason for supporting Hibernia comes from the technology that the project will provide our country and the training it will provide our people. I do not need to outline for honourable senators the tremendous need for Canada to catch up with the rest of the industrialized world in adapting and developing new technologies. Hibernia will provide us with a major chance to do just that. Through technological transfer agreements, through on-the-job experience, through testing and production of an array of new equipment, we can help Canada grasp the future. We can make our country the world's leader in offshore technology. We can make Canadians the people to whom other countries turn when they want help for their megaprojects.

As a Newfoundlander, I am very pleased with the work already done by the Cabot Institute to prepare our province for the technological opportunities Hibernia will bring. I am also very pleased with the offshore transfer agreement announced by Premier Wells and the commitment that the world-class construction facility at Bull Arm will be turned over to the province for use on subsequent offshore projects once the development stage of Hibernia is complete.

My colleagues will appreciate that after so many years of dreaming, and then planning, for Hibernia, Newfoundlanders can advance far more than three reasons, for this legislation to pass. However, I will advance three strong reasons because they speak to the future wellbeing of Canada.

There are some other aspects of this project which merit consideration. Hibernia has been subjected to a most vigorous environmental examination. An environmental impact statement and environmental studies have been reviewed publicly by a joint federal-provincial panel. In 1985 the panel concluded that Hibernia should proceed. That report was again scrutinized recently by the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office.

In addition, the Canada-Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board has twice thoroughly reviewed the environmental aspects of the development plan. I outline this detailed information with some pride, because, as Newfoundlanders, we live by the ocean, we live off the ocean, and we have always cherished it. We are pleased to have a megaproject which respects the environment.

Senators will be pleased to learn of the strict safety rules that apply to Hibernia. The safety of workers is of paramount concern. The rules are as stringent as any in the world, and that is as it should be.

Senator Ottenheimer has covered some of these points, and I shall leave for other senators more learned in these matters the issues of completion assurances, income and sales tax considerations, and detailed examination of contractual royalties. However, I will say this: The Hibernia deal is a fair deal which stands to benefit all parties. There should be no losers in this project, only winners.

There are risks involved with Hibernia. Nobody can say for certain what the next 25 years will bring. Yes, there are big risks, but there are bigger opportunities. There are big risks, but we are fulfilling a bigger dream.

Hibernia is not the cure-all for Newfoundland and Labrador. As Premier Wells has said, we must be ever vigilant to seek out new and exciting means of expanding the base of the province's economy; but Hibernia is a tremendous step forward. It bodes well for the future of my province and for the future of our country. I urge all senators to vote with enthusiasm for this legislation. I urge all senators to vote with enthusiasm for the future prosperity of Newfoundland and Labrador, and the future prosperity of Canada.

Hon. Daniel Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words on Bill C-44. My first words are congratulatory to our colleagues from Newfoundland on their fine speeches, which have explained the good things about Hibernia. I agree with them and believe that Bill C-44 is one should be possed by this house.

However, there are different perspectives on Hibernia. As this legislation proceeds through our parliamentary process we should ask questions about how well the government has designed the program, and about whether or not changes can be brought to the Hibernia project in the future that will improve it even further.

Confusion arose over the original announcement of Hibernia in 1988 as a potential project that would increase Canada's security of supply. The exact words from the 1988 papers are:

> Canada's increased requirements for foreign crude supplies could be significantly reduced by new supplies of light and medium crude from Hibernia and from further development of the potential Newfoundland offshore.

There was a dramatic change between that time and September 1990 when an information kit from Energy, Mines and Resources dropped that reference and characterized the project as a new energy frontier for Canada. There has been much controversy on the project as something that will help Canada increase its security of supply of oil, particularly in a region of Canada that is, has been, and will remain, totally dependent on imported oil to meet its needs.

We will have an opportunity to talk to the minister about this when the committee later today. Other questions also arise. There are questions as to its efficacy as a regional development project, having regard for the large amount of money being dedicated to Hibernia, and how effective that expenditure will be in achieving the regional development that we all laud and want to see in Newfoundland.

There are other questions that we will want to explore as this legislation passes through the Senate; for example, the extent to which it will improve and diversify our energy resources through further development on the east coast, as well as the unique nature of the gravity-based system for producing Hibernia oil, when most oil in that region will probably be produced through some floating production platform. We will want to look into the government's general policy with respect to energy.

Initially Hibernia was a security and supply driven project. It became a regional development project during the 1988 election when the Government of Canada announced it would invest $2 billion in direct support of four projects: the Vancouver Island pipeline, the Lloydminster heavy oil upgrader, the OSLO oil sands project and, of course, Hibernia. The OSLO assistance took up most of the $2 billion, but it was cancelled, as announced in the last budget of the Minister of Finance.

The advancement of this $2 billion for oil development confirmed that this government was interventionist and that it was prepared to spend more money in the oil sector. To that point, it had been strictly market-based and regulation-based in its approach. The question then becomes: Is the government intervening in a logical and understandable way? While Hibernia will receive my support, I think we must explore these questions. We will have an opportunity to raise them during our meeting with the minister in committee later today and to comment on them in more detail when we debate the committee report, which will arise, I assume, from our single meeting with the minister. With those brief comments, I will say that I am persuaded that Bill C-44 should pass, subject to our receiving appropriate answers to questions we will raise in the interest of future development.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read third time?

On motion of Senator Ottenheimer, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

DEBATE AND PROCESS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the debate and process concerning the Meech Lake Accord.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this inquiry calls the attention of the Senate to the debate in process on the Meech Lake Accord. As far as I am concerned, that order is dépassé. Perhaps whoever introduced it will consider what he wishes to do with it, or will determine whether other senators wish to speak to it. In the meantime, the order should stand.

Orders stands.

THIRD LATIN-AMERICAN AND CARIBBEAN MEETING OF PARLIAMENTARIANS ON ENERGY AND PETROLEUM FOURTEENTH WORLD ENERGY CONGRESS

PARTICIPATION BY STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES—ORDER WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hays calling the attention of the Senate to the participation by the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources at the Third Latin-American and Caribbean Meeting of Parliamentarians on Energy and Petroleum held in Caracas, Venezuela, and at the 14th World Energy Congress held in Montreal.—(Honourable Senator Hastings).

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, this order has been on the order paper for almost a year. I have reviewed the matter, and it has been adequately dealt with by my colleagues, Senator Hays and Senator Balfour. I believe it can be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order withdrawn.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

[Senator Frith.]

THE HONOURABLE J. MICHAEL FORRESTALL

PROPERTY QUALIFICATIONS FOR MEMBERSHIP IN SENATE—MOTION FOR REVIEW

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), pursuant to notice of Thursday, October 25, 1990, moved:

> That the question of Senator Forrestall's property qualification and the qualification, therefore, of Senators Ross, Lavoie-Roux, Bernston, Grimard, Johnson, Keon and Meighen be referred to the Committee appointed to consider the Orders and Customs of the Senate and Privileges of Parliament; and That, notwithstanding any other rule, provisional rule or order of the Senate, the Committee meet in this Chamber within the twenty-four hours following the adoption of this motion.

He said: Honourable senators, let me repeat something I have said, although I will say it in slightly different words. The purpose or motivation for this motion is not personal. It is purely political; and it is because of the balance of votes in this chamber and the position that the Opposition has taken throughout with reference to the status of the eight senators appointed under section 26.

Let me deal first with section 26 and to remind honourable senators of its provisions. Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867, as enacted in 1982, provides as follows:

> If at any Time on the Recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit to direct that Four or Eight Members be added to the Senate, the Governor General may by Summons to Four or Eight qualified Persons (as the Case may be), representing equally the Four Divisions of Canada, add to the Senate accordingly.

There has been a good deal of attention paid to the question of whether the conditions necessary for the exercise of the power conferred by section 26 existed at the time the power was exercised. I do not mean to dwell on that aspect. That aspect is, at the present time, still before the courts, and more than one court. What I simply wish to underline is the following, in section 26, where it clearly says:

> If . . . the Queen thinks fit to direct that Four or Eight Members be added to the Senate—

And I underline the words "Four or Eight":

> —the Governor General may by Summons to Four or Eight qualified Persons (as the Case may be)

Those words are important from two points of view. It clearly says "qualified Persons" and it says "Four or Eight . . . (as the Case may be)", and we know in this case that the decision was made to recommend eight.

In general, in support of this motion, at this stage it is only necessary, in my respectful submission, to raise a question under section 33 of the Constitution, which says:

> If any Question arises respecting the Qualification of a Senator or a Vacancy in the Senate the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate.

Turning then to the question of qualification, we find in section 23 a listing of the qualifications for a senator, keeping in mind that the section that was the basis for the appointment of the eight additional senators, section 26, did use the word "qualified". That necessarily turns our attention to section 23, which begins with these words:

> The Qualification of a Senator shall be as follows:
> (1) He shall be of the full age of Thirty Years:

Subsection (2) mentions being a natural-born subject. Subsection (3) is the important one, and reads as follows:

> (3) He shall be legally or equitably seised as of Freehold for his own Use and Benefit of Lands or Tenements held in Free and Common Socage, or seised or possessed for his own Use and Benefit of Lands or Tenements held in Franc-alleu or in Roture, within the Province for which he is appointed, of the Value of Four thousand Dollars, over and above all Rents, Dues, Debts, Charges, Mortgages, and Incumbrances due or payable out of or charged on or affecting the same:

Now, honourable senators, the question of amount is not in issue here. The question turns on the word "seised." As I have mentioned, the question of property under section 23(3), which I have just read, is the one that commands our attention when we are thinking of the motion that is before us. As I pointed out, section 23(3) of the Constitution requires that a senator—and I am now selecting the important words:

> . . . be legally or equitably seised as of Freehold for his own Use and Benefit of Lands . . . within the Province . . . of the Value of Four thousand Dollars.

Again, the question of value is not in issue. Now, as I mentioned earlier, the question that is raised as to qualification under section 33 arose originally from a story in the news media—one I believe to be true as to the facts—that the home was willed in Nova Scotia by a relative to the parents of Senator Forrestall for the term of their lives, with a provision that it be passed on to the senator and his two siblings in joint tenancy after the parents have passed away.

The words actually found in the will are found in the third part of the will of Katherine Cecilia Ells of Middleton in the County of Annapolis in the Province of Nova Scotia, and provides in the first part, under subheading (b), as follows:

> To convey my property situate in Lower Middleton, Annapolis County, Nova Scotia (and known as the Forrestall Homestead) as follows:
> A joint life interest to THOMAS P. FORRESTALL and ESTHER FORRESTALL to run for the life of the survivor of the two and on the death of the survivor of the two, the remainder in fee simple to the children of THOMAS and ESTHER FORRESTALL, who shall be living at the time of my death, as Joint Tenants and not as Tenants in Common.

I understand also that the following facts will be established by the committee: that both of the parents are still alive and live in the house and therefore have possession and a life interest in the estate; and that the siblings are the remaindermen who have a vested remainder interest in the property.

At an earlier time, I raised the question as to whether the property was vested, and I said that that would be the principal issue. I have found that it is vested, in that sense, but that that does decide the issue—the issue being whether such vested remainder interest in the property satisfies the requirements of the Constitution.

Although the senator actually has an interest in the property, it is one which may only be enjoyed in the future, and the Constitution requires that the person actually be seised of the land. So the question is then: Does a future interest constitute seisen? "Seisen" is an old, medieval term. It is not commonly used in modern matters relating to property law. However, legal dictionaries and authoritative texts suggest the following: first that "seisen" means possession; and, second, in a situation where a person has possession of a property pursuant to a life estate, and where the remaindermen, of which Senator Forrestall is one, will only inherit the property after the life interest has expired, seisen rests with the person in actual possession. It seems, therefore, difficult to avoid the conclusion that Senator Forrestall's vested remainder interest, which will allow him to enjoy seisen—using the words found in the Constitution—in the future, does not actually entitle him to seisen at the present time.

Following this strict interpretation of the constitution and the meaning of seisin, one may only conclude that Senator Forrestall is unqualified to sit as a Senator.

Should the interpretation of seisin be made in a liberal manner—that is small "l" liberal, or capital "L", according to one's wish—to suggest that seisin is split between those with a life interest and the remaindermen who will enjoy the fee simple after the death of those in possession, the Constitution would still not be satisfied. Section 23(3) states that he must be seised for ". . . his own use and benefit . . ." Clearly, at the present time, he may neither use it nor benefit from it. The authorities suggest, anyway, that seisin must always be full and cannot be divided.

By way of a buttress for these conclusions I refer to authorities, first Black's Law Dictionary at pages 1218-1219, says:

> Seisin means possession and the right to immediate possession.

The authorities cited are mostly United States authorities.

The next authority is Canadian Law of Real Property by Anger and Hansberger, at page 553, which states:

> Seisin is synonymous with possession.

The third authority is Property Law, Cases, Texts and Materials by Mendes Da Costa and Balfour, a 1982 publication, and a leading Canadian authority.

The research notes that I have state:

> At page 739 they describe a fact situation which corresponds to the one Senator Forrestall is in. The person who > holds the life estate and has possession of the property is clearly the one who holds seisin.

Remember that "seisin" is the word used in the Constitution.

Continuing:

> The vested remainder interest does not entitle the remaindermen to seisin since he is not entitled to possession.
> At pages 745-746 the concept is further illustrated with a diagram. Those with life interests have seisin. In The Law of Real Property, by Megarry and Wade, leading United Kingdom authorities, from which we derive a good deal of our property law, as I am sure many honourable senators know, it is at pages 48-49 that the requirements for seisin are listed, and they include possession.

In Cheshire's Modern Law of Real Property, another United Kingdom authority, states:

> At page 296 it states seisin means possession and it must always be full (i.e. it is not possible to have partial seisin).

The notes further state:

> Apparently Senator Forrestall has stated that he made sure his interest satisfies the property requirement.

I believe him. I also believe that the Clerk acted properly when he accepted Senator Forrestall's sincere belief that his interest satisfied the property requirement of the Constitution. But belief is not the test so these authorities raise serious questions about it. In fact, I am prepared to say that they negate that assertion.

I am told the Atlantic Television System obtained a legal opinion that concluded Mr. Forrestall did not meet the minimum requirement, and I agree with it.

For all of the above material on seisin I am indebted to Senator Stanbury, and also his research assistance, Mr. Andrew Kavchak, who did the research on that subject.

The question now is, who decides? The Constitution, as I have mentioned, is quite clear about this question of qualification when it says:

> If any question arises respecting the qualification of a senator or a vacancy in the Senate the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate.

The next question is: How does the Senate do that?

The best authority that I was able to find on the subject is an article in the 1975 edition of The Parliamentarian by W. F. Dawson, Professor, Faculty of Social Science, University of Western Ontario. The title of the article is: "Resignation and Removal of Canadian Senators." I will read a few excerpts and then turn to the question of property qualification. It states:

> The British North America Act . . .

That is what it was then called. It is now called the Constitution Act, 1982:

> —devotes considerable attention to the related questions of the qualifications of Senators and their tenure in office. A Senator is summoned to office by the Governor-General by instrument under the Great Seal of Canada. In order to qualify the person must be a British subject, a resident of the province from which he or she is appointed, and be possessed of specified property.

It then goes on to speak of the original provisions of the Constitution entitling a senator to hold office for life, and then states that there is compulsory retirement at age 75. The article also mentions the disqualifications. It states:

> Removal was made mandatory if a Senator became a foreign citizen, was adjudged bankrupt or insolvent, was attainted of treason or convicted of felony or any infamous crime, lost his property or residence qualification, or failed to attend the Senate for two consecutive sessions. A further section provides that the Senate shall hear and determine questions relating to a Senator's qualifications or removal.

The article then goes on, for the most part, to deal with the question of absence, because that was the most common reason for resignations or removal. There is a long piece under the heading "Resignations," and it cites the many cases in which senators have resigned. Then, at page 14, it deals with the removal of senators. It states:

> While the resignation of a Senator is a deliberate act performed solely by the Senator concerned and is thus a fairly simple process, the removal of a Senator, necessitating as it does some action by the Senate itself and possibly an interpretation of the British North American Act, raises greater complications. On the surface, the provisions of the Act and the procedure to be followed are reasonably clear. The Act specifies the various offences which will constitute obligatory grounds for vacating a Senator's seat. As previously noted, the Senate is obliged under the Act to hear and judge each case as it arises.

I underline that as a basis for the motion that the Senate is obliged under the Constitution to hear and judge each case as it arises; and, of course, here such a case has arisen. It also says that the case shall be decided "with all convenient speed," according to Professor Dawson. We are still on the question of the removal of senators due to absences. Professor Dawson says:

> The first, and most basic question faced by the Senate was an obvious one—how does the Senate first discover that a Senator has been absent?

Of course, that is not relevant to what we are talking about today. I mention it only because most of the article deals with absences; therefore, we have to cull the jurisprudence and research from that subject for the matter we are concerned with, which is property qualification. As I have said, absence occupies most of the article from page 12, where it deals with resignations, through page 13 and page 14 with respect to the removal of senators. I mention these pages only to acknowledge that most of the article deals with resignation and removal because of absence. It continues through page 15.

On page 16 there is a heading "Possible complications," which says:

> The Senate may consider itself fortunate that it has had few, if any, problems in the application of the British North America Act to the removal of Senators. The Senate has never addressed itself seriously to the question of the possibilities inherent in the Act and the procedures that it has developed to deal with this awkward question.

Then, on page 16, there is a heading "Senate procedures", which says:

> The general outlines of procedure adopted by the Senate to deal with the question of removal have been satisfactory so far.

We are still talking about absences.

> The Clerk makes a factual report based on his examination of the Senate Minutes. The report is referred to the Committee on Privileges. There seems no general agreement on the exact powers of this Committee. On some occasions the Committee has communicated with the Senator involved to ascertain if there are any reasons why action should not be taken. On other occasions, the Committee has decided that it does not have the power to do more than to report to the Senate as a whole that in its opinion the facts alleged by the Clerk are accurate and that an address should be sent to the Governor-General advising him that the seat has been judged to be vacant. When the Senate receives the report it is normally accepted and a resolution is passed to send an address to the Governor-General, and a further resolution of regret at the loss of a valued colleague. From that time on presumably the Government may proceed to fill the vacancy.
> Even this simple procedure, however, may give rise to problems. There seems to be a considerable lack of clarity in the terms of the British North America Act and the exact function of the Senate in the process. As early as 1884, Senator Power raised the obvious question about the evidence needed to vacate a seat.

We are still talking about absences, honourable senators.

> The record of the Minutes is clear. By deciding to look further into the question the Senate is tacitly establishing the right to challenge the formal records of Parliament, a right which even the courts would be hesitant to claim.

We are still talking about absences.

Then there is more information on the question of procedures. As I have said, there seems to be ample flexibility because there have been various ways in Senate history of dealing with this question that places an obligation on the Senate to deal with it under the Constitution. Then there is a long section defining the whole question of absences.

But on page 18 there is a piece on property qualification, which says:

> The fact that the Senate has never declared a seat vacant for any other reason than absence should not make it blind to the other problems that might arise. The question of the property qualification, for instance, has created apprehension on occasion and, as noted above, has caused two Senators to resign with a promise of reappointment to clear their dubious position. The Act is once again both explicit and lax in its requirements. A Senator must make a property declaration before he may take his seat, but for the remainder of his tenure his finances may fluctuate as they will without any constitutional check. In 1880 the Senate itself took steps to tighten control. Under a rule passed in that year, every Senator must renew his declaration of qualification each Parliament. Within the first twenty days of the opening of the first session of a Parliament, each Senator must file with the Clerk of the House a declaration in the form prescribed by the Act. At the end of the twenty days the Clerk lays on the Table a list of those who have complied with the rule. The rule has been obeyed with only intermittent regularity. Some Senators do not even appear in Ottawa until after the stated period, and it is usual for the Senate, by motion, to accept a late filing. It is also possible for a Senator to swear his declaration at home and send it to the Clerk. Acceptance of this form also requires the assent of the Senate.
> The usefulness of this rule—that is, the rule of renewing > —is open to question.

I am still quoting Professor Dawson.

> The British North America Act requires a Senator to have a property qualification and there is no doubt that it is a qualification that can be lost. It is doubtful, however, if any imprecise check by the Senate every few years is sufficient if the Senate is truly interested in obeying the law. The real problem, of course, is the Act itself which implies at least that the property qualification be continuous. This is a rigid rule, and, as one Senator pointed out in 1880, he could lose his seat overnight if some of his property happened to burn. As a whole, the Senate agreed in 1880 that the enforcement of the property qualification was difficult and could result in hardship. It was, however, in no position to amend the Act and the provision in it remains to this day along with the Senate rule which requires periodic confirmation of a Senator's right to sit. It is fortunate that the Senate has never been faced with the problem of deciding just what the net worth of one of its Members is, although it is probably reasonable to assume that the Senate would be generous in its interpretation of the facts.

I read the entire portion into the record—some of which is not directly relevant to the subject matter of my motion—so that honourable senators would have all of the information that is contained in this research on the subject of property qualification.

The article then goes on to deal with the other question of qualification with respect to conviction of infamous crime, which is not relevant here. Rhetorically I would be tempted to say that something infamous was done, but by the prime minister, not by Senator Forrestall.

That then brings us to the motion, based on the provision of the Constitution I have referred to, and the research by Professor Dawson, raising the "Question," to use the words of section 33, respecting the qualification of a senator or a vacancy.

Now, about the question of the relevance of this motion to the qualification of the other seven, I again turn to section 26 as their sole constitutional right to sit, because it is under it that those eight senators were appointed.

I remind honourable senators that it states:

> If at any Time on the Recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit to direct that Four or Eight members be added to the Senate, the Governor General may by Summons to Four or Eight qualified Persons (as the Case may be) . . .

● (1120)

It is very clear that that power can only be exercised to appoint four or eight senators. In this case, we know that the Prime Minister recommended, as his option, eight. If one of the eight is not qualified, then the result is the appointment of seven additional senators. The Constitution does not provide for the appointment of seven additional senators. The result would be that all of the eight would be disqualified, not because their property qualifications were under question, but because they can only be appointed in fours or eights. Once the number of senators falls below 104, of course, any one of them could be appointed. However, since they claim their constitutional right to sit in this chamber on the exercising of a power claimed under section 26, they must come in the number of eight or four, not seven or six or five or three or two or one.

For that reason, the qualification of all eight senators is raised by section 33, which states: "If any Question arises respecting the Qualification of a Senator . . ." and so on. Therefore, honourable senators, in support of the motion, it is clear that a question has arisen under section 33. It is clear from the provisions of the Constitution and the research to which I have referred that the matter is for the Committee on Privileges.

It is understandable that it would be referred to the Committee on Privileges because in a very direct way the privileges of every senator are affected with regard to the exercising of the right to vote by those eight senators. The wording of the motion makes direct reference to that committee, which is appointed every year as a Committee of the Whole to consider the orders and customs of the Senate and the privileges of Parliament.

Honourable senators, I submit that the case for the adoption of this motion is clearly made out. Not only has a question arisen, but there is substantial evidence of an absence of qualifications in one senator, a senator appointed under section 26 of the Constitution. If the question is as sound as I believe it is, the seven other senators who were so appointed would be disqualified. That, of course, would have a great effect on the privileges of all senators because of the effect of the result of votes on measures and matters before the Senate.

That leaves only one important question, as an epilogue, which is: Can these eight senators vote in the meantime? Can they vote, for example, on the motion itself? Is there not a clear conflict of interest in their doing so? Voting even on the question of whether their qualifications should be examined by the appropriate committee would seem to me to involve a conflict of interest. It would be exactly analogous to the conflict of interest of a party to a lawsuit stepping into the jurors' box and voting in the jury room on his side of the case, whether it be civil or criminal.

These eight senators are in no way accused of any criminal action here, but the principle of conflict of interest, as well as that of fair play and natural justice, is equally engaged. Would they consider themselves as having the right under such circumstances to step into the jury box or up onto the judge's bench and, in effect, to vote on whether or not they are guilty? It seems to me that their voting on this motion, or in the committee would clearly be irresponsible and against any conceivable principle of decency or natural justice.

The question then arises, as it did yesterday, of whether they should vote on any matter in between times. I think the question is applicable, as are the principles. Certainly, while the motion is still before the Senate, and the matter is before the committee, they should not vote. They might try to draw a distinction between their right to vote on the motion dealing with their qualifications, or in Committee of the Whole, and their voting on legislation in the meantime. But, is there a distinction? If they do, I suggest it is not a distinction clear enough to establish the right to vote at all until this question is determined.

That is why, honourable senators, the second part of the motion requires that the Senate deal with the matter quickly or, to quote Mr. Dawson, "with all convenient speed." I believe that the matter should be settled so that these eight senators—and, of equal importance, all other senators—will know whether they are qualified to vote on legislation. In the meantime, I think it is clear that they should not vote on this motion or in committee, or on the committee's report, until this matter is settled.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, October 29, 1990, at 2 p.m.

QUESTION PERIOD

PERSIAN GULF

PRESENCE OF CANADIANS IN KUWAIT AND IRAQ—PROTECTION AND REPATRIATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable Senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he can give us any information on the number of Canadians who are presently in Kuwait and Iraq, and whether any representations have been made by the government through the now closed post in Kuwait, or through Baghdad, to have them leave these countries. The Minister is aware that at present exit from these countries is denied to citizens of certain countries, including Canada. What is the situation with respect to Canadians?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I can only read the notes that I have been given on this matter, which are to the effect that Iraqi authorities continue to refuse to allow diplomats who are based in Kuwait to leave Iraq. This refusal affects both those who travelled to Baghdad before August 24 and those who made the trip on October 19.

The Iraqi Ministry of Foreign Affairs has also refused to recognize these individuals as members of the diplomatic staff of our embassy in Baghdad. These Canadian diplomats are being treated like other Canadian citizens in Iraq. They are free to move about Baghdad at will, but do not at present have permission to leave.

We continue to insist with Iraqi officials both here and in Baghdad that the welfare of all Canadians in Iraq and Kuwait be respected and all those wishing to leave be permitted to do so.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the minister will be aware that other countries have taken with some success special steps to have their nationals released from Kuwait. I conclude from what the minister has said that representations have been made to the authorities of Iraq, who have refused to pay attention to what Canada has said.

Is it now contemplated by the government to send any special representatives to Iraq, with a view to obtaining the release of those Canadians? I know that the answer dealt with diplomats as well as Canadian citizens, but I understand there are quite a number of Canadians who are 70 years or older.

Senator Murray: Yes, honourable senators, there are. However, I have seen, as I am sure has the honourable senator, statements attributed to the Prime Minister to the effect that we had not been invited to send—and, in any case, would not be sending—a special diplomatic representative to Iraq for the purpose indicated. That statement was made after the former British Prime Minister, Mr. Heath, went to Iraq and was instrumental in releasing some old and/or ill British citizens detained in that country.

I shall obtain the official position from the Prime Minister's Office and the Department of External Affairs on this matter and will advise the honourable senator.

Senator MacEachen: In obtaining the information, would the minister find out why Canada has taken the view that it will not make any special effort or send a special representative to see whether something can be done, particularly in light of the fact that the Minister of State for External Affairs has recently been talking about the prospect of armed conflict. That brings to mind what Canada would be able to do to protect Canadian citizens if hostilities broke out. Would it not be prudent at this stage to make every effort to get them out before Mr. Clark sends his forces to the Persian Gulf?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend has raised two questions. As far as Mr. Clark's statements are concerned, he was only being realistic in pointing out that, while we continue to prefer and pursue all diplomatic means to effect the withdrawal of the aggressor, if those means fail there may be armed conflict in that area, an armed conflict in which our allies and our own military forces might well be implicated.

I shall obtain an official statement from the Minister of State for External Affairs on the reason why we do not at this point believe it will be fruitful to send special representatives to the Government of Iraq to attempt to effect the release of those Canadians who are still in the country but unable to leave it. I believe my honourable friend will find that the position we are taking is consistent with the position taken by most, if not all, of our allies.

NATIONAL FINANCE

MONETARY POLICY—EFFECT ON ECONOMY—RELATION TO INFLATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to get an answer to the question I asked a few days ago about the government's monetary policy and its relationship to inflation. The bank rate did not change at all last Thursday; it remained thecent for same at 12.66 per cent. The week before it was slightly lower, but it moved up somewhere between six and eight points. In any event, according to the same statistical information the rate of inflation is now 4.2 per cent. I should like to ask the Minister, does the 4.2 per cent rate of inflation influence monetary policy and the level of interest rates which today are at 13.75 per cent prime and between 14 and 14.5 per cent for most people who borrow? What I am asking is very simple. Does the rate of inflation of 4.2 per cent mean interest rates of 14 to 15 per cent or a rate that is well over 10 per cent real interest for Canadians?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable Senators, my honourable friend has been around long enough to know that there is no arithmetic calculation of ratio fixed by the Bank of Canada or by the government as between the rate of inflation and the bank rate at any given time. The bank rate is at its current level in response to the current and expected rate of inflation. As I told my honourable friend the other day, the bank rate over a period of 13 or 14 weeks or more has been following a downward trend, as has inflation over the same period. While there will be blips in the inflation rate as a result of various factors, whether they be oil prices, the introduction of the GST or whatever, the overall rate is following a downward trend, and we expected that as it goes down the bank rate will go down with it.

Senator Olson: Honourable Senators, I heard those comments last week, and I understood what the Minister said. However, what he does not say is that the bank rate has stopped going down. It stopped at 12.58 I believe, then it moved back up to 12.66, and last week it remained exactly the same at 12.66. I should like to remind my honourable friend that the Minister of Finance and, indeed, the Governor of the Bank of Canada have said, in almost every one of their public statements, announcements or declarations on policy, that the interest rate, as a consequence of their monetary policy, is based on the rate of inflation and that the rate will remain up there—they have called it "high"—as long as inflation remains high. If honourable senators can recall the trend, there was a brief decline in the rate of inflation for a few weeks. I believe the minister referred to thirteen weeks. That may be right. However, the inflation rate stopped going down and remained at 4.2 percent. That is exactly the same point at which the Minister of Finance and the Bank of Canada stopped lowering the bank rate. Many people are intensely, if not desperately, interested in understanding the policy of this government, because to them it is real money that they must pay out on their debt service charges. Now that inflation has flattened out at 4.2 percent, does that mean that people will pay 14 percent interest for the money they borrow? That is the question. I do not see why the honourable senator cannot answer the question. People want to know because they have to make choices—not very many, by the way, when you are heading into bankruptcy. You have a choice. If it is the government's policy that interest rates are to stay at around 14 per cent or so when inflation is running slightly over 4 per cent, then people have a right to know that so they can make business decisions based on that factor. Is it the government's intention to continue to give whimsical answers to the effect that one is not related to the other, while the Minister of Finance tells us that they are? What we want to know now is whether 4 per cent or 4.2 per cent means 14 per cent interest rates to most people.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator gave some precise ratio between the bank rate and the rate of inflation and he knows as well as I do that it is a far more complex matter than that.

I will send him a copy—if he has not got it already—of a speech made on October 24 by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, in Moncton, New Brunswick—and a very good speech it was. Without quoting from it extensively, I would quote two short paragraphs that illustrate something of the complexity of this matter. The Governor of the Bank of Canada said:

> As the demand pressures on inflation became less intense scope emerged for easier monetary conditions. Short term interest rates have declined in recent months by about one and one-half percentage points. Given the change in economic conditions, this change in interest rates is of course consistent with a monetary policy framework oriented in the direction of price stability. The lower inflation generated by an easing of inflation pressures is, after all, a basic condition for lower interest rates.
> Many would like to have seen much larger reductions in interest rates than have occurred. However, the present turbulent situation, with so many cross currents and uncertainties, calls for particular caution in monetary policy actions.

He then goes on to talk about some of the factors at work, including the persistence for so long of inflationary pressures in Canada, developments in the Middle East, oil prices, longer term interest rates in Canada and abroad, and so on and so forth. This is a speech to which I would invite the attention of Senator Olson, because he is so clearly unconvinced by my explanations, however cogent and valid they may be.

Senator Olson: That may be, but those people who are facing bankruptcies want to know what is the policy of the government. Surely the minister does not have to play these funny little games by outlining all these complicated matters which most people do not understand and do not care whether they understand. What they want to know is what interest rate they are going to be stuck with as a result of government policy. They can read. The Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada have both gone around the country making speeches. The Governor of the Bank of Canada has made speeches in Moncton, Winnipeg, Toronto and other places and in every instance he has advanced the rate of inflation as reason for the monetary policy with the consequent high interest rates.

We all know that inflation backed off and came down to 4.2 per cent.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, may I rise on a point of order?

I do not like to single out Senator Olson, because we are good friends, but once again I have to point out that this is Question Period. Senator Olson seems to follow a pattern of making very extended speeches, asking his questions and then wanting to debate the answers; and that is not what this is all about. This is Question Period. The answer may not satisfy the honourable senator but, surely to goodness, asking questions and getting answers is what Question Period is all about. If he wants to introduce a debate on a particular issue, then he can do so at the proper time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

• (1420)

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN INFLATION AND INTEREST RATES

Hon. H.A. Olson: For the benefit of Senator Kelly, I do not think he has a valid point of order. He is a good friend of mine, but I have to say that, if he were to be objective, he would realize that I have not yet received an answer and that it is necessary for members of the Opposition sometimes to come at a question from ten different angles when the government is reluctant to answer. So far, I have not received an answer. I put the question very simply: What is the relationship between the level of inflation and the monetary policy, and then consequently the interest rates that people have to pay?

The argument the government has made over and over again is that inflation is causing high interest rates. Inflation has backed off to 4. 2 per cent; it flattened out at 4.2 per cent; The bank rates backed off to 12.58 or 12.66 per cent, and there it stopped. Is there a relationship between one and the other? The minister got up and gave me an answer—

An Hon. Senator: Time!

Senator Olson: I am doing this for Senator Kelly's benefit. The minister gave me a lot of fluff, saying there are a whole lot of other factors involved.

An Hon. Senator: Put the question!

Senator Olson: I want to know if it is government policy that 4.2 per cent inflation means 14 per cent interest rates, or something over ten per cent real interest. Is that the policy that this government is going to be following?

Senator Kelly should know that today there are thousands of Canadians who are on the brink of not being able to manage these debt service charges and who may have to do as 35,000 people did last month and declare bankruptcy. Some of the problems they are facing have come straight from government policy. They have not done anything to contribute to inflation, but they were caught in the government's monetary policy, which is crippling them financially.

Instead of giving me all this fluff, the minister should tell us what the government's policy is with respect to the relationship between inflation and monetary policy, and thus high interest rates.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the short answer to the question is that the government supports the monetary authorities in their efforts to bring inflation under control. Not only do we support them, but our own fiscal policy is designed to that end. I hope the honourable senator appreciates that. The alternative that the honourable senator would produce is a premature easing on the monetary side which would again lead to the kind of 21 per cent interest rates that we had in the early 1980s, with the accompanying high inflation and high unemployment. Either that, or he is reverting to form as a Social Crediter and wants us simply to print money and throw it around the way Major Douglas suggested.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, despite the funny little remarks the minister likes to make about me and my Social Credit leanings—

An Hon. Senator: "Funny money"!

Senator Olson: —some day I will make a speech in this chamber on Social Credit—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Simard: Why not this week?

Senator Olson: —that will teach a lot of you a number of things about monetary policy that you probably ought to learn, because we had some great experience in Alberta years ago about what could be done within the jurisdiction of the province. In case you have never heard—or, if you did, you have forgotten-after the Social Credit government came into office in 1935, for the next 36 years it did not borrow one cent.

Senator Simard: Why did you leave it?

Senator Olson: Anyway, I still want an answer to the question I asked. All of this appears in Hansard and is sent out to people, and I can tell you that you are not enhancing your position very much by this funny little habit you have of trying to depreciate and throw fun at the problem I am raising, which is of desperate concern to probably 40,000 or 50,000 more people who are on the brink of bankruptcy for November. You may think this is a comical show, but you had better get down in the street with the real people and find out what is happening, because I know of hundreds, indeed thousands, of people who are facing that situation right now, and they do not like it when I am answered with points of order from Senator Kelly and with these fluffy little answers from the minister that do not mean anything.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: I should like to raise one more point of order, and I promise it will be my last one this afternoon.

I am totally in sympathy with the points the Honourable Senator Olson is raising. I think they should be explored even more than they have been this afternoon, if that is possible. However, I believe we should put these points on the record under Notices of Inquiries. We could then debate this whole question of monetary policy. That is the place in the proceedings for such a debate. My concern is that we are getting mixed up as to what point we are at in the proceedings. This is Question Period.

It is also my belief that if I raise a question and I do not like the answer, that is it, that is the answer, and that is the way it has to be, otherwise we enter into a debate.

I hope I have not prompted the Honourable Senator Olson once again to embark on a long speech.

Hon. H.A. Olson: The Honourable Senator Kelly can pursue whatever action he thinks is appropriate to achieve the results he is looking for. I have tried to raise this matter under Notices of Inquiries and in other ways, but I received no answers from the government. At least if I raise the subject during Question Period the leader gets up and says something. Often he does not answer the question, or talks about something completely different from what the question is asking. He may do that, if he wishes, but the people who read that nonsense in Hansard do not like it, and that is all it is.

The people of this country want straight answers. That is what I have been trying to get, but the government keeps fluffing the answers with all kinds of other excuses.

People have been following this situation. They are suffering from desperate service charges. Those charges are killing them financially. If the leader chooses not to answer, that is fine, but I have made a commitment to those people to find out what is the government's policy, and I will keep doing that.

If the Honourable Senator Kelly does not agree with my tactics, that is his problem. I will continue doing this on behalf of the people I represent, anyway.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will give the honourable senator a straight answer. The straight answer is that it is hypocritical and irresponsible of him to suggest a turning on of the monetary taps, because that will only result in driving interest rates, inflation rates and unemployment rates right through the roof, which is what my friends opposite did so notoriously and so successfully in 1981-82.

Senator Olson: The leader has just said something that is absolutely false. I have never suggested that. If he can find one indication in Hansard of today's date, or of any other date, in which I advocated what the leader has just said I advocated, I will eat the book. I have never said that.

What I have asked for is this government's policy.

Senator Murray: I have told you what that is.

Senator Olson: No, the leader has not. He told us that there is a relationship between inflation and the level of interest rates, and then he threw in a lot of other gobbledegook regarding what factors are at play. He left things at that. If that is the way he wants to leave it then that is fine, but do not say that there was no opportunity to give straight simple answers most people can understand.

The Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada have consistently said that that is the relationship. Arithmetically, it is very simple: you came down to a 4.2 per cent inflation rate and stopped lowering the bank rate. Does 4.2 per cent inflation mean 14 to 15 per cent debt service charges to the people of Canada? That is the question. Answer it!

• (1430)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it has taken me several years to confess it, but I must do it now. I do regret having tormented the honourable senator so much when I was in opposition and he was a minister.

Senator Olson: I want the honourable Minister to know that he did not torment me at all. I loved it. That is one of the reasons I am asking these questions, because Senator Murray has demonstrated a long, deep and abiding interest in monetary policy and its consequences; therefore, I am sure he is informed all the time. As a matter of fact, I believe he knows the answer to the request I made, but I do not believe he is levelling with us. There are lots of people across this country who want to know if that arithmetic relationship that I pointed out—and I do not want to repeat it because I might annoy Senator Kelly—is what they can expect. Frankly, I believe the people of Canada have a right to know, so why don't you tell us?

PERSIAN GULF

CANADIAN RESIDENTS VOLUNTEER FOR IRAQ ARMY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is further to the situation in Iraq. I am referring to a press story in the Toronto Sun of some time ago, August 17. The heading is "Metro recruits for Iraq army", "1,500 in Canada volunteer: Embassy". The article says:

> OTTAWA—External affairs says it won't try to stop hundreds of Canadian residents volunteering for the Iraq army—even though it may be illegal.
> The Iraq Embassy in Ottawa said 1,500 people have offered to enlist. In Metro, an Iraqi community spokesman said hundreds of his countrymen are prepared to defend their homeland.

Further in the story it says:

> A spokesman at the Iraq Embassy in Ottawa—who called himself "minister counsellor Hussein"—said 1,500 people have volunteered, mostly Iraqi, Irani and Pakistani landed immigrants.

My question to the Minister is: Is this indeed going on, and what is the situation of an individual who is a landed immigrant in Canada who decides he wants to volunteer for the army in Iraq when we, in turn, have Canadian forces in that region which may be involved in a war with these people at any moment? Is the government going to do anything about that situation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not have any information on that matter, but I shall obtain whatever is available and advise the honourable senator in due course.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers to questions.

TRANSPORT

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STUDIES OF PROPOSED FIXED CROSSING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 24, 1990, by Senator Bonnell and Senator Stewart, regarding Transport—Northumberland Strait—Request for Tabling of Environmental Impact Studies of Proposed Fixed Crossing.

(The answer follows:)

> The Environmental Assessment Review Panel (E.A.R.P.) report on the fixed link was presented to the Honourable Elmer MacKay, Minister of Public Works and the Honourable Robert de Cotret, Minister of Environment, August 15, 1990.
> Officials of Public Works Canada, Environment Canada, and Fisheries & Oceans are still reviewing the report and exploring all options available.
> As soon as a decision has been reached by the Minister of Public Works, this information will be made public. For the time being, I wish to now table that report and its' attached news release with this response.

PERSIAN GULF

POLITICAL AND MILITARY SITUATION—IMPACT ON CANADIAN ECONOMY—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT STATEMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the second delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 19, 1990, by the Honourable John B. Stewart, regarding the Persian Gulf—Political and Military Situation—Impact on Canadian Economy—Request for Government Statement.

> All Canadians know that the unprovoked Iraqi invasion of Kuwait on August 2nd was a clear violation of international law and of the United Nations Charter, and a brutal attack on a smaller, virtually defenceless neighbour.
> On August 24th, three Canadian ships—the destroyers ATHABASKAN and TERRA NOVA, and the supply ship PROTECTEUR—with their combined crews of more than 900 Canadian men and women, were dispatched to the Persian Gulf to assist in deterring further Iraqi aggression, and to contribute to international efforts to ensure strict implementation of the United Nations economic sanctions against Iraq. All ships received modifications and improvements in order to make them effective platforms for operations in the Persian Gulf.

On September 14th, the Government announced a further contribution to the international enforcement effort by deploying a squadron of CF-18 aircraft from our base at Baden-Soellingen in the Federal Republic of Germany. Now based in Qatar at "Canada Dry One" and "Canada Dry Two", more than 500 Canadian Forces personnel support our CF-18 operations. These versatile aircraft from 409 Squadron are contributing in a significant way to the air defence of friendly naval forces operating in the region, of which our three ships form a part.

Canada's response is fully consistent with the provisions of Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. More than twenty-five countries have similarly committed military personnel and equipment as a part of the multi-national effort.

Canada is maintaining independent national command and control of our ships and aircraft as they patrol their assigned area of responsibility in the Persian Gulf. To ensure maximum coordination of the efforts of the Canadian vessels and aircraft in the region, Canada is also establishing a centralized joint-headquarters which will be located in Bahrain. As a member of a multi-national effort, Canada is conducting its operations in close communication and cooperation with its allies in the region.

The Chief of Defence Staff, in consultation with the Minister of National Defence, has authorized the Commander of the Task Group to take such action as may be necessary to accomplish his assigned mission. Specific national Rules of Engagement and Levels of Force have been approved to guide the actions of the commanders deployed to the Gulf Area. These are detailed rules and instructions regarding the degree of autonomy that the Task Group Commander, commanding officers and aircraft commanders have in responding to a developing situation. To date, Canadian Forces have intercepted more than 400 ships in the area of operations in the Persian Gulf. These have been completely non-violent operations conducted in the spirit of cooperation.

As the search for a resolution of this crisis intensifies, Canadian ships and aircraft will continue to make a meaningful contribution to the multi-national enforcement of United Nations sanctions against Iraq. In so doing, they will at all times remain under Canadian command and control. The men and women of the Canadian Forces have and will continue to demonstrate operational flexibility, dedication, and determination to achieve the aims established by the Canadian Government.

IMPACT ON CANADIAN ECONOMY

[Senator Doody.]

It is difficult to measure the potential impact on the Canadian economy of the current crisis in the Gulf. Uncertainty surrounding the outcome has led to extreme volatility in oil prices and no one can be sure as to the duration of the crisis. However, in the absence of an escalation of tensions, we can make some conclusions about the impact on Canada.

Higher oil prices resulting from the Gulf crisis are not expected to have a substantial effect on the Canadian economy. Output will not be greatly affected although some upward pressure is expected on prices. This view has been substantiated by a number of private sector forecasters and international organizations such as the IMF.

The small impact relative to previous oil shocks is largely due to a substantial reduction in the importance of oil relative to total energy consumption since the early 1970s. On average, oil consumption per unit of output has declined by nearly 40 per cent in OECD countries since 1973.

Further, Canada is a small net exporter of oil. Consequently, higher oil prices represent an improvement to our terms of trade and a net income gain to Canada.

Over the longer term, we would also expect higher levels of energy investment. However, additional investment will only be undertaken if higher oil prices are perceived to be permanent. At present, the industry does not consider current price levels to be sustainable beyond the short term and they have therefore been conservative with respect to future investment plans.

However, higher oil prices have resulted in increased revenues. It is unclear, though, how much of the increase will find its way into future investment.

Increases in net exports and the possibility of higher investment will help to offset some of the negative impact from other sectors; most notably, as the economies of our major trading partners slow, Canadian non-oil exports will be negatively affected.

The U.S. economy will likely be slightly more detrimentally affected by the price shock than Canada given its position as a net oil importer. This will provide a risk to our export performance.

So far, there has been no visible impact on the prices of other fuels. Increases in gasoline prices have only begun showing at the pump in the last month or so.

Domestic natural gas prices are established under contracts that are not indexed to the price of oil. These contracts are only renegotiated every one to three years. Little response is therefore expected in the near term.

The price of electricity is regulated by provincial regulatory boards. Overall, only about 2 per cent of electricity generation in Canada is oil-fired. Most of Canadian electricity is generated through nuclear, coal, and hydro-electric generation. Higher oil prices should not, therefore, have a significant impact on electricity prices.

ENERGY

PRICE OF GASOLINE IN LONDON, ONTARIO, AND ENVIRONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the third delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 24, 1990, by the Honourable Charles Turner, regarding Energy—Price of Gasoline in London, Ontario, and Environs.

(The answer follows:)

In the short term local market forces, i.e. competition and the supply and demand for gasoline, are the most important factor in determine gasoline prices. London and Woodstock are markets where gasoline prices are volatile, partially due to the prominence of independent gasoline marketers, who purchase gasoline from Canadian and American refiners. Independent gasoline marketers import gasoline from wholesalers in Buffalo and Port Huron when the price to import the gasoline is lower than the price they would pay to Canadian refiners.

Independents can often "shop around" for the best prices, and thus are able to offer gasoline to the consumer at prices a bit below their competitors. The competitors will have to lower their prices in order to preserve their share of the market.

Gasoline prices in London have been fluctuating during the past 2 months. During September, regular unleaded gasoline prices ranged between 54.1 cents/litre and 59.7 cents/litre. In October prices have increased and ranged between 59.5 cents/litre and 62.1 cents/litre.

When the prices are lower the consumer is benefitting at the expense of the refiner and retailer. While the current market forces have resulted in lower gasoline prices in Woodstock than in London, there is little guarantee this situation will persist.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE SUSPENDED

On the Order:

Third Reading of Bill C-44, an Act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto.—(Honourable Senator Ottenheimer).

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Our colleague, Senator Ottenheimer, should move third reading, should he not?

Senator Hays: I gather, from prompting on this side, that we could either speak to the bill at third reading, or I could speak now to the report.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think it is simply a matter of Senator Ottenheimer's moving third reading, at which time everyone can speak.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: If honourable senators agree, then I move third reading of this bill.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, speaking to third reading rather than to the report of the committee, I am pleased to rise to make a few comments on this legislation.

There are many factors which commend Bill C-44 and Hibernia to us and many factors which raise serious questions about whether or not it should proceed as negotiated or at all, in the light of the extraordinary assistance that will be required by the Government of Canada. On balance, the committee takes the view, as I do, that this project should proceed.

I accept that view principally because Hibernia will provide levels of economic activity in Newfoundland that would not otherwise occur. It will probably act as a catalyst to further activity that has the potential to serve Canada's needs and, in particular, to stimulate economic activity in Atlantic Canada, particularly in Newfoundland.

Having drawn that conclusion, we should not fail, however, to have a full and frank discussion about the project, its origins, its long suits and its shortcomings. I will make some comments generally and I understand that at least one senator, Senator Kenny, will be speaking more particularly, his plan being to talk about the environmental issues raised by Hibernia. I will not dwell at any length on those.

I should first say that this legislation and what it represents ended the strictly deregulated market-based policy of the sitting government, in that this government decided during the period prior to the 1988 election to make a market intervention. The decision involved a commitment of $2 billion to Hibernia, a heavy oil upgrader at Lloydminster, an oilsands project near Fort McMurray called OSLO and the construction of a gas pipeline to Vancouver Island.

As we all know, since the last budget of Mr. Wilson the commitment to OSLO has been withdrawn. It may be revived, I do not know. In any event, I think it is worth making the point that the non-interventionist policy changed at that stage.

Specifically with respect to Hibernia, as we well know, there will be a direct investment of $1.04 billion toward infrastructure costs. In addition, $1.66 million in loan guarantees will be made available. The reality is that that direct payment and those loan guarantees will enhance the value of an asset owned by a number of large companies; Mobil Oil Canada, the lead company, to the extent of 28.125 per cent; Petro-Canada, 25 per cent; Gulf Canada Resources Limited, 25 per cent; and Chevron Canada Resources, 21.875 per cent. When this bill is passed, those companies will be the owners of an asset worth considerably more than it was before its passage. The question really is: is it a good intervention?

I would like to make a few general comments about Hibernia to put it in perspective. As we all know, it is located 315 kilometres east of St. John's in about 80 metres of water. It is estimated by Mobil Oil to contain at least 525 million barrels of recoverable oil, and, by the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration, a government agency, to contain between 625-650 million barrels.

It represents the culmination of activity that had its origins in an exploration permit granted to Mobil Oil in 1965 for exploration off the east coast. Between 1972 and 1976 six exploration wells were drilled by the original Hibernia sponsors. In 1978 special renewal permits were issued to Mobil, Gulf and Petro-Canada. The following year, Chevron and Columbia Gas joined the Hibernia group. The Hibernia discovery well was drilled in 1979, and nine delineation and appraisal wells were drilled in 1980 to 1984 at an expenditure of $465 million.

The Atlantic Accord was signed in February, 1985 and Mobil Oil as the operator, submitted socio-economic and environmental impact statements in May, 1985 and a development plan that September. The Canada-Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board gave conditional approval to the development plan in June, 1986. Since then the project sponsors have submitted three fiscal proposals, and the terms of a final offer were agreed upon in July, 1988, following which the sponsors—Chevron, Columbia, Gulf, Mobil and Petro-Canada, and the governments of Canada and Newfoundland and Labrador—signed the Statement of Principles on July 18, 1988.

The development of the field is expected to result in the production of 110,000 barrels a day; peak production would be 150,000.

Natural gas, of which there may be more than one trillion cubic feet producible from Hibernia, will be reinjected for reservoir repressuring. At the end of Hibernia's producing life, some of the natural gas may be produced in a reservoir blowdown, if prices warrant its extraction. Hibernia's economics have been calculated without any credit for the potential gas production.

Operating costs over the life of the project are estimated to total $10 billion. Thus the total Hibernia project cost is set at approximately $19 billion in as-spent dollars, when one adds the estimated $5.2 billion to be spent over the six years to bring it into production and the additional $3.3 million which will be spent in capital costs over the operating lifetime of the field.

The field will be produced through use of a gravity base structure. This structure is unique. I am not aware of any similar structures from evidence brought before the committee or from the briefings we have had.

The principal construction site for the Hibernia platform will be at Great Mosquito Cove in Bull Arm, Trinity Bay, about 150 kilometres west of St. John's. This location will see the construction of the GBS, or gravity based structure, fabrication of one of the supermodules, assembly of the platform topsides and, in effect, the bringing together of all of these components. This will provide an industrial infrastructure to support further development of offshore petroleum resources and should contribute to the economic viability of projects following on from Hibernia.

[Senator Hays.]

One point that should be made is that the gravity base structure will probably be unique. Accordingly, the technology for that structure will not have direct applicability to the other technical needs to produce oil from Terra Nova, White Rose, Ben Nevis or some of the other fields in that area, but will indirectly contribute to the technological capability to bring those fields into production.

The project has gone through redesigns, mostly from the vantage point of greater industrial benefits for Newfoundland as well as other parts of Canada. In particular, we are all aware of the desire that certain shipyards in Quebec benefit from the activity that will result from the high expenditure of direct tax dollars as well as the direct expenditure on the loan guarantees. Before concluding my speech I will talk about the specifics of what we might expect in terms of dollars spent.

The consortium has undertaken to use its best efforts to cause the fabrication and assembly and outfitting services of the modules, including the supermodule, within Canada. I will have a specific figure later—I do not have it here right now—which shows that around half of the capital expenditures are expected to be spent in Canada.

A number of controversial issues relate to the location where the oil produced from this field will be refined. I should like to turn to that issue now. It is one of the incomplete things in this intervention. We have been through a period where the Minister of Energy, Mr. Epp, as well as the President of Petro-Canada, when appearing before the energy committee, indicated that virtually all of the production from Hibernia would be exported. The briefings also confirm that the export will take place either to western Europe or to the United States.

Through some good investigative work, we have had reports in the media that the reason given for all that oil being exported—namely, that it has a high paraffin content—would not prevent it from being refined in Canada and that those refineries that are importing oil to meet our needs in atlantic Canada and Quebec could and would refine the oil. Since that statement, and since more and more questions have been asked, there has been a modification. Mr. Hopper, in his last appearance before the committee, estimated that roughly one-third of the oil would now be refined in Canada. Mr. Epp did not disagree with that. That is the best I can say about the testimony we heard from him.

Specifically, I should like to put on the record, in a way that I did not when I spoke to this on second reading, how the position of the government changed with respect to the security and supply issue.

The Hibernia background papers of 1988 states:

> Canada's increased requirements for foreign crude supplies could be significantly reduced by new supplies of light/medium crude oil from Hibernia, and from the further development of the potential of the Newfoundland offshore.

That is found on page 14 of the report. The fact sheet on the role of Hibernia in enhancing Canada's oil supplies contained in the September 14, 1990, Energy, Mines and Resources information kit drops any mention of Hibernia oil used in Canada. It refers to the Hibernia project establishing a "new energy frontier for Canada and diversifying Canada's oil supply." The issue of Canadian oil security is not addressed.

Although this is not available in final form, I should like to quote from the evidence the committee heard, in particular from Mr. Hopper, on this issue. I am not sure whether I should refer specifically to the blues by page number, but I will. The quote that I am about to read is from A-37 of the unrevised transcript of evidence given by Mr. Hopper before the committee on Tuesday, October 23, 1990.

I will quote from a statement Mr. Hopper made in response to a question that I asked. It is found at page A-37:

> You say that Chevron and Mobil look upon security of supply in a North American context. I don't know how Mobil and Chevron look at it. It would be a surprise to me if they looked at it that way. I think their view is security of supply is something the governments look after and they look upon their own security of supply. They might express concern from time to time about U.S. security of supply but fundamentally they are driven by the market and the bottom line and really feel that security of supply is something that the U.S. government ought to take care of rather than themselves. And that's not saying anything harsh about them. The world has always been that way.
> I am not sure that Petro-Canada long term will feel much differently about that except that we are a company that is largely in Canada.
> We are investing in Canada and we have large resources in Canada and in the long run it is going to be good for this company to develop those resources in Canada which will in turn will be good for Canada's security of supply.

I then intervened and said:

> I agree that security of supply is a concern of the government of the nation. Along those lines, and I don't know, maybe you can't share this with us, maybe you can, was there ever any attempt in the negotiation on Hibernia to see that oil come into the Canadian market?
> Mr. Hopper: No I don't think so, not seriously. You must remember that Chevron and Mobil don't refine on the east coast at all.

He goes on to explain their refining capability in the U.S. Quite naturally, those U.S. companies would like, as Mr. Hopper said, to complete their loop and refine their oil in their own refineries.

● (1450)

I am spending all this time to confirm one thing. The companies will not look after Canadian security of supply. That is the responsibility of the Government of Canada. The evidence on the record so far—and Mr. Epp did not really comment in a way that I can quote reasonably on this issue—is that the Government of Canada did not pursue that. Accordingly, the point I am making is that that the government is an incomplete intervention.

I would like to put on the record a few more facts which are well illustrated in the report on Petro-Canada that the committee tabled in June. We are currently a net exporter of oil, both in terms of volume and dollars. I was surprised to see the figures with respect to that, although I have not had a chance to examine them. The reason I am a little surprised is because we export a large volume of heavy oil, which sells at a price of about $10 per barrel lower than does the light oil which we import. In any event, our volumes of exports are apparently sufficient to make up for that differential. The fact is that our light oil production is in decline, something which is well documented. I would refer honourable senators to the report which the committee tabled on Petro-Canada. Thus, we must be concerned about this matter.

I say that because approximately two-thirds of our requirement is supplied by our own production, while approximately one-third of it is supplied by imports. That is a potentially serious problem for us since our IEA commitments treat our obligations to the rest of the world—which would be principally the United States because of its proximity—as if we not only produce but actually supply all the oil that we consume. We have to be careful to keep that in mind to ensure that we do everything possible to reduce our exposure to a short supply situation. That would leave us with IEA commitments based on our total supply, the IEA overriding the FTA in this circumstance, as well as our commitment pursuant to the FTA, in particular Article 904(c) of the FTA which states that we could not change the 36-month history of exports without invoking proportionality. There are some exceptions to that which I will not go into. However, I will answer questions on it later if honourable senators wish to pose them.

On the IEA and the FTA commitments, we have a vested interest in seeing that we supply our own needs to the greatest possible degree. It seems to me that we can do that by completing the intervention. I believe that in the end, either through this government or another, we will address that issue. The 110,000 barrels, which represents an estimated 12 per cent of our production in the year 2000, will be directed into the Canadian market. It will displace imports and address our balance of payments problem. That should be the way that we should go. Hopefully, we would then displace additional imports with production from other fields on the east cost and the offshore.

I would now like to refer to a letter I received which was critical of me for taking the position I have on the Canadian security of supply problem. I think it puts very well the other view, which is that it is not Canadian security supply about which we should worry, but North American security of supply. We all recall the degree to which this was an issue during the last election. There was a lot of rhetoric at that time to the effect that we were buying into a continental energy policy and that this had potential risks for Canada. I believe it does.

Furthermore, it was the view that we would be paying heavy subsidies out of Canadian tax dollars to bring production in Canada on line not to meet our needs but to meet U.S. needs.

One of the ways to say that is not happening would be to address the issue that I am making so much of right now. That is to say, do not spend a billion dollars plus and that large amount in guarantees and then export all the oil to the U.S. We should not do that because that puts truth in criticisms which were directed at the FTA. It seems to me that the government has a big interest in seeing that that does not happen.

The point I want to deal with is in terms of those who say, "Don't worry about Canada. It is a North American issue, a Canada-U.S. issue." The letter to which I referred states that "Despite past legislative attempts to formulate energy security in a Canadian context, the reality is, that Canada's energy security must be defined in a North American context. In light of this reality, Canada's energy security position was greatly strengthened by the Canada-U.S. free trade pact. By contributing to North American energy security we are contributing to Canadian energy security."

That is true. We are also contributing to world energy security. However, when all the potential problems we would have in a short supply situation are factored in and the difficulty in dealing with those because of our IEA and our FTA commitments are taken into account, it seems to me that that is not a good answer.

I would like to try to bring that point home. We talk a lot about global competitiveness. All too often we talk about it as if it is a solution and a good answer without really understanding that what is happening in the world presents great risks to Canada.

I would like to quote at length from an article which appeared in the New York Review of Books written by Peter Peterson, a former U.S. Secretary of Commerce who is chairman of both the Council of Foreign Relations and the Institute for International Economics. This article deals with the issue very well, as does our report on Petro-Canada. The article states:

> One of the most depressing aspects of the recent Persian Gulf upheaval is that the United States has once again been caught virtually unprepared to deal with the threat to its supply of imported petroleum. This should not have come as a surprise. Indeed, as the 1980s unfolded, the increasing vulnerability of the U.S. energy supply to foreign manipulation would surely have been clear to Persian Gulf adventurers in the yearly reports of our national energy and economic accounts. That Americans ignored it until this August is yet another troubling indication of the national somnolence of the 1980s.
> It is true that when OPEC overplayed its hand in 1979 and sharply raised prices, the U.S. temporarily decreased its oil consumption and domestic oil production rose. But the decrease in consumption was over by 1983—ironically just as many Americans were convinced that they were entering a period of painless national prosperity.

• (1500)

> US oil consumption has since risen by 12 percent. And the good news about energy production was over by 1985. Between 1985 and 1989 US production declined by 12 percent, and it is expected to decline another 4 or 5 percent this year. From net crude oil imports of about four million barrels a day in the mid-1980s, our oil deficit has lately been increasing—to six million barrels a day in 1988, and, according to recent projections, it will exceed seven million barrels a day this year.
> A downward trend in world energy prices between 1980 and 1988—partly caused by energy conservation in other industrial countries—temporarily reversed the impact of our growing oil deficit (measured in barrels) on our trade balance (measured in dollars). Indeed, from 1980 to 1986 our annual net oil trade deficit fell by over $45 billion. But again the good news is over. Nearly all experts agree that our net oil trade deficit, after reaching a low of $29.9 billion in 1986, is bound to rise from now on. When the figures for 1989 become available, they will show that the oil deficit will exceed $40 billion.

I should like to quote further:

> How could a new energy crisis come about? It may, to be sure, resemble what happened in 1973 or 1979, when a sudden contraction in supply was followed by public rationing and political hysteria. But I doubt such a replay of events. If there is one lesson the Gulf states have learned over the last decade and a half, it is that very sharp increases in price unleash market forces that both limit demand and encourage competing supplies to be produced; and both these work against their own long-term interests. Equally important, they may have observed that while Americans often react decisively in the face of an obvious crisis, they appear likely to tolerate trends, such as chronic trade or budget deficits, that are insidious and gradual. The most astute OPEC strategy would be to let both oil production and prices rise steadily as long as the cartel leaders can keep them under control. (Interestingly, periodic relapses in oil prices such as those that occurred just before Iraq invaded Kuwait also tend to undermine new investments in energy supplies outside of OPEC, but they have only minor adverse financial consequences for the Saudis and most of the other chief OPEC exporters.)

The final paragraph I should like to quote says:

> If we persist in our frivolous and willful habits and continue to succumb to energy gluttony throughout the 1990s, we may no longer enjoy the luxury of saying that it's "just another problem" that one day will go away, like the S&L debacle. By the middle of the decade we will likely be forced to recognize America's use of energy as part of a much deeper problem: a national tendency to avoid hard choices, which results in excessive consumption at the expense of our future combined with a foolish dependence on foreign capital. The economist Herbert Stein once observed, "If something is unsustainable, it tends to stop." The only question is whether we will decide to choose when and how it stops, and at what cost to ourselves and to our children.

This article is from the September 27, 1990 issue of The New York Review of Book. It makes very well the point I wish to make: Unless you are vigilant you can get into a lot of trouble. The United States is in a lot of trouble with 50 per cent dependence and on their way to 60 per cent.

Looking at North America as the unit for which we want to create a secure supply, and taking into consideration, when we exclude oil sands and heavy oil, that we have 1 per cent of the world's light crude reserves, we are not a solution to the American problem. We had better look out for ourselves, because our failure to do so will leave us in the same situation. We will have problems similar to theirs, when we do not need to have them, with or without the FTA. We need to ensure that we serve the complete Canadian interest, not only regional development but, as importantly, the security of supply issue.

The Department of Energy in the United States, under the auspices of the Secretary of Energy, Admiral Watkins, held a series of hearings, leading to a national energy strategy. That strategy is to be announced some time before the end of this year. The U.S. recognizes the problem and does want to do something about it. Its current budget package includes an increase in the motor fuel tax. In its consumer society it has been impossible to address the security of supply issue. We in Canada are blessed with an abundance of energy. We do not have a major security of supply issue, and we do not need to have one. However, we will have one if we are complacent and not vigilant in our policy development.

I should like to put some facts on the record that arose out of briefings the committee had with respect to Hibernia. The expected distribution of Hibernia pre-production expenditures is: Newfoundland $1.6 billion, the rest of Canada $1.4 billion, and offshore $2 billion. The remaining $160 million could fall into any one of these categories. That will be the subject of competition. Hopefully the successful competitors will be Canadians. This is where the issue of industrial benefits to the Province of Quebec arises. Members of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee heard representations from members of the National Assembly expressing concern about the heavy subsidies to Hibernia and the extent to which they would be at a disadvantage in competing for further work offshore or in the Beaufort. I am not as concerned as are some of the members of the National Assembly, but they do make a good point. When we spend these kinds of dollars in the interventionist way that the government has chosen, we should ensure optimum benefits for the country.

The Hibernia consortium is required to spend $1 billion on the project within three years. There is, however, an escape clause for the consortium members. If the project pre-production capital cost rises above $5.6 billion, a company has the option of withdrawing from the project and the $1 billion consortium spending commitment terminates. Therefore, if the projected costs exceed $5.6 billion within the initial three-year period, a consortium member can withdraw without having spent its full share of the $1 billion. If the projected costs exceed $5.6 billion after the three years, a consortium member can still withdraw. This is something that they negotiated. It is not expected that it will happen but, as a matter of record, there is some risk of that kind of problem occurring.

When the minister was pressed to answer questions regarding the cost and the return, he did make some good points. Over time, through reduced exposure or reduced obligations with respect to transfer payments, UI payments and so on, it is seen as something that is beneficial to Canada as a whole, not just Newfoundland. That has been commented on by economists in Newfoundland in the context that it really does not do much for us because many of the benefits simply go to Canada in terms of reducing their obligations to assist us. Hopefully it will go beyond that with the other projects and Newfoundland will have its day in the energy sun.

In any event, Hibernia is not considered to be a crown investment as such, but as an initiative which returns indirect benefits to the federal treasury, such as reduced equalization payments to Newfoundland, reduced UI payments because of job creation and increased income tax revenues. I have already commented on the gas. I have not commented on the gravity base structure and the problems it will present. The agreement entered into by the two levels of government with the developers does not provide for what will happen to the gravity base structure when the field is depleted. In fact, it is estimated that a further $1 billion would have to be spent to take the gas out of the field. It may present a potential environmental hazard. I simply want to ensure that honourable senators are aware of this potential problem and that it is on the record as we discuss the bill and prepare to vote on it at a third reading.

For the government to receive a return on its investment of the nature I have described, the price of a barrel of crude through the production period would have to be $25, and that is calculated in 1989 dollars. Using a 5 per cent discount rate, the federal return on the project would be about $39 million which, for my purposes, is flat given the type of investment we are talking about here. I shall not dwell at length on the regional benefits because they have been covered sufficiently by Senator Ottenheimer and Senator Petten. They are potentially great, although somewhat controversial. However, using rule-of-thumb numbers, 1,100 permanent jobs, costing $1 million per job, will be created. An additional 2,500 jobs will be indirectly created, which brings the price of a permanent job to somewhere around $300,000. As well, there are 13,000 person years of work during the construction phase.

So it is a controversial project. I shall not comment on the environmental aspects because Senator Kenny intends to discuss that issue. In the end, the environment may be the most controversial aspect of the project, because it is located in probably the richest fishery in the world, the Grands Banks. I support the recommendation of the committee, that we pass Bill C-44 without amendment.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Would Senator Hays permit a question?

Senator Hays: Yes.

Senator Stewart: This bill, respecting the Hibernia Development project, was given first reading in the Senate on Friday, October 26. It was then sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. This is Monday, October 29 and we do not have access, as Senator Hays had said, to the record of the committee hearing. Hibernia is located in very rough waters. It is adjacent to very valuable fishing grounds. Did the committee ascertain what guarantees are required of the participants in the project to ensure that any environmental damage that specifically affects the fishery will be adequately, indeed, fully compensated? I notice that he dealt with this project almost entirely from the viewpoint of oil and gas, the money to be paid and the jobs to flow therefrom. What about this other aspect of the project?

Senator Hays: In the final analysis if we were unlucky, the question raised by the honourable senator would be, by far, the most important and profound question, both economically and environmentally. The honourable senator is correct in that the committee proceedings of the hearing with the minister and his officials are not available, although the blues were out at mid-morning. I believe the record will show that Senator Kenny who intends to speak on the environment issue and Senator Spivak and Senator Marshall were at the meeting and asked these questions about the environmental impact of the project. I do not believe that I could do justice to the honourable senator's very serious question by trying to summarize those answers at this time. I wonder if I may defer dealing with the question until after we have heard from senator Kenny. While he is speaking, I will review the blues, and if Senator Kenny does not address the concern raised by senator Stewart perhaps I can rise after Senator Kenny and try to deal with the question.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Senator Hays quoted a letter which he described as being mildly critical of his views with regard to Canadian sufficiency. Would the honourable senator identify the author of that letter?

Senator Hays: The author is a man by the name of Trevor Mills, who wrote on his own behalf. He is from Calgary. I chose to quote the letter because I thought that it put the view of the U.S. participants in perspective. As you know, because Hibernia is in the frontier Canada Lands, it is required to be 50 per cent Canadian owned. The 50 per cent Canadian owners are Petro Canada and Gulf, and the 50 per cent U.S. owners are Mobil and Chevron. I felt that Mr. Mills put the Mobil-Chevron position very well. He indicated that security of supply was not a Canadian issue but rather a North American issue.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I would like to make a few remarks about bill C-44. In examining this piece of legislation, I found myself to be at odds with some members of my caucus. I feel that both the legislation and the project itself fall short of what we should expect. In particular, I believe it falls short of what Newfoundland should expect, and I am very concerned that the federal government is not providing Newfoundland and the people of that province with all the benefits they deserve.

When you look at Hibernia, you have to ask yourself why is it important to Canada and why is it important to Newfoundland? Successive federal and provincial governments of both parties have looked at this pool of oil—it is estimated to be 890 million barrels of light and medium crude—and have decided that it has the potential to cut Atlantic Canada's need for 200,000 barrels of oil per day just about in half. Currently, all of that oil is imported.

They have also decided that it would provide, in an economical manner, good, stable, long-term employment for Newfoundland which currently has an unemployment rate of 17 per cent, or 44,000 workers, the highest in Canada. They also believe that all of this could be accomplished without significant risk to the environment and to the province's traditional fish-based economy.

Honourable senators, Bill C-44, as an energy bill, will cost the Government of Canada $1.04 billion in preproduction capital expenditures, and $1.66 billion in loan guarantees. If all the financing provisions are fully exercised, the total cost to the federal government could go as high as $3.175 billion. In addition to this, Petro-Canada, the state oil company, will invest another $1 billion over the next five years. However, I believe that if you have a good project, the marketplace will demonstrate that you do not need to put subsidies of this sort into the project.

The oil that is to be produced will be too expensive. Production costs in U.S. dollars range from $17 to $38 a barrel. At the moment, 75 per cent of the oil that is lifted in the world is produced for less than $4 a barrel and 90 per cent of the oil lifted in the world is produced at a cost of less than $10 a barrel. We are looking at a range here of something between $17 and $38 a barrel.

Industry analysts tell us that $30 (U.S.) a barrel is the minimum price for the project to be viable for its commercial partners. Currently, prices are above $30 (U.S.), but anyone who follows oil pricing will know that it is just as likely to be above as below today or tomorrow.

If we look at Hibernia from the point of view of being a regional development bill—that is, assuming it is not a good energy bill—the jobs will simply cost too much. We heard Senator Hays say earlier that for 1,100 permanent jobs, the federal government will be paying $945,000 per job. That is remarkably high.

Too much of the sourcing related to this job will be going offshore. We hear estimates ranging from 40 per cent to 60 per cent and, I might add, the project sponsors think that is a major accomplishment. I do not understand why sourcing of this magnitude should go offshore when Canada has been active in the offshore; when Canada has a fully mature oil and gas industry; and when we have capable shipyards and capable workers. Why does this amount of our project have to go offshore?

Honourable senators, too few permanent jobs will be created. If this were a regional development bill and the federal government were committing itself to $1.4 billion in regional development, I would suggest that there are better ways to spend that money in Newfoundland than to spend it on Hibernia. They could come up with more and better jobs than the sort of work that will go ahead in Hibernia.

The agreement I have seen is full of references to "best efforts." I would suggest, honourable senators, that "best efforts" really does not mean very much. They are warm words that may give politicians some comfort from time to time, but the phrase does not mean a damn thing to the oil companies.

If Newfoundland and Canada were prepared to go ahead with a project like this, I do not understand why they would be prepared to settle for "best efforts." I would certainly concede that in the oil and gas business workers are mobile; they move around a lot. It is an international business and there are Canadians working offshore in different parts of the world. We, in turn, expect a lot of people from different countries to come and work here. However, it seems reasonable to me that over a period of time, particularly if the government is going to put in this sort of money, the agreement could have insisted on increasing the proportion of Canadian employees to work on this facility.

I think that the type of work, particularly the construction work, that is going into this project is of the lowest quality. The type of equipment to be built will be a gravity-based system which involves putting together great chunks of cement, floating the whole thing out and sinking it to the ocean floor. It will provide work and income for the workers while it is being built, but once the job is complete then that is the end of it. There will be no more demand for this type of structure. In fact, the next structure coming on will be a floating system. It will not be built the same way, it will not look the same, and it will have none of the same characteristics. Therefore, the work done by employees will be of a temporary nature.

Honourable senators, I also looked at the legislation from the perspective of oil self-sufficiency. Right now, Atlantic Canada gets all of its oil offshore at the rate of 200,000 barrels per day. Hibernia will be able to produce almost half of that, in fact, 110,000 barrels per day. That would amount to 12 per cent of Canada's light crude production. However, the plans are for all of the oil to be sold offshore.

We heard Senator Hays refer to Mr. Hopper's comments before the committee. Mr. Hopper said that, as far as he knows, all of the oil will be going offshore, but he allowed that perhaps 30 per cent could be refined in Canada. However, he went on to point out, as we all know, that it is waxy crude which cannot be refined in Canada because we do not have the capacity to do it. Some of the members of the committee questioned him on this and asked why this was the case; and he replied that it would cost Petro-Canada $50 million to convert its refinery in Montreal. Senator Waters pressed the matter and asked about Come By Chance and told us he did not know what the exact situation would be but that it would probably cost the people in Come By Chance $50 million—the same as it would cost in Montreal—if they wanted to convert their refinery to deal with waxy crude. He told us that it did not make much sense for us to do it on our own when we could export our oil and run these refineries without spending $50 million.

The long and the short of it is that the deal will not do much for Canadian self-sufficiency. We will be producing it at great expense and we will be shipping it down the gulf coast or down the east coast to the United States. This will become a "Normal Channel of Supply" under Article 904(C) of the FTA. We may find ourselves having to continue exporting the same amount, as our own needs grow, with the result that there will be no domestic refining capability and no domestic oil supply for Atlantic Canada. What we may end up doing is using regional development funds to supply oil to consumers in the southern United States.

I should like next to deal with the argument that this is kick-starting energy development on the east coast. Premier Wells used this argument. Mr. Epp used this argument. However, I just do not believe you can kick-start this sort of development. I have some experience in seeing the kick-starting of energy projects. We all know what happened in Tuktoyaktuk; we have Senator Adams who can tell us about it. A government—a different government but a government—decided that it was going to kick-start activity in the Beaufort Sea and spent hundreds of million of dollars up there. Suppliers got geared up; many natives started their own businesses, began joint ventures and got trained in handling supply boats. The long and the short of it is that the price is not sufficient to support oil development in the Beaufort Sea. No amount of kick-starting on the part of the federal government, or any other government, can make an energy project go for one minute longer than the subsidies last. The logic, if you need logic, is to count the rigs that are active off the east coast. Five years ago there were 15 exploration rigs active, but in the past two years only one rig has been active and only one well has been drilled. There is a message there, a message for all of us: The timing is not right; the price of oil is not right. We are pushing a stone up hill.

Projects proceed when they are economic, and the very fact that these sorts of subsidies are going into Hibernia tells us that Hibernia is not economic.

I should comment in passing on Terra Nova. Mr. Hopper raised it before the committee. Perhaps I should first remind honourable senators that if all of the financing provisions for Hibernia are fully exercised the federal government will be putting $3.175 billion into Hibernia. Terra Nova, about half the size of Hibernia and about 40 kilometres south of Hibernia, is going to go forward without any government involvement—not a nickel. It is going to be built with a more efficient floating structure, built off-shore, and I might add, with no cost to the government. Mr. Hopper thinks it will come into production in 1996 or 1997, about the same time as Hibernia. The question we have to ask ourselves is: If Terra Nova can proceed without government assistance, why not let it, and spend the millions and millions of government money that we plan to spend on Hibernia in other ways to improve training and employment in Newfoundland?

I think that the people of Newfoundland are being shortchanged by this project. I think they are getting the money in the wrong way. They are not getting it in the way that will provide them with the jobs and the future they deserve. It will cost the province of Newfoundland $1.6 billion in preproduction costs. Newfoundland will also forego millions of dollars in retail sales tax and in provincial corporate income tax, and then it will earn $2.3 billion in royalties if the price stays above $25 U.S. a barrel. However, for every dollar it receives in royalties from the oil companies, the federal government will reduce its equalization payments by 97 or 98 cents. I really do not understand where the province will be coming out on this.

Professor Wade Loche, from Memorial University, has done a study showing that the province will take from Hibernia a total of $100 million, or an average of about $4 million per year over the life of the project from Hibernia. It seems like a very expensive project.

I now turn to the environmental risks that are associated with Hibernia. The well is to be located in an area that is commonly referred to as "Iceberg Alley". The risks are from blow-outs, from spills in handling the oil, and from damage to tankers transporting the oil. We have seen all three of those occur in North America in the past few years. It may be fair to say that hundreds of holes have been drilled in the North Atlantic so far without any serious blow-outs, but it takes one.

The November 1989 joint report of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada and the Canadian Petroleum Association—which are the two principal associations of oil companies in Canada—entitled "Oil Spill Preparedness in the Upstream Petroleum Industry" made some points which I should like to repeat here in the chamber. Honourable senators should again remember that this is oil producers talking about the dangers of oil spills in Hibernia.

The CPA report stated that oil flow from a blow-out would likely be at least 10,000 barrels per day. Mobil Oil, which is the lead member of the consortium, gave a worst-case example of 30,000 barrels per day in their environmental impact statement. Just to put that in context, the Exxon Valdez lost 240,000 barrels in total. So, in Mobil Oil's worst-case scenario, it would only take one week to spill as much oil in a blow-out as the Exxon Valdez spilled in Alaska. A relief well takes between four and eight weeks to drill, so you can multiply the Exxon Valdez four to eight times if you have a serious blow-out or a worst-case blow-out in Hibernia.

In terms of Canada's ability to clean up a spill, there are many factors involved and it is difficult for anyone to be precise about how a clean-up will go. The variables that exist include issues like the time of year, the waves that are occurring at the time, and the wind. So people are quite imprecise, but just so that honourable senators can get a feel for some of the possibilities, in a sub-sea or above-sea blow-out in summer with a sea state of three, which is about a one metre wave, it is estimated that 11 to 24 per cent could be cleaned up using the best available technology. This is equipment that we do not have in Canada. In fact, we have very little equipment available to clean up in Canada, but if we had world-class technology, with a sea state of about one metre, then 11 to 24 per cent might be possible to clean up.

In winter time, with either a sub-sea or above-sea blow-out, with a sea state of five, or three metres, which is likely in winter time, the likelihood of cleaning up anything more than two per cent is very low. In fact, most people suggest that if you had a blow-out in the winter time you would not even bother cleaning it up.

In fact, when we discussed the problems of a blow-out with Mr. Hopper in committee, he just suggested that it would not be a totally unmanageable problem. The high-sea state would cause the oil to emulsify and the drift would tend towards the northeast, so that by the time it passed Iceland there would not be much of a problem, and there was certainly no risk of any of it hitting Ireland. I am paraphrasing, and perhaps being a little bit mischievous in the way I am doing it, but that was the thrust of Mr. Hopper's comments.

The problems with the sort of oil that would spill are that it is thick, waxy and difficult to recover. It gets submerged in the water column.

● (1540)

The report states:

—high waves, winds, open seas make recovery more difficult

—difficult to predict direction and spread of oil slick (dependant on seasonal winds & currents)

Right now in Canada the technology is very poor in open water. We have skimmers, we have booms, but they work best close to shore.

The report goes on to state:

e. Inappropriate or lacking equipment:

—technology does not exist to perform adequately in open water—skimmers and booms work best close to shore —technology also does not exist to detect and track submerged particles and globules formed by waxy oils

—currently available equipment could not deal with the heavy, waxy emulsions and oils from Hibernia. Would require help from other oil spill cooperatives around the world, moving response time up to approx. 2 weeks (using worst case scenario, 420,000 barrels would be lost—2 Exxon Valdez disasters)

—East Coast Spill Response Inc. (ESRI) does not have vessels of its own, but depends on oil companies or Coast Guard for transport. Given current transport equipment, would take ESRI over 2—4 days to arrive on site.

—no heavy-lift helicopters or aircraft nearby—closest in Ontario

—ESRI does not have equipment needed to deal with waves of 20—30 feet, nor adequate amounts of boom

In fact, no one has adequate booms for waves of that height.

The Independent Petroleum Association of Canada goes on to state:

f. Other problems

—personnel and management not adequately trained in handling oil spill response preparedness

I am quoting from an oil industry report. This is what the industry is saying about its capacity to deal with a spill, should one happen. It goes on to state:

—no systems in place to quickly access additional manpower and expertise from other sources (national, international)

—less money is being spent on research and development into ways of tracking and cleaning up oil spills, especially of Hibernia-type oil

They go on to state that if the above blow-outs should occur, 29,830 registered fishermen will be hurt; 551,000 tonnes of fish that were landed last year will be lost, with a value of $300 million, for a total production value of $710 million. The industry provides work for 11,160 plant workers in 240 processing plants and is responsible for over 10 per cent of all jobs in Atlantic Canada, with 25 per cent of those jobs along the southeast coast of Newfoundland.

Honourable senators, I have taken a look at the legislation from the point of view of its being an energy project. This is not a good energy project. This does not involve good regional development—the jobs are too expensive. This does not provide self-sufficiency for the Atlantic region. We are kick-starting an energy project, and that can backfire. I have lists of companies in Newfoundland that are going ahead with joint ventures, and all of those companies could be left hanging out if the price swings.

Newfoundland is being shortchanged. The money that is being spent is being credited to Newfoundland's account, but they will not get the jobs. There are tremendous ecology risks, and we have little capacity to clean up a spill, if one does occur. The people being put at risk are the fishermen who have traditionally fished in that area.

I cannot support this bill and I urge honourable senators not to support it.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I should like to ask unanimous consent to proceed to Order No. 9, which stands in my name, and which has some urgency attached to it.

I have had discussions with the leadership on both sides of the house respecting this matter, and because we will be frozen with the order of the house after the vote takes place on Hibernia, it might take some time for this to come forward.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Debate suspended.

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 9.

SEVENTIETH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Consideration of the Seventieth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (supplementary estimate), presented in the Senate on 26th October, 1990.—(Honourable Senator LeBlanc, P.C. (Beauséjour)).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that this report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT ACT

BILL TO AMEND - THIRD READING

Hon. Dan Hays: If I may, honourable senators, I shall return to Senator Stewart's question. In the time that has elapsed since Senator Kenny spoke, I have had an opportunity to review the blues of our meeting with Mr. Epp. I will quote from that transcript, but having had an opportunity to look at other material it seems that the specific question the honourable senator asked—that is, what would happen if there is an oil spill, in terms of the cost of cleaning it up—the answer is that it is no better than the covenant or the depth of the pockets of the consortium: Mobil, Chevron, Petro-Canada and Gulf. That is my conclusion from having looked at the materials available to me at this point in time.

In any event, this did come up at the committee meeting. In answer to Senator Spivak, Mr. Epp stated:

> First of all, on the probability of oil spills, as you know, COGLA—

That is the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration:

> —asked the consortium to give us the worse case scenario, which, for proper planning, one would expect. Technology, even though it is leading edge, has not been tested in the North Sea. In terms of that experience, small spills, generally speaking, in terms of what we have in place and what the demands are and the specifics—if you want to ask more about the specifics, I think Mr. Whelan and others can answer that—I think we are well placed.
> In terms of the training that we have already been undertaking, I have already expressed myself on that point. Obviously, prevention is the first order of business and the consortium I think is well aware of the obligations that they have contractually with respect to production or the type of production, methodology or modalities that they are to use and to reduce or eliminate as much as is humanly possible even small, when we talk about offloading spills that could occur.

There is a further exchange in the text between Mr. Epp and Senator Marshall. Mr. Epp says:

> With the environmental safeguards that we have put in place, along with our discussions with the fishermen, fishermen's unions and others, as well as with the provinces of Newfoundland and Labrador, we believe that we have put forward every safeguard, condition, prevention mechanism and "can't spell" mechanism that is humanly possible. However, this is not a new area for us. There are some specific conditions, for example, icebergs on the Grand Banks and we appreciate that. But if you are asking me if there is a 100 per cent guarantee, I cannot give a 100 per cent guarantee. I can only say that we have pushed it as far as we can to what we believe is both technologically and humanly possible.

Senator Stewart, there are also references to background papers, specifically the Canada-Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board Decision 86.01 of June 1986. I looked at it briefly, but it does not include a specific reference which says that there is a covenant or a specific amount of money made available by way of bond, or something analogous to that. Of course, we are reminded of the Exxon Valdez incident in Alaska, where Exxon has spent in excess of a billion dollars. I think the minister is on the right track in terms of prevention. Had that money been spent on prevention, the Exxon Valdez incident probably would not have occurred. Something else might have, but, interestingly enough, the story one hears about the Exxon Valdez is that while there was originally a preparedness for spills, that preparedness disappeared. So the efforts of the people transporting the oil falling off in terms of crew assignments in combination with the lack of capability is a good illustration of what can happen.

In terms of the specific answer to your question, Senator Stewart, I am unable to find a specific statement in the materials I have available to me saying that we will look after an oil spill to the extent of $1 billion or $5 billion.

I was struck by a comment made by Mr. Hopper in our Petro-Canada hearing where he said that if a spill occurred—not in the context of Hibernia; we were talking about Terra Nova—oil would come up somewhere in the North Sea, go north to Iceland and would have almost certainly disappeared before it reached Ireland. He predicted the oil would never reach Ireland. That is not a comforting answer, but he tends to be dramatic. The point is that prevention is the only sure way we have of ensuring environmental safety. There are boards in place to ensure this, but the depth of the pocket of the developers in the end seems to be the only guideline we have for cleaning up a spill, in the event it does occur, and their willingness to spend that money.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: I wish to thank Senator Petten and Senator Hays for their support of Bill C-44. The committee meeting, which was presided over by Chairman Hays on Friday, was helpful to those who were present. The Honourable Jake Epp was forthcoming, frank and open in his answers.

I am not going to undertake to reply to Senator Kenny's points in detail because I think we are coming from different directions, and obviously that is his privilege. I will comment on three aspects briefly. The honourable senator mentioned the great cost in jobs per man and how many jobs could be created in Newfoundland using that money. As I said, we are coming from different perspectives, but the project is not only making work, but is introducing expertise, knowledge and marketable, valuable, contemporary assets and skills which will be of continuing value to the people who possess them and the society in which they live.

It was also pointed out that as royalties kick in, equalization will go down. It is worked out in such a way that the province's treasury will always be somewhat better, but obviously incoming royalties will affect equalization. I think that the present Liberal government in Newfoundland would wish to contribute to equalization and would much prefer to have income in royalties than income in equalization. With respect to Senator Kenny's final point, I can only echo what Senator Hays said, which is that the emphasis has to be on prevention, which has been recognized by both orders of government and industry: safety for the environment, people's lives and the fishery.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 60 residents of the East Angus region in Quebec, who are opposed to the proposed legislation on the Goods and Services Tax.

I would like to read a number of petitioners' names.

(Names of signatories read)

I would just like to remind you that these good people have signed the petition. They ask that the Senate reject the new 7 per cent federal tax on all goods and services adopted by the Tory government. They point out that it will create serious, unfair and unjust difficulties for Canadians. They maintain that the imposition of this tax will constitute an unprecedented assault on the already insufficient income of Canadians not only by forcing them to pay higher taxes but also by causing the cost of living to rise through higher inflation and excessive interest rates and by increasing unemployment.

They therefore humbly ask the Senate to reject this new tax on goods and services.

On top of it all, we are in a recession. When the petition was signed, on July 14, it was not obvious yet. Now that we know for sure, I think the arguments raised are even more relevant.

I will now continue reading the names of these Canadians strongly opposed to the Goods and Services Tax.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition signed by 362 residents of the Frelighsburg region in Quebec who are against the proposed legislation on the Goods and Services Tax.

(Names of signatories read)

This is in the Eastern Townships. As you can see, there are still a few strong English-speaking communities in that region.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert:

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Simard: Senator Hébert, may I ask a question?

Senator Hébert: Of course! Your questions are always most welcome, senator.

Senator Simard: You really think this is doing the country, Canadian society and the people we want to help any good, this reading of lists of people who signed petitions a few months ago and probably are not necessarily aware of the fact that Mr. Wilson has made a commitment that in the next budget, there may be some changes with respect to the publishing industry, for instance, and other sectors?

Do you have the impression you are getting anywhere by costing Canadian taxpayers between $100,000 and $150,000 a day more, not because the Senate would necessarily sit twenty-four hours a day but because we will certainly sit longer than it takes to consider the amendments to this bill?

I wonder if you could tell us whether you thought about that and whether you could advise your colleagues that their time might be better spent considering the amendments to the bill.

Senator Hébert: Once again, the senator has not shown much respect for Canadians who for centuries have had the right to present their petitions before the Senate or the House of Commons. I intend to get on with what I have to do.

Senator Simard: Second question, Senator: earlier one of our colleagues met some reporters in the lobby who said the following: tradition is all very well, but the rules of this Chamber are important, and there are rules that tell us that the usual way to represent petitioners is to table the petitions and read them very briefly, leaving out the names, telephone numbers and addresses of all these people because traditionally, according to our rules, the petitions can be consulted once they have been laid on the Table here in this Chamber and are thus available to be read.

All senators on this side could give unanimous consent to putting all petitions, the text of all petitions, on the record, reproduced in full. This way, you would not be able to accuse us of violating parliamentary procedure, and vice versa, while we would have the assurance that the voice of low- and middle-income Canadians and everybody else could be heard and identified.

Senator Hébert: No comment.

Senator Simard: You are being stubborn and wasting our time, and this is an insult to Canadians.

Senator Hébert: We will consider your proposal and see how we could respond, but I saw your leader who was about to tell you, Senator, to sit down, so you are doing them a favour by wasting time on frivolous matters. So to get back to when I was so rudely interrupted by the senator who doesn't want to hear the voice of Canadians, I was reading the name of Linda Thétrault. This is not my voice but the voice of average Quebecers who are telling you they don't want this legislation.

Honourable senators, I have here petitions signed by 39 residents of the region of Saint-René-de-Beauce and East Breton, Quebec, who are against the tax on goods and services.

Now the signatures of 106 citizens of the region of Poster, in Quebec, who urge the Senate to reject the GST bill.

Senator Simard: Senator Hébert, this is not question period.

Senator Hébert: If you want to waste a bit of time, I have no objections.

Senator Simard: We have wasted enough as it is in the last 40 minutes, we expect to waste a lot more if you go on like this. Referring to page 57 of the Rules of the Senate, and I quote:

> A senator—

Listen for a second, you did not read it correctly or you did not understand:

> A senator presenting a petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the contents of the petition—

Which is what you did with the two previous petitions.

> —to inform the Senate of the contents of the petition, the petition itself is not read.

In any case, the text of the petition and the names of the petitioners attached thereto is not printed in the Debates of the Senate or the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, so I conclude that you are speaking just for the sake of speaking. You said that 27 or 150 or 300 citizens of such or such city signed a petition against the GST and that you tabled the whole thing in the Senate, that is quite in order and I can agree with that. But if we are going to waste our time listening to names of people and streets you can hardly pronounce, from a community which you do not even represent, that seems to me as a waste of time, a waste of money, and an abuse of freedom.

Senator Hébert: Honorable senator, I would like to point out that your reaction is a bit late since we got quite a few petitions in the past few weeks and I believe that the Rules say that the names are not printed.

Senator Simard: Did you look at the polls lately?

Senator Hébert: I find the last polls very interesting but I do not want to let myself be distracted by Senator Simard, because we always regret it. If it is clear in the Rules that we can't expect the names to be printed, there is nothing which says that they cannot be read. Consequently, despite what Senator David is saying I will go on reading. I have lost track of where I was, I think I will start all over again to be sure not to forget anyone.

Now, I have only a few here, 22 from Saint-Nazaire in Quebec, or the vicinity.

(Names of signatories read)

Here is a petition from an historical village in Quebec, which reminds us of Maria Chapdelaine and, of course, it is Péribonka, a small village from the Lac St-Jean area, the setting for the famous novel by Louis Hémon, Maria Chapdelaine.

Senator David: Is Péribonka in the district you represent?

Senator Hébert: I represent the whole of Quebec, as you very well know.

Senator David: But legally don't you have a district?

Senator Hébert: I represent the whole of Quebec, you very well know, Senator, that any citizen can ask any senator to table a petition. He or she doesn't have to come from that senator's district.

Senator David: Did the Péribonka residents send this petition directly to you? Could you read the address?

Senator Hébert: It is written on the back.

Senator David: Read it to me; you have been reading so well for the past hour.

Senator Hébert: I read what I please.

Senator David: Go ahead!

Senator Hébert: Honourable Senator Jacques Hébert, Room 487 East, Centre Block, Parliament Buildings, Wellington Street, Ottawa, Ontario, K1A 0A4.

Senator David: It does seem like your address. Thank you.

Senator Hébert: Right!

Senator Corbin: Although this petition was sent to you, was it addressed to the Senate?

Senator Hébert: Honourable Senate of Canada. If you insist, I am quite prepared to read the petition from the beginning.

Senator David: Could you read for me the motion which appears at the bottom of the page?

Senator Hébert: We discussed that before. I do not look where all the petitions come from. If there are Canadians who insist on distributing petition forms, I feel it is quite all right. I do not know, but perhaps you may not like this kind of Canadian who have the guts—

Senator David: I am asking you to read the note at the bottom of the petition.

Senator Hébert: You can read them when they reach the Table. Here are the names of the Péribonka residents.

(Names of signatories read)

That means the people living on Range 7 in Albanel are clearly among the 85 per cent of Canadians who are against the GST and who want the Senate to block it.

(Names of signatories read)

There are several others. I have some from Saint-Léon, Sainte Jeanne d'Arc, Waburn, in Quebec, probably from my district, which should please Senator David. Knowlton is unquestionably in the Wellington district which I represent here in the Senate.

There are forty residents in the Knowlton area who oppose the GST.

(Names of signatories read)

We are now coming to the City of Sherbrooke.

(Names of signatories read)

Now I am coming to Quebec City. These petitions will do because there are a great many residents there who are against the GST.

Senator Cogger: Senator Hébert, would you allow me to interrupt?

Senator Hébert: Do as you wish, but I reserve the right not to answer your question if is not more interesting than last time.

Senator Cogger: It is not a question, Senator Hébert, I want to correct a small mistake you probably made inadvertently.

You said earlier to Senator David that he was pleased you should read a petition signed by people from Knowlton which was in your district. May I point out to you, and it was probably a mistake, that the town of Knowlton is located in the county of Brome which is in the senatorial district of Bedford represented by Senator David. If I understand correctly, your constituency is Wellington. Unfortunately for the people of Knowlton or fortunately for them, they are represented by Senator David and not by you.

Senator Hébert: The fact remains that they did not send their petition to Senator David, but to me.

Senator Cogger: I also thought of doing you a favor by giving you time to take your breath.

Senator Hébert: I am sorry for being impatient earlier. You are absolutely right. I want to assure you or to assure your colleague, Senator David: I do not have any territorial ambition! I do not want to take over Knowlton.

(Names of signatories read)

Sutton is in the Eastern Townships and has a beautiful ski resort.

(Names of signatories read)

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: I have the honour to present a petition signed by 1,624 residents—

• (1520)

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Doody.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to table the following documents.

Senator Gigantès: I have the following names:

(Names of signatories read)

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Gigantès, you are out of order. I gave the floor to the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Senator Doody: The report of the Public Service Staff Relations Board for the period April 1, 1989 to March 31, 1990.

[Translation]

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Sir, I have the right to read the petitions. The new 7 per cent federal sales tax—

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Gigantès, I am recognizing Senator Doody.

An Hon. Senator: He was on his feet first.

Senator Frith: He was not!

The Hon. the Speaker: After Senator Hébert, I recognized Senator Doody as the Deputy Leader of the Government.

Senator Frith: Senator Gigantès was on his feet first.

Senator Doody: Nonsense!

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: You saw that I was on my feet first.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: I saw Senator Doody on his feet first. I am sorry.

Senator Corbin: Senator Gigantès was already up and reading!

Senator Gigantès: I was up and reading. When Senator Doody stood up I immediately stood up.

Senator Frith: It was very clear that he was on his feet first.

An Hon. Senator: Sit down!

Senator Gigantès: Despite the fact that you saw me up, you are trying to deprive me of my right to read petitions from Canadian citizens!

The Hon. the Speaker: I called Senator Doody—

An Hon. Senator: Sit down!

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: You are resorting to tricks to deprive me—

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: You have the floor, Senator Doody.

Senator Doody: —Public Accounts of Canada, volumes I and II in two parts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1990.

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: I was on my feet before him.

[English]

Senator Murray: Sit down, Senator Gigantès!

Senator Frith: He was on his feet way before Senator Doody!

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: What you are saying is wrong; you cannot act like this. What you are doing, Sir, is unworthy of your high office.

[English]

Senator Hastings: Sit down! We are on petitions!

Senator Doody: I have petitions. I want to table my documents.

Senator Frith: No, sir.

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: —that you have acted in a shameful way—

[English]

Senator Barootes: Sit down when the Speaker is standing, you idiot!

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: —you are showing a lack—

[English]

Senator Doody: —Public Service Staff Relations Board for the period April 1, 1989 to March 31, 1990,—

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: Be—

[English]

Senator Doody: I want to table my documents.

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: —Sir—

[English]

Senator Barootes: Sit down when the Speaker is standing!

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: —behaviour which has led this chamber—

[English]

Senator Doody: —statements of operations under the Veterans' Social Insurance Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1990.

Senator Murray: Sit down, Senator Gigantès! Sit down!

Senator Gigantès: You have dishonoured the Throne on which you sit by beginning again the kind of behaviour—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. I would like to say a word.

Senator Gigantès: —and which led this house to pandemonium, because we cannot rely on anything you said or anything you did.

Senator Murray: Sit down!

Senator Gigantès: Here you are, standing again—

Senator Doody: You are standing again.

Senator Gigantès: You know I got up first, but you say he got up first!

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Doody got up at the same time.

Senator Frith: He did not! Senator Gigantès was talking before Senator Doody got up.

The Hon. the Speaker: That is the way I saw it.

Senator Gigantès: —something that is false. That, sir, is prevaricating, and you are losing any respect—

Senator Barootes: You lost control of this chamber!

Senator Gigantès: You should not get up and say something that is false.

Senator Barootes: Get out!

Senator Petten: Just try it!

Senator Gigantès: You do not have the right to do that, sir.

An Hon. Senator: I got up.

Senator Gigantès: You got up? I got up before Senator Doody.

An Hon. Senator: He got up!

Senator Gigantès: And you got up. He tried to interrupt me. He was standing, and I stood up and started speaking. He sat down immediately. Senator Doody got up after me. Here, sir, you are trying once again to disrupt this house—

Senator Doody: I got up as soon as the honourable senator on the other side sat down!

Senator Gigantès: —by breaking the rules, by disregarding the rules, and by saying something that is not so. You should be ashamed of yourself! How can you do that.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Doody: The courtesy is in recognizing people on both sides of the chamber.

Senator Gigantès: You have no respect for this institution! On October 4 . . .

The Hon. Speaker: Order!

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): On a point of order, honourable senators, it was very clear to anyone who was in the chamber that Senator Gigantès not only got up first—

Senator Barootes: How do you get the floor?

Senator Frith: I am rising on a point of order!

Senator Barootes: Sit down! The Speaker was standing! You sit!

An Hon. Senator: Shut up!

An Hon. Senator: The Speaker does not have any right to make rules in here!

Senator Frith: I am standing—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, I called on Senator Doody. It has been a tradition here that—

Senator Hastings: Point of order!

The Hon. Speaker: —on petitions we hear from one side and then the other.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: The Deputy Leader of the Opposition, as much as the Deputy Leader of the Government, gets the call when he gets up.

Senator Frith: Honourable Senators, on a point of order, it was quite clear to anyone in the chamber—

Senator Barootes: You have eyes in the back of your head, do you?

Senator Frith: No, I do not need them. I do not need eyes in the back of my head. If fact, I did not see—

Senator Phillips: You did not see Senator Gigantès, no!

Senator Frith: Take your time folks, take your time. I did not see Senator Gigantès get up first, because I did not need to. I heard him talking. But I saw Senator Doody, who is directly opposite me. I heard Senator Gigantès, and then saw him on his feet. Then Senator Doody got up.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Frith: Your Honour, who can only intervene when senators get up at the same time—which is not in this case, because they did not get up at the same time—has no role.

An Hon. Senator: You do not know that.

Senator Frith: I do know that. I heard it. I looked and saw him get up.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Cogger: You cannot talk sitting down!

Senator Frith: Your Honour, therefore, has no role in this at all.

Senator Barootes: He has no role?

Senator Frith: The only time Your Honour has a role is if they both get up at the same time. Even in that case, if Your Honour chooses someone, a senator can move that someone else be heard. But in this case that does not arise. Your Honour has no role because Senator Gigantès was clearly up first.

An Hon. Senator: No.

Senator Frith: He does not need the recognition of the Chair.

Senator Barootes: Read rule 26!

Senator Frith: He does not need recognition of the Chair when he stands. He does not need—nor does any senator—to address the Chair. If he is up first, he speaks. There is no role for the Speaker at all in such a situation.

An Hon. Senator: Never has been!

Senator Frith: Senator Gigantès must be allowed to continue because your Honour has no role in the matter at all.

The Hon. the Speaker: The rules—

Senator Olson: Sit down!

An Hon. Senator: Go ahead!

Senator Olson: You have no order at all.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): On the point of order, honourable senators—

Senator Gigantès: I wish to continue reading petitions!

Senator Doody: —Senator Frith was given the courtesy of being heard on a point of order and I am going to respond to the point of order.

Senator Hastings: Senator Gigantès, sit down!

Senator Frith: Honourable Senators, I move, under rule 26, that Senator Gigantès be now heard.

Senator Doody: Does Senator Frith have the floor again?

Senator Frith: That is a proper motion, because it is a motion under rule—

An Hon. Senator: When did you get the floor?

Senator Doody: Senator Frith, there is now a point of order before the chamber that has to be discussed and ruled on.

Senator Frith: He is not listening to it! Oh, good. Let us debate the point of order first!

Senator Doody: I wanted to speak to the point of order, but this discourteous gentleman over here would not allow me to speak.

Senator Frith: Let us debate the point of order. We will then make the motion!

Senator Doody: I am trying to make the point.

Senator Frith: Sure.

Senator Doody: I am trying to make the point that—

Senator Frith: Under rule 26?

Senator Doody: Under rule 26 it states:

> When two or more senators rise to speak, the Speaker shall call upon the senator who in the Speaker's opinion first rose;

Senator Barootes: It states "in the Speaker's opinion"!

Senator Doody: The Speaker has quite clearly given his opinion, the fact that I rose first.

Senator Frith: He is up to his old tricks!

Senator Doody: The second point—

Senator Frith: Even though it is not so!

Senator Doody: —that I am trying to make is that it has been a long respected tradition in this place that when a member from the other side speaks, someone from this side is given the courtesy of following. That is, we alternate. We have been doing that for years. If someone on this side does not elect to stand, then two or more can continue on that side.

Senator Bonnell: Do you have a petition?

Senator Bosa: Do you have some petitions?

Senator Doody: When I rose to speak as deputy leader I had before me a bunch of documents, which I table at this time just about every day. I rose to do that, but was shouted down by my friend across the way.

Senator Buckwold: You cannot change the order of business.

Senator Frith: Honourable Senators, I believe that Senator Doody is now asking—

Senator Doody: No, I am not asking anything; I am telling you.

Senator Phillips: Sit down!

Senator Frith: Let me finish! If Senator Doody is saying that under the heading of "Presentation of Petitions", he wishes—

Senator Murray: He wishes to speak!

Senator Frith: —to speak on the basis of alternation and not on the basis of what I consider a clear breach by the Speaker—

Senator Doody: I made two points!

Senator Frith: —of who got up first, then I believe we should let him speak.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Barootes: This isn't your chamber any longer!

Senator Frith: Never was, sir.

Senator Olson: It never was!

Senator Frith: It never was, sir. Nor is it yours.

Senator Barootes: Like Gilbert and Sullivan!

Senator Doody: I have a number of items here, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Senator Foghorn!

Senator Doody: I have a number of items that I wish to table.

An Hon. Senator: Is this "Presentation of Petitions"?

Senator Doody: I have the report of the Public Service Staff Relations Board for the period April 1, 1989, to March 31, 1990. I have the public accounts of Canada, volumes one and two in two parts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1990.

An Hon. Senator: How did you change the order paper?

Senator Phillips: Why don't you come some time and find out?

Senator Doody: I am not changing the order paper! That is precisely what happens here every day! It says here quite clearly "Presentation of Petitions, The Honourable Senator Doody tabled the following:" I am changing nothing.

An Hon. Senator: That is not a petition.

Senator Buckwold: We have not finished petitions.

Senator Hastings: Petitions!

Senator Doody: I have here statement on operations under the Recurrent Soldiers Insurance Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1990; statement on operations under the Veteran's Insurance Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1990.

Documents tabled.

Senator Bonnell: That is reading of petitions.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable Senators, I have several petitions here also. I have a petition here signed by various residents of the Ottawa area who ask that the senate pass Bill C-62 without further delay in order to end uncertainty within the business community at a time of economic uncertainty.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Hébert: How many of them are there?

Senator Buckwold: How many are there?

Senator Doody: There are three on this petition.

An Hon. Senator: Read the names!

Senator Doody: I will not read the names.

Senator Bonnell: Read them!

Senator Frith: How did you find them—

Senator Doody: I have another petition.

Senator Frith: —with a search warrant?

Senator Hébert: You can read them!

Senator Doody: I have another petition signed by the President of the Canadian Manufacturer's Association,—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator Doody: —who respectfully requests that the senate get on with its business.

Also, honourable senators, I move that the Orders of the Day be read now.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator Frith: Look at them smiling!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order.

Senator Barootes: We are through with the petition. Sit down. You have no right to interfere. Sit down.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on a point of order, the motion was just snuck in by Senator Doody after we allowed him to—

An Hon. Senator: Sneaky Billy.

An Hon. Senator: Contraband.

Senator Frith: It is not receivable, and I will tell you why not, Senator.

Senator Barootes: We don't want to hear your reasons.

Senator Frith: I should tell Senator Foghorn that one of his colleagues wants to hear the rest. As a matter of fact, he specifically asked. I don't think they are capable.

Senator Barootes: Senator Foghorn is missing. He sits next to you?

Senator Hastings: Take a valium. Take a valium.

Senator Frith: No, let him talk. Keep talking. We will just keep talking. Are you finished?

Senator MacEachen: What is the motion?

Senator Frith: I have it here somewhere.

An Hon. Senator: Sneaky Billy.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I moved, seconded by Senator Ottenheimer that Orders of the Day be now read. I have copies of it for distribution if anyone wishes to have it.

Senator Frith: I think I can understand that. Perhaps a copy may be given to Senator Barootes. I think the rest of us can follow it all right.

A motion for reading Orders of the Day can clearly be made, as it was made here, without notice under Rule 46(e).

[Senator Frith.]

So we are clear about what is in order. Rule 46 says: "No notice is required of the following motions:" and 46(e) says "For reading the Orders of the Day;"

That is the motion now before us, but it is clearly a superseding motion and superseding motions are moved in the course of debate on questions which they seek to set aside; that is, these motions seek to set aside a question that is before the house.

So they can only be moved in the course of debate on questions that are before the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: You have a reference?

Senator Frith: Yes, I do. I thought you would never ask. They cannot be moved by a member rising on a point of order.

Now, is there a question before the Senate?

Senator Hastings: No. No.

Senator Frith: What is, under the rules of the Senate, a question? Incidentally, the reference for Senator Kelly is the fifth edition of Beauchesne, citation 417, at Page 151.

Senator MacEachen: In both languages?

Senator Frith: Yes. That is the edition that has the old language.

Senator MacEachen: The official language. It is not the bootleg edition.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: I am glad to hear you say that, because I thought you were going to say that it was in Gaelic. I am glad you said it was the official language.

Senator Frith: We are now trying to find out whether there is a question presently before the Senate, remembering that what is presently before the Senate are petitions.

I take it there is no quarrel about that.

Question. I am now reading from Page 4, Rule 5(o).

> "question," except in respect of the question period and a question of privilege, means a proposal presented to the Senate or a committee thereof by the Speaker or chairman for consideration and disposal in some manner;

What we were dealing with was petitions.

When this motion was made we were dealing with the order paper, we were on namely, the "Presentation of Petitions—not on motions, but on petitions. At random I chose a petition under the rules.

I do not read the petition, but it is addressed to the Senate, and but I do read the names, and they include: Lucy Sinne, Rita Laurendeau, Mr. Cosgrove, Rose Cosgrove, Bud Centure, June Graham.

Senator Barootes: We have finished with petitions.

Senator Frith: Oh no, we haven't. Other petitions are Conrad Guillamette, Jacklyn Guillamette. Wouldn't you love it? We have a motion, but we are still on petitions.

I am raising a point of order, and I am pointing out, by way of illustration, what is before the Senate at the present time.

Senator Hastings: Not a question.

Senator Barootes: It is not a point of order, but a point of odor.

Senator Frith: I didn't think you would appreciate its bouquet, senator. Perhaps I had better explain it again. Senator Barootes is a little slow.

On the point of order, let me start again, so that Senator Barootes knows exactly where we are.

The motion is presented without notice under Rule 46. You could look it up, Senator, so that we will be clear about where we are, because you seem to be confused. We are on the order paper under the heading "Presentation of Petitions."

Under the heading of petitions, Senator Doody rose to present a petition.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Rule 46 says: "No notice is required of the following motions."

Senator Frith: I am coming to that, and under the heading of petitions, Senator Doody stood up and presented a petition.

Senator Hastings: No.

Senator Barootes: No. A motion.

Senator Frith: No, a petition. Then while he was on his feet, he presented a motion under Rule 46(e) "for reading the orders of the day."

Senator Barootes: Right in the order.

Senator Frith: Which may be made without notice; but although it may be made without notice, it may not be made when the Senate is considering petitions.

That is Mr. Beauchesne's opinion, too. And why can it not be done? Because when, for example, Senator Gigantès was presenting petitions, and when Senator Doody was presenting petitions, there was no question before the house, and there still is no question before the house.

What we are doing is reading petitions, like this one to which I was referring and which includes the names of Margaret Thewnee, Barbara Robillard, Pat MacIntosh, Mrs. Sauer, and so on.

There are others. To give honourable senators an idea of the importance of where we are on the order paper, I believe we have some 50,000 petitions, of which we have read approximately 2000.

Is there a question? Well, what is the question?

Senator Hastings: Is it going to rain?

Senator Frith: Yes, is it going to rain? That would be a question, but it is not a question in the Senate. You see, that might be included in the rules. Rule 5(o) says:

> question. "except in respect of the question period, and a question of privilege, means a proposal presented to the Senate."

Now is this a proposal? No.

An Hon. Senator: I didn't hear any proposal.

Senator Frith: This petition started out with the name Lucy Sinne; but she is not making a proposal. I am not making a proposal. No one is making a proposal to the Senate.

We are reading petitions from the people of Canada who are opposed to the GST. So no one is making a proposal.

So maybe it is covered by something else presented to the Senate. No, there is no proposal presented to the Senate.

It is not a proposal presented to a committee thereof by the Speaker. The Speaker did not present this proposal. He did not put forward a motion. He did not put forward a question. He did not ask whether we wanted to vote on the question.

He couldn't, because there is nothing before us. All that is before us are petitions—

Senator Hastings: Petitions, petitions.

Senator Frith: —for consideration and disposal. It is not a matter of disposal of these petitions. There has been no question put before us.

If there is no question before us, then, because this motion made by Senator Doody is a superceeding motion, it is out of order, since such motions can be moved immediately when a question is under debate. There is no question under debate at the present time. Can anyone seriously suggest that there is a question under debate when petitions are being read?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Barootes: Have you finished your smokescreen, so that we can get on with the business of the Senate?

Senator Frith: Such motions may only be moved when a question is under debate and cannot be moved by a member rising on a point of order. I gave the citation which sets that out.

I have also referred to rule 5. Perhaps I should make sure that everyone follows rule 5 and put it on the record in French just in case there is any absence of concordance between the two versions. I do not believe there is.

[Translation]

> "question", except in respect of the question period and a question of privilege, means a proposal presented to the Senate or a committee thereof by the Speaker or chairman for consideration and disposal in some manner;
> "rule" means any standing rule or standing order of the Senate;

[English]

I would say the concordance is very exact.

Let us also remember that the motion to proceed to Orders of the Day is also considered a dilatory motion which, according to Beauchesne's—

Senator Hastings: Does this Greg MacDougall work in your office, Senator Murray?

Senator Murray: Yes, as do the other two.

Senator Hébert: He couldn't find anyone else to sign the petition.

Senator Frith: The petition states, "Your petitioners pray the Senate will pass into law without further delay or obstruction Bill C-62 in order to end uncertainty within the business community at a time of economic uncertainty, as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray."

Picture if you will, honourable senators, the scene in the office of the Leader of the Government. It is made up of a group of people perhaps having tea and discussing procedural strategy. Someone says, "How the devil are we going to get on our feet in order to move a motion to proceed to Orders of the Day?" Someone replies, "Well, that is an interesting problem. What will happen is that those Grits will get on their feet and they will be yacking away concerning petitions. They will force us to sit and listen to what the people of Canada have to say."

Honourable senators will remember that the scene is a group of people in the leader's office. The next comment will be, "And every one of them can be counted upon to do it." Shall we say that through lack of enthusiasm for listening to more petitions, and for listening to what the people of Canada have to say, that is what was said. However, we do not know who it was who said that. It might have been Adèle Desjardins. It might have been Greg MacDougall.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: Or it might have been Peter Webber. We do not know how many senators might have been at this strategy session.

Senator Kelly: Senator Frith, are you still on a point of order?

Senator Frith: Yes, of course I am on the point of order, as to whether it is proper to raise such a motion at this point in time.

Senator Kelly: This does not sound as if it is part of the same subject.

Senator Frith: Keep listening. Here they are in the office, located in the corner of the lobby, trying to figure out how they can get a motion to move to Orders of the Day to stop the Grits insisting on telling us what the people of Canada want and—

Senator Barootes: And you talk about dilatory motions and dilatory actions!

Senator Frith: Yes, I certainly do, sir.

Senator Barootes: You sure do. You are a perfect example of it. You are dilatory.

Senator Frith: Yes, I am exactly, sir. That is precisely so.

Senator Grafstein: Is Senator Barootes suggesting that petitions are dilatory?

Senator Frith: If honourable senators opposite think that I am going to forget to come back to this beguiling scene, they are wrong. So someone says, "I've got it. I know what we'll do. We'll all sign a petition," to which Senator Doody says—

Senator Barootes: Go ahead and perform this CBC play. It is a CBC comedy. We have an actor in the house!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Barootes: But I am no longer part of your audience.

[Senator Frith.]

Some Hon. Senators: More, more!

Senator Stollery: He is insulted that they did not ask him to sign the petition.

Senator Frith: Wait a moment, there is a second page here.

Senator Bonnell: Is Guy Charbonneau's name on it?

Senator Frith: The next thing they say is, "All right, what will we do, because Hébert or somebody else will get up and start to table petitions and probably in a seamless web," if I may use that metaphor, "Gigantès or someone will get up right after and we will never get a chance to have the floor." So they say, "Well, what will we do? First, we have to have a petition." So then they say, "Where the devil are we going to get anyone to sign a petition in favour of the GST?"

They then probably turned to poor Adèle, someone whom I know is a very nice woman, as we all know, and she probably said, "Please, not me." The reply to her statement will be, "Adèle, they all like you over there. You are a nice woman and well respected around here. We want you to sign a petition in favour of the GST." She says, "What am I going to tell my husband and kids? What am I going to tell all my neighbours?" Being loyal, she signed it.

Meanwhile, over in the corner, trying to shrink out of sight is, guess who? Greg MacDougall. Somebody says, "Where's Greg?"

Senator Kirby: Up in the press gallery.

Senator Frith: We all know where Greg would be. Greg would be out talking to the reporters.

Anyway, someone says, "Go get Greg." So Greg comes in and they hand him a pen and he asks, "What am I signing?"

Senator Sparrow: Is it with an "X"?

Senator Frith: They say, "You are just signing a small promissory note." He says, "Thank God; I thought it might be a petition". Then, Peter—and I do not know where they found Peter—signed the petition. At any rate, they got three people to sign it, which was not too bad.

They then say, "Okay, we now have a petition. Is there not anyone else in this whole country who could sign a petition in favour of the GST?"

Senator Bonnell: They put them all in the Senate.

Senator Frith: They can think of no one else. They say, "There is Adèle; we have her here. There is Greg, and we have him here. There is also Peter, and we have him. Then there is the Canadian Manufacturers' Association." Whoever came up with that is a very creative person and should be given a promotion.

Senator Murray: But the joke is on you. That is what you do not understand.

Senator Frith: I see. Anyway, by the looks of this signature, I do not think the Canadian Manufacturers' Association flew Mr. Thibault in. It is a fax; so Mr. Thibault finally signed that. That is Act 1, Scene 1.

Now Scene 2 is problem number two. "How do we get on our feet, because those Grits are so used to Reading of Petitions that they get up just like that. You cannot get a postage stamp between them when they are on their feet. How is Bill going to get on his feet to do it?" Enter the Speaker. Either one of the senators or Greg or Adèle or Peter, who were in on this meeting, said, "Call Charbonneau." That is it.

Sure enough, what happened? Senator Doody does not get up fast enough. Gigantès is on his feet, as you all know, and talking. In fact, Gigantès hits the floor talking. Gigantès starts talking before his derrière leaves the seat. So when he hits it, he hits it running. Bill tries to get up, and Gigantès is already on the fourth name down the list. The Speaker says, "I blew it again." So he stands up and says, "Senator Doody." We all say, "What do you mean, Senator Doody? Gigantès has been talking for 30 seconds." But the Speaker says, "I recognize Senator Doody."

An Hon. Senator: I recognize him also.

Senator Frith: Senator Doody then says he feels we should have alternance, which he is quite right about. Usually we alternate back and forth, although it certainly has not been happening on petitions, and it is not hard to understand why. We have been on petitions for about three weeks or a month.

Senator Murray: And there are 50,000 to go, are there?

Senator Frith: No, 48,000. That is four weeks, more or less. That is 28 days, and it took them 28 days to find three people to sign a petition. No wonder we have not been alternating. They have not asked to alternate, because they could not find anyone to sign such a petition.

That is how it happens that Senator Doody has this motion before us. He was recognized by the Senate as being entitled to alternate, but obviously he was using it as a way to get this motion before us. However, as we have found, this motion is totally out of order, because there is no question before us. I cannot imagine anyone suggesting that there is a question before the house under petitions.

In the House of Commons this motion has been successfully moved by a minister who was on his feet to table documents, which is the procedure that I suppose Senator Doody was wishing to follow. However, that procedure is unique to the House of Commons. I do not believe there is a single example of its ever being done in the Senate. As we proceed with the debate on this point of order, I will be interested to hear any precedent or evidence of this having been done before in the Senate—namely, moving a motion to proceed to Orders of the Day during petitions—although it has been done in the House of Commons.

Beauchesne says that it may not be moved during petitions or in any circumstances in which there is no question before the house. What do we do next? We go to the Senate rules. As far as I know there is no specific rule one way or the other. The only rule that I know of that is in the rule book dealing with this motion is the one that says that it may be made without notice. Senator Doody made it without notice, and we accept that. If he had made that motion, for example, while there was a question before the house, it would be quite different. Then he does not need to give notice. It is a dilatory motion, which makes it subject to some other debate also. I am sure that will arise during our debate on this point of order.

Rule 1 says:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

In the absence of any provision, we go first to Senate practices, not to House of Commons practices. In view of the clear words of Beauchesne and with no contrary procedure ever having been followed in the Senate, it is clear that the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of the Senate, as described in Rule 1, do not allow such a motion, regardless of the practice in the House of Commons. The practice and precedents of the Senate must surely have priority over the practice and precedents of the House of Commons, particularly when they are diametrically opposed and when the Senate practice is in complete conformity with Beauchesne's. The only way there could be a ruling accepting this motion, while we are dealing with petitions, is if the Speaker decided to say, "I will refuse to follow the fact that there has never been such a practice in the Senate. I will refuse to follow the words of Beauchesne, but I will follow an event and a precedent that took place in the House of Commons." In other words, he is saying, "To heck with the Senate, to heck with Beauchesne, I will follow . . ."

Senator Murray: "I will follow Rule 1."

Senator Frith: No, quite the opposite. "In following Rule 1, I will ignore Senate precedents that it has never been done under Rule 1."

Senator Murray: That is not a precedent. If it has never been done it is not a precedent. Come on!

Senator Frith: Let us put it the other way around. The Speaker says, "Under Rule 1 I will look at the House of Commons and I will say that it has been done there. I will refuse to look at the fact that it has never been done in the Senate and . . ."

Senator Murray: And that is a precedent, is it? It has never been done, so that is a precedent in the Senate?

Senator Olson: No, we go by the rules that we have.

Senator Frith: I have not finished my sentence yet.

Senator Murray: He is saying we go by the rules we do not have.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, order!

Senator Frith: I have not finished my sentence. ". . . and I will go against Beauchesne. I will go against Beauchesne even though Beauchesne is directly opposed, and I will follow what happened in the House of Commons."

• (1610)

Naturally, the government will claim as a precedent what went on in the House of Commons, and the Speaker will probably be seriously tempted to consider deciding in that fashion, because that would suit the government, which, as we know, he supports. So he will naturally be tempted; but I hope he will say, "Get thee behind me, Satan" and not follow a precedent in the House of Commons which is against all other precedents. Indeed, it is against all other practices and all other principles, that one cannot move a motion to proceed to Orders of the Day.

Why is that so? It is because a motion to proceed to Orders of the Day is a dilatory motion, a superseding motion, with the objective of taking the main motion, and the main question that is before the chamber—that is on the main line, so to speak—and shunting it off onto a siding so that you can go forward with something else.

So if, for example, we had a motion before us to adopt a committee report, and the question was put as to whether or not the report should be adopted, and someone on the other side did not want to deal with that committee report, but wanted to shunt it off onto a siding while they occupied the main line with some legislation that is on the Orders of the Day, then without notice they could move such a motion. In other words, some senator might say "I do not want to proceed with the question that is before the house. I want to proceed with another question." However, there is no other question, because there is no question before us.

So it seems to me, honourable senators, that it is very clear that such a motion could carry only under the most strained interpretation of the practices of this chamber, remembering that there is no precedent whatever for such a motion at this stage—none.

An Hon. Senator: No, no!

Senator Simard: So what?

Senator Frith: Of course, of course, "So what" is right. Who said that? Senator Simard? Let us hear from Senator Simard. "So what?," he says; "so what?"

Let us examine the, as usual, immaculate logic of Senator Simard. His proposition is: "So what?" because he says there are no rules here.

Senator Simard: You said "So what?" last week, and the week before.

Senator Frith: Senator Simard is citing me. Not a bad authority, I must admit. However, let us pursue what his reasoning is. He says that because two or three weeks ago somebody said there are no rules here—

Senator Simard: You said so.

Senator Frith: Yes, I did. In any event, someone said, "There are no rules here," because the Speaker refuses to follow the rules and holds a vote not in the presence of the whips, and locks the door early to make sure that both the whips cannot get in. Because that was said, Senator Simard now says "So what? So what if this has never been done?" I can understand what would encourage him to feel that way.

Senator Simard: The precedent. House rules are made on precedents.

Senator Olson: Do you want to come and sit over here?

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please!

Senator Frith: I do not mind. Perhaps Senator Simard was not in the chamber. I had better start at the beginning. Senator Simard should know that at the present time we are on the order paper dealing with petitions.

Senator Simard: No longer. We now have a motion.

Senator Frith: What happened was that under the heading of "Petitions", Senator Doody got up, while Senator Gigantès was reading petitions, and presented the petitions of three people, plus the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Then, at the end of that, he made a motion. So we are now dealing with a motion presented under "Petitions" and whether it is an order or not.

Senator Simard: It is an order.

Senator Olson: Point of order.

Senator Frith: Such a motion is found by Beauchesne to be only an order if there is a question before the house. There is no question before the house, and, therefore, because Beauchesne says that, and because we have always followed Beauchesne—

Senator Simard: Senator Frith said that.

Senator Frith: Pardon?

Senator Simard: Senator Frith said that.

Senator Olson: He is quoting that good authority.

Senator Frith: I am obliged to you, sir. However, there being no question before the house, we have always followed Beauchesne and have never permitted such a motion to be made under "Petitions".

Therefore, the only way that such a procedure could be allowed would be to follow a House of Commons procedure, which is against Beauchesne and against Senate procedure. But to that, Senator Simard says "So what?" I take it that Senator Doody's motion purports at least to be under the Rules of the Senate or he would not have advanced it, and under the Rules of the Senate such a motion is only in order when there is a question before the house.

In the House of Commons there have been such motions received when a minister was on his feet to table documents, which was not the case here in any event, and which is irrelevant. That is the procedure I suppose Senator Doody thought he was following; but, if so, he is in the wrong place. He might want to go down to the other place to make such a motion, but he cannot make it here. The motion is out of order, and we should continue with petitions.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wish to speak to this point of order. This afternoon Senator Doody rose on petitions. I will not go into the sequence of happenings which led him to have the floor. He knew he was on "Presentation of Petitions". He knew that was the rubric, the heading with which the Senate then was dealing. He read, I believe, two petitions, and I will desist from attempting to describe those petitions, since Senator Frith has already explored the origins of those petitions.

● (1620)

Then, honourable senators, Senator Doody sought to put forward a motion for the reading of the Orders of the Day. That proposed motion is out of order. Accordingly, it cannot be received even under the most strained interpretation of the Rules of the Senate. The Senate, by an explicit rule, a rule which allows no room for interpretation, has established the order of business at a sitting. It has done that by Rule 19. That rule states: "At each daily sitting of the Senate the Speaker shall call for, in the following order:

1. presentation of Petitions;
2. reading of Petitions;
3. reports of Committees;
4. notices of Inquiries;
5. notices of motions;
6. question period;
7. orders of the day;
8. inquiries;
9. motions."

Now, Senator Doody seeks to set aside that rule of the Senate, Rule 19, by moving that the Orders of the Day be read. Rule 19 is a rule—in the House of Commons it would be called a standing order—of the Senate. The Senate has ordered that this be the order of business at each daily sitting. It cannot be swept away except by a change in the rules.

It is notable that in this house the heading or rubric "Motions" comes at the very end of a sitting. It is the last order of business we reach at a sitting. The situation in the House of Commons is radically different. There "Motions" is the last heading of what they call "Routine Business." In the House of Commons the heading "Motions" comes before the Orders of the Day. That difference is significant. I shall explain why it is significant in a moment. The prescribed order of business at a sitting of the House of Commons is radically different from the order of business which the Senate has prescribed under Rule 19.

On Saturday, October 4, during the sitting that began on October 4, and again on October 15, 1990, Senator Murray tried exactly the same tactic. I think we can imagine what happened in his office prior to that attempt. It was not as hilarious on those occasions as the scene Senator Frith has just sketched out for us. There was Senator Murray. He took up the Rules of the Senate and he read rule 19. His heart fell. He concluded that while in general Rule 19 is a good rule, it did not suit his present purposes. Consequently, he wished to repeal it just for himself and just for this sitting. Senator Doody now follows that very same pattern. On that earlier occasion Senator Murray asked himself, "How can I evade rule 19? It is an order of the Senate, but how can I possibly evade it?" Senator Doody asked himself the same question. After ruffling through the pages of the rule book, he came to Rule 46. There he read:

> No notice is required of the following motions:
> (a) by way of amendment to a question;
> (b) for the referral of the question to a committee;
> (c) for its postponement to a certain day;
> (d) for the previous question;
> (e) for reading the Orders of the Day;
> (f) for the adjournment of the Senate, while a matter is under discussion;
> (g) for the adjournment of the Senate for the purposes of raising a matter of urgent public importance (which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the Orders of the Day;
> (h) for the adjournment of the debate;
> Some others are:
> (l) for the first reading of a bill; . . .

And they go on. So Senator Doody said to himself, "Ah, there is my answer; Rule 19 really means that there is nothing to stop me from rearranging the order of business any way I like when I have a majority. There are no rules in the Senate when I have a majority. Rule 19 can be set aside at any sitting by a motion under Rule 46. Isn't it great! Eureka, I found it!" Had Senator Doody finished reading Rule 46, he would not have blundered as he has done. The final words are: "other motions of a merely formal or uncontentious character". Motions under Rule 46 are either formal or uncontentious.

I ask honourable senators to take up Beauchesne, the Fifth Edition, and turn to page 151. With that in hand, look at the motions listed under Rule 46, the motions for which no notices are required and let us analyze these motions. They will find that those motions are exclusively of three kinds. Some are what Beauchesne calls "subsidiary motions." Beauchesne says:

> Subsidiary motions are used to move questions forward in different stages of procedure through which they must pass before their final adoption. Motions for the readings of bills are in this class.

Let us go back to Rule 46. We find there, for example, that the motion for the first reading of a bill can be moved without notice. That is a good example of a motion of the subsidiary type listed in rule 46. Other motions set forth in rule 46 are what Beauchesne calls "incidental motions." At the bottom of page 151, he tells us what that term means:

> Incidental motions are those which arise out of, and are connected with, other motions to which they relate as, for instance, motions for reading Papers immediately after they have been laid on the Table, to withdraw a motion or an amendment, or for obtaining unanimous consent to dispense with a rule, for the time being, in order to expedite business.

In other words, if Senator Doody had sought leave to dispense with Rule 19 for the time being in order to expedite business at this sitting, that would have been an incidental motion.

The third category is made up of what Beauchesne calls "superseding motions." Beauchesne lists the motion, "That the Orders of the Day be read as a dilatory motion".

Senator Murray's motion would have had, were it in order and carried, the effect of setting aside one of the Senate's fundamental rules. A motion to repeal Rule 19 is not one of these three kinds of motions.

It is, in fact, a substantive motion. It is a motion which cannot be moved under Rule 46. It does not come within any of the three kinds of motions that do not require notice. It is a substantive motion and requires notice. After notice it would be dealt with under "Motions", the rubric that we reach at the end of a sitting.

When we read Beauchesne's list of dilatory motions as set forth on page 151, we find that the motion of the Order of the Day is included as a dilatory motion. But Senator Doody's motion fails to qualify even as a dilatory motion. To be an order a dilatory motion must seek to postpone or set aside debate on a question already before the Senate. A motion stating a proposed question to be answered eventually by the Senate must have been moved. Then, that motion must have been put before the senate for debate and for ultimate decision.

When the Senate is dealing with a kind heading of business "petitions", that does not involve a motion, and which, consequently, does not involve a question, a dilatory motion cannot be moved. Even as a dilatory motion, Senator Doody's motion cannot get on the field at all. His motion is ineffective to move the Senate down the list of business to the Orders of the Day. It is ineffective to bypass the earlier headings set forth in Rule 19. Even as a dilatory motion it is meaningless, because there is not a question to be postponed or set aside. That is the truth of the matter.

I wish to say a few more things about this lame attempt to move a motion. In so doing, I wish to refer to the practice of the House of Commons. Senator Frith already has made reference to the practice of the House of Commons and Senator Murray, by interjection, has indicated that he relies heavily on the practices of the House of Commons.

Before I do that, I wish to put before the Senate a comment on the practice of a House such as ours looking outside for procedural guidance. This comment does not deal specifically with the Senate, but the burden of the argument is germane to the present situation.

I am quoting now from a book entitled The Legislative Process in Canada: The Need for Reform. The commentator states:

> I would like to make two preliminary observations which, I think are self evident. First, the British parliamentary system is not universally praised as the healthy supreme body which Professor Franks suggests it is.

[Senator Stewart.]

The reference there is to Professor C. E. S. Franks, Professor of Political Science at Queen's University in Kingston, Ontario. The quotation continues:

> This is certainly the message which has come from this conference. I would suggest that a major similarity in Britain and Canada is a parliamentary and public frustration with what is perceived to be a non responsive bureaucracy in a regulated society. Somewhat tongue in cheek I would suggest that this continued colonial outlook on the part of those who refer in hushed terms to the "Mother of Parliaments" is a failure to realize that in Canada, from 1867 onward we have gone in different directions than have those at Westminster. Our two systems are ever increasing in divergence and it is more and more difficult to refer to "mother's example" as a justification for the way in which we do things in this country.

The commentator then goes on to state:

> Technically, the British printed works such as Erskine May's Treatise on Parliamentary Practice while useful as historical documents, are not always appropriate in the Canadian context. Certainly there is no reason whatsoever why a Canadian Parliament should be bound by a precedent at Westminster which may have come into being to meet a specific British situation for which there is no parallel in the Canadian system, but many people feel because it is in "May" that it is transferable to the Canadian scene.

The author of these comments is John A. Holtby. He was speaking at a conference held at the University of Victoria in 1978. I have certainly adopted his words. We should not convey into the Parliament of Canada British practice, which may be very unsuitable here. Similarly, we should not attempt to convey into the Senate of Canada practices which the House of Commons may have decided to follow.

We certainly do not follow their practices in many matters. If it is not too painful a subject, may I refer to the ringing of bells?

Senator Frith: It is not too painful at all!

Senator Stewart: Back in December of 1982 the House of Commons adopted a rule with regard to the conduct of divisions. Has anyone ever suggested that that rule applied automatically here? Certainly on October 4, 1990 Senator Charbonneau did not.

Senator Frith: No!

Senator Stewart: He found it necessary to blaze a trail of his own. Certainly the Senate did not. Only last week the Senate made a provisional rule of its own to deal with the conduct of divisions. We did not say, "Oh, but there already is a precedent from the House of Commons. Back in December of 1982 they adopted a standing order that deals with this matter. That applies to us." Senator Charbonneau knew that it did not apply to us. All members of the Senate, when by a unanimous decision they made a provisional order governing that very matter, in a way very different from the way it was dealt with in the House of Commons, knew that what they had done over there, although interesting, was irrelevant and not binding here.

How the House of Commons proceeds is for that House, not for us to decide.

Senator Frith: And visa versa!

Senator Stewart: How the Senate proceeds is for the Senate and not the House of Commons to decide.

As I stated earlier, the two situations are very different. Over there "Motions" is called before the Orders of the Day. In the old days it sometimes happened that there would be a motion under debate which someone wishes to postpone or set aside by moving "that the Orders of the Day be now read". Here, in contrast, debate on "Motions" comes after the business ordered for a sitting. The situation is entirely different. Even if we wanted to adopt the House of Commons practice, other changes in our rules would be necessary.

Moreover, the situation in the House of Commons is not straight-forward and clear.

I am reading now from the all standing orders of the House of Commons published in 1989.

At Page 200, Standing Order 59 of the House of Commons is set forth: "A motion for reading the Orders of the Day shall have preference to any motion before the House".

Notice the words, "any motion before the House".

The commentary on the standing order, on page 201, says, "The motion belongs to the calss of 'superseding' motions which, although independent in form, traditionally may bemoeved without notice during debate on questions which they seek to set aside. Once moved, the motion under Order 59 is put from the Chair immediately without debate or amendment, and, if agreed to, has the double effect of superseding the business that may then be under discussion and of causing the House to proceed with the Orders of the Day. Any previous business thus seperseded is thus dropped from the Order Paper, although on a motion without notice it may be supported for consideration again." The annotation goes on to say that this was derived from an earlier by British rule, has been used frequently throughout successive Parliaments; and although its wording has not changed since Confederation, it has been the object of several interpretations.

The annotation continues: "Precedents vary". So even if we said, "Really, we will follow the other House, we would not have a clear guide. Precedents vary.

"In 1956 the Speaker ruled out of order a motion to proceed to the Orders of the Day on ground that there must be a motion before the House before this second motion could be entertained; a similar ruling was rendered ten years later. In 1970, the Speaker accepted the motion moved during Question Period, and, in 1983, the motion moved during Routine Proceedings under "petitions" was similarly accepted. In February of 1987 the Speaker put the question on the motion moved at the commencement of the sitting".

And so on.

So even in the House of Commons, as the authors say, "Precedents very". The practice is not settled.

This is not a clear guide for the Senate of Canada, even if we decided that we would follow the example of the House of Commons.

This motion that the Orders of the Day be now read has a long history behind it. I know that senators will not want me to go into it at great length this afternoon; but it is important, I think, to understand how this motion got into the rule book.

Back in the expansive days of the 18th century at Westminster, when a member gave notice of a motion, he would very often say, "I will move this motion at three o'clock three weeks hence." Or he might, in the case of a bill after having introduced it, say, in response to the question "When shall the said bill be read the first time", or "a second time", he might say, "Well, I will move it at eight o'clock four weeks hence—this day of the week for weeks hence".

That is how Orders of the Day came into existence. Items of business were ordered for particular times on particular dates.

There would often be interruptions in ordered business at sittings. Perhaps something would have been put down for two o'clock, and then something down for eight o'clock, and so forth, on particular days.

The paractice was that honorable members could use the intervening time for other business. They would move various motions.

Thus, it might be necessary, if an Order of the Day were to be carried out at, let's say, eight o'clock, to put aside the intervening business. The member sitting there, impatient to bet on with the bill or motion, of which he had given notice three weeks hence, moving from one foot to another with his impatience, would say, "I move that the Orders of the Day be now read".

In effect he would say, "I have notice of my item of business. We have an order for eight o,clock this day. This other motion, this other bill, important though it may be, is taking up the time. I want to get to the business ordered for this hour of this day".

That is the origin of the motion.

Of course, as honorable senators know, we no longer build up our program of work, our Orders of the Day, in that piecemeal way.

In the House of Commons there is a list of Orders of the Day. The items now have been sorted out so that government orders are given priority at certain hours and private members orders are given priority at other hours.

We know how it is done here. In the Senate we know how the Orders of the Day, the structure of the Orders of the Day, is arrived at. We have our own rules for that.

That is the origin of the motion for the reading of the Orders of the Day. It was to supersede a motion, perhaps a substantive motion, perhaps a motion relating to the progress of a bill thorugh Parliament.

That is the origin of Standing Order 59 as set forth in the rules of the House of Commons at this day.

Standing Order 59 was once Standing Order 29. I now refer to Beauchesne's second edition. That standing order was adopted by the House of Commons on December 20, 1867. It states that a motion for reading the Orders of the Day shall have preference to any motion before the House. Notice that it says: "preference to any motion before the House". It does not say "preference to any petition before the House".

An item of business has been ordered for a certain hour on a certain day, but there is another motion before the House. That other motion is pushed aside. It is bumped out be the reading of the Orders of the Day.

There is another standing order of the house of Commons that is relevant. It now is Standing Order 58. it was adopted by the House of Commons on July 10, 1906.

That order reads:

> "When a question is under debate, no motion is received unless to amend it, to postpone it to a day certain for the previous question, for reading the Orders of the Day, for proceeding to another order, to adjourn the debate, or for the adjournment of the House."

Honorable senators will see that those two standing orders of the House—Number 58, the one that I have just read, and Standing Order 59 of the House of Commons—overlap. Both refer to the reading of the Orders of the Day.

Number 58 is kind of a grab bag: "When a question is under debate, no motion is received unless to amend it for reading of the Orders of the Day," et cetera. In contrast, Standing Order 59 deals specifically with a motion for the reading of the Orders of the Day: "A motion for the reading of the Orders of the Day shall have preference to any motion before the House."

How did that Standing Order 48 get into the Standing Orders of the House of Commons? Sometimes history can be very instructive. I have in my hand the proceedings of the House of Commons for several sittings in July, 1906.

On Thursday, July 5, 1906, the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Prime Minister, moved:

> That the report of the special committee appointed to revise the rules of the House, presented this day, be referred to the Committee of the Whole House for consideration on Monday next.

An Order of the Day for Monday, July 9 is being made. He proposed that it be an order of the House, that on Monday next the report of the committee be referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Eventually, pursuant to that order, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the proposed new standing orders. Some of those orders are very interesting. Incidentally, this is the origin of the motion governing the adjournment of the debate to discuss a matter of urgent public importance.

[Senator Stewart.]

Prior to 1906 members were getting up sitting after sitting to move the adjournment. Having moved the adjournment, they would then talk about the most diverse topics on that motion. It was a debatable motion. They would talk about the plight of the fisheries in Lunenburg. They would talk about the plight of miners in Ontario. They would talk about one of the great topics of the day, namely the need for cowcatchers on trains, and for other devices to protect livestock from being injured or killed by railway trains. They would get up and move the adjournment of the House and talk about the urgent need for temperance throughout the land.

They went on so often that the House decided that there had to be, not a ruling made on his own by the Speaker, but a rule made by the House to govern motions for the adjournment of the House. So they wrote a rule in July of 1906 stating that the motion to adjourn, put in standard or formal style, shall not be debatable, but that a member may move the adjournment to discuss a matter of urgent public importance in a specified way. That is the origin of "Emergency debates" the practice in the other place.

Another interesting matter dealt with in the House of Commons in July of 1906 was conferences. The Debates state:

> On Section 84,—conference with the Senate.
> (84.) In cases in which the Senate disagree to any amendments made by the House of Commons or to which the House of Commons has disagreed, the House of Commons is willing to receive the reasons of the Senate for their disagreeing or insisting (as the case may be), by message, without a conference, unless at any time the Senate should desire to communicate the same at a conference.
> Any conference between the two Houses may be a free conference.
> (2.) When the House requests a conference with the Senate, the reasons to be given by this House at the same shall be prepared and agreed to by the House before a message be sent therewith.
> Mr. FOSTER. What is a free conference?
> Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Heretofore there has been a lot of red tape about these conferences. According to the existing law, we have to pass questions here and give written instructions from the House to the members of the conference representing this House, and therefore we are now providing for a free conference without any instructions at all. All the instructions are contained in the reasons for the disagreement.

They added to their standing orders a provision for free conferences. I wanted to call that to the attention of honourable senators because I think it is of importance interest to us in 1990.

They then got on to the adoption of what is now their rule 58. It deals with privileged motions. The proceedings for that date quote the proposed new standing order:

When a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it; to postpone it to a day certain; for the previous question; for reading the orders of the day; for proceeding to another order; to adjourn the debate; or for the adjournment of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is a condensation of several rules which are not printed except in the text books but which are introduced into the rules of the House now.

Mr. BERGERON. What is the meaning of 'reading the orders of the day.'

Mr. FIELDING. That is a form of disposing of a question without expressing any opinion. By reading the orders of the day you express no opinion on a question, but you postpone it.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the committee rose and reported.

In other words, there was no doubt in their minds that a motion for the reading of the Orders of the Day had the effect of putting aside a previous question, a question which already was under debate. The House disposes of a question without expressing an opinion on it. Or the House postpones it.

The House of Commons seems to have strayed recently from the established practice of both the British House and its own earlier established practice. That is not our business. Nor is it our concern. As Mr. Holtby said, it is not for us in Canada to follow the so-called Mother of Parliaments slavishly. Similarly, it is not for us here to follow the House of Commons slavishly, whether it does right or wrong. Its precedence are of interest, but they do not bind us. They do not guide us. Nor do they shed a light for us to follow when we have an explicit rule, a rule set forth clearly as in the case of Rule 19 as to the order of our business.

What Senator Doody has tried to do is to smuggle a substantive motion into this house in the guise of a dilatory motion. He has put forth a motion to set aside rule 19. By unanimous agreement —by leave, as we say—we often set aside a rule. And sometimes we change our rules by a substantive motion. In the latter case notice is given and the motion is brought up for debate on Motions after the Orders of the Day. That is the way a substantive motion to deal with the Rules of the Senate is dealt with.

We also have dilatory motions. Dilatory motions, as Beauchesne says at page 151, ". . . are designed to dispose of the original question either for the time being or permanently." If a motion is to be a genuine dilatory motion there has to be an "original question" to be disposed of either for the time being or permanently. Beauchesne goes on: gives examples. He says:

They are usually of the following type:

"That consideration of the question be postponed to . . . . . (date)".

"That the Orders of the Day be read."

Senator Doody has said to himself, "I shall try to smuggle in a substantive question in the form of a dilatory question,"; however he did not succeed in even moving a dilatory motion because for a dilatory motion to be in order there must be another question, "an original question" before the Senate.

Honourable senators, this whole episode is just another ridiculous chapter in the history of this Government's conduct of this session of the Senate. It is ludicrous. We would be laughing again and if it were not evident that this Parliament is being degraded by the Government. We all remember what happened here on Thursday, October 4. Let us not revisit that sad day again.

Senator Haidasz: Black Thursday.

Senator Stewart: What we saw on that day was a carefully orchestrated scenario that afternoon. This afternoon we have another carefully planned plot. Senator Doody sought the floor, saying, "I have petitions. Senator Gigantès, your turn will come. I have hot petitions." Naturally he wants the Senate to hear from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. We can understand that. In addition, he wants to read to the senate the petition from Senator Murray's employees. The Senate should hear them, and that is fine, because they are Canadian citizens. However, having got the floor under the heading, "Reading of Petitions", he did not proceed in an orderly way. He stumbled. He brought in a motion which he thinks will have the effect of a substantive motion, setting aside a rule of this place, Rule 19. He does it in the guise of a dilatory motion under Rule 46, which deals with motions of quite another kind, and he expects us to take him seriously.

Clearly, he is being advised by someone who knows nothing about procedure. He is being advised by Senator Murray. That is what is going on.

Senator Frith: That is the only explanation.

Senator Stewart: Nobody can argue seriously that the motion moved by Senator Doody is in order. It is a travesty, a nullity. It is ludicrous. If the government wants us to take their business seriously, they will have to stop these silly shenanigans.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words on this point of order. Honourable senators opposite seem to assert that the citation from Beauchesne's, paragraph 417, is the final authority on this particular situation. In fact, honourable senators, it seems to be the only authority that has been quoted. Recent practice in the House of Commons demonstrates that paragraph 417 of Beauchesne's, clearly is not the only authority.

Senator Frith: Not in the House of Commons anyway.

Senator Doody: It is not the only authority. There are some very obvious examples of this procedure being followed in the House of Commons: November 24, 1986 at page 1473 of the House of Commons Debates; October 16, 1989 on page 4679 of the House of Commons Debates; October 24, 1989 at page 4029 of the House of Commons Debates; March 21, 1990 at page 9607, also of the House of Commons Debates.

Honourable senators, it has been stated here before—and I will repeat it again—that Rule 1 of the Senate rules is the applicable rule in this case. That rule says:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

Since honourable senators opposite have been unable to find examples of the Senate rules—the Senate rules are silent on this—then we look to the House of Commons for guidance.

Senator Olson: Oh no. We have precedents.

Senator Doody: I will not be very long.

Senator Frith: We are entitled to groan. Bill, you will not begrudge a groan.

Senator Doody: No, I will not. Groan away.

Honourable senators, we should examine paragraph 417 of Beauchesne's in light of these examples of the House of Commons' practice and why paragraph 417 is not operative. Page 405 of the Seventeenth Edition of Erskine May, on which paragraph 417 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition is based, suggests that the motion for the reading of the Orders of the Day as a separate and distinct question is obsolete in the British parliamentary practice. It says that the motion that the Orders of the Day be read is obsolete as a substantive motion. This is because the provisions of the Standing Orders of the British House of Commons provide for entering upon Orders of the Day at a certain hour every day. This means that the rules of that house prevent any obstruction to reaching the Orders of the Day. The statement in Beauchesne's paragraph 417 is correct insofar as it applies to the British House of Commons.

It has no bearing in the Parliament of Canada. In the Parliament Canada such a provision has not been added, as they have in the British House of Commons, to prevent the use of routine proceedings as a dilatory tactic. In other words, if we in this place were to adhere strictly to this 417 of Beauchesne, which has been cited and which, as I said, is applicable in the British House of Commons, then it is quite possible that a minority in this place could prevent the Orders of the Day from ever being reached. We would never be able to discuss government business.

So it follows then that the 46(e), which has been referred to here was inserted in the Senate's rules for just this purpose, and 46(e) says quite clearly that no notice is required for the reading of the Orders of the Day.

Now, honourable senators, why is that rule in there if it was not mentioned that no notice is required for the following motions: "for reading the Orders of the Day," which is exactly what happened here. A motion was laid down in this place that we proceed to the reading of the Orders of the Day.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Frith: It is not that notice is required to the Orders, but to the motion.

Senator Doody: You are not groaning now senator. I shouldn't interrupt you; I'm sorry.

Senator Frith: You are forgiven.

Senator Doody: So therefore it follows, in the Canadian Parliament, that the motion that the Orders of the Day now be read retains its character and functions as a separate and distinct procedure. Indeed, our rule 46(e), which I have just quoted, and the House of Commons Standing Orders 58 and 59, which Senator Stewart quoted, anticipate the fact that such a motion can be moved as a distinct question. The practice of the House of Commons in the matter is instructive, and I have given the chamber some examples. Speaker Fraser in the other place dealt at length with the matter in a ruling—which I will not read, but it can be found in the Debates of the House of Commons of April 14, 1987, at pages 5119 and 5122. Speaker Fraser was concerned in his ruling that there be no abuse of the rules of the other place. He concluded that such an abuse could occur if the government monopolized the time of the House.

In this particular case it is the reverse. The Opposition is monopolizing the time of the house, and it does that by never permitting the house to reach routine proceedings. Equally, such an abuse would happen if the Opposition did exactly the same thing, which is what we have been seeing here; and honourable senators opposite have made it quite clear that they intend to continue. So, having been faced with the prospect of another 40,000 petitions, it was quite an order to move to Orders of the Day. I fail to understand the logic and the argument that the motion for Orders of the Day could only be moved if there is a motion or a question before the house. That anticipates that we would have gone to Orders of the Day before we are allowed to move to Orders of the Day.

Senator Frith: There are other motions.

Senator Doody: It makes no sense, and obviously it is not the intent of the rule. This house, as does every other house, must have the fundamental power to regulate its own business. In order to allow us to do that, certain rules are provided, one of which is Rule 46(e) which I quoted, which allows for the tabling of a motion or the presenting of a motion for reading Orders of the Day.

Honourable senators, Senator Stewart referred at great length to Rule 19. He went on to read it and describe it, and seemed to infer that that order, or the manner of presenting the order paper every day is cast in stone, and cannot be changed, that we must follow it precisely every day. But that also seems to be contradicted by the various opportunities which the rules give us to move to the previous question, to move to Orders of the Day, or to move for postponement to a certain day. All these opportunities are provided for under our Rule 46, none of which requires notice, and obviously they are put there to facilitate the conducting of the business of the house. So I put to honourable senators the fact that this motion is indeed an order that has been properly presented, that it has been used in the other place and on various occasions. The only citation that could be found to argue against it is a citation expressly written by Erskine May to deal with the situation in the British House of Commons, which is very different from the situation in this place.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Doody: So I submit that this motion is entirely in order, and I urge that it be adopted.

An Hon. Senator: No, no.

Hon. H.A. Olson: You are in a hurry. Trample down the rights of parliament and you then get in a hurry; but you can't even wait for people to make submissions on the basis of a point of order. Well, honourable senators,—

An Hon. Senator: No, no.

Senator Olson: —the senators in this place decide that, not one or two members on that side, or whoever is sitting in the Chair. He doesn't decide when a point of order has been exhausted; the senators do. Let us be clear on that.

There is one point that has not been made in speaking to the point of order. It has been made, but it has not been emphasized enough; and I will go over it in a few minutes. If you are going to accept the motion moved by Senator Doody, then you have to set aside everything else, and in this case you have to set aside the right of Canadians to petition Parliament.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: I have hundreds of names of people, good Canadian citizens, who have sent me these petitions, and I can tell you, so there is no misunderstanding, that I intend to honour my obligation to place those petitions before this House of Parliament.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Senator Doody can argue that it has been used in the House of Commons Position of duress. I spent fifteen years there. I don't know what happened since the Conservatives were elected in 1984, but I know that they have trampled on the rights of Canadian citizens and the parliamentary process several times since then—which is something they would never have got away with 15 or 20 years ago. They had a big majority. I'm not quite sure, but I believe that in 1984 they started out with 211 members. They used their majority to bulldoze parliament then, and they are still using it. Bill C-62 would never have reached this chamber in the time that it did without the government bulldozing it with time allocation, guillotine, or whatever you want to call it, time after time.

Now, the legislation is before the Senate, and the people of Canada have decided they are going to use every angle, every device, every opportunity they can to prevent the government from imposing this terrible iniquitous tax on them. That is why we have received these petitions. Surely you can understand that. I don't know of any time in my 34 years in the Canadian Parliament—it goes back to 1957, anyway—when the people of Canada have been so exercised over a bill that the government insists on passing. There is a good reason for that.

I want to talk for a few moments about what Senator Doody tried to advance as reasons for why he thinks his motion is in order. First, he forgot one thing, namely, that being that there was no motion before the house.

Senator Olson: If he wants to cite Beauchesne, Erskine May or whomever, he should read what they say. As we know, he was attempting to introduce a superseding motion, although there was no motion before the Senate for him to supersede. There was no motion on which to move a dilatory motion, as we were on petitions. We were following the right of Canadians to petition their Parliament, and that right should be honoured and respected. Now that right is being trampled upon. Senator Simard has said, "So what?" If that is the attitude on the government side, they can be sure that we on this side will stand up for the right of Canadians to petition their Parliament, and we will do that hour after hour, day after day until this government gets the message that it is a right of our people under our parliamentary system. It is our obligation to make sure that the petitions are presented here.

Coming back to Senator Doody's argument, superseding motions, though independent in form, are moved in the course of debate on questions which they seek to set aside and may only be moved when a question is under debate. They cannot be moved by a member rising on a point of order. Senator Doody did not rise on a point of order; he pirated himself onto the floor by reading petitions. As far as I am concerned, there was no motion before the house. It is very clear that we cannot move a superseding or dilatory motion until we pass the item in the list of routine proceedings called "Presentation of Petitions."

It is more serious than that. I am not sure whether it is absolutely true, but I hear that the members opposite—the Leader of the Government, the Deputy Leader, the Whip and whomever—intend to carry on so that we never get back to petitions insofar as Bill C-62 is concerned. That means that all of these petitions that I have in front of me, and all of the others, how many hundreds and thousands there are, must be thrown in the waste paper basket if we accept Senator Doody's motion, because, unless we get back to the top of the order paper, there will never be an opportunity to present them to this Parliament before we vote on third reading.

I appeal to members opposite. They may think that they are playing games with us, and I suppose a little of that goes on all the time, but please do not wreck parliamentary procedure and do not tramp on the rights of Canadian citizens to petition their Parliament. I, for one, am absolutely convinced that what has been attempted here is completely out of order. I promise that I shall do everything in my power to make sure that the rights of citizens are not trampled upon. Thousands of citizens want to let Parliament know, by way of petition, that they oppose what is contained in Bill C-62; and there is good reason for it.

However, we will get to that sometime reasonably soon, unless the government chooses to continue to bulldoze through. Surely it should have learned by this time that this house of Parliament will not be bulldozed. The government tried it on October 4; it has tried it a couple of times since, and is trying it again today, to move a motion tramping on the right of Canadians to have their petitions heard before the Parliament of Canada. The same thing was done also in the other chamber. The chairman of the finance committee of the other place decided, because he had a majority, that he would stop people from even appearing before the committee.

Senator Lucier: Even people from their own party.

Senator Olson: Sure. They have a practice over there that if you vote against them you get kicked out of the party. We have a couple of victims in Alberta.

So, honourable senators, I ask you not to take this kind of activity quietly or to think of it as some kind of contest between Liberals and Conservatives. It is far more serious than that. The government is trying to tramp on the rights of Canadians to express themselves before one of their houses of Parliament. That is the consequence of accepting Senator Doody's motion. It is so serious that I do not know that it can ever be properly repaired. I sat in the House of Commons and was a member of the rules committee for some months during an intense debate in which the government of the day had tried on a number of occasions to push what it wanted through Parliament. The government was getting a little impatient and had made some changes to the rules to shorten, if you will, and restrict, the rights of the Opposition to carry the pleadings and the prayers of the Canadian public. Every time that has happened, Parliament has been a poorer place for it. There is absolutely no doubt in my mind that it is happening here. We must ask ourselves the question: Are we going to let the government jump on the rules to petition in this place?" There is nowhere else to go. The bill is before the Senate. It has already passed the other place with the use of closure, the guillotine, the allocation of time, and that kind of thing. We either get redress for these people in this chamber, or this hated, despised bill will become the law of this country even though the people do not want it.

The Minister of Finance has said that he knows that it is not popular, but it is right. He says that his party intends to do a few things that are not popular but are the right things. One of the most basic rights in a democracy is the right to be wrong. We do not have to accept that the right to be wrong is wrong by someone else's interpretation. This bill is wrong, wrong, wrong. It is not right at all, and close to 90 per cent of the people believe that it is wrong to bring in a law that will cause them an accounting and bookkeeping nightmare. They do not want it.

Everyone knows that we have to pay more taxes. However, you do not have to set up such a complicated system that will make slaves of all of us. I welcome an opportunity to get into the substance of this bill as soon as we can, because I have some arguments that, I hope, will persuade members opposite that they should not support the bill. However, along the way we must honour and respect the parliamentary traditions that have grown up over centuries. I do not know whether Senator Stewart mentioned when petitions first came before the British House of Parliament, but I know that the tradition is centuries old.

I do not know the exact date, but for the common people to be able to carry their views before the people that govern them is not something that we invented in this century—I can tell you that with some certainty. I hope that honourable senators opposite will at least respect the right of Canadian citizens to express their views through the one process that we have. It is on our order paper at the top of the page—that is, under "Presentation of Petitions". The next item is "Reading of Petitions". Under that item you can do a lot of things. But we have not yet reached that order of business. We are still on "Presentation of Petitions." There is probably not one senator on either side of this house who can remember the number of petitions that have come to this chamber. That is how much people are opposed to this measure.

Senator Phillips: You would not allow them before, Senator Olson!

Senator Olson: "You would not allow them before?" The post office was available for petitions to come to senators at any time. If you want to put it that way, I can never remember, that until now any senator was denied bringing petitions into this chamber. It has never happened before. But we have new rules. They are new, bulldozing, rules—that is what they are. I do not care so much about polls. Sometimes I believe them and sometimes I do not. It does not always depend on whether or not they are favourable, because I like to know how they got their results. I prefer to go around and talk to people. I can tell you that from what I see on these petitions higher than 90 per cent of the people in my region of Canada do not want Bill C-62 to become the law of this country.

But the government is saying, "We will use our majority and trample over it and pass it anyway, because the minister of finance is saying that it may not be popular but it is right." I repeat again: It is wrong to impose something on people.

Senator Frith: That may be one of the reasons that it is unpopular, namely, because it is wrong!

Senator Olson: Yes, that might be. Mr. Wilson says the same thing about monetary policy and 14 per cent and 15 per cent interest rates, too—that is, "It may not be popular but it is right. We are not interested in what is popular or not, we will do what is right."

Honourable senators, think that over fairly seriously. This country believes in democracy. Surely we do not think that means one election every four or five years or so with a dictatorship in between. That is not what Canada is all about.

Canada is made up of a government that has years—I was going to say centuries—of structural changes behind it. I am thinking back to sometime in the 12th or 13th century. It has evolved over time. We will not now have that thrown in the waste paper basket just because this government is in a hurry to trample on people's rights. One of their most important rights, as I said a few minutes ago, is to petition their parliament pm bills which they simply do not want.

The argument has again been made that something has happened in the House of Commons, where they tramped over this. Surely, honourable senators, our own rules and practices are more important than what goes on in the House of Commons. He quotes Rule 1 as if we do not have any rules in dealing with petitions. We do have some practices and procedure in this chamber dealing with petitions, namely, that we accept them. We allow people to express themselves by way of petition into this place.

We know that you have tried this once before. I do not remember the exact date, but it was earlier this month. You tried to trample over people's rights to have their petitions heard in this place. But we do not accept that. The people of Canada do not accept that. They expect us to act according to the practices that have been set in place here. We knew that the government would argue that in the House of Commons this motion has been successfully moved by a minister who is on his feet to table documents. We knew that the government would argue this. That is not quite what Senator Doody did earlier today, but it was approximately along the lines of what he did.

We have spent some time researching this, but I do not believe there is a single example of its being done in the Senate—not one. This is breaking new ground and trampling on people's rights at the same time.

Senator Frith: It is imposing a rule of the House of Commons on us.

Senator Olson: It is imposing rules on us that we do not need. We do not need to refer to Rule 1 to find the proper way of dealing with this motion. In view of the clear words of Beauschene's, and with no contrary procedure even having been followed in the Senate, it is clear that the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of the Senate as described in the Senate do not allow such a motion, regardless of what is the practice in the House of Commons. We would be breaking new ground.

I appeal to honourable senators opposite to think about what they are doing if they are to trample on people's rights to petition their parliament just because they are in a hurry. Give us a little time. I guess they are trying to run this place for 24 hours a day. We can get through a lot of petitions in that time. It will play out. I do not know how many days it will take, but it will take a few. If we spend some time respecting the democratic processes that have taken hundreds of years to develop, we are not wasting our time to be in defence of that.

The practices and precedents of the Senate must have priority over the practices and precedents of the House of Commons, particularly—and I want to emphasis this—when they are diametrically opposed, and when the Senate's practice is completely in conformity with what has been written by authorities such as Beauschene.

Honourable senators, I wish to appeal to you to think over very carefully—as I have done now a couple of times—what you are trying to do here. You will regret it. I guarantee that everytime you start to trample on the rights of the Opposition and to wipe out the checks and balances in the system, you make a mistake. You will learn to regret it later on.

I do not suppose that honourable senators opposite will regret it very much, because as soon as the Canadian people can get at the Conservative party they will do so. But that is not the point. The point is that there are checks and balances even between elections, and the Senate is one of the most important of those checks and balances. We have an obligation to stand up to this kind of attempted roughshod treatment of Canadian rights.

I will close by repeating what I said at the beginning—that is, be careful. You will carry this for a generation. If you want to trample into the ground these things that have been worked out over centuries, you do so at the risk of Canadian citizens losing the respect for Parliament that they should have. So do not do it.

There is no need to be in that much or a hurry. We have had bills before Parliament on a number of occasions, and a bill as important as this one can take a little more time.

That was in spite of the government having spent millions of dollars trying to sell the measure. I know there is a question of whether or not that was legal but before something is passed into law. However, it is the policy of the Conservative party; it is not the law of the land. But they have done it and with impunity too. They have taken money out of the treasury to try to sell something to people who do not want it.

In spite of the Conservatives having done that for weeks and months the polls show that they have not changed the minds of two per cent of the people. The people still do not want this bill. It is not just because they are opposed to any type of tax. We all know that. They are opposed to what is in Bill C-62. In spite of all the efforts made by the minister and in spite of the millions and millions of dollars paid to slick ad writers and public relations firms the people of Canada are not being fooled. They do not want this type of a structure to collect the revenue that Canada needs to run government services. They have said that over and over again. The Conservatives have pulled every trick out of the bag to try to impose this on them.

I hope that I have been able to convince some honourable senators opposite that they should back—track and have a good look at what they are doing. I hope that Senator Phillips, who is nodding his head in the right direction, will be one of those who will carry the message that this is the wrong thing to do. So far the process has been as wrong as what is contained in the bill.

Senator Phillips: I will give your remarks due consideration.

Senator Olson: That is good. I conclude by saying that I hope I have convinced some senators opposite that what they are trying to do is wrong. Therefore, I hope they will follow through on what has just been said.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Would Senator Olson answer a question?

Senator Olson: I would be very happy to try.

Senator Barootes: One of your chief observations is that it is the right of citizens to present petitions to a House of Parliament with which we are in total agreement.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Barootes: Thank you. In the past in this house, it has been the practice to present petitions by reading a short excerpt concerning the intention of the petition and then to mention, if a senator so wishes, the number of names on the petition.

Senator Frith: Wrong!

Senator Olson: You are a little off track.

Senator Barootes: If you will read the rules, you will see that that is quite clearly eluded to.

Senator Frith: No, it is not. It says that they are not printed.

Senator Barootes: May I ask my question of Senator Olson? If I had wanted to ask William Pitt, the Younger, I would. However, I am asking my question of Senator Olson.

Would it be sufficient for you to present these petitions in the time honoured way by reading some part of the petition and then by doing as you have done before, and as Senator Hébert has done many times, table the petition and say that it contains the signature of so many people on it? Would that suffice to clear the log jam, if you will, which appears at the present time in terms of the proceedings of the Senate?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think I should refer Senator Barootes to page 57 of our rule book. I hope that we all have a great deal of respect for our rule book. It states very clearly under the title "Presentation of Petitions:

> A senator may present any petition entrusted to him.
> See Rules 5(m), 51, 52, 53, 87, 88, 89 and 94.
> A senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition;

I have not heard any senator reading petitions in this place.

Senator Frith: That is right, just the names.

Senator Olson:

> . . . the petition itself is not read.

We have not been reading them.

> The test of the petition and the names of the petitioners attached thereto is not printed in the Debates of the Senate . . .

Let us be very careful that you understand that. The names are not printed. It does not say that they cannot be read.

Senator Frith: If you were not to read them, why would the rule state that they are not to be printed? The rule assumes that you are going to read them.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Grafstein: Senator Simard agreed with us about two weeks ago.

Senator Barootes: Will you allow Senator Olson to answer?

Senator Olson: There is your answer. It is very plain. I am not so good in french otherwise I could read it to you in french. But the english is very clear.

Senator Barootes: The point I am making, and I thought that you might agree with it—I see now that you can't, because you are fixed in your blases—is that if the names are not to be printed, then why read them? Why not follow Hébert's previous system of mentioning how many names are on the petition and letting it go at that? The only time the names were read here was when Senator Bonnell read them on one occasion. We then changed the rules so that names would not be read and not be contained in our answered.

Senator Olson: Honourable senator, Senator Barootes is a very bright, intelligent and good senator. He should be able to understand to language.

Senator Barootes: Thank you very much.

Senator Olson: He should also be able to read. He had better get out his little red book and turn to page 57 and read along with me. I will read it to Senator Barootes again. It does not say that a senator is prevented from reading. If the rules committee and the Senate had wanted to say that senators cannot read the names on petitions, then they should have said so. They did not. That is how simple it is. It states:

> For the test of the petition and the names of the petitioners attached thereto is not printed . . .

It does not state that you cannot read them.

Senator Barootes: Does it say anything about addresses and telephone numbers?

Senator Olson: What we are up against is really very serious.

Senator Barootes: Is that why you are reading addresses and telephone numbers? It states that you should not do it.

Senator Olson: It does not state that. Do not say something that is not in the book. We are up against the same old problem. Senator Simard says about the rules, "So what?"

Senator Grafstein: Senator Simard agreed with us.

Senator Olson: Yes, he agreed with us a few weeks ago. But with respect to other rules he said, "So what?" Now, Senator Barootes should learn that you just cannot do that. You cannot make up the rules as you go along. The rules does not state that you cannot read the names of petitioners. It states that those names will not be printed.

I will tell the senator one other thing, too. That is to say that if one does read the out names, then I think they are printed. I refer to the ones that are in your speech. Your speech is printed. I could hand in a couple of petitions now and I know that after it is handed in the names will not be printed. If I stand here and read them all, they will be printed all right, because my speech is printed.

Senator Barootes: Past practice and present practice is different from what you have said.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Would Senator Olson entertain a question from me as a follow-up to the question asked by Senator Barootes? I think Senator Barootes put an interesting fact on the record, assuming for the moment that he was correct.

As I understood what Senator Barootes said, he said that the rule governing petitions was changed very recently, that it is not an old rule, and it was changed precisely because the experience in this chamber relatively recently when the names have been read into the record by Senator Bonnell and therefore clearly since the rule was changed recently, when a rules committee was considering how to deal with the situation of having a petition have all names read into the record and then printed in the record and since the rule is changed to state explicitly that the names would not be printed, that implies to someone like me that what that really means is that is was understood that the names would be read into the record but, in fact, would not ultimately be printed. I ask Senator Olson to comment on that in terms of his experience in this chamber and on the rules committee in the other place.

I ask Senator Olson this on the basis of his experience in dealing with rules in both places. Am I not correct that if the intention of the Rules committee had been to prevent the reading of the names, they would have said so? In fact, they explicitly say that the names will not be printed. They do not make any reference whatsoever to whether or not the names ought to be read and, indeed, according to Senator Barootes, that rule came about explicitly because there was an incident in which all the names were not only read but were ultimately printed in the record. The Rules committee decided that the appropriate solution to the problem was to avoid a long Hansard with names typed in, but clearly felt that it was fine to have the names read in the chamber. Otherwise they would have outlawed that.

I am not a lawyer, and neither is Senator Barootes, despite the fact that he frequently likes to act like one. That seems to be a layman's interpretation of the rule and the intent as set out by Senator Barootes. Senator Olson, on the basis of your experience with the rules here and in the other place, would you care to comment on whether my interpretation is right?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is a more important reason than the one Senator Kirby has just mentioned. Do you think that the Rules committee would make a rule that decides what I put in my speeches? No, it would not. It can make rules about vexatious language, and that sort of thing, but if I want to identify towns, people, provinces, or anything else in my speech, the Rules committee would not attempt to make that sort of rule. Senator Doody did read the names from his petition, but two wrongs do not make a right. I think he regretted doing that.

The reason the text of the petition is not printed, if the senator did read the names, is that it would not be printed in another part of the records that are kept. I do not know why we are arguing that a senator does not have the right to read names. If we carry that one step further, it means that the Rules committee will decide what we put in our speeches. It will not do that.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Senator Olson, as I understand the principle underlying the rule—and we had this debate late one night some weeks ago—the very essence of a petition is a prayer that is made by a petitioner in open court. The historic basis of the idea was that a citizen would be able to have his grievances redressed in open court. Is that not the fundamental premise underlying the proposition that when a senator reads a petition, if he chooses, he can table that petition and also refer to the essence of that petition in terms of the person and the substance of the petition? Is that not the basis of making a petition in open court, the court here being Parliament?

Senator Olson: I agree with that. It is anti-democratic for senators to object to our naming the people who sent the petitions here. I would hope there would never be a rule where we could not read the names of petitioners. That would mean that the Rules committee will decide what senators put in their speeches, and that will never happen.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I would like to return to the point of order. It might be helpful to identify it again. You will recall that Senator Doody moved that the Senate proceed to Orders of the Day. Senator Frith then rose on a point of order. The essential thrust of the point of order was that the motion moved by Senator Doody was a superseding motion of a dilatory nature. Since there was no question before the Senate—"question" as defined in the Rules of the Senate—Senator Frith said that the motion was out of order. In his opinion, it was a superseding motion of a dilatory nature which could only be made when there was a question as defined in the Rules of the Senate and, therefore, it was out of order. Other arguments were also made. Obviously, I can only deal with one at a time.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Senator Ottenheimer, I understood that Senator Doody undertook to set aside Rule 19 by a motion to change the order of business at this sitting. Consequently, my argument was that he did not try to move a dilatory motion; rather he tried to move a substantive motion which would require notice and which would have to be debated under Motions. I raise that now because I do not want you to chase that "dilatory rabbit." I do not think we are dealing with that kind of creature here.

Senator Ottenheimer: Senator Frith's line of argument—and I obviously wish to refer to that—dealt with the dilatory and superseding nature of the motion, or his opinion thereof. I am aware that Senator Stewart's argument was of a different nature. He examined whether it was dilatory or substantive. I think it fair to say that he came to the conclusion that it was substantive. He was of the opinion that it was a motion of which notice should be given, and he made reference to Standing Order 19.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is now 6 o'clock. According to our rules I must vacate the Chair. We will return at 8 o'clock.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended.

THE SENATE

October 30, 1990

At 8:06 p.m., October 30, the sitting of the Senate was resumed, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I had just begun speaking to Senator Frith's point of order at 6 o'clock. Having progressed for only about a minute and a half, I will now act as if starting from scratch.

Honourable senators, what the Senate is considering for decision by the Chair is a motion of Senator Doody to the effect that the Senate proceed to Orders of the Day. A point of order was raised by Senator Frith alleging that this motion would be out of order. He argued that it would be out of order during routine proceedings in general and petitions specifically. Basically, the argument was that, because there is no question before the house—"question" as defined in the Rules of the Senate—the motion would be out of order.

Senator Frith referred to citation 417 of the Fifth Edition of Beauchesne to the effect that the motion that the house pass to the orders of day is a superseding motion of a dilatory variety and is therefore out of order because there is no question as defined in the Rules of the Senate.

Senator Stewart's argument in that respect, as I recall it, was that, while in appearance it could appear dilatory, it was in effect not a dilatory but a substantive motion. He then went on to say that the necessary notice would be required.

We have, therefore, the two contentions on that specific question. One is that it is dilatory and therefore cannot be raised during routine proceedings because there is no question before the house. The other is that it is substantive and therefore requires notice.

When one gets into classifications of this kind, I think one probably resembles a Medievbal scholar defining various kinds of grace, santified or actual. I will come to Beauchesne, but Senator Stewart is much more a historian than I am. He went into the 19th and 18th Centuries. I am making a very passing reference to the Medieval Ages and I am relating this to the definition of various words. We can all try to use them in order to hook things on to them—things for which they were never probably intended. That is something like using a weak splinter sticking out of a wall as a coat hanger. Naturally, it will lest the coat fall to the ground because it was never intended to act as a coat hanger.

Therefore, without being offensive, to get into a debate on whether the motion is dilatory, according to Senator Frith's understanding, or substantive, according to Senator Stewart's understanding, is really to get into what is more a theological debate, something like whether a sin is mortal or venal, whether a motion is substantive or dilatory, or whether certain celestial bodies are pure spirits or demispirits. These are theological questions, and although this is a red chamber, it is far removed from the College of Cardinals—even that of the Middle Ages, when there were many lay Cardinals.

I would therefore suggest that it is an interesting question but a theological one—a question of nominalism, a question which is not, let us say, empirical.

I think we have to approach this question not in a scholastic fashion but, rather, in an empirical, Baconian fashion.

Hon. John B. Stewart: What was the word after "empirical"? Was it "draconian"?

Senator Ottenheimer: I am not sure, Senator, I will have to check Hansard, because I am speaking from notes. But certainly I think it is important to approach this in an empirical manner.

So, in answer to the interesting but somewhat theoretical question of whether this motion to proceed to the reading of the Orders of the Day is dilatory, as Senator Frith maintains, or substantive, as Sentor Stewart maintains, I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is a Rule 46 motion. That rule reads, in part, "No notice is required for the following motions". It lists a great number of motions, some of which are dilatory, some of which are not. Whether being dilatory or not dilatory is the criterion is not the specific identification or characteristic of a Rule 46 motion. Rule 46 states:

> No notice is required of the following motions:
> (a) by way of amendement to a question;

That usually is not dilatory. The rule also states:

> (i) for the consideration forthwith or on a future day of Commons amendments to a public bill;
> (j) for the appointment of a committee to prepare reasons for disagreeing with a Commons amendment;
> (l) for the first reading of a bill;
> (o) for the reconsideration, while in the Committee of the Whole, of any clause of a bill already agreed to;

These are Rule 46 motions that are not dilatory. What I am suggesting is that, as interesting as it is, the debate whether the motion is dilatory or non-dilatory, substantive or non-substantive, or substantive or dilatory, really comes down to this: it cannot but be a motion which is described in Rule 46, which states that no notice is required of it. Rule 46 (e) states:

"for reading the Orders of the Day." As I have pointed out, among that whole list of motions for which no notice is required, some are what is tradionally called dilatory and some are not.

I certainly agree with Senator Frith that there is no precedent in the Senate for moving to the Orders of the Day during routine proceedings in general and, more specifically, during that part of the routine proceeding which is petitions.

It is certainly clear that there has been no ruling in the Senate on whether such a motion is in order, since in all likelihood, as far as I know and as far as anybody here knows, no such motion has previously been made in routine proceedings. Obviously, there is no ruling on it. There are those who would say that because this question has never been ruled upon it is therefore out of order. I, personally, cannot accept that. I think that might be the inclination of some Honorable senators opposite. I cannot accept that because it has never been ruled in order it is therefore out of order. Nor would I maintain that because it has never been ruled out of order it has to be in order. I think that both are equally unacceptable. The question has never been raised so that a decision could be made upon it. There is no precedent in the Senate for this decision.

Senator Hastings: We have heard that.

Senator Ottenheimer: Yes, but I will go on in my own time. I do not intend, each time there is an interruption, to start from the beginning. I have emminent authority for so doing, but I do not intend to emulate it.

Going back to Rule 1, much quoted, sometimes by some much despised and, by others, regarded as an intelligent guide, it states:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliment of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any Committee thereof.

It is quite clear that there is no precedent, that there has been no decision made by the Senate as to whether this motion is or is not in order. It appears to me that we therefore have to go to the Rules of the Senate, specifically Rule 1, which provides for that case.

I do agree with Senator Stewart that we should not follow the House of Commons slavishly, but it appears to me that we should be guided and informed by that house when there are relevant precedents within its jurisprudence and when there are no such precedents in our own jurisprudence. If there were precedents in our own jurisprudence, obviously, that would be a different matter.

Therefore, honorable senators, I will not repeat the references to the Debates of the House of Commons and the rulings of the Speaker in that place to which Senator Doody referred, all of which deal with this matter, because that is already on the record. It appears to me to be quite clear that, since we have no precedents, Rule 1 of the Rules of the Senate makes it obligatory to refer to precedents in the House of Commons, because there are none elsewhere,will show that this motion is in order. It is then up to the presiding officer of this house to decide what, specifically, the precedents in the House of Commons mean and how they apply. I think the procedure is clear because we have no such precedent ourselves.

One could, in an ancillary or a complementary manner, ask oneself: "Would there be anything in the Senate adopting the practice in the House of Commons, finding that this motion is in order, which would be contrary to what are generally understood to be the principles of Canadian parliamentary law and practice?" Bourinot, Fourth Edition, quite clearly identifies what they are. They are there, first, to protect the minority and to restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority. I certainly don't see that there is anything in this which affects that particular principle. They are there, secondly, to secure the transaction of public business in an orderly manner. It would seem to be quite consistent with that. Thirdly, they are there to enable every member to express opinions within limits necessary to preserve decorum and prevent an unnecessary waste of time. There is nothing there to prevent honourable members in the eight amendments, which presumably will be moved in third reading, and in debate which in all likelihood will precede and interconnect and follow these amendments, which will limit members in a way contrary to that principle, giving abundant opportunity for the consideration of every measure, and to prevent any legislative action being taken upon sudden impulse. Well, it appears to me that if we look to these principles of Canadian Parliamentary Practice, as identified by Bourinot, there is certainly nothing inconsistent therewith.

Senator Olson, just to make a brief reference to his submission, said that if this motion were ruled in order and the Senate proceeded to Orders of the Day, there would be a problem created because many Canadians, numerous Canadians, had sent in petitions, and the rights of the petitioners and their views would be short-circuited. Again, I would suggest, there are procedures which provide an opportunity for the filing of petitions with the Clerks. They are in the official possession of the Senate, and to the best of my knowledge there is nothing on debate of Bill C-62 which would interfere with senators associating with the views of people who have written to them, who have petitioned them, with their own views, and commenting on them. I don't see anything that would interfere with that.

Senator MacEachen: How does the senator foresee that possibility being exercised. He says he doesn't see how it could be interfered with, namely, the vast number of petitions that have come forward. Commenting on Senator Olson's argument, Senator Ottenheimer has said, "Well, I don't see how that would be interfered with." Maybe Senator Ottenheimer would explain how these petitions could be brought forward in time to be considered as we go through the legislative process.

Senator Ottenheimer: It is my understanding that there is a procedure whereby petitions may be filed with the Clerk. They are then in the possession of the Senate, and any honourable senator is entitled to peruse them, read them, study them and make notes from them. So they are in the possession of the Senate, and to the extent that petitions deal with the GST, deal with the subjectmatter of C-62, I am sure it would not be beyond the ingenuity of honourable senators opposite, or, indeed, anybody, to put forward their own reasons for their opposition to C-62, their own reasons for amendments and changes to make reference to views of others as expressed, among other things, in petitions. That is something that can certainly be done.

Senator MacEachen: does the honourable senator not think that the other petitions that are still in existence in the thousands should get the same status as the petition presented today by the Deputy Leader of the Government on behalf of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, which was not filed with the Clerk but was read, and which we thought was appropriate? The honourable senator feels this procedure is not appropriate for other citizens, citizens who may not be as close to the government as the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Ottenheimer: My reply to that is that petitions filed by a senator, tabled in the Senate, are available to every senator to examine, peruse and make notes of and can be referred to and incorporated in his or her speech on Bill C-62. In my opinion, the signatories of such petitions would in no way receive less full or adequate attention than anybody who might have signed the petition read by the Honourable Senator Doody, or anybody who might have been referred to in a petition during the fourth-hour reading out of dozens or hundreds of names. I really think it would be at least equally appropriate.

Senator MacEachen: The senator hasn't yet explained why it is possible for the Canadian Manufacturers' Association to have its petition presented under the rubric of petitions, as was done today, as provided for in Rule 19, which Senator Stewart referred to, and other citizens have to find a back door. The senator has suggested a number of back doors, but they can't come in the front door like the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

Senator Ottenheimer: I would disagree with the honourable gentleman in characterizing the procedure that I refer to as a back door. I think it would be very much a front door procedure. A senator comes in through the same door and tables the petition, or whatever the procedure is for filing with the Clerk. It is there for any and all senators to see. I suppose the specific answer would be that not only the petition referred to by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, but the other petitions presented during the past few weeks, were presented before any motion to proceed to the Orders of the Day had been made, and what we are at now, as Senator MacEachen knows, is the question of whether or not this is in order. That, essentially, is my answer to the honourable gentleman.

Let me be brief and then I will certainly recognize the honourable gentleman. I would ask myself, and I would suggest that honourable senators do the same, whether the Senate has the ability to decide the order in which it will decide to proceed with public business? Senator Stewart referred to Rule 19, which provides that at each daily sitting of the Senate, the Speaker shall call for, in the following order, (a) presentation of petitions; (b) reading of petitions; and so on. That is what the Speaker does. The rule does not refer to the question of whether the Senate may determine its own order of business. As honourable senators opposite have frequently said, the Senate is the master of its own business, and that is the order which the Speaker calls if the Senate has made no other determination. But when we ask ourselves whether the Senate has the ability to decide the order in which it will determine public business, I would certainly say, as I have heard honourable senators opposite say on numerous occasions, the Senate is the master of its own procedures.

It would appear to me that every parliamentary body has the right to determine the order in which it will decide public business. It appears to me that that is inherent in a parliamentary body.

I will go so far as to say that if the Senate does not have the ability to decide the order in which it will decide public business, this chamber would be something less than a parliamentary body. I don't know what it would be. It could be a debating society. It could be any number of things, but I don't think it would be a parliamentary body. To put it conversely, if it is a parliamentary body, then in my opinion it must be able to decide its order of business.

So in the final analysis we have a situation which is without precedent in the Senate, because no such motion was made and also because no such point of order was ever raised. So there is no precedent. That does not mean that this motion is automatically out of order, and it does not mean it is automatically in order. It means that this question will have to be decided. I repeat, there being a lack of precedents in this house, Rule 1 is directive. It isn't really optional, it's directive, and if there are no precedents here, then the Chair and the Senate are directed to the House of Commons. That is how I would view the situation.

I think there is obviously a specific point of order before the Chair. I know there have already been a number of submissions, three by honourable senators opposite and two on this side, and no doubt there will be others. Somewhere along the line, the Senate will need a decision from the Chair on this specific point of order.

Senator Stewart: Senator Ottenheimer just now said that the Senate is the master of its own proceedings, and from that he concludes that Rule 19 is of no significance. I should have thought that, starting from the proposition that the Senate is master of its own proceedings, that the Senate, in Rule 19, has laid down, as that rule says, the order of business for each daily sitting. That rule leaves no discretion in the Speaker.

It then says that the Speaker shall call various headings in the following order. What is the status of our rules with regard to proceedings at a sitting? Is Senator Ottenheimer telling us that rule 19 means nothing; that at each sitting the Senate will, as it were, ad hoc decide what the order of the business at that sitting will be? If so, there are no rules here, which some of us have begun to suspect is indeed the case. I should have thought—and I want Senator Ottenheimer to seriously deal with this point—that this house operates on principles, one of which is that we follow the rules of the game as set down by the Senate itself. If I am wrong, Senator Ottenheimer, please explain how a rule of law has become a rule of the jungle.

Senator Ottenheimer: I think the honourable senator has put the situation dramatically, but rule 19 says:

> At each daily sitting of the Senate, the Speaker shall call for, in the following order:

Then it lists the routine proceedings. I maintain that that is the instruction of the Senate to the Speaker. Coexisting with that is the principle that a parliamentary body may itself decide the order in which it will proceed with public business.

Senator Stewart: Why do we ask for leave then? Why do we ask for unanimous consent to waive our rules from time to time?

Senator Ottenheimer: If it decides to so do, that takes precedence.

Another way of answering your question would be, yes, rule 19 is there and, on the face of it, is clear. Rule 46(e), which says that no notice is required for reading the Orders of the Day, is equally clear. This is not the first time in speaking to differences of interpretation or in speaking to a point of order that, in the final analysis, there has to be a reconciliation of certain rules, orders or laws. Other principles are equally evident; and, since we have no precedent in the Senate for reconciling these viewpoints or submissions, rule 1 is the arrow that indicates our direction. There are no precedents here, and the only other reference we have is the relevant practice in the House of Commons, or at least that is my submission.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Ottenheimer, let me approach the "Ottenheimer rule" a different way. In effect, you suggested that we take what I consider to be the basic premise of the house, the Orders of the Day, which is to deal with certain public business, and say that the majority can decide to collapse the Orders of the Day. Take your position to its logical conclusion. You would have us file petitions, reports of committees, notices of inquiries, notices of motion, questions, orders of the day, inquiries, motions and adjourn. There would be no reason for us to be present. We could just file and adjourn.

The premise of the rule respecting the Orders of the Day is not a simple practice or transitory procedure. Each of the subsections under the Orders of the Day is based on long, historic traditions. These Orders did not come about by accident. They were not drafted at a rules meeting several weeks ago. To say that there is no precedent for the Orders of the Day is to take the constitution books of England and set them aside.

Let us deal with petitions, the first Order of the Day. The word "parler", to talk, comes from the premise and principle of petitions. The essence of Parliament evolved from the right of a citizen to petition. If you look at the history books on petitions, they show individuals or groups of individuals laying down a petition before the Monarch, which was subsequently transformed into relief or law.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate is shaking his head. I will give you a historic precedent, which is in every book I have ever read about the origins of Parliament. I will read a precedent which is a reference to the foundations of Parliament. The book is entitled Constitution and Legal History of England, which was written in 1942 by M.M. Knappen. The same principle finds itself in Erskine May and in every other book or constitutional history. Let me read you a paragraph or two.

> The second advance was the winning of the right to petition the king as a body for redress of grievances, a right from which later legislative powers sprang.

It goes on to say:

> . . . petitions were thus very important, and the special name of Parliament was first given to those held for such purposes. Originally "colloquium", or "parliament" (talkfest, from the French parler, to speak), was considered merely another name for "council", and the technical significance of the term as applied to special sessions of this body developed but slowly.

Each book on constitutional history deals with exactly the same point. Petitions are an architectonic of Parliament. Presentation of Petitions is not a transitory precedent or practice. It is a fundamental rule.

I do not know precisely how "Ottenheimer's law" would apply here. Would it tell me not to show up in the chamber, but merely send in my thoughs by letter, which would be filed by the Clerk. We would only need a quorum of 15 Conservative senators to sit while these papers were being filed. We could then go home. It might even be done by fax—Parliament by fax.

Senator Ottenheimer, I have a petition from the Mayor of the City of Toronto that I wanted to read. The letter is dated yesterday, and he has asked me to bring this petition forward. For me to be refused that opportunity, while, as Senator MacEachen said, the Manufacturer's Association was able, on this day, to have its petition read, is unreasonable, unparliamentary and unfair. I urge the honourable senator to consider the purport of the precedent he is suggesting, which is to vitiate the foundation of our necessity to be present in this place.

Senator Stollery: I also have a question for Senator Ottenheimer. He seems to have persuaded himself that there is no precedent for all of this; we can dismiss rule 19. In an obscure way I cannot follow he has somehow decided that, because his team is having problems dealing with parliamentary procedure—that is the underlying difficulty Senator Ottenheimer has—we should dismiss the order of business and, in some obscure way, follow rule 1.

In Erskine May I see that the order of business in rule 19 is precisely that which has been followed for hundreds of years in Parliament. What do I see? Presentation of public petitions. I will not bore you with the definition of petitions, but I see it right here. It is the same order of business that we have in rule 19. It is an ancient practice. I would like to ask Senator Ottenheimer how he arrived at the conclusion that this rule of business, which is hundreds of years old, is either without precedent or can in some way be disposed of by the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Ottenheimer: I spoke once. I do not want to inflict my views on honourable senators again. They are on the record, and obviously I encourage Senator Stollery to do the same. This is not the first time he has disagreed with me, and I am sure it will not be the last.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: I have another question for the honourable senator. Personally, I am not a great expert in the rules—

Senator Murray: Indeed! Your conduct on the Banking committee proves that! A puppet is what you were as chairman.

Senator Hastings: He was a good chairman!

Senator Murray: He was a puppet!

Senator Hastings: He was a good chairman—a hell of a lot better than you.

Senator Murray: That is not true. I was a good chairman.

Senator Buckwold: That is better than being a Charlie McCarthy to the Prime Minister, that is for sure. In my office I have literally hundreds of petitions; and the honourable senator, in his discussion, has seen fit to recommend that these not be heard. You can dump them somewhere, but not hear them. I looked at the way the official petition to the Senate is worded, and I would like to read it into the record.

> To the Honourable Senate of Canada:
> The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable house will therefore provide a remedy.

Those words have been printed on every official petition that has been received by the Senate for, I presume, dozens of centuries, and again, I would presume that the wording of those petitions was taken from something that had been prepared hundreds of years ago. I say that the common grievances of the petitioners are being presented in the certain assurance ".... that your honourable house will therefore provide a remedy."

● (2045)

Added to that, then, as a recipient personally of hundreds of petitions, I am very often asked what assurance can I give that these petitions, which have been gathered across the country—sometimes with some difficulty and trouble in reaching out to all the people who wish to sign them—have been presented to the Senate, and that I just haven't piled them in a box somewhere, which is what I gather Senator Ottenheimer is suggesting. These people are requesting of me—and I gather of others who have received petitions—that their word be heard, and they want the assurance that we have, in fact, done our duty and presented them to the Senate.

To the honourable senator, then, my question is: How do you relate or reconcile that aim with the type of suggestions that you have made?

Senator Ottenheimer: I think I have answered that question, maybe not to the honourable senator's satisfaction, but I did answer previously. My views are therefore on record, and I am not a proponent of repetition ad nauseam. The honourable gentleman knows my views. He does not have to agree with them.

Senator Buckwold: It seems to me that you just cannot wait to get out of the chamber. You are practically at the door already. Can you not take, perhaps, two minutes and try to explain to me a little bit why you say that I can respond in that fashion to the people who ask me, "Have you presented these petitions to your honourable colleagues in the Senate?" They ask me that in order to be sure that I have not just received the petitions and thrown them in the waste basket, as perhaps Senator Murray does. However, I think I am entitled to a response, rather than a Ben Johnson dash to the door. Let us hear from you.

Senator Ottenheimer: I thank the honourable senator if he is comparing me to Ben Johnson.

But you have heard my views and they are on the record. I know some honourable senators feel that repeating and repeating is conducive to, perhaps clarity or precision of thought. But I think it must be boring for people who have to listen to it. I know I find it boring to repeat myself. Therefore I do not wish to inflict the boredom on myself, quite apart from others—and I am no Ben Johnson, I assure you.

An Hon. Senator: Where are you going?

An Hon. Senator: To the men's room.

Senator Kirby: Honourable senators, I rise very briefly to make just a very few remarks on the point of order which is being debated; the point of order raised by Senator Frith in connection with Senator Doody's motion. I do so, not with a great deal of familiarity with rising to speak on technical issues facing the Senate, because there are far more people on both sides of this chamber who have had more experience with the rules than I have. I do so because I suspect that, if truth be told, there are many people in this chamber, on both sides of this aisle who are deeply troubled by what has gone on today.

I say that because we are being cut off from reading such petitions the day after we have seen a well-publicized national public opinion poll which makes it very clear that Canadians believe that their institutions are failing them; that Canadians believe their views no longer count; that Canadians believe they are isolated and, indeed, alienated from the national government. To have members on this side of the house told that it is wrong for us to read into the record the names of people who have signed petitions and sent them to us; that it is wrong for us to take petitions which were sent to us by ordinary Canadian citizens. These are not petitions which we went out and sought, nor petitions signed by people on our payroll, as was the case with the petition that Senator Doody tabled. These are petitions sent to us by people who clearly have a deep and serious concern with Bill C-62—to be told this is wrong is ludicrous.

Yet, when people go to the trouble of doing this and doing it in numbers that far exceed anything that I have seen in my more than 20 years in government and in politics, to be then told by Senator Doody and members opposite that, in effect, they have no interest in allowing us to put on the record in this chamber what Canadians think about Bill C-62. This, at a time when we already understand that the institutions in this country are seen by more and more Canadians to be failing them, is in fact a very sad comment on the complete lack of understanding and appreciation of the feelings of Canadians on the part of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I say to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that it is clear that what we are seeing here in this chamber tonight is a strategy which in fact the leader tried to put in place a couple of weeks ago but failed, and which in fact he is trying again tonight. I will make some comments on that strategy in a minute, since it focuses directly on the issue of whether or not we should be allowed to continue to present our petitions.

Before doing that however, I cannot resist making the observation that, in proceeding in the way Senator Doody did, and no doubt following the instructions of Senator Murray—I have seldom in my 20 years in government and in politics seen such a truly amateur performance. It is absolutely unbelievable, when you think about it, that the only people the government could find, the only three Canadians they could find to sign a petition against the GST were three people who are on Senator Murray's payroll.

I understand the enormous difficulty the government might have in finding three Canadians to do that. I understand that it would have taken a long time for them to do so. But one would have thought, in the interests of at least a modest degree of professionalism, that Senator Murray, as a cabinet minister and as the manager of a group of government forces, might have proceeded with some degree of decorum.

I was reminded of the time—I think it was on December 13th, 1979—when Senator Murray was involved in a fairly amateur performance for which many of us—indeed, I think all of us—on this side of the house will be forever grateful to him. It was on that day that his inability to count lead to the collapse of the Conservative government of Prime Minister Clark.

That is the same kind of amateur performance we saw again tonight, and I must say that we may learn to think of it as a good thing.

However the people of Canada will not think of it as a good thing, and that is what truly troubles me. The message going out of here tonight will be a message that, once more, the views of the average Canadian do not matter; that once more the rules, which make it very clear, even to a non-lawyer like myself, that senators are allowed, whether we are on this side of the aisle or the other, to present petitions which are sent to us. These are petitions, might I say, that which express the views of the average Canadian; petitions which, as I have said repeatedly, we ourselves did not formulate, unlike the petitions which Senator Doody tabled. This is something that the rules now allow us to do. However, we are now being told in effect that these rules are subject to change by the majority whenever they want and whenever they feel like it.

The reason I say that is because the entire strategy on the government's part with respect to this issue has been very simple. The strategy has been, number one, to ensure that Senator Doody had the floor and had a chance to speak, and it was arranged that the Speaker would recognize him.

The second step was to introduce a motion that members opposite, including Senator Murray, knew well was out of order. However, they do not really care whether it is out of order, because their strategy is to ultimately have the Speaker rule on the point of order that Senator Frith raised. Then, if the Speaker supports us, members opposite will simply call a vote in an attempt to overturn the Speaker's ruling, knowing that they have the largest number of members. Therefore, in effect, what they will do is change the rules arbitrarily to ensure that at no point will we get back on petitions.

Frankly, and I say this to Senator Murray quite honestly—none of us were surprised at what you did, but that you did it after only one person had read petitions. Most of us had thought, obviously incorrectly, that you would have exercised somewhat more discretion, somewhat more judgement, somewhat more patience, recognizing that the petitions existed and that we on this side had clearly committed ourselves, in the provisional rules, to getting to debate on third reading on Bill C-62. We had clearly accepted that principle; it is written into the rules. Therefore we thought—clearly unwisely—that you would have shown some modicum of patience and allowed some petitions to be read, rather than moving as precipitously as you did.

I must say, over the dinner break it occurred to me that we were clearly wrong to have assumed that. I realize that we should have seen what Senator Murray was doing, because I recall those two weeks in June when Senator Murray was on the national television news night after night. Each time Elijah Harper managed to delay proceedings in the Manitoba Legislature, there was Senator Murray on television, saying to the legislators in Manitoba and to the Government of Manitoba, "Ignore Elijah Harper's rights. Change the rules. Don't follow your own rules. Don't have public hearings. Don't have the hearings that your rules call for. Cut him off. The rules don't matter. What matters is that I get my way." That was essentially Senator Murray's position in June, and it is once again an example of his position here today. At least he is consistent—consistently wrong.

I suppose some of us thought that, given the disastrous effects which his performance had had on the Meech Lake issue, he might have learned at least some modicum of patience over the last six months and might have, in fact, allowed the debate to proceed in an orderly fashion.

● (2100)

Clearly, that did not happen. Clearly, we are in a situation now, however, in which, regardless of which way the Speaker rules, Senator Murray would use his majority to ultimately move the debate along rapidly. What we have just witnessed and what we will see in newspaper coverage and in radio phone-in shows and in other means of public feedback across the country are more editorials along the line of the one in the Toronto Star on October 6th, headlined, "An Abuse of Power", and concluding with the following lines: "The Parliamentary Rule Book allows ample room for skilful manoeuvres by all members. They can be frustrating at times, but take away the rules and laws, we'll have no moral authority at all." And it seems to me that what we have witnessed here tonight and what we are going to see across this country, as Senator Murray proceeds with his tactics day after day, will be a situation where more and more Canadians will wind up thinking of this government as a government that abuses power; that will wind up thinking of this government as a government that has no interest in what people say. That is exactly why they are not allowing petitions to be tabled. That is a government that doesn't recognize that, however frustrating democracy may be, one has to tolerate that frustration if one is going to preserve democratic institutions. The public will think, as the editorial says, that the laws that are passed under this government, including C-62, if whenever it gets to the point where we have a final vote on the third reading, that in fact that law as the editorial says, will have no moral authority at all. It seems to me, honourable senators, that the troubling issue for people on this side of the House, and on the other side of the house ought to be what is happening to the institutions of this country. We have witnessed a massive abuse ofpower by this government. A situation is developing in which the views of individual Canadians are simply to be ignored.

It is for that reason—not for reasons that are detailed and relate to the specific numerical sections of various parts of the Senate rules, although reading the rules it appears crystal clear to me that in fact the motion of Senator Doody is out of order—it is for that reason, it seems to me, that we are in serious danger of furthering the alienation that the people of this country feel towards our institutions, and, in particular, towards this government. It is for that reason that I think it is extremely important we support Senator Frith's position, that we support his point of order, and that in fact we ultimately end up with Senator Doody's motion ruled out of order. Thank you.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, in a word, the honourable senator who has just resumed his seat insists on the right of honourable senators in the Opposition to read petitions, to read the names of petitioners endlessly and without limit in this place, and he alleges that it is an abuse of the government's power for us to insist at any point that the Senate ought to move off of petitions and onto the agenda, that is before the Senate. That is really the nub of the speech that he has just made. I just want to ask, rhetorically, if I may, how many hundreds of hours, how many hundreds of hours in the past month or so have we spent listening to petitions from honourable senators opposite? Not petitions presented in the normal way as in this and other houses, but petitions presented name by name by name by name, and we were told today by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, Senator Frith, he gave us the figures, he said, "We have done 2,000 in 28 days and we have 48,000 to go." I suggest to the honourable senator that it is utterly mindless, irrational, and irresponsible of him to suggest such a thing. That is not the purpose of Parliament regardless of what he or Senator Grafstein may say. The idea that honourable senators can tie up one of the Houses of Parliament indefinitely, which he defends, paralyses the business of Parliament and the Senate. That the government should have no recourse, that the majority should have no recourse to move the Senate off of petitions and onto the orders of the day is absolutely mindless and irresponsible, and he knows it.

Senator Kirby: Honourable senators, since I believe that Senator Murray directed that question to me, I would like to correct him on a key point that he made. I said in my remarks—and indeed the Provisional Rules and the House Order which members on this side agreed to, ten days ago, were crystal clear, because after all they talked about the eight amendments that would be debated, they talked about a limited length of time for those amendments and about periods of time during which votes could be taken. I said in my remarks that we were absolutely clear from those Provisional Rules and the House Order that it was crystal clear that we did not contemplate—to use your words a minute ago—an infinite extension of the thing; we contemplated that those rules constituted a situation in which debate on third reading and on amendments and indeed ultimately on the bill itself would take place. Therefore, it is clearly false for you to say what you said, because in fact I said the exact opposite, I don't mind if you want to twist my words, but don't turn them around 180 degrees. The fact of the matter is that what we saw here today was your unbelievable intolerance for anybody that ever disagrees with you. That is what we saw.

Senator Murray: We heard 2,000 petitions in 28 days and we have been told by Senator Frith that there are 48,000 to go. That is where we are.

Senator Kirby: There have not been 28 sitting days on this bill. They may be weekdays, but I think if you go back and have a look see, there are not 28 sitting days.

Senator Murray: Count them up. How many hundreds of hours have we spent sitting here doing nothing but listening to petitions name by name by name.

Senator Kirby: Millions of Canadians send us their names. That is not our fault.

Senator Murray: This is not the business of Parliament to sit hundreds of hours doing nothing but listening to names right out of the telephone book.

Senator Kirby: Canadians want to send us their names and all you can do is find 3 flunkies to sign yours. That is not our fault.

Senator Murray: This is an abuse of Parliament. This is a prostitution of Parliament to behave the way you have been behaving with these petitions. Two thousand done, two thousand done over how many hundreds of hours and 48,000 to go. That is what Senator Frith said, 48,000 to go. That is what he promised us, and yes, we did come to an agreement, and yes, sir, we now have provisional rules, and yes, sir, we have a House order on legislation. We did all that some days ago, and where are we today? We are right back where we were when the Speaker summoned Senator MacEachen and me to his office to try to get out of this mindless situation in which we are in with honourable senators reading the telephone book and the Bible and everything else into the record. We are back to where we were.

Senator Kirby: Senator Murray is using ridiculous examples. The fact is nobody read the telephone book. Nor did we go looking for all those petitions. Those petitions came to us for a very simple reason. Canadians think that this is the worse piece of public legislation they have seen in the entire period of anybody in this House. That is your problem, not my problem.

Senator Hastings: Wait, wait, wait.

Senator Grafstein: This is a question not privileged, but just as a point of information. I have a short letter that I would like to read, just a short letter in response to the leader of the government who apparently referred to my name in my absence. I just want to read a brief two-paragraph letter to him that deals with his comments on the nature of petitions, because in my view, these petitions are timely.

Senator Barootes: You are out of order.

Senator Grafstein: You might be interested, Senator. It is just two short paragraphs. It is a letter dated October 29, 1990, and it has a seal, the seal is the City of Toronto. It says:

> I hereby petition you to inform the Senate that on October the 22nd and October the 23rd—which is the past few days—Toronto City Council took the enclosed actions regarding the proposed Federal Government's Goods and Services Tax.

The City of Toronto Council, which includes NDP members, Liberal members and Conservative members, passed a resolution respecting the GST. The letter goes on:

> I also petition you to inform the Senate on behalf of the City of Toronto of the other enclosed documentation regarding the City of Toronto's position on the GST.

This is not, with all due respect, mindless names from a telephone book. This is the Mayor of the City of Toronto requesting that we bring this resolution forward to the Senate, that we bring this petition forward to inform all senators, many of whom are sitting in this place, who represent the province of Ontario and come from the Toronto region. Now, surely this is not a mindless gesture on behalf of the City of Toronto.

Senator Barootes: It is stupid, not mindless.

Senator Grafstein: In addition to that, the Mayor of Elston, Saskatchewan, joined in a press conference with the Mayor of the City of Toronto today, together with the Mayor of Dartmouth. So 4,000 letters were sent to mayors across the country today asking their particular views on this issue. I was requested to bring those results, if there are any, forward to this chamber. Now, I don't consider that to mindless names from a telephone book. I consider that to be responsible public officials who are seeking, I think in a very formal fashion, to bring their concerns, and the concerns of their cities and the City of Toronto, to the attention of the Senate. Now I only raise that—-

Senator Murray: 47,999 to go.

Senator Grafstein: This resolution represents—I am not sure what the population is, under a million people.

Senator Murray: Senator Frith says you have 48,000 to go, 48,000 petitions.

Senator Grafstein: Today, we received a petition from the Canadian Manufacturers Association. Enclosed in this petition and capsulated in this resolution are representations from practically every sector of the working community in the City of Toronto. I would like an opportunity at the appropriate time to be able to bring the details of their concerns to the attention of the senators. And I just say to the leader of the Government of the Senate that this is not a partisan gesture; this not a partisan brief.

Senator Barootes: Don't insult our intelligence.

Senator Grafstein: Talk to the Conservative members, talk to the Conservative members on the Council of the City of Toronto who are well known to members opposite and ask them whether or not they were inspired by partisan motivation to support the city's resolution; or was it inspired because those members were receiving tremendous pressure from the voters to do something about the GST, and the only thing they could think of doing was pass a resolution and bring it forward to this place. Now, I don't consider that to be a partisan measure at all.

Senator Barootes: Wait for the other 48,000.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I would like to say at the outset that I am disappointed to hear Senator Murray refer to the names that we list on petitions as simply reading the telephone book. I think he is insulting those Canadians who have voluntarily signed these petitions. He may not like to hear it, but I think it may be an example of how out of touch he is and how out of touch his government may be in terms of what is going on in Canada. The people who signed those petitions are real, live Canadians and they signed them on their own. These signatures are not taken from lists in the telephone books, as Senator Murray has described them. If he wants to characterize Canadians who signed petitions as having been taken from lists in telephone books, that is fine, but—

• (2115)

Senator Murray: There are 48,000 of them. How many more are there to go?

Senator Molgat: Senator Murray is refusing to listen to what is going on in this country. He is refusing to listen to what Canadians are desperately trying to tell him: that they do not want this tax.

However, let us come back to the point of order. My original intention was to discuss this point of order on the basis of the rules. However, that has been done to a considerable extent. I gather that we may be on this point of order for some time and I will be able to come back at a later time in the debate to the specific rules. I am rather tempted, though, after listening to Senator Ottenheimer, who appealed to us to deal with this on an empirical basis, to deal with that aspect of it, and to start off with what happened this afternoon.

I think that Senator Doody had a very good point—and, by the way, I regret that he is not here. He is a delightful individual with a great sense of humour. I think he exhibited his sense of humour this afternoon in a marvellous Newfoundlandish way. Those people really have the best sense of humour of all Canadians.

Let me go over what happened this afternoon. When we came to the moment when His Honour called for the doors to be opened and we were ready to proceed—

Senator Barootes: To start the filibuster again, you mean.

Senator Molgat: No, no.

Senator Hastings: When?

Senator Molgat: No, Senator Barootes; you may think that, but what happened was that Senator Hébert got up first to proceed with petitions—

Senator Murray: He got up to filibuster.

Senator Molgat: —petitions being the first item of business. In fairness—

Senator Barootes: When before September did senators opposite ever read the names on the petitions?

Senator Molgat: But, Senator Barootes, we have been through this discussion at least six times. It is perfectly proper to read the names on a petition. You may not like it, Senator Barootes. I regret that so many of your Saskatchewan residents are writing to tell us that the tax you want to impose on them is no good. It is too bad that you do not like that and I appreciate that. What I am telling you is what your Saskatchewan residents are telling us.

However, honourable senators, let us go on. Senator Hébert spoke. I might mention that we have always in the past conducted business so that there would be a speaker from one side and then a speaker from the other side. I think that is a perfectly proper practice that we have to continue. I think we have to have those kinds of easy relationships.

Senator Doody then rose to his feet, and I will admit that there was a bit of a ruckus at that point. There was the assumption that Senator Doody was going to do something else, which was to move a motion which, in our view, was out of order. Senator Doody said, "No, I want to table some documents," which is perfectly in order. If senators look at what our rules say in that regard, they will see that documents are tabled by the Leader of the Government or by a senator on his behalf. No debate is allowed at that stage except with the consent of the Senate, but a brief explanation may be given of any document. In fairness, then, Senator Doody had every right to table those documents. Perhaps he should have been allowed to do that first. I do not deny that it was perfectly proper. But the next item then states—

Senator Barootes: Senator Hébert was out of order, then, was he?

Senator Molgat: No, I think we were on petitions and anyone could present petitions. If Senator Doody had indicated that he wanted to table documents, I think we should have been prepared to do that. When he did indicate that, we said, "Yes, if you want to table documents, go ahead. That is in order."

The next item of business is such that a senator may present petitions entrusted to him. So what happened? Well, Senator Doody got up and did indeed table a couple of documents, but there is where his Newfoundland sense of humour—really, his con-artist operation—came into effect. What did he do? He tried to bootleg in a motion. That is exactly what he did.

Senator Ottenheimer asks for empirical evidence. There it is, precisely. Senator Doody got up and said that he wanted to present a petition. What petition did he have? Honourable senators, this is typical Newfoundland humour. There were three names on that petition—three names from Senator Murray's office. I think perhaps one could claim that that was done under duress. Has Senator Murray thought that this was perhaps done under duress? Perhaps he could be arraigned on the basis of duress placed upon his staff. He imposed upon his staff the obligation to sign a piece of paper that Senator Doody could present in this house. When you think of it, this is empirical evidence. What a great piece of humour on the part of Senator Doody. It is too bad he is not here to appreciate how much we have all enjoyed it.

Then, of course, his other document was one put together by that great group of populists, the people who are really out to protect the Canadian public, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. On that point, I wonder whether Senator Doody checked rule 52, which states that a petition should not be received from a corporation unless it is duly authenticated and under the seal of such corporation. I wonder whether Senator Doody verified that indeed it was authenticated and under the seal of the corporation. Perhaps it was a faxed document. If it were—

An Hon. Senator: The Manufacturers' Association is not incorporated.

Senator Molgat: It is not an incorporated body? I am sorry. I am sure that senators across the way know more about this than I do. Whatever senators opposite tell me about the Canadian Manufactures' Association I will readily believe.

Senator Barootes: Go on to the next point. Try another one.

Senator Molgat: Obviously, then, it is not necessary to have the seal of the corporation. However, I want to come back to Senator Ottenheimer's request that there be empirical evidence. If there is any clear evidence, it is that Senator Doody was being facetious in what he was doing. He was presenting bogus petitions. He presented a cooked-up petition from Senator Murray's office and another cooked-up document, and for what purpose? It was to smuggle in, against the rules, a motion. I ask honourable senators this: If Senator Doody were really convinced that his motion was sound under the rules, why did he need to try to bootleg it in behind two phoney petitions? Senator Doody knew himself that what he was trying to do was not according to the rules. Why would he go through that subterfuge otherwise? It makes absolutely no sense.

If Senator Ottenheimer is asking for empirical evidence, I think Senator Doody gave it to us this afternoon. Obviously, in his own mind, the motion that he was proposing did not stand on its own right.

Senator Barootes: That is not empirical—that is inferential.

Senator Hastings: What is that?

Senator Molgat: Why, then, didn't Senator Doody get up and move the motion? Why did he start off by reading two petitions and then, sotto voce—in fact, my hearing is so poor that I did not hear him at that point—proceed to smuggle in a motion? He had no trust. He did not believe in himself.

Senator Lucier: He could not keep himself from laughing.

Senator Molgat: That is the basis on which that motion was introduced.

Be that as it may, honourable senators, this being a point of order, the Speaker will have to rule at some point. I do not know when, but at some point he will have to rule on the point of order. All I can say in that respect is that we know that the Speaker of this house is a partisan appointment. I think it is important, however, for the sake of this house, for the sake of the Senate and for the sake of the whole of the parliamentary system that, once the Speaker is appointed to this place, he rise above partisan considerations. I submit that rulings must be based on the Rules of the Senate, on the precedent of the Senate and on how we have run this establishment in the past.

Senator Balfour: Yes, subject to appeal.

Senator Molgat: When I was in the Chair, my ruling was overruled by the people on my side of the chamber. I can assure senators that, if I were ever in the Chair again and the same thing happened, I would rule according to the rules. No one is ever happy to be overruled on a ruling, but my ruling would be based on precedent and what has gone on in this house.

I have to ask that, whenever the ruling is given on this point of order, it be based not on partisan considerations, not on what goes on in the House of Commons, but on what goes on in the Senate. That must be the basis of the ruling. If we do not do it that way, we are harming this house immensely for now and for the future.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators—

Senator Buckwold: Here is another country to be heard from.

Senator Phillips: My honourable friend says, "Here is another country to be heard from." That may be true, but I make no apologies for my country. He may belittle it if he likes, but I am quite proud of it.

Honourable senators, lately we have developed a concept in the Senate that petitions are the ultimate, that everyone has a right to present a petition, have it read, and develop, thereby, the paralysis of Parliament.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Last week Parliament was not paralysed. We passed four bills last week.

Senator Phillips: When Senator MacEachen was Deputy Prime Minister, this place would be given about four hours to pass a bill. When he sent a bill over, we had a four-hour deadline on it. He should not talk to me about paralysis of Parliament.

Senator MacEachen: That is fiction.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, we have gone back to the Medieval idea of presenting petitions. I would like to remind the Senate that after the remains of the unknown warrior were interred in Westminster Abbey, a newspaper man on a bet went out with a petition asking for the Government of the United Kingdom to grant a pension to the widow of the unknown soldier.

• (2130)

No one knew the name of the unknown soldier, no one knew whether he had a widow or not, but this individual collected over a million names on that petition. Now, we have had similar ideas here. If you want to collect petitions, I could go out, and in a period of three weeks, get 15 million signatures asking for the resignation of all you senators over there. Are you going to pay attention to that? Are you going to have every one of those names read? Are you going to resign as a result of that petition? No, not one of you is going to resign. And then we have developed a paralysis of power, a paralysis as a result of these petitions.

Now, I have here in my hand, honourable senators, one of the petitions. I don't know who presented it, who read the names into the record, but it's marked page 26, page 26, page 27, and it comes from Peterborough, Ontario. I was rather intrigued to see names from places like Lloydminster, and then I go down the page a bit further, and I see one marked, "John Eaves, 2929 Linden, Oniontown, Ohio". And then the man's American postal code follows.

The next page is even more interesting. We have here a petitioner, Elaine E. Bambly, from 23184 Oakwood East, Detroit, Michigan, and she puts on an American postal code. In the meantime, you fellows over there are squawking about free trade. My God, it didn't stop you from going to get names from the United States, did it? I would have thought you would be ashamed to come in here with all these American names after all you have had to say about free trade, but, no, you insist on tying up the business of Canada with petitions from American citizens.

Honourable senators, we have also heard recently a great deal about an elected speaker in this chamber. I would just like to refer you to some remarks of Mr. Speaker Fraser. And of course I do not have to remind you that Mr. Speaker Fraser is elected. He says the House is nevertheless facing an impasse which it has been unable to resolve for itself. There comes a time when a Chair has to face its responsibilities. When circumstances change and the rules of procedure provide no solution, the Chair must fall back on its discretions in the interests of the House and all its members. And with the greatest of respect for the Chair—I always have respect for the Chair, I would suggest, honourable senators, that in this case the Chair has to take into consideration the necessity of proceeding with the business of this legislature, of this chamber, of this nation.

Therefore, I would again, with the greatest of respect, sir, ask you to give a ruling on the point of order.

Senator Stewart: Will the honourable senator permit a question? No. Senator Phillips, may I make a suggestion then? I have here a copy of the petition presented by Senator Doody from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and a copy of the petition presented to the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled signed by Adele Desjardins, Greg MacDougall and Peter G. Webber.

Will Senator Phillips agree to have these two petitions appended to the Hansard of this day and reproduced in the Minutes of Proceedings so as to be a permanent part of record of this place. These are memorable petitions; they deserve that kind of special treatment.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, inasmuch as a point of order has been raised by Senator Frith and inasmuch as I believe that we on this side have concluded our comments, I would not like it to be left on the record that the Speaker rules at the request of the Whip of the Conservative party. That is a bit too much to take in this atmosphere.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we will suspend the sitting for about ten minutes, and I shall be back with a ruling.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed at 9:45 p.m.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have been asked to rule upon a point of order raised by Senator Frith.

[Senator Phillips.]

Earlier today, a point of order was raised that the motion to proceed to the reading of the Orders of the Day can only be moved when a question is under debate and not when the item "Presentation of Petitions" has been called. In Beauchesne, Fifth Edition, citation 417(2)(b) states:

> Superseding motions, though independent in form, are moved in the course of debate on questions which they seek to set aside. They may only be moved when a question is under debate, and cannot be moved by a Member rising on a point of order.

This citation has been the object of some controversy, not only in the Senate but in the other place as well. The Annotated Standing Orders of the House of Commons states the following on page 201, with respect to Standing Order 59, which reads:

> A motion for reading the Orders of the Day shall have preference to any motion before the House.

I continue quoting:

> This Standing Order, derived from an earlier British rule, has been used frequently throughout successive Parliaments, and although its wording has not changed since Confederation, it has been the object of several interpretations. The most consistent issue raised in regard to the motion this Standing Order allows has been whether it may be moved at any time (before Orders of the Day), or whether it can be moved only when debate on another motion is currently underway.
> Precedents vary. In 1956, the Speaker ruled out of order a motion to proceed to the Orders of the Day on grounds that there must be a motion before the House before this second motion can be entertained; a similar ruling was rendered ten years later. In 1970, the Speaker accepted the motion moved during Question Period, and in 1983, the motion moved during Routine Proceedings under "Petitions" was similarly accepted. In February 1987, the Speaker put the question on the motion moved at the commencement of the sitting. The following day, a Member's right to move such a motion when there was nothing before the House was the object of a point of order. The weight of recent precedents favours the admissibility of motions to proceed to the Orders of the Day, if moved before Orders of the Day, whether or not debate on another motion is currently in progress.

It should be noted that the Senate does not have a rule equivalent to Standing Order 59 of the House of Commons. A motion for reading the Orders of the Day is permitted in the Senate, however, pursuant to Rule 46(e), which states that such a motion may be moved without notice. If this motion could only be moved when a question is under debate, the effect would be that the motion becomes, for all practical purposes, non-operational, since no motion is normally moved under the items which precede the Orders of the Day, specifically "Presentation of Petitions", "Reading of Petitions", "Reports of Committees", "Notices of Inquiries", "Notices of Motions", and "Question Period". It is not the opinion of the Chair that the Senate would want as part of its procedures and practices a motion which can never be moved.

It seems that a motion for reading the Orders of the Day, therefore, is in order if moved under the item "Presentation of Petitions" and whether or not debate on another motion is proceeding. The Chair therefore rules against the point of order.

SPEAKER'S RULING APPEALED

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I appeal the ruling.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to our provisional rules, rule P-3(c) says:

Therefore, the bells will ring at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, and the vote will be taken at 10:30. In the meantime, the sitting of the Senate is suspended.

At 10 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was suspended until Wednesday, October 31, at 10 a.m.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the appeal of my ruling is lost. Let the doors be opened.

THE HONOURABLE PAT CARNEY

ALLEGED INSULT TO ITALIAN COMMUNITY—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. Last week during Question Period I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he could find out from Senator Carney whether the interview with Mr. Schneider took place in which the Italian community was denigrated, in what context Senator Carney mentioned the words "Italian community," and in what context she mentioned the words "Parliamentary bathrooms."

● (1040)

I have not yet received an answer. I would like you to put this matter to bed once and for all, and until I receive satisfaction I will keep on raising it.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with great respect, I did not undertake to obtain for my honourable friend an answer. First, what I said, and I think the record will bear this out, is that this is not a matter that comes within my ministerial responsibility; and secondly, that my honourable friend had brought up this matter, or a related matter, some time ago; that Senator Carney, on her responsibility as a member of this place, had made a statement which we accepted, obviously, and that there the matter rested. If he has another quarrel to pick with Senator Carney, then it is his business and hers, but it is not a matter that can be raised, it seems to me, during the oral Question Period, as it is not a matter within my ministerial responsibility.

Senator Bosa: This is not the Question Period. I rose on a question of privilege. I know that the honourable leader cannot answer that question, but I am constrained by the Rules of the Senate. I can only put a question to the honourable gentleman, and not to a member of this chamber. I know that we have not been receiving the Hansard reports on a regular basis, and perhaps the Honourable Senator Carney might not have read the intervention I made last week. I am making it to you verbally. She is within hearing distance and could stand up and say: "Yes, the interview took place." I have raised these two questions in this context. Or she could say: "No, the interview did not take place," in which case I will consider other measures with Mark Shneider.

Senator Murray: Honourable senator, let us leave it at that for the moment. I will examine the record to see whether I have left undone anything that I should have done, and Senator Carney can examine the record to see whether there is something further she may wish to say on the matter.

Senator Bosa: It is a very simple answer that the Honourable Senator Carney could give me. She could say, "Yes, the interview took place and I mentioned the expression 'Italian community and parliamentary bathrooms' in this context." Or she could say: "No, the interview did not take place," in which case I will go after someone else.

I am not going to let this matter die until the Italian community has received an apology for the insult given on that occasion.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, once again, I suggest that my honourable friend give both Senator Carney and me an opportunity to examine the record.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO CALL ORDERS OF THE DAY—DEBATE SUSPENDED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by Senator Doody, seconded by Senator Ottenheimer, that the Orders of the Day be now called. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: Let us hear some debate on this question.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will be very brief, because I think the importance of this motion and its purpose does not require much elaboration from this side.

On numerous occasions in the past month or so we have been reminded that the practice of presenting and receiving petitions in Parliament, and the right to send petitions to Parliament, is an ancient and honourable practice and right.

Senator Olson: It is not honourable anymore.

Senator Murray: I am coming to that.

Senator Frith: It is not being honoured.

Senator Haidasz: You want to dishonour it.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, anyone who examines the voluminous Hansard of the past month or so will see that the ancient and honourable right and practice with regard to petitions has not been honoured in this house; rather, it has been abused and indeed prostituted by honourable senators opposite.

Senator Olson: By the Conservatives.

Senator Murray: I hope that honourable senators themselves will read the volumes of Hansard of the last month to see if they can find there anything they might be proud of. I do not think they can.

Senator Olson: Just defending Canadians rights to petition the government, that is all.

Senator Murray: I hope that some of the media will take the trouble—

Senator Haidasz: Are you trying to forbid Canadians to petition Parliament and to seek redress for grievances?

Senator Murray: I hope that some of the media will take the trouble to glance through the volumes of Hansard of the past month.

Senator Thériault: Why don't you get your Prime Minister to tell the media what to do?

Senator Haidasz: Let the people speak.

Senator Murray: My goodness, we are chirpy this morning aren't we, Senator Haidasz?

Senator Gigantès: We have a clear conscience.

Senator Olson: Let the record show that the Conservatives are smiling after they have killed people's rights to petition Parliament. Let the record show that.

Senator Murray: I would hope that many people would examine the Hansard of the past month or so to see what has been done under the guise, under the rubric, of petitions. What will Canadians of the present generation think—

Senator Frith: They will be looking for their names.

Senator Murray: —reading the verbal excesses of the past month from the other side and see attached to some of those interventions names that are well-known in politics and public life and the various professions in this country. What are people to think reading Hansard and finding Senator Stanbury, under the guise of petitions, reading verbatim into Hansard the biographies of honourable senators from the Parliamentary Guide? Is that petitions? Of course not.

Senator Olson: They will understand. They know why we are delaying it.

Senator Murray: Understand, Senator Olson, they never will.

Senator Olson: People understand why we are delaying.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: On a point of order, I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to have the decency, before mentioning people, to look across the floor and see if they are present.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I regret Senator Stanbury's absence, but I do not think he can possibly take objection to my statement of fact that, under the guise of petitions, he read verbatim extracts and biographies of senators from the Parliamentary Guide. He read the biographies of honourable senators holus-bolus into the record under the guise of petitions.

Senator Thériault: Ask Premier Hatfield and he will tell you about that experience.

Senator Murray: I was here and I heard it. Senator Fairbairn read lengthy extracts from a book under the guise of petitions.

Senator Fairbairn: A very good book.

Senator Murray: A good book, yes. In some cases, The Good Book was read under the guise of petitions.

Senator van Roggen read verbatim into the record a speech that he first delivered in 1971 under the guise of petitions; and Senator Sparrow made, at the wrong time, an otherwise excellent speech on soil conservation under the guise of petitions.

All this, honourable senators, under the guise and the rubric of petitions. These are not petitions. This is time wasting, obstruction and filibustering.

Senator Olson: It is called delay.

Senator Murray: Delay, yes. What are people to think when reading the speeches in the record—

Senator Thériault: Why don't you go and ask them. Get out of here and ask them what they think.

Senator Barootes: Abuse of parliamentary privilege.

Senator Olson: According to Barootes.

Senator Murray: —attached, as some of them are to quite distinguished names in the political and public life of this country? All this at a time when Canada faces very serious economic challenges that we all know about.

Senator Haidasz: Because of the government's mismanagement of our affairs.

Senator Murray: What are people to think when reading those speeches and seeing how the Senate of Canada passed its time in those days?

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Peter Bosa: Would the honourable gentleman permit a question? I would like to ask him what Canadians think of the 220 speeches that were made by his Conservative colleagues, including his former leader, the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, during the flag debate which commenced in June and ended in December?

Senator Frith: A good precedent.

Senator Murray: I remember it well.

Senator Frith: A ploy not unknown to Conservatives.

Senator Bosa: We are amateurs when it comes to filibustering. We are just beginning to learn.

Senator Murray: I remember it well and the fact that it was ended by closure.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Could Senator Murray explain why the number of petitions all senators have received have increased in the last week from all parts of the country? Why is it that petitions have increased in the last week by hundreds and thousands?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the number of petitions may have increased, but these things are hung up in various public places and signed by people from Michigan. In the case of our friend, Senator Hébert, he has subscribers to that well-known Liberal publication Vers Demain in Quebec coming to his assistance in bringing these petitions in.

Senator Haidasz: On a point of order the Leader of the Government in the Senate has been criticizing us for bringing forth the petitions of citizens representing their grievances. I want to ask him what has the government done to this day with those petitions?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, they are filed, as I understand it, with the Table.

Senator Frith: And ignored.

Senator Murray: I am not complaining about honourable senators bringing petitions to the house—not at all. We know how it should be done. Senator Hébert showed us some months ago how it should be done. The honourable senator should stand up and say: "Honourable senators, I have a petition signed by 200 people," or whatever it is, "in such a place on such and such a subject, and it is tabled."

Senator Hébert: You didn't like it then.

Senator Murray: Senator Hébert, I put your name forward as a paragon of proper parliamentary procedure in a former time.

Senator Hébert: I tried to do it in the way you seem to like, but on the day I was doing it you didn't like it at all; so I tried it another way.

Senator Murray: I like it less.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: May I ask a question of the Leader of the Government? What has he and his colleagues in the Senate done with the petitions they have received from citizens criticizing the GST?

Senator Murray: Read them very carefully, honourable senators. Again, my point in this debate is not that honourable senators might wish to bring petitions here, but that under the guise of petitions we have had readings from the Parliamentary Guide, readings from books, readings of old speeches dating back to 1971.

Hon. George van Roggen: I should like to correct the record. At the time I read that "old speech," it was not under petitions.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator read the old speech under privilege. Even worse.

Senator van Roggen: I might say—and I won't embarrass him by naming him—that a senator from your side came up to me afterwards and said: "My, that was interesting."

Senator Murray: I am sure it was. I have no objection at all to petitions being presented in the way they should be presented according to the rules; but you have broken every rule in the book on petitions in the way that you have brought them in.

Senator Frith: We have observed it strictly and carefully.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the country faces tremendous economic challenges, and people reading Hansard or examining the record of these days as to what is happening in the Senate of Canada will have to conclude that it was time wasting, it was obstruction, it was filibuster and delay.

Here we have in the Gulf the most serious international crisis since Korea, and what are they talking about in the Senate? They are obstructing, they are filibustering, they are delaying, they are time wasting. That is what has been going on in this place.

Now, honourable senators, on two occasions we tried to move the Senate off this and on to the business of the country.

Senator Frith: Your business, not the people's business.

Senator Murray: Twice mob rule took over, drowning out an honourable senator on this side, refusing an honourable senator permission to speak. For four hours on one occasion I was on my feet, two hours on another occasion, trying to make myself heard—

An Hon. Senator: Let the record show what you were trying to do.

Senator Murray: —through the din.

Senator Frith: The din of the people that responded to the action of a tyrant.

Senator Murray: It was to try to extricate the Senate from this disgraceful situation that the Speaker of the Senate invited Senator MacEachen and myself to his office some days ago.

Over a period of days, four of us, Senator Roblin and I on this side, Senator MacEachen and Senator Frith on that side, negotiated a house order on legislation and provisional rules to get the Senate back to business.

With regard to Bill C-62, there was a commitment to a process, an agreement that no motion to move the previous question would be receivable until after eight Liberal amendments had been disposed of. A commitment to a process that necessarily involved getting into third reading debate on Bill C-62.

On the day when third reading should have been called, what did we have? We found ourselves right back where we were on that day when we were invited out of here to meet in the Speaker's chambers. Back to time wasting. Back to obstruction. Back to filibustering. All under the guise of petitions.

We have twice heard from the Leader of the Opposition that petitions are eternal.

Senator MacEachen: Exactly.

Senator Murray: We heard yesterday from Senator Frith that in one month they have brought in 2,000 petitions and they have 48,000 to go.

• (1100)

Senator Frith: Doesn't that tell you anything?

Senator Murray: Yes. It certainly raises the question: Are honourable senators opposite dealing in good faith or not?

Senator Frith: Our good faith is with the people who sent us the petitions.

Senator Murray: We have come to an agreement. There is a house order on legislation.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: I am sorry to interrupt you, senator, but I was just wondering what you would be doing with the petitions your office would be getting in opposition to the GST? I am assuming that your office will be receiving petitions. Are you presenting them to the Senate, or what are you doing with those?

Senator Austin: He is ignoring them.

Senator Sparrow: In your office and others: are they presenting them to the house?

Senator Murray: No petitions that have come to my office have been drawn to my attention. I have not seen any.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Hébert: Except for the two yesterday.

Senator Murray: Yes. I think it was quite important yesterday to demonstrate what a joke my friends have made of the whole petitions process. They made a mockery of the petitions process. They have not been presenting petitions, they have been making speeches, reading the Bible. Everything under the sun.

Honourable senators, we came to an agreement which, at Senator Frith's insistence, involved a house order on legislation and new provisional rules which we passed as one motion. They have committed themselves to the third reading process, or so one would have thought. But if we can't get to the Orders of the Day, if we are not getting to third reading, then the house order is surely a dead letter. It is a nullity, isn't it?

Senator Frith: What do you mean?

Senator Murray: If we can't get to Orders of the Day, it's a nullity. You will make a nullity of it.

Senator Frith: The rules are a dead letter.

Senator Murray: Surely, if honourable senators are going to prevent us from getting to Orders of the Day; if we are going to have 48,000 more petitions, and I don't know how many hundreds of hours that will take, then the intent of honourable senators must be obvious. It is to prevent us from getting to Orders of the Day. It is to prevent us from getting to third reading. It is to prevent Parliament from voting. We would be left to confront the prospect of the utter paralysis of Parliament because of the actions of honourable senators opposite.

Honourable senators, this motion to move to Orders of the Day is the only motion that can save the Senate from total paralysis and possibly from self-destruction. Therefore, I commend this motion that we move to Orders of the Day and get on with the business of the country to the support of all honourable senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I also intend to make my remarks brief. One thing I have concluded from listening to Senator Murray is that he is very unhappy. He is quite unhappy with the way the Senate is proceeding. He is quite unhappy that legitimate rules are used by senators on this side to delay the business of the Senate. He almost appears scandalized that this should happen.

He should not be scandalized at all, because it is a familiar parliamentary procedure. It has been used more extensively by the party which honourable senators opposite support than this party. It has been the stock in trade of the Conservative Party in the House of Commons in the years when I was a member of that house. I lived through, for example, the debate to which Senator Bosa referred, the filibuster led by that master of delay, the late John Diefenbaker. The House of Commons was hung up, as Senator Bosa said, from June to December. All that time, Mr. Pearson did not go like a crybaby to the Speaker or to the Governor General or to the Queen. He put up with it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: We put up with it. Mr. Pearson put up with it, and I think you people had better put up with it too, because it is not over yet.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: It is not over yet. When we both spoke on the house order and the provisional rules, Senator Murray said—and I thought it a very revealing and commendable comment—that the provisional rules provided to the minority—in this case us—tools for legitimate delay. Delay has been a long-accepted parliamentary technique. Governments do not like it; they never do, but they have to put up with it, and Senator Murray—

Senator Teed: You didn't put up with six months of it.

Senator Perrault: What are you talking about?

Senator MacEachen: Senator Murray is quite unhappy about the reality of parliamentary delay.

It is clear that this government, as a whole, has very little patience with opposition parties. We know that closure in the other place had never previously been used as much as it has been under the present Prime Minister. It is now almost a weekly occurence. It is closure.

Senator Frith: Abuse.

Senator MacEachen: Closure was a dreaded technique. I was Leader of the Government in the other place for at least three sessions, and I do not think I ever moved a closure motion—well, maybe one, but I don't think I did.

Senator Doody: One at a time.

Senator MacEachen: However, this government has exceeded all records in moving closure in the other place. They just do not want the Opposition to function in the normal way—and it has been a numerically weak Opposition. It is not as if the government was numerically weak. But despite the fact that, since the election of 1984, the Prime Minister has had a huge parliamentary majority and a numerically weak Opposition, nevertheless, closure and time allocations have been pounded into the system, week after week. In fact, this bill is here because it was pounded through the system by closure and time allocations.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: Senator Murray has, I think, considerable gall to get up and complain that we on this side are using the rules that are available to delay the government. It is too bad.

Senator Perrault: On which they all voted.

Senator MacEachen: You cannot have everything your own way. You have created your dubious majority. You did not have a majority. You could not get your bill through if you played by the rules of the game, so you have created an artifical and dubious majority in the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: Then you have the nerve to complain that a number of senators are reading petitions, while you have the capacity, because you are God's gift to Canada—

Senator Frith: Or 15 per cent of it!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

• (1110)

Senator MacEachen: —to bring in—

Senator Perrault: They are sliding. It is 13 per cent now.

Senator MacEachen: —to bring in an artifical majority. So do not complain. Just relax and enjoy it. It is part of the process of growing up, if that is what you want. It is part of the process of growing up in Parliament to understand that delay is at times the weapon of the Opposition which will be used time and time again. Nobody used it better than Mr. Diefenbaker. Nobody used it better than Mr. Clark when he rang the bells. For twenty-one days we heard those bells ring.

Senator Austin: And Senator Murray was his advisor.

Senator Frith: The villain who now whines and complains.

Senator MacEachen: The Speaker of the House of Commons refused to intervene and the government finally accepted the splitting of the energy bill into several different parts. So the Opposition had its way and the government bowed to the Opposition.

Senator Bosa: The majority government.

Senator MacEachen: However, this government has never bowed to the Opposition in the other place. I do not know whether this government, in its history, has accepted an amendment of any consequence from the Opposition in the other place. They just brush them off through closure and through time allocation.

Why, then, do you complain that petitions were used for delay? It is an accepted technique. Perhaps some of the speeches were not great. Perhaps they will not be listed among the world's greatest speeches.

Senator Frith: They can always leave and have coffee.

Senator MacEachen: Presumably, however, they have attracted the interest of Senator Murray, because he followed them avidly and he knows every one of them, presumably by heart. I cannot think why he should be so unhappy today. Why should he be so unhappy? We did have a meeting of several day's duration between the two parties and we produced a legislative package and a new set of provisional rules. The legislative package has been completed. We followed the house order meticulously and we passed Bill C-28, which had been much requested by the government. We passed Bill C-21, also much requested by the government. We passed the report stage of Bill C-62, or we had a vote on it as we said we would, and on Monday we completed the proceedings on Bill C-44. So we conducted ourselves with meticulous adherence to the house order. However, after we had done all of that, Senator Murray went before the television cameras yesterday and said that we had violated the spirit of the agreement.

Senator Perrault: For shame. For shame.

Senator MacEachen: I thought it was rather, shall I say, inappropriate for Senator Murray to complain—

Senator Bosa: Cheap.

Senator Perrault: Shoddy. Sleazy.

Senator MacEachen: —after he had reaped all the benefits for the government. After they have tucked away all of these important bills, he then goes out and cries foul. There is nothing in it for the Opposition, apparently. It is all for the government.

An Hon. Senator: I cannot believe what you are saying.

Senator Perrault: Stay there awhile and you will learn something.

Senator MacEachen: It is true, senator. Were you in the Senate when we passed the Unemployment Insurance Bill? Were you here when we passed the "Clawback" bill and when we passed the bill on Hibernia or were you someplace else? If you were here, then you must have been asleep.

Senator Perrault: Spaced out.

Senator Frith: And fast asleep. Stay awake.

An Hon. Senator: You are not getting on with the bill.

Senator MacEachen: Because that is what we did. We are talking about the legislative package.

Senator Perrault: You are facists.

Senator MacEachen: When the government reaped all of its benefits—I know that the honorable senator can't take it. He just can't take it.

An Hon. Senator: Can you?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Perrault: Sit down. I can't understand what you are saying.

An Hon. Senator: Speak from your seat.

Senator Frith: You will have a chance to make a speech.

Senator MacEachen: Perhaps one of the new senators will get up one of these days and defend the GST.

Senator Frith: Yes. Let's hear from them.

Senator Perrault: Let's hear them in defence of the GST.

An Hon. Senator: We will get up.

Senator MacEachen: What are your views, senator?

Senator Frith: Let's hear about it, yes.

Senator MacEachen: You do not have any views. You are just another person brought in here—

Senator Perrault: Blathering.

Senator MacEachen: —to do a job, and that job is to rubber-stamp what the Prime Minister wants. And we will not permit that, even if you do not like it, senator.

Senator Perrault: You are just a hired gun. That is all. You are part of the Tory wrecking crew!

Senator Simard: Come on!

Senator MacEachen: Honorable senators, I wonder why the people on the other side are so agitated, after getting those four bills which we passed in accordance with the house order.

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator MacEachen: Yesterday, after four hours in the house on a point of order, Senator Murray goes out and cries foul. I think he is a crybaby and this debate is no place for crybabies. Just get used to it, because we intend to use every legitimate method provided by the rules.

Senator Frith: That is what "legitimate" means.

Senator MacEachen: We will use every legitimate method available to us to thwart the passage of the GST.

• (1120)

Senator Murray has complained about the use of petitions, and that it is a terrible abuse of the rules. Honourable senators, I think something much more fundamental is at stake, and that is whether the rule of law in the Senate will be observed. Senator Murray talked about the outbreak of mob rule in the Senate occurring twice. Why did that happen?

Senator Murray: Almost a third time.

Senator MacEachen: It happened because the rule of law had been abandoned. The question for the Senate is whether the rule of law is to be restored to the Senate.

Senator Sylvain: How about the spirit of the agreement?

Senator MacEachen: The question is whether the established customs of the Senate are to be respected and whether the clear words of the rules are to be taken at their face value. Honourable senators, let there be no doubt about it — there is a clear and fundamental disagreement between those on that side of the house and we on this side of the house on Bill C-62. Senators on the other side want to pass it and we want to prevent its passage. There is a deep disagreement. It is a classic conflict situation.

Senator Sylvain: Then let us debate and vote.

Senator MacEachen: That conflict, honourable senator, will be resolved one way or the other, but will it be resolved in accordance with the rule of law?

Senator Sylvain: Only when we debate and vote.

Senator MacEachen: Will it be resolved as we go through this process? Honourable senator, we are going to get to third reading and we are going to vote.

Senator Sylvain: We will be too old then.

Senator MacEachen: We will reach the third reading stage of this bill, but are we going to see the Speaker used as an instrument to secure the passage of this bill?

Senator Frith: Again?

Senator MacEachen: Is the Speaker going to be used as a means of accelerating passage of the bill? Are the rules going to be observed? Senator Murray, after putting his blessing upon this new provisional rule, says, "It is a dead letter."

Senator Murray: If we want to get to third reading . . .

Senator Frith: You cannot have it your way.

Senator MacEachen: Is he now backing away from that rule of the Senate, or does he have some other subterranean method by which he will attempt to destroy —

Senator Murray: Debate and vote is all I ask.

Senator MacEachen: —the implications of these rules?

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Sylvain: The spirit of these rules.

Senator MacEachen: What about the spirit of the rules?

Senator Sylvain: Let's get on with the debate and vote.

Senator Frith: The spirit of the rules is in the rules.

Senator Sylvain: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: The Honourable Senator considers that to be a joke. Does he consider that the rules do not apply because he has had some spiritual message or some such thing?

Senator Sylvain: I have not had a spiritual message, but the rule has a spirit behind it.

Senator Corbin: You must have had a liquid breakfast. What's wrong with you?

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators on the other side have to understand that there are certain realities at work in this country, realities that are dominating this debate and that are behind the debate. Senator Murray is unhappy, and all of his unhappiness seems to be attributed to us. However, it is true that almost all Canadians are unhappy with the government. They have very little confidence in the Prime Minister; they have very little confidence in the policies of the government; and they have damn little confidence in this bill, Bill C-62. They do not want it to be passed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: That is a reality.

Senator Austin: That is why they want us to kill the debate.

Senator MacEachen: There is another reality, and it is that the Prime Minister, in order to secure the passage of this bill, did something that no other Prime Minister ever did, which was to pull out of the British heavens eight new senators in order to pass the bill. The people loathe that. In Atlantic Canada, 92 per cent of the people disapprove of the appointment of these eight senators in order to have the bill passed. Ninety-one per cent of the people on the prairies disapprove of what has happened. Honourable senators think that this debate can be conducted in a political vacuum, but it is being conducted in a real Canada where discontent with the government and with the new senators is rampant. We intend to express that discontent as we conduct this debate.

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators—

Senator Frith: Let's hear from this man.

Senator Sylvain: Would the Honourable Senator please explain that remark about being British. I would like to hear how they came to be British.

Senator MacEachen: Oh, Oh.

Senator Perrault: That is a profound question.

Senator Haidasz: What is wrong with being British.

Senator MacEachen: Perhaps the honourable senator is not aware that the letters patent creating these senators had to be signed in Buckingham Palace, and I understand that is in the United Kingdom.

Senator Frith: That is in Britain.

Senator Sylvain: Would the senator please tell us who signed them? Was it the Queen of Canada?

Senator Frith: Read the newspapers.

Senator MacEachen: I believe she signed as Queen of England.

Senator Austin: Exactly.

Senator Frith: They were signed in England, unlike yours, sir, which was signed here. That is what makes them British.

Senator Olson: Hang your head in shame for a while.

Senator MacEachen: When Senator Murray makes a big thing about the reading of petitions as the principal problem, he seems to have his head in the sand, because the reading of petitions is not the major problem. The major problem at the present time is that the Government of Canada is pressing forward with a tax bill which at least 75 per cent of the Canadian people oppose. That is the first part of the problem. The second part is that the bill was forced through the House of Commons under closure.

Senator Bosa: What about the provinces?

Senator MacEachen: It was forced through under time allocation. The third part of the problem is that the provinces and the municipalities oppose this bill.

Senator Perrault: And the churches.

Senator MacEachen: There is but a small percentage of people in the country that want the bill to be passed. That is the source of the problem, and what compounds the problem further is the fact that the rules of the game, as we knew them, were not permitted to be played out. The Prime Minister interfered in a most blatant, unfair and offensive fashion and plucked eight senators out of the blue in order to make the difference in getting this bill though. Their credentials are before the courts of Canada.

• (1130)

If you worry, Senator Murray, about the reading of petitions, I worry about what happened on October 4.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: I worry whether there are any rules left in the Senate, and whether there is any objectivity or impartiality left.

Senator Simard: I thought that was behind us.

Senator Frith: Yes, so did we.

Senator MacEachen: I worry about Senator Murray's statement yesterday in which he said the new provisional rules are a dead letter and that he intended to back away from them. They are the rules of the Senate, and the senator is talking about backing away from them. Are we going to live in the Senate under the rule of law as we carry out this debate? I assure the senator who interrupted several times, Senator Sylvain, that we will get to the third reading debate and we will have amendments, and I hope that he will stand up in an orderly way and give his views about these problems and not shout from his seat.

Senator Sylvain: Honourable senators, I would just like to say that if I am disorderly, I have had great people in the Opposition show me how to be.

Senator Perrault: Sit down! You are not up on any point at all.

Senator MacEachen: I hope, honourable senators, that as we conduct this battle we can count on fairness and impartiality in the administration of the rules. Can we count on that? Can we count on that?

Senator Sylvain: Let's get to the debate.

Senator Frith: Will it be the rule of law or the "crybaby" rule?

Senator MacEachen: Yesterday—or this morning—we had the majority again asserting its dominance over the process of the rules.

Senator Murray: How many times did you do it yourself?

Senator Simard: And for partisan purposes.

Some Hon. Senators: On your feet, Murray!

Senator Murray: How many times have you done that since 1984?

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, Senator Murray has asked how many times we have appealed a Speaker's ruling.

Senator Murray: When you were in the majority.

Senator MacEachen: And we did, of course.

Senator Murray: Routinely.

Senator Perrault: Very seldom.

Senator MacEachen: But I do not think we ever appealed a ruling when such a shadow hangs over the Speakership, as it does today in the Senate.

Senator Austin: Total darkness.

Senator MacEachen: A cloud and a shadow. Honourable senators, you should not forget that any one of you could search the annals of the parliamentary system anywhere and you will never find an occasion when a vote was taken in the absence of the Opposition, when the doors were locked so they could not enter the chamber.

An Hon. Senator: And locked early.

Senator MacEachen: You can search but you will find no place where the literal rule of Parliament was flagrantly denied in the administration of a vote.

Senator Austin: It was a shameful day.

Senator MacEachen: You should not think that that is not very much in our minds, and it must be in your minds, too.

Senator Buckwold: They have no minds.

Senator MacEachen: Every time there is a crucial decision to be made by the Speaker, what do you think Liberals on this side will be thinking? What do you think will be on our minds? I think you had better understand that, honourable senators.

Senator Simard: This is about reading petitions.

Senator MacEachen: We have shown, I think, considerable restraint—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator MacEachen: —in the last few days, but don't push it too hard; let me tell you that.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Simard: We don't need your threats.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to begin by telling you that I intend to give notice now of a question of privilege. I think that what the person who was occupying the Chair, Senator Charbonneau, did to this institution and to the rights of people to petition this institution was disgraceful, but I am just going to leave that for a moment.

Senator Murray: Why?

Senator Olson: Because I want to give him a full explanation of how rotten that was and how much damage it has done to Parliament, but I want to do it when he is in the Chair so I can do it right to his face.

I want there to be no misunderstanding over what you have done to Parliament by letting this motion pass, but you have already demonstrated how little regard you have for the rules by even maintaining that this motion is in order. That is the other part of the problem.

Senator Murray: We settled that last night.

Senator Austin: Nothing is settled.

Senator Olson: I hope that I sound indignant because I am. I know exactly the kind of speech that this institution would be getting today if one Honourable John G. Diefenbaker were on this side, because I was in the other place when he made these kinds of speeches about a government trampling the rights of Parliament. By the way, I was in the Opposition then, too, in case you do not remember.

Senator Murray: Come to think of it, you supported the government on that, didn't you?

Senator Olson: We heard from Senator Murray, when he was trying to support this motion this morning, saying that this is a joke. The stuff that is in this red book is a joke now. As Senator MacEachen pointed out so clearly, after four hours, you say that you are going to renege on your agreement. That puts your honour in disrepute. However, it is not only an agreement, it is now a house order, in case you have forgotten. What are you going to do, trample on that again?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes, he will.

Senator Murray: If you make a nullity of it.

[Senator Buckwold.]

Senator Olson: I guess that is the notice you were giving to the press outside: First, your word is no damn good; and second, even if we get a house order, with all the Conservatives and all the other senators voting for it, you are going to trample on that, too.

Senator Austin: Murray has no honour!

Senator Olson: You can decide whether you have any honour or not, but I think it is a despicable attitude, and if there are any further words that describe it more adequately I am going to use them, too, because I think what has happened to Parliament today is the most despicable display of dereliction of duty that I have ever seen. I really believe that. I say very sincerely that you have trampled on the rights of Canadian citizens to petition their Parliament.

Senator Murray: Baloney!

Senator Olson: You can say "baloney" but I tell you that I have two files of petitions left here. It might take me two or three hours, although I cannot get that much time all at once. I know that many of my colleagues have more petitions as well.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: The people who signed these petitions are all from southern Alberta, where I come from, and they have a right to petition their Parliament if there is something going on in Parliament about which they want to express their views, either in support or in opposition. In this case, they are opposed. You have just trampled that right out of existence with this ruling, with this insistence that you are going to interfere with the routine proceedings and move to another item further down. We know very well that you intend to keep this session going now without any adjournment so that we cannot get back to the top of the Order Paper again. When you get to Bill C-62, you are going to arrange things in such a way that we never get a chance to present these petitions. That is what this is all about.

Senator Simard: So what? Table them.

Senator Olson: "So what?" he says.

Some Hon. Senators: "So what?" Simard. Senator "So what".

Senator Simard: Just table them.

Senator Olson: I want the record to show very clearly that the Conservative member opposite, after I explained the gravity of people's right to petition, just says "so what". Say it again. You said it yesterday, too. You think this is just some small thing we can have a little fun over. I see a few people over there smiling. I also see that their faces are a little crooked because they don't quite like that kind of a smile on their face. They know they have done something wrong. With this action they have violated Parliament, raped Parliament and raped the right of people to petition Parliament.

• (1140)

They have raped the right of people to petition Parliament with this action, and I can tell that they are not very proud of it.

Senator Frith: The smiling rapists.

Senator Olson: Senator Murray says what we have been doing is a joke. Is it a joke to carry people's petitions to Parliament?

Senator Frith: He thinks so.

Senator Olson: That is what he called it. That is some joke. The people of Canada have tried everything they know to get this government to understand that there is a majority of Canadians out there, about 90 per cent, who have a right, and have always had a right, to have some say in the way their government operates. They had some say through the Fathers of Confederation, and other people, to set up the structures.

I see people opposite who think they are great experts on what the rules are, and on what the constitutional structure is.

I will tell you one thing, and do not make any mistake about it, the whole thing has been set up with the consent of the Canadian people. That is the kind of structure they want to govern them, and these people are trampling over it all the time. The people are never going to forget this.

What happened on October 4 and what happened again today is a rape of Parliament, the worst that we have ever seen. I know what you are going to do. You are going to say that is now a precedent. Those are the new rules. Any time the Leader of the Government wants to get up on his feet—I guess this time it was the Deputy Leader, Senator Doody—and move a motion to go to the order paper, he will say, "Well, on October 30," or whatever date it was, "we had a motion. That is a precedent. Now we can do it."

I heard Senator Murray tell us on more than one occasion that what happened on October 4 is a precedent that he intends to use in the future.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: That is violation of everything that is on page 57 of the rule book. Just because you got away with it once, with your "illegits," if you want to call them that, or your swamping senators, now you are going to use it as a method of amending the rules. It is a new system we have here. We amend the rules as we go along. If we do not like the rules or if they do not happen to fit our impatience at any given time we make some new ones. You even got the Speaker into it to a disgraceful degree. Too bad, but that is what you did. You know he is not going to survive this. You may think he is, but he is not.

An Hon. Senator: Where is he now?

Senator Olson: I do not know where he is now. I am not critical of him for not being in the Chair now. As I said a few moments ago, I am going to raise the question of privilege when he is in the Chair, because I want on record what I think of what you, Mr. Charbonneau, and you, Mr. Murray, have done to the people's right to petition Parliament. Then I am going to get a few thousand copies of that and send a copy of it to every one of the names that is on this petition so that they know at least that I tried.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

Senator Murray: Who pays for all these copies?

Senator Olson: Are you going to start cutting our funds off too?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: We had better understand that there is no limit to this government.

An Hon. Senator: Does that mean we do not have franking privileges any more?

Senator Olson: Are you going to stop the franking privileges too?

An Hon. Senator: More threats.

Senator Olson: I want to take this seriously, because I had better get it in quick and get it out to these people if they are going to cut off funding too.

Are you serious when you say that? You are going to examine where I get the money to send out copies of Hansard?

An Hon. Senator: That is what he said.

Senator Olson: I said I was going to do it, and he said, "Where are you going to get the money?" I am going to get it from the same place I have always got it.

Senator Murray: The public treasury.

Senator Olson: Of course! Are you intending to interfere with that?

Senator Murray: Never! I have not attended Internal Economy meetings in 10 years.

Senator Olson: But you have other ways of sneaking your influence into certain places.

Senator Murray: You are living high off the hog, senator, and I am not interfering with it.

Senator Olson: I want you to know this, but I think I had better be careful and make sure that all these people know before you can get the budget killed too.

The Leader of the Government called it a kind of mockery. Is it mockery for people to let Members of Parliament—in case you do not believe we are Members of Parliament, you had better examine section 17 of the British North America Act and you will find out that senators are Members of Parliament. Is it some kind of mockery that Members of Parliament should be able to receive petitions and present them to Parliament? You know, it is so silly, because if we are not going to present them to Parliament, where does that leave us as Members of Parliament?

Do you want us to just take these petitions in and leave them in our files? That was not what the people intended. They intended those petitions to be presented to Parliament, and that is what we have been trying to do for days and days. It is kind of laughable in many respects.

Senator Murray: We have had speeches on the Canadian Football League. You have not presented the petitions. You have wasted time.

Senator Olson: Senator van Roggen just got up and told you to your face that you misled the house when you said that he made that speech on petitions. Now back off! Admit that you were wrong. I suppose we can look back on some of these other things too where you have quoted different members. It probably was not on petitions at all.

Senator Murray ought to understand, at least by now, that we are trying to delay Bill C-62. Do you not understand that? Do you not understand that we are going to use every tactic and every technique available to us to delay Bill C-62?

Senator Simard: Under the rules.

An Hon. Senator: A Grit is a Grit is a Grit.

Senator Olson: Perhaps a Grit is a Grit is a Grit, and a Conservative is a Conservative is a Conservative. As far as the rules of Parliament are concerned you can say, along with that, that a rapist is a rapist is a rapist.

Some Hon. Senators: So what?

Senator Frith: So what, Senator Simard?

Senator Olson: I have been here for 34 years, and I have never before seen such long-term, disgraceful parliamentary behaviour in my life.

Senator Simard: No, no!

Senator Olson: The only other comparable act was the great pipeline debate in 1956. I was not here when that happened. I came the next year.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

Senator Olson: I know what happened, though, because it was fresh in the minds of all Members of Parliament, including people like M. J. Coldwell, who was a highly respected politician and then the leader of the CCF Party, and John George Diefenbaker. They stormed the Speaker's Chair. That is what they did. Yes, they did. They actually left their seats and went right up to the Speaker's Chair and stuck the rule book under his nose and told him to get the hell out of there.

Senator Frith: Let us try that.

Senator Olson: So if you want to know what your own colleagues did—

Senator Frith: I never thought of that before.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: —and if you want to know what some highly respected Members of Parliament did on that occasion, that is what they did. We have not done that. We have done a couple of things that stopped you from doing further damage to Parliament when you were insisting on making a motion that was out of order.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Murray: Why would you not let the Speaker decide that?

Senator Frith: No, no.

An Hon. Senator: You decided.

Senator Olson: We have already had a demonstration of how the Speaker decides things.

Senator Petten: The decision was written by you.

Senator Murray: In the words of Senator Frith.

Senator Olson: The Speaker has already demonstrated that he has completely lost his objectivity and fairness. There is nothing left, and I intend to tell him that straight to his face when he is here.

• (1150)

I am not going through that now, but I intend to tell him that straight to his face when he is here.

Honourable senators, it appears that we have entered a new era in parliamentary democracy where we make up the rules as we go along. If we don't like what the rules are to allow minorities and the Canadian people to be heard when they send in petitions, we will make new ones. We got a new rule today. There is absolutely no precedent that anyone can find where a member interceded to make a motion when petitions were being read. That has never happened.

Senator Murray: Senator Doody read the precedent into the record yesterday.

Senator Olson: In this place?

Senator Murray: The precedent in the House of Commons.

Senator Frith: That is where he would like to be where there is closure and all those tools to choke off debate. Of course, he wants to bring the House of Commons rules over here. He delights in the ability to ram laws through with closure.

Senator Olson: Well, that is where we are at and we can make new rules whenever we don't like what is going on.

Senator Perrault: "Instantrule."

Senator Frith: Just add water!

Senator Olson: I looked over that so-called agreement, at least I thought it was an agreement, and it did not state how we were going to handle petitions. There was no commitment on this side about giving up our right to present petitions.

Senator Frith: It has nothing to do with commitments; they are all in the rules adopted by the whole Senate unanimously.

Senator Olson: I understand that it is in the rules. Does it state anything under the provisional rules?

Senator Stewart: Senator Olson, would you permit a question at this point. It would appear that some Progressive Conservative senators believe that the orders made by the Senate provide that at the very beginning of the sitting that began yesterday, the Senate would move to the motion for third reading of Bill C-62. For example, I believe that Senator Sylvain, who was intervening earlier, believes that that was the significance of the special order made on the motions of Senator Murray and Senator MacEachen.

Senator Sylvain is new here. I presume he was given that false interpretation by Senator Murray.

It was clearly decided by those who made the special order and provisional rules that at the beginning of the sitting yesterday we would go to the first order of business as established by Rule 19. The fact that that was what was intended was shown by what Senator Doody did. He rose on petitions yesterday, which shows that he knew where we were on the order paper.

In defence of Senator Sylvain, is it not quite likely that Senator Sylvain and other members of the Progressive Conservative senatorial caucus were misled when the provisional rules and this special order were put before them? I ask you, Senator Olson, if that is not a reasonable interpretation of the attitude some of them are now showing.

Senator Olson: Perhaps we need a fresh explanation and interpretation of what the new provisional rules mean. It seems to me it would probably be better if Senator Frith and Senator Murray made that explanation. However, I agree with Senator Stewart's interpretation that there was no provision whatever made in those rules as to any limitation expressed or implied with respect to petitions or, in fact, the top of the order paper under Article 19 of the rules. That rule simply states that we start off with presentation of petitions.

If Senator Murray misled his caucus, it is up to him to explain. He may or may not have. If the interpretation was that there was something limiting the use of the first item under Rule 19, that is certainly not the explanation we received in our caucus.

If someone had returned from a meeting where some arrangement had been worked out to restore order to this place and told us that one of the rules was that there would be no more petitions from the people, I would have said no, and therefore it would not have passed anyway. I believe Senator Frith understood that and never made any such commitment. The wording certainly does not state that I cannot present petitions from the people in southeastern Alberta. If it had, I would have said "No, thank you."

I was chairman of a committee in the other place for approximately 16 months in 1964 and part of 1965. I am not sure of the exact dates. The committee was attempting to revise the rules to get more business through this place. I know from long experience, honourable senators, how careful one has to be and not tramp on the rights of the Opposition to delay the government if it is attempting to rush things through. The committee filed 22 reports to the government of the Right Hon. Lester Pearson. He asked me to be chairman of that committee for a special reason. At the time I was the House Leader of the Social Credit Party and he wanted someone who was not a member of the old-line parties so that the committee could have what he thought would be a neutral chairman. It was a good exercise.

What we finally decided was to transfer an enormous amount of the work that was required to be done on the floor of the chamber into the standing committees. It set up a new regime from meaningful debate on more than one subject at a time. In other words, if there was a bill dealing with transport it went to the transport committee, and the members who were interested in transport went there. The same applied to bills on agriculture and other subjects. When the bill was returned to the chamber itself, there were many delaying tactics, but it was absolutely necessary to be careful that the rights of Opposition members to get their foot in the door were not muffled or stifled. There are some senators opposite, I think, who were there. Maybe Senator Phillips was there at the time. He might even remember what happened. However, there was one thing we never did. We never set up a regime or even attempted to set up a regime where you make up the rules as you go along.

Now, there have been some changes made over there since. They have given the Speaker far more power, in my view, than any Speaker ever ought to have. For one thing, there is no appeal from his rulings anymore. I believed it was a serious mistake when they did it. I don't remember what year it was, but if there is anything that has demonstrated that it should never have happened it is the situation now where they use closure over and over and over again and there is no appeal.

The last very important thing I want to say on this motion, although someone will probably heckle me and I will get started again, is that you should not be in such a hurry. You may have tried to make the argument that you waited long enough, that there are economic problems, and so on. Well, 90 per cent of the people in this country do not believe that you need to be in a hurry to pass this bill. They are the ones that are going to be affected by it. I tell you without any hesitation at all that if you want to trample on their rights just because you are in a hurry to get it done by some date in November or December or whenever, you are doing the wrong thing.

I believe that the Leader of the Opposition, Senator MacEachen, explained to you, had you wanted to listen, very carefully and very accurately why you are having this difficulty with opposition in the Senate. It is not because of us particularly. It is because of the malaise in the country. The people do not want the government to proceed with this bill. They do not want this kind of tax regime set up.

Oh, there are a few in the manufacturers' associations who want to be relieved—

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Will you allow me to make a comment at this time? I think you will want to hear it. It will not take too long.

Senator Olson: So what? If you want to make a speech, I really think you ought to make a speech.

Senator Simard: I think it would be useful for you and our colleagues to know what a 19-year-old Quebec student has to say about what has been taking place in the last month.

Senator Frith: Tell us in your speech. You will get a turn.

Senator Olson: I would invite Senator Simard to make his speech when he gets to it.

Senator Simard: You cannot speak out of both sides of your mouth. You either believe in what the people say or you do not. Why do you not allow me to put this on the record?

Senator Olson: Why don't you make an arrangement with your whip so you can make a speech?

Senator Simard: Obviously we are going to be here for several more days listening to you. Why don't you listen to what this 19-year-old student has to say?

An Hon. Senator: Sit down!

Senator Simard: This is just another smoke screen. We know what you are up to.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Olson has the floor.

Senator Simard: I respect the Chair and I will sit down. I hope that you will remember that because you can't respect the Chair at 11:55 a.m. on a Wednesday and say that there is no one in the Chair at 3:00 o'clock in the afternoon. So be consistent.

Senator Frith: He has made a fool of himself.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, this is absolutely amazing. They have now decided that they can interrupt anyone anytime they want to. Is this part of the new rules?

Senator Perrault: Table it during the petition.

Senator Simard: You are talking out of both sides of your mouth.

Senator Olson: Leave it on the record.

Senator Simard: Why don't you let me then, and hear what other people have to say—

Senator Perrault: Table it.

Senator Olson: It is clear and easy to understand, Senator Murray, that you have to take some of your back bench senators, like Senator Simard, into a room and teach them what is in this book. It says that one senator at a time shall have the floor. Senator Simard, I think, is now the "So what?" senator, but had he got up and asked if he could ask a question—

Senator Simard: I asked you!

Senator Olson: No, you did not. You said "I wonder if Senator Olson would let me put this comment in here at this time from some student." I would suggest that that is a good subject matter for your own speech.

Senator Perrault: Wait for the petitions.

Senator Olson: Senator Simard, we welcome you to make that kind of speech.

Senator Perrault: Put it under petitions.

Senator Olson: Yes, we could read a hundred petitions.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Simard: I will go to Alberta. I will go to Alberta to tell them what kind of a representative you are!

Senator Frith: Go ahead. Go right now.

Senator Perrault: We will buy you a ticket.

Senator Olson: I will tell you one thing: If you come to Alberta, Senator Simard—and I welcome you to come—when you come to Alberta, please let me know when you are coming, because I want—

Senator Perrault: And you can do a walking tour of the tar sands out there.

Senator Olson: —to go there and be sure that no one finds out that you supported this bill, because you would be in some danger if you did.

If some people in Alberta were to find out that you were part of the breaking of the rules in this place in order to force through Bill C-62, you would not be very welcome.

• (1200)

Senator Simard: I have been there before.

An Hon. Senator: You didn't stay very long.

Senator Olson: In any event, the point I was making, when I was so rudely interrupted, is that there are a few people in Canada, such as the Canadian Manufacturers Association, who would like this bill passed. One of the other organizations that came before the committee and wanted this bill passed was the Business Council on National Issues, the captains of industry, represented by one Mr. d'Aquino. He is also in favour of this bill.

Senator Murray: He used to be in Mr. Trudeau's office.

Senator Perrault: He was an office clerk, for heaven's sake.

Senator Olson: He was in favour of this bill and, of course, he is now the mouthpiece for all of the big commercial and corporate organizations in Canada. At least, that is what he claimed he was.

Senator Perrault: Sure, he is in favour.

Senator Olson: One hundred and fifty of the largest corporations in Canada make up the membership of the BCNI. I have been at many meetings with those people. When I was Minister of Economic Development I used to have meetings with them in Montreal, Toronto, and so on, and they had a specific point of view on almost everything. They wanted their corporations to succeed, to be profitable and to prosper. That is their job. I never criticized them for that. However, I know now why they want this bill to pass, because they know that with this bill there will be a massive transfer of the tax burden from their corporations to other people in Canada. Mr. d'Aquino had the nerve to come before the committee and say, "Those people who are opposed to this bill do not understand it. They are misinformed." I tell you, honourable senators, and Mr. d'Aquino too, the people understand it a lot better than he thinks they do. That is why they are opposed to it. They are not in favour of this massive transfer of the tax burden.

However, I do not want to get into that, because I want to get to the bill sometime so that we can talk about all those things–

Senator Simard: We all do.

Senator Olson: —because there is a lot that needs to be said and I hope that members opposite will screw up their courage and stand up to the leaders of the Conservative Party, both in this chamber and in the other place, and bring into the Senate a reflection of the wishes of the Canadian people. I think it will take a little more courage than most of you have, but at least you should try to screw up your courage and stand up, just once, for Canadians.

Senator Simard: Display your courage and play the kazoo and all of these other things? How much courage do you need for that?

Senator Olson: I am glad the "So what?" senator mentioned that usually what he says is "So what?" about the rules. He does not care about the rules. That is why I call him the "So what?" senator.

Senator Perrault: So what? So what?

Senator Simard: I care about the rules.

Senator Perrault: No, you don't.

Senator Simard: You threw the book away, and the enforcer here, Senator Frith, opened the door. He invited in the press, the people from the House of Commons and everyone else. You showed disrespect for the rules. You threw the book away.

An Hon. Senator: It was thrown away in the afternoon.

Senator Frith: Yes, thrown away in the afternoon, when you came in and participated in this shameful—

An Hon. Senator: Shame.

Senator Olson: I want the record to be clear. It was yesterday, or the day before, that Senator Frith was talking about respecting the rules. He pointed out very clearly one of the rules in the rule book, and Senator Simard said, "So what?" Does he mean, "so what" that that is in the rule book?

Senator Frith: It is a little better than looking at them.

Senator Olson: "So what?" is what he said.

Senator Perrault: That will stay with you awhile.

Senator Olson: As I said -

Senator Perrault: So what?

Senator Simard: That was a sad scene with the media that night.

Senator Perrault: "So what?" Simard.

Senator Olson: We know very well why the BCNI and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association support this bill. There is no mystery about that. They know very well that they will be relieved of a great deal of the tax burden as soon as it passes, because I presume that it will repeal the manufacturers' sales tax. But the people who will pick up the load, and take on the load from here, are not in favour of that.

The other thing they are not in favour of, and I want to make this point again and again, to try to hammer it into your heads—

Senator Simard: Where does Mr. Chrétien stand now on it at this time? We thought that yesterday he was for killing it. He is known to change his mind. He has changed his mind five times in the last month. Where do you suppose he stands now?

Senator Olson: Whom are you talking about?

Senator Simard: On the GST. I am talking about your leader.

Senator Murray: Jean Chrétien.

Senator Olson: Senator Simard, you have so much to say, why don't you get up and make a full speech?

Senator Simard: That is why I invited you earlier to sit down so that I could speak. Please allow me.

Senator Perrault: No. He is not about to give up his place.

Senator Frith: You will get your turn. Let him keep it up a bit.

Senator Perrault: Be patient.

Senator Olson: No, you cannot. The only time that you cannot speak is when some other senator has the floor. If you look in the rules you will find it there. You don't want the rules?

Senator Simard: My rules don't count.

Senator Olson: No; it was you who said "So what?" It was you, not Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: Yes; you don't like it now. They have the label on him now. He is trying to get it off.

Senator Olson: In any event, yesterday we went for four hours, and then Senator Murray lost his patience and switched with Senator Doody. Four hours after we had come to an agreement to change the rules, and that is all; that is all the patience they had. They abandoned the rules, abandoned an order of this house that was so fresh in everyone's mind that I think almost every one of us could recite it by heart, and we would not even need to look in the book under Provisional Rules. I do not know if I would get it word for word, but I know what every one of these words were. Four hours, then throw the book again! Trample on the rules of Parliament.

What they want to do is tramp on the rules of Parliament.

Before I conclude I want to very seriously say that honourable senators opposite have done a disgraceful thing to Parliament. Everyone who supported that action should hang his head in shame. You have denied Canadians the right to petition Parliament on a matter about which they feel strongly.

Senator Murray: Will we move to Orders of the Day today?

Senator Olson: Will you give me an undertaking that we will get back to petitions at some time?

Senator Murray: I am sure you will.

Senator Olson: When?

Senator Murray: It will all depend on when third reading of Bill C-62 will start.

Senator Olson: Will the honourable senator give an undertaking that we will get back to the order of business provided for in Rule 19? That would solve much of the problem.

Senator Murray: It is inevitable.

Senator Olson: I am talking about before Bill C-62 passes.

Senator Barootes: Oh!

Senator Olson: Did I hear Senator Murray make an undertaking that that would happen?

Senator Murray: I think it will.

Senator Olson: That is not enough. If after only four hours you have abandoned the provisional rules, we have to have something in writing. Next time we will get it in writing.

Senator Frith: Let's stick to the rules. We are now debating a Conservative Government motion to choke off the people's views. Let's stick to that.

Senator Olson: If he would give us an undertaking that we will get back to petitions, and if he would sign it before witnesses, that would be worth something.

I know other senators, including Senator Stewart, want to make a few comments on this violation of the right of Canadians to petition Parliament, but in concluding my remarks I want you to understand that any time you trample on the rights of Parliamentarians to present the views of the people they represent, it is wrong. I am not saying, honourable senators, that we fall into the same category as members of the other place, but we do have functions, the most important of which is to provide a check and balance in the whole Parliamentary system.

Honourable senators opposite are progressively and repeatedly violating the rules that make the Senate effective in carrying out its responsibilities. There is still time for them to contemplate that and perhaps to regret it sufficiently that they will not continue to completely disregard the rules. Every time they run up against a rule that may be a little awkward, they try to change it. The problem we have been encountering is that they keep changing the rules and forcing motions that are out of order, having the Speaker dragged into the matter so that his capability to preside over this place is reduced or eliminated. I will deal with that in more detail some time later. The main thrust of what I want to say today is that you are now denying people from making their views known before this House of Parliament, and that is a disgraceful thing to do.

Senator Murray: You have abused and prostituted that process, senator.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Frith: Listen to who is accusing you of abuse and prostitution. Boy, what words for them to use!

Senator Olson: Honourable senators opposite have wrecked the rules in this place more than anyone has done in the time I have been in Parliament, which is 34 or 35 years. I have never seen a situation where rules have been trampled on when they got in the way. You ought to be ashamed. You still have time to correct the situation if you want to, but if you don't want to, you will have to suffer the consequences. I am going to make sure that the people who sent their petitions to me know that it was Senator Murray and his government, in collusion with the Speaker, who prevented me from presenting their petitions to Parliament.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Would Senator Olson mind answering a question? Earlier he referred to the Speaker of the House of Commons and the rights that he has. Could the senator explain to this house the difference between the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Speaker of the Senate? As I understand it, the Speaker of the House of Commons is chosen by all of the members and is completely impartial. Would Senator Olson relate that situation to the situation in the Senate today?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not quite sure what the appropriate terms are for describing the Speaker of the House of Commons. He is a presiding officer to the extent that all Members of Parliament must address their comments to him. There is no doubt about that. It is to the Speaker and through the Speaker that a member speaks to other members who are present.

That is not the case in this chamber. In this chamber senators address other senators. The function of the Senate Speaker is set out to some extent, but he is not granted the authority to preside over this house as is the case with the Speaker of the House of Commons. I think Speakers who have occupied that Chair recognized and understood that they do not have that authority. That authority has never been given to a Senate Speaker.

I suppose the reason is fairly clear. It is that the Speaker of this house is appointed by the Prime Minister. He is not elected. It is not quite correct to say that the Speaker of the House of Commons has always been elected, because years ago he was nominated by the Prime Minister, and usually his nomination was seconded by the Leader of the Opposition. No votes were taken. I believe they asked for a voice vote and that was the end of it. Now, of course, a far more elaborate process is in place and a true election is held.

While on this subject, I think it is important to note that if the Speaker of the House of Commons had attempted what in fact occurred in this place, he would not have lasted five minutes. He would have been taken out of the Chair and the chamber would have immediately erupted. That happened to Speaker Beauduoin in 1956 when he started to do things that were a violation of what members believed were their rights and privileges. The Speaker's function—and I think this is true for both places—is to protect the rights and privileges of individual members, not to side with the government or take orders from the government or to make decisions that are sent by the government.

I was not here yesterday, but I understand that there was a really unfortunate situation. I feel very strongly and very deeply about it, so do not make any mistake about that either. Apparently, the Speaker asked for a few minutes to make a decision; he came back ten minutes later with it all written out.

Senator Stewart: Typed!

Senator Olson: I wonder where he got it from?

Senator Buckwold: It was typed the day before.

Senator Olson: I was not here, but I heard that, and I am going to do some investigation. Who decided? I bet Senator Murray knows. I think it was a disgraceful thing to do. There will come a day when the Speaker will be here and it will be appropriate to raise a question of privilege because I have a few hundred names here of people who believed they had a right to petition their Parliament, and now that has been trampled on.

Senator Frith: They are trying!

Senator Olson: They are trying to trample it out of existence. That is why I was so keenly interested when Senator Murray seemed to make an offer that we would get back to the top of the Orders of the Day, as indicated in Rule 19, before Bill C-62 passes.

Senator Murray: I am sure we will.

Senator Olson: You are sure? Well, give us an undertaking that we will.

Senator Murray: I cannot.

Senator Olson: All we have to do is adjourn and start at the top of the order paper again.

I am not going to make any deals with you across the floor. Just give us an undertaking that we will get back there so that my people can have their petitions respected.

This is so silly. Why in heaven's name would we present petitions opposing Bill C-62 after Bill C-62 had been given third reading? That is just ridiculous. It is ludicrous.

That is the undertaking we would like, and if you are seriously and favourably contemplating allowing us to have an opportunity to present petitions again, Senator Murray, we would like to know.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Senator Olson, would you permit a question?

Senator Olson: Certainly.

Senator Stewart: Earlier in this sitting—

Senator Phillips: This is the second time you have spoken!

Senator Hastings: He is asking a question.

Senator Phillips: He made a speech last time.

Senator Frith: No, not on the motion.

Senator Hastings: He has a question.

Senator Stewart: I am asking a question. Earlier, I suggested that there might be some value in having some kind of consultation in an effort to clarify, for the benefit of new senators, the agreement that was made at the end of the sitting of October 9, which agreement appears in our Debates, particularly at page 3116. Now, let me read what the Senate then ordered:

> That in relation to Bill C-44, An Act respecting Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, unless previously disposed of, at not later than 8.00 o'clock p.m., on Monday, October 29, 1990, the Senator then in the Chair shall, if required, interrupt any proceedings then before the Senate and shall proceed to put forthwith and successively, without any further debate or amendment, all questions necessary to dispose of all remaining stages of the said Bill, and the Senate shall then adjourn forthwith.

Consequently, at the end of the day on Monday, October 29, the Senate, pursuant to that order, adjourned forthwith. That was clear.

Senator Olson: Yes, that was clear.

Senator Stewart: What did that mean? It meant that when the next sitting began the first heading of business was Presentation of Petitions. That is established by Rule 19. Indeed, even the Speaker had no problem with that. The first thing he did was to call Presentation of Petitions. Senator Doody got up and presented two notable petitions.

Senator Olson: "Notorious" is a better word.

Senator Stewart: There was no question about what was prescribed by the special order of the Senate. However, it would appear, Senator Olson, that Senator Murray has been less than frank, less than candid, with new senators on his side. He did not explain to them what he had agreed to.

Senator Frith: Either he must not have or they are very slow.

Senator Stewart: I do not think that is true.

Senator Barootes: You don't come to our caucus. How do you know that?

Senator Frith: Because of the way they behave, sir.

Senator Stewart: It is the only possible explanation, Senator Barootes. It is clear that Senator Sylvain believes that somehow the spirit of the agreement has been violated. His conduct here today leads me to believe that. How would he have got that notion?

Senator Murray: Perhaps he heard Senator Frith describing the 48,000 petitions that one office still has left to present, or Senator MacEachen, on two occasions, saying, "Petitions are eternal." Perhaps he heard that. Perhaps that is why he believes, with good reason, that the spirit of the agreement is being violated.

Senator Frith: Perhaps he did, and as Senator Simard would say, "So what?"

Senator Stewart: Perhaps Senator Murray failed to understand—or if he understood, failed to explain to the members of his own caucus—the implications of the special order, which he helped to write. Perhaps that is the truth of the matter. Perhaps he went in there and said, "Boys, I've got it all settled. I used MacEachen to mop the floor of the Senate. I've taken him to the cleaners. You just watch." Then they discover that what he told them was not true, consequently, they protest.

Senator Simard: Senator Murray never said any such thing!

Senator Frith: We must be getting close to the truth.

Senator Stewart: Senator Olson, would it not be a good thing for the Senate now to adjourn—

Senator Simard: Senator Stewart—

Senator Frith: They are biting! Here is another fish, up to bite!

Senator Simard: Would you allow me a question?

Senator Olson: Ask me.

Senator Stewart: I want to finish my question.

Senator Hastings: He is asking a question of Senator Olson.

Senator Simard: I am trying to ask him a question.

Senator Murray: Talk about abusing the rules!

Senator Stewart: Just as soon as I have put my question, I will be happy to hear a question from Senator Simard.

Do you not think, Senator Olson, that it would be constructive for the Senate now to adjourn so that all the senators could get together, perhaps in the Railway Committee room, to get a candid explanation, for the benefit of new senators, and perhaps indeed for the benefit of Senator Murray, of the implications of the rules and the order that Senator Murray helped to write?

Senator Olson: I think that is a good idea.

Senator Simard: I have a question.

Senator Olson: I am trying to answer a question. Would you wait until I answer it? I also have the impression that some members opposite did not quite understand their agreement. At least their comments from time to time lead us to believe that they do not understand what the new provisional rules are or what the agreement was. What I was trying to explain a while ago—and I think Senator Stewart has drawn our attention to it again—is that, insofar as I am concerned—and Senator Frith and Senator Murray can listen to this—what is written in the provisional rules is the essence of the agreement.

Senator Frith: Of course it is, and it is now a house order.

Senator Olson: There never was any doubt about that in my mind. Now, you can read over those provisional rules, if you like, in great detail, and you will not find one thing that says we are going to limit the presentation of petitions.

Senator Steuart: Not one! Not one iota!

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Hastings: Not one word!

Senator Olson: Senator Barootes is right: we did not go to his caucus. However, the fact is that some members, particularly the new senators, seem to think that Senator Murray got the Opposition to agree to some kind of deal on petitions.

• (1220)

Senator Murray, if you tried to convince your backbench members that that is the case, then you did mislead them.

However, he is shaking his head that he did not, so I will take his word that he did not mislead them. You will have to listen more carefully when you go to caucus if you want to get these things clear, because, as Senator Stewart pointed out, we did not agree to forfeit our right to present petitions.

We have had only four hours to present these petitions—four hours in the life of a nation, when they are going to be burdened with the worst tax they have ever known.

Senator Simard: You had twenty-five hours last week or the week before.

Senator Olson: Maybe we need a little more time than that. Anyway, I think I have answered Senator Stewart. If Senator Simard has a question, I will be glad to answer it, but I do not want him to make a speech on the pretext of asking a question.

Senator Simard: I will not be long, senator.

[Translation]

I should like to put a letter on the record because it is important that I and honourable senators opposite listen to the citizens, to ordinary people as they often say and as Senator Hébert in particular likes to remind us—

[English]

Senator Olson: Ask your question.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: I have a letter dated last week from a student—

Senator Olson: I have a question, please.

[English]

Senator Simard: Senator, if there is a senator in this house who knows that the preamble can be long, it is you, Senator Olson. So please allow me to present my preamble here. This letter is from Sarah Montgrain, Ste-Foy, Québec.

[Translation]

Among other things, she enquired about the possibility of reforming the Senate and the proceedings of this chamber, and so on.

She raised 14 points in her letter. I will read two as a preamble to the comments I intend to make afterwards.

In point 9 Miss Montgrain says . . . she is a 19-year-old student in a Quebec City junior college. It is amazing how people—students especially—know what is going on.

I am referring to such disgraceful antics as we saw on TV two weeks ago where Senator Gigantès was seen ringing a bell.

It seems that every two or three days the CBC cannot do better than showing that sort of activities.

This only goes to show that a good many students in Quebec and elsewhere want to know what is happening, and I commend them for that.

In point 9, Miss Montgrain has this to say

> Do you think that senators elected by the people would be more efficient and more representative within the government? Perhaps the anarchy now prevailing in the Senate could have been avoided?

A good question on her part. There is more:

> Example: The unemployment insurance reform (C-21) which has yet to be settled and the GST legislation, not to mention the immigration system reform which has been in the works for 309 days, and the measure on refugee status, 272 days . . .

Those are a few examples she gave to illustrate the Liberal senators' conversion to democracy. She goes on the say, under Item 10:

> The Liberal senators who have instigated this inertia in the Senate since 1984, purporting to defend average Canadians against a Conservative majority dedicated to serving the interests of the financial community, were not as always as vigilant under Pierre Trudeau.

This according to our constituent from Quebec City, a student who wonders about your strategies, your filibuster. She goes on to say:

> At the time—

under Trudeau:

> —the Liberal majority in the Senate passed two bills—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is 12.30 p.m. and I intend to suspend the sitting of the Senate.

Senator Simard: Your Honour, I thank you for reminding me, and I am about to conclude.

> At the time, the Liberal majority in the Senate passed two unemployment insurance bills in the single day. Don't you think senators should be free from any political allegiance?

I wanted to read this into the record, to show that perhaps the time is not quite ripe, consider our problems and also the fact that unanimity is required for complete constitutional reform, which includes Senate reform.

I think the concerns expressed by this eighteen-year-old young lady from Quebec City are an indication that Canadians have had enough. In fact, the polls show that the Liberals led by Mr. Chrétien have been outstripped by the New Democratic Party.

So I would urge you, Senator Olson, and all the others to end your filibuster. You told us earlier that you were anxious to proceed with the substance of the debate on the GST. I would therefore urge you to end this filibuster. I will table this letter at the appropriate time.

Thank you honourable senators.

[English]

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt a senator when he is in full flight. However, there has been an agreement that the Senate would suspend its sittings from 12:30 to 1:30, and I so move.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended.

[Editor's Note: For continuation of proceedings see Issue No. 105D]

THE SENATE

[Editor's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Issue No. 105C.]

The sitting of the Senate was resumed at 1.30 p.m. Wednesday, Oct. 31, 1990.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO CALL ORDERS OF THE DAY—DEBATE RESUMED

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, before we adjourned for lunch I was about to reply to a question asked by Senator Simard. I suppose if we wait a few minutes he will perhaps return to the chamber. However, I wish to reply to some of the questions and opinions contained in the letter from a student. He would like me to reply to that and I certainly will. I would like to have the name and address of the student who wrote the letter in order that I can send her a more detailed explanation of some of the legitimate concerns she raised. As a matter of fact, I would like to ask Senator Simard to table the letter. I suppose eventually we will receive Hansard; however, it would be nice to have the original or a copy of the letter so we can be more precise in replying to it.

Senator Simard raised the matter of an elected Senate. Apparently the young lady was questioning whether or not that would be a better idea for the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Senator Murray is in favour of that. I was present in Alberta when he announced that on behalf of the government.

Senator Olson: I would like to tell Senator Murray that I would bet a lot of my entire fortune, however small it is, that if there were an elected Senate today Senator Murray would not be doing what he is doing. Even if there was a Conservative majority which had to answer to the people for what it had done to the Senate and what is being done through both the contents of Bill C-62 and its process—

Senator Frith: And the Prime Minister and the Queen would not have been able to stuff the place either.

Senator Olson: They could not have swamped the Senate. The Senate has been swamped, and the people resent that. The people resent anyone who does not play by the rules. I hope Senator Simard tells the young lady that.

There was a recent poll which I believe is fairly accurate. In fact, I am surprised it was so high. People were asked if they supported the tactics—never mind Bill C-62—that the senators used on October 4 and 9. Fifty-five per cent of the Canadian people said, "Yes, we support those tactics in that situation."

I am surprised, because I do not think any senator on either side of the house was very proud of the way the Senate had to act that day when we made all that noise.

Senator Hastings: Forced to act that way. Had to act that way.

Senator Olson: That is the point, and that is what we have to tell the young lady who wrote the letter. We had no choice. We were faced—

Senator Kelleher: That is what John Turner said.

Senator Olson: We were faced with a situation where the Speaker had violated the rules by calling the vote before the whips came in, in spite of what is written on page 57 of the rule book. To add insult to injury, the Leader of the Government attempted to move a motion that we proceed to Orders of the Day. I am sure his idea was to get to Bill C-62 and not to listen and not to follow the rules.

Senator Murray: It was a legitimate motion.

Senator Frith: Absolutely, but not then, and that was its purpose.

Senator Olson: That is interesting; he now claims that it was legitimate for him to trample and change the rules in the middle of the game.

Senator Murray: I could not be heard over the din. Mob rule took over.

Senator Frith: Mob rule against tyranny.

Senator Olson: Change the rules of the game so he could get his way. I was not going to get into this issue very deeply, but I should tell Senator Murray that if he thinks he can manage a parliamentary system with those tactics, he has a lot to learn. Many people have tried that before and none of them ever get away with it over the long haul.

I hope Senator Simard tells the student that when we were using those tactics, which every senator agrees were disagreeable, there was no other way of dealing with a bulldozer that was trampling on our rules. We had to prevent the government from further trampling on the rules of this institution and on the rights of the people to make representation to this institution.

Senator Simard elaborated rather extensively on the matter raised in the letter of an elected Senate. I have heard many senators say they are in favour of an elected Senate. I will tell you why I do not agree with their conclusion. I sincerely believe that if we ever have a Triple E, or an elected, Senate, then that will mean the end of responsible government. The government cannot be responsible to two institutions at the same time. The government at the moment is responsible to the House of Commons, and if it ever fails to get a majority in the House of Commons it is forced to resign. If the Senate is elected, will it be a duplicate of the House of Commons, with the political party divisions about the same, or will the government have to come to the Senate and demand a vote of confidence or resign? I do not think so.

I have heard many people, even some of my own colleagues, speak about Australia, where there is an elected Senate and House of Representatives, and suggest that it is somehow superior to what we have in Canada. I have spoken to a few Australians who do not believe it is any better than what we have; they believe it is worse. There has been chaos there a few times. That does not disturb me as much, but to hold that up as some great example that we should emulate in Canada is going too far. Only people who do not know any better can be pursuaded that Australia has a better system than ours. Perhaps I had better be careful, because I may be trampling on of the opinions of some of my own colleagues. However, I accept their views sincerely and I hope that they will accept my views sincerely. There will be no further responsible government as we know it, if we have an elected Senate. And that bothers me. I do not think we should abandon responsible government in this country. I like it better than the structure they have in the United States, for example.

● (1340)

I have known quite a few U.S. Secretaries. For example, when I was Minister of Agriculture I became very well acquainted with the Secretary of Agriculture. He told me that he had 45 bases to cover every time he wanted to get a bill through Congress. We have some, but not quite that many. Down there it is a nightmare. They have rules that allow them to make amendments to a bill unrelated to the bill itself. You have to deal with that before you can get it through Congress.

Well, they can have their system; I like ours better—and ours includes responsible government. The Prime Minister, his cabinet and government members have to maintain the confidence of the House of Commons or they lose.

One solution with respect to an elected Senate is that the administration should have its own mandate. That is what the President of the United States has. He goes to the people directly. He is elected for four years. He does not rely on a vote of confidence from either chamber. That is not part of the structure.

So I hope, Senator Simard, that when you reply to this young lady's letter, you explain all of those problems. They are very real indeed.

The honourable senator mentioned a number of other matters that we could deal with. I think some of them were comments that were slightly disparaging of, or an attempt to degrade, what goes on in the Senate. In Canada we respect the right of people to express their opinions in that respect. I do. I believe that young lady and everyone else has that right, and I will stand in their corner demanding that their right to do so be maintained. That does not mean that I agree with them.

I see Senator Chaput-Rolland is having a little problem with me, but I think she agrees with what I have just said.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: You have a problem with me, too.

Senator Olson: No, I have never had a problem with you. Never.

The point is, it is not too late. We do not have to pass this motion. It sounded as though there had been a great loss when we lost the vote on the motion when we were on petitions. That is fairly sad. I think that has done a great deal of damage to Parliament, particularly if it is ever used as a precedent. That is the danger.

Senator Murray won one of those before, when the Speaker intervened and locked the doors and prevented Liberal senators from coming in, and then called a vote. Then, of all things, I could not believe it, the next day he went about the country bragging: "Now we have a precedent." If the bells ring too long, and it does not suit us, we have the precedent of October 4, 1990 that we can use to shut the doors anytime we feel like it in the future.

We now have that, at least for the balance of this session, expunged from the rules and precedents, because we provided in our provisional rules for the length of time the bells are to ring on certain motions. However, honourable senators, that expires at the end of this session. I hope there are no senators opposite who think we are going to go back to a situation where what happened on October 4 is ever going to happen again. I know there are a lot of good, intelligent, reasonable people on the other side who will not support any attempt by the government leader or the Speaker, whoever is sitting in the Chair, ever to repeat that sad experience.

I think it was too bad that the Speaker ruled that the motion was in order, because it is completely clear to me that it was not. But he did, and then they have the majority on the other side, particularly the swamping senators.

Senator Barootes: Plurality, not majority.

Senator Olson: The swampers. You swamped us. However, as I said, and I am being reasonable, it is not too late. All that did was to put the motion on the floor. You can still repent and not pass this motion.

Senator Barootes: The end of the world is at hand. Repent.

Senator Olson: I hope that you will, because passing this motion means that you set another precedent where you can trample on the rights of petitioners anytime you get a little tired of hearing them.

I thought Senator Murray was a fairly patient man. After only four hours he ran out of patience. Senator Doody moved the motion to set aside everything and go to Orders of the Day. We lost the Question Period, too, and senators opposite will know that I like to have Question Period, because I have some very important questions to ask of the government. I have an obligation to ask questions about how many more bankruptcies we are going to have before the government changes course. How many more farmers do you want to run off the land before you do something reasonable and intelligent about the situation in international markets?

Senator Murray: Farm bankruptcies are down 39 per cent.

Senator Olson: There will come a day when you have no farmers left, and you will not have any more bankruptcies either. That is pretty clear. Ask those people what has happened to their income since 1984. The only thing you had in place since 1984 to help alleviate that situation were the policies put on the books by the previous government, such as the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. I admit that you put some more money in, but the policy was there and there were several hundred million dollars in the fund at the time. But after this government came to power it got so bad it had to put in more.

Senator Murray: We must have a debate on that some day, but the motion is whether we move to Orders of the Day.

Senator Olson: I know. If you do not like what I am saying—and I take it you do not—about some people who are concerned about this, then do not try to pirate in little inaccurate comments. I told you it was the policies that existed before you took office in 1984 which saved you for two or three years. Yet now you have abandoned even those. What are you doing to crop insurance and advance payments?

Hon. William M. Kelly: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Olson: Certainly.

Senator Kelly: I wonder if Senator Olson can tell me where we are right now? I may have lost track. I wonder if he can tell me precisely how this fits in with where I thought we were?

• (1350)

Senator Olson: I think we are at the point now where we are debating the motion to set aside all business until we get to Orders of the Day. I have a ligitimate complaint: It is that we will be skipping Question Period, and I want to ask a few questions about the plight of farmers in this country. I also want to ask a few questions about monetary policy; but, if this motion passes, I will not have an opportunity to do so.

Senator Kelly: Is Senator Olson saying that for now we are in Question Period?

Some Senators: No,

Senator Olson: I did not say that. I will explain to Senator Kelly very precisely where we are at.

Senator Hon. Corbin: Back to square one.

Senator Olson: We had a motion by Senator Doody that we move to Orders of the Day. There then ensued a debate, because many people on this side of the house, very intelligent people, including myself, believe that motion to be out of order. I have read the rule book once or twice and if honourable senators opposite want to be knowledgeable about the contents of the rule book, they should at least read it. It says in the rule book that there is no way one can move that motion unless there is a question before the house, and there was not.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Barootes: It is in Beauchesne.

Senator Olson: Senator Barootes may want to quote Beauchesne, and I will gladly respond to him, but, first, I have to respond to Senator Kelly who asked me where we were at. We were discusssing whether the motion was against the rules. A decision was made and a vote was taken and the Speaker ruled that the motion was in order. A vote was taken and it was decided by a majority, including the swamping senators, that the motion was in order. That is the motion we are now dealing with.

I am pleading with honourable senators, because if we move from Item No. 1, Presentation of Petitions, to Orders of the Day, which is Item No. 7, we would then wipe out Item No. 2, Reading of Petitions; Item No. 3, Reports of Committees; Item No. 4, Notices of Enquiries—and I do have a couple of those to present, but obviously I will not get an opportunity to do that.

Senator Kelly: Item No. 6 is where you are now, sir.

Senator Olson: No, I am not there. Item No. 5, Notices of Motions, would be wiped out, as well as Item No. 6, Question Period. What I am complaining about is that passage of this motion would wipe out Question Period.

If honourable senators opposite will give us an undertaking that we can start at Item No. 1 and go through the "Order of Business," I will be glad to hear that.

I was pressing Senator Murray some time ago to give his commitment that we would go back, but when he realized what he was doing, of course, he backed off. That is too bad.

I must explain to Senator Kelly why I am so disturbed that Question Period is going to be wiped out. Do senators opposite think that farmers in Western Canada, who have been suffering through the terribly severe economic conditions compounded by drought, for the past seven years, are going to be happy if we cannot ask the government to explain the policies that have led them into this disaster? I get letters and phone calls every day and I travel around Southern Alberta to meet those people. They did not do anything. They did not make any drastic changes in terms of borrowing more money that might contribute to the problems they are having. Of course, part of their problem results from the situation with the international grain market. The other part of their problem stems from the monetary policy of this government.

Senator Hastings: Toryism

Senator Olson: That is why I am complaining about not having a Question Period.

Senator Kenny: What questions would you have asked?

Senator Olson: I would have asked that one, and I would have asked when the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada are going to repent and let people live in this country without being under the usury that is now being inflicted on people because of the high interest rates.

About fifteen years ago— in the mid 1970's—farmers were getting over twice as much for wheat as they are getting today. It was at about $6.00 a bushel by the time they got the final payment. Today they get less than $3.00 a bushel. Since then, they have had 15 years of inflation on all their cost factors including fuel. They are now having to pay 14 to 15 per cent on all debt service charges. That is the problem about which I want to ask the government during Question Period, and that is why I want to have a Question Period.

Why does the government keep following this monetary policy that leaves interest rates 500 and up to 600 basis points above the United States? I will keep on asking these questions every time we have a Question Period, but apparently we will not have one for several days if the government continues to be as stubborn as it is.

Senator Barootes: As soon as you pass the bill we will have a Question Period. Just vote on it.

Senator Frith: Killing us with kindness.

Senator Hastings: That is your attitude.

Senator Olson: It is like asking a person if he wants his head cut off or if he wants to be shot. The consequences are the same.

Senator Frith: You withdraw the bill and we will forget about Question Period.

Senator Barootes: We love Question Period.

Senator Frith: You withdraw the bill and we will talk.

Senator Barootes: Put it up for a vote now. Bring in your troops.

Senator Frith: Withdraw it right now. Bring in your troops. Withdraw the bill, then we will talk.

[Translation]

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senator, could you give me the floor?

[English]

I do not want to speak; I was asking if I may speak.

Senator Olson: If you want to ask a question I would be glad to hear it, but I cannot give you permission to speak; only the Chair can do that.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I have been in this Senate for two years. Are you going to give me the courtesy of being permitted to say a few words, or are you not?

Senator Frith: We have not yet decided.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I am going to ask the Speaker for that right.

Senator Olson: You have the right to ask if you can ask a question, otherwise you have to wait your turn like everyone else.

● (1400)

In the meantime, I have the floor.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I will try to ask a question.

Senator Olson: All right.

Senator Frith: Try.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: That is very kind of you.

[Translation]

Today, for the past two hours, Sir, you have been saying that Senators on this side are against petitions. Let me tell you, Senator ("Honourable" got stuck in my throat) that if we had no rights as citizens—

[English]

Senator Olson: Don't worry, "honourable" to me means nothing, anyway.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Not for me, either. Not in this house any more.

Senator Olson: If you don't want to be insulted, don't start it.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Oh, sir, you are very kind.

Senator Frith: Take your turn and make a speech.

Senator Olson: Take your turn.

Senator Frith: Senator Olson, this is not a question. She should take a turn and make a speech, and then we will listen to her speech.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator can make a speech on this motion whenever she is recognized. If she wants to ask a question, she should put the question.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: The senator was only—

Some Hon. Senators: Sit down!

Senator MacDonald: She was only trying to ask you a question.

Senator Olson: No, she was not. She started to out to spice up her speech by wondering whether or not she could call me honourable. I will tell her right straight to her face that if she wants to start out with a bunch of insults, then she had better take the heat or get out of the kitchen.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Chaput-Rolland was just starting out with a preamble to her question.

Senator Olson: She was not. Sit down! She said she did not know whether she could call me honourable or not, and if she wants to start out with that kind of garbage, I too know how to dish it out.

Senator MacDonald: Then wait your turn!

Senator Olson: It's my turn now! If you want to ask a question, go ahead, but don't try to make a speech.

Senator Barootes: Senator Stewart's question was 20 minutes long!

Senator Olson: I am used to rather long preambles. That does not trouble me. However, Senator MacDonald had better get his thinking straightened out, too. You may be able to bulldoze Murray and the others over there, but you are not going to be able to bulldoze us one at a time. Just forget it!

Senator MacDonald: I am waiting to hear the preamble to the senator's question.

Senator Olson: You can tell her and everyone else over there, that if you treat us with respect, you will get treated the same way back.

[Translation]

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Senator, I did not say you were not honourable. I said that over the past two months I have found it increasingly difficult to say "honourable senators" because I think we have all lost some of the meaning of the word "honourable". Here is the question I wanted to put to you: Why do you, sir, think that we on this side of the chamber are against petitions?

Petitions do convey a message, and over the years I have always been among the first to sign them, to draft them, and to deliver them. You are right to say that you want to deliver the petitions you receive, but I am asking you whether it is necessary to read them one by one, to give such details as addresses, ages, postal codes and so on. I do not think that is what Canadians want.

What the people of Canada want, perhaps rightfully so, this is not for me to decide . . . May I have your attention? I did listen to you for two months. I listened to you very carefully, Senator Frith, and quite often too. I should think that now you might urge your colleagues to do me the same favour, if because I am a Conservative senator—

[English]

Senator Olson: Have you got another question?

Senator Beaudoin: She has the right to speak.

[Translation]

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I asked you earlier what made you say that Conservative senators on this side of the chamber do not want to hear Canadians explain why they are not in favour of this bill. I can understand their disapproval, I can understand their mistrust, but what I cannot understand is that you would use petitions and abuse the privilege. If you would listen to me, sir—

[English]

If I speak to you in English, I can do it very well. However, in this room, from now on, it is neither French nor English that we speak. It is a language of accusation, of dissension, of allegation, and I am fed up with it!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: That's good!

Senator Hastings: You're doing well! Who started it?

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I have every right, as you have, sir, to stand up in this room and have my say. If you want to try to stop me, you will have to try again, because—

Senator Frith: We won't, but take your turn. We will listen. You can speak on this motion. We will wait to hear from you. However, let him finish and then take your turn. We are not going to deny you the right to speak on the motion. In fact, Madam, let us make it clear: Far from denying you the right to speak on this motion, we are waiting and we will be glad to hear from you. We will applaud when you stand up and tell us what you think, but take your turn. Other people want to speak, I am sure, and we hope that you will speak on the motion.

Senator Perrault: And speak at length!

Senator Chaput-Rolland: If you do not want me to speak now—

Senator Olson: No. I have the floor now.

Senator Frith: Take your turn.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I asked you a question three times. On what kind of principle—

Senator Frith: As soon as he is finished, you're on!

Senator Olson: Do you want to sit down while I answer the question?

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Perhaps I should ask you again, because you did not seem to understand.

Senator Olson: No; I heard the question. I was just waiting for you to complete your preamble. Honourable senators, the question was very clear. I hope the honourable senator will get up and speak, and I am told by my colleagues that they will be very happy if you do get up and make your speech right after me. In the meantime, I will answer your question. You asked the question as to whether we did not believe that you are in favour of the people's right to petition their Parliament.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: That is not what I asked at all.

Senator Olson: It sure sounded like it to us.

Senator Frith: Sure did.

Senator Corbin: Speak clearly!

Senator Olson: Yes, speak clearly!

[Translation]

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I beg your pardon, sir. I usually make myself clearly understood in this country either in English or in French. Once again I ask you this: "On what do you, Liberal senators, base your assumption that we, Conservative senators, are against citizens sending us petitions to express their disagreement with a bill"? You have the sacrosanct right to present these petitions to the Senate but not to abuse the process as you have done. Please answer my question.

[English]

Senator Olson: Now, that is true. I accept the additional explanation, although I have to tell you that I understood you the first time very clearly. The way you can demonstrate that is to kill this motion. Vote against this motion and then there is no question that you are going to continue to honour and respect the people's right to petition their Parliament. However, if you pass this motion, you will trample on those rights.

Senator Corbin: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: I do not care how you wish to carry your petitions into the house. Senator Murray told us something today that I found incredible. I could not believe it. He said that he was not aware that his office had petitions in it. That is what he said: He did not have any petitions. Have none of the rest of you got any petitions asking you to delay or kill, or do away with, or defeat—or whatever the right word is—this iniquitous Bill C-62?

Senator Perrault: Of course you do!

Senator Olson: Well, Senator Murray is shaking his head. I know there are a lot of people in southern Alberta who would like you to know they do not want this bill passed. Would you like me to ask them to send you a few petitions?

An Hon. Senator: They are here!

Senator Olson: Oh, we have got a few. Look at that! Honourable senators, I want to conclude, if I may, by saying that it is not too late if Senator Chaput-Rolland wishes to demonstrate her respect for the right of the people—

Senator Murray: Those boxes are why this motion has to pass. That is an abuse of the rules.

Senator Frith: You don't like them?

Senator Perrault: Democracy frightens the dickens out of you!

Senator Murray: That is why this motion has to pass.

Senator Olson: There is a little interference from that side.

• (0410)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order!

An Hon. Senator: Call him to order.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Senator Buckwold, would you remove those two boxes? I cannot see you.

An Hon. Senator: There is nobody there! There is no one there!

Senator Olson: I was trying to explain to the senators opposite that it is not too late. If you respect the people's right to petition their Parliament, then all you need do is defeat this motion. If I were convinced at this stage that you were going to defeat this motion, then I would sit down and let the vote come right away; but I am not sure. You did not give that commitment You did not say, "Yes, I am going to defend the people's right to petition Parliament," and therefore I am going to vote against all motions that trample on those rights, like the motion before us now.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: If you want to stand up and say that, so that I am confident that you are going to respect people's right, then I do not need to finish my speech.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Then, may I speak?

Senator Olson: I am not quite finished yet. I wanted first to give you an answer to your question, and then I have a few more things I want to say. The point I want to make is that it is not too late, that you can repent. You can say, "We were wrong in trying to bulldoze over the rights of people and the right to have their petitions presented." You can still do that, and I hope you will, because if this gets into our books as a precedent, it would be one of the most disgraceful things that anyone could do to the people of Canada and to the respect they have had for their Parliament up until now.

We know that they have been getting away with this kind of trampling of rights in the House of Commons, but the people will deal with that as soon as they get a chance to get at them. There probably will not be even 15 per cent left. If they do not have more than 15 per cent, they will not get any place. Here we have to do things a little differently. What we need from members opposite is an assurance that they will not proceed with this motion, that they will not vote for it. You can shorten the debate a great deal by simply getting up and saying, "Sorry, we have been misled. We were told that this motion would not do all that damage." I will tell you one thing: You are not going to win by being in a hurry. You are willing to trample on everyone, all the rights of the people, on the rights of Parliament, and so on, because you are a little impatient to get Bill C-62; but you are not that naive. I know it. We have told you that what we are doing is trying to delay this bill, and you understood that. Well, I will tell you we are going to keep on doing that.

An Hon. Senator: For the people of Canada.

Senator Olson: For the people of Canada, until you get the message. You apparently have not yet got the message from the people of Canada. It is a long way to an election. I would think that if the polls do not change, you are probably not going to go to the people at all until your mandate runs out. That is November 21, 1993.

An Hon. Senator: Good God!

Senator Olson: That is too far.

An Hon. Senator: Let us have a referendum.

Senator Olson: How about a referendum? How about asking the people? I am not even asking that. How about even listening to the people?

Senator Frith: We do not need a referendum; we have got it right here in the petition.

Senator Olson: Senator David knows very well that 85 per cent or 90 per cent of the people do not want the bill to pass.

Some Hon. Senators: Let us have a referendum.

An Hon. Senator: Immigration, capital punishment, everything!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Good for you. A real democrat, finally.

An Hon. Senator: Let us have a referendum.

Senator Frith: We could have one on how the Globe and Mail conducts surveys.

Senator Olson: The Globe and Mail, that great democratic institution that speaks for the ordinary people! We are talking about real people, on real streets, the main streets and residential streets of Canada.

Senator Perrault: They do not know anything about real people.

Senator Olson: I know that the Globe and Mail and the Business Council on National Issues, and the Canadian Bank—and I think even the Canadian Chamber of Commerce—backed off. I tell you, they will back off when they find out what happens to their membership, because their members do not support them. I know that we have hundreds of towns in Alberta and British Columbia that are going to send the Canadian Chamber of Commerce a message and tell them, "You do not represent us when you go before the Senate committee and tell them we are in favour of Bill C-62, because we are not." They do not want anyone coming to Ottawa pretending that they represent those businesses and then saying they are in favour of Bill C-62.

An Hon. Senator: A state of war!

Senator Olson: No it is not a state of war. It is just that people come here and pretend that they represent somebody when they do not. That is what they do.

The laughable part about it was that Mr. d'Aquino came before us from the Business Council on National Issues and said that everyone who criticizes this bill does not understand it. That is what he said.

Senator Frith: Like he does.

Senator Olson: Afterwards he wrote me a letter. When he got up to leave, I think I was a little annoyed, because it was a terrible performance, and I said, "It is a complete waste of time listening to you."

An Hon. Senator: It sure is.

Senator Olson: It was. He does not represent anyone who counts. He represents 150 of the big corporations in this country. They count for a little bit, but they are not the ones who elect Members of Parliament. I know what they are going to do; I can see it already. They are going to try to use their clout and their capability either to contribute to parties or to withhold their contributions, to try to force the people of Canada or the political parties to support this tax. I have news for you: We ain't gonna do it! We are not going to submit to that kind of pressure. It has been tried before.

In conclusion, you can remedy the difficulty that we have had over the last couple of days simply by defeating this motion.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: In the long run I am sure you will be glad that you did. Don't get sucked in by these leaders who say "We have got to have this legislation now." I will tell you something: You never have to have legislation that the people do not want, never!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: What is the hurry? Why have you got to rush it through? Because the Minister of Finance and some of his bureaucrats say that if they do not get it by a certain date—and I think two dates have gone by already—then they cannot implement it on the first of January? I understand their anxiety, but I also understand that the people who will be affected by this have some rights too. Now you are trampling on every one of them, one at a time, in your hurry to bring in Bill C-62, so that you can bring in a tax regime that nobody wants except the big shots.

I know quite a few of these guys, and they are not all that interested in the welfare of Canada the way they say. They are interested in who is going to pay the taxes in this country. That is what they are interested in, and they know bloody well that if Bill C-62 passes and they get this regime set up, there will be an enormous transfer of the tax burden from them to the middle- and low-income people all across this country.

Senator Frith: The people who have written these petitions know what is happening.

• (1420)

Senator Olson: My province is not the worst. Probably Old Crow in the Yukon has the worst problems. It was calculated that those people would pay 158 per cent more tax on the same items than the people in central Canada. Do you want to support that? That is what you are going to do if you move to Orders of the Day and Bill C-62.

It is a little better in British Columbia, but not much. It is a little better in Alberta, but not much. Some Conservatives opposite, especially Senator Robertson, say, "Don't you say that anymore, Olson." Albertans will pay approximately 20 per cent more tax on the same package of goods as people living in southwestern Ontario. Do you think that is fair? The people out there do not think it is fair.

We have been told that it will be a substitute tax. Whatever else one wishes to say about the manufacturers' sales tax, it was paid at the manufacturers' door, or when the manufacturer wrote out the invoice, and everyone in Canada paid the same tax on the same item, and the freight and other charges were not added in before calculating the 7 per cent tax. I know Senator MacDonald was there and he heard people say that, but why senators opposite do not listen now is beyond me. That is why we have to stop this motion.

I will conclude by pleading with senators opposite once more, do not do this terrible thing to Parliament and to the right of people to petition Parliament. There is still time, and perhaps you could listen to a few more speeches until you are really convinced and then defeat this terrible motion. It will do damage not only to Parliament, but to a whole generation—that is, 30 years of damage to the Conservative Party. I can promise senators opposite one thing. We will bring it up over and over again. We will not let the people of Canada forget that you did this to their Parliament. You are doing a terrible thing and you should stop and think it over. I do not care whether you repent or just feel sorry that you got sucked in the first time. However, whatever you do, do not pass this motion if you have any respect for the democractic institutions we have established in this country over the past 120 or 125 years.

Hon. S. Chaput-Rolland: I thank you, sir, for letting me say a few words. I wish to say a few words about the definition of democracy that I have heard in this chamber over the last month. Democracy does not only rest in the right to—

Senator Cools: Speak to the motion.

[Translation]

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I thought, Senator Cools, that I had the right to speak, after Senator Olson, of whatever I wanted to say, according to your rules. In fact, I think I have this right and I will take it. I will ask you to show me the same courtesy I had for you. Please listen to me. I promise I will not keep you here as long as you did. I have heard in this Chamber so many incredible things in the last two months that I feel I must voice my reaction.

The right to submit petitions, like the ones I see stacked up on your table, honourable senators, I fought for this right as much as anyone else. We are gathered here in this Chamber, among people who have been chosen. I asked today that the list of the senators chosen by Mr. Trudeau be sent to me. I could read it to you, but it would take a lot of time.

What I mostly want to tell you, honourable senators, is that we can be against a law, we can fight against it, that also is the democratic way to do things.

[English]

That is the name of the game. But the way it is being done in this chamber, it is the shame of the game.

[Translation]

I never would have thought I would see people as intelligent, rich and powerful as you and we are—

[English]

Senator Haidasz: What about Charbonneau's closure?

Senator Frith: She voted for it and she talks about the shame.

Senator Beaulieu: You were at the door waiting.

Senator Frith: They locked the door five minutes early to make sure, just in case we came in. Shame is the word all right, but it is on the wrong side.

[Translation]

Senator Chaput-Rolland: It is difficult to make any kind of intelligent speech after so many frivolous interruptions. I was just trying to say—

Senator Cools, I listened to you for awhile, and I could say the same to you. I think I have the right to say a few words as well, but it isn't easy.

There has been a lot of talk about democracy, and democracy starts with human dignity. You were right, but there was an incredible lack of dignity in the way you attacked the Speaker of this Chamber whom I have known for 35 years—

Senator Thériault: We had reason to!

Senator Chaput-Rolland: —who is a brave man, a man who fought for his country to defend those democratic principles you fail to respect.

Honourable senators, I listened to you, and perhaps you could let me have my say once in a while. After all, this is the first time I have spoken in this Chamber since June 27.

[English]

Senator Olson: You should not be so sensitive.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Sir, after hearing you throw insults at us, I think it is my right not to be sensitive but to be damned angry. If that is not the language of the Senate, you have taught me to use it.

It is all very well and easy to say that this law that the government is passing is not very popular. That is correct, it is not a very popular law.

[Translation]

Your Prime Minister Trudeau had more courage than you do because one day, despite the views of most—Come on, gentlemen.

[English]

Senator Olson: He listened to the people.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: No, he did not. I was there as a journalist—

Senator Frith: Back in the good old days when you were a Liberal? We remember those good old days and we still hope you will return to the fold after your small sojourn in purgatory and hell.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Sir, I gave you the right to speak and I think you should permit me the same right.

Senator Olson: Do you know how many seats Trudeau got in the last election in which he ran? He got 74 out of 75.

[Translation]

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senators, that is not what I was talking about. When Mr. Trudeau had the courage—

[English]

Senator Olson: You got Roch LaSalle. Only one out of 75 who did not vote for him was the very popular Roch LaSalle. I know them all.

• (1430)

[Translation]

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senators, if I can speak French in this place, even if you understand only a little or not at all, it is because, one day—

Senator Hébert: Stop bemoaning and speak French, will you!

Senator Chaput-Rolland: You spent enough time doing the very same thing, Senator Hébert, that you could show me the same courtesy for ten minutes. What I am trying to say is that, when Mr. Trudeau passed the Official Languages Act, he was not very popular with some people in this country. There were petitions then too. Yet he passed the legislation. That may be what is happening now. Perhaps we are trying to pass this piece of legislation, although some of us—I included—believe that it is far from perfect.

Senator Thériault: Mr. Trudeau always had the support of a majority for his Official Languages Act. What are you talking about? He always had a majority.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Senator Thériault, I spoke about the courage of Mr. Trudeau. I did not speak against the Official Languages Act, not at all. I simply want to say that there are politicians—like us on this side of the chamber—who know that sometimes the laws go against public opinion because people do not always understand them, but that does not mean the people are wrong because they do not understand them. It simply means that now and then the Prime Minister has to disregard public opinion because he knows that a law is necessary. I think this law is necessary. After all, to whom do we owe the gaps in our finances which this legislation is designed to fill?

You were in office for a very long time. Perhaps you might agree that we have to make sacrifices. You have been talking for months on end, but you know that the legislation will go through. Indeed you may succeed in delaying it for a long time yet, but sooner or later, it will pass.

But the lesson you have given me, the lesson you have given to the woman I am on the way you see democracy, on the way you see what you put this House through by creating an unbelievable commotion I have never seen in my 40 years of political experience, is one of the things I am most ashamed of and not proud of at all. I think you should occasionally have the decency to admit that your ways of passing a law are not the best.

If this House that has an important— Again, I will ask you to listen to me a couple more minutes.

If this House that has a transcending importance in Canada's life was to disappear, believe me, you would be the first responsible and you would go down history for it. This is better than anything I could ever say.

Hon. Gildas Molgat: Would you allow me a question, senator?

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Certainly, Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: You said that in your 40 years of public life you had never seen a chamber in such a state as this one was a few days ago. I agree with you. Like you, I deplore what happened. But in your 40 years of public life have you ever seen a situation where a Speaker went directly, absolutely against the very clearly written rules of the House? Where surely the Speaker went undoubtedly against the rules? Have you ever seen that in your 40 years of public life?

[Senator Hébert.]

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senators, I am not the only one here to have heard some of you asking people to wait and not enter the chamber, and that was before the doors were closed. I am not the only one to have heard that. There might have been mistakes. We do not have on our side qualities like you do. We have not been created like you by God to be always perfect. But nevertheless there are ways—

[English]

Senator Olson: I thought you were perfect. Go ahead.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I am not, but you are. I have listened to you for two years; I have learned how perfect you are.

[Translation]

What I am referring to, Senator Molgat, are these shenanigans, this shouting, this constant banging on your desk, this ringing of the bells. You and I must have read the same newspapers. You must realize how the Canadian people are disgusted with your antics and, not because they oppose the legislation, for they have every right to do so. In a democracy, I will fight anytime and anywhere for the people's right to say yes and no to a piece of legislation, whichever the government introduced it. I am not talking about that.

What I am talking about is the demonstration you gave us that you are unable to accept the will of the majority. You insulted here all the new senators. You know by now that the Supreme Court of Ontario ruled in favour of this decision.

The people who are here in the Senate are doing us honour. Having had the privilege to work together with Mrs. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, Mr. Claude Castonguay and the others, I know that they have every right and are proud to be here.

What have I heard from the other side for the past two months? Nothing but insulting remarks, accusations, innuendos, name calling as in "the Britishers", everything.

Can we not respect an article in the Constitution? If your Mr. Trudeau did not want it, honourable senators, do you not think that he had the proper mandate at the time to remove it? If he decided that Article 26 should remain in the Constitution was it not for someone to use it eventually? Honourable senators, the Constitution of a country is most sacred. If you are against the Constitution, say so. On the other hand, if you support the Constitution, under difficult circumstances, you should have the good grace to accept the other senators who are here and respect their presence as I respect yours, although I do not find it easy today to do so.

Senator Molgat: Senator Chaput-Rolland, you have not answered my question which is clear and simple. Have you ever seen, during the forty years you said you were involved in politics, a situation where the Speaker was in breach of the rules of the House in an attempt to prevent senators from voting? I was deprived of my right to vote. I was not notified that a vote was about to take place.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Senator Molgat, you should have used that right when it was available to you.

Senator Molgat: Senator Chaput-Rolland, either you did not read our rules or you do not want to understand them. The rules are very clear and I followed them exactly. The Speaker decided to call a vote, which had never happened before, never, not only in my 40 years of public life but in the 123 years of existence of the Senate. This was never done before. It is against the rules. The Speaker has no such right in this chamber. He granted himself rights that he does not have. He deprived me and many others here of our right to vote. Are you suggesting that we should simply take it and sit down? Don't you think we have a right, even an obligation to stand up and defend the most sacred right in a democratic system, which is the right to vote? You have taken away that right.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Senator Molgat, am I to believe that senator Everett and senator Molson had to break the doors to come in?

● (1449)

Senator Molgat: Senators Molson and Everett received a personal letter. Me, I did not receive any. And you have the guts to rise and say that we should accept that? Frankly, senator, where are you coming from?

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Senator Molgat, your whip had the same position as ours.

Senator Molgat: He received the letter at 5:15; how could he contact everybody? Come on, senator Chaput-Rolland, you are not being reasonable!

Senator Hébert: It is against all the principles of democracy.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Senator Hébert, it seems to me that you should be the last person to give me lessons in democracy in this House.

Senator Hébert: I would not be the last one, I can assure you!

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I assure you that your lessons in democracy do not impress me very much. We let you do what you wanted. You read your petitions at length. So, I beg you, at least have the decency to recognize that not many people here kept you from talking. Only when you—

Senator Hébert: You keep me from talking and that is serious.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Was it not your strategy to do exactly what you did?

Senator Hébert: No, senator Chaput-Rolland.

The Hon. Eymard Corbin: Our strategy was—

Senator Chaput-Rolland: What a nice confession admission! It is wonderful, Senator, your admission is splendid. I compliment you and I thank you.

Senator Corbin: I would like to ask you a question.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: No, I have had enough!

Senator Corbin: I am going to make a comment. I have heard you talking drivel on Montreal radio stations for years. I know about your sacrosanct democracy. It is a hypocritical democracy, senator.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Do you think, senator, that the Montreal radio stations would have hired me if I had denounced them for 25 years? I am friends with some of their reporters. Do you think I would have been fired from Radio-Canada, TéléMétropole, CKAC and CJAD if I had said anything against them? For heaven's sake, at least have the decency to admit against whom it was done!

Senator Corbin: Against whom?

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I have never attacked radio stations, although I, like most Canadian reporters, have criticizd the Senate. I admit it but I certainly had a good reason to do so.

Senator Corbin: You weren't exactly charitable towards certain political figures when you weren't in politics, which doesn't mean you had the God-given right to go on the way you did. You abused your privileges as journalist.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Never!

Senator Corbin: And today, you are trying to put us in our place, like some Mother Superior. Go and talk to the wall, I am not in the least bit impressed.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I am already talking to a wall, Senator, so I might as well sit down!

[English]

Hon. Anne C. Cools: I believe the honourable senator said that we should accept the appointment of the eight senators with—and I believed she used the word "grace." Would the honourable senator tell us what she means by "grace"? Does she mean "gracefully" or "graciously" or something else?

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I thank you, Senator Cools, for suggesting that I have grace. Sometimes I feel anger; sometimes I feel love; sometimes I feel passion. To say what grace is, I can only say that I know what it is not. It is what you do not have.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate this afternoon on the motion by Senator Doody that the house do now move to the Orders of the Day. I particularly welcome the contribution—although I do not know if I totally agree with it—of Senator Chaput-Rolland. She had some fairly disparaging remarks to make with respect to the conduct of this chamber as we sought to fulfil our responsibility to the people of Canada.

I would remind the honourable senator that 56 per cent of the people of Canada support the tactics Liberal senators are using, which is about 41 per cent more than support of the Prime Minister she worships. When she tells me about the minority withholding the will of the majority, let me remind her that for three days in this Chamber it was the minority over there who precluded this house from making a decision. She was part of that, and we learned well from the filibuster that was carried out on that side which prevented the house from making a decision. But now, sanctimoniously, we hear her tell how terrible it is for the Liberals to do this. She did it for three days. You raised a point of privilege, that you used, and abused in this house, and precluded the report from being tabled. That was fair game. However, on this side it is terrible and we are told we must not do it. We are told that we must not preclude this great Tory majority, including the royal regional representatives, eight of them brought here by the Queen, who appointed them to trample on the rights of the minority and on the rights of Canadians who seek to put petitions before this house with respect to Bill C-62.

We are talking about petitions and the right of all Canadian citizens to petition this Parliament—a right that has existed through the ages. We are talking of the right of the subject to petition the Monarch in an aggrieved situation. Since 1576 it has never been interrupted, until Senator Doody interrupted it today. Now we are going to break any rule to fulfil the program of the government.

Beauchesne has been quoted a great deal as the authority of Parliamentary procedure. What does Beauchesne say with respect to the right to petition? He says:

> The right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the constitution and has been exercised without interruption since 1867.

Honourable senators, we are going to interrupt it today on the motion of Senator Doody. We will be breaking new ground and changing the rules to fulfil the objectives of the government. I should also like to quote what Erskine May has to say with respect to petitions. It states there:

> The right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principal of the Constitution. It has been uninterruptedly exercised from very early times and has a profound effect in determining the main forms of parliamentary procedure.

Honourable senators, it has been uninterrupted until today by the Deputy Leader of the government in the Senate. Erskine May goes on to state:

> Public petitions may pray for an alteration of the general law or the re-consideration of a general administrative decision, and they may also pray for redress of local or personal grievances . . .

That is the authority, honourable senators, for public petitions.

Another authority is $%An Introduction to the Procedure of the House of Commons$% where it deals with petitions as follows:

> The practice of petitioning the Crown goes back beyond Parliament. Procedure on petitions was a large part of the business of Parliament from the beginning. They were submitted in writing and were dealt with systematically by being sorted by Receivers and heard by committees of the council in Parliament called Triers. In the great Parliament of 1305, the records of which are unusually complete, nearly five hundred Petitions were presented and they were heard of by four bodies of Parliament.

• (1450)

In 1305 they did not decide to put petitions aside for urgent government business. They dealt with 500 of them. However, we are called upon today to put them aside to deal with this urgent government program and priorities. Well, what do I tell the petitioners who have asked me to petition this Parliament? Do I tell them that we filed the petition of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, and that all the others, according to the Ottenheimer principle, will be put in cardboard boxes and stored in the Clerk's office where they can be studied and examined after the bill has passed? What do I tell the following petitioners?

(Names of signatories read)

Do I tell them that we read the Manufacturers Association petition and then we threw theirs in a box and sent them to the basement?

Senator Fairbairn: You forgot the three employees.

Senator Hastings: Of course, the three employees. I hope they get a wonderful Christmas bonus. Greg MacDougall's contribution to Toryism went way beyond the call of duty when he signed that petition.

Senator Buckwold: It was the call of Doody!

Senator Hastings: Everyone in Nova Scotia will be proud of Greg MacDougall signing that petition, and I know he is going to be anxious to get home at Christmas to tell them he signed that petition in favour of the goods and services tax for his boss.

What do I tell the next petitioner?

(Names of signatory read)

Do I tell him that his petition is in a box in the Clerk's office and we will get around to looking at it after we have passed the bill? What about the next one?

(Names of signatory read)

Senator Fairbairn: I would not want to tell her, because she is a good lawyer.

Senator Hastings: No, I would not want to tell her that her petition is in a cardboard box hidden somewhere in the Clerk's office, and that I can go and study it and make notes on it after we pass the bill, if and when we ever pass it. What about the following?

(Names of signatories read)

What do I tell the people who sent me this petition? "I'm sorry, we passed the one from the Canadian Manufacturers Association, and all the others were thrown in a box into the Clerk's office and anybody can go and see and study them, according to the Ottenheimer theory, and make notes after the fact"?

Senator Corbin: The CMA's petition was not in proper form.

Senator Hastings: But these people, availing themselves of that right to petition their Parliament, will now be denied that right by this motion now before us. What about the following petitioners?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I rise on a point of order. We are on the motion; we are not reading petitions.

Senator Frith: What is that motion?

Senator Phillips: The motion is to proceed to the Orders of the Day.

Senator Frith: And not to deal with petitions?

Senator Phillips: No. It does not say a thing about petitions.

Senator Frith: But is that not the effect? Of course it is.

Senator Phillips: That is for you to decide.

Senator Frith: Carry on, senator. You are absolutely right. If you want to debate it, go ahead.

Senator Phillips: The Speaker should give us some guidance. We went through all this yesterday. We are repeating it again today. Let us cut out this nonsense and get down to work for a change.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like it to be clear that I am speaking on the point of order and not on the motion. Let us have a debate on this point of order. Anyone else is welcome to join in the debate on the point of order raised by Senator Phillips. Senator Phillips now says that a speech on a motion that deals with proceeding to Orders of the Day while the Senate is under the heading of petitions is somehow inappropriate. Let us have no misunderstanding about that. Let us remember that the house order was voted upon by everyone on the opposite side, including everyone on this side, and I am referring just to the senators in the chamber: Senator Meighen; Senator Bolduc; Senator Barootes; Senator Doyle, about to leave; the person who has raised the point of order, Senator Phillips; Senator Macdonald; Senator Cochrane; Senator Rossiter; Senator Marshall; Senator Tremblay.

[Translation]

—and others, including the so-called senators—

[English]

They all voted for the house order; and what did the house order say that is relevant to what we are speaking about now?

Senator Fairbairn: Read it out!

Senator Frith: Let us have a look. The senator who raised the point of order has been driven from the chamber! No, no, he is coming back.

Senator Cools: He has just been trying to get a quorum.

Senator Frith: The order says:

> That upon the adoption of this Order, notwithstanding any Provisional or other Rule of the Senate, the following provisions shall apply:

This is the order that was voted on and supported by everyone, unanimously. Every senator supported this. The first thing it dealt with was Bill C-28, the clawback bill. Did we hear any objections or any points of order when we dealt with Bill C-28, when we dealt with it in strict compliance with the order? Did you hear any points of order then?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Frith: Did Senator Phillips get up and say, "On a point of order"? This provisional order deals with Bill C-28 and it was agreed that we would deal with that and, as it says, we shall:

> —interrupt any proceedings then before the Senate and proceed to put forthwith and successively, without any further debate or amendment, all questions necessary to dispose of the said Bill.

Well, is that not what we did?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes!

Senator Frith: Did we not all do that on all sides? No one raised a point of order about that.

Senator Fairbairn: We did it in good faith.

Senator Frith: Yes, we did it in good faith. It was done. They got their bill. Senator Phillips can take that, stick it in his pocket and say, "Good, got the Grits to go along with that." No points of order on that point. Then the order continues:

> That, in relation to Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, unless previously disposed of, at not later than 8.00 o'clock p.m., on Monday, October 22, 1990, the Senator then in the Chair shall, if required, interrupt any proceedings then before the Senate and proceed to put forthwith and successively, without any further debate or amendment, all questions necessary to dispose of the said Bill.

Well, is that not what happened?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Senator Frith: This is the order they voted for. Did they raise any points of order then?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Frith: Did you raise any points of order?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Frith: Did anyone raise any points of order?

Some Hon. Senators: No! No one!

Senator Frith: That was fine. They loved it then. They loved this order then. Even Cogger clapped. Good old Cogger. Cogger loved it then. Cogger was crazy about it then. It was his favourite house order. It was at the top of his hit parade. The favourite order of Cogger and everyone else was this order. Remember those days? They were just a few days ago. That was when all the Tories loved this thing.

Senator Buckwold: They claimed victory!

Senator Frith: They gloated, right. After Bill C-21 was passed, did they raise any points of order?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

• (1500)

Senator Frith: Did Mrs. McDougall say to them: "You had better raise a point of order on that. I mean, those Grits are going to give me my bill. Good for you, Senator Murray. You managed to get the Grits to agree to do that. Maybe you had better raise a point of order, though. They are coming along. They are doing exactly what they promised to do. There must be something wrong." Maybe Senator Phillips would raise a point of order and say: "No, we do not want the Grits to do that. Let us hear from Senator Barootes." Senator Barootes, did he raise a point of order?

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

Senator Barootes: What do you want? An Emmy Award too? We will give you an Emmy as well.

An Hon. Senator: An Oscar.

Senator Barootes: An Oscar. Best performance by a politician.

An Hon. Senator: Withdraw the bill.

Senator Barootes: Best performance by a comedian.

An Hon. Senator: No, no!

An Hon. Senator: A Greek tragedy; it is a Greek tragedy.

Senator Cools: We know that Senator Barootes is going to use his influence to withdraw the bill.

Senator Barootes: Do you want to try for a melodrama award?

Senator Cools: I have never been interested in being an entertainer.

Senator Frith: As we were saying, we were on C-21. Did Mrs. McDougall say: "Those Grits are doing exactly what they promised to do. They respected this order, our favourite order, as it then was." Did Senator Barootes tune up his built-in foghorn and say "Do not pass Bill C-21. Do not do what you are supposed to do?" I guess not. No one raised any point of order; no one shouted; nobody interrupted—because they were getting what they wanted. It was still their favourite order, top one, No. 1 on their list, on their hit parade.

So we then went on to Bill C-62, which is the goods and services tax, and it provides:

> That in relation to Bill C-62, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, unless previously disposed of at not later than 5.45 o'clock p.m., on Thursday, October 25, 1990,—

Do you remember?

An Hon. Senator: Yes.

[Senator Buckwold.]

Senator Frith: "The senator then in the Chair shall, if required, interrupt any proceedings before the Senate." Did he do that? Yes, he did. Did we raise a point of order?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Frith: Did they raise a point of order?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Frith: Did anyone raise a point of order?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Frith: No. They were getting what they wanted. ". . . proceed to put forthwith and successively without any further debate or amendment all questions necessary to dispose of the report stage of the said bill." Well, that is exactly what happened. Did anyone raise a point of order?

An Hon. Senator: No.

Senator Frith: Did Senator Murray stand up and say: "I am renouncing this thing"?

An Hon. Senator: Heavens, no!

Senator Frith: Did he say that earlier? Did he say that when Bill C-21 was going through?

An Hon. Senator: I did not hear that.

Senator Frith: No. I will tell you what he was doing. He was not out there denouncing an agreement. He was out there gloating with Mrs. McDougall. That is what he was doing.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: I ask you, what enabled him to go out there and gloat with Mrs. McDougall?

An Hon. Senator: The agreement.

Senator Frith: No, not the agreement. The house order. Can you imagine what would have happened if Senator MacEachen had got up and said: Listen. I do not like the way Senator Murray and Ms. McDougall are out there gloating. I am going to renounce this thing. I am going to say it is a dead letter. Right. Can you imagine? No, of course not. They did not do that. How would they have reacted if suddenly Senator MacEachen had rushed out to the press and said: What are these people doing out here gloating over the fact that we have done what we agreed to do and obeyed this unanimously adopted order, and therefore I am going to call it a dead letter.

Senator Cools: No grace at all.

An Hon. Senator: And it is not in the spirit.

Senator Frith: Then, of course, when Senator Murray had gone over to the press, he would have said: "What is Senator MacEachen complaining about? I mean, that is the order. We had an agreement that there would be a house order and some provisional rules. What is he complaining about?"

Then, of course, reversing roles, Senator MacEachen would say: "Well, it is true. It is very clear, but it is against the spirit of it."

An Hon. Senator: Against the spirit of it.

Senator Frith: Against the spirit of it. Well, you can imagine what Senator Murray would have said in that case.

> That, in relation to Bill C-44, An Act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, unless previously disposed of, at not later than 8.00 o'clock p.m., on Monday, October 29, 1990, the Senator then in the Chair shall, if required, interrupt any proceedings then before the Senate and shall proceed to put forthwith and successively, without any further debate or amendment, all questions necessary to dispose of all remaining stages of the said Bill, . . .

That is Hibernia. Did anything happen then? Were there any points of order raised? I was not in the chamber that night, but you can tell me. Did anyone raise a point of order?

An Hon. Senator: Not a word.

Senator Frith: Did Senator Murray say, "That is a dead letter. Do not pass Hibernia. It is a dead letter." He had not quite got his warehouse full. He had had all his bills except that one. So he was not going to complain about that.

Let me draw your attention, honourable senators, to the next words. Remember:

> —shall proceed to put forthwith and successively, without any further debate or amendment, all questions necessary to dispose of all remaining stages of the said Bill,—

Now listen to these words: ". . . and the Senate shall then adjourn forthwith." Now what does that mean?

An Hon. Senator: What it says.

Senator Frith: What it says; but you know why that was there? Because the agreement was that when they had got in their crop and got all their goodies into the warehouse, and the barn door was locked and everything put away for the winter, which is what they had, we would start with a new day. Why would we start with a new day? Because it was perfectly understood by Senator Murray and Senator Roblin, and everybody else who had the wit to understand it—and I hope that he explained it to his caucus, because on the basis of what we have been hearing here today—

An Hon. Senator: And the Cabinet.

Senator Frith: And the Cabinet. On the basis of what we are hearing today, everyone seems to be shocked that we went to the top of the order paper and started on petitions. Everyone is saying, "What are you doing?" Well, now, did he not explain to you, what that means? It was a perfect understanding, a very important distinction between the words "suspend" and "adjournment", because if we suspended the sittings we would be wherever we were. Adjournment means we go to the top of the order paper. Everyone understood that, everyone who paid any attention; and anyone to whom it was explained should have understood it. Then everyone gets shocked about this. Then we start talking about dead letters.

We start talking about dead letters. This occurs only after everything Senator Murray wants out of this house order is "all in and cooled out," as they say at the track.

• (0510)

Did he then raise any point of order? No.

Then, as was understood by everyone, as was provided for by the house order and adopted unanimously, we went to the top of the order paper. We came to petitions and began dealing with petitions, as everyone knew we would do.

All this week and last weekend I was asked by the press what would happen. I said very publicly, as did Senator Murray—what are you whining about, sir?

Senator Barootes: Why don't you put it on tape and we will play it. Then you can go home and rest. We heard it yesterday. We heard it the day before. Just put it on tape and we will play it.

Senator Frith: You don't like it any better than you did then.

Senator Barootes: It smelled then and it smells worse now.

Senator Hastings: You stink.

Senator Frith: Let us understand what it is that stinks. We had a house order which we complied with strictly. We delivered on every bit of our—

Senator Barootes: There was a house motion that was passed today at 10 o'clock and you are defying it. Follow the motion of today.

Senator Frith: What did you say?

Senator Barootes: You are as phoney as a $3 bill.

Senator Frith: What happened, senator? You are getting winded.

Senator Barootes: Not a bit. I am fine. How about yourself?

Senator Frith: What smells to Senator Barootes is the fact that after he and his colleagues and leader got everything they wanted from this house order, we came to the point that was perfectly understood, and we began on petitions. There was no question about it. What sort of olfactory glands does the senator have—

Senator Barootes: Not olfactory.

Senator Frith: I will tell you what they are. They are Tory glands. That is why it stinks to him. Now he has to listen to someone else getting what they are entitled to under the hHouse order, instead of just what he wants.

Senator Barootes: It is the emetic things you are saying that are making me a little sick.

Senator Hastings: What does that mean?

Senator Barootes: Look it up, Senator Frith. You are a master of English. You explain it to him.

Senator Frith: Why don't we take the time to do that? What was the word?

Senator Barootes: Emetic.

Senator Frith: How do you spell that, sir?

Senator Barootes: Now he wants to know how to spell it.

Senator Frith: We will take our time.

Senator Barootes: You do not hear so well. Shall I spell it and bring it over?

Senator Frith: I hear fine. Emetic root is a flowering spurge.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: There are quite a few emetics. Its origin is Greek.

Senator Barootes: You have it at last. The light is on.

Senator Frith: I know why this word is in his vocabulary. It refers to vomit. Of course, he would know that word.

Senator Barootes: That is what is making me sick: your emesis.

Senator Frith: Emetic, relates to Barootes vomiting, relates to inducing vomit. An emetic mushroom is a mushroom with a deep red or rarely white pileus that grows usually in the woods and is violently emetic and poisonous.

Senator Barootes: You can make anybody emetic.

Senator Frith: Violently poisonous is what we might call our friend Senator "emetic" Barootes. Our emetic senator.

We came to the top of the order paper, as we understood, and started dealing with petitions, as we understood. People were asking what would happen. I was saying to the press for the last four or five days, as was Senator Murray, that what will happen on Tuesday after Hibernia is that we will start at the top of the order paper. He said it. I said it. We started at the top of the order paper.

What will happen then? Then we will start reading petitions. Senator Murray will try to move a motion to go to Orders of the Day. We knew that would happen, and it did.

Suddenly it becomes a dead letter. There was no misunderstanding. Why are senators here so shocked when everyone out there knew about it? The press knew what would happen. Everyone who read the papers knew that would happen; and that is exactly what happened.

We then had the motion. He knew perfectly well that we were going to raise a point of order. I told the press and he told the press what would happen, and that is exactly what took place.

As I said earlier, the Speaker is nowout of the closet. There is no longer even a pretence at impartiality. At least it is refreshing that there is no doubt that the Speaker voted with the government, and that the government does whatever it wants. He recognized Senator Doody even though Senator Gigantès was up. That is all right. At least we now know where we stand. We have a Speaker who will do whatever the government wants, will rule always in its favour. At least we know how we stand. That took place and did not surprise us too much.

We then went on to debate the motion itself. What happened? Was there any secrecy? Should there be any surprise about that? The press asked me what would happen, and I said we would start debating the motion. Senator Murray said that we would start debating the motion. Everything happened exactly in accordance with the unanimously supported house order. It was well understood by anyone who had the wit to find out about it.

Then when we were proceeding under the heading of "Presentation of Petitions" there was a motion to go to Orders of the Day, which is what the government wants. At that point he referred to petitions as reason why we should not go to Orders of the Day but should listen to petitions Senator Phillips then rose to raise a point of order. So much for that point of order.

We are exactly where everyone knew we would be. We are doing exactly what everyone knew would be happening. This hypocritical, false shock that is being shown by the senators on the other side, when they knew exactly that this is what would happen, is really very disorderly. Anyone who may wish to join in the debate on this point of order must realize that this is a point of order only, that he is not speaking on the motion. You will not be using your one speech on the motion. I have not used up mine. I was speaking strictly to the point of order.

• (1520)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I rise on the point of order raised by Senator Phillips. I am a little surprised in that it appears there is a serious misconception on the other side of the house as to what was the understanding when both sides agreed some two weeks ago to the new order of business.

It seemed to me that it was very clear at that time that we reserved our right to use the rules legitimately to prevent the forward motion of this bill. We made no secret of that. All along we have stated that our objective is to defeat this bill and to prevent its passage. For honourable senators across the way to be surprised that we would use delay as a tactic is a surprise to me. Delay is a properly acceptable parliamentary practice. It is not a new practice and has been used consistently over the years. In fact, my honourable friends across the way having spent many more years in Opposition than we have, perfected the art of delay. One need only look at the flag debate which went on for months. The Opposition was consistently and deliberately delaying. I am not complaining, because they were using the rules as is proper in a parliamentary system. Part of the parliamentary system is to give to the public, whom we represent, an opportunity to react. It is not simply a case here of spending a lot of time discussing an issue. It is also a situation of permitting the Canadian public, whom we represent, an opportunity to find out about the issue, to get involved in the issue and, quite frankly, to put pressure on senators across the way to change their minds. That is part and parcel of the whole affair.

That is exactly what went on in the flag debate. Mr. Diefenbaker and the Conservative Party decided that they did not want the new national flag; they did not want a new Canadian symbol that was purely Canadian. They were trying to get Canadian public opinion on their side. What mechanism did they use to do that? They used protracted debate in the House of Commons and they kept on with debate for weeks and months; and that was a perfectly proper parliamentary practice.

The other example was the pipeline debate, where again the Opposition made a consistent attack on what the government was trying to do. They objected strenuously, as well they might. I happened to agree with them on that issue. They objected to the closure that was used. They did everything they could within the rules of Parliament to delay, to make sure that the public was involved, and to try to get the media interested in the issue. They used that delaying tactic, and that, quite frankly, is what we are trying to do.

In this particular case there is a different circumstance in that the Canadian public is aroused. The figures vary on whether it is 75 per cent, 85 per cent or 90 per cent of the Canadian public that is opposed to the GST. It is certainly a large majority of the Canadian people. That public reaction has not seemed to have any effect on the honourable senators across the way. Therefore, we are legitimately using delaying tactics so that hopefully our friends opposite will start to listen to the Canadian public. That is the whole objective of trying to get a change and trying to get our friends opposite to withdraw the tax, to start from scratch and to create a tax that will be acceptable to the Canadian people. We all know that we have to pay taxes, but let us at least have a tax that is fair.

I am sorry, Senator Murray, but I cannot see that cartoon. Perhaps you could send it over to me.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chrétien, "Flap, Flap, Flap."

Senator Molgat: I am not quite sure what that is, Senator Murray. However, I can assure you, if you have not caught on yet, that the Canadian public certainly has. It wants you to change the course on which you are engaged, and we are trying to assist in that course. One of the methods available to us is delay.

Some two weeks ago an agreement was made to proceed with the other items of business. There were no illusions in that regard. I well recall Senator MacEachen stating that this will enable us to continue the fight even better than we were able to before. I do not know what Senator Murray told his caucus. Perhaps he told his caucus, "We have a great deal; the Liberals have agreed to pass all these bills and then it will be one, two, three and we will pass the GST." If that is what he told his caucus, then he certainly did not tell them the truth, because that was not the understanding at any time, and there were no illusions in that regard either underhand, overhand or in any way. We were quite consistent and clear in what we were trying to do.

Yesterday we proceeded with petitions. We believe that what we were doing was legitimate. We believe that the motion introduced by Senator Doody was bootlegged into this chamber under the pretense of presenting petitions. He presented two absolutely phoney petitions. Even Senator Murray was embarassed when the names were read out.

Senator Murray: No; I saw the petitions.

Senator Molgat: He could not help but sit there in total embarassment that the only petition he was able to find was from three of his staff members. Under that subterfuge the motion was introduced. Senators opposite obviously knew it was an improper motion. If they thought it was proper, surely they would have had enough belief in themselves and in the motion to present it honestly. However, no, they tried to sneak it in underhandedly and behind two phoney petitions. By ruling, we were prevented from doing that.

What is it that we are now trying to do? We are trying to tell you that, in our view, that motion is out of order and that motion is wrong. Surely a sound argument is that we have all of these petitions which people have asked us to present. If there is a better argument than that for allowing us to continue, I do not know what it is. The Canadian people have asked us to present these petitions. We want them on the official record, and the people who have given us these petitions want them presented.

When you are making your ruling, Mr. Speaker, that is why you have to look at what it is we are trying to do. We are trying to prove that the motion now before us should not be proceeded with at this time; that the motion should not be approved by the Senate because there is other business that should be dealt with, and namely the petitions that we have on hand. That is the debate that is now going on: should we accept the motion before us to go to Orders of the Day, as Senator Murray would have us do, or should we not?

In the process of that argument it is perfectly reasonable for us to point out that we have these petitions. That is the gist of the argument. Why else would we want to return to petitions, if it were not that we have petitions on hand to deal with?

• (1530)

Mind you, this motion should not be proceeded with at this time. Perhaps the time will come when it should be. Perhaps a solution to what we are involved in now is for the two leaders to get together and have a further discussion on how long we are going to continue with petitions. That is the way we have conducted our business in this house in the past. Whenever we come to an impasse, we sit down and talk about it. I submit that had we followed that practice since we started in September, we would not be in the difficulty in which we noe find ourselves.

Just wind back the clock a bit. Imagine if, on that fateful afternoon of October 4, when the Speaker sent his letter, which was totally against the rules, he had said: "We have an impasse. I suggest that the two leaders get together and discuss this business of the bells. How long do you intend the bells to ring?" I think we would then have arrived at some understanding.

We are all parliamentarians. We know that you cannot simply keep on obstructing forever. At some stage there has to be an understanding. At that time the Speaker could have used his good offices to get the two leaders together and say, "The bells are ringing. We have had experience in the House of Commons where they rang for 21 days; what are we going to do? Are we going to have permanent bell-ringing, or a term, or what are we going to do?" Had that happened, I am convinced that the situation could have been resolved and an understanding arrived at.

We did it on another issue which could have been a difficult situation for this chamber. Senator Frith moved his motion that there were strangers in the house. Do honourable senators recall that event? That meant that the bells started to ring. Had we followed the practice of the House of Commons, the bells could have kept on ringing for the following week, and the week after that, and the week after that. Instead, there was a discussion between both sides and by agreement we came back, Senator Frith's motion was withdrawn by unanimous consent, and the Senate continued its work.

So it can work, but it will not work if we stand here like two boxers, one against the other, and no one sits down to talk.

An Hon. Senator: And no referee.

Senator Molgat: That is part of the problem. We have lost confidence in the referee, and that complicates things. However, that does not prevent the two sides from sitting down and talking. That is the only way we can resolve our problems as sensible parliamentarians. If we have an issue over how long petitions are going to continue, I think the way to resolve it is for the two leaders to sit down and talk about it. Otherwise we will continue a situation of conflict and no one will gain from that.

I do not know how soon you will be ruling on this, Mr. Speaker. I am sure there are others here who wish to talk about it. All those who want to express an opinion on the point of order should have an opportunity to do so; frankly, my appeal is to both sides to sit down, discuss it, and arrive at something that is mutually agreeable. However, I have to repeat that it cannot be for one side only. The agreement must satisfy both sides. The government has obtained a large part of what it wanted, certainly all that it could expect, in the passage of the main bill, C-21, as well as the "clawback" legislation and Hibernia. They were passed with absolutely no attempt on our side to delay or change the rules, or to use points of order, or do anything of that sort. We cooperated fully.

The government, for its part, has to accept that we made it very clear that we were not caving in, that our opposition to the GST was as vigorous as ever, that we would use the legitimate rights that we have in this house to oppose the GST, to fight it, to delay it, to do whatever we could to prevent it from coming into effect. Surely you knew that when that deal was entered into.

We now have this problem regarding petitions. I submit that we will not settle it by having rulings by the Speaker. Rulings by the Speaker on an issue like this will serve only to divide both sides rather than settle the issue.

MOTION TO CALL ORDERS OF THE DAY—DEBATE RESUMED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, before the point of order was raised by Senator Phillips, I was speaking to the motion by the Honourable Senator Doody that we proceed to Orders of the Day. I was alluding to the fact that by the adoption of this motion it will be impossible ever again to present a petition in this chamber with respect to Bill C-62. Those people who have entrusted me with those petitions, people residing in the province of Alberta, will be precluded from having their petitions considered in the same light as the President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association was considered, or Senator Murray's staff were considered. According to Senator Ottenheimer's theory we will put them all into cardboard boxes and send them all to the Clerk's office. Then, if any senator wishes to look at them, and make notes, or copy them, or anything else, he may do so—after we have disposed, of course, with Bill C-62, on which the petitioners are asking us to listen to them.

What do I tell these petitioners from Bonnyville, Alberta as to what I did with their petition? That I put it in a cardboard box and it is in the basement of the Senate? Do I tell them that we did not treat their petition in the same way that we treated the petition from the President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, because Senator Doody decided there should be no more petitions will be considered with respect to Bill C-62?

I pose the question: Is that fair and equitable? They live in the province of Alberta and their petition does not receive the same consideration as that granted the President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association? What do I tell all these petitioners from Bonnyville, Alberta?

• (1540)

That petition is in a box in the basement of the Senate. It did not receive the same treatment that Senator Doody accorded the petition of the President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

Senator Corbin: That petition was not even in proper form.

Senator Hastings: It was a Fax.

What will I tell the following petitioners?

(Names of signatories read)

These citizens signed this petition and asked me to present it. They signed it with the assumption that it would be treated as all petitions have been treated throughout history, when the subject petitions the Monarch with respect to a grievance.

Senator Corbin: It was not a Hallowe'en prank.

Senator Hastings: They should not be put in cardboard boxes and stored in the basement of the Senate; they should be presented to the Parliament of Canada, which is the God-given standing right of every one of her Majesty's subjects until today, when it is going to be denied if we adopt the motion of Senator Doody.

What will I tell them when I visit Bonnyville and they ask me what happened to their petitions?

Honourable senators, if we adopt the motion of the honourable Senator Doody and proceed directly to Orders of the Day, we deny that long-standing right of Canadians to petition Parliament and we will go ahead with the very subject the petitioners are asking us to address. If we adopt it—and I hope we do not—we will be dealing with it before ever considering their representations. We will not consider them, we will merely put them in the box again and put them away. This is treatment of public participation not becoming this chamber. The citizens of Canada have turned to this chamber as never before seeking assistance in their grievance with respect to legislation in the Parliament of Canada. They are asking this chamber to do what the other house would not do and which it is our duty to do - to give second sober thought to legislation which is rejected by the people of Canada.

However, Senator Doody does not want that participation. He does not want public participation. The government has never wanted public participation since the legislation was introduced in the House of Commons. They stunted and stopped consideration in that House at every step with closure. There would be no dissent or discussion in that House. Two honourable members of Parliament from my province were summarily thrown out of the Conservative Party because they dared to dissent with this legislation; because they dared to attempt to give representation to the people of Alberta who despise this legislation.

Honourable senators, every political party in the province of Alberta is opposed to this legislation. The premier and the provincial government are opposed to it. The NDP and the Liberal party are opposed to it. When we visited the city of Edmonton the only person who would appear before the committee in support of this legislation was the Conservative member of the other house. I am referring to Murray Dorin, the Honourable Member for Edmonton South West. There was to be no discussion in the other place. They used closure to stop discussion; and threw out any member who did disagree; and sent the bill off to the Senate. There would be no problem here, of course, because the Prime Minister would use a provision in the British North American Act to have her Majesty sign letters patent for the appointment of eight royal regional representatives who would help form a Conservative majority in this house.

● (1550)

They tried to stop the committee from going across Canada. As the committee went about its work, the members of that committee were instructed, I believe by the Leader of the Government, not to discuss the matter under consideration, not to discuss the goods and services tax, but to attack the Liberal members of the committee.

Senator Corbin: Absolutely right!

Senator Hastings: And, in particular, to attack the chairman—

Senator Corbin: Absolutely!

Senator Hastings: —a man whose public contribution to western Canada pales into insignificance any contribution made by any of you in western Canada! He was Mayor of the City of Saskatoon, President of the Canadian Association of Mayors and Municipalities, and has been a distinguished member of this chamber; and you set out this summer, each of you, in your task to discredit him with a personal vendetta, rather than discuss the goods and services tax, so that when we returned here there would be no problem, because you would have the majority and could ram the tax through, brooking no opposition, brooking no discussion, forcing it through. Then we are criticized on this side because we say, "Slow down. Listen to the people, listen to the people who are talking as they have never talked before, telling you with their petitions and their voices, to slow down." But you will not slow down. You are now asking for no more petitions. Senator Doody says, "Let us proceed to Orders of the Day, to third and final reading of Bill C-62," and the people who asked to be heard are not going to be heard. The following people from Alberta wanted to be heard:

(Names of signatories read)

Hon. Paul David: May I ask you a question, Senator Hastings? What is the difference between what you are reading at the present time and a petition? I thought you were supposed to be discussing a motion. Is there a difference between reading a petition and discussing a motion?

Senator Hastings: If the honourable senator will just be calm, he will notice that I am not reading a petition. I am telling you that these people did sign a petition and asked me to present it. I will be unable to do so if the motion of Senator Doody passes, and I am asking honourable senators, what does one do when one is confronted with this problem of facing these people and unable to tell them that their petition was presented, that their petition did not receive the treatment that was accorded the President of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, that their petition was put in a box and put somewhere so that someone could go and see it some day? That is not fair, it is not within the spirit of petitioning, and it is what this motion of the Honourable Senator Doody will do to this petition; I am not reading the petition. I am simply telling you that these people signed a petition, and I am wondering what I will do when I have to confront them and tell them what happened to their petition.

Senator David: But with such reasoning, you could go on for hours and hours and read all the petitions in these boxes. That is a pretext.

Senator Hastings: I am sorry, but I have no idea what you mean. I just grabbed this petition, because it is an example of what will transpire should this motion of Senator Doody be adopted, which, in fact, curtails and abrogates the right of the citizen to petition Parliament. Apparently this government does not want any more public participation. They have rejected public participation.

Hon. William M. Kelly: May I just follow up on that question, please senator? In the same vein, you mentioned those names in Calgary, and in the preamble to each name you read, you said, "What do I say?" In each case, you mentioned a name. It seems to me that a few years ago—I believe it had to do with a bill relating to penal institutions, where you did a lot of good work—you presented a number of petitions. At that time you described the substance of the petition and stipulated how many names you had there. You did not name them. So I would ask you if at that time one of the people who signed asked you what you had done, what did you say?

Surely, some of the people who signed those petitions must have asked you what you had done, and I presume you said, "I presented the petition on which your name was located and I stipulated how many names were on each of those petitions." You must have felt that that was a satisfactory answer. Does that not apply now?

Senator Hastings: Well, I am glad to have that advice from the honourable senator. I think the petitions he was referring to related to the attempt of the government to steal back the Old Age Pension. That is when we were presenting petitions.

Senator Kelly: Perhaps that is it.

Senator Hastings: I told them the same thing, if they asked me, although I cannot recall whether anyone asked me. However, someonr is certainly going to ask me about these petitions, because I have never before had petitions in this number coming voluntarily from the people of Alberta.

Senator Kelly: Senator, I am simply saying, had they asked you, what would your answer have been? You did not read the names. You simply presented the petitions and listed the number of names on each petition. Surely, you anticipated the question. What would your answer have been? If it was satisfactory then, why is it not now?

Senator Hastings: Well, of course, if we adopt the motion of Senator Doody, I will be precluded from even presenting them in any manner.

Senator Corbin: That is the essence of it.

Senator Frith: You will understand the fairness of that.

Senator Hastings: That is my response.

Senator Frith: Senator Kelly is a fair man.

Senator Hastings: As I was saying, the attitude of this government from the beginning has been one of rejection of public opinion, as it was with respect to Meech Lake. It was all done and was given to the people as a fait accompli.

Senator Frith: "A seamless web"!

Senator Hastings: They said, "Here it is. Take it or leave it." The people said, in that instance, "We will leave it." I think perhaps they would say the same thing were they asked that today with respect to the GST. Of course, we now have, entering the discussion right on cue, corporate Canada coming to the rescue of the government, as they came to the rescue of the government with respect to free trade. No one knows how much money they spent, but it was millions and millions of dollars in that campaign in a successful attempt to influence the people of Canada. The multinational corporations, and, of course, corporate Canada, came rushing to the defence of this government, and well they might. Indeed, they should. They financed the government party. They should look after it and keep it there. They came rushing to its defence on Meech Lake.

• (1600)

They told us what would happen if we adopted Meech Lake. Our Canadian dollar will go down. Unemployment will prevail. Economic chaos will result, and Japan will withdraw its investment in Canada if we dare to not accept Meech. Well we did not accept Meech Lake and their forecasts have been proven totally false.

However, right on course, right on time, they are back now with respect to this bill. They are rushing to the defence of the government. Last week they held a meeting in Toronto, corporate Canada. The self-appointed God's first lieutenants in Canada, defenders of the Canadian economy, corporate profits and the social fabric, of Canada in that order.

Senator Murray: I am glad Senator Rizzuto is here to hear that.

Senator Hastings: They were there, seventeen strong, and decided "We have got to go help them out again. We have got to help Senator Murray get the GST through the Senate of Canada. It is stalled." So the boys sat down to a meeting in Toronto.

Senator Murray: We will send copies of this around.

An Hon. Senator: They got out their cheque books.

Senator Frith: You would. We understand. They are financing you and they are paying your piper, and they are calling your tune. They are not paying our piper and they are not calling our tune. That is the difference. We are not dancing like you are.

Senator Hastings: Mr. d'Aquino, to whom Senator Olson referred earlier today, President and Chief Executive Officer of the Business Council on National Issues.

Senator Murray: He used to be in Mr. Trudeau's office.

Senator Hastings: He was Mr. Trudeau's office boy. He emptied the garbage cans. What are you talking about? Mr. d'Aquino, when he appeared before the Senate committee, made this great contribution to our discussion. "The people are misinformed and they do not understand the issues." Only we and our 150 captains of industry understand the issues. We understand corporate profits. We understand transferring the tax load onto the poor and the middle-income. The ordinary people do not understand the issues." Mr. McKichan appeared before the committee. He sent the telegram to Senator MacEachen to help out Senator Murray. Mr. McKichan appeared before the committee and said:

> "The people do not comprehend what this tax is all about". Corporate Canada is talking. No one understands but we 150 captains of industry. No one understands it. We should all follow it and vote for it.

An Hon. Senator: Who is McKichan?

Senator Hastings: Mr. McKichan is the Chief Executive Officer with the Retail Council of Canada.

Senator Frith: Unsupported by all the retailers, as we found out.

Senator Hastings: That is corporate Canada, yes.

An Hon. Senator: Who were they?

Senator Hastings: Who was there? Here they are.

An Hon. Senator: Read them all.

Senator Hastings: Why did you not get these people to sign a petition? They would have all signed it for you, and you would have had one with 15 on it instead of one.

Senator Bosa: I want to hear every name.

Senator Hastings: They would not be on your payroll. You may be on their payroll, but they are not on your payroll.

Senator Murray: Be very careful with that sort of talk.

Senator Hastings: I will withdraw that statement. I am sorry. I was carried away. I quickly withdraw it. There is Mr. Steve H. Van Houten, President of the Automotive Parts Manufacturers Association; James G. Matkin, President and Chief Executive Officer of the Business Council of British Columbia; Thomas P. d'Aquino, President and Chief Executive Officer of the Business Council on National Issues. It sounds like a Tory fund raising dinner; Roy M. Woodridge, President of Canadian Advanced Technology Association; Jean M. Belanger, President of Canadian Chemical Producers' Association; John C. Halliwell, President of Canadian Construction Association. Mr. Halliwell appeared before the committee and said, "Do not pass that bill until you resolve the issue of the MUSH, universities, municipalities, and universities. However, he changed his mind I guess.

They are: Canadian Exporters' Association, L. James Taylor, President; J. Laurent Thibault, Canadian Manufacturers' Association. We know him.

Senator Frith: He recognizes them all from their signatures on cheques.

Senator Hastings: There are Daniel W. Romenko, Managing Director, Canadian Steel Producers Association; Ghislain Dufour, President of Conseil du Patronat du Quebec; Norman Aspin, President, Electrical and Electronic Manufacturers Association of Canada; George Fleischmann, President and Chief Executive Officer, Grocery Products Manufacturers of Canada; Janice M. Moyer, President and Chief Executive Officer, Information Technology Association of Canada; Jack L. Lyndon, President, Insurance Bureau of Canada; C. George Miller, President, The Mining Association of Canada; Norman A. Clark, President, Motor Vehicle Manufacturers' Association; and finally, again, Alasdair J. McKichan, President, Retail Council of Canada.

So they held a meeting in Toronto, and, as I said, they decided to come to the aid of Senator Murray and the Conservative Party in the Senate because they were stuck there; they were having trouble. They decided to send a telegram to Senator MacEachen, the essence of which is to tell us we are making a terrible mistake in proposing that the goods and services tax not be passed. True to form, as they did with Meech lake, they predict economic chaos if we do not pass it. They predict unemployment; they predict inflation, as if it could get worse.

Senator Bosa: They already have it.

Senator Hastings: All this and more if we dare not pass the GST.

An Hon. Senator: They are in the recession.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I do not know whether or not my leader has responded to that, but if I had to respond to it, I would tell them to drop dead, that I will perform my responsibilities to the people in trying to stop the passage of this act which is transferring the taxation load from those people whose names I have just read, loading the middle income, lower income, and the poor with all the taxation load of Canada. The tax is unfair and it should not be proceeded with.

We come back to the motion under consideration. Senator Murray, when speaking this morning, was terribly indignant at what the Liberal Opposition is doing. I know he will not listen to me, and I know he will not listen to the people of Canada. However, as he proceeds on this insidious journey of his to break all the rules to achieve his ends, to distort any fact, to confuse the issue—but, worst of all, what he is doing to the Parliament of Canada–I want him to listen not to me but to John Diefenbaker and to what his advice to him would be today, were he available to give it, with respect to what the Opposition is doing in this chamber.

After reviewing the parliamentary system in Canada and saying how it flowed from the British traditional system, he ended that particular chapter with this comment. He said:

• (1610)

> The parliamentary system that Canada inherited and that Canadians have caused to flourish in a new environment is not something to tinker with lightly, or to lay aside thoughtlessly.

Do not tinker with this system and lay it aside thoughtlessly as you have been doing in this chamber with respect to the vote of October 2. More importantly, what would he say about the role of the Opposition, if he were here to tell you, Senator Murray? He would tell you that:

> Only a strong and alert Opposition can hope to check and control the excessive powers, contrary to the constitution, that may be assumed or confirmed upon governmental administration, the so-called bureaucracy. Only an alert Opposition can prevent the short cuts through democratic procedures that cabinet ministers and bureaucrats frequently find attractive. It is only the Opposition, functioning as a recognized part of parliamentary proceedings, that stands opposed to the degeneration of the governmental system into a form of arbitrary direction of public affairs by the executive of the bureaucracy. Without it minorities would stand unprotected. Freedom would wither, individual liberty would be in jeopardy. Unwarranted and oppressive invasion of private rights would grow unchecked.
> Without an effective Opposition, the administration in office could and would carry on the task of running the country, under circumstances identical with a totalitarian > one-party state. To some this may seem an efficient way of running the country . . .

That is what we have heard today. The efficient way to run this chamber is to put aside the rights of petitioners. To some it may seem an efficient way to run the country. Senator Doody believes that to put aside all the rights of Canadians who wish to participate in this process is an efficient way to run the country.

> —the first victim of such a regime . . . is freedom itself. Without an Opposition, it is not too much to say, the parliamentary system of government would fail in its primary task of protecting the rights of individuals and minorities, and of ensuring freedom and democracy.
> In the parliamentary system, an Opposition is as necessary as the Cabinet itself. One without the other would mean tyranny or chaos. It is commonplace that governments view an effective Opposition as an obstruction.

We have heard that today. It is commonplace that governments view an effective opposition as an obstruction.

> This is a view that is, too often and too lightly, taken up by unthinking critics outside of Parliament. An Opposition that discharges its parliamentary responsibilities may appear, in the superficial view, to be obstructionist. Extended opposition means lengthy debate. It was the British Labour Party Chairman, Professor Harold J. Laski, who wrote that "the alternative to the 'talking shop' is the concentration camp".

That is Mr. Diefenbaker's advice to you.

Senator MacDonald: When did he say that?

Senator Hastings: Before he died. His words come to haunt you.

Senator MacDonald: Give us a date.

Senator Hastings: I always had the greatest admiration for the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker. It was in 1972. He had respect for this place, for this parliamentary procedure. He had respect for the Opposition and he knew that the Opposition had to fulfil its responsibility. That is what we are trying to do, with legitimate opposition.

Senator Murray: Is there anything in there about the Senate? Are any of Mr. Diefenbaker's comments about the Senate?

Senator Olson: Mr. Diefenbaker knew about Parliament. This is part of Parliament.

Senator Hastings: I do not think the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker demeaned the Senate as it has been demeaned by the government in this chamber over the past year. John Diefenbaker knew the value of rules and of abiding by them. He called the government to account when it tried to shortcut the rules of Parliament, and it was not to the same extent as the rules of this chamber were violated on October 2 when the Speaker entered into a conspiracy with the government to impair the ability of the Opposition to fulfil its responsibility.

[Senator Hastings.]

The adoption of the motion which has been presented to us by Senator Doody effectively blocks off the ability of Canadians to participate in this process. Whoever promulgated the rules of this institution knew the importance of a petition with respect to this chamber. The presentation of petitions is the first item. I submit it was put there because the presentation of petitions is the most important item on the agenda each day. It is a fundamental right, as is indicated in Bourinot. That will be taken away if we adopt this motion, the legality of which is in question. It should never have been made because no question was before the Senate.

It was made according to the "so what" formula of Senator Simard. "What do the rules say? So what! We will do it our way. If the rules of the Senate preclude it, we will use the rules from the House of Commons. If those rules in the House of Commons preclude it, we will take the rules from the State of Georgia or the Province of Saskatchewan. We will find a rule. So what? We will get the Speaker to agree to it and ram it through."

That is the "so what" formula by which they will operate in this chamber.

It is interesting to note that when they want to violate a rule of the Senate they go to the House of Commons; but they did not do that when the bells were ringing. They did not use the House of Commons rule when the bells were ringing in this chamber; yet they now say, if there is not a precedent here, we must follow a rule in the House of Commons.

That is what you are advocating with respect to this motion. You found your own rule: just send out a letter from Guy Charbonneau and pass it without the Opposition. That is the "so what" rule. We are under the regime which says, if there is no rule, they will make one.

This chamber and Parliament suffer as a result. When people want to participate the government finds a way to preclude that participation. Last Saturday night a poll indicated that an overwhelming number of people believe that what they think or do is ignored by the government. They feel frustrated and isolated. There is isolation and fear across the prairies because the government will not listen to them.

Senator MacDonald: They wanted capital punishment too.

Senator Hastings: They want this damned tax stopped.

Senator Olson: You compare this to capital punishment?

Senator Hastings: I want to remind you that 56 per cent agree with this Opposition and what we are doing, and 77 per cent oppose the tax in my province. There is a feeling of frustration and isolation. They would like to participate but are precluded from doing so. They are turning to other parties to find a way to participate. Now it is going to be done again. It was done on Meech Lake. The government would not let them participate, and now the government is trying to do it again with this motion. It is attempting to stop people from a very minor participation in the democratic process and consideration in this chamber.

• (1620)

Like the president of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the next signatories on the petition, from Boyle and Athabasca, Alberta, thought that perhaps the government would listen and consider what they had to say.

(Names of signatories read)

What do I tell those petitioners? "Senator Doody said your petitions were not important. What was important were the petitions of the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association because he finances the Conservative Party and he is listened to."

Senator Stollery: And the three staff employees.

Senator Hastings: And those poor staff members from Senator Murray's office. I hope, Senator, they get a grand Christmas bonus for their contribution to Toryism in Canada, because no one contributed more and above the call to duty than they did. I feel sorry for Mr. MacDougall who has to go home to Nova Scotia and say, "I am one of only three people in Canada who signed a petition in favour of the GST." That should be worth an appointment to the parole board.

(Names of signatories read)

Those signatories wanted to participate, but Senator Doody says "No way."

(Names of signatories read)

When I see those people in Boyle, Alberta, what do I tell them about what happened to their petition? Was it considered by the senators? No. According to Senator Doody we put it in a cardboard box in the basement of the Senate and proceed to pass the bill. Whatever the petitioners have to say about that bill was not important to the government or to the Senate. The Senate proceeded to pass that bill without even stopping to consider that the petitioners took the time to sign a petition and asked to be considered. In effect, that is what will be the result of the adoption of this motion.

It is the first time in hundreds of years that this right has been interrupted by a government and petitioners will be denied the opportunity of participating in the legislative process as was accorded the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

The next petitioner who signed the petition anticipated that participation in the democratic and legislative process might have a slight impact on those who govern. Not so, according to Senator Doody.

(Names of signatories read)

Those good citizens of Stoney Plain, Alberta, living in the constituency of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, signed a petition and felt they were contributing to and participating in the democratic process.

If this motion passes, and I do not think it will pass, I will write to them all and tell them that their participation was not wanted, needed or expected. After all, Mr. d'Aquino, the economic advisor to the government said they were misinformed and did not understand the issues. Mr. MacEachern, whom the government listens to and is a great advisor to the Minister of Finance, states that the people of Stoney Plain, Alberta just do not comprehend what this tax is all about.

Honourable senators, these people understand this tax much better than many people will give them credit for. They understand it and know what it will do to them. They know the unfairness of it all. They know the misinformation that has been piled on them by this government. They know what it is going to do to them, the cost to their way of life, the unfairness to the poor people of Canada. That is why they are signing these petitions in untold numbers. That is why they are sending them to you, asking you to reconsider and stop this insanity before it goes any further. And I am asking you to stop and consider what you are doing to this process. They know what they are doing. They know what this act is all about.

(Names of signatories read)

These petitioners from Edmonton, Alberta signed these petitions asking the Senate of Canada for an opportunity to participate in the process. They thought they might have a little influence on the process. They wanted to participate as Canadians, but Senator Doody says no. "Your views will be put in a cardboard box in the Clerk's office in the basement."

(Names of signatories read)

All those citizens of Edmonton, Alberta, want to participate in the democratic process. What do we tell them? According to Mr. D'Aquino, you people are misinformed, you don't understand the issues.

The Retail Council of Canada, those great protectors of social legislation in Canada, are the people who told us with free trade: "Don't worry, your social programs are all protected under free trade." From the day the agreement was signed until today they have been going across Canada telling us we are spending too much on social programs, cut them, cut them, cut them. These same people now tell us we do not understand, we do not comprehend. Well, the people of Canada do understand; the people of Canada do comprehend. They understand what this government has been doing. They understand the myth that was created and the misinformation and the distortions that commenced in the election campaign.

The Prime Minister says today that we had a great discussion on the goods and services tax in the election campaign and everybody voted in favour of it. The discussion on a sales tax lasted exactly 24 hours and it was unwittingly brought to light by Mr. Blenkarn who made a statement that the government was going to impose a sales tax which would net the government $24 billion, and the first person to go on the offensive was the Minister of Finance who says: "Oh, no, no. It is just a replacement tax, it is revenue neutral, do not worry." End of discussion.

Revenue neutral? A replacement tax? The biggest misinformation ever perpetrated. Revenue neutral? The campaign was just over and you sent out the mobs across the country telling us about the deficit; we had to get some money, we had to increase the sales tax, we had to have a goods and services tax. That is when it became a public issue. What happened to revenue neutral?

The one man in this chamber who was totally honest about revenue neutral was Senator Finlay MacDonald. In a moment of complete honesty and complete frankness in the northern city of Whitehorse at 11 o'clock on a Saturday morning he explained to us what revenue neutral really was. I want you to listen to what Finlay MacDonald said:

> It was said a second ago that it has been admitted that this tax is not intended to reduce the deficit.
> I admit it; I admit it as one member of this committee. With all due respect to my leader, I admit that this is the most screwed-up thing that the Government of Canada, my government, has done.

Let me read it again. In a moment of frankness and in a moment of honesty, which should prevail, and it would help if it prevailed a little more in discussing revenue neutral, he said:

> I admit it; I admit it as one member of this committee. With all due respect to my leader, I admit that this is the most screwed-up thing that the Government of Canada, my government, has done.

His government; Senator Finlay MacDonald's. He was not content with that; he wanted to go on and explain. He said:

> The government has come out with the phrase "revenue neutral" and they tried to explain what it is. They do so after talking about laying the big burden on our grandchildren. They go through all of this performance and then they say it is revenue neutral. They say it will help reduce the deficit.

• (1640)

Then Senator Finlay MacDonald posed a very interesting question. He asked:

> Well, how in the name of God can it help reduce the deficit if it is to be revenue neutral?

Senator Frith: Who said that?

Senator Hastings: Senator Finlay MacDonald. That is what these misinformed people have been asking themselves: "How can it be revenue neutral when you are going to reduce the deficit?" The honest part about it is that you knew right at the beginning you were going to do this. It is a cash grab. It was going to be nine per cent, but now it is down to seven per cent. You can rest assured that it can go back up from seven per cent to nine per cent just as easily, and the people know that.

Then Senator MacDonald explained a little more by saying:

> I said yesterday that I did not think it was misrepresentation on the part of the government. It was just a dumb mistake in communications. They didn't know what on earth they were doing. However, a second ago I put this statement to the witness and he declined to answer. Everyone knows that this tax will be a windfall . . .

Senator Frith: Is this still Senator Finlay MacDonald speaking?

Senator Hastings: Yes.

[Senator Hastings.]

Senator Cools: Are you sure it is Senator MacDonald who was speaking?

Senator Hastings: Yes. From being tax neutral it became a windfall in two paragraphs. That is what the petitioners understand and that is why they are signing these petitions asking us not to pass this bill.

Finally, Senator MacDonald said:

> Everyone knows that this tax will be a windfall, and that it is intended to get at the deficit. Therefore, let us be done with these gags between ourselves about "revenue neutral" and such things as that. Let us forget about it now.

It is a tax grab when we have the limelight on it but it was revenue neutral through the election campaign. It was to be just a replacement tax. In Mr. d'Aquino's opening remarks to the committee he said it was not a new tax but a replacement tax. They are replacing it all right. They will replace collecting taxes from the corporations of Canada and, instead, they will collect them from the poor people of Canada. They are dumping it on to the poor people in order that they can pay their deficit. What is the truth? There is no truth. There is misrepresentation.

Honourable senators, the people want to participate with this government in these discussions. The first way the people can participate is on election day; and each one of you will regret what you are doing today when they speak to you then. You will not listen to their petitions, but you will have to listen to them on election day, unless you try to find a rule to take that away from them.

Senator Frith: Call an election a "dead letter;" that is what you would do.

Senator Hastings: What are you going to say to the people in Slave Lake, Alberta? I am sorry Senator Twinn is not here, because I had hoped he would be.

Senator Cools: He does not care.

Senator Hastings: He and his fellow citizens of Slave Lake, Alberta, about 300 of them —

Hon. Paul David: Senator, I wonder if I could give you a little rest, since you have been standing for more than one hour, by asking you a question.

On three or four occasions you implied a relationship between Meech Lake, the Free Trade Agreement and Bill C-62. I wonder why you are comparing those three items, which seem to me to be quite different. At least three or four times during your very imaginative speech you drew a relationship between those three things.

Senator Hastings: Thank you, senator. While you were speaking I took one of your pills, so I will be good for another hour.

Senator David: I do not advise that you stand for another hour.

Senator Frith: Will you permit him to sit?

Senator Hastings: I think these pills come from the Montreal Cardiology Institute. They are excellent pills and I can now swim a mile a day. They are produced by a certain pharmaceutical company and I pay pretty heavily.

Senator David: You are expounding the merits of Bill C-22.

Senator Hastings: No, no, the price went up $3.00 per 100 when we started paying those who had the copyright.

Senator David has asked about the similarity to be found in these three headings. The similarity is this: Those three initiatives, Free Trade, Meech Lake and the GST—

Senator Buckkwold: All failures.

Senator Hastings: —are all supported by corporate Canada. You heard from the 17 who met in Toronto last week. They are again to come to the assistance of the government. They were part and parcel of the government's agenda to force these issues on the people of Canada at any cost. We do not know how much corporate Canada and the multinationals invested in the Free Trade Agreement in order to influence an election in this country, but we know it is in the millions.

Senator Barootes: Free trade was not forced on the people of Canada. Did we not have an election on that very issue? The Conservative Party was returned with a majority. You people forced the election, for God's sake. Why don't you accept the decision of the people?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hastings: The Conservative Party won an election bought and paid for by the multinationals and corporate Canada.

Senator Frith: They did not have a majority vote.

Senator Hastings: They did not get a majority vote.

Senator Murray: Sour grapes.

Senator Hastings: I will now turn to the question of Meech Lake. Senator Murray, as we all know, was part of the negotiations on Meech Lake and, when the negotiations on Meech Lake got into trouble, corporate Canada and the multinationals came to the rescue. They paid for full-page advertisements in the Globe and Mail.

Senator Carney: Would the Senator permit a question?

Senator Hastings: I am answering a question.

Senator Carney: Are you unwilling to answer a question?

Senator Hastings: I will answer your question at the end of my speech. Will you please sit down? I am trying to answer a question that has already been asked. I can only answer one question at one time.

Senator Carney: It is too bad that you are unwilling to accept a question.

Senator Hastings: I am unwilling to answer two questions at one time.

Senator David asked about the similarity as it pertains to Meech Lake. When Meech Lake got into trouble, who came to the rescue? It was corporate Canada and the multinationals. They ran full-page advertisements in every newspaper in Canada saying that we must have Meech Lake or a depression would follow, our dollar would drop and we would be going to hell in a hand-basket. Corporate Canada came to the rescue. It is your government; it is their government.

Senator Davey: Don't forget the Globe and Mail and the CBC.

Senator Hastings: It is a conspiracy.

Senator Murray: Sour grapes.

Senator Hastings: The conspiracy exists.

Senator Barootes: Tell us about the World Series again.

• (1650)

Senator Frith: Why don't you do that? Answer that request.

Senator Hastings: We have now come to the GST and last Saturday corporate Canada held a meeting, as I pointed out, in Toronto. Senator Murray was in trouble in the Senate of Canada with Bill C-62. We then see that a telegram was sent to the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate advocating quick passage of this bill or Canada would be going to hell in a hand-basket again. So they are coming to your rescue. The full-page ads will now follow. Don't worry, they are coming to your rescue to explain the GST to the people of Canada; but the people of Canada do not need any more explanations. They understand this much better than you or Mr. d'Aquino care to give them credit for.

Senator David: I think I have to agree with Senator Barootes that the last election was won on the free trade argument. As for Meech Lake, we must never forget that a little more than three years ago it was approved by the 11 first ministers.

Senator Davey: But not by the people of Canada.

Senator Frith: Not by the people.

Senator David: With time it deteriorated, but all of those 11 first ministers were nevertheless elected by the people of Canada.

Senator Hastings: Well, honourable senators, I am not arguing for or against Meech Lake. I am pointing out how your friends in corporate Canada finance you, keep you in power and influence the people of Canada. That is what I am telling you. That is the only point I was making. Three times they have come to your rescue, and they will come again, don't worry. They will be here with their full-page ads explaining why the GST should go through. The people of Canada are going to be denied the right to participate in this process if we pass this motion, and I am asking you not to pass this motion. It denies these people their right to the simple act of participation. It is not much. It does not cost a great deal. However, you are not going to allow it if you have your way. I was dealing with the people of Slave Lake. I do not know what the population of Slave Lake is—I think it is about 300—but I have a petition signed by 200 residents of Slave Lake. That is the home of Senator Twinn, and Senator Twinn will be able to go home this weekend and tell these people that he and his party decided that their petitions were not important. He can tell them that they signed those petitions in good faith, but when they got to the Senate of Canada it was decided that they would not be heard, that they were interfering with the efficiency of government, as Mr. Diefenbaker said, and so they were put in a box and were not received in the same manner in which the Senate received a petition from the Canadian Manufacturers Association. They were put in a box and sent down to the Clerk's office in the basement. He can tell the following people, "We did not present your petition. We threw it in a box somewhere. You are not important. You do not understand the issues."

(Names of signatories read)

He can tell the following people that their petitions were not considered:

(Names of signatories read)

He can go up there and tell them that what they thought was important but that Senator Doody decided that efficiency demanded no consideration of their petition. There are other people as well:

(Names of signatories read)

He can tell them that their petitions were not considered by the Senate, that they were not presented in the same manner as the petition of three employees in Senator Murray's office was considered. There is also:

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Twinn can look them up or phone them and tell them their petitions were not considered, that they were not important, and that they do not understand the issues. It is only Mr. d'Aquino and the Canadian Manufacturers Association who understand these issues such as the taxation of the poor. There are more:

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Twinn can contact those people this weekend when he is home in Slave Lake and explain to them why we did not consider their petitions. "It was not important. You do not understand the issues. You cannot comprehend what we are doing down here." That attitude explains why the Reform Party is in full flight in the province of Alberta. Then when Senator Twinn is home this weekend, he might call on some of the following people:

(Names of signatories read)

Canyon Creek is a small village in Alberta and the only request from this petitioner was that the Senate of Canada listen to her petition; but if Senator Doody's motion carries, we will not get to listen to her any more. Her petition goes down to the basement in the cardboard box and is never considered again. What about the following people:

(Names of signatories read)

● (1700)

Senator Twinn can tell all those citizens of Slave Lake who signed the petition that we stuck it in a box and sent it down to the Clerk's office and did not consider it because the petitioners' views are not important. According to Mr. d'Aquino and the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the petitioners do not know what they are talking about. Honourable senators, those petitioners know more than you would care to give them credit for, and they understand this god-awful piece of legislation better than perhaps many senators understand it; and they know how they are going to have to pay for it.

[Senator Hastings.]

Hon. Pat Carney: Would the honourable senator permit a question? In your speech, you mentioned that Conservative corporate friends influenced our position on free trade by, in effect, buying us. Is the senator aware that one of the fiercest proponents of free trade, one of the people who was an early proponent of free trade and who was very eloquent on the subject, was one of his own colleagues, Senator van Roggen? Does Senator Hastings suggest that the corporate world bought and influenced him too?

Senator Hastings: Senator van Roggen is not the only colleague of mine who was in favour of free trade. I rather suspect one of my former colleagues, Donald Macdonald, was one of many people who favoured free trade. I do not question anyone who was in favour of free trade.

Senator Carney: Yes, you did.

Senator Hastings: I questioned the ethics of the Conservative Party selling themselves to corporate Canada and the multinationals to help buy your election on free trade. That is all. You can believe in free trade, but you could have fought it fairly. You did not fight it fairly. You sold yourselves to corporate Canada and the multinationals in New York City. When he was just elected, your Prime Minister rushed to New York City to tell them we were open for business and we were all for sale. Those are your friends, not mine. Those are the people who support and finance you and those campaigns and they are going to finance another campaign in favour of the GST. That is what I said.

Senator Carney: Senator Hastings, I do not understand the connection between the corporate buying of the Conservative government—

Senator Hastings: The buying of the election, is what I said.

Senator Carney: —and the fact that there have been many distinguished Liberals—you pointed out Donald Macdonald being one of them—who supported free trade. Why are you tarring the Conservatives with this brush, unless you intend to stain the reputations of your own Liberal colleagues?

Senator Hastings: Far be it for me to explain to the Honourable Senator Carney, a former minister in the government, who played a leading role in the free trade discussions, or to question the motives of those who believe in free trade. I did not do so. I questioned the interference of corporate Canada and the multinationals in the electoral process of Canada and the sell-out of our nation to corporate Canada and the multinationals by your government. That is all I said. I do not question those who were for or against Meech Lake. I do not question those who were for or against free trade. I question the interference of these people in the electoral process. I question your party permitting it to be used the way it was used, and you will permit them to do it again. The ads will come out this weekend, "Support the GST", financed and paid for by the Canadian Council on National Issues, Mr. d'Aquino, President and Chief Executive Officer, who thinks the people of Canada do not know what they are talking about. They are your friends, not mine.

Senator Carney: Mr. Macdonald is a good Liberal.

Senator Hastings: I never questioned his politics. I understand he emptied the wastepaper baskets in Mr. Trudeau's office.

Senator Frith: "Good Liberal" is a redundancy. All Liberals are good.

Senator Hastings: I was dealing with petitioners from the Town of Slave Lake, Alberta, 137 miles northeast of the City of Edmonton, Senator Twinn's hometown. There are approximately 300 residents in the Town of Slave Lake, Alberta, and there are exactly 200 signatories from that town and district to a petition asking Senator Twinn to please consider the GST and reject it on our behalf. If we adopt Senator Doody's motion, we will not consider what the people of Slave Lake have to say. Senator Twinn can go home and tell those petitioners what they think is not important, that it is more important to fulfil the corporate policy and objectives of the Canadian Manufacturers Association.

(Names of signatories read)

All of those citizens from Senator Twinn's hometown are asking us to give consideration to their petition, the same consideration given to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Let Senator Twinn vote in favour of that motion and go home and tell those people that he voted in favour of throwing the petition in a cardboard box because it is not important. According to Mr. d'Aquino, the petitioners do not comprehend what it is all about. That is what is going to be done with Senator Doody's motion.

• (1710)

When Senator Twinn goes home to Slave Lake this weekend, he can probably phone these petitioners who signed this petition hoping to participate in this process.

(Names of signatories read)

He can look up these people and tell them that according to Mr. D'Aquino: "You don't understand anything about this tax and we put your petition in a box and stuck it in the basement. Now we are going to go ahead and pass the bill if we can shut up those damned Liberals."

(Names of signatories read)

He can phone all of those citizens residing in the province of Alberta, most of them in the town of Slave Lake, who are asking to participate, and say: "No room, no more." They are asking to exercise a right which has existed through the centuries, yet it is going to be suspended by the Honourable Senator Doody because it does not fit the agenda. It does not fit in with the efficiency of this government.

Strange how this government becomes efficient when local, ordinary people wish to participate. Of course, the government was not efficient when the President of the Canadian Manufacturers Association wanted to participate. Senator Doody stood up front and centre and presented an illegal petition in order to accommodate the President of the Canadian Manufacturers Association. But we cannot hurt him. We cannot insult the President of the Canadian Manufacturers Association. We cannot tell him his petition went in a cardboard box. We have to stand up front and centre and read it and then sneak through this motion to go to Orders of the Day and get rid of petitions and get rid of those other people who do not understand what we are doing.

When Senator Twinn goes home this weekend, perhaps Senator Waters and I should go with him, because there are a lot of people in Slave Lake to see. He is going to have a busy weekend. He should try to see them, because they are very interested up there.

(Names of signatories read)

He can call these petitioners who reside in Widewater, Alberta. Widewater is just a little village 18 miles away from Slave Lake. A citizen there says: "Please listen to me; I do not want the GST." But we will tell her that we did not listen to her; we listened only to the President of the Canadian Manufacturers Association. We put hers in a cardboard box. Maybe some day it will come up.

All these residents of Slave Lake, Alberta are asking to have their views considered. The only way they can have their views considered is by way of presentation of a petition. But Senator Doody and the Conservatives say no. Senator Twinn says no. "We are not going to consider the views of the citizens of Slave Lake, the 200 who want their views considered. We do not want to hear from these people." Mr. D'Aquino says they do not understand. He is one of those great leaders of industry in this nation, the guardians of our social fabric and our social welfare system.

Well, honourable senators, these people who reside in Slave Lake, Alberta have asked to be considered.

(Names of signatories read)

[Translation]

I believe that this Mr. Boisvert who signed the petition is a cousin of the Leader of the Liberal Party, Mr. Jean Chrétien, since Jean Chrétien's mother was also a Boisvert from St. Paul in Alberta.

I think that this Mr. Boisvert is one of Mr. Chrétien's relatives.

Senator Muir: You are pretty good in Greek.

Senator Hastings: It is not Greek, it is French.

Honourable senators that is another group of 25 residents of the town of Slave Lake, the home of Senator Twinn. I hope that he goes home he will try to contact a few of these people and tell them we did not give a damn about their petition. He can tell them that we passed a motion, a motion that he voted for to get rid of the petitions in order to pass the goods and services tax. He can probably phone the next group of petitioners.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, there are 300 people in Slave Lake and 289 signed the petition.

Senator Lucier: Eleven were out of town.

Senator Hastings: Including Senator Twinn. I do not know if he was in town.

Senator Marchand: You never know, he might have signed it.

Senator Hastings: The list of names goes on as follows;

(Names of signatories read)

• (1730)

All of those people that I mentioned, I believe, signed petitions in good faith.

Senator Barootes: You have got them on the record.

Senator Hastings: They thought they would have an opportunity to have their petition presented in this chamber and that senators in this chamber would consider their views when it came time to deal with Bill C-62, the goods and services tax. However, that will not happen if we adopt the motion of Senator Doody that we move to Orders of the Day and we do not further consider the first order of business on this day, being Presentation of Petitions.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Hastings: The right extended to every Canadian throughout history to present his views to the Parliament of Canada will now be denied, and the petitions of those people from Slave Lake, Alberta, will go in a cardboard box, according to Senator Ottenheimer, and down to the basement, while we proceed to deal with Bill C-62 in complete indifference to their views, which, as I have said, and I repeat, is consistent with the attitude of this government when it comes to the ordinary Canadian citizen.

Senator Barootes: So the Liberal Party is the protector of the little man, is it?

Senator Hastings: Always!

Senator Barootes: Is that what you are saying?

Senator Hastings: I am glad you have finally learned. I am glad you finally saw the light. I had wondered where you had been, Staff.

Senator Barootes: Then listen to this. Tell them about the Liberal Party and the protection of the little man.

Senator Hastings: I can tell you.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: On a point of order—

[Senator Hastings.]

Senator Hastings: Point of order?

Senator Frith: No, don't say "point of order". You will regret it.

Senator Hastings: He said "point of order".

Senator MacDonald: I want to be helpful. You make so much of the corporate support we receive. Have you looked at the last return by the Liberal and Conservative parties. You received 62 per cent of your revenue from corporations, and the Conservative Party received 50 per cent.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Barootes: There is the protector of the little guy, eh?

Senator Frith: You bet!

Senator Corbin: Small businesses!

Senator Frith: A lot of small businesses, you bet! We get it from the small businessmen.

Senator MacDonald: Sixty-four per cent of your revenue is from corporations, whereas we receive 58 per cent.

Senator Corbin: It still wasn't enough!

Senator Frith: You've got all the big shots, that's why!

Senator Barootes: Who is looking after the little guy? You people?

Senator Frith: Including the small business people. You are quite right. They are all against the GST. Well done! Thank you very much!

Senator Barootes: You're minions of big industry!

Senator Hastings: I am glad Finlay MacDonald is here, because he was not here when I tried to explain revenue neutrality.

Senator MacDonald: I missed nothing.

Senator Hastings: You missed your own words.

Senator MacDonald: No, I heard every scintilla.

Senator Barootes: You did not respond to the 64 per cent from corporations and big commerce.

Senator Frith: No, small businesses!

Senator Barootes: Why don't you answer that?

Senator Hastings: Look at your donation from the Royal Bank!

Senator Barootes: You're toadies to business!

Senator Murray: Where is Rizzuto? He should be listening to this.

Senator Barootes: Toadies of big business!

Senator Phillips: How much did the Bank of Montreal give them?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, as you may have surmised, I intend to vote against the motion. I believe that I have a duty to protect these people.

Senator Barootes: Oh, yeah!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Hastings: These citizens of Slave Lake asked me to present their petition. Senator Twinn is not going to present their petition. He is going to vote that their petitions go into the box. I am going to vote that the people of Slave Lake and the people of Alberta be considered in the same light as the President of the Canadian Manufacturers Association and have the same treatment, and I shall therefore vote against the motion of Senator Barootes.

Senator Barootes: The same ones who gave the Liberal Party 64 per cent of its revenue. You are living off big business!

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators—

Senator Hastings: I heard a voice from heaven!

Senator Doyle: I would have saved this question for Senator Buckwold, but I have not seen him in hours.

Senator Hastings: He's there! Stand up on the chair, Sid!

Senator Barootes: You looked better behind there!

Senator Doyle: There is an arm! So I won't have to ask where he is! At any rate, I find my eyes drawn to that part of the chamber and to the boxes and crates. I am reminded of the evidence in a courtroom stacked up for all to see, and I wondered if we might have the same privileges as members of a court and be allowed, perhaps during the supper break, to look at the evidence, to check the quantity and have a look at the signatures—or is it private? If it is private material, I am surprised to find it sitting here in the Senate. That is what I should like to know, whether it is for all of us or whether it is something of your own over there?

Senator Hastings: It is Buckwold's paper barricade.

Senator Corbin: We have more, by the way.

Senator Barootes: Is that your laundry, Sid?

Senator Hastings: That's the Oka barricade!

Senator MacDonald: Stand up, Sid!

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Talk about a sad day in the Senate! It is a sad day when I hear my colleague from Saskatchewan, Senator Barootes, a representative of the people, denying the people of Regina the right to have their petitions heard. It is sad when he looks at my array of the people's will and says, "Is that your laundry, Sid?" That is exactly the attitude of your group, led by a big mouth like yourself.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Buckwold: He compares the will of the people to dirty laundry. I suppose you people are well-used to that. That is the way this whole thing started tonight.

Senator Barootes: Table them!

Senator Buckwold: I started to stand up, and right away somebody said, "What's in your boxes?" What do you think I have in my boxes?

Senator Barootes: Table them!

Senator Buckwold: We are not supposed to table them; you know that. We are going to be denied the right to table them, and that is why I am standing up. Honourable senators, as I said when I started out, it is a sad day indeed. It is a sad day when I hear a motion by the Deputy Leader of the Government that we proceed to Orders of the Day. We are eliminating the right—as so well explained by Senator Hastings in his brief speech—of those who feel they have the duty and responsibility as good citizens to appeal to their government. Only a few years ago I went as a representative of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association to the Isle of Man, along with two or three other representatives, to attend what they called the "Tinwald" ceremony honouring the oldest parliament in the British Commonwealth. It was a great ceremony, and I had the honour, with others, of representing Canada. The Governor of the island carried out the ancient ceremony on the beautiful green grass of the Isle of Man, that I am sure many of you have seen and enjoyed. It was a lovely day.

• (1740)

The first order of procedure on that remarkable anniversary was the Presentation of Petitions to the Governor by the islanders of the Isle of Man, who had the right, which had been carried on year by year, to present their petitions and to doff their hats to the governor and beg a petition.

That is the tradition and it relates to the petitions which we have here, as seen in the preamble to the petitions, which says: "The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada"—and this the official wording that is required to send a petition to the Senate—"who now avail themselves of the ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to the petitioners" in the assurance that "your honourable House will therefore provide a remedy."

Honourable senators, those are ancient words that were written centuries ago, and they express the trust which citizens have that they will be listened to. That trust does not mean a damn thing right now when we have a government that is absolutely determined at any cost, and using any means, legal or otherwise, to ram through what is probably the most unpopular tax measure in the history of this country. Believe me, that is the truth.

In my earlier speeches I have asked: "Why doesn't the government listen a little?" If Senator Murray had any brains—and I am not questioning that, although others may—he would say "Let the Senate kill the bill at least for a period of time," or he might at least accept an amendment to delay implementation of the bill for a year and get us off the hook. But, no, that party, as it has historically, has a death wish. They somehow want to act in a way that will ensure that in the next ten generations they will probably not again be re-elected, as we have seen happening across Canada. Why do these stupid things? In this chamber we have seen really stupid actions in changing the rules and forcing through all kinds of procedural changes that are not compatible with the standards of this chamber.

I have to ask myself why they do this, particularly when the Globe and Mail and the CBC—who are not necessarily friends of the government—indicate that the government is absolutely wiped out in every poll that is taken. The government has been decimated, annihilated, or any other adjective one cares to choose. Seventy-five per cent of Canadians have expressed resentment toward this tax. If we eliminated Quebec from that view, then that figure would probably be around 85 per cent across the country.

Honourable senators, I will touch for a few moments on the situation respecting Regina, because I do have some petitions here that should be read. I am sure that Senator Barootes will be interested in the names, so that he, like Senator Hastings, can go and talk to these people. He can discuss with them why their petitions were not honoured.

Honourable senators, we have heard much of that great evening of October 4 when the doors were locked and there was a secret assembly with everyone present on that side but not a soul on this side. It was really quite ludicrous. Honourable senators will recall the bedlum that occurred the next day. Why did it take place? I wish some of our distinguished press people were here so that they could listen to the truth. Why did those who otherwise are sane former members of the federal cabinet, former premiers, and former mayors, and any number of important legislators and leaders of this country carry on in such a way which all of us agree was almost nonsensical? They did it for a very good reason. For four hours our friends across the way tried to put the motion to move that we proceed to Orders of the Day and that we start with item number five, Bill C-62. Believe me, everyone knows—although we never see it in the press—that the antics that went on were to keep the Leader of the Government from being able to move that motion. He stood there for four hours like a dummy, embarrassed, trying to find break where he might sneak in his motion; but no-one gave him a chance.

Why did Senator Gigantes sit there and read his Greek Tragedy or Jeremiah? Why did Senator Davy Steuart lean heavily on "begad and begats"? Why were we making such fools of ourselves? We did it only to jam that microphone in order to keep from being processed the very motion that we are now dealing with here. It is the same thing.

Honourable senators, why did we have such bedlam in the Senate, over and above the fact that we had a Speaker who sabotaged the rules? When the history of this is written—

Senator Barootes: Were you there?

An Hon. Senator: Were you here?

Senator Buckwold: Certainly I was here.

I will come to the barricades pretty soon. There is the man who talked about taxing reading materials and newspapers, that great noble former editor of the Globe and Mail, that crusader who fought for every right for people to be heard, stating week after week in our committee that this tax is a good thing and it is not a bad idea to tax newspapers because they make too much money. I wish your former boss could hear about that.

Senator Doyle: Your friend Ted Thomson can afford it.

Senator Buckwold: Now we come back to the same situation, proceed to Orders of the Day, ram it through, and not talk about the goods and services tax. Other than Senator Kelly, who in a very fair way presented his side of the case—and, as I stated, I admire him for what he did—we have heard absolutely nothing about the goods and services tax. I gave what I thought was a fair review in my introduction of the bill. I spoke for two hours and covered every aspect of what the committee heard and our responses, at least from the point of view of those of us on this side. I saw nothing in the press. Perhaps it was not good enough to make the press. There was not one word other than two or three lines that stated the bill was introduced. Someone along the line should be able to tell Canadians why a majority of the committee came to the conclusion that it did; but that did not come out. We spent many weeks travelling the country and heard hundreds of witnesses. Believe me, Senator Murray, we were not puppets. This chairman did not take any orders from anyone. I could feel myself, along with the committee, moving in response to the wishes of the Canadian public as expressed through the witnesses we heard. If you would only move a little bit, I have a feeling you might do a lot better. All I am really saying is that the time has come to start thinking about the whole basis of the arguments, and I have not seen that yet. However, it is coming, and I am sure we will have an opportunity in due course.

To return, Senator Doyle, to the petition boxes. I deliberately brought a few of the boxes, but there are many more in my office. I think I am the one who is most interested, involved and concerned about literally millions of people across the country who have gone to the trouble of signing a petition. I well remember a rainy day in May when a young man, accompanied by another young person, came into my office, shook off his raincoat, and told me he had just arrived in Ottawa on his motorcycle. He had gone across Canada and was here to present me with a million signatures. This young man was emotionally involved and had a deep-set feeling against this tax. At his own expense, he rode his motorcycle through rain, snow and sleet stopping in towns along the highway from one end of the country to the other and presented the signatures of one million Canadians who want the Government of Canada to listen to them. That is being denied.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Senator Buckwold, I do not wish to interrupt you, but would you take a question on what you said? You mentioned that you introduced the bill. I think you meant that you introduced your report from the committee. It was not the bill you were introducing, but the report.

You also said a moment ago that the report you prepared was not discussed with anyone.

Senator Buckwold: No, I did not say that at all.

Senator Barootes: Excuse me. What did you say in that respect?

• (1750)

Senator Buckwold: I said I was very disappointed at the time of the original presentation of the committee's report not to hear one senator, other than Senator Doyle in his presentation, rise and given cogent reasons why the goods and services tax, as brought forward by the government, should be acceptable to the people of Canada. All we heard was criticism of the committee, criticism of the chairman, and the usual diatribe, planned and devised and part of a scheme to make sure the Canadian public knew nothing about the goods and services tax—and that is continuing to this day.

Senator Barootes: I am sorry, I did not make myself clear. I was not refering to that part of it. Both in your introductory speech on the report of the committee, as well as a few moments ago, I thought you mentioned that this was a report that you had not discussed with anyone before it came to your committee.

Senator Hastings: It was adopted by the committee.

Senator Barootes: No; before it came to the committee.

Senator Buckwold: Rest assured that we listened to presentations. It did not take very much to know what direction the committee would take. One did not have to be any Einstein after listening to the people. One did not have to have any more brains than some of the Conservative members of the committee to know what was going to happen. I was criticized for dominating the committee and for not discussing the final results. That has been clarified.

Senator Barootes: Not at all.

Senator Buckwold: The committee report has been well received across Canada. The accolades that I, as chairman, and members of the committee have received will be with me for the rest of my life as one of the great contributions I have made to this country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: I have absolutely no regrets.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Senator Buckwold, while you were referring to the responses and the comments on the bill from senators on this side, I quickly re-read my own remarks on Bill C6-2 and I thought they were quite cogent and Senator Davey Steuart agrees.

Senator Buckwold: Perhaps you were not listening to me. I said you were the only one.

Senator Kelly: No, you said Senator Doyle.

Senator Buckwold: I apologize. I meant to say Senator Kelly.

Before we get to six o'clock, let me speak to Senator Barootes. Senator Barootes, distinguished citizen of Regina, a nice city and very glad that Senator Barootes spends most of his time in Ottawa, what are you going to say following the excellent example set by my colleague?

Senator Barootes: You are bootlegging this in, are you?

Senator Hastings: What are you going to say to Stelco?

Senator Buckwold: What are you going to say to the following petitioners?

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Frith: He will call them emetic.

Senator Barootes: At least you now know the word.

Senator Frith: I shall associate it with you for the rest of my life.

Senator Buckwold: We have reached the hour of adjournment, but if senators so wish I will give you a few more names of people from Regina who would like to know why they are being denied the right to be heard by this body.

I have pages of petitions from Senator Barootes' city. I would ask the honourable senator, as a fellow senator from Saskatchewan, if he has had any petitions from Regina?

Senator Hastings: Ipsco?

Senator Buckwold: Well, we had Ipsco in front of us. You remember Senator Barootes in Regina, what an ass he made of himself that day? I was going to use another part of the word, but remember what an ass he made of himself? He started out with points of order asking why four witnesses were being denied; and he made an uproar over this kind of thing. We then found out that most of them did not want to appear and that one wanted to come to Ottawa. Do you remember that, Senator Barootes? I thought you were supposed to be representing the province.

Senator Hastings: You made Ipsco come.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as the clock says 6 o'clock, I must leave the Chair. We will suspend the sitting now and reassemble at the call of the bell.

The sitting of the Senate suspended.

THE SENATE

[Editor's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Issue No. 105D.]

The sitting of the Senate was resumed at 8:00 p.m., Wednesday, October 31, 1990, the Speaker in the Chair.

[Translation]

GENTLEMAN USHER OF THE BLACK ROD

APPOINTMENT OF MR. JEAN DORÉ—ESQUIRE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the pleasure to inform the Senate that I received a certified copy of Order in Council PC 1990-2247, dated October 12, 1990, appointing Mr. Jean Doré as Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, starting October 15, 1990.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: On your behalf, I welcome Colonel Doré to the Senate.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62—RECEIPT OF PETITIONS

Hon. Efstathios W. Barootes: Senator Buckwold has given me permission to pursue a conversation that we had at the recess. I should like to answer his question—and I do not know whether it was rhetorical or direct—as to whether I have received any petitions from Regina or Saskatchewan. My answer to that is no, I have not. I would presume that most of those people who were gathering petitions opposing the GST would have sent them to either the chairman or the clerk of our committee. I would hope that they would be in your hands.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: They gave up hope to ever convince you.

Senator Barootes: I have the Debates of the Senate for September 25, 1990. On pages 2234 and 2235, Senator Buckwold said:

> I have to admit that I made a decision, to which some people may object. There was so much insistent demand on the part of our friends across the way to be able to transmit every word that was being said that I wanted to keep it under my control. This is a very sensitive piece of legislation for the government and I took my responsibilities very seriously. I said to myself—and it was to myself—that "I am going to keep this to myself because every word will be leaked within two seconds the minute anybody looks at it."

You kept it to yourself until it was released just before our meeting of the committee on September 24.

In answer to Senator Simard you said:

> All I am saying is that I was keeping it under wraps.

Those were your exact words.

In a letter to Senator Poitras, who was the Deputy Chairman of the committee, under date of September 19, item 3 says:

> No member of the committee or any other senator, including Senator Kirby, has seen the report in its present form. The report is being drafted by our researchers under the direction of the chairman.

You and I discussed these things outside this chamber, and it is clear that no members of the committee helped in the preparation of the report which you wanted to keep under wraps. That is an unusual procedure, but certainly you explained your reasons for it.

However, in an article by Mark Kennedy, Citizen National Staff, you are quoted somewhat differently. The article says:

> As Buckwold's committee continued its hearings through August and early September, the senior Liberal senators began formulating their report. They would not follow tradition and recommend amendments, but in one sweeping and dramatic gesture proposed that the Senate just kill it. "It was a fairly difficult decision because it put the Senate into new territory," says Buckwold, adding that MacEachen, "didn't take too much convincing" to agree to the plan.

The plan being to kill the report.

The other thing that comes to my attention, Senator Buckwold, is that by inference—and I do not mean to say that this is proof positive—Senator Frith, in speaking to the media some time before your committee met on September 24, had outlined the four options which you made available in your report.

I say to you that this contradicts the fact that you kept it under wraps and that no other senator was aware of it if you had consulted Senator Frith and Senator MacEachen, as you say you did. Obviously there was some input into that report which other senators on the committee were not permitted to see or participate in.

You must have a response to this. I would be pleased to listen to it.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Senator Barootes, I am glad that you wasted seven or eight minutes of a long evening by starting on the same old track, same old recording, same old attack: Get to the chairman, make sure that he is discredited, question his report. I must admit that I do not recall the particular quotation that you read. In due course I would like to read it all. It might bring it back to me because, God knows, there were hundreds of reporters looking for information on a subject which was of so much interest to the Canadian public.

How does a committee operate? In my case, I took the responsibility as Chairman. Seriously, after listening to the evidence, I discussed possibilities with all members of the committee, indicating time and time again that there were four alternatives. Let me mention them to you: The first was that we would hold our noses and pass the bill; the second was that we would make amendments; the third was that we would delay it; and the fourth was that we would axe the tax. That was said by me publicly over the TV and radio right across Canada. That was my position right until the end.

As indicated early in my remarks, the committee prepared a report under my supervision. When I say "the committee", I mean the researchers. Because of a variety of reasons—very good reasons—that I gave in my address, I felt that I wanted to play it very close to the belt. I believe I used an expression similar to that. I did not want the report to be public knowledge or in the hands of the minister or in the office of those who were waiting with bated breath for every word that I had to say. With that in mind, I personally supervised the report, after listening to the representations made to the committee and hearing the kind of comments that were presented. I do not find that difficult to accept.

I have been involved in dozens of reports of committees. Generally speaking, they are prepared by the chairman, along with his staff. When I have been on other committees, I do not remember the chairman sitting down and saying "What are we going to say?" Basically, there was a report presented to the committee as a result of the direction of the chairman, as a result of the input that went into committee, and as a result of the kind of hearings that took place. That is generally the way committee reports are made, along with a great deal of input from the professionals and the senators involved.

• (2010)

My friend, Senator Poitras, seems to have an exaggerated view of the role of two functions: that of the steering committee and that of the deputy chairman. I do not know whether Senator Barootes still has his rule book. It seems that it is no longer a document of importance to this chamber; but if he were to look through it, he would not find in the rules any mention of the role of the deputy chairman. The deputy chairman is there to take the place of the chairman in case he is absent. I suggest that he look through the rule book to see if he can find one reference to a steering committee. I did. Perhaps Senator Molgat could find a reference; but I could not. What is the responsibility of a steering committee? The job of a steering committee is to deal with the technical aspects of conducting meetings, where they take place, and so on. In other words, to plot the course.

The steering committee does not write the report, particularly when it involves a highly controversial, politicized subject such as the goods and services tax, on which committee members hold very definite positions. I am not talking about writing a report on a study, such as the one we did on financial institutions. In that exercise we spent some time listening to witnesses, doing our homework and having discussions with advisors, and so on, to come up with a report that would be acceptable to everyone. That study on financial institutions kept us going for six months, and there was substantial input from everyone involved. It was important that we came in with a report on which there was agreement, and that involved a little give and take. We were not discussing legislation, especially controversial legislation like Bill C-62.

I am sorry that Senator Poitras is not here. He is a relatively new man, and certainly a fine man, and I admire him, in spite of all the terrible things he has said about me. The fact is that he seemed to think that because he was deputy chairman he could write the report. That is nonsensical. It just does not work that way. He was outraged that, as a member of the steering committee, his duties were designated by the chairman. I have been a member of a steering committee when meetings were never called. Three and four months would go by and nothing would happen. The chairman simply ran his meetings.

I am looking at the other clipping to see what it is all about. The Conservatives must have a lot of people digging up these things. It is dated October 13.

Senator Barootes: That's right.

Senator Buckwold: We tabled our report on September 25. I thought the honourable senator had said earlier—again it is a typical misrepresentation—that this had occurred in the early stages.

Senator Barootes: There was no misrepresentation; I gave the dates.

Senator Buckwold: You left the impression that I had leaked something. You were trying to imply that I had leaked something.

Senator Barootes: Read the quote, please. It is on page 2, and I have put an x by it.

Senator Buckwold: I do not have time to read it, but it says that Buckwold's committee continued hearings through August and early September. That is right. However, the article was written October 13, two weeks after the report had been tabled. That is after we had gone through the whole exercise. As I say, I will read it, and if I have anything more to say about it, I shall say it.

If the honourable senator wants to keep talking about it, it will give me further opportunity to go through this exercise on the goods and services tax. Why does the honourable senator not stand up and say, "You know, it's going to be good for the economy to have the goods and services tax." Why does he not say that it will be good for the tourist trade? Why does he not stand up and say that the government has just sent out 10 million copies of a bulletin to every household in the country, and that it is just great?

Let me go through some of the propaganda that cost the Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars. I am trying to answer the honourable senator's question, and it may take me about an hour. The title is, "Goods and Services Tax: Fair, Visible and Modern." Who decided that it was fair, when almost every Canadian citizen who appeared before the committee had, as his first objection, that the tax was regressive and unfair? No matter, the government has as its headline, in its propaganda that cost taxpayers millions, that the tax is a fair tax. The government says that it is fair when everyone else is saying that it will soak the poor, that it will take advantage of those who are least able to pay. Why does the honourable senator not discuss that point with us? I have not heard him say one word on it.

The government says in the headline that the tax is visible. Certainly no Canadian has said that it is visible, except perhaps two or three senators on the other side, and if they were to let down their cover a little bit, I am sure that they would indicate that it is not. One of the initial objectives regarding this tax was that it would be visible. That is what the government said when it first introduced it. Then when the legislation came out, they realized that it would be a little hard to make it visible. They then hoped that the merchants and suppliers of goods and services would add the tax on the bottom line. For example, if a pair of shoes was a hundred dollars, the tax of 7 percent would be visible on the bottom line. However, I do not think that deep down the government wanted the tax to be visible, because a visible tax is like seeing an old girlfriend. You cannot get away from her; she is there to haunt you. The government did not want every invoice, bill or sales slip to have on it a "plus 7 percent government tax" or "Conservative tax" or "Tory tax". They really did not want that, so they changed the rules.

The legislation does not compel anyone to add on the 7 percent tax, to make it visible, like they say in their million dollar advertising sheet or throw-away, which really is what it is. All they say in the legislation is that there is to be a sign in the store saying that the store includes the goods and services tax in the price. The tax can either be added or it can be a flat price which includes the tax. When Senator Doyle's newspaper is sold under the tax, it will be $.50 plus 7 percent. It will probably be $.55; in other words, rounded out to 10 percent. You can not very well use pennies. It will not be a visible tax.

Senator Lucier: It will be like the laundromats, which will increase their prices by a quarter or more, or, in other words, by 25 percent.

Senator Buckwold: That is right. The heading then goes on to describe the tax as "modern." It is probably the most regressive, ancient kind of tax as it is imposed on consumer goods rather than on income. It goes back to ancient Rome when the tax load was put on the poor slaves. They did not tax the rich. A modern tax should tax the rich. We gradually got out of the feudal ages by taxing people on the basis of ability to pay. So I say to Senator Barootes: Why do you not discuss these things with us instead of haranguing the chairman, day after day, on how he developed the report? No GST will be charged. Listen to this. This is their propaganda. I am answering Senator Barootes again. There will be no GST charged on basic groceries. Take a look and see the overhead that will be added to the grocery stores. We have been told that they will have to take a bit of extra mark up.

• (2020)

Senator Stanbury: And the transportation!

Senator Buckwold: That comes into it. That is the worst misrepresentation. There will be no GST charged on residential rents. How can you sit back, even as partisan as you may be, and say that there is no effect on rent?

Senator Lucier: That is a blatant lie!

Senator Buckwold: I am the partial landlord of a small apartment building. On the first of January, if by any chance the GST gets through—and I hope that it will not; it will not be because of me or members on this side if it does—the tenants in that building will have a rent increase of 2 per cent to cover the extra costs that I will incur that are not directly charged. Do you see the misrepresentation? There is no tax on rent, but the owner of the building will pay on his heating.

Senator Bosa: He will pay tax on his fuel and electricity also!

Senator Buckwold: Yes. He will pay on his heating, electricity, and on every painter that comes in to paint the apartments.

Senator Bosa: He will pay tax on every service!

Senator Buckwold: The landlord will have to pay on everything that he buys, other than wages. By the way, the landlord does not pay for water. There is no tax on water. Why they do not tax water when they tax electricity, I do not know. You will have to pay tax on the legal fees to draw up the leases, and tax on anything that happens in the building.

How do you manage to sit there complacently, as intelligent, decent people—which I used to think you were—and swallow that kind of propaganda and never, ever question it?

Senator Lucier: They do not swallow it!

Senator Buckwold: You said to the Canadian public that there was no tax on rent or health and dental services. Talk to your dentist. Those are two separate fields. The doctor does not charge anything for his services because he is paid by a provincial health plan.

Senator Bosa: That is the case for a doctor, but not a dentist.

Senator Buckwold: But the Canadian Medical Association, of which Senator Barootes is an active member, as I presume Senator David and others are, has told us that this will cost doctors $100 million dollars—you remember the figure, gentlemen—over the entire spectrum of the medical profession. That cost will be added to their overhead.

One of the members of our committee who is a medical doctor—and I will not say who—said, "Well, doctors can afford it. They will not add that on to the price of their services."

Senator Bosa: That is an addition!

Senator Buckwold: But the doctor has to pay tax on his rent and any of his purchases. He may receive a sliver back and a slightly lower price because the manufacturers' sales tax has been taken off his toilet paper, but on the other hand he will be paying on everything that he buys and on everything that he uses. He will be paying tax on almost everything except wages. We were told that that will cost an average general practitioner about $3,000 a year.

Hon. Paul David: I am sorry to interrupt you, Senator Buckwold, but it seems to me that you are discussing Bill C-62 at the present time, which is the main subject of the motion made by our side. You are not speaking about the motion at all, which is supposed to be the subject of your discussion.

Senator Lucier: He probably was not here when this happened!

Senator David: You are not answering Senator Barootes' question because that is not what he asked you to do. Therefore, I think that votre plaidoyer would be most welcome when we get to the issue of the bill itself. You have told us that you regret that we have not as yet come to the issue of the bill itself. We have not come to that issue because, since September 25, you have not given us an occasion to discuss the issue itself. I hope sincerely that the speech you are giving today—

Senator Austin: What were you doing on September 15th?

Senator Grafstein: What were you doing on September 26 or 27?

An Hon. Senator: Let him answer his own question!

Senator David: What you are telling us at the present time could be postponed until we discuss the third reading of this bill.

The question is: Why are you giving this speech tonight and not discussing the motion that is before us at the present time?

Senator Buckwold: Thank you very much, doctor. I guess it hurts a little when I start talking about doctors.

Senator Lucier: Yes, right!

Senator Buckwold: It must hurt a little. I guess that it strikes home. Your colleagues must be talking to you.

Senator Lucier: It is like a needle!

Senator Buckwold: I am answering Senator Barootes' question.

Senator Barootes: I never asked you that!

Senator Buckwold: He has not objected. I am giving him a thorough answer.

Senator Barootes: What is the use? You will go on about it anyway. I never asked that!

Senator Buckwold: Senator Barootes has given me a piece of paper about all the things that have been said and done, apparently. I am only responding by saying that—

[Senator Buckwold.]

Senator Doyle: Do not ask—

Senator Buckwold: —there is another one that we will come to in due course.

Senator Barootes: We ask you what day it is and you tell us how to make mashed potatoes! That is the relevance.

Senator Buckwold: There they go with their mashed potatoes!

An Hon. Senator: There you go asking about mashed potatoes!

Senator Buckwold: Senator David, you wanted to know why I am talking about the GST. I gather that the Hansard reporter has taken that down. I will continue to talk to you rather than to Senator Barootes, if that is a better direction.

I am talking about the GST because you have just asked me about it. I am referring to some of the misrepresentation that is taking place across Canada at a substantial cost —and I do not know how many millions of dollars—in every home in the country.

Senator Lucier: It is a bunch of lies!

Senator Buckwold: The fact is that it is advertising that is not acceptable. It is untruthful and—

Senator David: I am sorry, senator, but perhaps I should express myself in french. With the trips that we have done together, I believe that I have improved my english vocabulary slightly. It was a good exercise for me to do that.

I am not asking you to deal with the substance of Bill C-62, I merely asked you why you were not discussing the motion that is on the floor at the present time and were not waiting to give your speech—as well as the others—when we discuss the issue itself. I never asked you to discuss the issue of Bill C-62.

Senator Buckwold: I do not know how to differentiate between the question that was asked and the reply that I am giving. I do not know how to do that. It is all interwoven—that is, the way the government has carried on its program of advertising so falsely, as determined by the Advertising Council of Canada—

Senator Stanbury: That is right!

Senator Buckwold: —who said in their statement that a private company that would do the kind of advertising that the government has done in promoting the goods and services tax would go to jail. They did not quite use that word, but they stated that they would be found guilty of misrepresentation. That was done especially on the basis of the statement that it was not a new tax. The government stated that they were only replacing an old tax with a new tax. The advertising council immediately issued a statement saying, "Just one minute, federal government. If we had done that you would have found us guilty. But you go ahead and do it and fool the Canadian public."

I will finish pointing out the misrepresentations. No tax on rents. We were told in Toronto that the average rent of a house—because the landlord has to pay the costs—will go up $50 per month. But I guess there is "no tax on rent".

It is quite true that at the bottom of your rent bill you will not see "Rent $800 per month plus tax". That is true. But somewhere, someone has to pay for that extra cost. We go through this over and over again—and perhaps Senator David is right that I am wandering a bit, but I think it is understandable, because I am so involved in this subject. I have lived the goods and services tax for the last six months. It is coming out of my ears. It hurts me to see the kinds of statements made by the Minister of Finance and others, who are misleading the Canadian public.

● (2030)

I say to my friend Senator Barootes that he can keep after the chairman all he wants. I do not know why he keeps doing that. He is not gaining any ground. Does he think that he will fool the public and stop them thinking about the goods and services tax by saying that I once said something or other? It really is not gaining you anything. I really do not know why he is doing that. We know that it is the same gremlin who travelled across the country with us who is feeding you this stuff. He must have said to you, "Here is a good quote, go after him again".

Senator Poitras was with us in Montreal. Since it is a French-speaking city where most of the witnesses were expected to be French-speaking, and since it is much easier to have a chairman who is fluent in the language, as a decent friend of Senator Poitras, my so-called deputy chairman, who was to be available if I could not be there, I said to him, "In view of the fact that we have a language problem here in Montreal for this two-day meeting, why do you not act as co-chairman? If there is a French-speaking witness, you handle it. If there is an English-speaking witness, then I as chairman will handle it". Senators opposite will remember that.

It is very important to remember that Senator Poitras could not make up his mind. He said, "I will have to let you know". He never made up his mind on anything until he talked either to his colleagues in the Conservative Party or, more likely, to the guy in Murray's office who signed the petition. Some little fellow ran over to him and whispered in his ear giving him advice. What was that advice? It was that he would accept only on the condition that he be the co-chairman for the rest of the trip. I said, "I am the chairman; I am not going to have a co-chairman. I want you to help me out here, but if you don't, then that's fine". I turned to Senator Hébert who was there and I said, "Senator, would you mind acting as co-chairman?" That is what went on. To answer your question, that is exactly why the chairman, sometimes reluctantly, felt it would be better to handle the committee the way he did.

Senator Barootes: You do not mind doing a little character assassination yourself.

Senator Stanbury: He has learned it from you, I guess.

Senator Buckwold: I did not learn it from Senator Barootes. He is a gentle soul. He is a very decent fellow. I say that sincerely because I have known him for 60 years, would you believe. He was a nice fellow then, and he is a nice fellow now. We went to the same high school together. He came from a very fine family, one of the nicest in Saskatoon. His sister sat in front of me for four years of high school. She had more brains in her little finger than does the eminent physician across the way.

Senator Barootes: See what I mean about character assassination?

Senator Buckwold: Having answered the questions of Senator David and Senator Barootes concerning the importance of petitions, to be somewhat dramatic, I thought that I would bring down some of the boxes containing petitions and other mail which has been sent to my office concerning the goods and services tax. What I have is not as much as what we have sent to Senator Hébert. Senator MacEachen has much more. I cannot imagine how many millions of Canadians have put their names on these petitions. Senator Murray, if you could get even one-half of them to put their "X" on a ballot, it would be very helpful in the next election. I have to say to you, do not count on it. Do not depend on it.

I wish to refer to a petition which comes from Saskatoon. I did not organize it. I did not go out and say, "Send us petitions," which is what happened in Senator Murray's office where they said, "Where can we find a couple of guys to sign a petition so that we can go through this exercise?"

There were 26 people who went to the trouble of signing this petition. These people have discussed the matter with us. They state on their petition, "In duty bound your petitioners will ever pray". Believe me, they had better start praying if they want this government to listen. However, they did expect at least the decency, the common courtesy, of having extended to them the privilege of having their petitions legally and properly presented to the Government of Canada.

Before we broke for dinner I was telling honourable senators about a young man who, on his motorcycle, went across Canada and gathered nearly one million signatures. He was a pretty impressive young guy. He really felt that he was doing his duty, just as many of us did when the time came to carry a gun in wartime. Recounting me some of his experiences, he told me that it was not so pleasant. After all, he crossed the country on his motorcycle. He said that everywhere he went, he was welcomed. People told him, "Good for you, keep going". He asked me, "How will I know that these petitions that I have gathered at some great inconvenience and difficulty will, in fact, get to the place where they should go?"—rather than into the cardboard boxes to which honourable senators opposite would have us relegate them. I told him that we have decent people in the Senate. We have a government leader who has his principles. We also have the rules that we follow. There is an item on the agenda on every meeting of the Senate which states, "Presentation of Petitions".

Senator David: May I make a suggestion to you, Senator Buckwold? With regard to the young man who brought you these one million signatures, something which you told us about this afternoon and which you are repeating again tonight, why do you not create a petition to have his name put in the Guiness Book of World Records? I think he deserves at least that.

Senator Buckwold: There might be some who have done more than he has done. However, they did not come in on motorcycles. The gathering of petitions was an immense event in the lives of many Canadians who are dedicated to doing what they feel is right. They are still doing it. They are still sending in their petitions. My phone is still ringing off the hook with people wanting to know what they can do to stop the GST. I am going back again to my friend from Regina—who has conveniently disappeared—and giving him a few names that perhaps he should call.

• (2040)

(Names of signatories read)

These things can go on and on, but I take it seriously. I know that you people will say, "This really doesn't matter". I have no way of knowing how many pieces of mail there are in here. I would guess I have at least a million pieces of mail in here.

Senator David: I don't think so; not a hundred thousand.

Senator Buckwold: I do not know how many there are. You can go through the cases and count them.

Do you want to disregard all of that? No wonder the people have lost confidence in this government.

I gave you the figures. They have four times as much confidence in chartered banks and what their bank managers tell them than they have in what the federal government tells them. That does not speak very well for the kind of reputation that is being developed here in the country by a federal government that just does not seem to care.

Let us not run roughshod over Canadians, which is what you are trying to do. You say, "Get that GST through at any cost, no matter who is hurt, no matter what institutions are ruined, no matter what rules are broken." The order is out to Senator Murray, "Get that bill passed. Your job is to deliver the goods." Believe me, if he does not deliver the goods, he will pay the price. If he does deliver the goods, then the country will pay the price. I would much rather sacrifice Senator Murray than sacrifice the country.

Over and above the legal petitions, what about the millions of coupons, hand-ins, clippings, that people have signed across the country?

"I endorse Resolution 1."

Do you know what Resolution 1 is? I will be that you fellows have never even heard of Resolution 1.

Resolution 1 is not a bad idea:

> "The federal government shall forthwith enact a law under which all future increases in total federal revenue must be exceeded by reductions in overall expenditure until the budget is balanced."

Not a bad idea.

An Hon. Senator: It is a good idea.

[Senator David.]

Senator Buckwold: That is exactly what Mr. Walker told us in Vancouver. Remember Mr. Walker, of the Fraser Institute? He said that with respect to the GST, there should be a law that says that they cannot increase that tax without, literally, a vote of the people.

But Mr. Jack Myer of Olds, Alberta, says he wants Resolution 1. How about the people who support this petition:

> I am opposed to the Goods and Services Tax being applied to electricity, a vital municipal service. I urge that the government exempt electricity from the Goods and Services Tax.

This is from a couple in Georgetown, Ontario. I must have 10,000 of those.

But nobody listens on the other side. I am trying very hard to be as sincere as I can in saying, "Please, fellows, take a look and listen."

Senator Lucier: How would you like to have a $300.00 electrical bill like we do in the Yukon?

Senator Buckwold: Yes. Well, that adds to it.

Senator Kelly: Could I ask a question, Senator Buckwold?

Senator Buckwold: Certainly.

Senator Kelly: I promise not to make my speech all over again.

I do not believe that anyone on this side doubts the suggestion that the GST is not popular. But what I worry about is that judgment on the GST is not being made against the background of the fact that we have run up a debt of close to $400 billion. The solution to that problem will not be popular with anybody, no matter what it is.

The question I want to ask you is, given that fact, do you really believe that the ultimate solution to bringing that debt down will be popular, whatever the solution is? Granted, this possible solution is not popular, but is there another that you have available to offer to people, remembering that whatever it is, it will not be popular?

Senator Buckwold: Nobody likes to pay taxes. As I said in my major speech, the long one that you had to listen to—

Senator Kelly: I enjoyed it.

Senator Buckwold: Is that the invisible senator from Regina?

Senator Balfour: That is right.

Senator Buckwold: That is the way he was described in our local newspapers.

Senator Balfour: At least I got elected to the other place. That is more than you can say.

An Hon. Senator: How about being elected as Mayor of Saskatoon for several years? Is that an honourable office? Of course it is. what were you ever elected to?

Senator Buckwold: By the way, I again hasten to add that you are one of the most distinguished senators in Saskatchewan. I just said you are one of the most distinguished senators in Saskatchewan, even if we do not see very much of you, but you certainly are a very, very respectable person.

Senator Balfour: That is because I am attending to my responsibilities here.

Senator Buckwold: That is good, but it would be even better to let Regina see you.

In any event, to reply to Senator Kelly, nobody likes to pay taxes. As I said earlier as I started out in my major speech, if the government had been forthright; if they had said to the people of Canada, "We are in a terrible mess", which we are, "and we are determined to get out of it" then there might have been a different reaction.

I can remember during the war years when there was an emergency situation, the government said, with not very much popularity, and I recall this, "One hundred per cent excess profits tax during the war, and after the war is over, if we win, we will give you back 20 per cent of that." In other words, if a company earned anything more than it did before the war, it paid 100 per cent of it back in tax. That was not a very popular move, but it was a time of emergency, and the people were prepared to make that sacrifice.

Senator Kelly, I say to you, if the government had sold the goods and services tax, with all its errors and with all its inequity, by saying, "Look, dear Canadians, there is a crisis in this country. We have a deficit of $380 billion, the interest is eating us up alive and we have to do something about it. We will make two commitments. We intend to really cut spending,"—more even than you indicated earlier, remember, in your first speech about how the government has tried to cut spending,–"and we intend to raise money. However, we will be dedicating every penny of that money to reducing the national debt. Therefore, we intend to put a ten per cent tax on everything. Also, instead of $18 billion, we intend to raise $50 billion, or $25 billion, or whatever it takes." The government should then get out and sell that tax to Canadians on the basis that, for a few years, we as Canadians will have to bite the bullet. There may have been a holler, but at least Canadians could see the tunnel at the end of the rainbow.

● (2050)

In any case, I say to you that is not the way this tax was sold. Literally in the last few weeks, the governmentis just starting to talk about deficit reductions.

Senator Lucier: Yes.

Senator Buckwold: During our committee hearings—and Senator David was there at many of the meetings—every one of the Tory senators said that this tax would be revenue-neutral. Just look through the evidence. However that is not the way this tax has been sold. In other words, whatever the government did, they did it backwards. They sold it wrong. They used the wrong kind of propaganda. Instead of trying to appeal to Canadians, they antagonized Canadians. Instead of saying to Canadians, "Help us," they left the impression that Canadians of lower income would be gouged.

There are many other ways of getting additional funds, and we discussed those in our report. We did not come to conclusions, any more than did the Canadian Tax Foundation, and I urge honourable senators to read their study which came out two weeks ago on the goods and services tax versus alternate forms of revenue. In that study, the goods and services tax did not rate higher than any of the other methods of taxation. Each of them have their weaknesses. The old manufacturers' sales tax—that much-maligned tax—came in with not such bad marks either.

The fact is that there are many other ways of raising this revenue other than a consumer tax such as the GST, keeping in mind that the provinces are already in this field.

Historically, the provinces have been in the direct consumer tax field, and that is why they are taking the federal government to court. Alberta, British Columbia, and Ontario, are saying "Hey, Mr. Federal Government, you moved in on our tax field." That is just another one of the weaknesses that was apparent to us as a committee.

You are absolutely right, senator. The deficit is a problem, but not in the eyes of the government as they were selling the goods and services tax. That was one of their major fundamental errors.

Honourable senators, I have taken enough of your time. I have literally millions of names on petitions. I think I should get my secretary to write them all out by area, by town, by city, by male or female, and make up a mailing list. Believe me, if any political party could have such a mailing list as I could develop from the names and petitions that have been sent to me from across Canada, they would have a propaganda piece that might even help them win the next election. I have already had a few people say to me, "Perhaps we could get hold of those names." However, I can assure honourable senators that the integrity of the members on this side does not allow that kind of think to happen.

I want to be able, if possible, to present as many as possible of these petitions, and draw to your attention the other kinds of presentations that have been sent in by millions of Canadians. This is why I have risen to speak in opposition to the proposition that we now proceed to Orders of the Day. In my opinion it would be wrong for Canadians; it would be unfair; it would not be in keeping with the spirit of this house, through which Canadians are given the chance to express their views in the form of petitions.

I say to honourable senators opposite, do not be misled into thinking that you might get your goods and services tax legislation through a day or two earlier. It will not happen that easily, even if you win this event, in spite of every impediment you have put in the way of our attempts to represent the views of Canadians. They are demanding that we represent them through these petitions and through the other manifestations of protest that Canadians have indicated to members of the committee and to others across the country.

Hon. R.J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I have to speak briefly to the Order.

I have listened today to the statements of Senator Olson and Senator Buckwold about the great injury that is being done to the poor citizen who, in faith, signed a petition and had it sent here to the Senate, where it has been treated with contempt, or disrespect, or lack of concern. I have heard words like that throughout this week, and one has to, at least, pay a small amount of attention. So, this being Halloween night, I have gone back through time to the 9th day of October, when we last heard petitions in this house, at great length and in great detail. Few words, to speak of, came from this side of the floor. They came in great waves from the senators opposite. In the debate the opposition was its own Atlantic and its own Pacific, but I could not do it justice without repeating just a few familiar quotations. I start with Senator Stewart—Atlantic Stewart—at page 3020:

> Honourable senators, I have here a petition relative to the proposed goods and services tax. The undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax. This petition is signed by many people, one person being from Newellton, Nova Scotia. Newellton is in Shenburne County. If I am not mistaken, the ancestors of Stanley Knowles, sometime an M.P., came from the Newellton area in Shenburne County. His ancestors left there, and he was born in Chicago. That may explain why he carried a strong Republican flavour into his discussion of Canadian constitutional matters. Newellton, Nova Scotia is a fishing community of considerable importance.

That was the last we heard of that poor petitioning taxpayer.

Senator Murray: Stanley Knowles?

Senator Doyle: He was from Newellton.

Senator Murray: It is interesting to see how seriously they take the ancient and honourable petitions.

Senator Doyle: I am still with Senator Stewart.

Senator Murray: Antigonish.

Senator Doyle: At page 3015 of the same volume, it reads:

> Senator Stewart: You cannot understand the post-secondary educational structure of Maritime Canada unless you realize that these institutions were founded on a denominational basis. King's College, which originally was at Windsor, Nova Scotia, is the oldest educational institution in the area.
> Senator Gigantès: Does it have a school of journalism?
> Senator Stewart: It does now.
> Senator Gigantès: Is George Bain at that school?
> Senator Stewart: Yes. I don't know his title, but he was the top person there. He may still be, because I have noticed articles in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald by him.

Senator Murray: The right to present petitions; what a farce; what a mockery.

Senator Doyle: Wait. It continues:

[Senator Doyle.]

> Senator Gigantès: I believe he has retired to a farm with his dog which, as he says in his articles, has only one testicle.

Senator Murray: Sacred right to present petitions, indeed!

Senator Doyle: It continues:

> Senator Stewart: I am in no position to comment.

And that was the last we heard of that petitioning taxpayer.

Further down the same page, ti goes on:

> Senator Gigantès: I am sorry, sir. I am an Anglican and how could anything Anglican be offensive?
> Senator Stewart: There are people who do not have what you regard as your omniscience in matters of religion.

• (2100)

> Senator Gigantès: We are going to have discuss this at greater length.

On page 3017 of the same volume, I continue with my friend, Senator Gigantès.

> Senator Gigantès: Are there good Chinese restaurants in Antigonish-Guysborough?
> Senator Stewart: The restaurant in Antigonish is reputed to be the best Chinese restaurant in Nova Scotia.
> Senator Gigantès: Is it of the Szechuan or Cantonese persuasion?
> Senator Stewart: I am not in a position to say.

Good old Stewart never goes too far.

Senator Gigantès, a few paragraphs down, says:

> Senator Gigantès: Filibuster has something to do with fire ships, self-sacrificing sailors that would put flammable material in their ships, attach it to an enemy ship, set their own ship on fire and try to escape in small boats.

However, Senator Stewart has nothing to say about small boats.

So, honourable senators, you will know that we do sympathize with the poor, unnamed taxpayers who have been sending all these petitions to Senator Buckwold.

On page 3018, Senator Gigantès says:

> Senator Gigantès: Senator Alzheimer stocks these halls.
> Senator Stewart: Is he one of the new senators?
> Senator Gigantès: I believe there is one on each side.

That is a message to take to the poor, unnamed, forgotten petitioners.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Doyle for entertaining us and for teaching his leader, Senator Murray, a lesson when he scolded us for wasting the time of the Chamber. I heard nothing new in what Senator

Doyle said. He repeated what had been said before by other senators, but at the time, I don't remember seeing senators opposite laugh when Senators Stewart and Gigantès made those remarks. Apparently, it sounds funnier coming from "the other side," as Senator David said.

I realize, honourable senators, that to a journalist like Senator Doyle, whom I respect, although I know him only by reputation and not personally, it may seem rather funny to see members of Parliament use parliamentary rules to block a bill they don't want and 85 per cent of the Canadian population doesn't want.

Honourable senators, this afternoon, like many of my colleagues on this side, I was treated to a sermon by Her Excellency Chaput-Rolland. She gave us the kind of talking to we used to get from our parish priest, and being docile parishioners, we patiently listened to her sermon.

Honourable senators, there is a motion before us today, a motion that should never have been allowed to come before this Chamber. To get back to Her Excellency Chaput-Rolland, I have this to say in response to her charge that we insulted the eight "British" senators. I am going to tell Her Excellency a thing or two. I don't know all eight senators. I only know a few. For instance, I know my friend, James Ross. He had the good sense to leave Quebec and move to New Brunswick.

Senator David: Why the good sense?

Senator Thériault: Because I think he did a sensible thing. I am entitled to my opinions, Senator David, and I will get to you later, if you will just be patient.

He had the good sense to move to New Brunswick and made a tremendous contribution to that province. He is a person of great distinction, and if the Prime Minister of Canada had decided to appoint him to the Senate in normal circumstances, I would have been the first to applaud that decision.

So when we talk about the eight, we are not talking about them as senators or as persons, but about the way they were appointed, and according to the Globe and Mail, which is not overly friendly to the Liberal Party, 77 per cent of Canadians are opposed to this kind of appointment.

We do not object to my friend, Senator Ross, or to someone else whom I know very well and who saved my life, Senator Keon. I don't think you would find a better person than Senator Keon, but I repeat, we object to the way they came here, up the backstairs and sworn in behind closed doors. This was unheard of in the Senate.

Senator Lavoie-Roux I do not know personally, but I am familiar with her record of public service, and at one time I thought she was a real liberal. I thought she was a liberal in her philosophy. She did a tremendous job in her field in Quebec, and we would have had no objection if she had been appointed like you, Senator David. We did not object to the fact that your grandfather was a Liberal senator, your father as well and that you came here as a Conservative senator. We had no objection. That was your business. You were appointed in the normal way.

Senator Cogger: These things happen in the course of a few generations.

Senator Thériault: I will get to you later, Senator Cogger, if you will just be patient.

To finish what I was saying, I may remind Her Excellency that sermons are a thing of the past and that perhaps she should look for another audience. Honourable senators, there is a motion before this Chamber which I feel shouldn't be here at all, because in our parliamentary system we have rules of parliamentary procedure.

I realize that Senator Doyle, Senator David and other senators may think this is rather boring. In any case, some of us have been exposed to this system for many years. I said it before and I say it again, I had to put up with this kind of systematic obstruction we call a filibuster, and perhaps Senator Murray would care to let Senator Hatfield refresh his memory.

For 29 consecutive days I stood on the floor of the Legislative Assembly which operates according to the same system we have here. I had to wait 29 days for the opposition's leave to table a bill 29 days of systematic obstruction. Senator Murray, just ask your friend Senator Hatfield and he will tell you all about it.

And if Senator Murray and Senator Doyle think what Senator Gigantès and Senator Stewart said in this Chamber was funny, they should take a look at the New Brunswick Hansard for the years 1966 and 1967, and they would see Conservatives, yes Conservatives, reading phone books or the Bible from cover to cover.

I heard the Bible read in a parliamentary assembly before I came here. We had legislation that was to come into force on January 1, 1966, and we were unable to implement it until January 1, 1967, because under our parliamentary system the opposition had certain rights. We, as the government, as Liberals, respected the right of the opposition to argue the points they had to make in Parliament, and honourable senators, and . . .

• (2110)

[English]

I was not here last night, but I heard Senator Doody introduce his motion over the system. I asked myself, what is happening to this great country?

Senator Doyle: Then you looked in the mirror!

Senator Thériault: I am sorry, I did not hear you.

Senator Doyle: Then you looked in the mirror.

Senator Thériault: I would like to know what you said, but I cannot understand you. Would you send me a note, please?

Senator Doyle: I will do that.

Senator Thériault: I heard the deputy leader of the government interrupt the reading of petitions by one of my colleagues.

Senator Cogger: Isn't it terrible; he was trying to get on with the business.

Senator Stanbury: Petitions are business!

Senator Thériault: I asked myself, what is happening to this country? I wish that Senator Murray would leave this house in the hands of Senator Doody for three weeks. Senator Doody understands Parliament. He was ordered last night to try and put in a motion, but you could tell that his heart was not in it. He knows about Parliament. I suggest that Senator Murray forget what he is told by Harvey Andre and come to his senses. I suggest that he spend a couple of days or a week travelling around this country, listening and talking to people. If he did that, because he is an intelligent person, he would not allow this kind of dictatorship to happen in this Parliament. Senator David calls it—

[Translation]

Senator David is talking about "our side". What side are you on in this GST business? You are on the side of the big companies, the side of the rich. I am asking Senator Castonguay whether, when he was a Quebec Cabinet Minister, he thought about imposing a tax on goods and services. Did he recommend that the Quebec government put such a tax into place?

Senator Castonguay: Can I answer this question? When I was a Cabinet Minister in Quebec, we managed the province better than the federal Liberals have ever done in the 15 years before the Tories came to power. That is why we did not have to think about collecting a GST.

Senator Thériault: You said you managed the province better than the Liberals ever did. Weren't you a Liberal government?

Senator Castonguay: I can give you more details if you want. While in power we balanced our current operating budget without building up a deficit whereas you, federal Liberals, plunged Canada into a series of deficits which created the problems now forcing us to take these measures. That is what happened.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, can you see what happens when somebody like Senator Castonguay goes from serving the public as a Cabinet Minister to becoming a millionaire who manages big companies? His thinking changes.

Senator Castonguay: It seems the senator cannot see a difference between managing company assets and managing his own personal assets. The senator tells me I am a millionaire. If I compared my finances to his, we probably would not see much difference.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I thought my comments would make him happy. If he is not a millionaire, then he speaks for them. His managing millions of dollars changed his political philosophy. Since then—

Senator Cogger: May I ask a question? Did you clear your speech with your own colleague Senator Kolber? What is this talking to members of our party as if it were the only one with company directors and businessmen? We have representation from the whole Canadian community—

Congratulations, Senator Stanbury, I had no idea you sit on the board of a number of companies. Congratulations and all the more power to you! Senator Kolber, the last time I looked I did not think he was president of the Salvation Army!

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am grateful to my colleague Cogger for his intervention because I will be speaking until midnight. He gave me a chance to catch my breath and gather my thoughts. I have more to say about the remarks made by Senator Castonguay when he was a minister in Quebec. Senator Castonguay, let me remind you that when you were a Quebec Cabinet minister I was also a minister in New Brunswick. We did not have a deficit either, and in Ottawa the Liberals did not have a deficit, well, practically none—

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Thériault: All I am saying is that you should think about it, you have the right to change your approach, but if you did not why is it that only 15 per cent of the people agree with you?

Senator Castonguay: May I ask a question? You seem to think that companies are an extremely harmful component of our society, but can you tell me who else besides companies creates jobs in Canada?

Senator Thériault: Would you mind repeating?

Senator Castonguay: The way you speak you seem to think that companies are a harmful component of our society. I notice an extremely negative approach when you and your colleagues referred to major company directors this afternoon. Who creates jobs in Canada if not companies? What is the point of running them down as you always do? Did you ever work for a company? Do you know the ethical standards of people who work for companies? I can assure you they measure very well against those of members of your political party.

• (2120)

Honourable senators, that is the kind of argument you get from people who don't know what to say. None of us said that corporations were bad for the country. I did not hear any of my colleagues say that this afternoon or last week, for that matter. Some of us are in business, in the private sector, granted but where we apparently disagree, Senator Castonguay, is that we believe it is not up to business to run the government. That is the difference.

We support private enterprise, Senator Castonguay, and I suggest that you and your colleagues remember what happened from 1929 to 1935, when private enterprise had a free rein.

We were in the biggest depression we ever had, and you know, with the Thatchers, Reagans and Mulroneys, we could easily get involved in the same kind of situation again, because you are destroying the safety nets that protected people who needed that kind of protection, the kind of systems that did not exist under the Conservatives from 1930 to 1935 and which you want to destroy with the legislation you are proposing and supporting in this Parliament.

That is the difference, and we have nothing against private enterprise. If Senator Cogger wants to support the GST, that is typical of his kind. It is typical of his kind of philosophy and his way of life. It is normal for people who are intent on preventing the rich and big corporations from paying their fair share of taxes. And they want to do this with the GST, if we fail to block it. I hope that my colleagues and I, with the 85 per cent support we have across Canada, will be able to block the GST with the parliamentary means at our disposal.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Would Senator Thériault entertain a question?

Senator Thériault: Certainly.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: You accused the present government of making cuts in social programs. I realize there may have been developments you might not have noticed since you were appointed to the Senate, and I don't know how many years ago that was, but do you realize that the first cuts in social programs, in transfer payments for education and health programs, were made by the Liberal government under Mr. Trudeau?

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I knew there were still a few Quebecers who were haunted by the memory of the most intelligent Prime Minister we ever had, the most respected government leader in the world. I knew they would bring up his name, and I will answer your question.

Do you know that—I do not deny everything you said, but I would like to tell you a story about this, because I was a member of a provincial government, the government of a small province, and when the federal government, I don't know whether it was Liberal or Conservative, changed the system of transfer payments to the provinces, do you know who wanted those changes?

You know perfectly well it was Quebec and Ontario that wanted those changes. You wanted them to ovehaul the system because until then, we paid 50 per cent of the cost, and when Quebec and Ontario agree, what Liberal or Conservative government is going to resist the pressure?

They have the seats, and they finance the parties!

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Would the senator entertain a supplementary?

Senator Thériault: Certainly.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: I think the senator's statement is inaccurate, unless he can provide evidence to the contrary. Quebec never—I cannot speak for Ontario—Quebec never asked for a reduction in transfer payments for health insurance or education. The decision was made by the Liberal government at the time.

Senator Thériault: I believe there were cuts. I don't remember but I know I didn't agree with them, and this was at the time of the 5 and 6 policy.

Senator Tremblay: 1972, 1974.

Senator Thériault: It was when they changed the system of transfer payments, and it was changed at the request of Ontario and Quebec. I don't think you were there at the time, even in 1970 or 1971, and they changed the system from what it was before, when we paid 50 per cent of the cost of health insurance. I know what I am talking about, because I was Minister of Health and Social Affairs in my province at the time.

They changed the procedure for financing these programs, under which we paid 50 per cent of the cost, and switched to block funding. I am not sure what block funding is in French but it was accepted at the specific request of Quebec and Ontario.

Senator Castonguay: I would like to make another point clear, honorable senator. The change in formula did not mean imposing a ceiling like the Liberals did a few years later. These things are totally unrelated.

Senator Thériault: It is for provinces like yours, because you had what you wanted. It made no difference for us, because, until then, we had been paying 50 percent of the national costs of the programs. A greater part of the national funds went to the poorer provinces in the East and the West. You too were getting funds, but with people already thinking about sovereignty association in those days and wanting to manage the whole program, the Liberal government finally gave in and tried to please Ontario and Quebec at the expense of poorer provinces.

That is true and I am not proud of it. When the Liberal Party government does things which I feel harm the people who need the government's help, I expose them. I do not care who does the harm, because I have integrity. I am not here for a one-time command performance, unlike some of you.

Senator Cogger: Nothing is keeping you from resigning!

Senator Thériault: It is obvious . . .

Senator Cogger: Please, Senator Thériault, if I may.

Senator Grimard: May I? Don't you think that it is insulting to assign motive to say they came here for a single purpose? Frankly—

Senator LeBlanc: What were they appointed for then?

Senator Cogger: Senator Thériault, I am listening to you because I have to like all our colleagues and I think that you are going too far. You are indulging in personalities. May I remind you that under Standing Order 38 all personal speeches are forbidden.

Senator Thériault: My apologies. On the personal level, I am filled with nothing but admiration for these people. I am concerned about their work as senators, and if Senator Cogger cannot understand that, I am sorry for him. That is all I can say. He is pretty narrow-minded.

Senator Cogger: You are making personalities again.

Senator Thériault: I am not. I am simply telling you that you are narrow-minded if you think that way.

Senator Cogger: I will accept your apologies just the same.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure to hear the comments of my French-speaking colleagues from Quebec. I lived in Quebec for part of my life, you know. I attended the Petit Séminaire in Rimouski and I have many relatives in Quebec. Like many others, I have no problems, no politicial problems that is.

• (2130)

I have no political differences with Senator Cogger, either as a Conservative senator, or with Senator Bolduc, Senator Poitras, Senator Beaulieu, and those with conservative roots. I have no problem with them.

Where I have political, not personal, differences, it is with senator Lavoie-Roux, Senator Beaudoin, Senator David and Senator Castonguay. I have problems with them.

Senator David: Listen, Senator, I should like to know what differences you may have with me. It is true that my father was a Liberal, and his father before him, but I have never been involved with a political party. I have no political stripe, and I felt the Prime Minister of Canada was doing me a great honour calling me on the phone and asking me whether I would accept to be a senator. From childhood memories, I thought that the Senate was a chamber of sober second thought where people behaved with extreme rectitude and dealt with each other in a very civilized and understanding manner.

Having kept this notion from my younger years, I told myself: "Why not continue a tradition?" Whatever its origin, whether conservative of liberal, I was delighted with this appointment and today I realize that I feel much better among Conservative senators that I would among you.

Senator Thériault: If I may, honourable senators, I should like to reply to Senator David. We feel much better with you sitting in the Conservative caucus than with us. There is no problem there. But I will tell you this: If you had no political stripe, I understand that the Prime Minister was doing you an honour by inviting you on the phone to sit in the Senate. He probably did call also Senator Roblin, Senator Molson, and other independant senators here.

Senator David: It is not the same.

Senator Thériault: What do you think would have happened if you had told the Prime Minister: "Yes, but you certainly realize that because my family had always voted liberal, my grand-father had been a Liberal senator, my father had been a Liberal senator, I should like to sit as an independent—" If you had no political stripe, did you ask to sit as an independent?

Senator David: I do not have to tell you the conversation I had with the Prime Minister no more than you have to tell me the one you had when you were appointed senator.

Senator Thériault: I just cannot understand why all Quebecers hate Prime Minister Trudeau, the greatest Prime Minister Canada has ever known. Is it jealousy? Is it envy?

I say that the last one you got from Quebec will never be as great as Trudeau. In fact, nobody will ever compare with him. I can tell you that even Prime Minister Trudeau whom you love to hate appointed Conservative senators, Senators Muir, Roblin and Marshall. The Senate is full of Conservatives whom Trudeau appointed here.

Show me one Liberal or an independent ever appointed from your side.

Senator Cogger: Senator Castonguay, Senator Lavoie-Roux.

Senator Thériault: You sit as an independent, but I can see that you are in favour of the GST as well as the cuts in old age security pension benefits. I see that you are also in favour of the cuts in family allowances. You are in favour of the cuts to such universal social programs as the old age security pension. You are defending these policies which are certainly not NDP or Liberal policies.

Senator Bolduc: As to the old age security pension, tell Canadians that it is the senators' pensions that are being cut. They would certainly not shed a tear over that.

Senator Thériault: Beg your pardon?

Senator Bolduc: Do not stop in mid sentence, senator, tell people we are cutting the old-age security pension of those who are well-off: senators and others like them. Nobody will weep over it.

Senator Thériault: Those cuts are being made by the same Prime Minister who swore on his mother's head that old-age pensions would never be affected. Senator Bolduc, the level of $50,000 at which pensions are cut is not indexed. It will be $45,000 next year, $40,000 the following year and one day, the old-age security system as we have known it will have completely disappeared.

God willing, another government, either Liberal of New Democrat, will correct the situation because your stay in office will not be long enough for you to exact from people the price you want them to pay. You are not straightforward enough to say you are destroying the universality system. No, cheques are sent but the money is clawed back some other way. You know what? You could have saved money by eliminating cheques. Cut them off. The case of senators is not important, but there are others who earn $50,000 or more.

Every person here probably has people in his family who earn over $50,000. They benefitted from family allowances, Why would the Government of Quebec give up to $2,000 or $3,000 for a second or third child? I do not know all the details of that program we read about in the newspapers. Senator Lavoie-Roux probably had something to do about that. Is that amount paid only to the poor or for all children?

Be reasonable, you are about to destroy everything!

Senator Castonguay: May I ask another question, Senator Thériault? Did you ever hear of the principle of spending according to what you can pay, and not only according to what you need? Did you ever hear about budgeting according to what you can pay, not just according to what you want to buy? Unfortunately, that is what your government did until 1984, and that is what put Canada in the situation we have today. You saw the needs but you never thought about the cost.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am familiar with the concept, and in fact I was exposed to all this in the provincial government, at the Treasury Board, although that is not what it was called in our province. The federal Liberal government, until the recession in 1981 or 1982, had no problem with the deficit. The government at the time was more concerned about the well-being of Canadians than the well-being of large corporations and billionaires. There was a deficit.

Senator Castonguay: Who created that deficit?

Senator Thériault: What will happen today if we have a recession? What is your Conservative Government going to do?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Answer the question.

Senator Thériault: Senator Castonguay, you know that when there is an economic recession, the government should help those who need it. In Canada, we can't, because since 1984, you have been spending all the government's revenue. You said we had the greatest economic boom we ever had in this country, but you doubled this country's debt since 1984. How did do you do that? By giving billions and billions of dollars worth of grants to big corporations. That is what you did.

Senator Castonguay: Senator Thériault, do you know why it is so difficult to respond to your comments. Because all the false information you give us makes it very confusing!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That's true!

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I want to say one thing. I do not claim to be a paragon of truth, but what I say, I say in good faith, and I say it on behalf of the people I represent. You speak for those you represent, the fifteen per cent who want the GST, according to what you say. I am not giving you any misleading information. I can put my figures right up there with yours.

Senator Beaulieu: Billions and billions and billions!

Senator Thériault: Yes, billions of dollars that were handed out again, not long ago.

Senator Beaulieu: Billions and billions and billions!

Senator Thériault: Billions and hundreds of millions wasted in the biggest economic boom we are supposed to have had in this country. To you, billions and billions don't mean a thing. At the time, C.D. Howe said: what's in a million? You may not say so, but your whole attitude is: what's in a billion! It shows in what you do and how you operate, which suits the people who take advantage of the situation. And Senator Castonguay, don't accuse me of misinformation.

Senator Castonguay: Which party was in power during the recession in 1981 and 1982? Wasn't it the Liberals? From 1984 to 1990, we experienced the most impressive period of economic growth Canada had since the end of the war. Who was in power? It was the Conservative Government.

Senator Thériault: Who was in power from 1984 to 1990?

Senator Castonguay: It was a Conservative government and we experienced the greatest economic expansion over.

Senator Thériault: So what are you going to do to reduce the deficit?

Senator Castonguay: Check the public accounts and you will see that you were not even able to balance the current expenses budget. Between 1984 and 1990 the government recorded ever larger surpluses in terms of current expenses. Were it not for servicing the debt the government would have surpluses in the current revenue account.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, when indebtness doubles, so do interest charges. That is what happened.

Senator Castonguay: And, Senator Thériault, that is precisely the inheritance you left us with!

Senator Thériault: The inheritance left by the Liberal government was a $200 billion national debt. After six years of unprecedented economic boom, how much is the national debt now?

Senator Castonguay: If you left a debt of $200 billion, Senator Thériault, compound interest makes it twice as much. That is what happened.

Senator Thériault: So the interest on $200 billion is the same as the interest on $400 billion. It is as if I were to buy a house worth $1 million and could meet the morthgage payments if it were not for the interest. I could make payments to repay the capital if I did not have to pay interests. That is what you are telling me.

Who believes you anyway? Nobody except for the 15 per cent of Canadians who welcome the GST and the 17 companies that bought the 1988 election to get free trade. Who else believes you? Nobody.

Senator Castonguay: One last question, Senator Thériault. Were you ever a member of the Social Credit? Were you ever a member of the Social Credit in the past?

Senator Thériault: I am not like you, Senator Castonguay. I have always been a member of the Liberal Party, which is more than you can say. That is the difference.

When we have comments which elicit responses it indicates we have hit a sensitive spot. I feel somewhat lucky to have touched on the sensitivities of our Quebec colleagues. Now I will try to do the same thing with respect ro my English-speaking colleagues.

Senator Poitras: It is all very good, you may continue.

Senator Thériault: You are a gentleman, Senator Poitras. You want me to go on? I had the pleasure of travelling with Senator Poitras, a true-blue Conservative. I have a lot of respect for true-blue Conservatives like Senator Robertson and Senator Poitras. They are, my friends and I respect them.

They are real Conservatives. And so is Senator DeWare for whom I have a lot of respect as well.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): They are not half-hearted Tories.

Senator Thériault: No, they are real Tories. It is something I admire. Like my friend Senator Comeau, who is a true Tory. I am happy to see him in the Senate because he is a true Tory. It is a pleasure to see politically honest people.

Senator Castonguay: Senator Thériault, what do you mean by that? That the others are not politically honest? I am a Liberal at the provincial level. Far from being ashamed of it, I am proud to be a member of the Quebec Liberal Party. But do not ask me to join your party which has never understood Quebec. You were wondering why Quebeckers do not like Mr. Trudeau. It is because he has never understood Quebec.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, it is a pity to hear people we thought interesting and intelligent say that Mr. Trudeau has never understood Quebec.

Some Hon. Senators: But it is the truth.

Senator Thériault: Then can you explain to me why he swept Quebec in every election? Where were you? Were you fighting against him then? Where were you all? I was going to say something I am not supposed to say here—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Go ahead, we understand!

Senator Thériault: You are saying that Trudeau has never understood Quebec. He never understood people who exaggerate. He never understood Duplessis, right? But Quebeckers understood him because every time he ran in an election there, he won by a landslide. Where were you, Senator Castonguay?

Senator Castonguay: I was in Quebec and I saw everything that happened. You were not. I heard Trudeau make one promise after another, until the day before the referendum when he promised a renewed federalism. And, the day after the referendum, after Quebeckers said yes to federalism, he turned his back on them. He repatriated the Constitution leaving Quebec out in the cold. That is why Quebeckers understand today that Trudeay had been misleading them throughout his mandate.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Senator Thériault: We are going to hear the history of Quebec and Canada as seen by Castonguay. It all started in 1984, right?

Senator Castonguay: Long before that. It started in 1960 in Ottawa with Trudeau who eventully replaced Prime Minister Pearson, a man who really understood Canada and Quebec. He was the last of your Prime Ministers to understand Quebec.

Senator Thériault: I am still surprised, Senator, for I told you earlier that I had spent part of my life in Quebec. There, I only met Quebecers who were disappointed, washed up Tories who never had a word of praise either for Sir Wilfrid Laurier or Louis St-Laurent, Quebecers themselves. Not a word. How is it that Prime Minister Mulroney, the so-called Quebec "idol" has only 16 per cent support in Quebec? Why only 16 per cent in Quebec—

An Hon. Member: The last election—

Senator Thériault: You bought the last election with millions of dollars!

Senator Beaulieu: Senator, what was the result of the last election? You lost it as you are going to lose the next one. Wake up!

Senator Thériault: Neither you nor I will lose the next election. That is the reason you found shelter here. How long ago were you elected in Quebec?

Senator Beaulieu: I was elected in Quebec in 1968.

Senator Thériault: What percentage of votes did the Conservative Party received in the Southshore riding where Edmunston was elected? In Laurier-Ste-Marie, what percentage of the votes did you get? Can you answer me?

Senator Beaulieu: You may continue to win by-elections but we will win the general election. Go on, amuse yourself with by-elections! We are going to win the next election the way we won the last. Face the truth and stop making all these stupid remarks which are just a bunch of lies. At least, use a civilized language.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I do not know one Canadian or Quebecer who would have any remorse over lying because the current government is lying so much that only 15 per cent of the people believe what it is saying. I asked you a question, as well as Senator Castonguay and Senator Lavoie-Roux. What percentage of the votes did the Conservative candidate get in Laurier-Ste-Marie? What percentage? Two, three per cent?

Senator Beaulieu: Let me tell you that the Liberal member who won in the general election lost that riding in a stupid fashion.

Senator Thériault: I don't think we lost it. Were you there, were you involved in the election? What percentage did you get? Answer me!

Senator LeBlanc: 4.8 per cent.

Senator Thériault: 4.8 per cent! That is a lot and the "Trudeau" legacy is so terrible. The Liberal candidate did not win, but he got 30 per cent, which is a little more than 4 per cent. True or false? True or false? True or false, Senator Beaulieu?

Senator Castonguay: If Quebecers understand you so well, how do you explain that you have only two French-speaking members out of 75?

Senator Thériault: The way you explain that Trudeau got 74 or 75. The same way, yes it is true.

Senator David: I understand.

Senator Thériault: Let us come back to the terrible attempt of this government. When I think of my friend, a real true blue conservative, who respects parliament, doing his duty, trying to put a motion through last night that would deny the reading of petitions, I am appalled.

I happened to be at a meeting on Saturday in my province, and people were telling me how desperate they were for their opposition to this tax to be heard. Never before have I asked anyone to give me a petition, but I told them that the way in which the people of Canada, a hundred years down the road, will be able to know that they are opposed to the GST is if they give me some petitions, because I thought we were still living in a parliamentary system. I said to them "Can you send me some petitions, and I will read them out and your names will be there forever, showing that you are against this tax." As a matter of fact, there were native people there, there were all kinds of people, and they said "Great." I have been receiving them ever since, and I have to call them now and tell them, "I am sorry, the democracy does not exist anymore in Canada. The Parliament in Canada has been taken over by a guy whose name is Lowell Murray in the Senate of Canada, under strict orders from his chief in the other place to stop—

Senator Doody: Who?

Senator Thériault: —Liberals from reading petitions.

Senator Doody: Who?

Senator Thériault: One or the other, I don't know.

We are faced with a motion, but that is only half of the story. The other half of the story is that that motion has been ruled in order by a speaker who has lost the respect of every one of the senators on this side, and I am sure if all those people wanted to be honest, they would say the same.

Senator Austin: Exactly.

Senator Thériault: The lack respect for the rules, for the parliamentary system, for the opposition, for the minority, and for everyone but the fifteen per cent of the well-to-do that they represent over there. Therefore when I hear Senator David talking about "Our side", I say to myself, "Welcome to your side; Welcome to your fifteen per cent." In New Brunswick, I think it is less than that; I think it is 11 per cent.

Senator Stanbury: It is seven per cent in Alberta.

Senator Thériault: Eleven per cent in New Brunswick, seven per cent in Alberta. In Beauséjour, four per cent—there is no Tory candidate there. And in Castonguay, a french author, speaking, writing, four per cent.

You want the GST, and I understand that. You want that, no problem, provided you respect the rules and provided you understand that it is our job to oppose it. We are determined to use every line and every rule in the book—

An. Hon. Senator: What book?

Senator Thériault: —to stop that tax.

Ex-Premier Hatfield in New Brunswick prevented us from putting a program in place for a year. He was wrong in doing that. But if we prevented this tax for a year, Canadians would kiss our feet. If we prevented this tax for a year, Canadians would be so happy. I am sure you could join a party from Halifax to Victoria.

Senator Doody: From St-John's?

An. Hon. Senator: To Whitehorse.

Senator Thériault: You know, there is a guy who is in touch with his people. There is a guy who is in touch with his people, because he knows that that party started in St-John's.

Senator Austin: An honest senator.

Senator Thériault: I said earlier when he wasn't here—and I want to repeat it now that he is here—if Senator Murray would only vamoose for three or four weeks, and let Senator Doody would take over, we would have a very interesting parliamentary debate.

Senator Doody: Duty calls.

Senator Thériault: We could sit regular hours from ten o'clock in the morning until ten o'clock at night. As Mulroney has said, those of us people who are over seventy could go to bed with our milk and cookies, as Mulroney says you should do when you are seventy-one—

An. Hon. Senator: Take a scotch.

Senator Thériault: I would take a scotch. But all of you are over seventy-one on that side. You should listen to what he says. When you are over seventy-one, you should go to bed with your cookies and a glass of milk. So if there was decency in the leadership of this place, we would sit decent hours, we would have respectable debate, we would hear one another, and we would kill that tax.

[Translation]

Senator Cogger: I simply wish to call your attention to the presence of 50 percent of the French-speaking Liberal members of Parliament from Quebec and to bid them welcome. Fifty percent, that is very good.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I wish I could bid welcome to the 4 percent who voted for the Tories in Sainte-Marie. We could have them in this gallery and have those who voted in the other gallery. That way, you would have as much support as you presently have in Quebec. I too am happy to welcome my friend Mr. Prud'homme, because he is a true Quebecer and a true Canadian too. He always spoke his mind. I respect people like him. That is what you find in the Liberal Party, people like him, not a bunch of sheep like we can find here.

Senator Cogger: May I make another comment, Senator Thériault? You are questioning intellectual probity, qualifications and so on of the senators on this side. First, answer this question if you please. Are you and your leader still on speaking terms? It is hard to believe. After all the bad things you said about Mr. Chrétien in Calgary as a Martin supporter! Are you sure you are on the right side?

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I have no problem answering that. It is true that I supported Mr. Martin. I did so honestly and openly. I did not slash the leader's throat. That is what you did to Joe Clark when he was Prime Minister. I did not go behind my leader's back to collect funds and slash his throat. I was openly supporting Paul Martin.

What happened at the convention? The Liberal delegates elected Chrétien. So, he is now my leader. I will back him up to see him become Prime Minister of Canada. It is as simple as that.

I can tell you one thing, honourable senators. Whether the next Liberal Prime minister of my country is called Chrétien, Turner, Martin or Copps, if he or she tries to play some of your tricks you played I will be the first one to rise and speak against such action if I am still in Parliament. Honourable senators, just take a look at the difference between the two sides.

There is Senator Kolber, who is apparently for the GST. He is a Liberal. Senator Everett, a Liberal independant, and Senator Pitfield, appointed by Mr. Trudeau, are also for it. To think that Mr. Trudeau was accused of being lead by Mr. Pitfield. Why can we not find a Tory or a party-Tory.

• (2200)

[English]

Why is it that we cannot find one man or woman out of 54 who agrees with 85 per cent of the people? What did you give up when you agreed to be Tory senators? Have you given up your independence? Have you given up freedom of thought? Have you given up the freedom to express what you think? Is it possible that you would find 54 people in one group in any Parliament of the world who would think the same way all of a sudden?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Let us debate the bill and we will find out.

Senator Thériault: That is interesting. Do you intend to vote against it?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No. We will discuss it and we will find out.

Senator Thériault: Not one out of 54. In the other place, there were a couple of people who stood up. It is true they were kicked out of the caucus, but so what. They were keeping faith with their honour. They were against the GST and they were kicked out of the caucus.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Are all your people for it?

Senator Thériault: No, we heard from Senator Everett, Senator Kolber, and Senator Pitfield. On this side we have a group of people who stand on their feet. We are with 85 per cent of the people of Canada.

Senator Simard: Follow the crowd, Norbert. Don't leave the crowd. Follow the crowd.

Senator Thériault: Senator Austin, do you not think there is ample reason for you, as a British Columbian, to oppose the GST when you go home and hear what people have to say?

Senator Austin: Senator Thériault, thank you for asking me. As I sit in this chamber, the legislature of the province of British Columbia has unanimously resolved to oppose the GST.

Senator Thériault: Is that a Liberal legislature?

Senator Austin: No, it is a Social Credit and NDP legislature. Regrettably, there is not a single Liberal in that legislature.

Many towns and municipalities in the province of British Columbia have passed resolutions, and when I get the opportunity to present those resolutions, I will do so. I have been stopped on the street by people who recognize me and who say, "Keep up the good the work. Oppose the GST. Don't let those—expletive deleted—push the GST down the throats of Canadians." Honourable Senators, I have answered Senator Thériault's question. I do not want to spoil my turn at the debate.

Senator Thériault: Senator Austin, I could repeat those words verbatim. For once the people of British Columbia and the people of my province are on the same wavelength. Last weekend in my area, I thought I was back in provincial politics. For the last ten years people have not bothered me. I am in the Senate, and they thought I was on the shelf. I had peace and quiet. All of a sudden I cannot go out my door; I cannot go to a party; I cannot go to a meeting; I cannot go anywhere.

Senator Doody: He is a social leper.

Senator Thériault: If I were to go to Senator Simard's area I would be afraid I would be mobbed. They say to me, "Why don't you pound some sense into that fellow's head"?

Senator Austin: Why don't you give them Senator Simard's phone number?

Senator Thériault: I have been on the popular side of politics for a long time. I have won seven consecutive provincial elections.

Senator Simard: So what?

Senator Thériault: I have won seven provincial elections and four or five municipal elections. Now all of a sudden I have people surrounding me saying, "Norbert, keep up the good work." If I am prevented from reading petitions, nothing will prevent me from reading some of the letters that I have received. I believe I have enough for three weeks.

Senator Simard: May I ask you a question, Senator Thériault?

Senator Thériault: Yes.

Senator Simard: Have you been to Beauséjour lately?

Senator Thériault: Yes, I have.

Senator Simard: Did you repeat those statements that you made in Calgary? I want to hear them myself. You told them that Mr. Chrétien did not have the intelligence to be the leader of your party, let alone Prime Minister of Canada. I am keeping an eye on Beauséjour and I know what you are doing when you go there. You repeat the same Liberal story.

[Translation]

Liberal today, Liberal tomorrow, that will not always work.

An Hon. Senator: It worked for 17 years in New Brunswick.

Senator Simard: I do not want to lose my right to speak either. Did you repeat the famous statements you made in Calgary?

[English]

Senator Deware: Senator Thériault, I arrived at the New Brunswick Legislature at about the time you were appointed to the Senate. I was there when Senator Richard Hatfield and other people on our side of the house sang your praises for the wonderful job you did for our province.

• (2210)

So you left when I was just beginning, but I always had a lot of respect about how others felt for you. I am not sure that I still agree with that respect tonight. I have heard the honourable senator make some accusations tonight, and I did not think that that was the kind of thing that went on in the Senate.

Senator Stanbury: It never used to!

Senator Deware: Everyone here was appointed, whether fifty years ago, forty years ago, five years ago or two months ago. Were you not all honoured to be appointed to the Senate? Were you not honoured when the Prime Minister appointed you to the Senate? I was honoured.

Senator Thériault knows how hard we debate here and how hard we debated in the legislature. We always had respect for each other, for the legislature and for the Speaker.

Some Hon. Senators: Here, here!

Senator Deware: We have been talking about petitions.

Senator Austin: Question.

Senator Doody: Let her speak.

Senator Deware: I have not spoken in this house. I have listened to honourable senators opposite for hours.

An Hon. Senator: Sit down!

Senator Deware: Give me just one minute. I am talking about the presentation of petitions. I have sat here and listened to the presentation of petitions. I have heard about dinosaurs, Greek mythology and a lot of things that do not involve petitions. If honourable senators opposite had presented their petitions as they were supposed to present them, they would all have been presented, every one of them, by today.

Senator Doody: Answer the question.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I do not know whom to answer first.

Senator Simard: I was first.

[Translation]

Senator Thériault: I was in the riding of Beauséjour with Mr. Chrétien the other day, I will be there on election day and I know he will win. You do not have the courage to field a candidate. Does that answer your question?

[English]

Let me answer Senator Deware now. I read your article in the Moncton Times of Monday. I have always had respect for you too. Whatever I said in the legislature, it was never said on a personal basis. I do not think that you can point out to me tonight where I said anything that affected anyone personally. Personalities do not enter into the operations of a legislature, whether it be federal, provincial or municipal.

When I debate a cause that I believe in, I debate very strongly. I have not debated very much in this house. However, it is my right to debate strongly. I was like that 40 years ago when I was warden of my county, and I have not changed. I stand for things.

In any event, I read the honourable senator's article. For the first time in my 40 years in public life, I was tempted—and I think I will—to write a letter to a newspaper. All through my political life I have let the journalists do their job, and it did not matter whether they attacked me or did not attack me. However, the honourable senator's article, I am sorry to say, was full of falsehoods, and I think that I should answer it.

Senator Deware: That is your right.

Senator Thériault: I do not know what happened in the legislature, because, as I said, I was only there for four or five months after the honourable senator came. It was a short time. Does the honourable senator recall in her eight or nine years in the legislature the Speaker throwing out the rule book and making decisions on orders from the Leader of the Government?

Senator Simard: That is not true!

Senator Austin: Of course it is true.

Senator Thériault: Do you recall Premier Hatfield ordering the Speaker to make a decision that went against the rules? That is what happened here. Even Senator Simard in his best days—

Senator LeBlanc: Or his worst days!

Senator Thériault: —did not try to give orders to the Speaker. That is what happened here. That is what your leadership has done to this place. It is not personal, but I believe that your leader lacks knowledge of how Parliament works. I recall, when they started trying to prevent us from making our point, telling them across the floor that it would never work; and I tell you it will never work. The sooner some of you understand that, the better off this country will be and perhaps the better off your party will be.

Senator Doody: Are you crossing the floor? Is that your first tentative step?

Senator Deware: At the beginning of October we saw the respect you people held for the Speaker. Your leader said on television tonight that he had not heard from the new members on the GST. I have a speech ready to give that outlines my points of view, but we have not had an opportunity to debate.

If you would let us debate, we would tell you how we feel about the GST, everyone of us. Get to the bill.

Senator Thériault: I will tell you something, and you can ask Senators Hatfield and Simard, or any one who has spent time in the legislature with me to verify it; I have never been known to follow a text. However, the GST is important. So I have a text that I have prepared, and it is 102 pages long. I have not touched it.

Senator Doody: God, what a threat!

Senator Thériault: However, tonight we are not talking about the GST; we are talking about parliamentary democracy, about our rights as parliamentarians. We are trying to tell you that, for the first time in British parliamentary history, an Opposition has been denied its right to vote.

Senator Beaulieu: You are afraid to vote!

Senator Thériault: I can tell you what would happen if we were in Quebec. There would be riots in the streets.

Senator Deware: Your Whip whipped you that night.

Senator Thériault: I do not know whether your Whip whips you, but my Whip does not whip me. I never received a call from my Whip. Even if I had received a call, that would not give the Speaker the right or the authority to take the decision he did, because doing what he did is not permitted under the rules. All my life, I have believed in my municipal council, in the provincial legislature and in the Parliament of Canada. I have believed that Parliament does not work unless you follow the rules.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Order in the court!

Senator Thériault: We have been trying to get through your thick skulls that you will not succeed in bulldozing your way through Parliament. I for one will not stand for it. The people I represent will not allow me to stand for it, and my colleagues will not stand for it. I suggest that you talk some sense into Senator Murray or that you send him off into the clouds for three or four weeks. Let Senator Atkins or Senator Doody take over, someone who knows something about parliamentary politics. Then we will have a really good debate.

I give notice right now that I have three or four points of privilege that I want to raise in the next few days, because I believe that my privileges have been abused many times. I give notice now that I will raise those points of privilege. I can tell honourable senators opposite that if God spares me my health, I shall stand on my feet and as long as parliamentary rules are followed, I shall fight the GST until the end.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO CALL ORDERS OF THE DAY—DEDATE RESUMED

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on the motion.

Senator Simard: Are you going to read all those books there?

Senator Austin: Absolutely, every word.

[Senator Deware.]

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on the motion to move to the Orders of the Day. I would like to commence my comments by referring to the Leader of the Government who, unfortunately, is not here. However, I take it that he will have an opportunity at the end of the debate to respond to any comments I make about the argumentation he delivered earlier today.

Senator Doody: He may.

Senator Grafstein: Before beginning, I should like to respond to a comment made by Senator Deware about getting on with the debate and about the urgency of getting on with the issue. Obviously, there is a desire on the other side to move as quickly as possible to deal with the pressing issue of the GST. Obviously, the honourable senator disregards a principle of parliamentary practice that even a critic of second chambers, J. S. Mill, suggested is appropriate in a situation like this.

John Stewart Mill, who wrote the definitive work on democracy on representative government, did not like upper chambers. He specifically did not like an upper chamber that was appointed if that upper chamber reflected the view of the majority of the house below. He felt that there was only some justification for a second chamber if it was composed in a way that was different from the lower house so that it could act as some sort of reasonable check on the lower house. In his book entitled Representative Government, at page 232, he says:

● (2220)

> . . . the worst consequence that could ensue would be to delay for a short time the passing of the measure, or give rise to a fresh appeal to the electors to ascertain if the . . . majority in Parliament corresponded to an effective one in the country. The inconvenience of delay, and the advantage of the appeal to the nation, might be regarded in this case as about equally balanced.

He was saying that you can have a delay in the upper house and, failing that delay, you can choose to make a fresh appeal to the electorate. That is parliamentary practice: delay in the upper house or appeal to the electorate.

J. S. Mill was a critic of the upper house, but he says something that is important to all of us, because it deals with the very informative debate between the Leader of the Government earlier today and the Leader of the Opposition in this place. There was a contest between rules which allow for delay and the urgency and the appropriate desire of the government to get on with its business.

This is what John Stewart Mill says, and I think it is appropriate:

> That there should be, in every polity, a centre of resistance to the predominant power in the Constitution—and in a democratic constitution, therefore, a nucleus of resistance to democracy—I have already maintained; and I regard it as a fundamental maxim of government. If any people, who possess a democratic representation, are, from their historical antecedents, more willing to tolerate such a centre of resistance in the form of a Second Chamber or House of Lords than in any other shape, this constitutes a strong reason for having it in that shape.

This was obviously the premise upon which this second chamber was constituted. It was to be a check on the popular will of the lower house. In addition to that, it was to be a house of regions—that is, a house that would speak with different voices for different parts of the country.

So, Senator Deware, I share your anxiety to get on with the debate. All of us are sitting here with long, impassioned, and, I assume, well reasoned addresses in relation to the GST.

Senator Doody: Absolutely!

Senator Grafstein: But even at this juncture it is premature. Let us look at the worst consequence of delay. Let us assume that the delay is another six months. All of us who sit here are numbed by petition reading, but we think it is an appropriate political and parliamentary form. But let us assume the worst consequence: that it was delayed for another six months while the 50 thousand or 60 thousand petitions went through this place. Would that not be something that would benefit the public interest?

Senator Doody: No!

Senator Grafstein: Would that not have satisfied those people who crave to have their voices heard and feel that their voices have not been heard? Would that delay not be in the public interest?

I am sorry that Senator Castonguay is not here, because I was interested in the exchange earlier this evening between Senator Thériault and others on the other side about the role of business. I came up to Ottawa from Toronto with John Bulloch, the head of the Small Business Association.

An Hon. Senator: Name dropper!

Senator Grafstein: On the airplane he gave me his submission to the Senate committee. He represents every small business in this country. He represents small business, not big business.

Hon. John Trevor Eyton: He represents the members of the association.

Senator Grafstein: I agree with that. He represents, as all associations do, the members of the association.

Senator Stanbury: Even the BCNI!

Senator Grafstein: I think it is fair to say that he is an authentic voice of small business in this country, and is certainly as relevant to this issue as the voice of the manufacturer's association and as relevant as the voice of the coordinating council, the BCNI. Theirs are authentic voices, and no one quarrels with that. But he pleads for a delay. He says, "Give us time to think about it. Give us time for the provinces to see if they can somehow meld their systems if they choose to go forward."

What is so inappropriate about allowing a delay for a period of time to allow the court challenges to be completed? For the legitimate voices of the regions outside this place—that is, the provinces—to have their say and come to some remonstrance about this? What is so evil about that? What is the animus that would compel those on the other side to deny the provinces, the municipalities and small business the opportunity of adjusting to this new reality?

Senator Castonguay is not here. I hope that he will read my remarks and have an opportunity to respond to them later. I assume that Senator Castonguay is saying that his reason for being here is to help us control our finances. He is here to put a cap on the wasteful spending of governments, particularly the spending of the Trudeau government. How alive and how well Pierre Trudeau is when members on the other side still like to beat up Pierre Trudeau when he is not here to defend himself.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: They would not do so if he were here!

Senator Grafstein: We humble nominees have to stand in our places and listen to this. I have been here for seven years and I have heard this over and over again. They have stated, "That evil man, Pierre Trudeau. The evil incarnate."

Senator Doody: Is it only seven years?

Senator Grafstein: "How he destroyed the country and our finances."

An Hon. Senator: That is right.

Senator Doody: Is it only seven years?

Senator Grafstein: It is only seven years, Senator Doody. I agree with you; it seems more than a life time.

I shall return to the topic now, but I shall come back later to Pierre Trudeau, the question of the GST and why we have to listen to the voice of Canadians. When we first heard about the GST, over and over again we were told one word. What was the word? GST. Then there was an adjective. It was called tax neutral. There was another adjective added, "revenue neutral". That is what we were told. Senator Castonguay is not here, but that is what we told. That is what we heard. The public is saying, "Wait one second. If it is not to be tax neutral—and we are now told by Senator Castonguay and Senator Simard that it will be in aid of deficit reduction—then how shall we allocate this painful pill?"

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Let us get to the debate and we will find out!

Hon. Brenda Robertson: We will explain it all to you then.

Senator Doody: We will explain it to you, yes.

Senator Stanbury: We are looking forward to that!

Senator Grafstein: I am confident that senators opposite will, because we will all have something to say about the deficit.

Let me return to my remarks. I was deflected from Senator Murray's comments in support of this motion. I should like to deal with that now, if I may.

Senator Doody: That is fair.

Senator Grafstein: He makes a number of arguments. He says that we should leap frog to the Orders of the Day—

Senator Doody: Hear, hear!

Senator Grafstein: —from "Reading of Petitions, Reports of Committees, Notices of Inquiries, Notices of Motions and Question Period". That is what he says.

● (2230)

In aid and support of that motion he makes several arguments. I would like to deal with them. I have not had an opportunity to read the Hansard so what I have to say will be based on my recall and on my rough notes. If I take the arguments which he made out of context I am sure that senators opposite will correct me.

First, he said that it is an abuse of rules to read petitions. Second, he said that it is mindless. He said, "The petitions are illegitimate. You are reading names from a telephone book. There is no legitimacy to those petitions". Third, he said that by reading these petitions we are wasting time, precious government time, precious public and parliamentary time. In aid of that argument he did something which I think is unfair. He said that there are other pressing matters which we should be debating in this place such as the Gulf crisis.

Honourable senators, let me correct the record. I think it is clear since I was directly involved in raising the issue the first day of our return from vacation. That was on September 25. I rose and asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate this question as reported at page 2252 of the Debates of the Senate:

> Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, since we are all concerned with parliamentary tradition and parliamentary practice, why he has failed to follow parliamentary practice today by not tabling the order in council dated September 15 that was tabled in the House of Commons yesterday.

I was referring there to the order in council under the National Defence Act. His response was:

> To what does the order in council refer?

He then went on to say:

> . . . I thought that document might have been among the many tabled earlier tonight by my friend the Deputy Leader of the Government.

I responded by saying:

> I have examined that and it is not there.

Senator Murray then said:

> If it is not there, there is no difficulty in obtaining a copy and tabling it tomorrow.

Senator Olson chimed in and said:

> Is there going to be a discussion in this chamber about that?

Senator Murray said:

> . . . as a matter of fact, there have been some preliminary discussions in the usual channels, if I may put it that way.

I then said:

> On traditional practice? The parliamentary practice?

Senator Murray went on to say:

[Senator Grafstein.]

> Will my honourable friend resume his seat. He asked a question and I am attempting to reply. There was also a second question from his colleague, Senator Olson, as to whether we were going to have a discussion in this chamber about the dispatch of troops and the response of the Government of Canada to the Gulf crisis.
> In answer to Senator Olson's question, there have been some preliminary discussions through the usual channels concerning the possibility of such a debate. We would welcome one. Before long I would be happy to bring in a resolution or have one of my colleagues do so to provide the opportunity for such a debate.

I went on to state:

> I say to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that we have been lectured today about parliamentary tradition and democratic practice. This democratic practice is as intense as any practice in the parliamentary world. When a parliament of a democratic country deals with issues of war and peace it is incumbent upon the government to convene Parliament, which includes the Senate, at the earliest possible opportunity and bring the order in council forward and make a statement in order that the Senate, as well as the House of Commons, can deal with this issue. The government has not done that tonight. That is a breach of parliamentary tradition, and it is not satisfactory. Aside from what internal discussions take place, I hope that tomorrow the minister will table that order in council so that members on all sides may have an opportunity to deal with this sacred parliamentary tradition.

Honourable senators will recall that the crisis in the Gulf started on August 2. The Prime Minister quickly, and I think appropriately, responded by saying that he would come to the support of the United States in connection with this matter. There has been discussion on all sides as to the appropriateness and the speed of that support. Nonetheless, I think there is widespread support for opposition to such aggression throughout the United Nations.

This was an important juncture, because the next thing that happened was that on the following day there were no further words from the government, but a motion was put forward by Senator Macquarrie to deal with the crisis. The government could have asked to waive the stipulation with respect to dealing with the motion if it felt it was an important and pressing matter. It waited from August 2 until September 25 to convene Parliament. Then, on September 25, when I raised the issue at the appropriate time, the order in council was not present on the Order Paper. The following day there was another opportunity to deal with the matter but an introduction to the debate was not allowed. We were not allowed to respond in a timely way to this crisis which Senator Murray now says was somehow overtaken by events as a result of our reading petitions.

Yet, I ask honourable senators opposite, what was taking place in this chamber on September 26, when there was the pressing issue of war and peace which affected Canadian troops who, according to the Auditor General, do not even have enough medical support? Were we given an opportunity to deal with the matter on September 26 while the armed forces were on their way to the Gulf? No. At that time we had Senator Ottenheimer and others filibustering the report of the banking committee on the GST.

Honourable senators, I rise to deal with this issue because I think it is important that Hansard reflect the facts as best we understand them. I do not think it is fair for Senator Murray to take argumentation out of context and to use it as a cudgel in conjunction with what I consider to be a very extraordinary motion to suppress legitimate petitions.

It is true that a number of the petitions read have been similar in nature. I make this comment in response to what Senator Deware had to say. I assume she said that she had heard enough of petitions. As I pointed out to the chamber earlier today, there are more petitions being received by senators on this side of the house this week than were received in the last week or even the week before.

Had Senator Murray not moved his motion I would have dealt with a very important petition from my region, which is the City of Toronto. I represent that region in the Senate. I wanted to stand up in this place as a senator representing that region. I assume that is what Sir John A. Macdonald meant when he said that a senator is to represent the views of his region.

Senator Deware, it is important to understand that the City of Toronto in a unanimous resolution seeks redress in the Senate. This resolution was not made three weeks ago but was adopted at meetings held on October 22, 23 and 24. I received a letter on the matter from the Mayor of Toronto on October 29. The event is recent. It is current. It is not mindless. Nor is it reading from a telephone book.

Senator Doody: That is a new approach. It is not mindless and it is not from a telephone book.

Senator Grafstein: I am quoting not out of context the words of the Leader of the Government in the Senate about all these petitions.

Before I deal with that, perhaps I should go back one more time and refer to the importance of petitions and how petitions are the cornerstone of Parliament. I said earlier that the word "Parliament" comes from the word "parler" which means to speak and comes from the action of dealing with petitions. Citizens and groups of citizens came to the court, to the monarch, to the Queen's councillors to petition them, to speak. That is where the word "parliament" comes from.

As Senator Ottenheimer said earlier, this is not some transitory practice, some expedient rule. It is a foundation stone. It is an architectonic of Parliament. Every history book that deals with the British Constitution, upon which our Parliament is based, refers to petitions as being a cornerstone of Parliament. There is no confusion in the minds of historians about this matter. Nor was there any confusion in the minds of Erskine May, or Bourinot, or Beauchense about the importance of petitions. They put them front and centre. It is the archway of Parliament. You cannot get into Parliament unless you deal with petitions, because historically petitions, in order to be transformed into law, were done by a very simple mechanism. People presented their petition; the monarch or the councillors endorsed the petition, and that became a statute; that became a decree, became an ordinance. It was the basis upon which laws were passed.

● (2240)

So to say, as the leader of the government says, that this is a dilatory waste of time, a mindless exercise, is to say that Parliament itself is mindless and is a waste of time.

And then we have the new and insidious rule—I should not say insidious; I withdraw that—the new pernicious rule—

Senator Stanbury: That is better.

Senator Grafstein: —that says that what we should do if we have a concern about these petitions is file them, not in open court, not to allow the citizens to have their say, but file them.

File them where? File them with the Clerk.

And again I make the argument that if you take that principle to its logical extreme, we do not have to be here. We can file by written interrogatories; we can respond by written interrogatories; and we can go home. I can sit in my office in Toronto and I can get all the material on a computer, and I can respond to those matters by computer, and it can all be printed here, and we don't have to be here, if we take Senator Ottenheimer's argument to its logical extension.

Obviously, he does not mean that. Obviously, he was using that in aid of the substantive part of Senator Murray's argument that somehow we were being irrelevant and we were delaying.

Honourable senators, I want to deal with the petition that I wanted to bring forward earlier, because I think it is important. As the honourable senators have properly criticized us, they have some relevance to the nature of petitions. There is no question about that. But we believe in freedom in this house. And we have heard outrageous statements on all sides, and sometimes it is enjoyable and sometimes it is not, but that is part of the give and take.

But this petition from the City of Toronto is not mindless. I would like to take you through the steps that the City of Toronto did before they decided to send us this letter, this petition, to remonstrate against the GST.

When the issue first came up—and this is all set out in the report of the Economic Development Committee of the city council of Toronto—when the GST first came forward, the councillors acted very responsibly after they had received a number of complaints from business—not from ordinary citizens but from sectors of business that make my city one of the most vibrant cities in North America: the fashion industry, the film industry, the television industry, the housing industry, and the tourist industry. These are vibrant, important industries. They are not big business, but they are certainly business.

Each of those sectors was canvassed by the Economic Development Committee. By the way, this was not partisan. This was unanimous. The NDP, the Conservatives, the Liberals, they all supported this inquiry into the impact of the GST—I would have thought senators opposite would want to have the benefit of this information. And what did they say? They not only went through each sector, but they went through every district association, including the Bloor-Yorkville Business Improvement Area and the Young-Bloor-Bay Association.

Senator Eaton is not here, but he knows of these associations. So does Senator Atkins, and other senators from greater Metropolitan Toronto know about these associations as well. These are local businessmen's associations designed to improve the business climate, the business environment in their district.

All of them made representations. I do not know of one that did not, including the Bloor-Young-Bay Association and others. They all made representations to this committee, and then a report was drafted on those recommendations. This all took place since last spring. A lot of hard work was done. It is all carefully detailed on the public record of the city of Toronto.

At the end of the day, they said, "Look, it's going to hurt us. It's going to impact on our industries, our jobs. And, by the way, we understand that the FST is unfair. But surely there is another way. Surely there is an alternative to this rather indecent tax that is being forced upon us. We are not ready for it, we do not understand it. We cannot cope with it. And by the way, folks," they remind us, "there is a recession going on."

Each one of these sectors is being ravaged by the economy, by the economic conditions. All of us know about that. The R-word is alive and well in Toronto. There is a recession in Toronto—Toronto, which everybody likes to criticize but which has been the engine of growth at least for southern Ontario. These organizations, not with total unanimity in terms of the nature of their complaints but nevertheless unanimously, were saying, "It is going to adversely impact the knowledge industry, the cultural industry, the tourism industry, the housing industry, the hotel industry."

These are businesses. They are not mindless names in a telephone book. And at the end of this, they beg for more time. "Give us a delay. Check out the alternatives. And by the way, we understand," they say, "that perhaps the GST in some form might be useful in order to offset the FST, but, please, have you considered the progressive income tax as a measure to offset the costs of the MST and the FST? Have you considered that?" And we now know, by an independent witness, the Canadian Tax Foundation, that the government did not study carefully the alternatives to the GST. We know that.

By the way, that is not a partisan group. I was admonished by the head of the Canadian Tax Foundation, who said, "Senator Grafstein, if you refer to our organization, remember, we are not partisan. This is a study undertaken by independent consultants. So don't enmesh us in your partisanship; but, yes, we stand behind those studies." So they are not taking sides, but they said in their study, which was tabled or referred to earlier here, that the government had not researched the alternatives.

So there may or may not be alternatives. But one thing is clear: they have not been studied.

When the honourable leader of the government in the Senate tells you not to listen, bear in mind that we are not talking about people who want to delay for the sake of delay, we are not here wanting to delay for the sake of delay. Do you think we enjoy being here at 11 o'clock at night or spending all night to debate these points? None of us enjoy this. This is not any great treat for any of us. It is not a treat, I know, for Senator Poitras; it is not a treat for Senator Bolduc; it is not a treat for Senator Doody, and it is certainly not a treat for me.

• (2250)

I certainly don't enjoy these midnight trips, but we have our responsibilities. "Senator representing Metro Toronto." That is my title. I take it seriously from time to time, and when the Mayor of the City of Toronto says, "Please, I want you to take this petition and bring it to the attention of the senators, because this is our last chance. Our city is in crisis. We have a city that is de-industrializing, whose economic base is now under attack. Don't overload the system. Ask them to defer, to study, to pull back."

That is what they are saying. They are not rejecting the GST out of hand in a mindless way. This is a thoughtful, carefully considered, unanimous recommendation.

However, let us take it up a step. In the province of Ontario during the last election, the Conservatives, the Liberals and the NDP unanimously opposed the GST. I think the only issue they agreed upon in the last election, and they agreed unanimously, was their opposition to the GST.

The new Premier of the Province, Mr. Rae, as one of his first acts, said he was going to oppose the GST. How will he oppose the GST? He has the support of 37 per cent of the province of Ontario; he now has opinion polls showing over 50 per cent in his favour. Obviously, you have to listen to his voice. He is not of my political persuasion, but I am duty-bound to listen to what he has to say.

He has asked the Prime Minister to convene a meeting of first ministers to deal with the GST, but he cannot get any agreement on that among other things. So what is the premier of the largest province of this country then forced to do? He says, sotto voce, to senators, without expressing it aloud, "Take up my complaint". The NDP being quite sanctimonious do not like to talk to senators because they do not believe in this place, but even Ms. McLaughlin has said, "Senators, scrap the GST. And, by the way, when you are finished, let's abolish the Senate." That is quite a sanctimonious position to take, but Mr. Rae, with all due respect, does not take that position. He has said, "First of all, I hope that it will be stopped in the Senate; but, in the interim, I am trying to convene a meeting with the Prime Minister, which he refuses to respond to." Therefore, what is the premier of the province compelled to do? He has to go to court. He has to go to the law courts.

An. Hon. Senator: This is a democratic process.

Senator Grafstein: He has to go to the law courts to get his petition heard.

Senator Simard: He was heard.

Senator Grafstein: You have not heard him because he was not the premier.

Senator Simard: We know what is on his mind.

Senator Grafstein: Don't say that, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: He was heard.

Senator Grafstein: You have not heard him; he was not the premier.

Senator Simard: We know what was on his mind.

Senator Grafstein: Don't say that, Senator Simard. He was elected after the Senate Committee had its hearings.

Senator Simard: I heard Premier McKenna, just as we all heard Premier Bourassa. And you know, as Meech Lake has demonstrated, that you can seldom get the eleven premiers and the Prime Minister on the same wavelength at any one time. Even if you do, you lose them after a while.

Premier Rae was heard. He won an election. Let him deal with his own taxes—and you wait to see how he's going to fix you guys when he applies his social democratic policies. I'm sure you won't be pleased. You won't plead with the Prime Minister to listen to him. The fact of the matter a Premier can't please everyone, and Premier Rae had a platform, and Prime Minister Mulroney has a government to run, which is not easy, especially after the legacy we inherited. So we will account to the people just as Premier Rae will eventually answer to the people. Don't tell me because Premier Rae is the premier of the biggest province. I am not very impressed by that. I come from a small province, and I don't believe that Premier McKenna has any more right or any less right to be heard than Premier Rae.

Senator Austin: Absolutely.

Senator Simard: I am not impressed by the fact that you come from Toronto. In any event, you know what you can do; you can sit down with Senator Kirby, Senator Davey and Mrs. Hoseck, the great star of the Peterson government and decide what to do, because Mr. Chrétien is well known for changing his mind. He has changed his mind five times. First, he could not control the Liberal senators, to upset, block and delay the G.S.T. That's the first time.

Senator Austin: Tell us about it!

Senator Simard: Then Mr. Chrétien says we'll look at the situation and probably he will have a committee look into it. Then he announced that he would set up his committee, when pressed by the press when visiting New Brunswick. Before he had said that he did not know what he was going to do, except that he was going to look at it. After a while Mr. Chrétien was talking about a total review of the taxation system—and God knows how many of his former colleagues in the federal cabinet had had reviews prepared and commissions setup—and then Mr. Chrétien had a meeting in Montréal to attend on the weekend. Well, boy, he changed his time again. He says, "No, I'm going to kill the GST."

If that is the case, why don't you go stop this filibustering and talk about amendments. At any rate we will listen to you, and I think the federal government has shown consideration in saying that—it will listen to your amendment proposals and consider them; and then finally in the next budget the government will correct some weaknesses have not been corrected through regulations or administrative measures. Thus the government will consider them in the next budget, table the budget, and have these changes take effect on budget day. That is not far away. That is only March of next year, six months from now.

So I guess let me say first that the government has no lessons to take from the Premier of Ontario, although it may be the largest province in Canada. Pierre Trudeau did one-thing right when he made sure that unanimity was needed to change the Constitution, in particular when it came to changing the Senate; he wanted every province to be equal, and as far as we are concerned, as long as it is in the Constitution, I am telling you I am going to listen to Premier McKenna as well as to Premier Rae. That was my point and why don't you leave Premier Rae alone?

Senator Grafstein: Let me say in response to Senator Simard that I agree with him because he is making an important point, and he agrees with me. He said, if I heard him correctly, that Premier McKenna had said, "I represent the province of New Brunswick"—by the way, representing the province of New Brunswick, he obviously is taking his duties seriously and is now proceeding in the way he believes he should exercise his provincial duties. I do not quarrel with that; if that is the way he chooses to exercise his duties, that is his business. I respect that, and I certainly respect members from Québec who take the same position as Senator Simard. He says, "Look, my premier is prepared to accept the GST. My premier is prepared to meld the two systems," and when the senators in the province of Quebec opposite say to me they can support the GST, I do not quarrel with them at all.

● (2300)

I am not trying to seduce them into joining with me. All I am saying is that my province does not agree with that. As a senator, I am here to represent the region of the province of Ontario. Every level of government in the province of Ontario does not want the GST.

Please, Senator Simard, do not criticize Mr. Rae. He has only just been elected. He is confronting a situation that he has to deal with. As Canadians, we are all concerned about our economic state. There is no question about that. We are all concerned about the deficit. With due respect, we all have a different analysis about the deficit.

I do not like to hear the canards about the wasteful government under Mr. Trudeau without having an opportunity to respond to those canards. We should have an opportunity to deal with that, and we will deal with it. Pierre Trudeau, wherever you are, people are still beating up on your policies.

Senator Stanbury: They have none of their own.

Senator Grafstein: Obviously they had some relevance. If they were not relevant we would not be as animated about them even to this day.

Honourable senators, let us return to the subject matter, which is petitions. We have the petitions of the premier who is now compelled to go to court to try to stop the GST. We have the example in British Columbia, and we will hear from Senator Austin after I have concluded. I am sure he will deal with the same issue, because we have discussed it privately. We have come to the same conclusion because we both feel that the voices of our regions must be heard on this issue. The petitions are eternal. Other petitions that I have received, all of which I wanted to refer to, which is fundamental to the nature of petitions as it relates to Parliament, are petitions from the next generation.

Someone on the other side said that the government inherited a mess that is going to be a baggage or a burden on future generations.

Senator Thériault: Senator Castonguay.

Senator Grafstein: I do not want to take his words out of context.

Senator Simard: He is not the only one who said that.

Senator Grafstein: If we would reject this motion, let us hear the voice of the next generation. What about listening to the voice of the next generation?

I have here a number of petitions from the University of Toronto. This may be perceived to be self-promotion, but I am a graduate of the University of Toronto, as others opposite may be. I have here literally thousands of petitions, and this is just a small version of those. These are petitions from the University of Toronto. These are students from the class of 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97—the next generation. They do not like the GST. Here is their concluding line:

> It heartens me greatly to see many of our senators fighting for us. The GST's disastrous effects on students will have grievious implications towards our objectives as a nation as we move forward towards the 21st first century in an increasingly competitive world.

This is the voice, through petitions, of the next generation. They are among the finest of our generation who are now at schools and universities across the country. If Senator Simard went to the University of New Brunswick, I wonder what they would say. Senator Simard is as concerned as I am about the next generation. We are all concerned about the future of our children. What do the students say? What will they say, Senator Simard, if we do not listen to them? Will they be alienated? What is the next step when governments do not listen to students? What happens?

[Senator Grafstein.]

Senator Simard: I know what they are saying.

Senator Grafstein: What are they saying?

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: They are like all interest groups. They would like someone else to pay. They do not want to pay. They want the people working for Frazer Mills in Edmundston, N.B. to pay. They want seniors with big pensions to pay. They do not want to pay.

They are no different from other groups. We have heard from students from coast to coast, and we have heard from many interest groups. A number of them say they like the GST because we have to control the deficit; we have to protect future generations. We heard that from the seniors and most every groups, but they did not want their group to pay.

Another thing we heard was that we cannot leave future generations with a whole pile of debts.

I should now like to ask you a question. After a government listens to people and hears their beefs, because they listen and care, does that mean they have to follow the crowd and do what the first interest group that comes along tells them to do? That is not the way a country should be run.

Senator Grafstein, if you were head of a government and if you heard that from students, would you be paralysed by it? Would you be obligated to stop and keep looking for another alternative? Is this the way you would run a government?

Senator Grafstein: My response is based on the record. The Canadian Tax Foundation said the Government of Canada did not consider or research alternatives. The City of Toronto is saying that we should research alternatives and that there is a better way. Their suggestion is that they are prepared to recommend, if necessary, increases to income tax.

Senator Simard: Is that the Liberal position?

Senator Grafstein: That is the City of Toronto's position. We are here to deal with petitions. I am suggesting to honourable senators opposite that they have a view.

I should like to respond to Senator Simard and read a short paragraph from a letter from Monica Dejong, class of 93, University of Toronto:

> Our Constitution created the Senate to act as a chamber for sober reflection. The Senate Banking Committee, in this spirit, crossed the country and listened to ordinary Canadians voice their opinion on the GST. The consensus is overwhelming. The GST is a regressive consumption tax that places an unfair burden, a tremendous burden on taxpayers in this country. Students are particularly affected by the GST as a wide variety of items essential and previously untaxed will now cost us several percent more. These items include residence fees, transit fees, locker rentals, etc., etc. Furthermore, a sales tax on text books and periodicals would, for the first time in Canadian history, undermine the importance of education and literacy nationwide. Most of us surviving on limited, inelastic incomes cannot afford the nightmare of the GST.

• (2310)

Senator Simard: Did she propose an alternative?

Senator Grafstein: No, she did not, but we have been told that there are alternatives. The United States considered alternatives and rejected out of hand a value-added tax. In 1983 a Congress commission looked at a consumption tax and rejected it. Ronald Reagan rejected it, and that is on the record. In fact, you can find words to that effect in paper No. 88 of the Canadian Tax Foundation. He rejected it for a lot of reasons.

One of the arguments that has been made in support of the GST is that it will help us to harmonize with the United States. We have all been to Europe, and we know that countries such as France, England and Germany have a value-added tax.

Senator Simard: Who said that we should harmonize with the United States?

Senator Grafstein: I come back to the relevance. The Minister of Finance has said over and over that we must harmonize our tax structure with that of the United States so that we can be competitive.

Senator Simard: Not the GST.

Senator Grafstein: No, everything, corporate taxes, individual taxes, everything. A tax is a tax is a tax. That is what he said. Yet the United States has said, "By the way, do not try to harmonize with a value-added tax because we are not going to have one." We are not suggesting that they are correct. I suggest that we take a look at the argumentation. It is a question of credibility, of belief. Why is it that politicians are not believed? Could it be that when they say during an election that a tax will be neutral and then tell people immediately after the election that the tax will be an aid of deficit reduction and that it will be massive and crippling but it will be good for you, they lose credibility. By the way, the Premier of Ontario said that he is not sure whether he can harmonize the GST with his tax in the time that has been allocated to him.

Senator Simard: Your premise is wrong, Senator Grafstein.

Senator Grafstein: I realize that what I am saying is not taken seriously by senators opposite, but I am merely voicing the arguments of others.

Senator Simard: That is fine, but please do not say that we said during the last election that the tax would reduce the deficit.

Senator Lucier: What did you say?

Senator Austin: They didn't talk about it.

Senator Simard: Do not imply that we had changed our tune. We said during the election that the tax would be revenue neutral and that the deficit had to be brought under control. We said that the GST would do that, and we are still saying it. The GST will be revenue neutral in the first year and in years two, three and four, once jobs have been created and production has increased, there will additional revenues at hand. We have not changed our tune.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Castonguay just castigated Senator Thériault by saying, "Don't you want this tax? It will reduce the deficit." That is what he said. Perhaps he had his signals mixed.

Senator Simard: The tax is revenue neutral the first year.

Senator Grafstein: That is not what he said. During the election it was said that the tax would be neutral.

Let us talk about what was said in the last election. Let me tell honourable senators about a discussion I had with a former Conservative—or maybe he is still a Conservative—and that is Mr. David Kilgour. A question was raised in this chamber about what was said during the last election in Alberta. We were told by senators opposite—and I cannot remember who—that the people of Alberta knew and understood there would be a GST, as that was part of their platform in the last election campaign. It was Senator Comeau who said it. I suggested that Senator Comeau sit down with Mr. Kindy and Mr. Kilgour. Obviously, I was not in Alberta during the last election, but I thought I would ask Mr. Kilgour, a Conservative member who has now left the party because of the GST, what was said about the GST in the province of Alberta during the last election. I asked this question of him just a few days ago. He said nothing, silence. It was not that the tax was to be revenue neutral, but that it had never been discussed. He implied that they did not want to bring it up because they knew the reception they would get in the province of Alberta from the electors if the subject were raised.

So there it is, honourable senators, the credibility gap. Certainly we on this side from time to time share a gap on issues, and on this issue there is certainly a credibility gap.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Senator Grafstein, I may seem somewhat obtuse, but I am attempting to follow the argument on the motion before the house. It would be helpful if we could have a schema of the argument that the honourable senator is raising. He started off, I believe, quoting John Stuart Mill and trying to relate that passage, I believe, to the duty or role of the House of Lords. I was beginning to follow that argument, but then he got a little bit lost. Could he provide us with a schema of the case that he intends to make on the motion, to help someone who is just a student and new here?

Senator Grafstein: I was trying to submit to the Senate that petitions, particularly timely petitions, go to the very credibility of this place. I am trying to respond as best I can to Senator Murray's arguments in support of the motion made earlier this day. I am trying to rebut his arguments with, I hope, rationality. He said that if we do not stop this delay, we will destroy the Senate.

Senator Doody: Who said that?

Senator Grafstein: Senator Murray. He said there is a danger to this place if we continue to delay.

Senator Doody: He is probably right.

Senator Grafstein: I tried to persuade senators opposite that a delay is an appropriate parliamentary tradition. John Stuart Mill, who did not like the second chamber, and every British constitution textbook, talks about the importance of petitions, particularly when dealing with an extraordinary tax measure, the likes of which has never before been seen in Canada. To employ something like 4,000 employees, the largest single increase in the public service, in aid of a tax measure should demonstrate to any reasonable senator that this is an extraordinary measure. Obviously provinces, individuals and businesses are responding in an extraordinary way. If we refuse to let them have their say, because they consider us wee poor vessels, that is not fair. Who was the great Christian theologian who said, "Oh, that this cup could pass from my lips."?

Senator Doody: Jesus.

Senator Grafstein: Well, oh that this cup could pass from my lips. I am not here to imbibe this, but we are the poor vessels who must respond to the pleas from students, businesses, cities, mayors, provinces, and so on, to stall what they consider is a disastrous tax measure. Let us assume that they are wrong. Not to give them the chance to air their views would be a greater danger.

Senator Simard: We have heard their views for the past two years.

Senator Grafstein: Yes, but you do not seem to understand that more people today—and it is not just some people—are exercised, excited, and distraught over the GST, and become even more so as they learn about it. There is a learning curve in the country. A law is not simply passed and people respond. For example, it says in today's Financial Post that 50 percent of firms have failed to register for the GST. Let us talk about the 50 percent that has registered and that are now confronting the GST. John Bulloch said on June 28 that one should not underestimate the politics of an unfair tax. He asked why Canadians should have the absolutely worst sales tax system in the world.

• (2320)

That is what John Bulloch said about the GST. Business people who are busy going about their business trying to struggle under terrible economic circumstances are now confronting the implementation of this bill. If they have four thousand civil servants, think about the number of Canadians who will have to be employed just for the GST alone. Thousands and thousands of man hours will now be adopted for the GST.

Hon. Michel Cogger: May I ask a question, senator?

Senator Grafstein: By the way, Senator Cogger, we will not have a chance to deal with Senator Castonguay's castigation now, because he castigated the Trudeau government. I will tell you one thing that always animated this side, and, I am sure, animated the other side. Perhaps we will deal with economic issues and put them in proper perspective. We will not talk about high interest rates, the GST, inflation or deficits; we will talk about what government is for—namely, to give people jobs and to give them a fair and decent allocation of the public responsibilities of the tax system. That is what government is for. We will also have an opportunity to talk about full employment.

Senator Cogger: May I ask a question?

Senator Grafstein: Not when I hear the Prime Minister saying, "By the way, Trudeau was terrible. We brought unemployment down from "X" to "Y." Approximately 8 per cent or 9 per cent of Canadians are unemployed, and we are deindustrializing in Ontario today.

Senator Steuart: Shame!

Senator Grafstein: Isn't that a shame? Is that a satisfactory state? Ask the governors of those great corporations what they are doing today in their boardrooms. I will tell you what they are doing. They are saying, "I have to defer capital spending. It is uncertain. I do not know how the GST will impact my government."

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Who created this uncertainty?

Senator Grafstein: That is what the GST does.

Senator Austin: Ask Senator Eyton!

Senator Grafstein: I do not want to ask any senators opposite. They have to ask that for themselves. But to say that we should not listen to these voices—

Senator Simard: Who is creating this uncertainty, senator? It is the Liberal senators in the Senate! You are creating this uncertainty!

Senator Doody: Periods of inequity!

Senator Stanbury: Are you standing up, Senator Doody?

Hon Jean-Maurice Simard: Senator Grafstein, you are quoting all these other people. You would like us to listen to Premier Rae and defer, delay, and postpone this bill. You came here from Toronto. Are you saying that it will hurt Toronto?

Here is what someone wrote in The Financial Post on October 30, 1990 under the headline: "Who Will Bear Costs of Senate Delay?" It was written by Samuel Slutsky. He said: "Liberal Senators should reconsider their actions."

You are talking about uncertainty. Well, sir, you and your colleagues are creating much uncertainty. Here is what Mr. Slutsky says. But first, I wish to ask you a question. Why will you not answer these people? I am looking forward to hearing what you are going to tell these businessmen.

Mr. Slutsky writes:

> While the political infighting surrounding the goods and services tax intensifies, there is little discussion on the significant issue of how much defeat or delay of the legislation will cost and who will bear it.
> It is unclear whether the issue has been considered by the Liberal senators who hold themselves up as champions of the consuming public.

Senator Steuart: I have a question for you.

Senator Doody: Senator Steuart has a question for you.

Senator Simard: Mr. Slutsky continues to state:

Logic would dictate that those intractable fellows—

That is, the Liberal Senators—

> . . . must have carefully quantified and considered the cost implications of their actions to their constituents, choosing to go ahead irregardless.
> With that assumption in mind, a consideration of the more apparent costs of delay is in order:

He then goes on to talk about pricing, competition and the need to complete their investment plans. It is all right for Senator Grafstein and his colleagues to talk about uncertainty.

An Hon. Senator: He is from Toronto!

Senator Simard: Yes, he is from Toronto. You cannot only be speaking for the poor, although they are important. You must be speaking as well for the people who are working for these industries and other companies, including the Bank of Montreal and the employees of the Bank of Montreal.

Senator Stanbury: They are all laid off!

Senator Simard: You must have in mind and be concerned about the future of the great province and the manufacturing heart of Canada. You must be concerned about that, too. What they are saying is that the uncertainty you are creating is causing evil with pricing, competition, their long-term plans, purchase of equipment, and so on, the cost of which will decrease with the GST.

You Liberals on the other side are very short-sighted to cause further uncertainty by preventing this piece of legislation from coming here and being debated so that amendments can be considered. But, no. You would just as soon talk about the need to hear the little public, the students, and all these people through these petitions.

Yes, Senator Grafstein, I was at UNB and Moncton University not so long ago and I was in Edmundston. We heard people who were concerned—that is, people who have made plans and have invested great sums of money in addition to those by government. You say, "Well, perhaps we should hear from Premier Rae. We should delay one month, two months, six months, or one year. In the meantime, we will have another review."

My question to you, sir—because one has to have a question—is: When will you answer Mr. Slutsky and the people in Toronto, Kitchener and these great manufacturing towns?

Senator Di Nino: Oakville.

Senator Simard: When will you answer these people from Oakville, Kars, Nepean and Oshawa? What will you tell them? Perhaps the government should spend more money and wait and lose the money that has already been invested in catalogues, and other things while they wait for Mrs. Hosek?

Senator Doody: And Mrs. Starr.

Senator Simard: Mrs. Hosek was the star in the Peterson government. You have it wrong, Senator Doody. Mrs. Starr is gone—we should not talk about her!

Are you serious, Senator Grafstein, that we should wait for another study and look at another scenario? If I were you, senator, I would take my chances. I would go on and debate not this motion, but at third reading, and try to convince Senator Castonguay and the new British/Canadian Senators, as you call them.

Senator Comeau: Let us debate the GST.

Senator Simard: We are not so insensitive that we are not prepared to consider amendments. Take your chances on the independents and on some of us. If you defeat us fair and square, it is dead. In the meantime, let us proceed and consider amendments. Let us put an end to the uncertainty.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Grafstein: I have to deal with those questions.

● (2330)

You have raised three issues which I would like to summarize. The first is that by delay we are creating uncertainty. The second is that because we are creating uncertainty, we are being unfair to business.

Senator Simard: And the employees and clients of those businesses.

Senator Grafstein: Not only are we being unfair, but we are creating an investment climate which breeds further uncertainty. Is that not a fair assessment of your argument, Senator Simard?

Senator Simard: Yes.

Senator Grafstein: I asked that question of John Bulloch. He said that imposing this tax measure is not only going to be disruptive, but that it is going to affect national unity. He said, to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on June 28, 1990, that he could not think of one single initiative that would convince millions of Canadians that Canada is not working than the imposition of two different invoice-based sales tax systems in nine provinces. He said that it will create unfairness and confusion for millions of Canadians where it hurts—namely in the pocket-book—and that it will create conflict between business and consumers. He said that the small business community will be in a perpetual state of war.

That is his generic response to your question about balancing, on the one hand, the uncertainty, with what he considers to be a disastrous tax on the other.

We are here to balance interest. We are taught, as a principle of administrative law, to balance interests. You have said that, Senator Simard. You have said, "Look, we can't listen to students. We have to be more mature here; we have to balance interests. We can't listen to one or another interest group, but balance their interests and come out with a conclusion that benefits the most in the best way". We all share that goal.

However, John Bulloch says that if he has to balance uncertainty on the one hand for a shorter period of time as opposed to the chaos that will be created without harmonizing in advance those tax systems in nine provinces, then he will choose delay. He is not alone.

I have asked a number of businessmen about this, and others of you can test this to see if it is correct. I have said, "We are being criticized by business associations for delaying this measure." They all say to me, "Look, if you are just delaying it and going through a charade or playing politics, then let's have the bitter pill. But if, in fact, you can truly delay it, and if you can get the government to listen, then we will wipe out the costs that we have already incurred in preparation for the GST because we think that is the lesser cost when compared to the greater cost of being involved in a tax structure which we think is unjust, unfair, chaotic and which will just not work".

One businessman whom I mentioned earlier—I will try to get his name—said that up until several weeks ago he had so far spent a quarter of a million dollars in getting ready for the GST. He is a very entrepreneurial-oriented young businessman in Toronto who has created an international company over the course of the last 10 or 12 years. He is known to senators opposite. He said, "Look, I would wipe out that quarter of a million dollars, which is now moving towards half a million dollars, because the GST is going to kill my business. I am in the hotel business and it will kill it. I will be put into an unfair competitive advantage compared with others. The province of Quebec is harmonizing theirs. We cannot harmonize ours because we have a different sales tax structure. So I am going to get doubly hit. It will cost me thousands of man-hours to implement the tax, and, at the same time, I will lose my competitive edge with the United States."

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: May I ask you a question, Senator Grafstein? What do you think of the seventeen groups of companies from Toronto who sent a telegram to the Leader of the Opposition telling him to go ahead with the goods and services tax? What would you do with the brief of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants? Its representatives said that you should go ahead with the tax. That association represents both small and large business.

Senator Grafstein: I would like to respond to the comment about the chartered accountants. I have asked a number of them about this. There is no doubt that they welcome this tax. There is no question at all that most firms of chartered accountants welcome it.

Senator Poitras: Why?

Senator Grafstein: I hope I am not taking their position out of context. They think it will be a tremendous job creator for their firms. They think that—

Hom. Jean-Marie Simard: Honourable senators, on a point of order, once upon a time I was a member of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. I practised my profession for many years. Last year, after contributing to this association for well over 20 years without earning money from the profession, while being in politics, I decided that I would let my membership lapse. Although I am no longer a member of the organization, I wish that I had never heard those comments about professional people who have made and who continue to make a great contribution to Canada. I wish I had not heard you say, as you have just said, Senator, that chartered accountants will benefit somehow from this bill thus the reason for their support. That is just not fair to the profession. If you say that about chartered accountants, then I can guess you say the same thing about lawyers or medical doctors. I hope that you will consider withdrawing those comments about a very noble profession.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Senator Simard, in a sense I do want to withdraw what I said. I want to withdraw because I did not talk to the gentlemen from the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. My comments were directed to several accountants from two different firms. I asked them about the measure and their response was that it will be good for business. I do not mean to take those two comments out of context and then impute improper motives to the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. I was responding as best I could, based on personal knowledge, to Senator Poitras who raised the question. He said, "What about the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants?" I answered based on my own limited research. It was an anecdote and not based on the submission.

Several presidents of banks have told me that there is no question at all that they support the GST. Part of the brief presented by the chartered accountants is motivated at least by two of the chartered banks. One of the bank presidents to whom I spoke was quite critical of the position I have been taking about this matter. I said to him that one has to balance the voices that one hears and make an independent evaluation of the voices and the nature of the evidence that people present in support of their cases. The one point that keeps coming through to me, aside from the criticism of the tax which Bulloch and others make, is that the country is not prepared for it. Surely, a tax cannot be imposed—even if we could agree that it is correct—that is perceived to be so unpopular, so difficult and so regressive without giving the population an opportunity to absorb the shock.

Delay will not deteriorate the economic condition of the country. The government still has at its means the ability to raise taxes other than by this particular measure. Clearly, interest rates are falling. We have heard that in the United States, because of recent results which were just published yesterday, the last two months in the United States indicated an advance in the GNP of 1.8 per cent. The two previous months were, as I recall, half of that. So the United States is now getting mixed messages. One of their messages, clearly, at least on the interest side, is that there is going to be less of a pressure. We hope it will last longer, that there will be less of an upward pressure on interest rates. That will certainly be, if we are to take the government's arguments, in aid of deficit reduction, because even if this were to impact on the economy next year, two points reduction in the interest rate would do more for deficit reduction, as all senators opposite will agree, than this measure. No question about it.

So there is a balancing act here, and timing act, and I think there is a legitimate dispute about the timing of the measure.

On the one hand, we hear from Senator Everett that this is the time to hit them. Hit them when it hurts, so says Senator Everett. And we hear from Senator Pitfield—I have read his comments carefully—that this is the wrong time, the wrong tax, but that we should let the government have its way because it is not irreversible. That is Senator Pitfield's argument.

I cannot accept that. I do not think senators opposite can accept the argument that we can go forward, impose a tax measure of this nature, and then suggest to the Canadian public that it would not cost anything to reverse such a new imposition, such a new scheme.

Honourable senators, I want to return, if I can, moving towards the light at the end of the tunnel. I think the credibility of the Senate is at stake. The way we treat petitions, and the public, who are looking at us for the first time as a relevant institution, should be put in the scales for us to measure.

The Senate, despite what Senator Murray suggests, has become a relevant body in the last several months, much more so, according to Senator Steuart, than any time since he was here.

Senator Steuart: That is right. And before.

Senator Grafstein: And before. Why is it that at the same time when we hear the Prime Minister blaming the Senate, we hear the Leader of the Government here blaming the Senate, and we hear ministers of the Crown abusing the Senate? We have all heard those comments and none of us like them. I am sure that senators opposite did not like the comments made by ministers of the Crown about the Senate any more than I did, because when they criticize the Senate they criticize all of us. And we do not like that, none of us like that.

The government has decided, as a question of policy, to trash the Senate, not just the Liberal-dominated Senate, the Senate, the senators. Minister Jelinek did not discriminate when he made an adverse comment about senators. He lumped us together.

Senator Austin: Do you recall what he said?

Senator Grafstein: He spoke for himself. I don't want to repeat a canard. None of us liked that. Some of us felt for the first time that even a comment from Minister Jelinek made us more relevant because we know that each time a minister opens his mouth and criticizes, somehow, in a strange way, support for the Senate ratchets up.

Honourable senators, think about the relevancy of the Senate and about what we are doing, if we are all concerned about this institution of Parliament, because this motion is to undermine, in my view, the routine business of the Senate, which includes petitions.

So it is an extraordinary motion to do that. It is an extraordinary step. There have been a number of extraordinary steps, but each time there has been an attempt by the government to facilitate the public business and to leap-frog into the debate on the Orders of the Day, each time that happens, and each time we on this side resist by unreasonable or reasonable means, our popularity goes up.

Why is that? Senators opposite, new senators and old, have you not asked yourself that question? Why is it that all of a sudden 50 per cent of the population approves, notwithstanding the destructive—and I am using the terminology of the side opposite—destructive, ungentlemanly, unreasonable, abusive techniques we used? Senators opposite are nodding their heads. I have talked to a number of them and they have commented upon how unhappy they felt, how ashamed they felt, how humiliated they were when we were pounding our desks. By the way, do you think we on this side felt proud of ourselves when we were pounding our desks mindlessly for six or eight hours?

Notwithstanding that, notwithstanding what was an extraordinary event in Canadian parliamentary history, the Canadian public now says that what we were doing was right, that our tactics were correct if they helped to defeat the GST. That is what the Gallup poll said. Fifty per cent. We have never had such a high rating. So I think it is important that we do have to listen.

When governments refuse to listen, they destroy themselves. They undermine the institutions they represent when they refuse to listen. Is not that the lesson of Parliamentary history? It is not that they are bringing opprobrium against themselves, they are bringing it down against the entire institutions, because people do not segregate in their own minds or discriminate politicians from the institutions. They think they are one and the same thing.

So why is it that in that same poll, despite these unreasonable and so-called abusive tactics, we are up to 50 per cent?

I will tell you why. It is because the House of Commons has gone down. And why has House of Commons gone down? Because the legitimate voice of the regions of the country, the population of the country, were not heard in that other place. We have heard Senator MacEachen make that very eloquent statement. Is not, with all due respect, Senator MacEachen one of the great Parliamentarians of our age?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Doody, when you smile, I know you smile with respect.

Senator Doody: Are you speaking for or against the motion?

Senator Grafstein: I am speaking against the motion.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

Senator Grafstein: And what Senator MacEachen was saying was that the other side obviously refused, not just on this tax measure but on a number of other measures, to listen to what the Canadian people have to say. So there is a death wish. There is a terrible death wish.

I am an amateur historian; I like to read history, and I like to read what people say about history. I picked up a very interesting book today by one of the world's greatest writers, who also happens to be a politician. His name is Vaclav Havel. There is a soft cover-book which was recently published called Living In Truth, which is a series of essays written by Havel about the individual and the state. I do not want senators opposite to take my comments out of context.

I do not want senators opposite to take my comments out of context, because in no way, shape or form am I suggesting that the government office is authoritarian or totalitarian. I am not suggesting that at all. But I am suggesting that the book contains some appropriate ideas that appeal to me and which may appeal to other senators. It says that a government takes on a death wish when it stops listening, starts deluding itself, and starts putting a spin on its own policies that over and over again seem to be out of sync with the general population. There are a number of essays here, but he says that a society is reduced by a policy where the only aim is superficial order and general obedience regardless of by what means and what price they have been gained. He then goes on to say that order has been established at the price of a paralysis of the spirit, a deadening of the heart and a devastation of life.

Now, those are exaggerated comments, but there is a germ of an idea there in what he is saying. He said that when a government refuses to listen and to respect the views of the governed, then by itself it is a death wish, and it corrodes public dialogue in the country. That is why, Senator Kinsella, I think that petitions at this particular moment in Canadian history, with this tax measure are more than justified. What does it matter if we take a month, or two, or three to listen to those parties and hear them out?

Hon. Michel Cogger: May I ask a question?

Senator Grafstein: Sure. Go ahead.

Senator Cogger: I am trying to follow what you are saying, and you are making very good points. You are speaking to us quite reasonably tonight, and for a while you were taking off, and Senator Simard intervened. Your point would appear to be that if it were not for Senator Murray's nasty or ill-timed motion, all we would need do on this side would be to listen to you gentlemen and we would hear the real people speaking to us.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Cogger: That seems to be your point. How do you expect us seriously to believe that, when for weeks on end we have listened to every kind of nonsense, from Bible readings to discussion of—

An. Hon. Senator: Do you call the Bible nonsense?

Senator Cogger: Chinese restaurants in Antigonish—please, senator—to Senator Van Roggen's 1971 speech. Your point seems to be that if we are just good boys and forget about that motion, then all of a sudden there will be no more nonsense, no more time wasting or anything, and finally you guys will come to your senses. Please be serious; we cannot accept that.

Senator Grafstein: There has been one beneficial impulse coming from the other side in the last week or so; and maybe I am misreading this impulse, because it is unexpressed. It is inarticulate, but I am detecting it as I listen carefully to the comments from the other side. Today, for some reason best known to each individual senator, there appears to be a desire to listen to substantive issues.

An Hon. Senator: We always were ready.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators on the other side read the same numbers we read, and the same newspapers we read and then get the same reaction we are getting. It is no different. I am sure that all senators are receiving the same public reaction, and I detect, on the other side, a pause, a thought for pause, and the thought for pause is as other senators gear themselves up for the grand debate. Now, I am not suggesting that we on this side are still uniform about what we think is the best prescription for the illnesses that we all know are plaguing the economic body of this country. There is no question about that. But I assume that I am correct when I suggest that senators on the other side, and the government more so than senators, are beginning to think about this GST in a way they did not think a month ago. I detect that in conversations, in comments that I hear here, in comments that I hear from the other place, and in comments that I hear from people who are in contact with ministers about how to address this. We have one specific example from the mouth of the Prime Minister himself who, until a month ago, would brook no amendment whatsoever to the GST. He received similar pleas to those I have received from the University of Toronto. Responding to a plea he received in person at the University of British Columbia a student who said, "Look, are you going to tax knowledge? Are you going to tax my books?" he said, "We will deal with that, we will satisfy you." He did not put a timeframe on it, but he said that he would. And that is a change. I consider that to be a positive change.

So it is not just senators opposite that we on this side are concerned about, because the ultimate changes will not be made by senators opposite. They will be made by the government.

Senator Cogger: You referred to in the University of British Columbia. Can you explain to me how you consider you are helping the student in fighting his case by forcing us to listen to 50 points of order on Senator Murray's motion? I do not see the connection. It is unfair to that student, because if we do not pass the GST, how can the Prime Minister fix it as you have suggested he indicated?

Senator Grafstein: He could fix it right away by unilaterally suggesting—and I would not not have to read these mindless petitions—to the students of Canada that there will be no GST against textbooks, that there will be no GST against residents' fees, there will be no GST against locker rentals, there will be no GST against student transfer fees. That is how we can solve it, and all of a sudden, that is set and the next generation will be put to bed instead of being aroused and anxious. What happens when students get animated? They tend to do mindless things.

So, honourable senators, the book goes on to speak of something else that I think is relevant, and that is the role of the citizen versus the state. I think it will be of interest to senators opposite if I brought some historic context to this. In this very interesting essay, "Citizens $%versus$% the State"—it was not written by Havel himself, but by a gentleman called Harry Jarv, for Havel—he dealt with Socrates, and he referred to the role of a citizen in a democratic state. He said:

> 'Law and order' are not sufficient criteria for a good society. For this one must have good law and order. This allows for any amount of disputes on questions of values.

• (0000)

> This allows for any amount of disputes on questions of values. Continual discussion is necessary. Laws can be unjust and harmful.

He goes on to make a plea for continual debate where people perceive laws to be unjust.

Clearly, the Canadian public, rightly or wrongly, perceive the GST to be unjust. He goes on to say:

> Socrates was prepared to suffer unjustly, but the Athenian state could not force him to act unjustly. Aristotle said, "An unjust law is no law." Yet the consequences of this pronouncement was not drawn until the middle of the 19th Century, when Henry David Thoreau created the concept of civil disobedience.

Honourable senators, we all know the consequences of civil disobedience. It is important to remind senators where the concept in Henry Thoreau's mind—the originator of the modern concept of civil disobedience—came from. What was he being civilly disobedient about? Honourable senators, do you know what it was about? It was about a tax, an unjust tax. He gave a speech in which he said a citizen has a duty. I quote again from this article "The Citizen Versus the State:"

> His basic proposition (referring to Thoreau) was that all governments, including those that are democratically elected, can be corrupted by abuse of power. The integrity of all governments depends on the individual citizen's feeling of responsibility. Thoreau sets the individual conscience against the majority decisions, the individual sense of justice against the law.

The next argument in this magnificent essay is a quote from Goethe, the greatest writer of German classical literature. Goethe had formulated a similar but more exacting maxim, and this is what he said:

> Government is best which teaches us to govern ourselves. Anarchy does not mean chaos but freedom from rulers.

What is the essence of this idea? The essence of this idea is that to deny individual citizens the right to redress a government measure which they feel is unjust—correctly or incorrectly, it does not matter—to deny them the opportunity to petition, not to have their voices heard here, is to invite civil disobedience and to erode democracy and to erode Parliament.

When Senator Murray stands in his place and argues that we have no right to do what we are doing on this side, when we are seeking to get these citizens' voices put forward in this highest court of the land, the court of Parliament. To deny us that right, even if it takes two or three weeks or a month, is to deny the essence of Parliament.

These are not my thoughts. This is based on Havel, a president who was prepared to be incarcerated for his conscience. I am not suggesting that we should be put in that category. I don't want to sanctimoniously promote ourselves to that situation.

Senator Olson: Go ahead.

Senator Grafstein: No, no. It is not fair and it is not reasonable. However, to deny people the right to have their court of last resort is self-destructive. It is a death wish for the government and for Parliament. That is why we are animated on this side when we see a vote taken without our being present. We know the games that people have to play, but when you push the game too far people get animated because all of us believe that what we are doing is somehow, in some strange way, trying to defend the institutions that we respect. We think that this institution is probably working better now than it has ever worked before.

I know that this does not agree with Senator Molson. I know that. He is not here. I heard his speech. He got indigestion when he saw the commotion. We all remember what Teddy Roosevelt said, "Politics is getting into the arena." By the way, none of us like to get our hands dirty. All of us would like this cup to pass from our lips, but we believe that what wer are doint here is grappling with a tax measure which by all accounts is unprecedented in its scope. The Prime Minister has said that, Mr. Wilson has said that, and the public just isn't ready yet. The is no question that the public is not ready yet, and to impose it upon them will invite civil disobedience, and if we do invite civil disobedience, we erode Parliament. Skipping the laws, using leap-frogging procedures, and not letting this passion ebb, is wrong.

So, honourable senators, I conclude by reading some excerpts from a book I have referred to many times. Each time we read it, I believe it informs us. It is Barbara Tuchman's book, The March of Folly. I believe every parliamentarian and every political figure should read this book because it talks about judgments taken by political leaders that cause unintended consequences that are horrendous. It talks about a series of decisions taken by government that not only destroyed the messengers but destroyed the institutions that the messengers represented. I would like to read two brief excerpts because I believe they are informative.

The first excerpt is found on page 384, and it talks about errors. When a government has made an error, how does it gracefully withdraw? I wonder if honourable senators opposite would agree that if we could relive last year, the government might have approached the GST differently? We have been told that. We have been told that by Dalton Camp, whom I respect. A great Canadian, he has been very complimentary to me over the years. We have heard from Dalton Camp, a Conservative, a great public servant and a great advisor.

An Hon. Senator: Diefenbaker had him nailed.

Senator Grafstein: Well, I had a high regard for Diefenbaker and I have a high regard for Dalton Camp. Dalton Camp has written that if the government could replay last year, they would have done it differently. Perhaps they would not have split the bill. Perhaps they would not have split the income tax giveaway, and decoupled the giveaway with the bad medicine. Perhaps they should have kept them together, but they did that in aid of an election. They wanted to give a tax reduction. Senator Castonguay is not here, but I wonder what he would think about a government that would decouple this bill with a tax give-away prior to an election, and then in the early part of the next regime, bring in the bad medicine by keeping the decoupling silent and suggesting that by keeping the bad medicine silent they could somehow force the poor patient to swallow the medicine. Now, they would have played it differently. So, there is clearly a consensus on the other side, if the polls are correct, that they have made some errors.

Back to Barbara Tuchman. What does she say about errors? She says:

> The test comes in recognizing when persistence in error has become self-damaging.

That seems to be the case here, honourable senators. She quotes Machiavelli:

> A prince, says Machiavelli, ought always to be a great asker and a patient hearer of truth about those things of which he has inquired.

• (0010)

> He should be angry if he finds that anyone has scruples about telling him the truth. What the government needs is great askers.
> Refusal to draw inferences from negative signs is under the rubric "woodenheadedness", which has played so large a part in these pages. This was recognized in the most pessimistic work of modern times, George Orwell's 1984, as what the author called "Crimestop". "Crimestop" means the faculty of stopping short, as though by instinct, at the threshold of any dangerous thought. It includes the power of not grasping analogies, of failing to perceive logical errors, of misunderstanding the simplest arguments, of being bored and repelled by any train of thought which is capable of leading in a heretical direction. "Crimestop," in short, means protective stupidity.

I ask honourable senators on this side, is that not what we are talking about when we oppose the motion that would, in effect, say to the Senate that it should stop listening to people who are asking questions? Is that not the effect of what we are doing?

I would like to conclude with an analogy that I think is a good one. Let me say that we on this side have made many political errors.

Senator Steuart: Not many.

Senator Olson: Not since we have come over here.

Senator Doody: Never apologize.

Senator Grafstein: I know that I have made many political errors. I have given advice that has led to many political disasters. Of course, we would try to fix things up afterwards. There is not a politician or public servant who has not made mistakes. By the way, if one says that he has not made mistakes, he is not a politician, because the essence of politics is mistakes and errors. The difference that separates good politicians from bad politicians is when they recognize an error and redress it. They withdraw, pull back or change course. Then they put a spin on it. I am not suggesting they should not have the spin doctors up there spinning when they make a u-turn. What I am suggesting is what Barbara Tuckman, Socrates, Aristotle and all the great voices of time have said: when you make an error, try to change, withdraw, correct, attack or pull back.

If I may, I would like to end with a reference to a good politician and exemplar. There was one exemplar in history.

Senator Bonnell: Trudeau.

Senator Grafstein: There was one exemplar in history. Let me deal with Trudeau for a moment. I agree that honourable senators should be concerned about Trudeau, and particularly Quebec senators, because he changed the country. He changed this country in a way that is so massive and so overwhelming that we have yet to grasp the full import of that change. What was the change? Earlier Senator Castonguay castigated Trudeau for this change. He said that Trudeau compelled Quebec not to join the Constitution in 1982.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: He did not say that.

Senator Grafstein: What did he say?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: He said that he did not keep his word.

Senator Grafstein: What did he say?

Senator Beaulieu: He said in 1982 that Quebec is not in the Constitution.

Senator Grafstein: Fine. What Canada and Quebec got is something that changed the political structure of this country, that empowered people in a way they have never seen before. We got the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It said that peace, order and good government, as we used to know it, is out the window, that governments are not always right. The ordinary citizen now has a way of petitioning government in this place and in the courts in a way he never had before. Why is it that there is such a swing in public opinion between parties now? Because people are thinking for themselves. We must govern differently. The next generation will have to govern differently. Government will not be respected or taken at its word. They will not believe government.

Honourable senators can see examples of this in the briefs presented to Senate committees. I suggest that honourable senators read the briefs that were submitted to the Senate Baking , Trade and Commerce Committee. I have read 40 of them. One of the best briefs I have read was one presented the other day to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee by a women's legal association. It was as magnificent a constitutional brief as I have ever seen. I am not suggesting that I agreed with all the arguments, but it was magnificently prepared and magnificently argued. Surely there is a connection between Pierre Trudeau's Constitution, which encapsulated the Charter, and that brief one decade later. The connection is that women now feel empowered in a way they never felt empowered before. Why do they feel that way? Because they fought and they got their right and recognition under the Charter. They were not satisfied with the first round, and they remonstrated and petitioned and got their way. Politics will never be the same in this country.

I know of one senator who was a great Liberal and who fell out of bed with the Liberals in this chamber because of the Constitution and the Charter. He felt that it would destroy the common law, that we did not need an articulated Charter that gave clear-cut rights, that we could rely on case studies, experience and common law to present petitions, and so on. That has changed, not only in Ontario, but in Quebec. All one need do is look at the cases that now go before the courts in Quebec, and I am not simply referring to criminal law. Quebec has changed. Canada has changed. It is tougher to govern today. I once thought that the greatest thing that someone could achieve in Canada was to be the leader of a political party and the Prime Minister of the country. I watch political leaders pretty carefully. Senator Castonguay said that the greatest Prime Minister of Canada was Mr. Pearson. I came into politics because of Mr. Pearson.

Senator Beaulieu: That is not what he said. He said that Mr. Pearson was the last one of your party to understand Quebec.

Senator Grafstein: I accept that.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Good. That eliminates Trudeau, and I accept that too.

Senator Grafstein: I have worked with Mr. Pearson.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I did too.

Senator Grafstein: I also knew Mr. Diefenbaker well, and I grew to respect him.

• (0020)

I respected him for one singular passion of his, and that was the Charter of Rights. I can tell you, honourable senators, that without the Charter of Rights—which broke ground and applied only to the federal jurisdiction—I do not think we would have been able to convince enough of Parliament to support the Charter of Rights and the Constitution. There is no question at all that he was the godfather of the present Constitution.

I had the pleasure and privilege of working with Mr. Trudeau and watching and observing him at close hand, as I have Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Clark. Mr. Clark, Senator Cogger and I bumped into each other in the sixties because we were doing things. We were active for our political parties and we had a mutual camaraderie and respect for one another. But, honourable senators, it is much more difficult to govern this country than it was before, because you have to deal with the public, who now feel empowered—that is, each individual group—to come forward and make their views felt in a way that we have never seen before. That is a tribute. In some sense it is a great improvement, because you cannot impose laws. You cannot bring in laws without satisfying yourself that not only are they correct but that people buy into those laws. I do not think there is a continual adversarial atmosphere outside this arena. I know that provinces and cities work where they have politicians of different political stripes. It can be made to work because there is a consensus about fundamental issues. On this issue, honourable senators, obviously there is a huge conflict in the country. To ignore that and to say that it will go away, and to expect that one year from today people will accept our hard medicine because somehow it will be good for them, will not be accepted. That is why the Meech Lake process broke down, because the public wanted to participate. The Prime Minister has acknowledged that. He has said, "next time around we will listen."

Is that not the substance of this motion? We are saying, "listen to petitions."

Let me conclude, honourable senators—because you have been very patient—with one of the great examples in history of a great politician. His name was Solon of Athens. In The March of Folly, Barbara Tuchman states that he was the wisest of the great politicians and is worth a glance.

Solon was called upon to be the chief magistrate of Athens in 6th Century B.C. at a time of great economic distress and social unrest. It was not too different from the atmosphere in this country. He was asked to save the State and to compose its differences.

The reason why the State was in a state of unrest at that time is that there were harsh measures that were perceived to be harsh. There were problems with creditors, taxes and the rich being perceived as becoming richer while the poor got poorer. There was a difference between land-owning classes and slaves and slave holders. Solon was called upon because, even though he was wealthy and comfortable, he was perceived to be just. He was accepted by the rich, according to Plutarch, because he was a man of wealth and substance, and by the poor because he was honest.

In the bodies of law he proclaimed, Solon's concern was justice—that is, fair dealing between the weak and the strong and a stable government. So he abolished some of these hard measures. He had to convince the land-owners and the slave-owners that their credit and taxes and burdens against the poor and the slaves were unfair and unreasonable. He changed the way of doing business by changing the currency. He regulated weights and measures so that people in business would not cheat. He established legal holds and the civil rights of citizens. He established fair penalties and, by taking no chances, he then exacted an oath from the Athenian council to maintain his reforms for ten years. He then left. They begged him to come back. It was a wonderful moment in history for a politician who took on those responsibilities. The people begged him to come back, but he refused to return because he felt they would cause him to change the balance he had struck.

What did Solon suggest that he learned from all this? What was the lesson or the moral? Was it personal ambition? No, it was not personal ambition. At the end of his life he wrote—and he put it in the third person—that each day he grew older and learned something new.

Honourable senators, I urge you to reject this motion. I urge you to listen. I urge you to listen to these petitions, because I believe that each day all of us can learn something new.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO CALL ORDERS OF THE DAY—DEBATE CONTINUING

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, earlier today, when we were discussing the motion made by Senator Murray, someone on this side said it was a disgrace. But Senator Murray put the disgrace on this side. He gave us a lecture on the way we behaved and how we embarrassed him and this institution, and how we took this institution, Parliament, and held it up to ridicule.

There is no question that there was some ridicule by some of the press about senators opposite. But I want to review the situation to see who held up this institution to ridicule and who, in his words, "prostituted the rules,"

It started on October 4—

Senator Simard: No!

Senator Steuart: October 4 is when it started.

Senator Simard: No!

Senator Steuart: —when you broke the rules—

Senator Simard: No!

Senator Steuart: When you used the Speaker, someone who enjoyed a reasonable—

Senator Simard: No, it started on September 24th!

Senator Steuart: —reputation across Canada, and you destroyed his reputation. You destroyed his reputation, and you started with Brian Mulroney.

Senator Simard: You said that majority rules. That is what Senator Buckwold said.

Senator Steuart: You are ashamed of what you did—and you should be ashamed.

An Hon. Senator: Never!

Senator Steuart: You should all be ashamed of what you did. You broke the rules of Parliament, and you know it. That is why you are shouting, because you are ashamed—and you should be ashamed.

An Hon. Senator: No!

Senator Steuart: You are, the whole bunch of you, a disgrace—the new ones and the old ones.

Senator Beaulieu: You should be ashamed of yourself! I was ashamed of you last night when you made a noise like a crazy guy. You are 74 years old.

Senator Steuart: I have been around legislatures, city councils and parliaments and I have never seen the rules trod on and broken as you people have done. You all stood there like sheep when we were locked out five minutes before the vote. You broke the rules, and you know it. You are the ones who prostituted this institution. Some of our people said they felt badly about how we acted. I did not feel bad about how we acted. I reacted, and will react again, if you try that again, because you do not have the right to do what you did, and you got caught. You are the most inept, thickheaded group of people I have ever seen here.

● (0030)

The only thing I can think of is that your leadership must be lying to you. I do not believe that you are that bad. I think your leader, Lowell Murray, went out and said, "They are already breaking the new deal." I invite senators opposite to read that to which we all agreed. I invite you to close your mouths and listen and read that deal. What it said is exactly what we agreed to. We did not agree to anything more or anything less. There was nothing in the agreement that said we would go to the top of the order paper.

On the top of the order paper is Presentation of Petitions, followed by Reading of petitions. Then we have Reports of Committees. Further down there is Question Period. It is our right as parliamentarians to speak to those orders of business. Yet you again used the Speaker to try to bulldoze a rule that was wrong.

What did he do? He listened for four hours. He then said, "I am going to need 10 minutes to consider what has been said." He came back into the chamber in 10 minutes with a typewritten sheet in his hand, a sheet which must have taken two or three hours to prepare—

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Senator Steuart, may I be allowed to ask a question?

Senator Steuart: Certainly.

Senator Simard: Before I do, I want to remind you that what you said about Senator Charbonneau is not totally accurate. It is inaccurate and incomplete.

Senator Doody: It is wrong!

Senator Simard: It is true that he listened for four hours, or perhaps more than four hours. What you forget is that from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m. that evening he sat down with the people from the Table to review the arguments that had been made and decided on what the ruling would be. He then came back here, listened to the same crap—the same arguments, I mean—which added nothing to the debate. Then he went away for 10 minutes and came back.

Senator Steuart: To make a decision?

Senator Simard: Yes, because he had prepared his ruling between 6 p.m. and 8 p.m. That is what happened.

Senator Steuart: Senator Flynn probably wrote that thing. Senator Flynn has been your quarterback. I understand that you are paying him. My God, you had better get your money back.

Senator Simard: I bet you wish you had a quarterback like Senator Flynn as Leader of the Opposition. I am telling you, Senator Steuart, I will take Senator Flynn as my quarterback anytime and you can have all your Friths and MacEachens. You can keep them.

Senator Steuart: And you would lose every time.

Senator Simard: We are not going to trade Senator Flynn for any six or twelve from your side.

Senator Olson: How much are you paying him?

Senator Steuart: What was your question? You got so excited you forgot your question.

Senator Simard: With the GST, money is no object.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Simard: Because the GST is important for this country.

Senator Steuart: Tell me something, how much are you paying Senator Flynn; and who is paying him?

Senator Simard: Do you want to know?

Senator Steuart: Yes, please.

Senator Simard: I do not know.

Senator Steuart: That is the first honest statement we have heard today.

Senator Simard: Ask someone else.

Senator Steuart: I will tell you something else. I bet you don't want to know, either.

Senator Olson: He told us it was more than he made before.

Senator Steuart: Every time Senator Murray gets up and looks over at his old mentor, Senator MacEachen, I am always reminded of a little mouse. Senator Murray is the little mouse and Senator MacEachen is the tiger.

Senator Simard: Jealously will get you nowhere.

Senator Steuart: He gets up and he says little words and places that embarrassed grin on his face. Senator MacEachen sits calmly and listens to him. Then he gets up and pounces on the little mouse that is Murray and destroys him every time. But Senator Murray must have some sort of death wish. He cannot resist. He has to take on Senator MacEachen every time.

[Senator Simard.]

As someone said in the newspaper, Senator Murray used to be Senator MacEachen's student. It was stated in that paper that it was thought that Senator MacEachen must have hidden some of the books on him. By God, I think he did. Senator Murray did not take the whole course. He should go back for a refresher course. Someone called senators opposite "the gang that couldn't shoot straight." I will tell you, every time you get up here to shoot us, you shoot yourself in the foot, and it bounces right off and hits Mulroney in the head. You are having a bad time.

Senator Simard: Senator Steuart, you can do better than that.

Senator Steuart: I haven't got warmed up yet.

Senator Doody: We know.

Senator Steuart: In fact, I want to deal strictly with the point under discussion, which is the motion of Senator Murray to move to the Orders of the Day.

Senator Olson: We want to move to Question Period. Is that okay with you guys?

Senator Steuart: Yes, let us talk about the Question Period. Have we not a right to a Question Period? I have questions to ask about our farmers in the west. They are in terrible circumstances. They are in the worst economic situation and they have been in it for 30 or 40 years. Yet we are being denied the right to ask what, if anything, the government is doing and, possibly during that Question Period, make some suggestions.

What about the Rafferty dam? It is a big issue in Saskatchewan. It may be a big joke here in Ottawa, but it is a big issue in Saskatchewan. We cannot get any answers. I am here representing Saskatchewan. Premier Devine is going ahead and building that dam. When I look at both sides of it, I think he has every right to build that dam. I think he did get what he thought was a gentlemen's agreement from Minister de Cotret. However, I think that when he got down here he was told that "if you back away in Saskatchewan we might have to back away from the James Bay." I watched de Cotret's interview outside while he was getting into his car. If I ever saw a man who is not telling the truth, it was de Cotret. We want to ask questions about that, but we are denied that right because you are going to take us from the Reading of Petitions and Question Period right down to the Orders of the Day.

What about the Indians in Saskatchewan? We are all very concerned about the Indians, as we should be. They have been trying to settle their land claims. Some have been settled. They have over a million acres coming to them. They also have money coming to them. This is not something new but something which has been on the books for years. We do not have a right to find out where they stand. We do not have a right to get information from the government to take back to them. They might get that information in the House of Commons, I do not know. That does not mean that we should be denied the right in this House of Parliament to get that information for the people we represent.

There is a war crisis going on. The matter has been brought up before in this place. When are we going to have a discussion about it? If you people have your way, we will never have a discussion about it until next January, February or March, if you ever get the goods and services bill passed.

What about petitions? What is said about petitions? This has been read to you before, but you do not seem to pay any attention to it. It is the right of citizens to petition the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances. It is a fundamental principle of the Constitution. It has been uninterruptedly exercised since very early times. It has a profound affect on determining the main forms of the parliamentary procedure. We are denied that right. Yet senators opposite say, "You have had petitions. You have had lots of petitions." We have over two million of them. Is there some limit on their number? Is there something in the process of parliamentary procedure which was changed while we were not looking, which now says that we can listen to 1,000 and that is the end of it? Then does someone say that the rest can be thrown in a cardboard box to be put in the basement?

In talking about business, I wish that Senator Barootes were here now. I have a number of petitions from business people in Regina who are dead against the GST. They say it will hurt them. One of the people who went and gathered the names on this petition is someone Senator Barootes knows. I refer to Ross Gravely who is a Conservative, or he was. He ran against Mr. Blakeney about two elections ago.

Senator Olson: I bet that Senator Balfour knows him too.

Senator Steuart: Is he still a Conservative? I don't think so.

Senator Balfour: Once a Conservative, always a Conservative.

Senator Steuart: It is that bad. It is life-threatening. It is incurable. There is a cure. Seven years of Mulroney will cure almost anyone from being a Conservative.

Senator Balfour: Is that what happened to the Liberals in Saskatchewan?

Senator Steuart: My right to present petitions before the Parliament of Canada has been taken away as a result of your motion.

Who are the people who signed these petitions? The petitions I have in front of me are signed by people from Regina.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Oliver: That has nothing to do with the point of order.

Senator Olson: Yes, it does. It denies the petitions. That is our problem.

Senator Steuart: Is there a problem?

Senator Olson: Senator Oliver says that it has nothing to do with the subject. He is dead wrong.

Senator Steuart: From your point of view, petitions have nothing to do with anything. You say that the people are ill-informed, that they cannot grasp the issues and that you do not want to hear them. I do not blame you for saying that you do not want to hear them.

Senator Olson: You are going to hear from them at the next election, at any rate.

Senator Balfour: That is what you said before the last one, Bud.

Senator Olson: I did not say that.

Senator Balfour: Yes, you did.

Senator Steuart: I will tell you that as soon as the people get a chance to correct that, you will get the bum's rush. It will be the same even in Quebec. They might not vote for us in some places in Canada, but they certainly are not going to vote for you.

There are pages and pages. These are just petitions from a group of businessmen in Regina. I cannot put them on the Table. You are denying that right.

I have another group from Prince Albert. They wrote an interesting petition. It is called "Contract." They have them numbered, and this is 1005. Just see what they want you people to hear, but that you are refusing to hear. The words of the petition are their words, not mine. I would never use rash words like that.

> "The GST is threatening to murder the economy of Canada and maim the lifestyle of all of its citizens. I, the undersigned, hereby put out a contract on the life of the GST. It must be stopped, forever buried deep beneath Parliament Hill. The pay-off for the death of GST will be the deep gratitude of all Canadians and the survival of thousands of Canadian businesses. The GST must die."

(Names of signatories read)

Many of these people are from the province that was the home of John Diefenbaker. Do you think John Diefenbaker would stand up for their rights to petition Parliament, either house of Parliament?

(Names of signatories read)

As I say, there are 1,005 names. I have brought just a few, and I will not try to impress you with all of them; but we still want the right to be able to read the names and put them on the record.

Here we have businessmen from Regina, businessmen from Prince Albert, and ordinary petitioners from all over Saskatchewan.

(Names of signatories read)

Canoe Lake, Saskatchewan. I have been in Canoe Lake. I made a speech there. Half of Canoe Lake is an Indian settlement and the other half is a Métis settlement. I went up there and made a speech at one time, and the chief interpreted it for me.

The biggest thing they were complaining about was the fact that every Christmas they were allowed to go and hunt on the Coal Lake shooting range. That particular Christmas the federal government had turned them down.

I eventually got in touch with the federal government and it lifted the ban, which was a stupid ban to begin with, and allowed them to go on.

Now, here are other names. It includes a relative of the chief.

I am going to tell you something. We have a senator from Alberta who should be listening to this. The Indian people are outraged. They are going to have to pay this tax. The Indian people do not pay the sales tax in Saskatchewan, but they are going to have to pay this tax. The honourable sanor is shaking his head. Well, you are going to have to check the record. They are going to have to pay this tax, and they don't like that, and they are angry. If you do not change your vote, change your mind. They are going to be awfully disappointed with you.

(Names of signatories read)

There is page after page of them, from Saskatoon, Indian Head, Regina, Saskatchewan, Moose Jaw, from every town and city, large and small, in the province of Saskatchewan.

These are just some of them. Senator Buckwold has them by the boxful in his office. These people took the trouble to sign these petitions, to fill them out and send them in. Why? Because they are disturbed, they are outraged, they say this is a wrong tax, at the wrong time, on the wrong people.

Senator Perrault: By the wrong government.

Senator Steuart: But I find it amusing when senators opposite get up and read them. The Canadian Manufacturers Association and the Chambers of Commerce want the tax. Why would they not want the tax? Of course they want the tax—because they know that someone has to pay to lower the deficit, and if they can put the tax burden on the little people, then they will escape it one more time. That is the unfairness.

I am totally unimpressed when I see big business supporting this tax. The Regina Chamber of Commerce presented the worst brief I ever heard. The Chamber of Commerce of Saskatchewan supported the tax, but in their brief they denounced the tax for five pages. They said it did not fit one criterion of a fair and good tax; and they then had the gall to say at the end, "but we want you to go back down and pass it."

An Hon. Senator: Right.

Senator Steuart: He says "Right." He must be a member of the Chamber of Commerce. I used to be a member. I recognized that when the Chamber of Commerce people went into the meetings they were individually quite bright, honest, and decent people; but they used to hang their brains up with their hats; because they would make decisions in the meetings that they would never stand for individually.

I asked how many members of the Saskatchewan Chamber of Commerce supported the GST and how many opposed it. He could not tell me. Since then I have done a survey, and I am willing to bet that 60 or 70 per cent of their members oppose it.

[Senator Steuart.]

The Saskatchewan Chamber of Commerce is in a great deal of trouble. All kinds of people are cancelling their subscriptions. They are pulling out because they said that those people who came to the meeting in Regina in support of the GST on their behalf and stated that they represented so many thousands of businessmen, didn't have that right. They had not surveyed their membership. They were not speaking for their membership, they were speaking for a few big businesses, and most of the small businesses were dead against it.

But when you see this happening, how can anyone be impressed with the very few people who are supporting the GST?

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: If you will allow me a question. You know, you are a wise politician. You can read. You know the people. I am sure you know what it takes to be a real leader. In other words, look at the business legislation, assess it, discuss it and then make up your own mind. You do not need the advice of the Chamber of Commerce. You know enough to know whether a piece of legislation or a tax measure, what have you, is right or bad. So why do you list all those people? You know what needs to be done for this country. Get over the deficit, put people to work. You may not like all aspects of this legislation, but what have you got to offer?

I know, we all know, that the NDP would like to tax to death, at the 100 per cent rate, all our big corporations, but the problem, I suggest to you, Senator Steuart, is that there are not enough big corporations in Canada, there are not enough millionaires in Canada; and even if they were going to be taxed at the rate of 100 per cent, that would not change the deficit very much. It is a Liberal deficit, I might add, as I was reminded by Senator Doody.

So what do you do, senator? Is it to tax big corporations? Is it to let the deficit zoom? Because, since I have been here, a little more than five years, every time this government has suggested ways, and brought in legislation, to implement cuts to VIA Rail, or cuts to some provinces when it came to equalization—not cuts but frozen payments—you are against that.

• (0050)

You were against taxing pensions for people earning $50,000 or more; so you can't be in favour of reducing expenditures. So what is your solution, if GST is not your solution? Would you let us know before you leave in January, so that some of us can consider that as well? But from what I have heard from you and your colleagues, you are not prepared yet. Are you siding with Mr. Chrétien in his wish and his call for more studies and more committees, to study, and form a committee and so on? Senator MacEachen has proposed that, Mr. Chrétien has proposed that in his day, and Mr. Lalonde did the same thing—and we got the report that Lalonde ordered and had prepared. So what is your solution?

You do not want cuts to anyone, and your bleeding heart is showing every time an attempt is made to control expenditures–and I have mentioned your opposition to any other tax. You have shown opposition and you fought and were led by Senator Hébert in the Liberal Party's fight against the UI system reform. So what are you for? Tell us. Tell us those words of wisdom before you leave, and you will then leave a good legacy. Please go ahead, take the next hour.

Senator Steuart: Could you repeat the question?

Senator Simard: I will try again. The government expenditure reduction program is not acceptable to you, as you have demonstrated to me in the last five years, yet every time the government has proposed a reduction or a freeze, or some control over these expenditures, you have said no. So you must be against any reduction in government expenditures. You obviously are against saving $1.5 billion, roughly, that will result from UI reform. You fought that and delayed that for a year. You were against that; and you were against cuts to VIA Rail. You were against every cut.

So what is your program to bring the finances of Canada under control? Tell us.

Senator Steuart: I would like to deal with the first statement you made. I have been in politics long enough to know that when you look at a piece of legislation you recognize it is good and you vote for it, and you do not need to listen to petitions or go out and hold hearings, which you people are against. Is that honestly the way you governed in New Brunswick? No wonder you were thrown out 100 per cent. No wonder you were thrown out. You did not listen to the people.

Senator Simard: I did not say close your mind. You listen to them, but there comes a time when, having looked at a situation, a government, or a minister, and, I suggest, a senator—

Senator Steuart: You're the judge when the time is up, eh?

Senator Simard: Yes.

Senator Steuart: You never gave a hearing in the House of Commons—

Senator Simard: Chambers of Commerce do not get elected by the people of Canada, and city councils do not get elected by Canadians at large—and each of these interest groups do not get elected; they are not accountable to anyone. Someone has to make the tough decision, and you, being a parliamentarian, you have been in politics, a long time, you have led your party, for a number of years, in Regina, in Saskatchewan, surely your experience should have taught you that at a given time, having listened to people, considered everything, balanced the requests of the various interest groups, you have to make decisions.

So if you are now placed in that position, try to put yourself in the position of Mulroney and the government; try that and still remain loyal to your conscience and the committee, to the good of Canadians at large. That is very much the desire on the part of Canadians to get this deficit under control. What would you do? You might say, "Well, I'm not in that position," but it is also your duty, I believe—

Senator Steuart: Why?

Senator Simard: —to suggest an alternative to this GST. What is yours?

Senator Steuart: Wherever did you the idea that the Opposition's job is to propose alternatives? Occasionally it does. It is not the opposition's job. You people were elected. You were the people who said you were going to draw the budget under control. You are the people who said you would bring the country together. You are the people who said you would bring an end to confrontation. You are the people who said you would bring Quebec into Confederation. You are the people who said you would heal the so-called wounds that Trudeau is said by you to have caused. What did you do? Quebec is worse off than they ever were. They are talking separation and sovereignty association, whatever that means. Every day of the week it is on the rise. The west is alienated.

Senator Simard: No, no, senator. Remember, I am not preaching independence.

Senator Steuart: You have made a mess of Canada.

Senator Simard: Pierre Trudeau said in 1975-76, before the election, that separatism was dead. He said that.

Senator Steuart: Who said what?

Senator Simard: Trudeau said separatism is dead, and within a year we had a separatist government in Quebec. So don't bring Trudeau into it. Stick to taxation, stick to the question I asked you. What would you do if you were elected? You say it is not the role of the Opposition—-

Senator Steuart: I haven't finished.

Senator Simard: I am not finished either. You say your role is not to present alternatives, that it is not the traditional role of the Opposition. Surely the Liberal Party of Canada studied, for all those years, various alternatives to the federal sales tax and couldn't make up its mind when it was in power. So I was hoping that maybe, being in the political purgatory of this country, it would, in opposition, have an alternative. It obviously did not have one when it was in power. I was hoping it would have one in Opposition.

You were telling me I was right, but you yourself—leaving the Liberal Party aside—as a distinguished, about-to-be-retired senator, should give us your words of wisdom and tell us what we should do as Canadian parliamentarians.

Senator Steuart: If I know the economy of the country, I know there ain't no free lunch. But, mind you, that's not very popular in all of Canada.

Senator Simard: That's right.

Senator Steuart: I was a Finance Minister for years. We had a strange idea. We used to call ourselves the Treasury; we were not the Finance Minister. The NDP, when they came, called it the Treasurer, and I tried to figure out what was the difference between a Finance Minister and a Treasurer. I figured the finance minister in the Province of Saskatchewan cost the government about $2 billion more a year than a treasurer used to, because we always balanced the budget. That was considered a proper thing to do until a few years ago.

What would I do? Well, to begin with, let us start at the beginning with this tax. They started something and said that the tax that was there had to go. "It is a terrible tax, just a killer of jobs." I look back and say, yes, there was something wrong with that tax, lots of things wrong with it. But it's an amazing thing. Under that tax, for 30, 40, 50 years, this country saw some of the greatest years of prosperity and we had the second-highest standard of living in the world. We haven't now. Wwe are seventh, or eighth, or ninth. Not every year, but year after year we had a record balance of trade, billions of dollars, and more exports than imports. Our dollar was sometimes higher than the American dollar, sometimes lower.

If it was such a terrible tax, how did we do that? I am not sure that it was such a terrible tax until you people got elected and raised it from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent.

● (0100)

That is when it started to be a terrible tax. Perhaps you could have taken more time to study this tax change before you tried to ram it through. When you started with this tax change, what were you going to do? It was going to be on everything. You were going to reduce the income tax, as they did in New Zealand and other countries, and put this tax on everything. Soon you started to lose your nerve and you took it off food and other things. Then you lowered it to 7 per cent.

Any country that has this tax does not have states or provinces. They have a unitary system of government. That is why the United States has never implemented it. The government knows it would wait 1000 years before it could get the United States ever to agree to meld the tax.

Senator Simard: What is your point?

Senator Steuart: I have not got to that. Just be quiet. Calm yourself. You are young. As you get older and wiser, you will be like I am—more steady, calm and peaceful.

I am giving you the theology, as Senator LeBlanc says, of where you got to where you are—the mess you are in now.

Instead of finding out and making sure that the provinces were going to meld the tax, you said to the provinces, "You can reduce your sales tax. Apply it on everything. It will be on a wider range of goods and services, so you will collect more money with a lower rate of taxation. You will look good. The federal government will collect the tax. We will take the political brunt. We will do the collecting and you will have all the glory." The only province that has taken this so far is Quebec. If you ever get this in—and I pray to God you never will—a lot of provinces will fall in line. I think Atlantic Canada is getting ready also. Once a new government comes into Saskatchewan—if there is a change—they may implement it. When they do, the people will pay more. But you could not wait. There was no rush. If you had done what you said you were going to do and brought in the income tax increase and put it on everything and had a lower rate and got the provinces to agree, you would not have this trouble. But you thought you had to ram it through. Someone said earlier that you could not wait for the income tax deduction. You were in trouble in the last election, so you lowered the income tax and you got elected.

But now you are in such financial trouble that you cannot lower the income tax again. So you are trying to ram this tax through. What would our answer be? We would never have got in this kind of a mess. When we are elected, Mr. Chretien has said he will wipe out that tax. Right now he is studying how to replace it with a tax that is fair and equitable, and that is what we will implement.

Senator Simard: What is a fair and equitable tax, Senator Steuart?

Senator Steuart: It is one that does not put an undue burden on the poor people. It is one that relates to the ability to pay. It is one that treats all regions fairly, unlike this tax. This tax is harder on those regions farther away from the centre, harder on those regions in the north and harder on the poor people. When a sales tax is put on something, the poor people spend a greater percentage of their income on goods and services than the rich people. This is an unfair tax. No one can convince anyone that it is a fair tax. You have not been able to convince 90 per cent of the people that it is a fair tax.

Senator Simard: You would start by exempting a far away region?

Senator Perrault: Equality, for heaven's sake.

Senator Simard: Or you would give exemptions to several categories of taxpayers?

Senator Steuart: We will wipe this out. We will start over again. In the meantime, the tax we have now is not doing too badly. Canada has done well under it for 40 years. It can wait another two years until we get a reasonable and fair increase in taxation. Then we could take a look at the programs and decide what is will be cut. There are a lot of programs that could be cut, but they have to be looked at fairly and reasonably. In this country, we have wasted billions of dollars.

Senator Simard: We are having a good debate here, Senator Steuart. I would like you to be more precise. I had reminded colleagues that every cut or freeze in expenditure that this government has brought in since 1984 has been opposed by senators on the other side of this chamber. You are telling me there are many things to be cut. What expenditures would you cut?

Senator Steuart: You could start off in the Prime Minister's Office and reduce the number of employees. Any Prime Minister would be better off if he took 80 per cent of those little gremlins that are running around trying to advise him and giving him bad advice.

Senator Simard: Would you say that would cut approximately $2 million.

Senator Steuart: Far more than that. When you are the government, you study all the programs and see which ones are bad.

What do you call those people you stuffed in when you did not have the nerve to fire the civil servants? You were elected to government and your party wanted to see blood running in the streets. They wanted to see deputy ministers put on the run out of Ottawa on every train and plane. But when you got in, what happened? You fired Mr. Pitfield. That is all.

Senator Simard: What do you mean, we "fired Mr. Pitfield"?

Senator Steuart: You made it uncomfortable and he left. He was the only one that went. The rest of them you kept. You kept them all and they are still there.

Senator Nurgitz: You guys fired him.

Senator Steuart: I thought perhaps a few bureaucrats would go. I thought we would see a little shakeup here. I thought there would be a little tremor in this great bureaucracy. What did you do? You were afraid to fire anyone because you realized that you did not know anything. Just to make your people feel happy, you hired a bunch of political hacks and said, "We'll put you in right near the top, right next to that deputy minister we really want to fire but do not have the guts to do so. You watch him and you make him act politically." So you added a whole new layer of bureaucracy.

Senator Simard: How much do you think that would cut?

Senator Steuart: It would be many millions. As someone once said, you save a billion here and a billion there and pretty soon you are talking about real money.

Then there are the airplanes. They forget Mulroney and they have to go back to pick him up. There are so many places where expenditures could be cut.

Ross Thatcher used to say, "If I ever get to Ottawa, I would go in there with a meat axe." He was a little indelicate. Perhaps a carving knife would have been more appropriate.

You could hardly wait to get into government to cut all these things. Why didn't you? You would be more popular today if you had. But you failed the people with every promise you made. You promised that you would straighten up the government and make it lean, mean and tough. You did not do it. You just brought in all your pals.

Poor Joe Clark. The Tories waited for years to get in government. They had their noses pressed up against the glass waiting to get into all those goodies. They said, "Those dirty Grits have been at the trough for 20 years and its our turn. We're going to get in the old candy store and we're going to load it." Then Joe Clark got defeated. He did one of the most honest things—politically stupid—that I have ever seen a Prime Minister do. He had 1,000 or 1,500 appointments on his desk and he refused to sign them because he had been defeated. He had the legal right to sign them. Mulroney got his gang to rush out and get every one of those names. They said, "Hey, gang, we'll get this guy." They all showed up in Winnipeg and voted against poor Joe Clark. The Tories said, "We've been waiting all these years to get at the goodies," and Joe Clark slammed the door shut. They were outraged. That is why Joe Clark was defeated. That is why he was run out. That is why you could hardly wait to get at him, because he denied you the trough you had been waiting to get at for years.

It was not as big as you thought, because the Liberals were very honest and had very little patronage. However, when you got in there, you managed to create a few new patronage appointments. You criticized poor old John Turner because he had put in a few people that Trudeau had asked him to put in. You said that you would never do that. What did Mulroney say? That he did not have to do it. But once he got elected, he did a quick about-turn.

What has Mr. Mulroney's record been since he became Prime Minister? All one may do is look across the floor to see the patronage. In fact, we had to put more chairs in the chamber. That is the first time in the history of Canada that we did not have enough chairs to accommodate new senators. All the senators opposite were patronage appointments. If they think they are not, they are kidding themselves and they are in "cuckoo land." Prime Minister Trudeau was the only Prime Minister ever to appoint people other than Liberals. He appointed Ernest Manning of the Social Credit Party, a great appointment. Senator Duff Roblin was appointed by Trudeau.

An Hon. Senator: Prime Minister Mulroney has appointed Liberals.

Senator Steuart: And lots of them. He simply waved a Senate seat at them and they came over like a shot. Where did their principles go? They have been trampled underfoot. Everyone criticizes the Senate, but if you wave a Senate seat at them, they fly through the air to get it. Who is happy? They are happy and their wives are happy, and everyone else is madder than hell. So do not kid yourself, there are lots of Liberals over there. They are hiding their colours right now. I think that before this debate is finished—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What debate?

Senator Steuart: The debate in which I am engaged. I hope to hear the honourable senator also engage later on in the debate. I am sure that when he hears our great arguments, our cogent, reasoned and steady arguments, his conscience will get the better of him and he will realize what he is doing.

Senator Simard: Senator Steuart, I would like to get you back on track here. You said, that you would list a number of cuts that you would make. I am keeping score and I am up to only about $6 million. Do you not realize that you have to go up to $21 billion, which, as has been forecasted, the GST will bring in?

Senator Perrault: It is supposed to be revenue neutral!

Senator Simard: You will have to keep making your cuts. You are only up to $6 million.

Senator Steuart: We will lower the interest rate. That will take care of billions right away. People will prosper, businesses will open up again, people will get off unemployment insurance, and so on. That is just one move that would save billions. I do not know why Mr. Wilson does not take our advice. We have been sincere and it comes from the heart and the brain. We are doing our best to get you people elected again, but you do not seem to understand. So we know of ways to save a lot of money.

Let me come back to the motion. Senators opposite have tried to force us off petitions, away from Question Period and on to Orders of the Day. Every time they try something like that it backfires. Why do they not just relax and let nature take its course? We would read a few petitions, ask a few questions and then we would get to third reading. At third reading we will introduce some amendments, debate them for a while—

Senator Simard: What is "a while"?

Senator Steuart: A little while. Then the independents would introduce a few amendments, if you will allow them, and if you are democratic. Eventually we will get to the vote. By that time, some of you may have passed away and some of you may have retired. Some of you may even have changed your mind, and you may lose the vote.

Senator Simard: Are you suggesting that we take those chances?

Senator Steuart: When the time comes we will take our chances. First, we have to go to court to see if my friend, Eric Berntson, is legal. I think he is. He is big enough to be legal and big enough to be anything. He is a friend of mine. However, some of you might not be legal, and may have to go. If some of you go, you are in a lot of trouble. You are right down to where you should be, and then we have you.

Senator Simard: Is that your bottom line, to get us?

Senator Steuart: We would love to get you.

Senator Simard: Is that more important than the GST?

Senator Steuart: Getting the GST and getting you at the same time would be like winning a double header. We would be so happy. I am not going to lie to you.

So I suggest that honourable senators opposite relax, that they not break the rules or again drag the Speaker down into the mud. Leave him alone. He is a nice fellow, and I think he wants to do what is right. Every time Senator Murray gets a little uptight he gets the Speaker in trouble. I can imagine what he says, "We got them this time. We have out-foxed old MacEachen." Of course, who has out-foxed whom? When the little mouse squeaks, MacEachen pounces, then you realize that he has got you again. How many times does he have to get you before you realize that he is better than you? I suggest that you follow the deal that you made and that you not break it.

Senator Nurgitz: Tell us again about how the elected should bring in solutions, that we are not supposed to propose alternatives. What does the election have to do with things when you are telling us it does not matter who got elected?

Senator Steuart: The job of the Opposition is to keep you honest. There is very little democracy in the other place. The Prime Minister rules, and if anyone steps out of line he is kicked out of the caucus. So they vote like sheep because if they do not, they will no longer be in the Tory party. The Senate is the last hope in this democracy. I never thought that I would see the Senate as being the last hope for anything. It is the last bastion, the last hope for democracy. Perhaps I should read some of these petitions to enlighten Senators opposite as to what they are missing. Here is one from Rosetown.

There is not a Liberal in Rosetown. It voted Conservative, but I doubt they ever will again. When they were not voting Conservative, they were voting NDP. They voted Liberal once, and it was the happiest four years they had in their life.

Senator Nurgitz: So they never wanted to be that happy again?

Senator Steuart: That is right, they could not stand it. They said that it was really good, that it had never happened to them before. Then they voted NDP, which is a fate worse than death. To tell you the truth, I would sooner have them vote Tory, although I am changing my mind.

Senator Simard: How do you know they voted Tory?

Senator Steuart: We questioned them on the way out. If they knocked us down we marked them "doubtful." Here is another petitioner.

Senator Simard: You are out of order.

Senator Olson: Why?

Senator Simard: We are debating the motion, not petitions.

Senator Steuart: I am not reading petitions. I am trying to let you know the kind of people who would like me to read their petitions, if I were allowed in this democratic process. If we could convince you to defeat this motion, then I could tell you about Janice Frederick of Box 4, 1344 Rosetown, who wants you people to stop the GST.

Senator Deware: You have had lots of time to do that, but you have been filibustering. You have been reading books, talking about dinosaurs and saying all kinds of things, instead of putting those petitions on the Table where they belong.

Senator Steuart: If you give us a second chance we will never make that mistake again. I am not sure that we made a mistake in the first place, but we have learned our lesson. Here is a petitioner from Prince Albert, my old home town and John Diefenbaker's old home town. We used to split the vote. Honestly, whenever we ran in a parade, I always stayed close to John, so that the people who hated me would not throw rocks for fear of hitting John. It was a wonderful thing and I never got hit once.

• (0120)

There is a letter from Prince Albert, Saskatchewan; one from Rosetown, Estlin and Saskatoon. These people are serious. If any of the senators here are from Saskatchewan—and Senator Berntson can tell you—they are in real trouble. The public cannot stand this tax. They hate it. They are afraid of this tax. That is the straw that will break the camel's back out there. I am speaking for Saskatchewan here. When Senator Berntson gets up to speak, I am sure he will back me up.

Before it is over, I think he will support me. I am not sure, but I hope that he will.

Senator Simard: Do not hold your breath!

Senator Steuart: I cannot tell. As I told him, unless we get him in the courts, no one else can get him because he is here forever. He is very young, and he is here for a long time.

Senator Nurgitz: He is a good guy.

Senator Steuart: He is a very nice fellow. In fact, he is almost as nice as Senator Barootes.

I have a letter here from Red Deer, Alberta. They were visiting in Rosetown when they signed the petition. I have another petition from Rosetown, Humboldt, Swift Current, Regina and Moose Jaw. Every part of the province of Saskatchewan wants us to read these petitions and put them on the record to convince you people to change your minds. Open up your hearts and minds. Do not come in here with your mind set like that and say, "We cannot change anything". That would be a terrible mistake for the country and for your own political party. We are suggesting that you listen to us. We are trying to do you a favour.

What about this motion? First, it is out of order. It should never have been put forward. Secondly, it is terribly undemocratic. It is denying us our privileges. We may have to bring up some points of privilege. I hate to think of it, because it may drag things out a bit longer, which we may find abhorrent at the time. I am hoping to get home for Christmas, but we may have to do it. It might be our duty, because you have denied us our privileges. You have tried to walk over us. However, every time you have tried to walk over us it backfires.

I suggest you have a meeting with Senator Murray and say, "Look, you never get anywhere with bulldozing. You cannot bulldoze people".

What about Senator Thériault? He made a great speech. He said that as long as he has breath in his body he will stand up and fight you for trying to break the rule of law in the Senate. Every one of us feels the same way. Before you tried what you did on October 4, we were just 51 or 52 senators. Some of us felt we should fight the bill a little bit. We were not united.

Senator Simard: What is the proportion?

Senator Steuart: With one bulldozing action—that is, breaking the rules and trying to trample over us—you changed us from 52 senators who were going this way and that to a unified team. You now have to recognize that. We are a team. But you are not a team, because most of you have a bad feeling—at least some of you do—about what you did.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You did not show up for the vote.

Senator Simard: You give us the weekend. When you come back, it will be passed! Watch out. I would not go away!

Senator Steuart: I talked about the farmers, but did I talk about the Indians?

Senator Simard: No.

Senator Steuart: I wanted to talk about them because they are very important. They are waiting impatiently for governments—not just the federal government but also the provincial governments—to take some action on their land claims.

In Saskatchewan we do not have the largest Indian population of any province, but we have the largest percentage of Indian population of any province. The largest number of Indian people are located in British Columbia. But we have the largest percentage. When you add to that number the number of Métis, we have an extremely large percentage of aboriginal people in Saskatchewan. We have not dealt with the land claims of the Indian people—that is, the Treaty Indians or the registered Indians. We have not been able to look at the claim of the Métis people. They have a legitimate claim. They are asking for far more than they will probably get, but that is the nature of negotiations. But we have not got around to that. We do not have the right either to petition on their behalf for some action or to ask questions about what is happening. When they phone us and say, "What is happening? Can you make them move? Can you do anything?" We tell them, "Look, they do not even let us get to that point on the Order Paper," but they do not believe us. They cannot believe that we go, day after day, and cannot even ask the government questions and expect answers.

We thought that when we got back here that every few days we would have a chance to make a few petitions and ask some questions. But you have already shown very clearly, yesterday and the day before, that you have no intention of letting us do that. Yet you ask us to act in a parliamentary way and deal with you in a rational and reasonable manner when you refuse to do the same for us.

The purpose of a Speaker and the purpose of rules—and you know this—in any legislature is for the orderly business of the government. That is the only one. The other part of it is to protect the Opposition. You have the majority now. You have more people than we have, so you can get your way when it comes to a vote. The only protection that we have is this rule book and the Speaker. But the Speaker is not on our side anymore. He is putting a uniform on and is playing on your side. So that protection is gone. This rule book means nothing. I do not know if the new members have read it, but if they have read it and they can see what you are doing to it, I am stunned they would not be rising up like we are and demanding that you behave yourselves and follow the rules.

Senator Simard: I have a question, Senator Steuart. The rule book is one thing and the interpretation of the rule book is another thing.

Can you remember, Senator Steuart, over the last five years how many times you, as part of the Liberal majority, overruled decisions of the Speaker, who tried his best to apply the rules and interpret the rules? How many times have you used your majority to overrule the Speaker when his decision did not meet your strategy and did not please you? How many times? Can you tell us?

Senator Steuart: I do not remember. Every now and then you make a mistake and we correct it.

Senator Simard: How many times did you respect the Speaker by overruling him? At least five or six times over the last two or three years.

Senator Steuart: Oh no!

Senator Simard: Oh yes!

Senator Steuart: You are exaggerating. We overruled the Speaker in the Chair when we were in the majority?

Senator Nurgitz: Yes.

Senator Doody: Yes.

Senator Steuart: I find that hard to believe.

Senator Nurgitz: Including Speaker Molgat.

An Hon. Senator: You did not vote it down.

Senator Steuart: You know. Seriously, Senator Molgat? A very fair man?

An Hon. Senator: Yes!

Senator Steuart: We only did it when they were wrong.

Senator Doody: I love it!

Senator Steuart: But you people do it all the time. You never overrule him?

Senator Nurgitz: Only when he is wrong.

Senator Steuart: Well lately he is wrong all the time. Do not try to get out of this. You are breaking the rules. Do not trying to wriggle.

Senator Simard: I thought I had you for a while. I think I still hold you, but you will try to wriggle out of this one!

Senator Steuart: You will find out, senator, that the second thing that goes when you get old is your memory. I cannot remember what the first thing is, but by God that is the second thing. So do not ask me to remember that. Just ask me if we stuck by the rules, and we did. We never held a secret vote. We never locked the door and kept you people out.

Senator Simard: Whenever are you going—

Senator Doody: Where were you?

Senator Steuart: We let you walk in—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What about your kazoo?

Senator Steuart: I did not have a kazoo.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You had your desk lids going, and you made comments about a miserable old bugger. You were more un-parliamentary than the rest of us. Why do you not apologize now and put it on the record?

Senator Steuart: I will tell you something: I will do it again if you people try to trample on me. You do not like it because we stood up for ourselves. We stood up for the rights of Canadians—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: With filthy language!

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Steuart: You are not going to bulldoze us. You are not—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You used insulting language!

Senator Steuart: If I called Senator Barootes something that he is not, I apologize, and I apologized to him.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Good. Let that be on the record!

Senator Steuart: Let me tell you something. I have heard two or three members saying, "We were kind of embarassed about the way that we acted." I was not embarassed. We were fighting a dictatorship. I thought dictatorship was—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You do not fight with low blows in a Parliament!

Senator Steuart: I was not ashamed of what I did then and I am not ashamed of what I am doing now. If you try to bulldoze us again we will do it again, and we will whip you again. Make no mistake, with all your majority.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I am afraid that you will try.

• (0130)

Senator Steuart: You cannot bulldoze Canadians. You will find that out soon. You may be a recent convert to the Tories—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I am not. Do not try to analyse my way of thinking. Try to behave in a parliamentary fashion and set an example.

Senator Steuart: Are you behaving in a parliamentary fashion, screaming from your seat?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You won't listen if I speak quietly.

Senator Perrault: If you want to speak, then get up and speak.

Senator Steuart: Stick to the rule book.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Then let us get to it.

Senator Steuart: Read the rule book and show some spirit. Show some independence. You seem to have all the character. You are a wonderful parliamentarian. You haven't shown it yet. You have buckled every time they try to trample on our rules. Your record is not very long but it is pretty shabby, let me tell you that.

Senator Nurgitz: And you can recognize shabby.

Senator Steuart: Is shabby nice? It is a lot better than what I used to say.

Senator Doody: It is better than what Barootes got. Poor fellow, he is still in shock.

Senator Steuart: He has forgiven me. He tells me that the biggest thing that made him mad is that I said he is little. Compared to me, he is not.

I am just about to wind down, and I know senators opposite will be sorry—

Senator Doody: Relax, Davie, it is only a couple of more months.

Senator Steuart: I might get an extension. I will be asking for one from the Prime Minister.

In closing, I want to say this. Talk to your leader. Your second in command is very reasonable. But Senator Murray has been given all these jobs to do. He has bungled every one of them. He is so determined to get a victory before he goes that he cannot wait. I do not think that he understands people. He needs just a little patience. You people had us on the verge of dispersing all over the place. Then you acted so thick-headed and dictatorial that you welded us into the fighting machine that we are today. We intend to stay that way. Take my advice, which is from the heart; act decently and sensibly, and we will act the same way.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, like my colleagues, I want to protest against this motion which is unconscionable, although I will not be nearly as amusing or as entertaining as the senators on this side of the house who spoke before me.

We have thousands of names on petitions to present, and not only with respect to the GST. There are hundreds of petitions which are arriving in my office every day protesting Bill C-43, the abortion bill. At some point, we will want to get to those petitions. I am sure that senators opposite are also receiving them in their offices. All those petitions will need to be put on the record in this house. We want the opportunity to express the views of those Canadians who have taken the time to sign these petitions and who have organized to make a legitimate protest against a tax they do not want. They protest the government's actions which have been arbitrary, to put it kindly.

I particularly want to protest the use of the Speaker to bully the opposition into abandoning a legitimate right and power which has been established, not only by history and precedent but by the actions this very afternoon of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who said that it was a legitimate right to present these petitions and statements in this chamber. It is this type of bullying tactic that is really upsetting the Canadian people. The more it goes on, the more petitions, the more protests, phone calls and telegrams there are, the more times we hear from increasingly irate Canadians.

Let us remember that the motion is not only forcing the Senate to abandon the reading of petitions in the chamber, but underscores a whole series of events which started on September 25, the first day we came back into the chamber. At that time, members on the other side of the chamber began to filibuster with questions of privilege on committee proceedings. The rules are very clear on that matter You cannot do that. Eventually, the Speaker had to rule that it was all out of order. However, it went on for two days. It used up the time of the house.

What we ought to have done in this chamber very recently was to have a decent retirement celebration for Senator Bielish, who was given the bum's rush out of this place on September 27. Do senators opposite remember what Senator Bielish said to us? She said, "I had planned to make a lengthy speech."

Senator Doody: Then she was ushered out under the pretext of calling for the removal of strangers. The poor lady was not even allowed to finish her speech.

Senator Marsden: Nobody called Senator Bielish a stranger.

Senator Olson: No one did that. That is your own interpretation.

Senator Doody: Some honourable senators did not even rise when she walked out.

Senator Olson: You spirited her out. Tell the truth. You took her out.

Senator Doody: I will not forget it.

Senator Marsden: She was hauled out of the house by her colleagues before she had a chance to say the things that were on her mind.

Only the night before that, I had a talk with Senator Bielish. She described all the things that she intended to do. It is a shame that she was put into that position, no doubt with the same kind of pressure tactics which are being placed on this side of the house.

Senator Bielish went, and even as she was giving her parting speech, the eight additional senators were being bundled up the back stairs and secretly being sworn in. Unlike every other senator who is sworn in at the Table, they were sworn in in secrecy—another tactic to which Canadians object. There was, of course, the use of section 26 under the most extraordinary circumstances. We will eventually see what the courts have to say about that. But we know what the people think about it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: There has already been one judgment of the court, but your leader ignores it.

Senator Marsden: The matter is still before the courts. However, senator, I look forward to your speech, but at the present time I have the floor.

We know that on November 13 we will get back into that discussion. However, I am not concerned about what the courts have done. You know very well, since you must have read the polls, that the Canadian people overwhelmingly disapprove of the government's use of section 26, regardless of what is the eventual judgment of the courts. The people are opposed to it.

On October 4 we had the Speaker's decision to call a vote, a decision which broke the Rules of the Senate, in particular Rule 70. It disregarded the traditions and practices of this chamber. No notice was given other than to a select, few senators. In fact, we do not even know if Senator Waters ever received notice of that vote. Two or three days after it took place we know that he still had not received the notice which was allegedly sent to him. He may never have received it.

Before we come back after a recess, each one of us receives a separate notice that we are to come back. That day, apparently, we could not have any notice at all. The people of Canada understand that.

In addition to the Speaker's decision being illegal in many ways, it was a stupid decision, a dumb decision, a decision that was totally avoidable. In a way, that is the true humiliation for the Speaker in terms of what he has done. Then what happened? After an appropriate protest, we came to an accommodation between the two sides, and it was written into the record of the Debates of the Senate that Speaker Charbonneau was not to reappear and that we would start at the top of the Order Paper after the weekend. Immediately, Senator Murray went out and appeared before the television cameras to say that he would not abide by that. He said that he did not agree with what he had just agreed to. There was one story inside the chamber and another story outside. People noticed that.

Thus, a discredited Speaker has been put back in the Chair, a Speaker who no one trusts. Certainly, no one who lived through the experience of October 4 can trust him.

● (0140)

The practice of the Speaker continues, the rulings continue to be non-neutral, non-impartial. So it is up to the opposition in this chamber to express the views of the people, to read their petitions, to read their letters, and I am glad that Senator Simard this afternoon read a letter from one of the people who had written to him.

The upshot of this, of course, is that some of the senators on the other side mock the people's efforts to protest against a tax they dislike and a government they equally dislike. Senator Simard is particularly virulant in his mockery. He mocks the people who appeared as witnesses in front of the Banking Trade and Commerce Committee all the way across the country, including retired people, senior citizens in Toronto, people who will really suffer a decrease in their quality of life as a result of this tax.

Senator Simard made fun of them. He said it did not matter. He made fun of people who tried to protect them. He mocks the citizens and he mocks the Senators. We have just seen ago that being done a few minutes to Senator Steuart as he was speaking. Senator Steuart doesn't mind, but the people do mind it.

I am sorry Senator Simard is not here, because he asked a question of Senator Stewart: What are the alternatives to the GST? Llet me suggest what some of the alternatives are, because of course there are alternatives which are suggested in the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. There are a whole bundle of them suggested in there, with their strengths and weaknesses reviewed.

There is no perfect tax, so the question is: How do you get the best possible tax under the circumstances? The first one that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee talks about is the one that Professor Neil Brooks proposed, which was higher personal income taxes. He proposed that the federal sales tax be eliminated and that the revenue from the FST be replaced by a combination of higher personal income tax, income surtaxes, increased corporate income taxes, and some increases in the usual excise taxes, such as alcohol, tobacco and gasoline. He reckoned that this would raise $10.5 billion dollars on personal income surtaxes. All the various features of what would be raised and now are spelled out in that alternative proposal to the GST.

The question raised is whether Professor Brooks underestimates or accurately estimates the amount of revenue that could be raised. But as the committee report pointed out, even if it is technically flawed, the principle of that tax is sound. Also,there are principles in the GST that are simply not sound.

What one is looking for, of course, is a progressive tax system. An income tax is one of the progressive ways of raising tax. There are some people who don't seem to understand the progressive possibilities in income tax, although it was encouraging to see that in the Auditor General's report yesterday, he pointed out that there is no need to accept people who do not accurately report on their income taxes, and that the government could gain a great deal of revenue if it deployed the tax inspectors from National Revenue more efficiently.

Income Tax remains probably the most progressive way of raising taxes in this country. Sales taxes are inherently regressive taxes. Regardless of the kind of tax credits employed, they are very clumsy and difficult to use. Sales taxes are not only regressive, but they are inefficient taxes, a very inefficient means of raising tax compared with personal and corporate income tax systems.

As every Canadian now knows, the government is estimating that they will need 4,000 extra employees who have already been hired at a cost of $200 million or more. That says nothing about all the additional employees that will need to be hired by every municipality, every hospital, every university, every small business, every large business, and many individuals who will have to hire more bookkeepers, more tax accountants, more paper workers in order to cope with the burden of administering this tax. The burden of administering this tax has not begun to be comprehended by a great many people in this country.

Of course, there are major criticisms Brook's proposals for a higher income tax. One of them is that higher income people will leave the country. As other witnesses before the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee pointed out, such as Professors Minz and Wilson, is that if people are rational about calculating their taxes, they will look at the total bill for income and commodity taxes. They will not just look at marginal tax rates. The kind of people who have that kind of choice to leave the country are not the kind of people who would make a simple-minded decision just by looking at marginal tax rates.

Why do they care whether the government replaces the FST with another sales tax or with higher income taxes? The higher taxes, of course, have to be matched against the kinds of benefits, such as health care and many other benefits that Canadians receive from the tax system.

One of the other objections to this Brooks proposal is the discriminatory treatment of savings. This is a very significant criticism of the Brooks tax proposal, that after-tax income can escape further taxation when it is spent on consumption but will be taxed again if it is saved. Fortunately, however, Professors Wilson and Minz have a solution for that one as well in their alternative proposal. So there are reasoned, calculated, well-thought-through alternatives that stem from Professor Brooks' higher income tax proposal.

Then there is Mel Hurtig's proposal for higher corporate income taxes. Mel Hurtig presented a very widely circulated brief, so that whole classes of students are studying Mel Hurtig's brief and analyzing it. Thousands of Canadians are now very well aware, through all of the data he presented, drawn from official sources, the Department of Finance and elsewhere, that the corporate tax rate is not fair, either to corporations or to the Canadian people; furthermore, that the Canadian people are receiving skewed or obscured data about what actually goes on.

So the alternative that Mr. Hurtig presented was that the GST should be rejected in favour of higher corporate income taxes, an increase in the progressivity of the personal income tax system, with more corporate audits, the introduction of inheritance taxes — we are unusual in not having one of those—and so on. An example that Mr. Hurtig used was the metal mining industry, which made profits of $2.355 billion in 1986 and 1987 and paid provincial and federal income taxes at an average rate of only 7.7 per cent. There are other industries, and the data was also presented on these other industries. It shows while the natural resource industries are paying very low rates of taxes, although uneven ones, the financial sector is paying at a much higher rate. The financial sector, of course, is one of the engines of the country at the present time, certainly the part of the country which I represent. So the taxation system is unfair among corporations, and it is certainly unfair to the low-income, or even to the high-income-earning worker who is under a huge burden of income tax while corporations escape.

The criticism is made that Mr. Hurtig's percentage of tax rates are based on book profits rather than taxable income; so when the recalculations are made using the taxable income as the tax base, the average percentage tax rates for '86-87 become 27.8 per cent for the metal mining industry, 29.3 per cent for the petroleum and coal industry, and a still highly unfair 41.1 per cent for the financial sector. So whether you use Mr. Hurtig's original rates or whether you recalculate them on taxable income rates as opposed to book profit rates, you still get a great unfairness in the corporate income tax system. And comparing the corporate tax system with the personal income tax, you see that the burden in this country has been shifted onto the back of the working person and off the corporation.

No one is saying that corporations should bear an unfair burden, but it has to be shared. Well, the advantage of higher corporate tax is, of course, that this can be done through the existing income tax system. You don't have to hire those additional—how many is it?—4,000 employees in the federal government and all the thousands of other employees in the private sector. And this income system is efficient and well-established. So the administration costs connected with this would be significantly lower, and at this point in our history, or probably any point in our history, that's a very important consideration.

So there is a higher corporate income tax proposal that should be considered and has been considered and may be one of the alternatives that Senator Simard doesn't seem to have any imagination about. Then, of course, there is this question that has been raised in the Senate committees before about vacating the sales tax field, and those members of this chamber who have taken the time to read Professor Robin Beaudway's paper on the interprovincial tax transfers will know he makes the argument that the federal government should stay out of the sales tax field because it complicates enormously the tax system. He makes a very well-reasoned argument why the interprovincial transfers, and the paper burden of the interprovincial transfers, and the getting back the rebates on imports will be horrendous and a nightmare for many manufacturers and other people in this country.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance a few years ago presented a report on the financing of post-secondary education, in which it made a proposal which was rejected but which was very consistent with the idea of vacating this field, because, of course, the federal government transfers under EPF large sums of money and cash which are tax points to the provinces, and so the federal government could eliminate the FST, reduce its payments to the provinces by a similar amount and leave the sales tax field to the provinces exclusively. This is a very neat way of dealing with the inequalities of the tax system. It means that much of the burden that the federal government now picks up in terms of health and education, and those costs which are a great burden would be at the level of accountability at the provincial level, and this is highly consistent with the recommendation made by the National Finance committee of the Senate, and it would resolve in many ways this tax conundrum that now faces us. It was similar to a proposal made by the Carter Commission in 1966, and all of that is spelled out.

The problem there is, of course, that the provincial sales tax will suffer from some of the same problems that plague FST, and that would leave the provinces to raise their provincial sales tax, and it would perpetuate the economic inefficiencies that are found in the FST. It would put pressure on some of the governments, such as Alberta and the NWT, to put on retail sales taxes which they don't already have.

I think that most important of all, the disadvantage of vacating this field is that if the federal government reduces its transfers to the provinces, it reduces considerably its ability to redistribute among the various parts of this country the economic resources—and that is unfair, very unfair, to provinces that are suffering temporary or long-term losses and the ability to raise revenues. It would create the worst inequality this country has ever seen, and it already suffers from considerable inequality among provinces, and even within provinces, from one region to another. That puts another burden on the next generation, on the children, on their parents, on the education system, and on the health system. It is highly inequitable.

Another of the alternatives Senator Simard might consider is moving the FST to the wholesale level. The FST is levied at the manufacturers' level, with some exceptions. So what one would do here is just move the point of tax to the wholesale level for all commodities. It would be imposed on the sales to the retailer, whoever made the sale.

One of the great advantages is that what now exists, the preferential treatment of imports over domestic goods, could be considerably reduced, and much of the expense associated with the distribution and promotion of imports, which escapes taxation under the current system, would be included in the tax base. When taxing the sales at the retailer, there would be less incentive to hive off market and distribution operations from other activities, and the tax would avoid entering the same tax field as the provinces, which would relieve the country of this compliance problem of the two-tier sales tax system.

The Carter Commission said that if this proposal were undertaken it would be no more costly to operate than the existing FST. There would be an increase in the number of tax filers, but there would be fewer evaluation problems than under a federal sales tax, where a minority of goods is passed through independent wholesalers.

As with every other proposal, there are disadvantages. Some retailers buy directly from manufacturers, whether domestic or foreign. The retailer then picks up the costs of marketing and distribution, and they don't constitute part of the taxable base. So if goods were sold through large retail chains, they might bear a lower rate of tax than those distributed by independent stores. This is a very major problem which could not necessarily be resolved. There are other problems with this tax. It doesn't solve the problem of taxing business imports, especially capital, and there are a number of tax evading in other provinces associated with that. There would still be all kinds of difficulties in evaluation.

So that is a proposal, a proposal examined in 1966. It is a proposal with a lot of disadvantages, but it is an alternative, and Senator Simard is very anxious to hear alternatives.

There is also the question of the retail sales tax—single-stage tax imposed at the point of sale and user; and if that is going to happen, business purchases would, of course, have to be exempted, and sales to the consumer and other trade levels would have to be included in the tax base. This has a number of advantages. Nine out of ten provinces operate a retail sales tax, so businesses have a lot of experience in using them, businesses which don't have experience in using a value-added tax and a two-tier tax system. No one has any experience in that except the Brazilians, and they are not a model.

● (0200)

If a number of conditions could be satisfied, this would be an attractive tax. If you go back to the original documents which the Minister of Finance tabled in 1987, this comes closer to his preferred proposal at that time than the proposal that was finally put in front of Parliament and which is in front of the Senate now. However, it also has many disadvantages. It suffers from tax cascading, where purchases are made at the retail level without an exemption and are used for production of other taxable goods or services. The tax may be embedded in the final price of goods or services that are not taxed directly, and exports are not totally tax free under a retail sales tax system. There is also a problem in taxing services because of the mixed use to which services are put. There is a problem in taxing services no matter how you go about it, as everyone who is involved with the consideration of the current proposal knows.

Then there is the question of the personal expenditure tax. There are a number of varieties of this tax. This tax represents one of the interesting proposals. It is a consumption tax calculated either by summing the expenditure on each purchase or by subtracting savings from income and then taxing the balance. This has the advantage, of course, of encouraging savings. These have all been worked out. The individual's tax liability can be calculated and tax paid directly through the already existing income tax system, which Canadians are familiar with and, with some reassurances, most Canadians trust and know how to use. The existing income tax system already deducts some forms of savings such as registered savings plans. So we already have a partial expenditure tax under way. If we had a full-fledged expenditure tax we would effectively register all income savings and borrowings, tax the sum of borrowing on income less the amount of savings.

There is a simplified version of the consumption tax, called a simplified consumption tax. If you had a 6 per cent simplified consumption tax you would yield approximately the same revenue as the existing federal sales tax. You would take away that unfair burden and you would not add to administrative costs. The advantage of the simplified consumption tax is that it can be made progressive throughout the full income range simply by raising the rate on taxable consumption above a certain threshold. This is a great advantage in a society where sharing the burden used to be one of the bases of the social contract, and still is in the minds of the majority of citizens in this country. It totally eliminates any compliance cost for business since the tax would not be applied on sales. This makes it a superior tax to any indirect consumption tax.

The administration cost is considerably less than that of the retail sales tax. It would operate through the income tax system. All those additional employees pushing paper and doing bookkeeping would no longer be needed.

The personal expenditure tax has all the advantages of eliminating the existing FST, and there would be a minimal additional compliance cost because you simply change the personal income tax. It would not have an unfavourable impact on the tourism balance of payments, and you cannot avoid the tax by travelling abroad which is exactly what millions of Canadians will be doing under the GST. The lineups at the border to the U.S. continue to grow as thousands of Canadians continue to do their shopping in the U.S., pay the duty and still come out ahead of where they are now and certainly way ahead of where they will be under the GST. One of the advantages of the personal expenditure tax is that it prevents Canadians from thinking up ways in which they can engage in tax avoidance. Given the fragile nature of civil order in this or any other country, that is a highly significant advantage.

There are always disadvantages. This one, too, has disadvantages. There is very little international experience with a personal expenditure tax. The question arises: How do you register all borrowings, savings and purchases of durable goods that are going to be included in the tax base? Some scheme would have to be thought out for that, and the authors of the proposal think there are simple ways of doing that. It is true that we have not seen it enacted, but nor have we ever seen a value-added tax imposed successfully in a two-stage or two-tier tax system, as we have in this country.

Another proposal—and this is not the limit of all the proposals—is the turnover or cascading tax, a multistage sales tax. This is similar to VAT, except that you do not have to go through the burden of getting credits for purchased inputs. The turnover tax is applied on sales at every stage of production and distribution of goods and services. Tax is compounded on tax at each stage of the production and distribution chain, although some countries that have done this have exempted certain goods or taxed these at a lower rate. This tax is relatively easy for businesses to operate since firms do not have to keep track of their input tax credits. Therefore, of course, administration costs are cut.

The disadvantages are that the amount of tax contained in a product varies according to the number of transactions in the production distribution chain, which depends on the organizational structure of the firm. If you have an integrated firm you attract less tax than if you have a non-integrated firm. This leads to problems in pricing and fairness of the tax. It would put a burden on Canadian firms to integrate, which may or may not be desirable. In some cases it certainly would not be desirable.

The rate of tax on similar goods could vary according to the organizational structure of production and distribution. That raises other problems of fairness. The compensation for that is not easily worked out except through subsidy.

Then there is the business transfer tax, yet another alternative that Senator Simard might be interested in. In contrast to the GST, the business transfer tax would not require separate invoicing of the tax. The total tax owed is calculated from the information already contained in company accounts. At the end of the period the firm simply calculates its tax base by totalling its gross receipts from taxable sales and subtracting its allowable purchases. Then you apply the appropriate tax rate to the calculated tax base. That is attractive because it does not require separate invoicing of taxable sales and purchases. Firms are able to extract from existing company accounts the information necessary to calculate the tax and so it is easier and less costly for firms to comply with than the GST, which is a very important consideration. The GST is putting firms—large and small—out of business all over this country. Even the threat of it is putting some of them out of business.

The business transfer tax is much easier to comply with than the GST because it would apply on a comprehensive base and there are very few exceptions. In fact, there really do not need to be any exemptions, although some countries exempt food and that could continue.

Since the tax is applied on an aggregate basis, firms would probably include the business transfer tax and their prices and apply the provincial sales tax at the point of sale. It would not show the tax separately on the sale's invoice and, therefore, you would not have to change the cash registers. If the tax were applied at a single rate on a comprehensive base, it would achieve all the benefits from removing the existing sales tax, such as eliminating the tax cascading and removing the tax on business inputs and exports as well as the preferential treatment of imports.

• (0210)

What are the disadvantages? Well, it does not employ separate tax invoicing, so the audit trail is less reliable than the GST—meaning that the business transfer tax would be subject to more tax evasion and avoidance. However, if it encourages firms to price on a tax-inclusive basis, the business transfer tax would be less visible. That is the situation we are in now—everyone knows that we pay the tax, so I do not see what difference that makes. It would require government to have a single rate with no exemptions, and this seems to be difficult to do, at least for this government.

Then, of course, we have the proposal for a single tax made by Dennis Mills, the member for Broadview-Greenwood. His tax is now widely supported and understood across the country. It is a flat tax imposed on personal incomes at 25 per cent marginal rate.

The great attraction of the single tax is its progressivity. The income tax system is maintained or enhanced, and there are large personal exemptions in his scheme and tax credits for families with children. We all know that some of the poorest people in this country come from families with children.

You could broaden the tax base by including 100 per cent of capital gains, except for principle residence, and by eliminating the dividend tax credit. There are various ways in which you could integrate by allowing corporations to deduct from income otherwise taxable any dividends paid to Canadian residents.

There are various other features to this scheme. Of course, the overwhelming attraction of the single tax proposal is its simplicity and its very broad base. It is a tax that people can understand. Nobody can understand the GST, but the single tax is applied on all forms of income, and its exemptions are well known, well understood and well defined, and every Canadian would know what they were dealing with.

The marginal tax rate would be lower for a great many taxpayers. Presumably that would make it more attractive to comply with, which in itself might induce people, who do not work an extra day because they have to pay so much tax on what they earn, to become greater producers in our economy. There is evidence to suggest that there are supply-side gains from such marginal tax rate decreases. This is not a regressive tax like the GST, and therefore it would gain the support of many Canadians who want fairer taxes and who are protesting the GST because of its regressivity. As well, because the tax's incentive to induce distortions would be reduced, economic efficiency would be improved. So you would have long-term improvements and real impact, both for individuals and for governments.

Compliance would increase under the single tax and we would have less of an underground economy than we have now, and are about to get if the GST is passed. The marginal rate reduction is not enormous; so would it be a significant source of federal revenue? Of course, that is an empirical question. If there is no large recovery from the underground economy—and because it is underground no one can judge that very accurately—one has to induce economic growth, and so you need an increase in the tax base of perhaps 10 to 15 per cent of the GDP over and above the present growth projection. Of course, the demographic review carried out by Health and Welfare Canada already recommends means of increasing the GDP by 20 per cent through two fairly straightforward measures: first, pulling into the Canadian workforce the same proportion of women who were in the Swedish workforce in 1985, which alone is calculated to increase the Canadian GDP by 10 per cent; second, eliminating discrimination against women and minorities, which according to analysis of the demographic review would increase the GDP by another 10 per cent. That is a total of 20 per cent by those two measures alone. So what may be seen as a weakness of the single tax is not really a weakness at all, and it is fairly easily dealt with.

The problem of unincorporated businesses is one that would have to be dealt with under the single tax, and the question of single tax, of course, reduces some of the policy steering effects that governments bring about by using cash tools to induce people to do one thing or another. This would have to be replaced with direct funding where necessary, which is not an insuperable barrier.

There is another alternative, the U.S. alternative minimum tax. One of the most puzzling aspects of the government's proposal is that it is imposing a tax which is not being considered in any serious way in the United States, our biggest trading partner and the part of the world from which we expect to gain the most in visitors, tourists and trade. So why would we not look seriously at the minimum corporate tax that is in use in the United States? It is claimed that it would raise as much as $2 billion per year in Canada. U.S. corporations, as members of this chamber will know, pay corporate income tax in the normal manner. On top of that they calculate a tentative minimum tax levied at the rate of 20 per cent of alternative minimum taxable income. If the tentative minimum tax exceeds the regular tax, the difference between the two is the alternative minimum tax. It limits the range of tax preferences that corporations use to reduce permanently or defer temporarily their tax liabilities. It was designed to ensure that corporations with economic income did not avoid paying any tax in those years. It certainly has some attractions in the current Canadian tax environment, as Mel Hurtig pointed out.

The amount of minimum tax paid is allowed as a credit against usual income tax in other years, if that alternative minimum tax is due to restrictions on preferences which defer tax liability. So what that tax does in some ways is change the timing of income taxes paid but not necessarily the total amount of taxes paid. It limits the ability of corporations to reduce permanently the tax liability by using tax preferences.

Before Senator Simard rises to his feet again and asks what the alternatives are, I wonder if he would like to consider that there are some alternatives, some very interesting and fair alternatives, some alternatives that are not as regressive as the GST and certainly not as expensive to administer. There are alternatives that are not as complicated, that can be understood by the majority of taxpayers, that do not increase the underground economy, that do not induce Canadian citizens to engage in tax avoidance and so on.

To come back to the question of the current motion, which is to prevent the reading of petitions, senators will have heard Senator Stewart suggest yesterday afternoon, in his usual generous way, the problem senators on the other side are having in not understanding the provisional rules that have been established in the Senate because they have not been explained to them. I do not entirely share his generous view of what is going on with respect to this matter and to petitions.

I think that one of the reasons the government side of this chamber is so desperately anxious to stop the reading of these petitions into the record is that they are tormented by the names of individual citizens who have gone to the trouble of signing petitions to let the government know how angry and upset they are and how rejecting they are of this proposed tax; of the use of Section 26; and of the whole variety of bullying tactics that have been used to try to tax every service that they use, every good that they buy, every breath that they draw. Perhaps it makes people on the other side squirm to hear the variety of people whose names are on these petitions: people from every one of the communities that live within Canada; people from all parts of the economy; people from every region of the country; young people, old people and middle-aged people—hundreds of thousands of people who have gone to the trouble to find a petition to sign in the hope that senators on the other side would listen to them and take into account their point of view.

Of course, it is probably true that the majority of Canadians do not understand the intricacies of the rules of the Senate. Indeed, it seems that some senators do not understand the rules of this chamber. But Canadians do understand the terrible mistake that was made on October 4 by Speaker Charbonneau and they understand how unfair, arbitrary, inappropriate, foolish and unjust that decision was. Furthermore, they understand how necessary it is to protest that kind of behaviour. They may not understand the details of it, but they understand the spirit of it.

Canadians who are writing, calling and talking to senators here are revolted by this departure from the rule of law, because every Canadian understands and has direct experience of impartiality or the lack of impartiality. Every child who plays baseball relies on an impartial umpire, and every student who studies history or politics understands the importance of having impartial institutions, courts, agencies and speakers in which one can have some kind of faith and confidence. They understand the breakdown that occurs when that is not obtained, and how necessary it is to restore the faith and confidence of any institution, any social, political or economic institution, if it is to operate. One of the reasons that people protest the GST so widely is that they believe it will contribute to a breakdown of civil order in this way.

Certainly, students look at the history of the United Nations and its existence as a major international agency which plays a role of impartiality or balance. Canadians have been reading in the newspapers in the last couple of days about how the balance in the Security Council is changed as we lose our seat and someone else takes over, and what all that means and how it operates in light of the delicate situation in the Gulf and the necessity for negotiating peace.

Everyone knows what happened to the League of Nations and how easily it was destroyed by bullies and tyrants, who not only destroyed civilian rule and justice but also practised their butchery on the people of Ethiopia. Then, in that infamous moment in history, the League did not operate.

So the students in high school and university certainly understand what is going on in this chamber. They certainly understand the nature of the Speaker's decision. They certainly understand that a tax is being imposed through closure and time allocation on the other side and through a whole series of manoeuvres equally distasteful and unfair here. Even if they do not understand all that—and the vast majority do—they are still upset and angry. But in fact senators would be amazed at the sophisticated level of the questioning that comes from students. Indeed, Senator Simard's letter, which he read out this afternoon, was from a student who had a sophisticated series of questions. I trust and hope that he will receive straightforward, detailed and fair answers to his questions.

Students certainly understand that what the government wants to do is ram through a tax that will affect them in everything they do. They are especially outraged about the tax on books, periodicals and scholarly journals, materials that all students, and many other citizens, have to use in almost everything they do. They cannot escape using those things.

Students are focusing on the question of books. They find the tax on books, on reading and on periodicals infuriating; and they are angry about that. But now the government says that not only does that tax have to go through but also their voices cannot be heard and their petitions cannot be read. We have heard a most extraordinary series of statements today. Some senators have said, "So what? It does not matter whether the citizens are heard from." Of course it matters. It matters very much indeed. They should be, in one way or another—and of course they will be heard from.

Senator Murray said the most mystifying thing. He said that some of these petitions are in public places. Senator Murray seems to be saying that signing a petition is a private matter and should be done only in the privacy of one's home. One of the great freedoms of the country is that you can sign these petitions. You can sign your name, address and phone number and say that you do not like what the government is doing. Indeed, some of the petitions that we heard earlier were from members of the Order of Canada from vice chancellors of universities and a whole variety of citizens who were perfectly happy to be counted publicly on petitions against this tax.

The people of this country are begging for an opportunity to express their views. Senators on this side are being asked over and over again, "What can we do? Would it be useful if we of marched on Parliament Hill? What can we say to our MP?" Of course, what the citizens of this country would like the best is a chance to express their views through an election. They certainly should have a chance to express their views through an election before they are taxed out of existence, as this government is promising to do.

In the view of many of us, petitions are the best deal the government side of this chamber will get. They are quiet, orderly, civilized and are individual expressions. In my opinion, the conservatives and the government should be greatful that Canadian citizens are so peaceful and willing to express their views in such a moderate way and are lucky that they are not living in some other countries, where the people would use much more direct and uncivil methods to protect themselves against this tax.

● (0230)

We are enraged by this bullying tactic that prevents those of us who have received petitions from reflecting the wishes of the petitioners. They are simply having their voices dampened.

There are hundreds of petitions here in front of me from students of the University of Toronto. In fact, four representatives of the Students Administrative Council from the University of Toronto came to Ottawa last Thursday to deliver these petitions in person. However, they only delivered them to the Senate after they had tried to see the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson.

Mr. Wilson happens to be a graduate of Trinity College at the University of Toronto. The students at the University of Toronto wrote to him as an alumnus of the university and said they would be willing to see him at any time and at any place that he found convenient. Mr. Wilson said that there was no time and no place that would be convenient for him to see the students from the university from which he graduated, students who represent 37,000 undergraduate students alone. They represent, of course, a great many others as well.

The students placed in the Sidney Smith Building at the University of Toronto an unattended pile of petitions. No one was there hawking them. No one was there coercing or even inducing people to sign them. If you had entered the lobby of the Sidney Smith Building at any time over the last two weeks you would have seen people making their way across that very large campus to sign these petitions because they wanted the opportunity to protest in this way. One thousand signatures were collected in about eight working days at the university. The students were still unable to see Mr. Wilson. They are very reasonable, well considered people who understand the complexity of government. Many of them are members of the Conservative Club, and active members of Mr. Wilson's party. However, they are outraged by this tax. They are totally unwilling to accept it. They regard it as a regressive consumption tax which places a tremendous burden on taxpayers in Canada.

They list some of the items that were previously untaxed and which will now cost more. I refer to their residence fees. The cost of living in Toronto is outrageous anyway, and now their residence fees will be taxed, as will their transit fares and locker rentals. Above all, they mentioned this tax being imposed on books and periodicals. As they point out, for the first time in Canadian history literacy nationwide and education are being taxed. The students look at it from their own personal point of view in terms of what they will have to pay. They are not looking at it from the point of view of administrators of universities.

I was contacted this week by the Canadian Association of University Business Officers who are very unhappy not only about the legislation but also about the attitude taken by the Department of National Revenue as they attempt to try to prepare for this legislation. They are looking for changes or relief. Many, although not all of them, would like to see this whole GST proposal thrown out.

Last Thursday, these students came to see Mr. Wilson. They brought with them a Mr. Popyk, who is one of the leading students at Trinity College. These students were the most bright and reasonable people you could ever hope to find, but Mr. Wilson absolutely refused to meet with them. Having been fobbed off on one of his assistants who could not answer their questions and who really did not understand very well what it was all about, they came over to the Senate with their petitions and asked senators to read the names of these students into the record. They showed that they care and that they wanted the chance for undergraduates of the country's largest university to have the opportunity to have their voices heard. Since a graduate of their own university had refused to hear them, they were trying the other means available to them.

As it turned out, Mr. Wilson could not see these people. But he did turn up outside the Senate at the moment the vote was taken in order to take advantage of the electronic throne to deliver his wisdom. Of course, the students were able to catch him there and he said, and I was there to hear it, that of course probably the government would want to remove the tax on books and periodicals, but not now. He said that, first, it wants to tax the students, put the publishers out of business, create enormous and hostile complications with foreign publishers at the border, engage in a labyrinth of complexities in the administration of this ill-conceived, ill-considered tax, and then maybe, when everybody was out of business, he would cut the tax. When every faculty member has adjusted their reading list so that students can afford to have the books they are required to have, and when the cost of government publications from Statistics Canada has been raised once again, then, maybe, Mr. Wilson allowed, the government would consider cutting this tax. That relief is not enough. It is not satisfying to the students, nor I am sure, to anyone else in this chamber. It is piffle. It is waffling. It is bullying. It is simply not the way to treat Canadians.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: I rise on a point of order, honourable senators. I think what Senator Marsden is doing is trying to do indirectly what she cannot do directly. After all, we are discussing the motion of Senator Doody. The object of the motion is to take senators opposite away form the reading of petitions.

Senator Cogger: It is not easy to fill up an hour and a half.

Senator Simard: As my colleague Senator Cogger has said, it is not easy to fill up an hour and a half or two hours. You will have to be more creative than you have been for the last ten minutes.

It is always a pleasure to listen to Senator Marsden. However, before she reverted to the reading of names, she was talking about the substance of the bill and some possible amendments to it. At that time I was ready to jump in and invite her to support the motion in order to get to the study of the bill. On both counts, however, I think the senator was slightly off track. I am inviting her to come back to the motion without referring to a list of names. It seems that Senator Perrault is patiently awaiting his turn—

Senator Perrault: No, I am not.

Senator Simard: Perhaps Senator Marsden would like to yield the floor and offer it to Senator Perrault.

Senator Perrault: I have just a few petitions.

Senator Simard: I am sorry if I cut you short, but please come back and obey the rules.

• (0240)

Senator Olson: I rise on the point of order that has just been raised by Senator Simard. It is typical, of course, of Senator Simard to try to interfere when people are making speeches. His point of order is that—

Senator Simard: But the speech has to be on the motion.

Senator Olson: According to your interpretation. I have heard Senator Marsden speak many times about why she objects to this motion being passed. She is doing what every good senator, every good Member of Parliament, ought to do—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: —and that is explain why this motion is a violation of the right of the Canadian people to petition this government, petition this Parliament. Surely you can get that through your head.

It is absolutely amazing, honourable senators, every senator who has got up on this side has tried to explain to you—

An Hon. Senator: You are like a broken record!

Senator Olson: —that you would trample on the rights of the Canadian people to petition Parliament by passing this motion. So Senator Marsden is trying to persuade you that you should vote against this motion. That is a perfectly legitimate thing for her to do. She does not have to be concerned with whether Senator Simard agrees with the way she has constructed her speech. The point of order is really a very false one. I am rather glad you raised it, though, because it gives us an opportunity to refer, again, to this disgraceful motion that tramples on the rights of the people. You are even going to trample over Question Period again.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, no!

Senator Olson: Senator Doody's motion, is that we go from Item No. 1 under Order of Business to Item No. 7. So all those items in between get washed out. It is terrible.

An Hon. Senator: Incredible! Absolutely awful!

An Hon. Senator: It is a shocker!

Senator Olson: Yes. I just wanted to point that out again. It seems like those opposite forget every few minutes what it is that we are doing here. You are slow learners. Senator Marsden has been trying to make a speech explaining to you, Senator Simard, why she objects to this motion. She has stated why over and over again.

So why do you get up on a point of order? You may not know it, but you do not have the right to interrupt her speech.

An Hon. Senator: Is this a point of order?

Senator Olson: Yes, it is. I am speaking to the point of order that was raised. I did not raise the point of order. It is terrible. You do not have the right to dictate to Senator Marsden what she puts in her speeches.

Senator Simard: You told us something yesterday, during the day. I must tell you, you are a much better player during the day than you are at night. I suggest that you talk to your Whip to make sure that you get reassigned to the daytime. Leave us alone here at night. Go and have a good sleep.

Senator Olson: The point I want to make is the same point Senator Marsden is trying to make, that you do not have any business raising a point of order on the content of her speech.

Senator Simard: The honourable senator is trampling on my rights now. I have every right to rise on a point of order. I have two points of order. You were reading a petition and you were trying, through the back door, to discuss the nature and substance of the bill, which should be discussed during third reading.

Senator Olson: Wrong again!

Senator Simard: There are two points of order in one, so you can have two for one.

Senator Olson: Well, I hope, Senator Simard, that you will raise a point of order every two or three hours. Every time you raise one you run the risk of getting 51 more speeches on it. I am sure that some of my colleagues will want to defend Senator Marsden's right to explain why she is against this motion. That is what this exercise is all about.

An Hon. Senator: You do not know that she is against the motion.

Senator Olson: Yes, she is against the motion. I hope Senator Simard will look in the red book that has the rules in it. Then you have to read Beauchesne, and Erskine-May, and you have to read several other authorities on the rule of relevancy.

The rule of relevancy is very simple. It says that you are supposed to discuss things. Senator Simard was trying to accuse Senator Marsden of being irrelevant. He then goes on to say, "Look, this is the way I want you to make your speech." You must make your speech according to the rules of Senator Simard.

You do not have that right. You do not have the right to tell her what she can put in her speech. She is against this motion. That is clear. She was giving the reasons why she is against this motion. She is not agreeing that she is out of order.

An Hon. Senator: That's what she said!

Senator Olson: Did she? Well, maybe we should hear from Senator Marsden. Did you that say you were out of order?

Senator Marsden: Well, of course, I am just delighted at Senator Simard's interruption, because he has made my point. My point is that every time you read the name of a citizen of this country who protests against what is going on here, it makes Senator Simard squirm. He cannot stand hearing the names. He is tormented by the fact that hundreds of thousands of Canadians are supporting this side of the chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Marsden: Let me finish.

Senator Simard: Do not accuse me of the same thing your colleague accused me of.

Senator Marsden: All you have to do, if the honourable senator will sit down for a while, is to actually read a name like Samuel Lopez or Shirley Young or Chris Martin or any other. He cannot stand hearing names. He has been tormented by the fact that hundreds of thousands of Canadians are supporting—

● (0250)

Senator Simard: Your are constructing my speech.

Senator Marsden: —this side of the chamber.

Senator Simard: You are guilty of the same thing your colleague accused me of.

Senator Marsden: All you have to do—if you would sit down for awhile—is read a name like Samuel Lopez or Shirley Young or Chris Martin—

Senator Olson: Point of order. I wonder if Senator Simard would withdraw his point of order now. That would be the decent thing to do, to get up, apologize, and say, "I am sorry, I did not have the right to dictate to Senator Marsden what she should put in her speeches. If you are not willing to do that, we have a few other people who want to defend Senator Marsden's right to make her own speeches.

Senator Simard: I will answer your question. You are not sitting down. We do not know if you are seeking the floor or not, you are half standing and half sitting.

I withdraw my point of order, if you will allow me. You have asked, yesterday, this afternoon and now tonight that all this be struck from the record because—

An Hon. Senator: Save a fortune.

Senator Simard: It would save a fortune. Do senators know how much this contract calls for?

This gives me the opportunity to come back to Senator LeBlanc's impartial report on the incremental cost of this all-night sitting. Senator LeBlanc tabled a sheet of paper last week. We went over it and the press has gone over it. We were all very disturbed by it because there were so many caveats to the estimate or "guesstimate", what it would cost to do these 24-hour sittings.

Actually the additional cost of $121,000 arrived at in that report is meaningless. It does not have the costs incurred by the Secretary of State, Supply and Services, and, worst of all, it does not have the printing costs of Hansard, which costs this house $1.5 million a year, for 16,500 pages. We have to assume that Senator LeBlanc has done his homework and has not signed a contract that calls for many thousands of pages in addition to the yearly average. Imagine what Senator Marsden's and Senator Olson's many speeches will cost. I predict that this fiscal year, because of the filibustering on the G.S.T. debate that you people have been guilty of since the September 25, and because I think we will go over 21,000 or 22,000 pages, it will cost another $300,000 or $400,000 just for the printing. I have some people working on it. I am waiting for the clerk to give me the average figures, but I assume that they only bargained for a $1.5 million, that they only estimated for 16,000 pages.

An Hon. Senator: Poor guy.

Senator Simard: At the rate we are going now, it may be close to an additional 325,000 for printing alone.

So, Senator Olson, I invite you to make a contribution here by ordering that everything you said earlier today and tonight be struck. You might save $5,000 or $10,000 by this measure.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Be specific!

Senator Simard: I am coming to you.

Senator Kirby: I have been waiting all evening. I am a night person, you understand.

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Simard: You can have the floor.

Senator Olson: Do you decide who gests the floor?

Senator Simard: I will withdraw my point of order if you will do what I asked you to do.

Senator Olson: I just wanted to say, before Senator Kirby takes the floor, that Senator Simard will not withdraw his point of order. You ought to withdraw it, no conditions, because you were completely out of order to raise it in the first place.

You can talk about all the costs you want, but I will bet you that it costs less than one-hundredth of 1 per cent to keep this Parliament going for a few days than it will cost the people of Canada if this iniquitous bill ever gets passed.

You talk about $400,000. Hundreds of millions, indeed, billions of dollars in tax burden will be transferred to the lower-and middle-income people of Canada, and they do not want it to happen.

An Hon. Senator: Is this a ruling?

Senator Olson: No, it is a fact. Senator Simard has asked if we would leave his point of order. He wants to raise points of order but he does not want anybody to argue with him.

Senator Simard: Are you saying that it will cost $400,000 for printing alone?

Senator Olson: It is very little compared to the costs surrounding this bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Simard: When the Liberals were in power $400,000 was peanuts. Millions for Via Rail, peanuts. A million and a half for UI, that is nothing. You guys have not changed. You can change leaders, but you people over there do not change.

Senator Kirby: You are filibustering. Sit down. Let us get on with this debate.

Senator Simard: My next and final comment for awhile is that I am appealing your ruling! You ruled that I was out of order, and I am appealing it!

Senator Kirby: Honourable senators, I want to speak on Senator Simard's two points of order, although it is unclear which is the first and which is the second, and on his concern about Senator Olson speaking better during the day than at night. Some of us think we are better at night than in the day.

Senator Simard: Are you on a point of order?

Senator Kirby: I am responding to your point of order.

An Hon. Senator: He has just withdrawn it.

Senator Kirby: As I understand it, he did not withdraw it.

Senator Simard: Take five, take five.

Senator Kirby: And even if he did withdraw it, I want to speak to him.

An Hon. Senator: He has been waiting a long time.

Senator Kirby: With respect to the issue of the length of Hansard, the number of pages and so on, we on this side were sympathetic to your point of view and, in fact, were trying to cooperate with you. Clearly you have missed the point. Earlier this week, I guess it was on Tuesday, when we were reading in this chamber the names of ordinary, every-day Canadians who are opposed to the GST, we had understood that we were not wasting paper or lengthening Hansard, because we knew very well that those names were not being written into the record. So to accuse us of unnecessarily lengthening Hansard is clearly wrong. We had done everything we could to deal with the subject in a way which would not do that. So I think that you have misunderstood that point.

I must say, I am surprised at your second point. You quoted a number. I think you said $300,000 or $400,000.

• (0300)

That is small compared to the numbers you normally choose when estimating the cost of anything. As someone who travelled across the country with you all summer, by the time we got to Halifax, which was only the fourth stop, Senator Simard was already claiming that the GST committee was going to cost $1 million at that point. In fact, he said it had already cost $1 million.

Senator Simard: No, no, no!

Senator Olson: I heard you say that!

Senator Simard: I stand by my figures!

Senator Kirby: In light of the current economic climate, I am glad to see you are cutting back on the level of exaggeration you put into your costing figures. At least you are learning something.

To return to your original point of order, which was that it is wrong for Senator Marsden to mention the names of Canadians who are opposed to the GST in her speech. The minute you say we cannot mention the names of anyone—whether they are indeed in favour of the GST such as the Canadian Manufacturer's Association, the people on Senator Murray's staff, or whether they are opposed to the GST—you attempt to constrain senators in a way that goes beyond the rules of this place.

Senator Doody: Let Senator Olson continue. He is funnier.

Senator Kirby: Would you like him to get up again? I could ask Senator Steuart to return and we could have a committee meeting! Senator Simard and I always end up discussing these things seriously, as we did for several evenings a couple of weeks ago.

Senator Simard, we must be allowed to express the views of the people who take the time to write us in this chamber; and, if you prefer, it would be just as easy to read letters into the record rather than petitions. I have a stack of several hundred letters from people across the country who have written to me, and I would be delighted to read those into the record. They are letters, not petitions, in case you have any questions, and we have another stack right here.

Senator Simard: Are you still on the point of order?

Senator Kirby: I am on your point of order, which, as I understood it, said that those of us on this side were not entitled to use names. Not only does that violate all of the Senate rules, but it goes against the whole idea that we can reflect the views of our constituents in a way that clearly identifies us with them.

Originally you said you had two points of order; one concerned the names but the second was lost in your opening salvo. I would be delighted to respond to your second point of order, if only you would explain what it was.

Senator Simard: The first point I made, which is the second one I talked about, was the fact that Senator Marsden was trying to do indirectly what we were hoping she would do directly at the proper time. In other words, she was debating the substance of the bill and possible amendments while we are speaking to this motion. I was telling her she was out of order because she should be speaking to the motion. If she wanted to talk about the bill on third reading, she should support Senator Murray's motion.

Senator Kirby: But surely the two are inextricably linked. The motion suggests that we move to debate on the substance of the bill. Surely in responding to that motion one has to be in a position where we can talk about why we do not think we should proceed to deal with the substance of the bill. In so doing, we wind up talking about the bill indirectly. If you have difficulty with the logic of that, we can attempt to clarify it.

MOTION TO CALL ORDERS OF THE DAY—DEBATE CONTINUING

Senator Marsden: Perhaps I can explain what I was doing. I would like to have Senator Simard's attention. For Senator Simard's benefit, I spent most of my speech outlining one of the answers to the questions he had put to Senator Steuart earlier with respect to alternatives. Now that Senator Simard is back, perhaps I should begin again and go through the eight or nine alternatives. It did not arouse the same appreciation as the naming of a few people.

As it turns out, Senator Simard, these are letters.

Senator Simard: They are not petitions?

Senator Marsden: They are letters. We have hundreds of letters from people who are offended by this move to prevent petitions from being read, whereas you seem to have only one. That is best illustrated not by the contents of their letters, but by their names, which represent practically every cultural community that exists in this country. I could go on at great length listing the names of undergraduate students at the University of Toronto—there are thousands more who are lining up to sign petitions, in addition to sending letters—but I should like to raise another point which Senator Olson spoke to a few moments ago: We are not going to have the opportunity to ask questions.

One of the questions that one would have wanted to ask—because this is another offense against the ability of people being heard—are those about employment equity in the public service. The Treasury Board has just issued its report, which shows that aboriginal people, visible minorities and people with disabilities are not receiving the opportunities they are entitled to in the public service. Those of us on this side, and perhaps some on the other side, want to have the opportunity to ask questions of the Leader of the Government with respect to that. I am sure he has some answers and explanations on that report, or I am sure he would be willing to prepare answers and explanations, because it is a commonly shared goal to improve opportunities for people in this country, which we are going to be denied as well. I had forgotten about that until Senator Olson raised it. This motion to move to Orders of the Day is frustrating to those of us who want to ask questions in this house.

I was almost at the end of my speech when Senator Simard interrupted. Of course he is worried about costs. He is inflationary in his own thinking, but this internal contradiction, which is to cut costs, is illustrated in the questions he raised here. The solution to the problem of the costs of long sittings would be for the government to withdraw this tax, which is what 85 per cent of Canadians want, to re-think the kind of tax this country should have, to carefully examine alternatives that experts in the field have put forward, and to re-examine the papers tabled in 1987 which most Canadians thought might lead to a fairer revision of the tax system and which no one seems to be protesting.

People realize that they have to pay tax and that the existing tax system is unfair. They have worked through a whole series of alternatives. We know Senator Simard is very concerned about alternatives. With those alternatives in front of it, not only has the government chosen an alternative tax that is unfair, regressive, hits the wrong people at the wrong time and will cause incredible damage if passed, but it does so in an unfair and bullying way at each stage of the game. This will destroy civil order in institutions. The government seems to be indifferent to the impact the tax will have on creating an underground economy.

If Senator Simard and others are worried about the costs of administering this chamber so that the voices of the people can be heard—starting with the senators on the other side—that this motion should not pass, then the best thing would be for Senator Simard and his colleagues to persuade the government to withdraw this bill. Other governments have done it. It is a perfectly honourable way of proceeding. If that happened, the costs would disappear immediately. We could proceed to other important business and, in fact, reflect what the people of the country are saying. That would be the proper way to proceed. There is a precedent for it; it would be welcomed; and it would even restore some of the popularity the government has lost, which I am sure would be welcomed by senators opposite.

I had hoped we would have received a favourable response. Perhaps the only way to achieve that end would be to read more of the letters that have been received. I am sure the names of the citizens will evoke the same reaction.

The motion in front of us should be rejected. The people who have written and petitioned us have the right to have their names heard and their views reflected in this chamber. It is done with respect to other matters, and it should certainly be done with respect to what is the most crucial matter on the minds of Canadians at the present time. I would urge all senators opposite, having thought it through, to reject the motion in front of us. Of course we will eventually debate this bill, but, in the meantime, Canadians have the right to be heard. Certainly it would be a pleasure to put the thousand names of the University of Toronto undergraduates on the record. I am sure they would be joined by thousands of other undergraduates from other universities across this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: With respect to the motion, why should we move to Orders of the Day rather than reading those petitions when the right of honourable senators in this chamber is to respect the wishes of the Canadian people?

• (0315)

We have been accused on this side of the chamber of being obstructionist, of filibustering, and of causing delays in the proceedings of this chamber. To some degree there has been an effort to delay passage of the GST by this side. I am a part of that delay, but I have no apologies to make and no regrets. This bill, in order to be more palatable and fair to Canadian taxpayers, should be amended, at least.

We on this side of the chamber are following the rules. If Senators do not like the rules of the Senate, then Senators can change those rules and make them more reasonable. We are operating within the rules and bringing messages from the Canadian people to the Senate.

Talking about Senator's rights, our rights were trampled on by the Speaker on October 4. I do not want to see that happen again. Now we are working within the rules of the Senate and are bringing messages to the members of the government in the Senate, and of course we are also bringing a message to the Canadian people.

Someone said earlier in this discussion that Mulroney is not God's gift to the Canadian people, and if he is, that he is only God's gift to 15 per cent of the Canadian people. That is the percentage of the Canadian people who have confidence in this Prime Minister and this government as of today.

During the last general election the government of today received less than 50 per cent of the popular vote — I believe the government received 42 to 45 per cent of the popular vote then. The government did not, even at that time, represent a majority of the Canadian people, and now it is down to representing what we are told is 15 per cent of the Canadian people, or less. So I do not think that honourable senators opposite have the right to say that they represent the Canadian people today.

The people of Canada are telling us what they think should be done as far as the economic situation in Canada is concerned, and as far as the GST legislation is concerned. It is upsetting to me to hear a leader of this country tell us that there will be no changes to any legislation that is proposed by his government; that there will be no amendments to such legislation; that no commas or periods will be changed in the proposed legislation.

We went through that respecting the Meech Lake Accord. We were told there would be no changes to that legislation, and of course, that was defeated. Perhaps, in retrospect, some changes could have been made to make that accord to make it more palatable to the Canadian people, but the government said that that was not possible. The government is doing the same with the GST legislation.

Honourable senators opposite can say that the committee brought in a report without suggesting amendments, but with the government saying there would be no amendments accepted, that the government would have no truck or trade with the Senate, that it would hold no conference, there was little value in bringing forward amendments. If the government had said that it would accept amendments proposed by the Senate, then I think the situation would be entirely different and the Senate, as a whole, would look at this legislation in an entirely different way and, perhaps, make it more palatable to Canadians.

I must admit that, in order to make it fairer to Canadians, many amendments would be required, but I think they should be proposed.

I am not going to now, or at any time in the future, accept this bill as it exists. I believe it is my responsibility and duty to oppose this, to delay it, do whatever I can to stop this from being passed into law.

It was also stated earlier today that the government in the House of Commons used every avenue it could to ram the bill through that chamber. It used closure, time allocation, and so forth, and rammed it through that chamber.

Canadians are not ready to accept that. That is why we are bringing forward these petitions. That is why we are opposed to this motion to move to Orders of the Day. We think it is necessary to bring these messages from the Canadian people to the attention of the government.

I said earlier that we have the constitutional right and moral obligation to look at this bill, and if we really believe it is not good for the Canadian people, to do whatever we can within the rules to stop the bill from becoming law.

It is not reasonable for the Prime Minister of this country, or for Harvie Andre or Otto Jelinek, to travel across this country and tell Canadians that the Senate does not have the right to do what we are doing. That is another lie to the Canadian people. We do have the right, and the Canadian people must realize the we have the moral authority and, in fact, the obligation—

Senator Beaulieu: Then let's vote. If you have that right, let's vote on it. The bill will either be passed or defeated. Why take another month?

Senator Sparrow: You are right!

Senator Beaulieu: I know I am right.

Senator Sparrow: But we will vote on it in our time.

Senator Simard: You have already taken one month. Why take another month?

Senator Sparrow: This will take another two months, not a lifetime.

How ministers of the government can travel across this country trying to sell the GST and make false statements is beyond me. Surely if the bill is good for the Canadian people, it can stand on its own merits. There should be no attempt to muddy the waters by bringing forth falsehoods, as has taken place.

We have every right to do what we are doing, and every right within the rules to do that. I think, in turn, we have a moral obligation to do just that.

We in this country will soon be observing Remembrance Day. On that day we will remember the many people in the world who had their rights trodden upon. The message from Canadians then and now is that they did not and do not want to see their rights trodden upon by other Canadians. Canadians see enough of that all over the world. So, let us think about that. We do not want the rights of senators to be trampled upon, as the Speaker has done in the past.

Senator Murray keeps referring to the need for the GST and the need for a change in the economic climate of this country. He also keeps referring back to what happened in 1981-82. We all know what happened then; but we are talking about today. The Canadian people have some hope in their governments avoiding what took place in 1929, 1935 and 1982. But what Canadians see today are changes that are not for the better.

One would think that this government would have learned lessons from what happened in those days, but it has learned nothing. This government is saying that it will put things back to normal on the backs of the poor and on the backs of the unemployed. That is what this government is doing now, and by bringing in the GST, it is going to cause greater harm.

I wonder why the government cannot tell the Canadian people the merits of this bill, because there must be some. We should get the merits and not confuse the issue with red herrings and outright falsehoods.

The government talked about bringing in the GST at 9 per cent and then said it would be revenue neutral. Then it reduced the rate to 7 per cent and also said it would revenue neutral. That was to make it more palatable to the Canadian people. We now hear that the GST will help offset the deficit. If the tax was revenue neutral at 9 per cent, and if it was also claimed to be revenue neutral at 7 per cent, how can this government now tell us that it will help offset the deficit? If the tax is designed to offset the deficit, why can the government not tell us that? Is that because that would not be palatable to Canadians?

Honourable senators opposite say that those earning less than $30,000 a year will pay less in taxes. I do not know how they can justify those figures. Senator Poitras was going to bring me an answer to that question. I was hoping he could give me some information that I could not get directly from the Department of Finance.

Senator Simard: What motion are you on now?

Senator Sparrow: I am on the motion that is before the House.

Senator Simard: You are not talking on that motion; you are talking on the bill.

Senator Sparrow: I beg your pardon?

Senator Simard: Do you know what you are talking on?

Senator Sparrow: I am talking on the GST and the motion.

Senator Simard: I am asking you to revert back to the motion. I have all kinds of speeches in my desk, as do my colleagues, but we are waiting to deliver those speeches at the appropriate time—that is, when we are on the appropriate Order of the Day.

Senator Sparrow: Do you want to do that now?

Senator Simard: We are now on the motion. I do not have a speech to make on the motion but you should be talking on the motion.

You can say that you are sticking to the rules and that the Speaker made a mockery of the rules three weeks ago—which is unfounded, of course. Senator Marsden had been guilty of breaking the rules as has Senator Olson, but that is an old trick of his.

Senator Robichaud: What are you on now?

Senator Olson: Are you raising a point of order?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: You are not dealing with the business at hand. If you were talking about landing a man on the moon it would be just as relevant to the motion as what you are saying now. Show some respect for the rules.

I know that Senator Kirby will support me on this, or he should. He is an aspiring leader. Whenever he wants to seek the leadership of his party he can come and see me and I will give him a hand, but in the meantime he should show us what he is made of and get his people back on track.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Other than the fact that I understand the concept of "beware of friends bearing gifts", I wonder whether you are just raising a point of order.

● (0330)

Senator Simard: I am just saying that it is an invitation to your colleagues to see the light, and to be reasonable.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: I would like to bring up a matter raised by Senator Simard, which is merely that . . .

Hon. H.A. Olson: Your point of order, is that you want Senator Sparrow to be relevant.

Senator Nurgitz: Yes. So I know that he wants to be relevant and I know that he wants to comply with the rules. So that we all want him to continue and we all want to allow him the opportunity to continue to speak to the motion.

Senator Kirby: Speaking on the point of order, surely the problem is the definition of relevance. Clearly, that is the problem.

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Nurgitz: It is either relevant or it is not relevant. What he said was not relevant.

Senator Kirby: For example, Senator Simard suggested earlier that when Senator Marsden was referring to some of the people who were opposed to the GST and therefore did not want us to take the part of the motion that we are debating, he did not want us to proceed to debate the GST. There was an argument made in a sense that was relevant, and I only point this out to Senator Nurgitz because it seems to me that relevance, like beauty is in the eye of the beholder. Faced with the problem, it seems to me that the speaker is absolutely entitled to define relevance as he sees rather than necessarily defining relevance as either Senator Nurgitz or as Senator Simard sees it.

So that I have difficulty with a point of order in which that subjective judgment of what constitutes relevance is made, not by the Speaker, but by the members opposite. That is my problem.

Senator Nurgitz: I accept that honourable senators, and now we will ask the good Senator Sparrow to speak and he will explain the relevance of what he is saying to the motion before this house. Then, I accept what you say but in doing that you are essentially saying that senators—

Senator Kirby: In doing that you are essentially saying—

Senator Olson: You have challenged his relevance.

Senator Kirby: What you are really saying is that Senator Sparrow, in addition to giving a speech, needs to give a sort of a Dick and Jane set of explanatory notes at the same time as he gives a speech so that you understand why what he thinks is obviously relevant is relevant. Is that correct?

Senator Nurgitz: No. I accept what Senator Kirby says that it ought not to be my subjective view of what is relevant, but he can tell us what the motion is, and he will tell us the contents of his comments and why it is relevant to the motion.

Senator Simard: Then Senator Olson will rule and if we do not like it, we will appeal his ruling.

Senator Kirby: You said that you want Senator Sparrow to begin by telling you what the motion is. He knows and he, I guess, assumed that you knew that the motion was Senator Doody's motion which was to move directly third reading. You are concerned that he does not know what the motion is simply because we are forced to speak to the motion without necessarily having heard Senator Doody put the motion.

Senator Nurgitz: Let him explain as to why it is relevant and I will accept it.

Senator Kirby: Sure.

Senator Simard: Senator Sparrow can speak to the motion. You can tell us in so many words.

An Hon. Senator: Is it Dick and Jane?

Senator Sparrow: I have the Dick and Jane story, if you would like to hear it?

Senator Simard: Oh, here is Senator Stewart. So, the forces are back. Did we confuse you, Senator?

Senator Sparrow: Yes, indeed.

Senator Nurgitz: No, I want to hear it and I will accept it.

MOTION TO CALL ORDERS OF THE DAY—DEBATE CONTINUED

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: First of all, I guess I wanted to tell you, and I think that I told you before, that I was opposed to the motion moving proceeding to Orders of the Day. If we were to do so, I would not have the opportunity to discuss these issues here and, if the GST ever gets to a vote in this house I will never have a chance again to make these points or to get this message across about the GST.

Senator Nurgitz: Indeed not.

Senator Sparrow: Let us give you this dress rehearsal.

Senator Perrault: You are just delaying the debate. Come on now.

Senator Sparrow: I will have to start over. Anyway, you wanted to hear the Dick and Jane story as well as the relevancy because I do have the Dick and Jane story here, if you will allow me to enter that into the record.

Senator Simard: We have to abide by the rules.

Senator Olson: Why not you tell him what the rules are. He knows why he is arguing against this motion too. Besides, you speak when you are sitting down so that is why I do it too.

Senator Sparrow: Yes, thank you very much for your help. It says the Dick and Jane story. You will remember Dick and Jane? Not to mention Spot the dog and all of the other memorable characters of your Grade II reader.

Senator Nurgitz: And you guys said that he never read anything.

Senator Olson: He is better than I thought.

Senator Doody: Let me hear more about Spot.

Senator Sparrow: You thought that you would hear about Dick and Jill going up the hill to fetch a pail of water, did you?

Senator Simard: Yes, that is it.

Senator Sparrow: Well, I am here to tell you that Dick and Jane are still with us. Sure, they are big people now, and Spot, the dog, with their one year old car. Everyone is alive and feeling well except for Spot whose battery is not what it used to be. So that I just bet you are wetting your pants like Spot if any one of you had a typical day in the life of your old friends Dick and Jane. And the dog. Especially in the age of the GST. I knew you were so that I am going to tell you.

Oh, is this pretty heavy for you.

Senator Doody: They can absorb it if you will go slower.

Senator Kirby: You remember how you did it when you were in grade 3?

Senator Sparrow: The day begins at seven when Dick and Jane got up for work. Dick reaches over Jane who sleeps like a log and switches off the alarm on the new clock they bought on the weekend just three days after the new tax became law. Look, Jane, he says, do you see the clock, it cost 7 per cent more on Saturday than it did on Tuesday.

An Hon. Senator: It is a little more quiet and genteel out here.

Senator Sparrow: Dick and Jane shuffle off to the bathroom to their Dick and Jane sinks. Jane picks up a toothbrush at her sink and cries "Look Dick, look, see the brush? It costs 7 per cent more too'.

This is what they wanted read, right ? Okay. 'Oh', said Dick, 'and the toothpaste too'. He looks at Jane. She looks at Dick. They all look at all of the stuff in the bathroom. Soap, shampoo, towels, toilet paper, everything is 7 per cent more.

Is this relevant? Is this all relevant to the—maybe it will be.

Senator Nurgitz: Perhaps he does not understand the difference.

Senator Simard: Well, the onus is on you to show the difference.

Senator Sparrow: Dick and Jane have three young children. Tom, Dick, and Harriet, but to avoid confusion, Dick calls Dick Rick and on the weekend, Dick bought Rick and Tom and Harriet new clothes, shirts, pants, socks for the boys and new shoes and a new hat for Harriet. As they were being dressed for school—am I going too fast?

Senator Doody: No, you are doing just fine.

Senator Stewart: So you wanted to know just what we did with our research money, did you?

Senator Sparrow: Behave yourself. As they were being dressed for school and handing their school books, they remembered that the books and the clothes also cost 7 per cent more.

Senator Kirby: They have trouble understanding it.

Senator Sparrow: He said nothing, but his brain went 'Oh, oh'.

An Hon. Senator: Make sure that the reporter gets a copy of that.

Senator Sparrow: Do you wish to have a copy of it as well?

Senator Simard: No, we don't get the Hansard for three days. Yes, I would like to get a copy of it. I would like to have it this morning because I would like to take it home and read it.

Senator Olson: Perhaps we can have an hour's recess and everybody can have copies.

Senator Sparrow: No, I have not made copies, but if you would like to have copies, I will make them. I could give them to you.

Senator Simard: Oh, is this just another Liberal promise? We want it. Okay? All right, we will take your word.

Senator Sparrow: Do you wish to have it in colour or uncoloured?

Senator Doody: It does not matter.

Senator Simard: We want the original. We want it all signed by all of you people over there.

Senator Stewart: So, what happened next, Senator?

Senator Sparrow: Well, with the kids off to catch their bus, Dick and Jane jumped into their new 7 per cent more car, backed out of the driveway and promptly had a flat tire. As Jane changed the tire—Dick was a mechanical klutz—she exclaimed 'Guess what, Dick?' 'This flat tire will cost 7 per cent more to be fixed.' 'Darn,' said Dick. 'Darn, darn, darn.'

I think I have lost their attention.

When the Darling Dick dropped his Jane off and later parked his car, he paid 7 per cent more to park. Later that morning at his break he paid 7 per cent more for his coffee and his muffin.

Who brought up this subject of Dick and Jane anyway?

Senator Olson: It was Senator Nurgitz. Yes, he wanted to hear the story.

Senator Nurgitz: No, no.

Senator Kirby: No, I think what happened is that Senator Nurgitz had difficulty understanding what Senator Sparrow was saying. I suggested it might help Senator Nurgitz if you gave a Dick and Jane explanation and Senator Nurgitz agreed that a Dick and Jane explanation would help, and I thought what you were trying to do was to, in fact, explain to the members opposite, and in particular to Senator Simard and Senator Nurgitz, the Dick and Jane implications of the GST, which is precisely what he asked for. That is my understanding of why it is important that you continue with your presentation of the Dick and Jane issue. Is that not correct Senator?

Senator Nurgitz: I do wish to congratulate the member opposite for his new levels of literacy. I think that it has been great.

Senator Sparrow: Senator Cogger wants some pictures. Do we have any that we could give to him that are in colour?

Senator Simard: I have my crayons right here.

Senator Sparrow: Just before lunch, for which he also paid 7 per cent more, Dick went around his office to collect for Mabel's going away gift, because Mabel was going away. Mabel was moving to Moose Jaw and so he had to add 7 per cent to what he had collected to cover the tax on the gift. That afternoon Dick slipped out of the office for a haircut and paid 7 per cent more. After work, he picked up Jane and stopped for gas and paid 7 per cent more. Then they stopped at the neighbourhood Home Hardware for some paint and paid 7 per cent more. Then the same for a brush. The same for a screwdriver.

While he was there, Dick bought Rick a new hockey stick and paid 7 per cent more.

It is so sad.

[Senator Simard.]

Since they were both tired and did not feel like cooking, Dick and Jane got a pizza for dinner and paid 7 per cent more.

As the next day was the Parent-Teachers day, the kids had no school and wanted to go to the movies to see Teenage Mutant Ninja Crocodiles, or Lizards, or Turtles, or something and Dick could not remember which, and so they finished the pizza and headed off to the theatre where they paid 7 per cent more for the show. Seven per cent more for the popcorn. When they got home and put the children to bed, Jane sat down to pay their bills. They paid 7 per cent more for furnace oil, 7 per cent more for electricity, 7 per cent more to the plumber who had fixed the leaky faucet in the laundry room.

Dick went into the family room to watch television and he walked across the new carpet for which they paid 7 per cent more.

He sat in his new chair which cost 7 per cent more and turned on the new boob tube which had set them back $590.00 plus 7 per cent more.

As he slumped there, not really watching whatever was going on, he began to think about his day, his seven per cent day and he got angrier and angrier. His 'oh, oh, oh' and his 'darn, darn, darn,' turned into 'damn, damn, damn.' He thought that they would all be better off dead until he remembered that funerals cost 7 per cent more.

You would suppose that they could have avoided the GST, that they could go naked and barefoot and unplug the phone, the television and the fridge and turn off all of the lights and shut down the furnace and freeze to death in the basement. But then there would still be funerals.

Disgusted he went to bed, pulled the covers over his head and had nightmares about the 7 per cent and of the police who were coming to get him.

In the morning, outside of his office, there was a man who was selling red buttons saying, 'Impeach Mulroney.' Dick bought six. One for himself, one for Jane, one for Tom, Rick and Harriet, and one for Spot. And oh, oh, he paid 7 per cent more.

I wonder if we could get a copy of this for Senator Simard?

Senator Olson: Now they understand why people do not like the tax better than they did before.

• (0345)

Senator Sparrow: And we will get the pictures, Senator Cogger, just as soon as we can. We will get the pictures.

Senator Cogger: And we will buy the crown before the 7 per cent goes into effect.

Senator Sparrow: Yes. Now speaking about relevancy, as far as the motion is concerned, I believe that the subject matter before us is very relevant because if we move to the Orders of the Day, we will get an entirely different subject matter. We will not be talking about the petitions that this motion has replaced, and we will not be able to get the message across that the people want brought to this house as far as what is going to happen if the GST goes into place. So I believe, in my heart, that that is relevant to the situation.

We talked about the rebate to individuals, and Senator Poitras—I know this is not a proper time and place to do it because it is not really in order to ask individual senators questions without the leader—but you did say that you would give me an answer to that question.

Would you happen to have that now or do you want to—

Senator Poitras: When we will be talking about the amendment or the bill.

Senator Sparrow: I thought you said you would bring it in the next day for me, but—

Senator Poitras: Well, I thought you would discuss the bill the following day. Normally we should have.

Senator Doody: We will get to this.

Senator Poitras: Yes, I think we should.

Senator Sparrow: Would you say that the figures I quoted and the information I got was relevant to this discussion and were factual? Would you suggest that?

Senator Poitras: I will answer this in due course.

Senator Sparrow: All right. Anyway, as we are talking about the idea that the people are going to pay less, that people who earn $30,000 are going to pay less. This is one of those falsehoods that keeps cropping up, those in favour of the tax keep telling us the big lie as far as this is concerned. If we are talking about the people earning $30,000 or less who will pay less tax, I wonder how that is relevant when a person earning $28,050 will get $5 rebate. If you are talking about four payments per year, you will be lucky. You will be waiting patiently for his cheque in the mail for $1.25 every quarter of the year, and I think it is just not fair to continue to say that people who earn less than $30,000 will pay less tax, because at a minimum, if they spent $15,000 only of their $28,000 on items other than food, they will have paid $150 in GST tax, and that would probably be twice or three times as much as the federal sales tax they pay now. So it is not fair to the Canadian people to tell them that they will be paying less. They tell us that it is good for the farmer, because the farmers will get a rebate on what they spend on capital items, but if they cannot afford in today's society to buy any new tractors, farm equipment or trucks, of course they will get no rebate at all, and they will still be paying GST tax on all of their items, except probably food and medical services. So it is not really necessary, I think, to tell the Canadian people those falsehoods. They say it is good for low-income people and are talking about the low-income people, the people who are below the poverty level—which primarily falls into this category of those people who are earning less than $30,000—and many people, of course, working at minimum wage earn only $10,000 per year, total, in this country. Many of them are supporting families on that. If it is a single person, he, in turn, if he earns $10,000, will only get $190 back, and of course, he is bound to pay more than that in tax. Yet, previously he never paid the federal sales tax because he couldn't afford the items that were affected by the federal sales tax.

We have been talking about the small farmers. People have said—and Senator Olson knows this—many times, "If you want to be a small farmer, you start out as a big farmer, and it doesn't take you long until you are a small farmer. We are getting smaller and smaller and smaller." Pretty soon we will not have an agricultural industry in this country, and certainly not in Western Canada, as the cost balloons in not only because of the GST tax, but because of the inflationary interest rates, and, of course, the cost of fuel.

The same consideration applies to small business. The government says, "it will be better for you." I really don't know what they refer to as small business. If they are talking about a small business that takes in under $30,000 a year, okay, they may not have to pay the federal sales tax or the GST tax. They may be excused from that, but the businesses that take in less than $30,000 are a very small percentage of the business people in this country. We are asking the people who earn $30,000 or more to collect that sales tax and then pay it to the government, less the balance that they are allowed as an expense. We are asking that small business person, who may be a plumber or an electrician who works by himself or who has one or two or three employees, and who works on the job all the time himself—now we are asking him, when he gets off the job site not only to calculate the unemployment insurance, the income tax, the Canada Pension Plan contributions, workmen's compensation, holiday pay, et cetera for these employees, now we are asking him to turn and do the calculations on the GST.

So, the message that we want to bring, or, at least, I want to bring is that not only can we not afford this tax within the community, but we can't really afford the extra work that it is going to take.

We are faced with an added cost in the small business community now with inflation rates at 4 per cent that we will have to adjust for. We will also have to adjust for the 7 per cent GST tax. Then any business that uses vehicles in trucking or in construction, indeed any of those businesses that are higher users of fuel will find that their costs have increased almost overnight with a 15 per cent increase in fuel prices. So we are talking now about the business community being faced with at least a 26 per cent increase in the cost of operation, and indeed we cannot afford that.

We were talking about the idea that to sell the GST the government will use any message to do it. I want to just read for you an item in the Globe and Mail of October 17 written by Linda McQuaig. It refers to the suggestion by the government that this was in their platform in the 1988 election campaign that they were going to bring in the GST tax. This is what that article states.

> One of the most misleading statements coming out of Ottawa these days is the contention of Brian Mulroney's government that the goods and services tax was part of its 1988 election platform.
> The government is advancing this theory now, of course, in an effort to suggest that it was elected with a mandate to impose the GST. Even if the electorate is now overwhelmingly opposed to it, the theory goes, the public elected the government knowing full well of—even presumably endorsing—the GST.

This is a considerable distortion of what happened. It is true that the government had indicated in vague terms in its 1987 tax-reform documents its intention to replace the Manufacturers Sales Tax with a new sales tax. But the government went mum on the subject during the 1988 campaign. This silence was with good reason.

The new tax was going to benefit only a small segment of the population—primarily manufacturers, who had long disliked the existing sales tax and would enjoy a much lighter burden under the GST. Indeed, some $4-billion of the sales-tax burden was to be transferred from the corporate sector to the household sector.

So the government saw no particular advantage in mentioning the new tax to the general public during the election campaign. It was bound to raise suspicion that the tax would be used to soak additional revenues out of the public for the ongoing war against the deficit.

For the Tories, there was no advantage in turning the GST into an election issue. Everybody who would like the new tax—manufacturers, business economists, tax experts—already knew about it. The rest were better kept in the dark.

So the government was set to let the issue slumber throughout the campaign, even though the GST was a central part of the Tory plan for its second term and all was in readiness to set the wheels for the new tax in motion as soon as the votes were counted. Everything was going according to plan when Don Blenkarn stumbled onto the scene.

Mr. Blenkarn, the feisty Conservative chairman of the House of Commons Finance Committee, was scheduled in the early days of the election campaign to make what promised to be one of its dullest appearances. He was to address a tax conference at Osgoode Hall Law School in Toronto. The event actually had nothing to do with the election, having been booked months earlier.

In the course of the day-long session, Mr. Blenkarn told the audience of economists and tax experts that the government planned to collect billions in additional revenues through the GST.

This evoked little interest: the tax specialists in the audience already knew it. But when Mr. Blenkarn's comments about the additional revenue-raising potential of the new tax were reported the next day on the front page of the Globe and Mail, the cat was out of the bag. The increase that only experts were supposed to know about was now in the hands of the electorate—a dangerous place indeed. So how did the government react? If it is true, as the Tories now maintain, that the government had "campaigned" on the GST, surely its response would have been to say, 'Yes, Mr. Blenkarn is right, the new tax will raise considerable extra revenue and this is necessary for deficit reduction.' They would have said then what they are saying now.

But both Prime Minister Mulroney and Finance Minister Michael Wilson were quick to deny the accuracy of Mr. Blenkarn's comments, insisting that he did not speak for the government.

As the issue percolated over the next few days—Ontario Treasurer Robert Nixon piped in with comments about how Ontarians would find themselves paying a lot more sales tax—the government repeatedly denied that the new tax would raise any additional revenue.

Mr. Wilson insisted that it would be "revenue-neutral"—that is, would not raise additional money. It was not a vehicle for deficit reduction. With the government's assurances, the issue died.

Since the election, Mr. Wilson has been more frank. On CBC's Morningside radio program last month, he told host Peter Gzowski that the GST would raise additional revenues for deficit reduction.

"But I thought it was revenue-neutral?" Mr. Gzowski said. Mr. Wilson replied: "Well, no, it helps us get the deficit down." So much for honesty on the election trail.

The government now argues with ferocity that the GST is really the only option for reducing the deficit—choosing to ignore the other fairer options, such as a detailed proposal developed by Osgoode Hall tax professor Neil Brooks to abolish regressive sales taxes altogether and raise the lost revenue through modest increases in the income tax. This option, which the government has refused even to consider, would save Canadians hundreds of millions in administrative costs alone.

The Tories now concentrate their fury on the evils of an unelected Senate, insisting that the shenanigans in the upper chamber are blocking the will of Canadians to have the GST put in place. But Canadians never endorsed the GST—not now and not during the election campaign.

Is the Senate really blocking the will of the people, as the government suggests, or simply blocking the will of the government, on an issue where the government was less than honest at the one time when Canadians were in a position to register their opposition?

Could it be that the Conservatives don't trust an informed Canadian public to make the right decisions, that they believe the only way to put their policies in place is sometimes to circumvent the will of the people? Are the antics in the upper chamber the real threat to democracy?

Honourable senators, I do not think that the upper chamber is the real threat to democracy in this country.

I want to quote from the Winnipeg Free Press of Tuesday, October 30, 1990. This is a poll of what the people think of the Prime Minister. The article is headed "Waiting for the Malaise". It states:

> Most Canadians believe politicians are increasingly corrupt, tell a lot of lies, don't know where the country is headed and how to get there and usually can't be trusted to do what is right.

I think this is what the Canadian people are now realizing because of the half truths and, I suppose, outright big lies that have been put forward with regard particularly to the GST.

> Most want Canada to have a leader with a vision for the country who won't be distracted by critics, but they do not want that leader to head a government that will do what it thinks is best for the country even if the majority of people disagree.
> Some observers, who looked for a bright side in the survey of Canadians' views of their politics and politicians made public this week by the Toronto Globe and Mail and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, found in it evidence of profound ambivalence. In fact, that ambivalence may be the real problem.
> Canadians, on the evidence of the poll, have not quite given up on their politicians, though they admit that their opinion of the breed has been going steadily downward. They have not quite given up on the political process either. Most of them rejected the invitation to agree with such expressions of political cynicism as: "The way I feel about politicians these days, I don't much care whom I vote for."
> Seventy per cent of those polled did care whom they would vote for. Hardly any of them, not surprisingly, would vote for Brian Mulroney.
> The response to the poll has been widely interpreted as evidence of a political malaise in Canada—a deep seated sickness in Canadian politics. But not liking the party in power is not necessarily evidence of a malaise. It can reflect nothing more than a healthy political judgment. If the party in power has adopted a failed constitutional policy, an economic policy which has resulted in a recession and a tax policy which people fear will pick their pockets, it is perfectly natural for the voters to dislike it. Their judgment may or may not be right, but it certainly is not sick.
> There is a sure cure for an unpopular government. Either it persuades the voters that its policies will, after all, benefit them, or the voters will kick it out. Some voters may complain that they won't get the chance to kick it out soon enough but, if the government really does remain deeply unpopular, there is a chance that defections in its own ranks will speed the day of its dismissal.
> The real malaise sets in if it turns out that the quick cure did not work; if the government which replaces the previously unpopular one turns out to be just as bad. For many western voters, that is what has happened since 1984. They turfed out Pierre Trudeau's Liberal government because it failed to address the needs of the West and elected Brian Mulroney's Conservatives who proceeded to fail as well. Canadians in other regions of the country have suffered similar disillusionment.
> If, two or three years from now, the voters face the same disappointment, Canadian politics could get truly sick. The rage and disillusionment heard today could sound tame if a Liberal or New Democratic government should take office after the next election and fall as short of expectations as Mr. Mulroney's Conservatives have done.

One of the next half-truths or falsehoods that is taking place is the statement that the federal sales tax that we now have in place is no good, that it is a detriment to the Canadian industrial complex and to Canadians as a whole. I suppose it should be on the record—and I think that Senator Stewart has made reference to this earlier in the debate—that when the Conservative government came to power the tax was only 9 per cent. If they thought it was such a bad tax for the Canadian people, why, then, did they raise it on October 1, 1984 from 9 to 10 per cent; on January 1, 1986, from 10 to 11 per cent; on April 1, 1986, from 11 to 12 per cent; and on June 1, 1989, from 12 to 13.5 per cent?

If the Conservatives believed that it was such a bad tax, why, then, do they keep raising it? Perhaps it is worse now than it was because of those increases. Perhaps it was not that bad when it was 9 per cent. Perhaps it is much worse—and I think, of course, that it is—at 13.5 per cent. The adjustments could be made to those figures without burdening the Canadian people with this new tax.

I want to talk for a moment about the Canadian people. They want a decisive government. They want leadership that is decisive. I do not argue with that, of course, but when we talk about the present government and the present Prime Minister, I have to point out that there is a difference between being decisive and being stubborn, mean and unyielding. There is a difference between being decisive and coming to the Canadian people with a holier than thou attitude.

Surely the Canadian people have some thoughts about what should happen in their country. Surely they should have some input in addition to the input at election time in the way this country is governed. I think today, in this discussion, we in the Senate are trying to reflect what the Canadian people want.

The Canadian people want compassion, understanding and a leader of the people, not just a leader of corporations and the rich of this country. We are looking for leadership and I am just telling senators that we are not getting it.

I want to refer to another article in the News-Optimist from North Battleford, Saskatchewan, which reflects what is happening across this country but brings it a little closer, at least, to my home. It states:

> Town council has jumped on the anti-GST bandwagon.
> During their regular meeting Monday, councillors received a copy of an anti-Goods and Services Tax resolution passed by the city of North York, a suburb of Toronto.

The resolution says the tax will "adversely" impact on the city and North York taxpayers.

In addition, it notes the federal government appears determined to pass legislation implementing the GST, despite the fact that some 80 per cent of Canadians oppose the tax and about $260 million will be spent in salaries and promotion to implement it.

The resolution describes that as "an outrageous waste of our tax dollars".

As a result, it calls on all 4,000 municipalities across Canada, including Battleford, to endorse the resolution and "voice their concern in the strongest terms possible to the Prime Minister and federal Members of Parliament."

Honourable senators, the terrible costs associated with the GST—just the cost of advertising for the institution of the tax—are basically unbearable. We have spent literally millions of dollars in advertising in the form of pamphlets. We are now faced with a further notice sent out by the government to all business places. This pamphlet includes decals to be put in places of business showing the guidelines for collecting the tax. Some of the signs state, "These prices in this store include the 7 per cent GST." Other decals state that the 7 per cent GST is included "where applicable". We were told initially that the tax would be up front, that it would be shown at the time the item was purchased. But that is not necessarily true any longer. This could in fact be a hidden tax.

Honourable senators, I assume that we are spending thousands of dollars on this very pamphlet, and people will not necessarily know whether the tax is hidden.

People have said that the collection of the tax will cost in the neighbourhood of $4 billion of the $20 billion collected in a year. How we can impose this additional cost on the Canadian people is beyond my thinking of what is possible.

Finance Minister Michael Wilson was quoted in the Canadian Press recently as saying, "Canada has slipped into a recession, but it should not be severe . . ." Well, I want him and honourable senators to know that the recession is severe and that it is going to get worse. In fact, in Saskatchewan at the moment it is considered to be a depression, not just a recession. We are faced with many aspects of a depression: Our individual bankruptcies are up and our business and farming communities are going broke. That, in my opinion, is a depression, not just a recession.

When I look at the pamphlet that has just gone out, I see that it talks about the great things the Government of Canada is doing for the people of this country. It talks about how the GST is going to help them and how it is going to affect them. I think this is another aspect of the big lie. I was about to read a number of these items into the record, but I think I will leave that to another time.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: If I may, I would ask Senator Sparrow a question. With his great knowledge of soils, can he tell us whether there is any danger to soils under the GST?

Senator Sparrow: You've got to be kidding. Honourable senators, I covered this subject some time ago in this chamber.

[Senator Sparrow.]

Of course the GST will have a great effect on the agricultural community. The money that will be flowing out of the agricultural community will make it literally impossible for a farmer to be a good steward of the soil and protect that soil. He will not be able to afford that.

I have told senators, and I will tell them again, that the most serious crisis facing the agricultural industry is soil degradation. This whole aspect of the GST—the economic timeliness of it—does not lend itself to conservation in any area, particularly that of soils.

If I might, I will just add—and it is not necessarily in answer to Senator Lewis's question—that what the government is doing is destroying small business in this country. We know that bankruptcies are up in this country by 40 per cent this year over last year. I heard on the news today that there is a 40 per cent increase in people who are 90 days behind in their mortgage payments. Honourable senators, this is shocking. People across the country are losing their homes. We are destroying the homeowners and we are destroying the small businesses. While we are doing this, the government has the gall to send out a pamphlet that is in turn costing hundreds of thousands of dollars.

● (0415)

It says "For the Small Business, Getting Started: Guides to Rules and Regulations Concerning the Establishment of Small Businesses in Canada". What a time to send out such a publication! We should send out a publication that tells us how we can salvage the small businesses we have, because who in their right mind would start a small business in this country at the moment? We should salvage the businesses that are in place.

Why are we increasing immigration to increase employment when we have no jobs for our own people at the moment? Thousands are being laid off across the country, but the government thinks we need to bring in additional immigrants. The government says it is great for the economic situation to see people unemployed. It must be great for the Conservatives in this chamber and throughout the country to know that someone is going to have to tell his wife and family that he just lost his job and he does not know what he is going to do to keep making the payments on his home and car or how he is going to feed his family. Yet the government is sending out pamphlets on how to get started in small business. What kind of nonsense is that?

In the agriculture community people are presently going broke. I have a study of poverty in Saskatchewan. Some other time I would like to discuss how this tax will affect those people. I also have a special supplement that was included in the Regina Leader-Post discussing poverty in the province and how the small businessman is now on welfare and going to food banks, along with many members of the agriculture community. It also discusses how the need for food in the school program has increased 20 to 30 per cent per year in the last three to four years, and the situation is going to get worse. I would love to have the opportunity to further explain those issues at another time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, from time to time it is useful to ask ourselves why we are in this chamber. I do not mean why we are here at 4.30 in the morning. May I suggest, facetiously, that the continuing source of inspiration for those of us who speak at ungodly hours like this is the fact that all of Canada is listening to every word we are saying. But, again, we have to ask ourselves what role we play in the Senate. At the present time the Senate has a credibility problem, which predated the incidents that occurred in the past couple of weeks. We were certainly not sent here to be automatons, trained seals or to march in step behind declarations of prime ministers or party leaders. Senator Hatfield, with his experience in the Atlantic provinces, knows full well we were sent here to effectively and authentically represent the regional hopes, dreams and aspirations of the people out there who are extremely worried today. It was indeed the contribution of the Maritime provinces to the Confederation debates that led to the creation of the Senate. John A. Macdonald said that this chamber would represent regional interests and protect them against the overwhelming power of the central provinces of that time. Surely that is still one of our roles. We shall not come here at the direction of some politician who say, "Do this or else!"

The Senate needs fundamental reform. We should be freer from party discipline; and, in return for an elected Senate with equal representation for the provinces, perhaps we should give up the veto power the Senate possesses and have a suspensive veto, which would enable groups of senators to hold up certain bills which might be injurious to their regions. Those would be some features of the modern Senate I would like to see. Yes, and, a Senate which would have the power to question the suitability of certain appointments to major government boards and agencies, as it does in the United States. We could be a more effective chamber if we were restructured along some of those lines, instead of being a cockpit of disputation—its members participating in black-and-white exchanges when all of us know few issues are black-and-white.

I had an opportunity to visit my province in recent days. I have been in public life since 1959, and I have never seen such anger, fear and apprehension out there about the state of Canada today. It would not be fair to blame that on one particular party, as easy as that is to do. The average Canadian in British Columbia, which is the region I attempt to represent, is worried about the future and the loss of employment.

The first reports we have received with respect to the Free Trade Agreement in our province have been bad. I hoped that the ultimate impact of that trade deal would be good for the country, but so far it has been disturbingly bad. Statistics Canada shows that 170,000 well paying, industrial jobs have been lost in Canada. It is true a number of jobs have been created, and it would be unfair to make my statement without that qualifier. But those jobs have been primarily in the service industry, which are traditionally lower paying. We have seen a steady departure of hundreds of companies to the United States since that the Free Trade Agreement was signed. That is of vital concern to Canadians, regardless of the way they vote. The woodworkers in the province of British Columbia are desperately appealing to the government to rescind the forestry agreement with the United States, which states that lumber exporters in British Columbia and most of the other provinces must be subject to the equivalent of a 15 per cent penalty for the honour and right of selling their products in the United States, when at no time were the Americans ever able to demonstrate that they were involved in unfair competition from Canadian forest companies. In retrospect, I do not think we should have given way on that particular point. Perhaps the deal can be renegotiated, and we should try.

Honourable senators, too many Canadians are losing their jobs and suffering in the process. We do not want to create the impression that the Senate is fiddling while the country is burning. I would almost be prepared to support a bipartisan, multipartisan conversations with respect to the financial and economic future of the country. I may represent a minority opinion, but perhaps the national situation requires something like this. The welfare of this country is more important than whether you or we win the next election.

I am getting to the subject of the suitability of ruling that petitions are not important and that we should move on to Orders of the Day. I went shopping in a supermarket in my province over the weekend, and prices are outrageous. I do not know whether they are being boosted in preparation for the events which may occur on January 1, but they are outrageous. I was stopped by seven people in one supermarket saying that they are totally behind the effort to stop the GST. They think it is wrong and discriminates against British Columbia. At the present time, we have many stresses in the province and in the country.

It is wrong to assume that the question of the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada is the only threat to Confederation. The movement toward protest parties in Western Canada is awesome—indeed indescribable. People are very upset with what is going on in this country. They are having a difficult time articulating the reasons for their concern, but the feeling is there.

Under this proposed bill, we in British Columbia are going to have to pay about 25 per cent more GST as a result of transportation costs on certain articles. This was raised time and time again in the hearings across the country and since the beginning of this debate. Yet the government persists in the view that there is a "seamless web" and nothing may be touched. I want to ask Senator Hatfield if he is prepared to vote for a bill that is clearly and demonstrably discriminatory against the Atlantic provinces. Government officials admitted that in our hearings. The people of northern Canada are going to have to pay 158 per cent more on certain articles. Is that fair? Is it too much to ask the government to resolve this issue and not put in place a discriminatory tax proposal of this kind? If we are authentic representatives of our regions, what are we going to do about it?

In conscience, I cannot support a measure that is going to severely discriminate against my own province. For years in British Columbia we have been paying more to ship from west to east than from east to west. The freight rates have been discriminatory. Davey Steuart knows how discriminatory the rail rates have been in western Canada. It is said that the gradient from west to east is more steep than the gradient from east to west. Translated, that means it is easier to be a manufacturer in central Canada and ship west than it is to sell from west to east. Is that the Confederation package we bought in 1867? Did we buy that discrimination? Is it not important to bring these problems to the attention of central governments? I think both major parties have failed to address adequately the problems of the regions on a consistent basis. As a British Columbian, I resent it. It is wrong, and I am prepared to fight for my people. I know central Canada and eastern Canada have problems too, but the anger I see in the west is awesome.

I want to share some of the letters I have received with you. They summarize the anger that is out there. I know that those of you who have travelled recently have not seen anything like it.

● (0430)

This is from a chap in Kelowna. He states:

> The writer is a Senior Citizen who has served his country in both war and peace for nearly seventy years. Now retired, my wife and I have lived frugally and carefully during the forty-eight years of our marriage, in order to assure a comfortable retirement. Neither we, our three adult children and six grandchildren, nor anyone connected with our family have ever accepted any government hand-outs—with the solitary exception of OAS which we paid for through a special surtax commencing in 1951—and we have always paid (God—how we've paid!) our income and other taxes in full and on time.
> Now we feel betrayed!
> A lifetime Conservative, I finally recognized some four years ago that the man for whom I voted was an egocentric, power-hungry—

I will not quote the rest of what he says because that is unkind to the Prime Minister.

But he adds:

> the proposed GST, like many of the 1989 federal budget proposals, is an abomination. The clawback on Old Age Pensions coupled with the Partial De-Indexation Factor, jeopardizes the future welfare of every Canadian who had saved and planned for a stable retirement. In my considered opinion, the GST, as proposed, will prove to be a "cash cow" which will do nothing to reduce the burgeoning National Debt but will only permit the Prime Minister to promise more goodies before the next election. It will only lead to ever-higher taxes, greater spending, and more waste.

This is one opinion. He goes on to state:

[Senator Perrault.]

> The GST is regressive, inflationary, extremely costly to administer and will hurt business.

That is the consensus out in British Columbia. The support for the GST is minuscule. I ask myself how supporters of this legislation sitting in this chamber can rally such personal support for this measure, condemned by so many responsible bodies. Are they really trying to tell Canada—because we are talking to Canadians in this place—that there is not one provincial minister of finance who has any brain and common sense? Are they saying that the universities are all wrong? The churches have told us that the distribution of the rebates will be almost impossible, that it will totally impracticable. John Bulloch of the Independent Business Federation of Canada said that the bill should be fixed up and left for a few months because economic circumstances have changed. Are honourable Senators opposite prepared to say that the whole country is wrong and they are right?

Then this tax-paying Canadian, who has a long and distinguished military record, who put his life on the line for this country states:

> The GST is regressive, inflationary, extremely costly to administer and will hurt business. Above all, it is unfair, especially to middle—and—lower income Canadians and seniors who have no way of overcoming the ravages of inflation.
> Shockingly, according to figures just released by the Department of Finance, taxes on Old Age Pensions and the "Baby Bonus" boosted Ottawa's revenue from personal income taxes in April, May and June of this year by 34.3 per cent over the same period of 1989.

Senator Marsden: Would the Honourable Senator read those figures again?

Senator Perrault: The writer states:

> Shockingly, according to figures released by the Department of Finance, taxes on Old Age Pensions and the "Baby Bonus" boosted Ottawa's revenue from personal income taxes in April, May and June of this year by 34.3 per cent over the same period of 1989.

Those are savings realized.

He continues:

> Equally shocking is the fact that Revenue Canada applied the "clawback" provisions of the April 1989 Budget Proposals to that year's income tax returns EVEN THOUGH TO THIS DATE, THE CORRESPONDING LEGISLATION HAS NOT BEEN PASSED BY PARLIAMENT.

It has now been passed. Honourable Senators opposite — and I can forgive the new ones—were very concerned about this aspect of the "clawback" legislation. We wanted to have a conference with the leadership of the other place, which is a standard Senate procedure. When I was leader of the government in the Senate I used to have conferences with the Liberals in the other place and fought for changes and amendments to bills that were subsequently accepted. That was done consistently by the Senate.

Senator Marsden: Where those amendments accepted?

Senator Perrault: Yes, we were successful in achieving many amendments and were thanked by the Cabinet Ministers in question, as we have with this government; I believe that since this government came to power in 1984 it has accepted some 18 amendments, with full approval of the responsible ministers.

The writer continues:

> The result was an increase in personal income tax revenues $16 billion in the quarter, up from $12 billion during the same period last year. In contrast, corporate income taxes fell by 4.4 per cent.

Do Honourable Senators opposite realize that of all the countries in the western world, we have an easier corporate tax. I can put some figures on the record in this regard. The Japanese pay some of the highest corporate taxes in the world. That country is doing extremely well, yet we hear from some Senators opposite we must not deter the productive effort of the Canadian corporate sector.

The writer goes on to state:

> In 1988 the Mulroney government reduced the corporate tax rate from 36 per cent to 28 per cent. More than 60 thousand corporations paid NO TAXES AT ALL, including some of the nation's largest companies, mostly foreign-owned-or-controlled. In addition to contributing nothing to Federal Tax Revenues, a great many companies received tax credits amounting to many millions of dollars.

Do honourable Senators opposite think that there is such a thing as a corporate welfare bum? That phrase was used some years ago, one does not have to be a kept socialist to be concerned that certain sectors are not pulling their full weight economically in this country. One does not have to be a raving Marxist to have some suspicions from time to time.

I recall attending a reception put on in Ottawa by the oil companies. That was in the final year of the Liberal government. They told me how badly they were doing by the Liberal government. Finally, I could not take that any longer: "I have checked the record and you have not paid any corporate tax for the past eight years." I told them that the Canadian people had paid most of their oil exploration costs and not to complain too bitterly.

Yet honourable senators opposite say there are no alternatives. Come on! Senator Marsden outlined very well, intelligently and constructively a number of alternatives. Is the only alternative available to us as legislators the immense transfer of the tax burden from the manufacturing sector in this country to the middle income groups and the lower income groups and the poor? I ask that because that is what is being done.

That is not Liberal campaigns oratory ; that is a fact, one revealed by Global economics and other economists in this country.

The writer goes on to state:

> Now Mr. Wilson, The Minister of Finance, in a speech to The Chamber of Commerce, blandly announces that his February budget figures were wrong—that the expected deficit for the current year will come in at close to $30 billion in lieu of his forecasted $28 1/2 billion!
> Brian Mulroney's latest efforts to salvage the GST by calling upon Her Majesty, the Queen of Canada, to permit him to "pack" the Senate are beneath contempt and an insult to Canadians.

I agree with that, especially regarding the appointment of certain Senators I will not name because I want this to be a constructive contribution.

The writer goes on to state:

> I am reminded of Oliver Cromwell's address to Parliament some three centuries age—

So says this old Tory from the interior of B. C., a life-Conservative:

> —he said; "You have sat here too long for any good you have been doing. Depart, I say, and let us have done with you, In the name of God, Go!"
> As a Federally appointed Senator from B.C., I expect that you will be sensitive to the fact that the citizens of The Province of British Columbia, like virtually all Canadians, overwhelmingly oppose the GST.
> I urge you to VOTE NO ! to the Goods and Services Tax.

Should a plea of that kind be ignored and should we simply slide into the Orders of the Day and say that petitions do not mean very much?

I have served in the British Columbia legislature and in the House of Commons, and petitions have always been an important part of a member's activities in those chambers. We should not denigrate the process or downplay it or attempt to minimize it.

Senator Kirby: Would the Honourable Senator permit a question?

Senator Perrault: Indeed.

Senator Kirby: I ask this question particularly because the Honourable Senator has been a member of a provincial legislature and a member of the House of Commons. I ask him to comment on two issues related to the point he just raised, which is the way in which petitions are handled in the British Columbia Legislature, the seriousness, or lack thereof, attributed to them; and secondly, given his years in public life, whether he could tell us how the number of petitions he has received with respect to the GST compares to the number of petitions he has received on other issues.

Senator Perrault: Honourable Senators that was not a set-up question. I can assure you honourable senators opposite of that.

I have received more mail—I am sure that it is true of all Senators including those sitting on the other side of the chamber—on the issue of the GST than on any other issue in my entire time in politics. The former premier of New Brunswick, Senator Robichaud, is in agreement.

Senator Frith: Likely more than all others combined.

Senator Perrault: Senator Frith is absolutely correct, more than all put together. I have never seen such a torrent of mail, and that cannot be ignored.

Respecting the British Columbia Legislature, when I was one of the opposition leaders, W.A.C. Bennett was in power. He was a difficult man with which to cope, at times, but he never short circuited the process of tabling petitions. They were always given significant weight in the legislature. We were not met with people saying, "just table them." We were allowed to speak on the petitions. That was why we were there. We were not sent there, nor were we appointed to the Senate to be "Charlie McCarthy Dummies".

If the Senators on this side had not reacted vigorously to what was attempted the other day, we would have permitted a precedent to be established in the Senate that would have been terribly damaging to this place for evermore.

• (0445)

We had to act. In effect it was a move to reduce the opposition to an ineffectual role in this place and indeed, almost an effort to abolish the opposition and I suppose the principle is lost to some of the newcomers here, but I have never seen it attempted before.

You simply cannot lock the door on the opposition and say, "you have to stay out and that we will run it ourselves." That is what they do in dictatorships.

On March 23, 1933, Adolph Hitler asked for special powers. He said, in order to run the new Germany, that he had to have these special powers and some of his advisors said, 'You should keep out the opposition, Adolph, and do not let them vote on this March 23 day in the Reichstag.'

'No', Hitler said, 'I will not block the opposition. Let the opposition in.' Eighty-four of the members of the Reichstag voted against Hitler on that occasion. Four-hundred-forty-four voted for it and gave him his special powers.

The significant thing is that in a Nazi dominated nation, they would not lock out the opposition. And you wonder why we were concerned? You wonder why this was a rather unusual incident in this place? You do not do that. It is unheard of. What states do you find it in? I do not know of any such states.

Senator Frith: The Nazis didn't do it, apparently.

Senator Perrault: Not even the Nazis did it in 1933. We are not saying that you are Nazis, but there is such a thing as our British Parliamentary standards.

In 1945 when the late Winston Churchill was reduced unexpectedly to the status of an opposition leader, he was defeated in that election in the surprising post-war election, he said, 'I did not come to this place to remain supine and silent while all that I have fought for and all of the principles that are represented here are put at risk.' You would think that if anyone had attempted to close the door to Winston Churchill in the British House of Commons, the Government would have been dismissed immediately and the Speaker would have been the first one to go.

Senator Marsden: Senator Perrault, if I may, may I ask a question? Will you entertain a question?

Senator Perrault: Indeed.

Senator Marsden: On the question of those other states that might exclude the opposition, I wonder if you know whether Colonel Khaddafi has an opposition and how that operates?

Senator Perrault: That is a good question. I doubt whether Colonel Khaddafi has an opposition.

Senator Frith: He did not lock the doors.

Senator Perrault: It is one of those incidents that not even the media or the editorial writers appreciated, I think, at the time. That was not specifically about the GST. That was a basic affront to the rights of every parliamentarian whether you sit on that side or on this side. It was not only a tactical mistake; it was grievous error.

So the people have a right to be angry, they have a right to have their petitions brought to this place.

Here is another letter, from another British Columbian.

> Way to go. Hope you keep it up. Please defeat G.S.T. Canada is counting on you and your fellow senators.

Here is another letter.

> My family and I would like to extend our heartfelt gratitude for the valiant fight that you are waging to defeat the G.S.T. We are running a family-sized software house service bureau servicing medium-sized businesses in the accounting field.

You know, we are doing very well in the area of developing software in Canada, as you know. One of the best development groups is located right here in Ottawa called Corel people. They are among the leaders in the software industry.

They are really one of the dominant graphics programmers in computers and there are many others.

> We have probably suffered proportionately more than anyone as most of our custom-written programs had to be amended by this abominable tax. We have been working for most of the year on this and our clients cannot be charged as most of them have a tough time as it is. Clients cannot afford to pay for it.
> No one doubts that our Nation's finances are in terrible shape and that more revenue must be found. However, with Mr. Mulroney's track record, all would be squandered away.

Also, this tax was probably the worst solution possible.

This is a small businessman. A number of them are closing up. They are just throwing up their hands in despair. It is a nightmare to administer.

> Just imagine up to eight remittances and claim backs from the mind of the final consumer. Are these people insane?

He is talking about you people, I assume.

> I have restaurants and delicatessens on my system. There is total confusion as to the cut-off of what is taxable and what is not.
> It will devastate across-the-border trade. Already lots of people go south for their shopping or holidays while many of their tourists won't come here anymore. All that's left for us is the provision of medical services on a reduced tax base.
> Much of the trade will go underground as people will try to stay under the thirty thousand dollar limit, thereby losing additional tax revenue and making criminals out of lawful citizens.
> There would have been all kinds of easier solutions to raise more tax revenue 'surtax on income actually spent rather than saved, and so on'.
> Please continue all you can to defeat this abomination.

The interesting thing in these letters is that none of them denies the fact that there is a debt and a deficit and they all say that they want to pay their fair share, and that comes through very, very honestly and very sincerely.

But they have an instinct, you know, the public instinct in a democracy is a marvellous, marvellous thing. And we have seen it manifest itself in elections. Our party has been through the experience and so has your party. Suddenly there is almost a national consensus that something is bad or that a government needs changing and they go out and march to the polls and the change is made.

Look at the Ontario election. They simply decided that it was not the time for an election and that it was wrong to call it and so they decided to beat the premier. Well, the same phenomenon is occurring today with respect to the GST and perhaps we would be wise to listen.

Senator Simard disagrees, which is his right, but you know, the economic conditions have changed since this idea was first developed.

Senator Marsden: So was the proposal. This is the original proposal.

Senator Perrault: Yes. Everything has been changed. Originally there was going to be a hidden tax and it was going to be integrated with provincial taxes. It was 9 per cent and then it went down to 7 per cent and it has become a very complex thing. Perhaps in all honesty and in conscience we should question whether or not it is wise to proceed with the measure in its present format at this time.

Perhaps, as an interim step we should say we will hold it for six months, because this is what John Bulloch and some of these people have suggested, and do some work on it and take out these features which are obviously discriminatory against certain of the regions.

It is beyond disputation. I have not heard a Conservative stand up and deny it. If it is there, then let us say some bureaucrat made a mistake, which probably is the case, but don't try to defend it.

It is the same as trying to defend ridiculous mistakes. I choose to say that it is a mistake. That is ridiculous. You do not support that. We do not support that. Why does not someone phone up a bureaucrat and say, look it, pass a regulation that you will not be taxed.

John Bulloch sent this out just the other day. He says you should withdraw Bill C-62, the GST legislation that is presently before the Senate. Fix the flaws, and delay implementation of the new tax by a period of one year.

The Conference Board of Canada has confirmed that we are now in a 'Made In Canada' recession as a result of the government's high interest rates. To make matters worse, inflation and declining output are now being compounded by high energy prices.

No one could have anticipated the situation in Iraq and we are not blaming you for it. We could not have done any better to anticipate that problem than you. We are not blaming you for it. But all the conditions are changing.

The figures are coming in differently. We have a deficit that we had not anticipated. It is higher, the Auditor General said this week. To make matters worse, says Bulloch, inflation and declining output are now being compounded by high energy prices. This is not the time, therefore, to introduce a massive consumption tax and drive consumers and small businesses into the ground.

When the GST was first contemplated by the government, the Canadian economy was enjoying a period of robust economic expansion, relatively low interest rates and inflation, and a competitive Canadian dollar. Times have changed.

You cannot argue with what Bulloch is saying. It is true. The timing of January 1 for this horrendous new tax could not be worse.

You know that Bulloch is not saying that it should be totally tossed out. He is saying give us a few months. I think that would help. He says that people are hurting in this country. Oh, how they are hurting.

Did you see that television clip in the news two nights ago about that woman who had just lost her business and had mortgaged the house, is losing the house, was crying on CBC television the other evening. Your heart went out to her. Innocent victim. There are thousands of them. Losing their homes and their hopes and dreams shattered forever. People who are reduced to penury.

Well, it is not funny, senator. You are laughing, but I do not think that it is very funny. You are not crying. You are putting on a nice fat cat conservative senatorial performance. It is not funny to the unemployed.

You know, you hired guns who were brought into this chamber to vote immediately for the GST should wrestle with your consciences a little bit. You can go ahead and call anybody you want, but do not laugh at the unemployed.

Senator Olson: Yes, let the record show that there should be a little more decorum in the chamber.

Senator Perrault: Yes, the Senator is having a great laugh at the expense of unemployed in Canada. People are hurting in this country. They are losing their jobs, losing their businesses, and more and more, are losing faith in their country's leaders.

That is correct. And, all politicians in this country are under a little bit of a pall. The faith is not there anymore. Right, Senator Nurgitz?

This is the time for the Prime Minister to show economic statesmanship rather than brinkmanship and perhaps it is time for all of us to demonstrate that.

The welfare of the country should be foremost, but do you really want to dismiss this Canadian Federation of Indpendent Business viewpoint as meaning nothing?

We go to the province of British Columbia. It is an interesting thing. The N.D.P. and the Social Credit parties have never agreed on anything except the GST and the Reform Party—all of the provincial parties—are supporting opposition to the G.S.T. because it is so demonstrably discriminatory against our part of Canada as it is in certain other provinces.

British Columbia has opposed the replacement of the existing Federal Sales Tax with a Federal-Only-Value-Added Tax. It was opposed when the Federal Government first floated the idea as a trial balloon in 1985 and it has been opposed since the GST was announced in the 1989 federal budget.

Despite these stories that we hear being circulated that it was discussed by the Prime Minister during the last election campaign, now, you Conservative senators know that is not true at all.

He said that there was going to be tax reform and he said that he was going to make it more equitable for the people of Canada. That is a long way away from the GST.

You cannot really be serious that what is being attempted here is en route to a more equitable taxation system.

This is what he said. These are the original Conservative promises that were made. Called 'A New Direction For Canada.' and 'An Agenda For Economic Renewal.'

> The Mulroney government told Canadians what they could expect from Conservative rule.
> Focusing on government revenue and expenditures in an effort to slow down and eventually reverse the growth in both the deficit and the public debt.

Well, they have doubled the debt since 1984. Second, redefining the role of government in the economy so that it allows market forces to predominate without undue government interference. This approach was supposed to foster higher investment, greater innovation, increased competitiveness and create a positive climate for new business enterprises.

This positive climate for new business enterprises is translated into the Tory lexicon, I suppose. Well, that is the Tory lexicon, but translated into basic English, that means to take the burden off the corporate sector and put it on the middle income group, the lower income group, and the poor people.

Third. Bringing about changes without sacrificing the basic sense of compassion, tolerance and justice that characterizes Canadian society.

Your government promised that it would not weaken.

I am using the words "the sacred trust of basic income support programs that have served Canadians so well in the past." Well, I was involved as parliamentary secretary of the Minister of Labour when we brought in the Unemployment Insurance Act and was involved in some of the early studies of U.I. You know what we have done? We have now adopted the American system of unemployment insurance. The government is right out of it.

● (0500)

I suppose this is part of the level playing field concept that the Americans have demanded.

Senator Marsden: At the expense of the unemployed.

Senator Perrault: We've gone American. We were Canadian when we were constructing the plan in the first instance, but now we have gone American-style. You wonder why we fought it for so long here?

> Fostering national reconciliation by reintegrating Quebec into the Canadian constitutional family and promoting harmonious federal-provincial relations.

Totally commendable objective. We should now talk about reintegrating western Canada into the Canadian constitutional family as well.

Finally:

> Placing Canada's friendship with the United States above all the other elements which make up the Canadian foreign policy.

This is right from the paper, New Directions for Canada. Well, they have been doing that. You have been doing that. Your Prime Minister becomes misty-eyed every time he talks of George Bush and his old friend, Ronald Reagan.

Senator Beaulieu: What's wrong with that?

Senator Perrault: Well I think you should be realistic and not just misty-eyed every time you think of the great presence. He doesn't become misty-eyed over Margaret Thatcher, I don't think, to the same extent. So the marketplace has really meant that—and this is a source of some of the concerns that people feel who write us and want their petitions to be tabled—"Reliance on the marketplace has meant that fundamentally your government has no industrial development strategy at all." Now it is in tatters. The number of companies that have closed down in Ontario alone, let alone B.C., is absolutely frightening. Have you checked them recently? Now some of you senators who were appointed recently, you have won your own personal battle against the war on poverty, but by gosh, many of the people that are in your regions haven't won that war. They want you to work for them just as my people want me to work for them.

> Professor Richard Harris of Queen's University noted in his very important research from the Macdonald Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada, 'it is doubtful whether a small economy like Canada can afford a hands off approach by government.'

Harris argued that it is imperative Canada focus its industrial effort on key high-growth sectors. This requires an important guiding role for government, something the Conservatives are very loath to provide. I think you still sort of believe way back there in the trickle-down economic theory that if you make the rich a lot richer, somehow a few cents are going to trickle down to the little guy at the bottom of the economic pile. Remember some of you who studied economics at university, do you remember that theory?

> Instead your government has opted for an unfettered open-for-business style that runs throughout your economic policy that trade and foreign investment policies pursued by the Tories since 1984 provide an excellent illustration of this.

You mentioned the Free Trade Agreement a moment ago.

> It has done little to establish an institutional framework within which Canada can effectively manage trade and investment flow, rather the door has simply been thrown open. Little or no attention has been paid to how freer trade and investment can be maximized to the benefit of all Canadians.

Free trade did not win in the province of British Columbia in the last federal election, and it would go down to a dismal defeat now.

> In the regions that you represent are the citizens organizing in riotous support for the free trade deal and the wonderful benefits that it has brought them since it has been enacted by your government. Has it meant new industrial expansion in the Atlantic provinces and in central Canada?

Quite the contrary has occurred. So much so that some towns are putting signs up like, "the last person to leave this town, please turn off the lights." Have there been huge benefits pouring in from the province of Quebec? The statistics do not indicate that.

> Free Trade Agreement with the United States has done little to establish an institutional framework within which Canada can effectively manage trade and investment flows. The doors have simply been thrown open. Little or no attention has been paid to how freer trade and investments can be maximized to the benefit of all Canadians. The government has assumed that simply eliminating tariffs and other forms of protection would usher in a new era of prosperity.

Now they want to bring in Mexico. Some of the parts manufacturers in Ontario have pulled out and are now manufacturing those items down in Mexico at the present time. You know it and I know it, and they make them for 85 cents an hour in this so-called zone, the manufacturing zone down there.

> In return for this uncertain benefit, you have unblinkingly sold off Canadian sovereign control over key economic growth sectors such as energy and manufacturing. Free trade has left Canada economically dependent on the United States running counter to the Canadian tradition of seeking diversified trading relationships in a global economy.
> Finally, the 20 per cent appreciation of the Canadian dollar has threatened to cancel any possible benefits that may accrue to Canada through an improved export position.

They have done other things, too, that have led to the malaise and the upset in this country. Why do former Conservatives write angry letters like the kind I have quoted. Your own supporters.

> Replacement of the Foreign Investment Review Act by the Investment Canada Act has further impeded Canada's capacity to freely determine its economic future. Since its start up in 1985, Investment Canada has approved or more appropriately simply recorded 4,000 foreign investments. The review process has been largely cursory. Even when so-called undertakings are demanded of the investor, there is little clout to ensure they are enforced. Not surprisingly, foreign investors have been quick to respond. Cross border direct investment flows have doubled from $4.5 billion annually in the early 80s to a high of $12 billion under the Tories. Acquisition of Canadian assets by foreigners have risen in recent years. At one time they accounted for less than 10 per cent of foreign direct investment. They now account for over 55 per cent. Among the better known foreign acquisitions have been several high-technology firms, including Mitel, Lumonics and Connaught BioSciences. Connaught acquisition used to be one of the great prides of all Canadians from coast to coast. Illustrates the potential cost associated with the government's open-for-business approach. Acquired by the Institut Mérieux of France, a state-owned Connaught competitor, significant rationalization will inevitably follow the merging of the two business enterprises. Given the obligation of Mérieux to respect the ownership interests of the French government, one does not need a degree in economic theory to see that the rationalization would likely be at the expense of Canadian interests. The Mulroney government felt obliged to follow the dictates of the market and award the takeover to the highest bidder. This despite the fact that an alternative bid by a Swiss-American consortium was clearly a net benefit to Canadian interests.

And so it goes on and on. We are chastised for bringing to this chamber the petitions of the people that we represent. I mentioned that the B.C. legislature passed a unanimous resolution condemning the GST and urging the federal government to withdraw the proposed new tax. They believe that the GST is seriously flawed, that more importantly the whole rationale for imposing a federal retail tax is flawed when the current fiscal situation is reviewed. You are going to dismiss the concerns of Canada's third largest province? Obviously you are not concerned about penalizing Canada's third largest province by making us pay 20 per cent, 25 per cent more in GST on certain items because of transportation. That doesn't bother you. You don't think that is any risk to Confederation. All that does is drive another nail into Canadian unity when you do things like that.

Senator Simard: Clothing.

Senator Perrault: You can defend anything, senator. We are not all trained seals.

Senator Simard: Is that all you are good for in opposition. You didn't have the answers when you were in power, and now you seem to have them all.

Senator Perrault: It is no secret that the federal government sees the GST as a solution to its current budgetary crisis. Long ago we gave up the pretences. This is revenue neutral. Remember that old line, it is revenue neutral. That means it isn't going to hurt you any more and it is going to be wonderful. They have given that one up now. It is an attempt to stem the red ink and slow the growth of a mountain of debt. If the $350 billion federal debt was translated into $100 bills, we could pave the TransCanada Highway from Vancouver to Toronto. I think we are in serious straits financially in this country, and a fair tax system has to be evolved in order to meet the problem. Any party that announces that it is critical about GST has to have alternatives. We suggested some here today. I suggested some the other day. Our leader has now formed a group to present some options. I don't think that this crude tax grab is the only solution to the fiscal dilemma. There is another option. That is, to cut expenses. It is not the time to go to the people for more money, but it is the time to get our house in order and reduce the debt by managing expenditures more effectively. Social welfare ministers sit down and see if we can reduce or eliminate duplication, make the administration of social welfare benefits fairer to the people in need. I know that you have got a program to cut back on spending. It is not easy to find all the areas where you would make substantial savings. No one said it was, but you chose to be government and people are asking you to perform. Everyone agrees that the existing 13.5 per cent federal sales tax is flawed, and as the British Columbia Minister of Finance said the other day, "Well", he said, "Conservatives going around the country preaching the 13.5 per cent federal sales tax is flawed," he said, "I should observe that these flaws were far less important in 1984 when the tax rate was only 9 per cent and the Conservatives decided to keep on shoving it up." Unfortunately this is the opinion of the B.C. legislators, the GST cure is worse than the ST disease.

> The most obvious flaw of the GST is that it is extremely complex.

This is the view held in my region.

> It will make Canada the first developed country to impose two distinct levels of retail sales tax.

[Senator Perrault.]

Can't you get together with those Ministers of Finance and at least try to work out a deal. In my local supermarket, the manager came up to me when I was shopping last Saturday and he said he has to buy $40,000 worth of new cash register equipment in order to meet the GST deadline. Forty-thousand bucks. Has any consideration been given to the plight of these two young men who are trying to make a living out of a supermarket store that they purchased just a couple of years ago and they are up to their necks in debt?

● (0515)

This tax will make Canada the first developed country to impose two distinct levels of retail sales tax. Retailers, whose jobs are not easy at the best of times, will suddenly be faced with problems in terms of whether things are taxable federally, provincially, neither or both. The so-called "simplified accounting methods" that are to be used to deal with this problem are not as straightforward as has been claimed, according to small business people in my region. Ironically, it is the small to medium sized businesses that will be the hardest hit by the complexity of the GST. Given that this sector is the key to job creation and economic health, we should be extremely wary of adding to their administrative burden.

Why do we always victimize the weak in society? The Canadian Manufacturer's Association has had a cheering section for this deal for months. This association thinks it is the greatest thing since the second coming. The little guy, who provides most of the jobs, is not enthusiastic. It is hardly surprising that the small business community has been a particularly vocal critic of the GST.

By the federal government's estimates, the introduction of the GST is going to add 1.25 per cent to price levels. Tell this to Murphy!

Honourable senators, I took a look at a document citing New Zealand's experience the other day. I see that the New Zealand government has been thrown out because of its introduction of a tax similar to the GST. Have senators opposite seen that? Does that send chills up their spines?

Senator Simard: A few years ago you were citing New Zealand as being a model of the world. Now you and your NDP friends say that Sweden is the greatest.

Senator Perrault: I will pay $100 to your favourite charity if what you say is truthful! You are afraid of the facts and figures from New Zealand. The people there became disgusted with their government!

Senator Simard: Do you know why that happened? They lived beyond their means!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, information is often the path to enlightenment and illumination. When the GST was introduced in New Zealand in 1986, the inflation rate jumped from 11 to 18 per cent. It is a unitary state without the complexities we have in Canada. The land mass of Canada makes it difficult to avoid GST tax complexities. It is going to cost more for goods in Yellowknife and Whitehorse than it will for the same goods in Toronto. And we do not all live in downtown Toronto.

In spite of the fact that two-thirds of the people of New Zealand opposed the tax, the government raised it again in 1989 by 2.5 per cent, causing further hardships for the average family. And that, by the way, was the Labour Party government in New Zealand. I suppose they are the Conservatives' ideological allies now. Is that so, Senator Simard? The socialists are the ones who introduced this sort of tax in New Zealand. Have you patterned the GST after the socialist system down there?

The Labour government was involved, as well, in phasing out the only wealth tax left in New Zealand, the 2 per cent tax on property. The country plunged into a recession. Conservatives have chosen New Zealand as their model. The government has been thrown out on its ear in that country. The Leader of the Government resigned six months ago. He was so unpopular that he said he had better leave in the interests of the party and in the interests of the country. Is the pattern you want to follow? Is this why you do not want petitions tabled in this house?

Honourable senators, I have another letter here from Prince George, a letter of support in the way we are handling the GST debate in progress. This person states: "Please be advised that I firmly object to the GST and feel that the Liberal Party is doing the right thing by holding it up."

Honourable senators, I like getting the Conservative letters. They are often much more interesting because they are usually more vehement. In the letters we receive from Conservatives, there is almost a sense of betrayal. They state how they expected more from you people after the promises you made.

Here is a letter from a well known educator in the West Coast, Patrick L. McGeer, a former Social Credit cabinet minister. He states:

> I hope you will read into the Senate record at your earliest opportunity my strong support for the actions being taken by the Senate with respect to the proposed Goods and Services Tax.

This letter is from one of our leading educators and medical doctors. I regret that Dr. Keon is not here at the moment. He was earlier, but perhaps he will read this. We need a doctor in the house.

Senator Bonnell: You have one right here.

Senator Perrault: Let us hear from this medical doctor:

> The Senate was conceived to be a chamber for sober second thought. The Founders of our country considered it essential to have a body with legislative power that could stand aloof from the short-term demands of party politics, and thus be able to curb excesses in the House of Commons. The GST is overwhelmingly opposed by the people of Canada. The House of Commons cannot claim to have a mandate to introduce legislation that is so obviously contrary to the wishes of the electorate.

Indeed, and this is my own aside, that is the reason why the Senate was created, to be able to stand up to excessive abuse of power by governments. Dr. McGeer continues:

> This is the single, most important time in the history of the Senate for it to discharge its duty to the Canadian people.
> The packing of the Senate will surely be recorded by historians as one of the most debasing moments in Canadian political history. Please convey my strong support for those Senators who must resort to unprecedented measures in order to salvage the honour of the Senate. Their names will be recorded in history as legislators of high principle; those who try to ram through the GST will justifiably be recorded in the Hall of Shame.

Senator Bonnell: That letter was written by a member of the Social Credit Party?

Senator Perrault: Yes, Dr. McGeer was a former Social Credit cabinet minister.

Do senators opposite want to be members of the Hall of Shame when they know in their hearts that this thing is wrong, that it is going to hurt their regions, that it is unfair and discriminatory? I am looking at you, senator. Can you defend in the region where you live the fact that your citizens will have to pay more under this tax system than citizens in Toronto will have to pay? You are not a westerner if you think that way. Oh, stand up and make your own speech. You have been singularly lacking in constructive contributions since you have arrived!

Honourable senators, I now want to read from a letter from the Roman Catholic Church—Victoria diocese:

> We ask you, on behalf of the poor of this Province, to use your influence to stop the passage of the GST which strikes hardest at those who are least able to bear the blow. As our Senator, you can speak for them. We ask you to do this.

Senators opposite sit there and say, "We are all right. We have our Senate appointments and we are going to follow orders." Well, honourable senators, that is what they said at Nuremberg: "I was only following orders." It is time to stand up for principle and conscience. To say that we must bring the concerns of our people to this place. To say that we are not allowed to read petitions, is—there is Laughing Jack in the back row again.

Senator Sylvain: I am listening to a damn good comic!

Senator Perrault: A damn good comic? Well, you are a damn poor senator, from what I have seen so far.

Senator Sylvain: Why don't you get to the debate and have something interesting to say?

Senator Perrault: If you have something to say, I will pay appropriate attention to it. However, we are talking about our right to bring the concerns of our people to this chamber. We are talking about their right to be listened to.

Honourable senators, another letter that I have is from Osoyoos, British Columbia. I promised to bring it here. It states:

> I am writing to express my deep disappointment and disillusionment caused by your actions as Prime Minister and Michael Wilson's actions as Finance Minister as regards the GST . . .

Do you have any idea what it is like for people in a small business who work, scrimp, save and borrow for six years of recession to prevent going into bankruptcy? To finally see some light at the end of the tunnel as the economy begins to pick up and one can begin to pay off debts, only to be plunged right back into the recession by the actions of your government?

After six years in office, you and your government have changed none of the above, Mr. Mulroney!

Mr. Wilson even has the audacity to say we need the GST to pay for services we have asked the government to provide. I know of no outcry from the people of Canada for all of the above-mentioned programs. These were Federal Government initiatives forced on us by an irresponsible government and continued by an equally irresponsible government.

Senator Cogger: Which one was that?

Senator Perrault: This writer had some criticisms of the preceding government—I am reading the whole thing.

Senator Cogger: I thought you were a member of that government!

Senator Perrault: He continues:

and you now insult us . . . your blatant patronage appointments to the Senate. This was done specifically to nullify that body's effectiveness—

People are very intelligent. They have it figured out. Listen to what this says:

This was done specifically to nullify that body's effectiveness just when it was finally going to do exactly what it is constitutionally charged to do—reject a bill that is harmful to our country. By your action, we do not have even a pretence of a protection against a dictatorial federal government! And we all know what happened to both Alberta Conservative MPs when they objected to the GST by voting against it at the request of their constituents.

Have honourable senators noticed that the Alberta Conservative Party, over the weekend, decided to divorce itself from you people?

Senator Sparrow: Yes, I saw that.

Senator Perrault: In the last Manitoba provincial election campaign, Mr. Filmon refused to put the word "Conservative" on his signs.

Senator Simard: So what?

Senator Cogger: What's that got to do with the motion?

Senator Perrault: Even your own followers are ashamed of you! As someone said yesterday, this is the most right wing government we have had in the history of Canada. Your own followers are ashamed of you and fed up with the way you have served the public interest. That is the story.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Marsden: May I ask Senator Perrault whether his correspondence mentions how very close Osoyoos is to the Canadian-American border? Does he raise the problem of cross-border traffic?

Senator Perrault: I thank Senator Marsden for her constructive observation. People who drew up this measure do not realize how bad it will be for those communities close to the border. Twenty per cent of all lower Mainland milk sales, for example, on the lower mainland are now made in Washington State. Senators opposite can say that there will be no tax on food, but there will inevitably be costs to the farming community as a result of this tax. It will make it almost impossible for farmers to compete. Shopping malls are being established just across the border. The design is to get Canadian, not American, trade. These are real practical problems that must be addressed. We have a bill before us, drawn up without looking at all of its problems and administrative difficulties.

Some communities in the southern part of British Columbia—and Osoyoos is one of them—will face these problems. Vancouver is only twenty-eight miles from the U.S. border.

Senator Bonnell: The same applies in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Senator Simard: Have you heard what they have to say in P.E.I., senator? They have said, Senator Bonnell, that you have to support the GST and pass this legislation in a hurry. I have been in touch with people from P.E.I. Yesterday someone asked me whether I had seen Senator Bonnell. I said, "Yes, he sits right across from me." He said, "Would you give him a message?" I said, "What's the message?" He said, "Make sure he waits for a month or two before he returns to P.E.I." They are waiting for you, Senator Bonnell. You let them down. You did not listen. Or, if you did, you did it your own way. You supported your own party. We have no lesson to learn from you, Senator Bonnell!

As for the other maritimer, Senator Kirby, I would be careful if I were you. I would not accompany Senator Bonnell to P.E.I. I would stay away for a couple of months.

Senator Perrault: Are you rising on a point of order, Senator Simard?

Senator Kirby: Senator Simard, the ridiculousness of your position is—

Senator Simard: You have a long time to make your speech, Senator Perrault.

Senator Perrault: You are flouting all of the rules, Senator Simard!

• (0530)

Senator Simard: I have an urgent message.

Senator Perrault: It is not that urgent. You spoke all afternoon.

Senator Simard: You said you were going to vote against that report. You supported that report. You supported that "axe the tax" business. They are waiting for you in Summerside, Senator Bonnell.

Senator Kirby: Senator Simard, your position seems to be akin to that of the person who proceeds to say to someone else that he is going to cut off your two arms and your two legs, but only cuts off three limbs and then expects them to be happy. It is your government that threw thousands of people out of work in Summerside. You are now saying we have to support this bill because 200 or 300 people are going to be re-employed when you created the problem in the first place. I have difficulty with the logic of your position.

Senator Simard: Were you in P.E.I.?

Senator Kirby: I travelled with you all summer. How could you forget that? Am I that insignificant? I am crushed.

Senator Perrault: May I please intervene?

Senator Kirby: Senator Perrault, please wait your turn.

Senator Simard: Take five. Senator Kirby, the message was not so much for you as it was for Senator Bonnell. You are taking it personally. I know you have to support these people and cheer them on in the absence of the enforcer, Senator Frith, and the present leader. You have to be patient. Eventually you will make it to that position, but, in the meantime, you do not have to support lost causes. That is why I say to Senator Bonnell, you are a lost cause. The people did not tell you, Senator Kirby, to support Summerside; but they certainly told Senator Bonnell that he let them down.

Senator Bonnell: They will not vote for me again.

Senator Simard: That is a big joke, isn't it! They are not going to vote for you. I submit, sir, there will not be many Liberal MPs from P.E.I. after the next election.

Senator Perrault: Senator, can you not make another speech tomorrow?

Senator Simard: Think twice. I am trying to be helpful, and I invite you to reconsider and support Senator Doody's motion and eventually support the GST. In the next couple of weeks you will have a second chance. You better grab it!

Senator Bonnell: I will need you to cover the good points!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Simard has been in oratorical flight for 24 hours. I hope he makes a safe landing.

Senator Simard: What did you say about Khaddafi?

Senator Perrault: I do not know whether they have an opposition in Libya or not.

Senator Simard: Why did you raise it then?

Senator Perrault: I did not raise it. I was asked a question.

Senator Simard: What a waste of money!

Senator Kirby: If Senator Perrault was asked a question, I did not hear it. The senator opposite was making too much noise. I would like to try to answer your question.

Senator Perrault: I was asked a question as to whether or not there was an opposition in Libya, and I am not sure.

May I conclude by putting this short appeal on the record from a small businessman in my province. He says:

> Please fight the GST with all your resources. If passed it will put thousands of small businesses like mine out of business. I have successfully run a small plumbing and heating business for 60 years, but the GST is going to force me out of business, and I had hoped to leave it to my son.

Letters from people going out of business are flooding in.

Senator Simard: Because of the GST?

Senator Perrault: I am appealing to the consciences of our good friends on the government side to re-think their position and see what can be done to make this an acceptable tax for the people of Canada. A tax is not a good tax if it is opposed by over 90 per cent of the people. One of the hallmarks of a good tax is the efficiency of collection and its public acceptability. It is not acceptable now. The government is not meeting the criteria of a good tax. If the process of tabling petitions has any effect at all, let us hope it does something to change your attitudes on the other side of the house. Perhaps we can do something worthwhile for Canada, but do not dismiss the tabling process as being unfair, undemocratic or a ploy. The petitions we are introducing into this chamber arrived in record numbers and are sending a clear message to all of us. The people of Canada want a fair system of taxation in this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Marsden: Perhaps I should expand on the question of Colonel Quaddafi. I was looking for examples of countries where the opposition has been suppressed the way we have been in the last while. It occurred to me that Quaddafi was a likely candidate. There may be others. Albania is not that bad.

Senator Perrault, I have a question. You explained to us that when you were in a supermarket in Vancouver on the weekend you met a number of citizens who opposed the GST. Many of us have had the same experience. You have three important universities in your province, and I wonder if you have heard from the representatives of those universities in terms of their reactions.

Senator Perrault: The administration of our three universities, together with the student bodies, are adamantly opposed to the GST. This is a significant factor in Canada. The hospitals are opposed to it. The doctors are concerned.

Senator Simard: Why are the doctors opposed to it?

Senator Perrault: How many people do you plan to alienate before you force the GST through?

Senator Simard: On a point of order, I would like to remind Senator Sparrow that he had promised us copies of "Dick and Jane in Libya".

Senator Sparrow: You were out of the chamber, so I was waiting until you had returned.

Senator Bonnell: Senator Simard, if you want "Dick and Jane", you will be able to find it in both official languages in Hansard tomorrow. You can get as many copies as you like.

Senator Simard: I do not think the rules make it necessary because this is a private transaction. It has nothing to do with the house rules, but I will have it translated because I am sure my people in Madawaska will be interested to know about the research that their tax money is being spent on. Again, Senator Bonnell, you had better wait a couple of weeks before returning to P.E.I.

Senator Bonnell: For Senator Simard's sake, we should make sure we do not vote on this bill for a couple of weeks because it might not be safe for me to return to Prince Edward Island, according to Senator Simard. So let us keep going with speeches on this motion so we do not get to the GST.

Senator Simard: Make your own plans. There is nothing wrong with that.

Senator Marsden: Senator, in response to your question, you asked why doctors were opposed to the GST. Evidently you have not been to see your doctor recently. They have explained that while the GST does not apply to their services, they have to pay GST on everything they buy. The local provincial health insurance scheme does not automatically increase by 7 per cent. Doctors have to pay their staff more and buy equipment, which will have the tax added on. All their costs will increase by 7 per cent. Like students and old people, they do not automatically receive an increase in their revenues. The government is taxing doctors, dentists and all other professional groups who are "exempt" from the 7 per cent GST, and they are annoyed with it. I repeat, if any of you have been to your doctor recently, they spend five minutes with your health exam and then 25 minutes telling you what this government is doing to them with this tax. They are livid.

Senator Simard: That is not the second installment of your speech. You were asking me a question.

Senator Marsden: I was giving you a response.

Senator Simard: Let me ask you a question then. Do you know what the average salary of those doctors who appeared before the committee is? Second, what is your estimate of the additional costs that will be incurred by them as a result of the GST?

Senator Frith: Is the tax going to be based on average salary?

Senator Simard: I believe they are going to be paying around $1,700 a year.

Senator Frith: Is this an amendment whereby the tax is going to depend on a person's average salary?

Senator Simard: Honourable senators opposite have a habit.

Senator Frith: It might be a good idea to change the tax into an income tax.

Senator Simard: You sympathize with the poor people. I fail to see where the doctors fit in with the poor people of this country.

[Senator Sparrow.]

Senator Frith: Ask them! They will tell you!

Senator Simard: I am not going to lose any sleep over the fact that the average Canadian doctor will pay $1,700 more a year, because that is part of progressive taxation.

Senator Marsden: That just shows you how much Senator Simard knows about the distribution of salaries of medical doctors in this country.

Senator Simard: So you do not want doctors, poor people or students to pay more tax. The middle class person who earns between $30,000 and $60,000 is already saddled with all kinds of taxes. You want to release the doctors. Now I see the true face of the Liberal Party.

Senator Marsden: You have not understood my points or, I presume, most of what has been said in this chamber. The fact of the matter is that doctors are paying the tax along with everyone else. We are talking about their ability to adjust their revenues. This is not a fair tax. They are in a situation of earning their income from the health insurance system.

Senator Simard: I have another story to tell you.

Senator Marsden: What you are saying has absolutely nothing to do with the basis of the tax proposed by the government. You are saying that somehow tax should be related to individual income.

Senator Frith: If the government made it an income tax, it might be workable.

Senator Marsden: That is exactly what we think. Income tax is a fair, progressive tax.

Senator Frith: It is a consumption tax.

Senator Simard: You said the GST was regressive. That is another case where we can demonstrate that the GST is really progressive. I am not going to worry about specialists or doctors who make $125,000 to $150,000 a year. You can be sure that I will not lose any sleep over it.

Senator Frith: You have been here all this time and you think this is what we are talking about? He thinks we are talking about an income tax.

Senator Simard: Income tax should be progressive. As a matter of fact, you have been pleading for a more progressive taxation system.

Senator Kirby: Senator Simard, I thought you raised a point of order, but there is one thing that puzzles me. During the course of our cross-country tour you will remember that the mayor of Summerside urged passage of the bill. You asked both Senator Bonnell and myself if we remembered that witness. We both indicated we did. However, I am puzzled by the nature of the question you asked Senator Marsden. In spite of that wonderful month we spent together this summer, you seem to have forgotten that the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Hospital Association, hospital boards in five or six of the twelve cities we visited and several representatives of health-related groups appeared before the committee, and argued that the nature of the GST was such that it was going to put an additional burden on the health sector. They said repeatedly that the government's claim that the GST does not tax health is false.

● (0545)

I find it odd that the honourable senator should remember one witness from Summerside and forget the 12 or 13 witnesses from elsewhere in the country who argued the health issue and explained it just as Senator Marsden did.

I am getting a little troubled because—and you ought to be a little troubled too—the honourable senator's memory is becoming very selective. One begins to wonder if the honourable senator is not starting to have a problem, because one just cannot be that selective.

Senator Simard: Of course, honourable senators opposite know all about selectivity. I grant them that.

I mentioned doctors because Senator Perrault raised that matter. That is why I dealt with that, but then Senator Bonnell made a comment. He is a doctor and he decided to get into the act. Being concerned about Senator Bonnell's health, I caution him about going back to Prince Edward Island.

I remember what the doctors and the nurses said. It is not as simple as Senator Kirby has said, but we will have an opportunity to discuss this on third reading, if and when we get down to third reading.

Honourable senators opposite should not say that I am being selective, because that is not my habit.

Senator Kirby: I realize that. Normally, the honourable senator's interventions are much more coherent. I am surprised he had forgotten about the evidence given by those in the health sector.

On the basis of the honourable senator's comments to Senator Frith a moment ago, obviously he has forgotten all of the economists who testified—even those who are in favour of the GST—who made it clear that the tax is regressive, not progressive, to use your words. Many economists said that, for a variety of reasons, and in spite of its regressivity they accepted it.

I thought I should point out that the honourable senator seems to be forgetting what the evidence was. I thought we heard enough this summer during our wonderful tour. I thought some of the main messages might have sunk in to the honourable senator's head. I am sorry they did not.

Senator Simard: Many witnesses said that the tax was regressive. Other witnesses said that it was progressive.

Senator Perrault: Name one.

Senator Frith: Put one name on the record.

Senator Simard: Because this tax takes into account services, and because the wealthy buy more services, they will pay more tax. That makes the GST more progressive than the present federal sales tax. On that basis, it is more progressive.

As far as doctors are concerned—

Senator Perrault: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Simard: —they will be paying $1,700 more a year. It has been accepted by them that they cannot pass that extra cost along to their patients.

Senator Perrault: Name one witness who suggested that this tax was progressive.

Senator Simard: For those in the higher income brackets, it is progressive.

Senator Perrault: Name one witness who appeared before the committee on the GST who alleged that this measure was progressive.

Senator Simard: I promise to do that. I have several names of individuals and organizations.

Senator Perrault: If you know, why wait? This should be at your fingertips. Your statement is absolutely untrue.

Senator Simard: Just wait! If you bet your seat, I will bet mine. Will you take that chance?

Senator Frith: Why are you refusing to put one name on the record?

Senator Simard: If I am proven wrong, I will stake my seat on that. Will you stake your seat?

Senator Frith: Name one.

Senator Simard: Obviously, Senator Frith has read all of the texts. Will he stake his seat on that?

Senator Frith: Just name one. What do seats have to do with this?

Senator Simard: I will get names.

Senator Frith: We understand. You do not have any names.

Senator Perrault: You are on the hot seat now!

Senator Simard: Bet your seat on that!

Senator Frith: Why do you not have the guts to say you do not have a name?

Senator Simard: We have names, several names.

Senator Perrault: You have the Prime Minister's name.

Senator Frith: Now they say they have thousands of names.

Senator Marsden: It has been difficult to follow some of the statements made by Senator Simard. Did the honourable senator say a few moments ago that because he is in favour of progressive taxation he is opposed to this value-added tax and in favour of changes to the Income Tax Act? It seems to me the conclusion of the honourable senator's attempt to analyze this tax measure—well, would the honourable senator repeat for us his argument, because I believe he has said that he is no longer in favour of the value-added tax, but in favour of a more progressive income tax.

Senator Simard: I never said that. Senator Frith got into the act and tried to get everybody confused by referring to income taxes.

Senator Frith: You got everybody confused by talking about seats.

Senator Simard: I said the GST is progressive because the more affluent do spend more on services, and therefore pay more tax. The doctors have to pay an extra $1,700 a year. The poor doctors! That is what makes the tax more progressive.

Senator Frith: Are you speaking on the motion?

Senator Simard: I am answering questions. I am supporting the GST. I think it is more progressive than honourable senators opposite think it is. We will try to make it even more progressive over the years, as the current government has made the income tax more progressive because of changes to the surtax for individuals and corporations, over the past two or three years, and including as recently as last week.

Senator Marsden: How on earth could one make the GST more progressive? Is the honourable senator confusing raising the rate with changing the conditions, or is the honourable senator talking about rebates?

Senator Simard: I am not the Minister of Finance.

Senator Perrault: Obviously.

Senator Bosa: I wonder if I could put a question to Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: I am not part of your filibuster. All I am trying to do is get honourable senators opposite back on to the motion. I am not making any speeches.

Senator Frith: For someone who is not part of our filibuster, you are being very helpful. Keep it up!

Senator Bosa: I only attended the committee meetings in Toronto. Consequently, I have limited experience regarding the number of witnesses that appeared before the committee. I know the Honourable Senator Simard sat on the committee throughout the hearings. When he said a moment ago that the GST is not a regressive tax, could he explain why it is not regressive, because it applies to everybody uniformly? How can it not be a regressive tax? Will the honourable senator elaborate on that?

Senator Simard: I do not think this is the proper time to do that.

Senator Frith: You have to stake your seat on something to get an answer from Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: I do not need hours to give several examples. I only need 30 seconds. The refundable credit makes it less regressive than it would normally be.

Secondly, as compared to the present federal sales tax, which involves no credit to speak of—perhaps one put in by this government a couple of years ago, but that is neither here nor there.

Because present federal sales tax costs each Canadian, on average, a little over $600 a year, on which there is no refundable credit to speak of, and because the GST, when passed, will cost no more for the average Canadian than the present system, it will be less regressive.

Senator Perrault: That is garbage!

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Simard: I say that because it will cost some Canadians only $25 a year and some $15 or less a year. That is not very much. So it is less regressive.

Regarding doctors, if they are going to have to pay $1,700 more because of the GST, then it is progressive taxation because doctors make more money than average Canadians. They earn, on average, $125,000 to $140,000 a year. So they will pay more than they used to pay. I suppose that makes the GST more progressive.

Another way I think the GST is more progressive—and I do not want to be too long. I want to go for breakfast, just like everybody else. Our shift is terminating soon. The GST is more progressive because—well, I have missed my point.

Senator Perrault: Just forget it and sit down.

Senator Frith: Take your time.

Senator Simard: I just looked at Senator Frith and lost my train of thought.

Under the proposed system, the one the Liberals will lose the vote on shortly, because services will be taxed, and because wealthy people buy more in total, they will pay more, which makes it progressive.

I promised I would give my honourable friends opposite the names of the witnesses who said that this is more progressive than the system we have, and I will do that.

● (0600)

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I am very glad to see that Senator Sylvain is here today. Because yesterday, Senator Sylvain was complaining that we do not talk of substance.

He said that he wanted to debate the substance of the GST and that is why you have a motion to put aside petitions and to get to the substance.

The substance of our whole debate is that we do not want this GST and I am about to tell, at length, in detail, every figure why precisely the GST is the wrong economic policy and why all of your economic policies are the wrong economic policies.

One of your key arguments is the deficit and that unless we have the GST we will not be able to afford what we want to afford. We need more revenue.

The point is, what can we afford to do? There is an influential school of economic thought that says that we can afford nothing, or rather that our governments can afford nothing—should afford nothing. Governments, according to this group, well represented on the other side, should do as little as possible, stop spending, stop taxing and let individuals take over from the state in practically everything, including the printing of private money. These are the most conservative of conservative economic theorists.

Short of this extreme view, there are many economists and business people who want government to reduce its staff and cut its spending on pensions, medicare, family allowances, unemployment insurance and job creation projects. Many who hold these views are influential men and they can afford to propagate their opinions effectively through the media, using the services of the most persuasive spokesmen.

They tell us that big government takes up economic space that should be left to the private sector, allowing it to make profits and create jobs which are the best social security.

The economic debate in Canada, as elsewhere, is between the cut-the-size-of-government view and the view that he supports the power of the profit motive. But there are good things a government can contribute. These are the two views.

The debate often pits the fear of economic depression against the fear of run-away inflation caused by big government spending.

Run-away inflation, when there is no stopping the explosive rise in prices, is a terrible plague. It scares not only the rich but all those people, and they are many, who save money to buy something important or to secure a nest egg for a rainy day. It is reasonable and understandable that such people do not want their savings to lose value because prices grow explosively.

In erecting defences against run-away inflation we must not dismantle defences we have built over the years against another terrible plague, run-away depression. When prices fall, jobs vanish, business stagnates and nothing can turn things around.

This is the substance of the debate between us. Do we follow the policies of those who want to cut the size of government and consider this the best way to fight inflation? Or, do we follow the policies of those who want government to have an important enough role in the economy to prevent economic depressions and promote employment?

The trick is to find a solution that avoids run-away inflation but that also gives us defences against run-away depression.

To devise the right policies we must understand how those two terrible economic plagues, run-away inflation and run-away depression, have occurred and still could occur.

The Great Depression of the 1930s was not the first of its kind. There had been others before. If we lower our defences there could be one again. There could certainly have been one in 1981. In the absence of such defences, which we call our social safety net, here is how a major economic depression could start, using an example that I have quoted to you previously many times.

The building of office towers, for instance, slows down because overbuilding results in more office space than tenants. Construction workers lose their jobs. Faced with lessened demand, industries supplying construction firms with bricks, lumber, cement, steel, plaster, paint, electrical wiring, appliances, close down or let staff go. Real estate firms, insurance companies and banks lose clients and cut staff.

Without unemployment insurance and welfare the newly unemployed reduce their purchases of food and stop buying clothes, furniture, entertainment, automobiles and so on. This cuts the sales of even more industries which fire staff thus further swelling the ranks of the unemployed.

A bank finds that its borrowers can no longer pay back their loans. The bank goes under. Fearing for the creditworthiness of other banks, people withdraw their deposits. Emptied of money, the banking system collapses.

As so many people no longer have any earnings they pay no taxes and the government's revenues fall and deficits rise. Facing empty coffers, the government cuts spending which means that it dismisses personnel and stops buying supplies. This only makes matters worse, because the supplies of the government and of its former employees lose additional sales, fire staff and buy less.

That is precisely what happened in the Great Depression of the 1930s before the introduction of unemployment insurance, welfare, family allowances and government spending for job creation.

Each phase of that monstrous economic downturn made the next phase worse. Each falling industry dragged other industries down. Falling dominoes, or an endless downward spiral into misery are two images that were used then to describe the great depression. It conditioned the thinking of most who lived through it.

Despite the advice of innovative economists, governments listened instead to bankers, and bankers were telling both individuals and governments that the only way to make things better was to cut spending and never mind lunatics who were talking about spending ourselves into prosperity.

But that is exactly what we did with the outbreak of World War II. Nations that had been economically paralysed had to fight for their lives. They forgot about their empty coffers and their depression days obsession with balanced budgets. They printed the extra money they needed and paid people to construct buildings, ships, trucks, roads and armaments.

"Printing money," in quotation marks, that is, increasing the quantity of paper money in circulation—has always been considered sinful by bankers, business people and conservative economists.

Printing money is an oversimplification of the complex way in which governments spend more than they collect in taxes, but it is a familiar image and not far from the truth.

If you increase the amount of printed money faster than the economy increases its production of goods soon you may have too much money chasing too few goods. As everyone knows, if a growing amount of paper money is being offered for what few goods are available, the amount of money those goods can fetch will grow. In other words, prices will go up, and that is inflation. Both rich and poor see their dollar buy less than it once bought.

However, there was little inflation during World War II. Government printed large quantities of money to pay those working in the war effort. They then borrowed back much of this newly printed money by selling war bonds to the patriotic public.

This borrowing paid for the inevitably huge government deficits. It also increased the national debt. But contrary to orthodox theories it did not cause inflation because the government controlled the prices of what civilian goods were being produced.

Nearly everyone who wanted to could find work, make money and even save. They were free from the numbing fear of ruin, and that was a great liberation for people who had spent so many years destitute.

The war revived the economy precisely in a way the economist John Maynard Keynes had said an economy could be jolted out of a great depression. Regardless of how empty the government coffers were during a depression, said Keynes, money should be printed and spent to create jobs. People with no income would then have money. They would buy things again.

Enterprises that once made those things would begin making them again, hiring, and paying workers, who would buy even more things.

The downward spiral would be reversed, Keynes predicted, and start moving upwards. World War II proved him utterly right. Keynes also recommended that also in good times government debts should be paid off, but that advice was often conveniently forgotten.

Keynesian economists preached that the lesson to be drawn from the war economy was that depressions could be prevented if we made sure that during the economic slowdown people who lost their jobs did not also lose all income. If they were paid enough to live on while they were unemployed, sales would continue—at a lower level admittedly—but continue nevertheless. The businesses that made and sold those things would not be annihilated. We would avoid the falling domino effect, the downward spiral described above. The economy would fall a little, but it would not plunge down a bottomless hole. After a pause, it would be able to start climbing again.

Thus, the Keynesian solution to economic depressions was to protect the income of the people so that they could go on buying things, keeping other people employed making those things. That meant protecting those whose income came only from unemployment; and that is the economic justification for unemployment insurance. But it would not do much good to protect the purchasing power of the unemployed poor if they paid what little money they had to doctors and hospitals. That is the economic justification for medicare.

Finally the poorer members of society, whether unemployed or not, could also lose their purchasing power if they had to care for destitute, aged or sick relatives, or for children below the legal working age; and that is the economic justification for old age pensions and allowances for children and the handicapped.

The problem with the Keynesian solution in view of Keynes's opponents, is that the money the government puts to energize a flagging economy will be spent at the wrong time. By the time we have identified what is wrong and start spending, they say, it is already too late. If we could get the timing right, printing money to restart the economy would be all right but we could never get the timing right.

As distinct from economists—

Senator Frith: What are you reading from, senator?

Senator Gigantès: This is my speech, my written speech by me. Every word.

As distinct from economists, business people do not get—and if I may, senator, it goes to the heart of the matter.

Senator Frith: I understand.

Senator Gigantès: The heart of the matter is, what can we afford, should we spend, do we need more money, how do we fight the deficit? and I am going to give you a full explanation taking everything into account including regional development, defence policies, our relation with the United States in the Free Trade Agreement, all of which impinge on this question of, can we afford what we need to do without this tax? It is not a simple matter to explain and so it will take many hours. I may be talking all day.

Senator Frith: You could break it into instalments.

Senator Gigantès: Maybe. We will see how long I last.

As distinct from economists, business people do not get technical about timing. They complain instead that much of the help given to the poor at times of recession is paid precisely at times when business produces fewer goods, when tax revenues have fallen and the government has to print money to help the poor so they can continue buying, which means that there are more dollars to offer for the same goods, which is one definition of inflation—too many dollars chasing too few goods. And these days, this new bout of inflationary deficit spending, generated because governments print money every time there is a recession, occurs in economies that have become inflation prone since the end of the Second World War.

Indeed, important businesses grown larger and larger found that cut-throat competition is not good and they stopped trying to undersell one another. When one raised prices so did the others. When workers asked for more they got it because business, freed from cut-throat competition, could raise prices to absorb the higher wages and avoid the hassle of a strike.

• (0615)

As prices kept rising, more and more unionized workers asked for and received wages that rose automatically when the cost of living rose, a procedure called indexation. Among these workers were a growing number of public servants. The fear that a recession might turn into a new Great Depression diminished. Recessions were relatively minor during the first quarter century after World War II. Business did not have to cut prices significantly as demand was protected by anti-depression government spending such as unemployment insurance, pensions, family allowances, medicare and welfare. Labour, therefore, did not have to give up its gains in wages and benefits, including indexation. Prices went up—inflation—but no faster than the income of unionized labour. It became an article of faith that one did not give up gains in profits or salaries.

Then the Vietnam war and the Arab oil cartel turned this brave new world on its ear. The U.S. government increased spending by the Vietnam war but did not raise taxes to pay for the extra spending. Washington simply printed more dollars. This deficit spending by the U.S. government produced two correlated results. One: the already large share of U.S. resources going into the making of arms was made even larger by the Vietnam war. The American economy turned out growing quantities of economically sterile weapons. A tractor can be used in making roads and hauling loads. A tractor is not only the off-spring of economic activity; it is also the progenator of economic activities. It is economically fertile, whereas artillery guns are sterile because they are not used in the making of other economically useful things. Thus, in the United States the quantities of useful things to buy grew more slowly than the quantity of new paper dollars in the pockets of Americans. To put it another way, more dollars were available to pay for the fewer economically fertile products that were being turned out by the U.S. economy, and the prices of economically fertile American products rose.

Two: to make weapons or to replace the peaceful production the weapons were displacing, the U.S. bought loosely from the rest of the world, paying with new paper dollars that had lost much of their value as we saw. In fact, all dollars lost purchasing power, even those that people had stashed away before inflation. It is like adding half a glass of vermouth to half a glass of gin. Because the vermouth has a lower alcohol content than the gin, the mixture will have a lower alcohol content than gin.

After World War II, American firms spent billions of dollars outside the United States buying up property and establishing industries. All those dollars in the hands of people outside the USA lost significant purchasing power. Moreover, people with money, like oil sheiks, had stashed their profits in dollars. These dollars, too, lost purchasing power. If a dollar loses its purchasing power, it takes more dollars to buy a car. The price of the car in dollars has gone up. Inflation. People around the world became flushed with the devalued dollars. As the U.S. dollar was everyone's alternative currency, and the currency for important international transactions, that currency lost much of its value and prices rose. In other words, the U.S. exported its inflation to the world.

Then came the oil shock. From 1973 to 1979, oil producing countries, mainly Arab, increased the price of oil 14-fold, from $3 to $42 US a barrel. The price of everything went up, as fuel goes into making or using nearly everything. This oil-generated inflation came on top of the inflation created by the devalued U.S. dollar. As prices rose ever faster, wage earners, entrepreneurs, and people with money to lend demanded higher wages, prices and interest. They sought not only to compensate themselves for increases in the cost due to existing inflation, but also for future inflation. So inflation reproduced itself. As interest rates climbed to between 22 and 23 per cent, fewer and fewer businesses that functioned on borrowed money—as so many do—could make a profit, squeezed as they were between rising interest rates and rising wage demands. Faced with the steep climb in the cost of living, workers were reluctant to moderate the demands for raises, let alone accept cuts in wages. Workers like everyone else were conditioned to expect higher, not lower, incomes. In any case, it is not easy for a worker to accept a cut in wages when interest payments on the mortgage and car loan are climbing, and when everything costs more and more. As fewer and fewer consumers could afford the rising prices, they cut their spending. Sales fell. Businesses closed and their workers, forced into the ranks of the unemployed, could afford even less than other consumers.

In 1981 the economy of all industrialized countries went bad. In 1982 it went from bad to worse. It suffered from a severe case of stagflation, an economic illness that most economists had not foreseen—when business stagnates in the midst of inflation. In conservative economic orthodoxy, stagflation should not happen. Business stagnates when consumers are not buying at the prevailing prices. To sell, according to this theory, businesses must lower their prices and pay less than what is being asked for raw materials, wages in on interest for money borrowed. The purveyors of raw material, labour or money for borrowing reduce their demands. Business can turn out products or services at the lower price that the consumer is willing to pay. The general level of prices falls. Inflation is cured, the economy starts humming again and everyone lives gainfully ever after.

More bluntly, this theory says that if everyone becomes too greedy, there will be an economic downturn, and when the downturn becomes severe enough and lasts long enough, wages and prices will both come down and inflation will abate. Things will return to a certain equilibrium in the long run because everyone will have learned to be less greedy. Keynes's response to this argument was: "In the long run we shall all be dead." There was no room in this theory for stagflation—the simultaneous occurence of rising prices and stagnation.

But in the 1970s and 1980s stagflation did happen. Business could not sell enough of its products at the prevailing prices. Business people said, however, that they could not lower their prices because their suppliers of raw materials or labour or loan money would not lower their prices or wages or interest rates. There is no doubt that the inflation of the 1970s and early 1980s did real damage. Stocks listed on the Dow Jones index at the New York Stock Exchange bought in 1973 for $100 were only worth $51 in 1982 after adjusting for inflation. On the Toronto Stock Exchange on the index, stocks bought for $100 in 1973 were worth only $60 in 1982. No wonder that people with nest eggs, whether small or substantial, were traumatized by such losses.

I have a table here in my speech which is rather short, and I ask permission that it be printed along with the speech that illustrates the figures.

Senator Doody: Agreed.

Senator Gigantès: Conservative-minded economists put much of the blame for such inflation on social security measures devised as a consequence of the Great Depression of the 1930s. Before the introduction of these measures, as we saw, significant depressions could occur because each business that failed and fired its staff affected its suppliers and the suppliers' staff, who in turn failed and fired their staffs, and so on downward. So governments introduced family allowances, medicare, unemployment insurance, pensions and welfare, which together form the social safety net that stops the economy from falling down the bottomless depression pit. In the late 1970s and early 1980s, a deep recession hit the whole industrialized world. The recession that began here in 1981 was terrible indeed, though it did not degenerate to the depths of the major depression. Even so, unemployment rose by 416,000 in 1981. Our manufacturing plant that had been working at 77.5 per cent of capacity in 1981 suddenly worked at only 65.9 per cent of capacity in 1982, a fall of 11.6 percentage points and the Gross Domestic Product fell by $11.5 billion from $356 billion to $344.5 billion.

Some definitions will make clear what follows. The Gross Domestic Product—the GDP—is the value of all the goods and services we produce as a nation. We are paid an income to produce these goods and services. The income we are paid equals the value of the goods and services we produce. So we say that the GDI—the Gross Domestic Income—of the nation equals the GDP. Those who pay us this income are incurring an expenditure equal to the income they have paid us. So the nation's GDE—Gross Domestic Expenditure—equals its Gross Domestic Income, which as we say, equals its Gross Domestic Product. In short, GDP equals GDI equals GDE.

Let us now consider what might have happened had we removed the social safety net during the last recession. Bill C-21 removes part of the social safety net. All these things hold together. That is why we oppose what you are trying to do. All figures that follow are from Statistics Canada. In 1981 social programs represented $31 billion in expenditures by all levels of government. Eliminating social programs in that year would have reduced the gross domestic expenditure or GDE or GDP or GDI by $31 billion.

● (0630)

We saw that the fall of $11.5 billion in GDP or GDE or GDI due to the recession of 1981 was associated with the rise in unemployment of 416,000 and the fall in manufacturing capacity utilization of 11.6 percentage points. If those were the effects associated with an $11.5 billion drop in GDP, how much more would employment and manufacturing production have fallen had we had an additional fall in GDE of $31 billion, which would have been 2.7 times greater? Is it far-fetched to think that we might have been on the road to another great depression like that of the 1930s, with both unemployment and manufacturing capacity plummeting?

If we continue with this hypothesis, we should assume that another $141 billion would have been taken out of the economy from 1982 through 1984. This $141 billion represents government spending on the social safety net from 1982 through 1984. Would there have been a recovery in that case? Would a major drawn-out depression, like the one in the 1930s, have been unthinkable?

Some economists argue that had there been no social security measures in 1981, the then unemployed would have accepted lower wages immediately. Perhaps such huge government social programs would have left more room for business to get the economy rolling again faster, with less inflation and unemployment than actually occurred.

In the great depression of the 1930s, there were no social security measures. People were ready to accept any wage, however low. Government was cutting spending precipitously, leaving the entire field to business, yet through ten agonizing years, business did not get the economy rolling again. It took the Second World War and heavy government involvement in the economy to end the great depression. However, economists who dislike government spending do not dwell on the lesson of the Great Depression. They simply say that, to finance social programs during the 1981 business downturn when tax revenues fell dramatically, the government borrowed huge sums and is now saddled with an unacceptably high national debt. Interest payments on this debt account for one-third of government spending and are equal to our continuing deficit. Therefore, we must cut spending on social programs. The ensuing reduction of the government's role in the economy would be all to the good, such economists, or some senators opposite, might say.

Proponents of this view specify that such things as unemployment insurance, welfare, old age pensions, family allowances and medicare are prime areas for government cutbacks. Certainly, we should not reject out of hand the case for cutting government spending. We should look at these categories of spending with a view to reducing them or making them more productive for the economy.

In the last recession, Canada, along with Japan, did best among the seven major industrialized countries at weathering the storm and minimalizing the misery of the people. But, if we take staying out of debt as the indicator of economic performance, Canada did less well, principally because those who were economically conservative fought every government attempt to move towards a full-employment policy.

Honourable senators, I will now make a proposition which I will then prove: Countries that make full employment the principal aim of their economic policy seem to outperform countries that do not. Countries with a full employment policy seem better at staying out of debt, at getting out of debt and at maintaining a high level average wealth for their citizens. Not all full employment countries perform equally well in all economic activities, but over all they seem to perform better than those countries without full employment policies. This is something I brought to the attention of the Senate in December 1987 in a report of the subcommittee I had the honour to chair, that on Training and Employment. The Economic Council of Canada checked my figures and, in its latest report, made the same statement, using my arguments in the order in which I will give them to senators, without an academic tip of the hat, which is customary, to the person from whom they borrowed the ideas. They even have the same tables and graphs as I do.

Senator Stewart: But, Senator Gigantès, is that not the usual practice of government departments and agencies over the years in dealing with the Senate? The Senate makes a report and then a government department or agency, Liberal or Conservative, may take it up and use it without any attribution to its senatorial source. I do not think you should feel especially selected for this kind of maltreatment.

Senator Gigantès: Oh, I do not feel selected or even victimized. I simply point out the lack of academic good manners on the part of an appointee of Prime Minister Mulroney.

Senator Bosa: I wonder whether the honourable senator would permit a question? He made several references to countries of full employment. He stated that they outperform countries that do not have full employment. What does he consider full employment? Would he consider it greater than 3 per cent of the work force being unemployed or does he consider it 100 per cent of the work force being employed?

Senator Gigantès: I will come to that, Senator Bosa. I think that 4 per cent in a country such as Canada is a feasible full-employment policy.

Let us look at the experiences of 13 countries. I illustrate this in graphs, which I ask permission to have printed.

Senator Hébert: Agreed.

(For text of graphs, see Appendix, "A" p. 3511.)

Senator Stewart: Are these the graphs that the Economic Council has already lifted?

Senator Gigantès: Yes. Four of these countries—Austria, Japan, Norway and Sweden—make full employment the fundamental aim of their economic policies and they are shown in black bars in the graphs. Countries shown by clear bars do not have full-employment policies. Finland and Germany, shown by the grey bars, have gone part of the distance towards a full-employment policy.

Graph A shows how they compare in terms of how big a place government, and therefore the social safety net, takes up in their economies, or what percentage of the gross domestic expenditures, GDE or GDP, is accounted for by government spending. Graphs B and E show the performance of the 13 countries under the four criteria: accumulated budget deficits, or minus, or surpluses, plus, as a percentage of GDP from 1970 to 1978. Graph C shows the average unemployment rate from 1970 through 1987. Graph D shows gross domestic product per capita in 1987. Graph E shows accumulated trade deficit, minus, or surplus, plus, as a percentage of GDP from 1970 to 1987.

If we award 13 points for first place down to one point for last place under criteria B through E above, budget balancing, lowest unemployment, average personal wealth and success in international trade, the 13 countries rank as indicated in Graph F, and they are as follows.

Norway acts best. Norway, over the 17 years in question, with a full employment policy, has a large accumulated surplus. Sweden ranks second. These are countries with less than 2 per cent unemployment. Sweden has an accumulated surplus. Japan has a small deficit and a full employment policy. Then comes Germany and Finland, then comes Austria. Germany and Finland have almost a full employment policy, although Germany has moved away from it.

Those countries with a full employment policy—and this point has just been repeated by the Economic Council of Canada—come up with the best performances in avoiding deficits. That is what senators opposite have been telling us should be achieved. The Economic Council of Canada says quite clearly in its latest report that the deficit cannot be fought unless unemployment is fought.

Therefore, policies to promote employment—government intervention to promote employment, as happens in these full employment countries—seem to be the solution to the problem of Canada and of other countries.

It seems fair to say that the four countries with full employment policies have generally done better, even though three spent considerably more than we do on their social programs. In other words, the total spending on social programs by three of these countries is much higher than ours as a proportion of their GDP. Anyone can look at OECD figures or Statistic Canada figures or the latest Economic Council of Canada figures and they will see that. The answer is working on full employment.

One reason why full employment countries perform better is that unemployment represents an enormous cost, a deadening drag, on the economy. This was brought out very clearly in the Senate report of December 1987 called "Only Work Works". Instinctively, one expects unemployment to increase stress, physical and mental illness, alcoholism, drug addiction, suicide, crime and the difficulty of getting along with one's family. There is overwhelming anecdotal evidence to support this, according to social workers, but again they cannot give an exact dollar figure of what those ill effects cost our society.

In his study entitled "Unemployment: Canada's Malignant Social Pathology", published in Perception spring/summer 1983, Richard Deaton counted loss of income by workers as a separate item in his sums and counted this loss again as a reduction of gross domestic income, which includes workers' incomes. This is double counting, in other words. When it comes to social costs, accurate accounting is difficult to find.

Among other things, experts disagree on whether it is the loss of a job that decreases the tendency to be sick or the tendency to be sick that makes one less employable. Whereas the social costs of unemployment are difficult to determine in dollars, the economic costs in losses to government and business are not. I will concentrate on those.

We can determine the loss to governments of having people unemployed or employable that are on welfare. We can add: (a) the loss of revenue at three levels of government because people pay less in taxes when jobless than when employed, plus (b) unemployment insurance benefits, plus (c) payments to people on welfare, plus (d) interest on the sum of (a) (b) and (c), because we are running a deficit and must consequently borrow the money to pay welfare and unemployment insurance benefits.

I will make another statement here which I will demonstrate. Our society paid people at the last job they held, as at 1989 figures, an average of $15,640 each, in exchange for which they each produced goods and services worth $15,640. When such people became jobless, each cost government $14,822, but could produce no goods or services in exchange.

In other words, employable, jobless persons each represent a net cost—a net loss for governments—of $14,822 per annum plus a net loss for society of goods and services worth $15,640, which they produced before losing their jobs. From 1985 through 1991 unemployment will cost Canadian governments $171.2 billion and cost business $85.6 billion in sales. The national debt from 1967 to 1985 equals the cost to governments of unemployment above 4 per cent of the labour force. I will demonstrate this shortly. These figures were checked for me by the Economic Council and, in checking these figures, came the ideas which they put in their latest report.

Then there is the calculation of what costs unemployment represents for governments involved using the multiplier. You will forgive me if I have to explain this to you. No doubt Senator Cogger will complain that I do not talk about substance, but, what can I do? He is asleep. The multiplier effect simply means that for a service or product, for instance, Michael pays $1,000 to Peter, who saves $200 and pays Paul $800, who saves $200 and pays $600 to Jim and so on. The initial $1,000 spent could generate up to $1,700 in spending. The total of all this spending is the gross domestic expenditure of Michael, Peter, Paul and the rest. All major economists use the multiplier and describe its workings in terms similar to those of the preceding paragraph. For example, Heilbroner and Thurow write that wages paid, say, to construction workers, do not stop there. The construction workers will spend their wages, and this spending will generate more spending "until the effect is finally dissipated. By and large, economists estimate that the impact of the multiplier over the course of a year is about two . . ." Heilbroner and Thurow point out that a contraction in spending in the U.S.A. of $23 billion in the third quarter of 1980 shrank incomes throughout the nation by $46 billion because of the multiplier.

Economists disagree about the size of the multiplier in Canada. Many say it is less than 2 because, among other things, we spend more on imports than do the Americans. Some say it is more than 2. The multiplier in this lecture is taken to be about 1.7. This figure, which is accepted by many economists, is lower than the multiplier used by the Economic Council of Canada. I am being conservative in my economic application.

So we can assume that when a Canadian spends $1,000 the gross domestic product increases by $1,700, using a multiplier of 1.7. In Table 2 we see the calculation of how much an unemployed person costs the government, which I would like to have included, if honourable senators agree. I will read you the table all the same. This is Table 2, the costs of unemployment to the three levels of government. The first part of the table says when Smith, the average unemployed Canadian, was employed. (a) Smith's employment income in private industry was $15,640. That was the average earning of Canadians employed in 1989. (b) shows the GDP generated by Smith's employment income of $15,640 times the multiplier of 1.7. So the GDP that his earnings generate is $26,588. Tax revenues for all levels of government, item (c), is 34.4 per cent of $26,589 or $9,146. I put a plus sign in front of that figure because I will use a minus sign in front of a deficit figure.

The second part of the table is what happens when Smith loses his job and goes on unemployment. Line (d) is Smith's unemployment insurance benefits, a net loss for governments of $9,023. This is not theory. This is what was actually spent on average on each unemployed person. (e) shows the GDP generated by Smith's unemployment benefits, which is $9,023—deficit spending by the government—which then Smith receives and spends multiplied by 1.7 to see how much he contributes to the GDP, which is $15,339.

The next item is tax revenues for all levels of government, from GDP generated by Smith's UI benefits, which is 34.4 per cent of $15,339 or $5,277. That means a reduction in tax revenues, which is line (g) for all levels of government because Smith lost his job. It is line (c) minus (f). I will remind you that line (c) $9,146, the revenue of government from the GDP generated by Smith's earnings when he was employed, minus the revenue generated by his spending of his unemployment insurance—so we have $9,146 minus $5,277—the reduction in tax revenue for all levels of government, line (g), is minus $3,869. That is an increase in government red ink of $12,892 because there is the $9,000 he receives in government unemployment insurance and the loss of government revenue. Those two must be totalled. So when he is unemployed we have an increase in government red ink of $12,892. That is line (h). Since we are in a deficit situation, the government is paying interest on the amount it is borrowing, which is $1,450, which gives us a total cost to government for each unemployed person of $14,342, or a move from black ink to red ink.

It is worse if Smith goes on welfare. The fallacy is that because people on welfare are paid less than they are on unemployment, they cost less. They do not cost less, they cost more. I move to line (k), welfare benefits, and I am using the Ontario maximum. GDP generated by Smith's welfare benefits, and I am using the largest figure including a wife and two children, which is $12,352. So he has paid a considerable amount, as you will see, in terms of the deficit. The GDP generated by Smith's welfare benefits of $12,352, multiplied by the multiplier of 1.7 totals $20,998, which is line (l). Line (m), tax revenues for all levels of government from GDP generated by Smith's welfare benefits, which is 34.4 per cent of $20,998 is plus $7,223.

The reduction in tax revenue for all levels of government because Smith is on welfare is minus $1,923, which we must add to the welfare benefits he is paid, (k), of $12,352, which gives us, (o), increase in government red ink, (k) plus (n), $14,276. This is a disbursement by government in excess of what government receives, on which, line (p), interest must be paid, which is $1,606 and, line (q), the total government loss caused by Smith's being on welfare, (o) plus (p), equals $15,882. So people who do not work cost an awful lot of money.

In 1985 the equivalent of 1,328,000 persons received unemployment insurance for the whole year, and another 600,000 received welfare because, though they were able to work, they could not find jobs. For every 100 Canadians receiving unemployment insurance benefits, there are an additional 45 who are employable but on welfare. So in 1985, the 1,328,000 unemployed times $14,343, which is the cost of the unemployed to government from the table above, cost the three levels of government $19,047,504,000. The 600,000 employable welfare recipients times $15,882, which is line (q) in Table 2 above, cost the three levels of government a total of $9,529,800,000. Combined, the 1,928,000 unemployed and employable welfare recipients cost the three levels of government $28.6 billion or $14,822 each in 1985. The figures were adjusted for inflation and are expressed in 1988 dollars. The costs of unemployment keep piling up, as we shall see.

In his February 1986 budget, the Honourable Michael Wilson, Minister of Finance, gave his projections of unemployment levels through 1991. These are in Table 3, which I ask the permission of honourable senators to have printed in an appendix. I hope it is agreed.

Senator Turner: Agreed.

Senator Gigantès: Table 3 shows the estimated unemployment in thousands from 1986 to 1991. These figures were provided by Michael Wilson, the Minister of Finance, in his 1986 budget speech. In 1986 he predicted 1.2 million unemployed and for 1991 he predicted 1 million. You will find the figures in between in the table. Adding 45 employable but jobless welfare recipients to every 100 unemployed in the above numbers and using $14,822 as the cost of each jobless, we establish, for the years 1986 through 1991, the following costs of unemployment. That is Table 4, which I ask your agreement to have included. Is it agreed?

Senator Turner: Agreed.

Senator Gigantès: The 1985 cost of unemployment to the three levels of government was $28.6 billion; in 1986 it was $25.8 billion; in 1987, $24.4 billion; in 1988, $23.8 billion; in 1989, $24.1 billion; in 1990, $22.8 billion; and in 1991, $21.7 billion. Those figures are derived from the projection of unemployment by Mr. Wilson.

For the years 1985 to 1991 inclusive, the total estimated costs to governments of having jobless people on unemployment insurance or welfare is $171.2 billion in 1988 dollars. Even with unemployment below the rates of the 1981 recession, government deficits will still grow substantially because we shall under-utilize labour, which is a factor in the creation of wealth. Wealth produces tax revenues. Graph G, which I beg permission to have also printed in an appendix, proves that this is an old story. The figures in Graph G, adjusted for inflation and expressed in 1971 dollars, show the national debt at $21.5 billion in 1967 and at $69 billion on December 31, 1985. Nearly the whole difference—$47.5 billion in 1971, which is $160 billion in 1988 dollars—equals what unemployment costs governments.

I cite here the Senate report, Only Work Works, at page 52 which states:

> In 1967, unemployment stood at under four per cent. For each year from 1968 through 1985, the numbers of the unemployed above four per cent of the labour force were calculated and were multiplied by the cost per unemployed to governments, in benefits paid, lost tax revenue and interest on these sums. The cost for each year is shown on the graph in millions of 1971 dollars (adjusted for inflation). The total for the years 1968 to 1985 is $46.3 billion in 1971 dollars or $160 billion in 1988 dollars.
> In calculating the cost of unemployment for Graph G, I include provincial and municipal revenue losses due to unemployment. This is not done to suggest that provincial and municipal revenue losses are included in the national debt, but only to give an illustration of how big the losses caused by unemployment are.
> Eighty-six per cent of the costs of unemployment are borne by the federal government and 14 per cent by the provinces. However, federal deficits (which pile up to form the national debt) comprise sums that are additional to the federal contributions towards unemployment and welfare benefits; these additional sums are given to the governments and citizens of the provinces to help them cope with the huge losses they suffer because of unemployment.
> Also huge is the loss in sales that business suffers as a result of unemployment. If we take what the unemployed would have contributed to the GDP had they remained employed, and subtract from that the lesser sum they contribute to the economy when on welfare or unemployment insurance (Table 2, above), we find how much less money passed through business coffers because of unemployment in 1985; and using the numbers of the minister of finance (Table 3, above), we can estimate, in 1988 dollars, that for the years 1985 through 1991, the losses in sales to business due to unemployment will be $85.6 billion.

Those are 1989 dollars.

I told honourable senators earlier that countries with full employment, and in which the government takes up a lot of space, more space than it takes up here, and which spend a lot on social services "manage to keep their deficits down because of their full employment policies."

We have seen, as I just mentioned, that the accumulated debt from 1968 to 1985 can be matched almost exactly with the increase in the national debt during those years.

The text goes on to state:

> In other aspects of the economy, Canada, along with Japan, weathered the recession best. Had we had a full-employment policy, we might also have done much better in keeping down our deficit and keeping the national debt from growing.

This is what the Economic Council of Canada has at last begun to realize, as it has just told us in its annual report.

The text goes on to state:

However, any suggestion of a larger government role in job creation was met with ferocious attacks by those who felt that such policies would be an unconscionable attack on the free-market system. Private entrepreneurs, they said, should be left free to do the job; governments should shrink.

Business and business writers are outraged at the suggestion that the free-market system is not infallible. The reaction is understandable: when sowing doubts about the free-market system, we are offending a religion with a vast clergy of businesspeople and academic economists, most of whom have contracts with businesspeople. Unconsciously, you believe what you do, especially if it pays off for you—there is nothing unnatural about that. And when these people feel threatened, they do their best to scare off possible attackers.

Before examining the details of a possible full-employment policy and whether we can afford it—-

That is an argument I might hear from the other side if they paid attention to what I am saying:

—we should consider the validity of objections to such a policy. The standard arguments against a full-employment policy are as follows:

—The unemployed choose to be unemployed.

—Yes, there may be unemployment, but measures to combat it lead to government programs financed by borrowed money, which then becomes unavailable for business borrowers who want to build new productive capacity and thus create "real" jobs.

—Government initiatives are now obsolete, a relic of old-fashioned thinking.

—If we simply liberated the entrepreneurs from government constraints, there would be no problems in the economy.

—Technological change destroys jobs.

That is a union's contribution to the debate. The text goes on to state:

—If we concentrated on exporting more, there would be more jobs.

—We do not know enough about the future to make policy. Let us see how these arguments stand up to examination.

STATEMENT: People are not unemployed or on welfare because they choose not to accept what jobs are available.

To deal with this issue we must look at how many job vacancies there are for people on unemployment insurance or welfare, whether these vacancies are where the unemployed are, and whether the unemployed have sufficient skills for these vacancies.

Let us not forget that the average wage the unemployed had in their last job, in 1985, was $270 a week in 1985 dollars or $300 a week in 1988 dollars. An awful lot of insufficiently skilled people must have been among the unemployed in 1985 for their average wage to be so low.

If there is a vacancy for a restaurant dishwasher in Toronto, an unemployed man in Cape Breton with a wife and two children might not have the fare to get to the job; the pay in Toronto might not be enough to house, feed and clothe his family.

We saw that in 1985 there were 1,328,000 unemployed plus 600,000 employable welfare recipients with no work, a total of 1,928,000 jobless. In that year, there were 292,000 job vacancies in Canada—-

So there were 1,928,000 jobless and 292,000 job vacancies.

The text continues:

—as a whole, or about one vacant job for every 6.6 jobless persons. But these vacant jobs were not equally distributed across the country. In the Atlantic provinces, the Prairies and B.C. there was only one vacant job for every 12 jobless, whereas in Ontario the ratio was one for five and in Quebec one for seven.

It is not known how many of the unemployed were qualified for the vacant jobs. We know that business often complains that it cannot find enough qualified workers. This must mean that some of the unemployed are insufficiently skilled to fill some of the vacant jobs.

Many of the unskilled have much to lose by moving from their low-employment regions to Southern Ontario where there are vacancies for unskilled jobs. Take a Cape Bretoner with a wife and two children who has just lost a job in his province at $15,600 a year: he is paying $420 a month in rent, leaving him $10,500 for everything else.

The move to Toronto would cost him $4,000, which he does not have and would have to borrow, repaying it in two years at $2,300 a year. Rent for a tiny apartment in Toronto would cost him a minimum of $750 a month, if he found an apartment (the vacancy rate in Toronto is 0.1 per cent); this is $3,960 a year more than he was paying in Cape Breton. So after paying his moving debt and the rent, he would have $4,560 a year to provide himself and his family with heat, food, clothing, electricity and transportation. It simply can't be done.

To get by in Toronto, he would have to find a job that paid him $21,860 or $6,260 more than his Cape Breton job. But he is unskilled and he wouldn't get that kind of salary. On top of financial losses, by moving to Toronto our Cape Bretoner and his family would lose their supporting network of friends and relatives who are a financial asset if only as providers of occasional child care.

Classical economic thinking sees "mobility" as a major solution to unemployment problems. People should move to where the jobs are; jobs should not move to where the people are. At the limit, this leads to the creation of urban monsters like Mexico City, where everyone piles in from the countryside and slums mushroom. Must we give up our space, one of the great advantages of Canada? Must we all live in a few Mexico Cities, in congestion, noise, polluted air and municipal anarchy?

Realistically, how many of the 292,000 job vacancies in 1985 could have been filled by the 1,928,000 people who were without work that year? There are no reliable studies on this issue. However, in view of the difficulties that the non-so-skilled would encounter in moving to or being hired for those vacant jobs, realistically we might assume that only six out of 10 of these 292,000 vacant jobs could have been filled; that makes 179,700 vacant jobs that could have been filled.

● (0715)

This means that only one out of 11 of the 1,928,000 jobless in 1985 could have found a vacant job; the other ten-elevenths would inevitably have stayed jobless because there simply were no jobs: this is the conclusion one is forced to draw from a special study on job vacancies by the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre. Thus, the contention that unemployment insurance and welfare create unemployment is not supported by the facts.

I will come to another statement answering those criticisms.

To argue, as do business and classical economists, that government borrowing reduces the funds available for business to borrow and invest is simply another way of saying that government should not exist. Besides, the argument becomes irrelevant if business gets its wish for a single world money market.

Certain economists and most businesspeople say that when government goes into deficit - when it borrows money to keep its social programs running during recessions - funds that should be available for business to borrow and invest are soaked up by government borrowing, and economic growth is slowed. In other words, private enterprise is being "crowded out" by government.

There are several answers to this. To begin with, we saw that social programs were developed to keep recessions from becoming great depressions. The social programs provide those who lose jobs during recessions with some income so that demand for goods and services business produce does not fall so low that the economy cannot pick itself up off the floor.

If we cut social services during a recession, the recession would be prolonged.

This is what you are doing with Bill C-21. You are cutting social services.

Business does not invest during recessions. The longer the recession, the longer the lag in business investment. So in effect government borrowing during recessions does not soak up funds business would have borrowed;business would not have borrowed those funds to invest because only fools invest when demand is shrinking, and in recessions demand shrinks.

A look at Table 5 below shows that we nearly always had more business capital formation than the average for the seven major Western industrialized countries; and we always had more capital formation than the U.S.A. In the years 1980 to 1986, Canada had less business capital formation than usual, which means that Canadian business invested less than usual; but that period includes the years of the 1981 to 1983 recession. At that time, business capital formation went down from the previous period in all coutries, inevitably so since investment goes down in recessions. Japan has invested at a higher rate than any other country, but it had a lot of catching up to do, having had its industrial base destroyed in the Second World War. Even before the war, Japan was behind the Western countries and had to catch up.

The figures are shown in Table 5.

The argument that government crowds out business is also made in good times against all government spending: government spending means taxing people's money away; that money, then, is not there for business to borrow and invest and make profits. Michael Walker, a proponent of this view and president of the Fraser Institute, would like medicare privatized. He says that government should not be taxing people to pay for medicare; it should be left to the private sector, where the profit motive will make sure that money is spent efficiently.

Doctor Walker's brand of medical care exists in the U.S.A. As a society, Americans pay 33 per cent more of their GDP than we do for medical care; all Canadians have medical care paid for by their tax-supported, government-run, universal group insurance; 37 million Americans cannot afford any medical insurance at all.

As an example of government intervention that produces costs and produces the necessary results.

Of course, doctors and hospital corporations make huge profits in the U.S.A. Canadians, as a society, decided to give priority not to the making of private profits through health care, but to giving health care to all, rich or poor. We have crowded business out of the health care business. It was our political choice. An overwhelming majority of Canadians support this choice. Later we shall see that not only do we provide good health care compared with all other countries, but we do so more cost effectively than any other government.

The Civic Hospital, where Dr. Keon operates, is often cited in publications in the United States of America as an example of efficient use of resources. Thanks in large part to his talent. When it comes to medicare—

This was a case where crowding out business was good business.

The people who argue that by borrowing government "crowds out" business—sucks up funds that business needs—are the very same who claim that the Canadian money market has now become an inextricable part of the world money market, thanks to instantaneous electronic communications. The money market, of course, is where you shop for money to borrow. Your neighbourhood bank is an outlet of this money market.

On June 6, 1989, Doctor Edward P. Neufeld, the Royal Bank's executive vice president of economic and corporate affairs, told the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs that the unification of the world money markets was a good thing.

Bankers supported the Free Trade Agreement, which goes a long way towards erasing the frontier between Canadian and U.S. money markets. Bankers want Canadian business to have more ease in borrowing and lending abroad. If bankers are consistent, they should hereafter speak soothingly to those who worry about whom we borrow from, as a nation—from foreigners or from Canadians. If there now is one world money market, surely it makes little sense to affix national labels on borrowed cash.

Canada is a safe, law-abiding country,

—not for long if the Conservatives remain in power—and, it is . . . not likely to be destroyed by foreign or civil war.

—again assuming that Mr. Mulroney calls for party venture.

Foreigners want to lend us money. Foreigners investing here or lending us money are not likely to pick up their money and take it elsewhere, all on the same day. Where else would they find as safe and promising a place to park their cash? So how can there be a shortage of funds to borrow when the one world money market is awash in petrodollars, Eurodollars, German marks and Japanese yen, ready to be borrowed by our Canadian entrepreneurs?

I will now pass to you another statement. In answer to the criticism about the full employment policy.

An energetic role for government in the economy is not an old-fashioned idea that is no longer useful.

There is little substance to the argument that policies of government intervention are out of step with a future belonging to small government that spends and taxes ever less. Those who espouse this view can also be called old-fashioned. Their fondness for reducing the size of government through budget cuts has never changed. We still hear it today, for example, in The Financial Post, now as always the voice of conservative business thinking.

Then I give some examples ranging from the 1920s to the 1980s. (i)—these are quotations . . .

(i) . . . spending by all three levels of government in Canada has produced inflationary deficits that must be further trimmed before the economy can get on an even keel again.

—that is from the 1920s.

[Senator Gigantès.]

(ii) We're living on a diet that is far too rich, certainly one that we cannot afford . . . . We have to cut something.

(iii) Before the Canadian budget can be balanced there must be a drastic and 'painful' process of slashing of government departments and services.

—that is from the 1920s—

(iv) If we go on adding to the debt each year the interest charges will become an intolerable burden to the people. Why should we pass the burden on to future generations?

—that is also from the 1920s.

(v) How welcome it would be if, next week, the finance minister announced across the board spending cuts in all departments.

That is from the 1940s.

There is nothing new in the debate between classical and Keynesian attitudes in economics: both can be found in texts of the fifth century B.C. Pericles, then leader of Athens, described his economic policy as one of spending on public works that took a long time to build, thus giving jobs to the unemployed, thereby creating demand and making the city more prosperous.

This is under Plutarch—

In answer, we have the text of a fifth-century B.C. pamphlet that accuses Pericles of ruining the economy by giving handouts to the lazy and spending on useless construction (it's to the building of the Parthenon that this pamphlet objects; it is called The Old Oligarch or Pseudo Xenophon).

The issue is what works best and which attitude best serves the current circumstance in which we have a high national debt, aggravated yearly by high interest payments on this debt, payments equal to our yearly deficit. If we can cut our deficit through an active government role in the economy to reduce unemployment, we should try it.

The Economic Council has said that we cannot do it otherwise. Because the only countries that seem to manage their deficit are countries that actively pursue employment policy.

As a percentage of our GDP, our national debt has been much higher in the past than it is now. We paid it down fast when we had low unemployment and . . .

I have a graph, Graph H, which I would like to have your agreement to print in the appendix. Is it agreed?

(For text of Graph, see Appendix "B", p. 3518.)

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed, agreed.

Senator Gigantès:

Conversely, as unemployment and interest rates rose, they dragged our national debt upwards.

You can see this clearly in the graph.

This seems to support the evidence given earlier that other countries with full-employment policies are better at getting out of and staying out of debt.

Now I give you another statement.

"Supply-side" economics does not work.

As a nation, we have, in the past 15 years or so, listened to economists who talk of the "non-accelerating inflation rate of unemployment" (NAIRU). They maintain that there is a level of unemployment below which we cannot go without causing quickening, even runaway, inflation. And these economists have been setting the NAIRU at a higher and higher rate: it looks as if, for them, the "non-accelerating inflation rate of unemployment" is the most recent highest rate of unemployment

We listened to these same economists and to their business followers (and paymasters) when they told us that our government should not interfere in the economy with job-creation programs. There were "structural" problems, inevitable cyclical problems that would be solved naturally if we "liberated the entrepreneur." This policy is also known as supply-side economics.

Supply-side economics relies on stimulating business, which "supplies" the goods and services that its customers demand. The theory is that if you make it more profitable for business to produce, it will buy more equipment, build more factories and hire more people; in the long run, the problems disappear, thanks to the rule of maximizing profits.

So we reduced corporate taxes from 4.6 per cent of the GDP in 1974, to 3.6 per cent in 1981, to 3.2 per cent in 1985, to 2.7 per cent in 1987.

● (0730)

The Department of Finance economic review for June 1987 shows this means that the profits of corporations were taxed at 34 per cent. That is real tax as a percentage of GDP, how much money do they actually pay? It was 34 per cent in 1974, but only 26 per cent in 1987. On another occasion I will explain how this has increased the deficit. And while the rate at which the government was taxing corporations fell, government aid to business increased. Business gets more from government than it pays in taxes according to the Nielsen Tax Force in 1986, and I have another graph, graph I which I hope you will agree can be put in appendix.

Senator Frith: We agree.

Senator Gigantès: The Nielsen Tax Force counted the costs of administering these favours to business as part of what is given to business as government and certain sales tax exemptions that partly benefit consumers, and various other items. They total $4.7 billion, and some of the business does not consider that part of the advantages received from government. The Auditor General estimates that the tax breaks governments give to business amounted to $11.5 billion in 1985, in the 1985/1986 fiscal year, in the official report of the Auditor General.

Senator Steuart: Before you go on senator, could I ask you a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Steuart: We are told that the economies around the world, including of course the Canadian economy, are undergoing globalization. Now is it not true that if the Canadian corporations are going to be able to participate successfully in this new globalized economy, they are going to have to get plenty of assistance from the government of Canada through tax expenditures and the like?

Senator Gigantès: Thank you. It depends, of course, on the form of tax expenditures—tax expenditures for job creation, yes. Tax expenditures for buying equipment that will enable the business to produce the same amount for less money and with fewer employees is not a tax expenditure we should consider because, if it is an efficient move, then a bank will lend them the money. They don't need government help.

Senator Steuart: Let me ask another related question, and that deals with subsidies. How are these tax expenditures and other forms of assistance to Canadian corporations, let us say, going to be given to them in this globalized situation where there is the possibility that these companies in particular and Canada in general will be penalized, will render itself liable to penalty on the ground that subsidies are being given to these productive corporations?

Senator Gigantès: I hope the honourable senator will be patient with me and I will deal with this issue. But I have got to come to it step by step logically, and I will show you exactly how we can, for instance, do what is necessary to promote employment in this country without allowing the Americans to do anything against us through the infamous Free Trade Agreement.

In the course of studying the problems of employment and training for this honourable Senate, I interviewed dozens of economists across the country and abroad. Even those who lean toward the conservative side of the discipline found that Canadian Governments acted ineffectively and even unfairly in helping business. Tax concessions such as deferment of tax on profits owed to government help firms that are already doing well since they have taxable profits. Such policies are thus perceived as unfair by other less fortunate businesses. Those big firms that can afford high-price lawyers can best take advantage of such tax concessions. Other firms think this unfair. This is a summary of the abuse of economists.

Another statement that summarizes their view. Such government programs support investment in capital intensive projects and lead to the replacement of people by machines. Moreover, the latest industrial equipment saves on both capital and labour. A new machine today turns out ten times as many products as a ten year old machine that costs the same in constant dollars when new. Today's machine slashes labour costs. There is no need to subsidize business to buy such a machine as they will buy it anyway. When a business cannot convince private lenders to advance money for a purchase that will both increase production and cut costs, that business does not deserve support.

For every two dollars of government revenue forgone to finance programs of tax concessions or grants to business, only one dollar in new investment results. There is no conclusive evidence yet, but there are factual hints here and there that a fair chunk of business spending is not necessarily productive. Increasingly more powerful personal computers are installed on executives' desks giving them spreadsheets with more and more columns, so that executives fiddle endlessly with how a change in one small aspect of their production will affect all other little aspects. Further, Canadian and US businesses are washing barracudas and bean counters, lawyers and accountants to handle mergers and acquisitions, thus increasing corporate overheads far above those of Germany, Japan, Sweden and other countries.

Now I make a statement that answers some union criticisms.

Senator Frith: You say these other countries do not have—

Senator Gigantès: They have much lower overhead.

Senator Frith: —legal costs and accountants' costs, professional costs dealing with mergers?

Senator Gigantès: That's right. Much lower in those other countries.

Senator Frith: Because they don't use them as much? Their fees are lower or what?

Senator Gigantès: Because there are more interested generally in producing an industry that is going to live and plan a long time ahead rather than shifting assets from one person to another.

Now, technology does not destroy jobs. Scepticism about the immediate benefits of increasingly sophisticated desk top computers for executives—this scepticism I just expressed—should not be taken as a rejection of technological modernization, but as with anything new, new technology will have its ups and downs, false starts and adjustments that may be painful. New technology does not necessarily spell instant success, nor does it inevitably wipe out jobs.

The final report of the Ontario Tax Force on employment and new technology, commissioned in 1984 by the Honourable William Davis, gives an impressive list of major technological changes that have taken place in Canada since 1910 affecting every economic and social field. A current, so-called technological explosion is no more explosive than what happened earlier with the car, airplane, telephone, radio, television, film and major developments of chemistry, metallurgy and agriculture. To sum up this Ontario Report, fundamental technological change in this century gave Canadians more than three times higher earnings after inflation. There was greater productivity. For every extra dollar Canadian workers collected in wages they delivered an extra 1.67 in production. A very small increase in the amount of jobs per capita, but jobs entailing fewer hours of work. So technological change has been neutral where jobs are concerned; it has not decreased the number of jobs per capita available to Canadians.

Now here is another statement. Exports do not increase the number of jobs. Increases in exports do not produce a net increase in jobs. This is not theory. This is just statistical fact. Our share of world trade grew in real terms as a share of the total from 3.6 per cent in 1980 to 5.1 per cent by 1984, yet employment shrank in those years. Certainly Canada should be more competitive on the world markets. Being competitive means being technologically up to date, more productive; therefore, able to create more well. Successfully exporting a commodity means we are producing it competitively. We will then hire more people to produce and export that commodity. A high tech item means high tech jobs, but the economists I have interviewed do not see exports as a major source for a net increase in jobs.

A recent Statistics Canada study in the past three decades noted that as our exports went up, so did our imports. That we gained jobs thanks to export but lost an equal number of jobs because of imports. From 1966 to 1980, Canada's imports went up from 20 per cent to 30 per cent of our GDP, all the goods and services we produced. Our exports went up from 21 per cent to 32 per cent. Further in some of our major exporting sectors, exports and unemployment increased simultaneously. Here as in other countries, imports and exports go up and down in tandem almost by the same amount. An explanation is that to buy our exports, other countries need Canadian dollars, which they obtain generally by selling us their exports. Each item we import is an item we do not produce here in Canada. This means that over time for every job we gain by exporting, we lose one by importing. If we export a lot but do not import an equivalent amount in dollars, then we shall not be spending enough Canadian dollars in other countries. In consequence, Canadian currency will be in short supply abroad. Since everything, currency included, rises in price when in short supply, the value of the Canadian currency, the value of the Canadian dollar will increase. Our exports, therefore, will become expensive, and we will sell less abroad eventually. This is what is happening to Japan now. Over time, there is no escaping the equilibrium between exports and imports.

Alternatively, we may export more than we import; then we shall have to invest more Canadian dollars abroad so that foreigners can use these dollars to pay for our exports. But if we export capital, we do not invest it here to create jobs. Simple.

Another statement: We do not have to know the future to make policy. Final argument against what is proposed in this presentation, and against any government role in the economy is that we cannot see the future clearly enough to make policy for the future. The whole world is in transition, this argument goes, we are moving from national markets to world markets in goods, services and money. Companies are becoming scale and will not accept any direction from government. That is why these large companies favour free trade so they can play one government against another. They are bound to defeat smaller businesses, political parties and labour unions which favour some degree of protection and consequently a greater role for government.

● (0745)

This victory of the conglomerates, we are told, will change things more than we can imagine. It will change the role of all governments to an extent that we cannot foresee. We should not, therefore, buck the trend and act as if government can make a difference in job creation.

Indeed, we live in a period of change. The large conglomerates have argued for a unified western Europe and they make get it by 1993. Until then, the bureaucracies of the 12 members of the European Economic Community will be writing a common rulebook for economic activity in all 12 countries. The megabusinesses will find themselves confronted, in western Europe, by a multinational megabureaucracy operating out of one common rulebook. It will not be possible to play one member nation of the community against another. By seeking the freedom of a larger multinational market in western Europe without national boundaries, the megabusinesses may well find their match in the multinational megabureaucracy they will have created as a byproduct of their campaign for the abolition of Europe's national economic boundaries.

This emerging European megabureaucracy has not shown itself inclined to encourage cuts in social services. Indeed, the Eurocrats are planning common and generous standards of publicly provided social services for the European community. This is one of the many reasons why Mrs. Thatcher dislikes Eurocrats. Nor are the Eurocrats devoted to privatization. Indeed, some Eurocrats say that handing over a public activity from a government to a megabusiness is not privatization but a transfer of power from an elected government to a non-elected government. Some megabusinesses are richer and more powerful than many governments.

Note that even the megabusinesses in Europe, outside Britain, are talking of becoming lean and mean to be competitive, but they do not suggest cutting social services to this end. Germany is competitive—as competitive as they come. Yet it spends more than Canada on social services. The Netherlands, with the second highest spending on social services among industrialized countries, is the best international trade competitor, having the largest trade surplus. Only Mrs. Thatcher seems to believe that grinding the faces of the poor is the way to competitiveness, and of course the Tories in this country believe the same.

When it comes to trade competition, Eurocrats have shown every tendency of flirting not with global free trade but with managed trade between trading blocs. They talk as if they favour totally free international trade but they act as if they favour a system whereby Europe says to Japan and/or to the U.S.: "Yes, we will trade with you, but on condition that our mutual trade is so structured that it is in balance. We will not accept having a deficit—"

Senator Simard: Senator Gigantès, may I ask a question? This thing you are reading from, is it a book that you wrote? If so, has it been published? If so, in which language has it been published, French, English or both?

Senator Gigantès: This is a book I have written, sir. It is called The Road Ahead. It was published earlier this year and was written in English. The French edition is being worked on. It is being written by myself in French—

Senator Murray: It is being translated by the staff of the Senate. What an imposition! That is being done for your private gain!

Senator Gigantès: I would like to inform Senator Murray that I have written two books since coming to the Senate and the royalties from both books are donated to scholarships. I make no private gain out of work I do in the Senate.

Senator Simard: It doesn't matter whether you make private gain or not. You are getting your book translated by the staff of this house. This is intolerable! This is a scandal! It should be denounced! You should be ashamed and you should put a stop to it.

Senator Haidasz: No, you should be ashamed and denounced!

Senator Gigantès: I am afraid that Senator Simard and other senators opposite, who were protesting that we are not talking about economic substance, which is what the goods and services tax is about—

Senator Cogger: You call that substance?

Senator Gigantès: —and who did not want the names of Canadians read into the record are objecting when we are talking economic substance.

Senator Haidasz: Do you not want to hear this speech in French?

Senator Gigantès: I was saying, honourable senators—

Senator Cogger: You were not saying, you were reading.

Senator Gigantès: This is my own stuff.

Senator Haidasz: You are just jealous, that's all!

Senator Gigantès: If senators opposite do not want me to publish this book in French, I can promise them that I will not.

As I was saying, Europe will say to Japan: "We will not accept having a deficit in our trade with you or exporting our jobs." What the Eurocrats are planning is not free trade, it is managed trade. A blue-ribbon commission of senior U.S. businessmen recommended to President Bush something quite similar as a right approach in dealing with Japan. The U.S. trade legislation, amended last year, follows the same logic; it penalizes other nations unless they cut their exports to the U.S.A. or increase their imports from the U.S.A.

Achieving such balancing of trade and more stability in currencies means that governments will play bigger, not smaller, roles. It may also mean that the global market envisaged by conservative economic theory may not turn out to be that global, if only because the U.S.A. may not be prepared to let foreigners control major American companies.

[Translation]

In July 1989, the U.S. Treasury announced that all foreign takeovers of American companies would be reviewed by the American government.

This process is to apply to all takeovers, past or future, if they affect national security. This means that a foreigner who purchased an American company several years ago does not necessarily have a clear and undisputed title to that property.

We may be witnessing a swing of the pendulum away from totally unfettered multinational free enterprise that can buy whatever it chooses anywhere at all.

What effects will the explosive changes particular to Eastern Europe have? What will their effect be on the economic orthodoxy of North American businessmen? There are enormous profits to be made in trading with Eastern European countries, but trade with Russia and its former satellites will be completely different from what the North American milieu is used to.

Senator Cogger: Senator Gigantès, may I ask a question?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, Senator.

Senator Cogger: If I understood you correctly, you said earlier that the proceeds from the sale of your book would be awarded as scholarships, is that not so?

My first question is the following: Is it not somewhat presumptious to think that there will be proceeds from the sale of the book? Secondly, to enlighten us, could you tell us what the royalties you received for your previous book amounted to, in order to give us some idea of the value of the exercise?

Senator Gigantès: Honourable Senators, there will two parts to my answer.

First of all, whether there are no proceeds, or whether there are proceeds and I donate them, the result is the same, and you should have no objection to my economics lesson.

Senator Poitras: Yes, but knowing what it is worth would still help us in our evaluation.

Senator Gigantès: Well, you will be able to judge when it is over.

Senator Poitras: Your lesson is out of place; that is not what we are here to learn!

Senator Gigantès: I want to explain why I object to your economic policy.

Whenever an objection is raised . . .

Senator Poitras: We also object to your lecture. You are curtailing our freedom by forcing us to listen to what you have written.

Senator Gigantès: Is that a point of order you are raising?

Senator Poitras: There are already enough treatises on economics!

Senator Cogger: I am trying to assess the cost of this whole exercise you have undertaken. I am told, furthermore, that there is already an English version of your book on the market. Is that so?

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Gigantès: Yes, Senator.

Senator Cogger: Can you tell us how many copies have been sold?

Senator Gigantès: The book was released on April 29, 1990. I will be receiving the first sales report one year later, unless it is a "best seller"!

I do not think it will be a best seller, because the sales of my book are not very brisk! I do not expect huge profits. Any profits from the sale of the book will be used to . . .

Are you rising on a point of order?

Senator Cogger: Another best seller, in both languages!

[English]

So the trade between North American business people and the Soviet Union and its former satellites will be what is called "counter-trade".

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: Senator, may I ask you a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly, Senator.

Senator Hébert: Should the GST pass (we know that it will not) but should the GST become the law of the land, it would be interesting to know whether this would affect your books . . .

Senator Cogger: You have to be seated in your own chair before speaking!

Senator Corbin: He is not sitting down, he is standing.

Senator Hébert: My question is of course rhetorical, but would the GST's passage affect your book?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, Senator.

Senator Hébert: So your book would cost more as soon as the GST came into effect?

Senator Gigantès: They would sell fewer copies.

Senator Hébert: They would sell fewer copies. Do you think that will be the case with all books?

Senator Cogger: Well, we are going to be able to claim that Senator Gigantès has a conflict of interest! If the GST is passed it will increase the cost of his book and thus earn higher royalties for him.

Senator Gigantès: In any case, had I decided to keep the profits from that book, I would have payed any federal income tax owing on them.

I have always done so for all my books. I have published 11 books and always payed tax on any profits they generated, except for the last two, on which I will not have any tax to pay because I will not be pocketing a penny.

Senator Cogger: I hope you have thought of selling the film rights!

Senator Gigantès: I notice that Senator Sylvain does not want to hear about content today, although yesterday he was indignant that we were discussing procedure instead of content.

Senator Sylvain: I did not refer to content yesterday. I spoke about the spirit of an agreement. You are mistaken!

Senator Gigantès: On that issue, Senator McEachen explained that if you believed what you said, that simply meant that your Leader did not tell you the truth and you did not understand the nature of the agreement.

[English]

To begin with, trade with the former satellites of the Soviet Union and the Soviet Union itself will be what is called "counter-Trade." The currencies of Eastern Europe are not convertible, nor will they be for some time to come. Our businesspeople trading there will have to barter. For example, they will sell equipment to the U.S.S.R. and in exchange they will get a given number of tonnes of raw fish that they can sell to the Japanese.

North American banks do not handle such transactions. They do not extend credit for such transactions. Austrian and West German banks do. Businesspeople in those two countries are already mastering this form of trade. The past masters, of course, are the Japanese. Japanese banks will give you credit for an exchange of fishing nets from capitalist country A against vodka from communist country B, destined for sale to capitalist country C, which does not make fish nets but drinks vodka.

Most significant, the countries of Eastern Europe are not going to become free-market economies overnight, if ever. They are not going to have businesspeople as we understand businesspeople. Many of the west's potential business partners in the loosening Soviet empire are bureaucrats, born and bred in government service. Since government service has been the only available career for the best and the brightest in Eastern Europe, our trading partners there will be bureaucrats trying to make their bureaucracies more supple, less stifling, more decentralized and open to foreign trade.

There are aspects of their social organization that they want to keep. For instance, they would never accept the American idea that medical care could be privatized. They are, in fact, likely to develop into the "welfare liberal" Eurocrats Mrs. Thatcher so despises. They are not likely to go for Mr. Reagan and Mr. Bush's Rambonomics. They are fully conscience of how poorly their system has performed. But they are educated and know that the free-market system also makes mistakes.

They are not going to be unalloyed free enterprisers.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Excuse me, Senator Gigantès. Honourable senators, I rise on a Point of Order, and I would ask the honourable senator in the Chair to listen. I quote Rule 16:

> When the Senate is sitting,
> (c) if senators have occasion to speak together, they shall go below the Bar, otherwise the Speaker shall stop the business under discussion.

I ask that the Speaker apply Rule 16.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Senator Barootes): I find the room quiet at the present time. Please proceed, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Corbin: I gather, honourable senators, that the person in the Speaker's Chair is deaf.

Senator Haidasz: He has no ears to hear and no eyes to see the unruly behaviour of members opposite.

Senator Gigantès: I thank Honourable Senator Corbin for trying to draw their attention—

Senator Petten: Order!

Senator Gigantès: It does not matter whether or not they are listening. They would not understand, senator, but it is my duty to put things like this on the record.

Senator Haidasz: Perhaps we should take a moment while the seals on the other side are changing.

MOTION TO CALL ORDERS OF THE DAY—DEBATE CONTINUING

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: The bureaucrats who run Eastern Europe:

> . . . are not going to be unalloyed free enterprisers. They will use the power of the state. They will not see trade as a series of individual transactions but as part of an economic scheme. They will not take to thinking that only the quarterly dividend matters. They represent a huge market, and it will influence economic thinking even on Wall Street.
> It is very encouraging that major Canadian businesses are working on counter-trade schemes with Eastern Europe. About a year ago, twenty-six such ventures had been signed and some where already producing. More are bound to come, and many more are needed, whether Gorbachev remains in power or is overthrown by his hardliners who are frightened of how they would fare under more freedom.
> By the way, it would help us increase our trade with Japan, too, if we followed the same approach we are now learning to follow with the Eastern Bloc. We could strike deals whereby we would swap certain Canadian products for certain Japanese products. These would be longer-term deals for both sides, taking into account the longer-term vision that pervades Japan where management, labour and government cooperate instead of worshipping the North American confrontational economic theory wherein "lone ranger" entrepreneurs succeed "despite" union bosses or government.
> We do not, of course, know precisely what will happen to any particular economic theory or fad. And there will always be swings from one fad to another. But there is one thing we know: mega-businessmen may make the cover of business magazines; their ex cathedra statements may dazzle small investors; their lavish entertainment may flatter ministers and bureaucrats; their lifestyles may make headlines, but like rock stars, the mega-businessmen stand or fall by satisfying the needs of consumers, and employed consumers buy much more than unemployed consumers.

Like entertainers, mega-businessmen may use the illusionist's skills of advertising to sell unnecessary, frivolous gadgets; but the basic economic activities of feeding, clothing, housing, tending, educating and transporting people are the core of any economy. That's what gives the many the power and the need to control the moneyed; that's what makes the pendulum swing back from unfettered capitalist freedom to a more responsible capitalism willing to co-operate with government and with labour.

So there is little substance to most of the reasons advanced against a full-employment policy for Canada and analyzing its consequences for the economy. There isn't a single formula good for all countries at all times. The countries with full-employment policies did not all face the same constraints, nor were their policies the same. How they fought of unemployment in the recent recession is described by Goran Therborn in his book Why Some People are More Unemployed Than Others.

Therborn looks at four countries with full-employment policies, coping with the last great recession of the late 1970s and early 1980s. All four operate under the constraints of international markets and the logic of domestic capitalist enterprise.

Japan: Japanese private business, guided and co-ordinated by the state, embarked on vast programs of energy restructuring (away from oil) and conservation. For the downscaling and restructuring of depressed industries such as shipbuilding, textiles, basic metals and certain branches of the chemical industry, Japan developed intense co-operation among firms in the same industry. The Japanese government did not hesitate to finance these activities by increasing its deficit even above that of Britain. Subsequently, the Japanese deficit was reduced as a result of this program.

Norway: The Norwegians used huge foreign loans to develop their oil industry and to subsidize full employment. Norway's "current account deficit" with the rest of the world hit 14.1 per cent of GDP. This was quickly corrected, however, by restricting demand through a wage and price freeze.

Sweden: The international recession tested Sweden's full-employment policy severely. Exports fell; profits slipped. Government deficits rose to 6.2 per cent of GDP in 1982. A new adjustment program started with a 16 per cent devaluation of the Swedish currency to make exports more competitive. The unions agreed to wage moderation. The budget deficit was cut by raising taxes. Full employment was maintained through public investment in transportation, energy and construction. The balance of trade became positive, and the total foreign balance has improved and inflation has fallen.

Austria: Inflation was kept very low in Austria through an incomes policy (wage controls). An expansive full-employment policy did not provoke a flight of capital or speculation against the Austrian currency. Fiscal policy was tightened with deficits reduced annually.

As Therborn shows, Austria, Japan, Norway and Sweden chose different paths in response to the circumstances each faced. But all four had full employment as the centerpiece of their economic policies. And all four imposed controls on the rise of wages and the prices when necessary. All four were very prudent about reducing deficits as soon as possible.

In those four countries, the full-employment policy was a non-reversible "given" to which the business world and labour adapted their policies. There was no room for doubt that government policy would remain committed to full employment even when power passed from one party to another.

In consequence, business, unions and government in all four countries co-operated in designing the full-employment policy to which they were all committed. The ways in which co-operation came about varied institutionally from country to country, but the essence was similar, and it has been called "co-operative capitalism". Such co-operation, of course, limits the businessperson's freedom of action. Many Canadian businesspeople believe the gospel of such American publications as Forbes and Barron's, which see the solution of all economic problems in liberating the entrepreneur. To this, the Massacheusetts Institute of Technology economist Lester C. Thurow replies:

North America is not being beaten on the productivity front and in international competition by societies which have liberated their entrepreneurs and emphasized rugged individualism . . . Whatever one thinks of the cause of Japanese success, it cannot be attributed to rugged individualism. If there was ever a society that de-emphasized rugged individualism and emphasized social organization, it is the Japanese.

In any case, even the U.S. government has begun encouraging experiments in co-operative capitalism, notably in an effort to challenge the Japanese supremacy in microchips: various companies and the government are exploring the possibility of joint semi-conductor research whereby competing companies may actually help one another. This is not Rambo-style capitalism where the great loner tycoon takes on the world; it is an imitation of what Japan and Sweden do.

Surely, if other countries have successfully tried full-employment policies and co-operative capitalism, we should at least examine whether such a course is feasible in Canada.

For two decades, Canada has needed a full-employment policy. We have seen how costly employment is. We can afford policies of full employment without increasing the deficit, taxes or inflation. The hypothesis is simple: for job creation we need less money than we already spend on unemployment. Before discussing the hypothesis further, let me say that I had it tested so that I would not waste... time talking about something unrealistic. I asked the Economic Council of Canada in 1986 and Infomertrica, a respected economic think-tank, to test this hypothesis with the help of their computerized, mechanized models.

They both did, and the Economic Council of Canada in its latest report, as I said earlier, has adopted my conclusion.

Econometric models are large sets of mathematical equations expressing the relationships between various aspects of the economy. They are fed into computers and then one can ask, for instance, what will happen to the cost of agricultural products and their sales if the cost of fertilizer rises. Similarly, one can ask what will happen to consumption prices, savings, investments, tax receipts, government spending if several hundred thousand unemployed find jobs thanks to a job-creation program instigated but not necessarily run, by governments, with the collaboration of business and labour.

● (0815)

These econometric models are far from infallible, but they are one of the most widely used prediction tools. The Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada use them.

Later in this book, I shall propose giving people jobs instead of unemployment insurance or welfare. The type of job creation to encourage should be determined by a combination of business, labour and government decisions at the federal, provincial and municipal levels. However, to test the scheme, I had to provide the Economic Council and Informetrica with a specific list of jobs categories and the number of jobs to be created in each category; the number of new jobs I put in each category was proportionate to the number of existing jobs in that category as a percentage of total employment in 1985. The test was done in 1987 and was for the years 1987 to 1990 inclusive. Here is the list of the new jobs:

TABLE 6

ACTIVITY	ADDITIONAL JOBS IN 4 YEARS
Building Low-Cost Housing	55,232
Restoring Housing Stock	59,476
Restoring Infrastructure (water mains, sewers, etc.)	8,712
Tourist-Facility Construction	59,476
Reforestation, Maintenance	17,337
Repairing and Double-tracking Railroads	67,016
Home Care for the Elderly and Mentally Ill	16,705
Eradication of Illiteracy	34,968
Tourism Employment	132,988
Day Care	27,488
Environmental Restoration	43,940
Other Jobs (spinoffs from above)	73,314
TOTAL	596,650

This figure of 596,650 new jobs would lower the 8.25 per cent unemployment rate projected by the Hon. Michael Wilson for the year 1990 to four per cent (see Table 3, above). Four per cent was used as a target because Canada has many seasonal jobs such as navigation on the Great Lakes and fishing; we also have vast distances, which make moving to another job harder than in smaller countries. Consequently, four per cent seems reasonably low unemployment, according to many economists.

Further, I asked Informetrica and the Economic Council of Canada to assume that initially the cost for creating these additional 596,650 jobs by 1990 would not exceed the cost to governments of each unemployed (see Table 2, above).

What would be the effects of such a program on the deficit, on inflation, on the GDP? Informetrica and the Economic Council of Canada did their studies. Their conclusions are summarized below. (The full texts of both studies can be found in Appendix C of the 1987 Senate report Only Work Works . . .)

INFORMETRICA

—Job creation would not increase government spending.

—There would be no significant inflation caused by the proposed job-creation program.

—The real level of wages and salaries would rise. "Thus, the gains of those who benefit directly will not come from the pockets of those who are otherwise employed."

—Economic gains predicted by economists for the years 1987 through 1990 would be enhanced through job creation, to the following extent:

—Consumption would grow an extra 1.6 per cent in 1987, 2.85 per cent in 1988, 3.1 per cent in 1989, 3.0 per cent in 1990, compared with what would happen without the proposed job-creation program.

—Business investment would be higher than expected by 5.35 per cent in 1987; 10.77 per cent in 1988; 11.7 per cent in 1989; 13 per cent in 1990.

The GDP would be 2 per cent higher than otherwise expected in 1987; 3.3 per cent in 1988; 3.25 per cent in 1989; 4.16 per cent in 1990.

Economic expansion would open up new job opportunities, thereby relieving some of the pressure on government to provide new jobs.

In addition, tax revenues would be increased—

So we will not be needing the GST:

—even though tax rates would not have to go up.

Public spending would decrease, allowing governments to save money.

We are often criticized for objecting to this government's policies and not suggesting alternative policies. I know this takes time because economic policies are a compilation of many complex ideas that have to be put together. This is what I am trying to do for honourable senators opposite in order to give them a total picture of how we can achieve what both sides want: a better life for Canadians, and a decrease in the national debt. We can do that not by the policies this government is proposing, but by the policy of full employment.

In the Informetrica simulation, each million dollars of the job-creation spending that went to the service sector produced 4.66 more jobs than each million dollars spent on creating non-service jobs. Obviously, if the aim is to create as many jobs as possible, the service sector gives the biggest job-bang for a buck.

The Economic Council of Canada (ECC) also found that 596,650 additional jobs could be created from 1987 to 1990 inclusive, without increasing the deficit or taxes.

However, the ECC remarked that these additional jobs—

The Economic Council of Canada has changed its mind since then, as is obvious.

The text continues:

—were all in activities with low growth in productivity. Thus, "the average productivity growth of our workers would be lowered; we would become less competitive internationally; the incomes of, and consumption by, the poor would grow faster than productivity and this would be inflationary."

There are two arguments here: (a) that we shall lose our international competitiveness if we create jobs with low-productivity growth; and (b) that our average productivity per worker will be lowered, which means that those getting the new jobs will have incomes that grow faster than the production of goods and services in the community, which in turn will cause prices to rise (again, too much money chasing too few goods).

Neither of these arguments holds. First, we do not compete with other countries in everything. "International competitiveness affects 30 per cent of our economy; 70 per cent is out of the export fame." Shouldn't we find jobs that produce goods and services for consumption in Canada? asks economist Rod Dobell. For example, we certainly do not face foreign competition in home care for the elderly, day care, or public school teaching. Competitiveness is in the import-export field and none of the jobs I propose are in the foreign trade area. (Later, when discussing defence, we shall see examples of how we can avoid having job-creation programs challenged by the U.S.A. as "unfair subsidies" under the Free Trade Agreement.)

Second, the ECC maintains that our average productivity growth will be lowered by this job-creation scheme, causing inflation, because the new spending by the re-employed poor would grow faster than our productivity—there would be too much money chasing too few goods.

This argument is based on a misconception that views a nation in the same way it views a firm. According to this view, we measure productivity growth by observing a numerical fraction of which the top, the numerator, is the GDP (the total of goods and services turned out by the economy); the denominator is the total number of people who actual work.

The rate at which the value of the fraction grows is the rate of growth of our productivity. This is how Statistics Canada, the ECC and business firms measure the growth rate of productivity.

It follows that if a firm can reduce the denominator (the number of workers on its payroll) without reducing the total of goods and services it produces (the numerator), the firm's productivity has grown. The point is that a firm can dismiss workers and "someone else" takes care of them. But as a nation, we cannot dismiss our people and have someone else take care of them. The nation is the "someone else."

The realistic way of considering the economy and productivity is to compare Canada to a co-operative with 100 workers of whom 87 have jobs and 13 have lost their jobs. (In 1988, those receiving unemployment insurance benefits, plus the employable welfare recipients, represented 13 per cent of employable Canadians aged 15 to 65 who had sought jobs at some point.) Let us now calculate productivity.

The 87 members of our co-operative who work increase their productivity by four per cent in one year (which means they multiply it by 1.04: 100 multiplied by 1.04 equals 104, which is an increase of four per cent). The 13 jobless have no product and thus cannot increase their productivity. This gives us the following fraction for productivity growth:

$$\text{(A) } \frac{(87 \text{ workers} \times 1.04) + (13 \text{ jobless} \times 0)$}{100} = 0.905\%$$

Now assume that the 13 jobless have found jobs in the which they have a product but show no increase in productivity—

The case that the Economic Council is so worried about, or was so worried about:

—(in other words, their product is multiplied by 1.00, which means it does not increase). The other 87 still have a productivity growth of 4 per cent. This gives us the following fraction:

$$\text{(B)}\ \frac{(87\ \text{workers} \times 1.04) + (13\ \text{new workers} \times 1.00)}{100} = 1.035\%$$

Fraction (B) gives a productivity growth for the collectivity considerably larger than faction (A). In fact, because 13 of the 100 were not working in fraction (A), the value of this productivity fraction is 87 per cent (0.905 divided by 1.035) of what it could have been had there been no unemployment as in fraction (B).

Remember that the ECC said that if we created the proposed jobs for the unemployed, these people would suddenly have more money and would spend it faster than goods and services could be produced. This, said the ECC, would cause inflation. Fraction (B) is one answer to that objection: employing the unemployed increases the rate of growth of national productivity. But what if this increase in productivity is not enough to keep up with the increase in spending? Wouldn't we then still find ourselves in an inflationary situation?

Those who still will not accept full employment because they believe unemployment keeps inflation down by keeping demand down should consider a proposal by the eminent U.S. economists Heilbroner and Thurow. They write that inflation can be controlled if we tax back 95 per cent of any increase in household income from one year to the next; to be clear, this means that if your income grows 10 per cent in one year, half this growth, the first five per cent, will be taxed at whatever is your normal tax rate; the next five per cent will be taxed away totally, while inflation threatens. Thus, a five-per-cent lid would be put on inflation since people would only have five per cent more to spend.

This fiscal five-per-cent lid on inflation would not be kept on at all times but only when inflation threatened. Prof. Pierre Fortin and other economists say that such wage and price controls worked very well in Canada in 1978—

And the figures that are in can be judged.

... making inflation fall by up to eight points. Wage controls, Fortin thinks, are certainly better than the policy of high interest rates that we now follow.

I will say more on this later.

We can conclude that the ECC exaggerates the danger of inflation resulting from full-employment policies.

They did this study for me back in 1986, and it is obvious they have come to the same conclusion as I if one reads there latest report, where they recommend that the only way to fight high deficits to decrease the national debt is to pay attention to reducing unemployment.

And, if inflation does manifest itself, then we can use controls to contain it while we pursue full-employment policies.

We should adopt this policy of full employment, with inflation controls if necessary, because restoring the unemployed to the workforce has beneficial effects on the deficit and on economic growth, as follows.

Let us assume that in our co-operative, each of the 87 shown as working in fraction (A), Table 7, earns $15,640, for a total of $1,360,680. Let us further assume that the care and feeding of all the 100 members of the co-operative costs $1.4 million. So the co-operative has a deficit of $39,320 and gets into debt.

If the other 13 find jobs at $10,000, the co-operative earns $1,490,680: [(87 × $15,640) + (13 × $10,000) = $1,490,680]. After spending $1,400,000 on the care and feeding of all its hundred members, the co-operative will have a surplus of $90,680 to pay off debts and invest in growth.

This parallel holds because Canada, as a nation, undertakes to look after the care and feeding of all its citizens. If nearly all work, we have a surplus to pay off our debts and finance growth. If substantial numbers do not work, we can't simply let them starve to death; we pay for their keep and that puts us into debt.

Many economists have demonstrated that full-employment policies can reduce deficits or taxes or both. For example, Professors O.N. Blanchard of MIT and L.H. Summers of Harvard write that high taxes and costly social programs are often blamed for European economic problems; "but each one percentage point reduction in unemployment in Europe today would make possible a reduction of about four per cent in tax rates because of the reduced need for social welfare ... and the enlarged tax base, as output expanded. Of course, if tax rates were kept constant, there would be a surplus to pay off the deficit.

I have another statement that I would like to make.

It is much cheaper for governments to subsidize a firm to hire an unemployed Canadian than pay him or her unemployment insurance or welfare.

I am not about to suggest that we end unemployment by hiring all the unemployed as public servants. But in one more demonstration of how avoidably costly unemployment is, I shall prove that, indeed, it would be cheaper for our society to subsidize job creation than to pay unemployment insurance benefits to the jobless.

The belief that paying unemployment insurance is better than government intervention to create jobs is deeply anchored among large numbers of people. After all, they say, unemployment benefits are only 60 per cent of a person's wages for 50 weeks out of 52; that's less than paying that person a full wage.

But we saw in Table 2 that unemployment benefits are not the only cost borne by governments and, therefore, by the taxpayer: because the unemployed have less income than they had when employed, they pay less tax.

The government's tax loss is in addition to welfare or unemployment insurance benefits they pay. So let us compare the government's accounts when a person is unemployed and then is given a government's subsidized private job at a salary of $15,614 which is what our unemployed earned on average before they lost their jobs in 1989.

This is Table 8. I hope that the honourable senators agree that it should be printed?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of table, see Appendix C, p. 3520)

Senator Gigantès: The table is entitled "Comparison of the Effects on Government Accounts of Paying Unemployment Insurance or a Public-Service Salary to an Unemployed Person, Using the Multiplier."

The table is in three parts. Part (A) is: When Smith, The Average Unemployed Canadian, Was Employed. Looking at line (a), Smith's employment income in private industry was $15,640.

Line (b) says: "GDP generated by Smith's employment income, $15,640 times the multiplier of 1.7, $26,588."

Yes, the government's net balance, 34.4 per cent of $26,588, which is in the plus column of the government's books is $9,146.

I refer now to Part (B) of the Table:

"Smith Loses His Job And Goes On Unemployment Insurance." Looking at line (d), Smith's unemployment insurance benefits, a net loss for governments, the figure is – $9,023.

For line (e), the GDT generated by Smith's unemployment benefits, $9,053 times the multiplier of 1.7," the dollar figure is p $15,359.

For line (f), "Tax revenues for all levels of government, from GDP generated by Smith's UI benefits, 34.4 per cent of $15,339, the figure is p $5,277.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Would the senator accept a question? I apologize for getting into this at this late stage of your address, but I wonder if he could help me understand what it is he is doing that is relevant to what we are debating?

Senator Gigantès: I can do that. We have a motion on the floor that says we should stop reading petitions and go directly to discussing—

An Hon. Senator: And in addition, passed Question Period and everything else.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, and to discuss the GST. The GST is the measure that you say will help you reduce the deficit—that is, the national debt—amd to improve the finances of the government.

We think there are better ways of doing that and therefore we are determined to kill the GST; and whenever we say that we are determined to kill the GST, we are asked "What do you propose instead? At this stage, I am giving you—and this, I am afraid, will take many hours, because it is a complex answer—what we propose instead, and why I want the GST killed.

By not allowing the proceedings to get to the GST, I want you to know why we act as we act, and why we think as we think.

So I am giving you a Liberal alternative to the Tory economic policies.

A reason for preventing you from pushing the GST through—

Senator Kelly: If I may ask a supplementary question. It seems to me, honourable senators, that what the Honourable Senator Gigantès is doing, and is doing very well, is entering into a debate on the bill itself, which I think would be fine and totally appropriate; but I wonder if it is appropriate here because what we are talking about here is whether or not we move to the Orders of the Day? We are not dealing with the substance of Bill C-62, but we would be happy to, and I would hope that we would do so. It seems to me that the honourable senator is getting his targets crossed, but I may be wrong.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senator, you are not listening to the preliminary remarks. If ever we get to the debate on the GST, I have several more volumes on economics to give you on those issues.

What I am trying to answer, among other things, is some of the comments that were made yesterday, notably by Senator Sylvain, insisting that we should talk of substance, and, by your often-repeated assertions to the press from that side, that we have no alternatives.

The press love to say things about this Liberal alternative. We do have a Liberal alternative, and I am reading you a Liberal alternative. I am a Liberal, sir, and very proud of it, and there are many Liberals in the House of Commons who accept these ideas.

We are a party that is much more democratic than yours and there is vigorous debate about all of these things, which is all to the good; but what I am saying is that if I believe that your economic policy, a part of which is the GST, is sapping the social safety net, then it is my duty to use every legitimate procedure or device to keep the GST from becomming law. One of these is to discuss, at this stage, the motion that you have put that we should wipe out everything and get to the discussion of the GST.

I am trying to explain to you the good and sound economic grounds as I see them.

We should not go anywhere near the GST, not only in terms of enacting it, but even in terms of discussing it, and before we get to discussing it, I want you to understand where we come from.

What I am trying to tell you is that your policies are wrong, and therefore, as a patriot, and as a legislator, I am not only entitled, but it is my duty, to make sure that those policies do not come about. We are a multi-party system. One party democracies are not democracies. We are the Opposition and it is our duty to oppose.

When we read the names of Canadians who oppose the GST, there is great indignation on your side. You are much more moderate in expressing indignation than I am or others are, and we are accused of doing something that has nothing to do with the matter at hand—although how the opinions of Canadian taxpayers has nothing to do with the GST escapes my understanding.

So, Senator Sylvain, you were asking for substance, and I am giving you substance. You may not agree with my ideas, but no one on your side can say that I am not talking substance and economics.

Senator Cogger rose to inquire whether I might use the text for a publication, and, of course, I might. As I pointed out to him in connection with another text that I wrote on the Free Trade Agreement, this text is in English, and all royalties that I might conceive of will go to scholarship funds in memory of Miss Mary White who was my thesis supervisor at the University of Toronto, a great lady and a great scholar.

● (0845)

I do not make money on the side as a Senator. I do not accept payment from newspapers when I write articles for them when they are offered.

Senator Corbin: Do you pay your taxes?

Senator Gigantès: And I pay my taxes, yes.

Senator Kelly: May I say just one final word? Senator Gigantès knows very well - because he is too wise not to know - that he is debating the GST, and, this reading from this document and what he actually is doing is what Senator MacEachen indicated would be the tactic, just to use up time. I guess my only plea is why don't we just say that is what we are doing. Senator Gigantès, again I say knows very well that the material he is dealing with refers really to the matters that will be discussed in great detail at the time we debate Bill C62. He is not debating the motion. He knows he is not debating the motion. I can only plead with him to try to get back on the track. I am not asking for any sort of points of order, rulings or anything of that sort. I just think it is more reasonable to be a bit more up front on what is happening here.

Hon. William J. Petten: Senator Kelly, I heard my name mentioned. I was reading. What was it I was supposed to have said? You said "Senator Petten." In what connection did you use my name?

Senator Kelly: Oh, I'm sorry, I said MacEachen. I do have one weakness—actually I have many weaknesses—but I do speak too quickly.

Senator Petten: Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Kelly: He is often and almost always on my mind, and it may have slipped out.

Senator Gigantès: It was a flattering slip of the tongue for both Senator Petten and Senator MacEachen. Would that I had been confused with Senator MacEachen or Senator Petten.

In any event, we have been very up front. Yesterday Senator Frith and Senator Maceachen said that we are perfectly entitled to and will use every legitimate means to defeat the GST. And to delay, he said, is a legitimate parliamentary tactic brought to a major art form by the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker, a true patriot and nationalist. I may have disagreed with many of his policies—

Senator Steuart: And Erik Nielsen.

Senator Gigantès: And Erik Nielsen, yes. Let us not forget Erik Nielsen. Anyway, John George Diefenbaker would not have thought of putting microphones in the caucus room of another party. Erik Nielsen did.

However, it is, said my leader, perfectly legitimate to use whatever is allowed by their rules. We are debating a motion. The motion is, do we wipe out everything and go to the GST to discuss the GST? We think not. We are going to talk on this motion, as we are entitled, to for many hours. I am giving you an example now: six to eight, or maybe ten, hours of a speech that you are going to hear. It depends on how often I am interrupted. I am indefatigable, and what I am doing is in answer to the protests of Senator Sylvain and others who were complaining about the content of our lengthy remarks. I am giving you not only lengthy remarks that are eating up time, but I am giving you lengthy remarks that are pertinent to a major economic issue which you are addressing not only with the GST, but with Bill C-21, Bill C-28 and perhaps others of your measures to dismantle the safety net of Canada.

What I am saying is that you are going the wrong way if you want to reduce the deficit and reduce the national debt and have a healthy economy. I am pointing out to you the facts that I earlier put before the Economic Council of Canada, which made them change their minds and say so in their report just published. However, as I was saying to the earlier shift of Tories, There was not even a tip of the economic hat to say that yes, I was the first one to point this out to make the calculations.

I think it is worth recording in the Senate that I object to the GST. I intend to use up as much time as possible to keep it from coming to discussion, and it is a service I perform for you and for the possible few readers of Hansard who will plough through this enormous speech of mine—

An Hon. Senator: What about the press gallery?

Senator Gigantès: Oh, the press gallery. They are superficial. All they look for—except for you; —present company accepted, young lady—they look for explosions, little facts and, of course, there is this enormous propaganda machine of the Tories.

Senator Corbin: Were you referring to that gentleman, Sir?

Senator Gigantès: My eyesight is poor. If it is a gentleman, then except you, gentleman. It is a generation gap. What can I do? I need a new prescription.

Yes, of course, I intend eat up as much time as possible, Senator Kelly, but I am eating it up with pertinent remarks: remarks that are pertinent to the rate division between your party and mine, which is how best to manage the economy of this country.

So, I was saying—

[Translation]

Senator David: Senator Gigantès, to continue this very practical discussion, may I ask you how many pages the English version of your book has, and what page you are on now?

Senator Gigantès: Honourable Senators, I am on page 74 and I intend to go up to page . . . if I do not count the footnotes and the appendix, I will spare you the appendix . . . I will go up to page 186.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Are you not ashamed of yourself, Senator!

Senator Gigantès: No, Madam, it is a very good book, believe me!

Senator Lavoie-Roux: You say that you wrote it yourself?

Senator Gigantès: If I am not satisfied with one of my books, I do not send it to a publisher.

I did not receive any grants. It was published by a very respectable publishing firm in Toronto called Stoddart. They published it at their expense and not at mine.

If there are any royalties, they will be used to set up a scholarship fund for students at the University of Toronto in memory of Mrs. Mary White who was my doctoral thesis supervisor. She was a person I had a great deal of respect and admiration for, a remarkable individual.

And so, I am not ashamed of what I am reading to you. It is not pornography, but good economics.

Senator David: Senator, if I understand you correctly, your book was published in English? Thanks to you, we know the author. Thus it is at this time on the market.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, Senator.

Senator David: So we do not have to sit here and listen to you; we can read it.

Senator Gigantès: You are not listening to me in any case!

Senator David: Well, I am happy to know that we will be able to read it at leisure, by and by!

Senator Gigantès: Books such as this one deserve to be read more than once. It is quite a weighty tome.

Senator David: We can make it our bedside reference book! An excellent soporific, I am sure.

Now, is there a French translation of this book coming out in the near future?

Senator Gigantès: There may or may not be a French version of the book. I do not know yet.

Senator David: Does that perhaps depend on Senate translators?

Senator Gigantès: Not necessarily. I have already translated approximately 180 pages on my own.

Senator David: So, of the 186, you only have six pages left. You will not need to put a lot of effort into what is left!

Senator Gigantès: No, there are 202 pages altogether.

[Senator Gigantès.]

I have not yet translated the appendix and the footnotes.

Senator David: Thus, you could read the last 22 pages and finish the job. You would have a complete translation.

Senator Gigantès: I was just blowing my own horn to Senator Kelly; one of the reasons I am making this speech . . . there are in fact two. One is to instruct you, and the other is to use up as much time as possible.

My Leader tells me that this procedure is entirely legitimate, according to parliamentary procedure. You may not like it, it may bother you, but that is the way it is.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: You should be a little more humble!

Senator Gigantès: A little more humble about what?

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Well, an author should not be using this Chamber to promote his own book.

Senator Gigantès: Madam, you are quite wrong; I am not promoting my own book.

You see, I am an ex-editorialist. I know for a fact that only two people read what I wrote: the chief editorialist and my wife, because I would refuse to give her her morning coffee if she did not read my editorial!

It does not bother me in the slightest not to have an audience. Every editorialist knows that he has no audience or almost none. When, on occasion, a reader would call to give me a piece of his mind and I took the call, I would go out of my way to be nice because I realized, to my delight, that there was a third person who read what I wrote!

So, as far as my promoting my own book is concerned, if you think I am stupid enough to believe that someone is going to buy it because I am reading it in the Senate, you are absolutely wrong. I am a lot more realistic than that.

First of all, nobody is going to bother reading the Senate Debates. And even if they were to read them, their reaction would be: Well, I do not have to buy the book, here it is! So, that certainly is not promotion.

In any case, I never sell many copies of my books! Indeed, I have never really understood why publishers are willing to publish my books, because they do not make any money on them.

Senator David: The professor who taught you will not make much money either if you only have a readership of three!

Senator Gigantès: I had professors who did not seem to be as interested in money as they were in their particular discipline.

Perhaps it is a little difficult for a Conservative to understand that, but it is a fact.

Senator David: Did your professors teach you discipline?

Senator Gigantès: Are you talking about discipline of the military or the academic variety?

Senator David: Intellectual.

Senator Gigantès: Ah, intellectual discipline. Well, I would not want my professors to be held responsible for my intellectual sins. Everything that is valid or useful in what I say comes from them. Everything that is invalid or useless is my own fault. I respect them and revere them.

Senator Frith: What modesty!

Senator Gigantès: They are head and shoulders above me.

Senator David: Senator Frith is absolutely right to say that you are modesty personified!

Senator Frith: Absolutely!

Senator Tremblay: To an inordinate degree!

Senator Gigantès: Yes, that is true when it comes to the eminent scholars who were patient and kind enough to let me benefit from their knowledge.

I will continue, then. I was at table number 8, in part B.

Senator David: On page 74!

Senator Gigantès: Yes, that is right.

[English]

Smith loses his job and goes on unemployment insurance benefits. Lline (d) indicates a net loss for governments of $9,023. At line (e), "GDP generated by Smith's unemployment benefits" is $9,023 times the multiplier of 1.7, which is $15,339. Line (f), "Tax revenues for all levels of government, from GDP generated by Smith's U.I. benefits, 34.4 per cent of $15,339,"the figure is $5,277. This, of course, is a reduction in tax revenues for all levels of government because Smith lost his job—that is, line (c) minus line (f)—and the reduction is in the amount of $3,869. As was said earlier, this was an increase in government red ink, not only by $3,869 but, in addition, by the $9,023 that the government paid in unemployment insurance benefits. This increase in government red ink, therefore, equals $12,892.

There is also interest to pay on that, naturally, since we are in a deficit situation, of $1,450. That gives a change in governments' net balance, at line (j), of $14,342.

We shall now pass to Part (C) of Table 8: "Let Us Pay A Private Firm $7.820 To Hire Smith At $15,640." That is what a private firm would pay Smith. At line (k), Smith's employment income is $15,640. The GDP generated by Smith's income, 1.7 times line (k) is $26,588. Tax revenues for all levels of government, 34.4 per cent, of line (l), is $9,146, minus the contribution to Smith's salary by the government of $7,820, which is half of the $15,640. Therefore, the net government balance is $1,326.

> Indeed, governments are better off when Smith works at a non-subsidized private sector job, because then their net balance is + $9,146, [line (c)] the tax revenue generated by Smith. When they subsidize a business to hire Smith, the governments' net balance is only + $1,326. But that $1,326 [line (o), above] is a positive figure, written in black ink on the government ledgers; whereas when Smith is unemployed, the net balance, written in red ink, is − $3,869 [line (g), above]. Which means that governments are $5,195 better off when they subsidize Smith's hiring than when he is jobless. Arithmetic works as when reading a thermometer: When you go from minus 3.869 degrees to plus 1.326 degrees, you have gained 5.195 degrees. We saw that when Smith is unemployed, governments are $14,342 worse off than when he worked for a private firm. Obviously we cannot afford not to find Smith a job, by paying part of his private-sector salary, if necessary. That is the Swedish secret: reducing the deficit by paying people to work rather than paying them unemployment insurance benefits to do nothing. And when people are paid to work at producing needed goods and services, they not only pay more taxes, increasing government revenues, but they also add to the Gross Domestic Product, the total of all the goods and services we turn out as a nation. In other words, they add to our collective wealth.

The device of subsidizing job creation rather than paying people to do nothing is used by the full employment countries all the time. It has been advocated by Canadian economists, among them John Graham of Dalhousie in a speech he made before an economic conference in Ottawa in March 1985. He said:

> A large part of the deficit arises from unemployment-induced payments of unemployment insurance benefits and social assistance. Unemployment insurance benefits alone amount to about $12 billion in the current year (1985). I do not suggest that these benefits be reduced, although they too should be reviewed to ensure that they are going to those who in fact require such a safety note; but I do suggest that they could be used to kill two birds with one stone: perform their safety net function and generate useful long-term employment.
> It is generally agreed that new production and employment will come principally from small business. It is therefore desirable to encourage these businesses. The initial period in the life of a business is generally unprofitable and is often one of touch-and-go financially until the business establishes the necessary market and gains expertise in developing and producing its product.
> If the recipients of unemployment insurance benefits were to be permitted to use their benefits as a wage subsidy in seeking employment with new small businesses, the employer would have the benefits of reduced costs in the start-up period; the employee would have the benefit of a job at the going wage rate with a good prospect of its becoming permanent. The government would make some revenue recovery in taxes and future demand for unemployment benefits would be reduced.
> Safeguards would be needed to prevent employers from laying off workers once their unemployment insurance benefits had run out and hiring other workers who had just begun to receive such benefits. There are no doubt other ways in which unemployment insurance benefits could be used to increase employment. The point is that they should be used in the most effective way possible.

The biggest contribution to deficit reduction would, of course, come from a substantial reduction in unemployment that would reduce unemployment benefits and increase tax revenues. From all points of view, the reduction in unemployment is the essential issue.

Every time we take someone off unemployment, we make a lot of money as a nation. It is profitable. It is a good deal for all of us to create jobs. It increases government revenues. It cuts the deficit. It reduces the debt. It increases our productivity. And employment is better than welfare because people do not only need money, they also need a role in society.

So we should pursue a full-employment policy that would keep unemployment at between three and four per cent of those that are employable between the ages of 15 and 65. This would not make the labour supply too tight. Sweden has found that less than two per cent unemployment makes the labour supply too tight and causes local labour shortages. We are a much larger country and labour mobility is harder to achieve; thus, we might not be able to push unemployment below three to four per cent.

This part of the book started with the question, What can we afford? The answer is now clear: we can afford anything that pays people in high-unemployment regions to produce needed goods and services rather than do nothing. What are those needed goods and services? They are what the cities, towns and villages need, and what they might be able to afford only if labour were subsidized. We know the large categories of the things they need because they have told us: Sewers, water mains, cycle paths, day care, making a local stream into a source of electricity, clinics and so on.

We can tell the municipalities and the provinces that the federal government will subsidize the wages of every new job created in meeting these needs. The subsidy, on average, would be $7,820 for each new job and would be tax-free.

Any businessman should be happy about that.

As was shown in Table 8, the federal government would reduce its deficit considerably for each unemployed person hired through such a scheme.

An average tax-free subsidy to business of $7,820 for each new and useful job created will work: the experience of a program in the early 1980s called Employment Tax Credits proves this. It gave businesses that created new jobs a credit they could use to reduce the tax they paid. Thus, the program was of no help to the small businesses that most needed it, those that were starting up, had not begun making profits, had not begun paying taxes and so had no use for a tax credit.

That was a wrong way in which to do it.

The Employment Tax Credit, moreover, was much smaller than the subsidy proposed here. The credit itself was counted as part of the firm's profits and was taxed.

[Senator Gigantès.]

So there wasn't enough benefit left for an established firm to think of starting new activities and hiring new staff, while putting up with the necessary government monitoring to make sure that the jobs for which the credit was paid were, indeed, new jobs that would not have been created without government help.

In consequence, the Employment Tax Credit Program only produced half as many jobs as forecast and was touted predictably in some quarters as a cautionary example of how unwise government intervention in the economy is. It was also condemned by all the value-for-money accountants for not meeting its objectives. None of the critics mentioned that the cost of each real new job that would not otherwise have been created was a much lesser cost than the payment of unemployment benefits.

This is as good an illustration as any of what is wrong with accounting as now practised by government and business: the accountants only look at the cost of implementing a policy and never at the cost of not implementing it, counting as too high, for example, the cost of installing anti-pollution equipment, and not counting the cost of the inevitable clean-up. These people have always only looked at the cost of job creation through the intervention of government; they have never compared this cost with the higher cost of keeping people unemployed.

To repeat, the new, useful jobs that qualify for subsidies would be identified by the communities where the jobs would be created. The communities themselves know best who has what skills and who needs what services. In consultation with the ultimate consumers of goods and services that are needed but are not being provided, the federal government would subsidize projects that do not conflict with the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement, as we shall see later.

Nor must we think that what is proposed here ends with sewers and water mains. Canadians have the imagination and ability to devise projects that would benefit from an initial wage subsidy but would be able to fly on their own eventually, as Professor Graham of Dalhousie says. Making our small, coastal mountain and lakeshore towns more attractive to tourists has endless potential for creating jobs in more and better tourist facilities, with well-trained staff.

• (0915)

In subsequent pages are proposals for various schemes in many fields. Actual schemes, as indicated, must be locally devised and run. However, there are some general measures that must be taken to make the application of full-employment policies easier.

To reduce the deficit, we should diminish tax incentives we give for saving, such as RRSPs, which reduce taxable income. With fewer incentives to save, people would spend more, which would stimulate demand. Government revenues would increase, which, in turn, would decrease the deficit and, therefore, the government's need to borrow.

As the government would be borrowing less, there would be more money for industry to borrow, invest in productive capacity and thus meet the increased demand.

Increased demand worries those who fear inflation.

I will deal with how to take care of that shortly.

Transform unemployment insurance into employment insurance, which will use its funds to create jobs. Labour and management would continue paying into employment insurance what they now pay to unemployment insurance. Smith, from Table 8, will be given a job at $15,640, financed partly by what is now the unemployment insurance fund. In this context, a single parent should not simply be offered a job or training sessions with full pay, but should also have access to affordable day-care, preferably at the workplace. Having established that we save money by creating jobs, we can prove that we would reduce the deficit by funding a day-care system that is accessible to all, regardless of income.

After some interval, an employable jobless person who refused work that was reasonably suitable, or refused a combination of work and retraining courses (at a salary equal to that which he last earned), would face the much less attractive and only alternative of leaving the labour force and going on welfare. In a very real sense, by choosing welfare instead of work, employable persons would be choosing to live in a poverty trap because, generally, their welfare benefits are reduced by a dollar for every dollar of income they earn on the side.

This seems harsh. But if an employable person is offered the chance to work and train at a reasonable level of income and chooses instead the poverty trap that is welfare, there is no obligation for society to make this person comfortable.

It is called tough love in some quarters and I agree with it.

The problem of what to do with people who do not fit into a society based on work has always been worrisome. Even Milton Friedman, high priest of undiluted free-market economics, deals with the problem of individuals who cannot cope with a free-market society: the handicapped; those too old or too sick to work; people with mental or psychological disorders who do not need to be institutionalized but who cannot earn a living; the working poor who struggle conscientiously but do not make ends meet; those who are unemployed or on welfare through no fault of their own.

It would be best, said Friedman some years ago, if we had a negative income tax (also known as a guaranteed annual income). Above a certain level of income, say $5,000 for the sake of illustration, individuals would pay income tax and get no government grants, handouts or tax deductions. If they earned nothing or less than $5,000, they would get enough from the government to have $5,000 a year.

The idea sounds so simple and cost effective. We could fire all the public servants and social workers who run our existing systems of welfare, pensions, unemployment benefits and family allowances. The whole negative income tax scheme could be run by the same people who now run our tax system.

But unless the scheme includes incentives to work, it is really no different from the way things already are. In our current welfare system, the certified penniless receive $5,000 a year and are stripped of every additional penny they earn. This forces them to try living on $5,000, doing nothing else; this, in turn, offends the work ethic and saps the self-respect of welfare recipients.

So how about incorporating an incentive to work in the negative income tax scheme? If welfare recipients earned, for example, $1,000 in addition to their $5,000 government handout, the handout would not be reduced by $1,0000 but by less. In other words, their extra earnings would not be taxed at 100 per cent, as they currently are, but at a lower rate, say 33 per cent. So in addition to their grant of $5,000 in negative income tax, they could keep $666.66 of the extra $1,000 they earn. When their grant and earnings combined reached a certain point, the grant would stop and they would be left to fend for themselves.

This combination of public generosity and encouragement to work is theoretically fine, but there are problems: (a) How do you structure the negative income tax so that it does not cost more than the existing unemployment insurance, child tax credits, welfare, pensions and so on? (b) How do you tax those who receive negative income tax so that they are not better off than someone who doesn't ask for negative income but earns $8,000 a year working for the minimum wage? (c) How do you tax the extra earnings of those on negative income tax so that it would be worth their while to earn any extra? (d) Where do you set the amount of extra earnings at which those on the negative income tax would no longer get any money from the government? If the amount is set too low, these people have nothing to gain by seeking employment earnings additional to their $5,000 from the negative income tax; if the amount is too high, then the negative income tax becomes more costly than existing programs.

All these problems have to be solved at the same time for a negative income tax to make economic sense. The economists of the Library of Parliament structured a negative income tax that solved the four problems, but it would give less than the existing programs do to old age pensioners and to people who have contributed towards unemployment insurance, with a formal understanding that they would get paid a certain amount, for a certain period of time, should they lose their jobs. Further, the middle class would also lose its child tax credits, and contributions to retirement funds would no longer be tax deductible.

Reducing payments to old age pensioners is not a good idea: it's hard enough to be old. Reducing payments to the jobless means defaulting on a real undertaking they were given that by contributing over the years towards unemployment insurance, they could expect to get 60 per cent of their insured earnings for 50 weeks when jobless.

To have an equitable negative income tax, planners should at least make exceptions for all those who are already receiving their old age pensions. Others who are not there yet but have been contributing for some years should get more than the negative income tax when they retire, to account for their contributions. Similar exemptions must be made for those who have been paying into the unemployment insurance fund.

The young, when they enter the labour force, could be told that they are entering under new conditions; that when the time comes, they will not get unemployment insurance or old age pensions but a negative income tax. That means we would have two categories of people, those wholly or partly under the existing systems and those under the new. And why not? However, administrative savings would be minimal because we would be running two schemes concurrently.

That is why this book takes the position that existing old age pensions, child tax credits and so on should continue to exist. But the unemployment insurance system should be changed to an employment insurance system, used to subsidize job creation and job training. And those who are employable but choose not to accept a job or train for a job would stay on welfare.

It is their choice.

Single, employable individuals choosing welfare over employment or job training would not fare well. I do not believe they are a significant proportion of the population.

Parents of under-age children are a different problem, especially single parents, who are for the most part women. A woman with small children does not have the choice of going to work unless she can get good, affordable day care. Otherwise she is a prisoner of her motherhood. She most probably would enjoy going to work, meeting people, doing something other than changing diapers in a dank apartment. She would probably love to be trained to improve her chances of financial independence for herself and her family. But without affordable day care, she cannot improve her life or that of her children. Such women should get more than they now do through welfare.

That leaves the working poor. Some time ago, The Globe and Mail wrote about a waitress who had come from Portugal and was working for less than $9,000 a year in a fast-food restaurant. She did not ask for welfare. She was admirably attached to the work ethic. As she had three children, she was very poor and her children went without things that children of welfare parents get, such as free dental care.

Even if we do not have a negative income tax, we can use the tax system to determine which working parents are so poor that their children need help. We should provide that help.

[Senator Gigantès.]

According to the auditor general, business gets some $11.5 billion from governments, much of it by allowing firms to postpone paying taxes almost indefinitely. Part of these billions will be spent on research and education, as we shall see; part will still be given to business but only for job-creation schemes where it is possible to prove, beyond doubt, that businesses truly did create jobs that they would not otherwise have created were it not for government aid. Establishing day care at the workplace will be one business initiative qualifying for subsidies.

I am proposing here various forms of partnerships between businesses and government: the firm manages and looks after the bottom line; the government participates as a provider of tax-free funds towards job creation and has enough access to the firm's books to know that the job creation is real and not a scam.

Classical economists keep telling me that the purpose of the economy is not to produce jobs but wealth. Wealth of the tangible kind is created by investing profits. Profits are made by selling. To sell, business needs buyers who have money. Employed people have more money than the unemployed. So if the purpose of the economy is to produce wealth, it must produce jobs for the jobless (especially since producing jobs for the jobless costs less than paying them to produce no wealth).

I intend to break Senator Murray's record of four hours on his feet. It will be a piece of cake.

As suggested by the economists Heilbroner and Thurow, we should pass a law that would tax away all increases in household incomes that exceed five per cent from one year to the next. This means that if you have a ten per cent increase, half of it, or five per cent, will be taxed at the tax rate you come under; the other five per cent will be taxed away totally. As the consumers would only have an extra five per cent to spend, prices could not go up more than five per cent.

Since the GDP can be forecast conservatively to grow by 2.5 per cent per annum, there will be 2.5 per cent more products for households to buy with half the permissible five per cent increase in their incomes; the other half could cause 2.5 per cent inflation, but no one would seriously worry.

This law need apply only when the Bank of Canada announces that it detects inflationary pressures. The mere existence of the law would moderate those inflationary pressures. No one would try for a wage increase exceeding five per cent—there would be no point; no merchant would increase prices more than five per cent—there would be no buyers.

A business that saw its profits increase 10 per cent would have half the increase taxed away, unless that half was re-invested in new machinery or job creation.

This tax would also apply to capital gains, but inflation would be taken into account. For example, someone who bought a house, a farm or a business twenty years ago for $50,000 and sold it yesterday for three times as much would not be taxed if the cost of living had also risen three times over the past 20 years. In any case, people should retain the existing lifetime limit of $100,000 in tax-free capital gains.

Improvements such as house renovations would be taken into account when calculating the part of the original cost that qualifies for tax-free status because of inflation. But renovations would have to be documented by authentic receipts.

● (0930)

Capital gains should be taxed at the same rate, not at a lower rate than employment income; this would be especially salutary for the stock exchanges: it would discourage the kind of gambling that goes on in stock markets, where speculators look for the quick kill. An end to preferential taxes on capital gains (after inflation) from sales of stocks would encourage investment in the hope of long-term returns. After all, the real purpose of buying stocks should be to provide funds for what one hopes is a sound investment. The same applies to land speculation. There is no reason why society should encourage the casino aspects of business through preferential taxes for speculators.

By statute, all the proceeds from this anti-inflation tax would go towards reducing the national debt and could not be used for any other purpose.

Incidentally, none of the above should be taken as hostility towards investors and businesspeople generally. Government help to business would not decrease, it would be redirected. Moreover, government measures should not be such as to discourage those who want to start or acquire businesses in Canada.

Finally, we should decrease interest rates. Assume a net national debt of $330 billion and interest rates of 10 per cent; this means that the government is paying $33 billion a year to those from whom it borrowed the money. These interest payments are approximately equal to the federal deficit. Every percentage point fall in interest rates means a $3.3 billion reduction of interest payments by the government—in other words, a $3.3 billion reduction of the deficit.

Our interest rates should be higher than those in the United States, we are told, for two reasons: (a) to keep money from flowing out of Canada and into the United States, and (b) to keep down inflation. Neither reason holds water.

(a) Suppose we lower interest rates. Suppose, further, that people with cash on hand will then want to take it out of Canada and stash it in U.S. banks. To start with, there is a legal limit to how much can be taken out: a very substantial part of our savings are in the form of contributions to pension funds. By law, only 10 per cent of such savings can be invested outside the country; the other 90 per cent must stay in Canada. Even so, suppose all other loose cash was transferred to U.S. banks: here is what would follow:

—There would be too many Canadian dollars in the United States. Whenever anything, even currency, is in overabundant supply, its price goes down. So if there were an outflow of Canadian dollars towards the United States, the value of the Canadian dollar would drop in terms of U.S. dollars. This means that the inverse would also be true—the value of the U.S. dollar in Canada would rise correspondingly.

—It would then be cheaper for Americans to buy Canadian goods with U.S. dollars, because an American dollar would be worth more here than before.

—Our exports to the United States would boom.

—Conversely, it would be more expensive for Canadians to buy imported American goods because these goods are priced by their producers in U.S. dollars; and since 10 Canadian dollars would be worth fewer American dollars, imports from the United States would be more expensive.

—Since we would have put a five-per-cent ceiling on any rise in income Canadians can keep after tax [see (iv), above], Canadians would not be able to afford to buy as many of the now more expensive American goods.

—Consequently, there would soon be an overabundance of U.S. dollars in Canada because Americans would be buying here like crazy to take advantage of the lower Canadian dollar.

—The value of the American dollar in Canada would decline, as the value of all overabundant things declines.

—And since we would be buying fewer U.S. products, fewer and fewer Canadian dollars would be going south to the U.S.A.

—There would thus develop a scarcity of Canadian dollars in the United States. Since the price of things, including currency, increases when they become scarce, the value of the Canadian dollar in the United States would increase to near where it was before we lowered our interest rates.

Would the fluctuations in the value of our currency then stop? Of course not. Speculation in all currencies never ceases. I have an acquaintance in London who makes an excellent living, judging from his three Rolls-Royces and his house in Mayfair. All he does is move his considerable supply of cash from one coinage to another, to take advantage of fluctuations in the relative values of currencies. The fluctuations may be minimal, but if he guesses right and, in effect, bets huge sums, he makes a killing.

There are millions like him. The shuttling of money every day from one currency to another far exceeds the value of world trade. But speculation in currency values, huge though it is, is acquiring a disembodied existence of its own that is only tenuously related to the real world. It often has much more to do with the mood of the players than with the stability of a country whose currency has lost favour. The speculators have been known to bet against the German mark, even against the Japanese yen. Or they have bet for those two currencies even though rates of interest in both Germany and Japan are much lower than in the U.S.A.

Many businesses and individuals would have to change some of their ways of doing things if we lowered our interest rates to the U.S. level. But in the process, Canadian businesses, home buyers, borrowers (including governments) would profit from lower interest rates; our deficits, private and public, would shrink; some imports that are too expensive while our currency is low would be replaced by equivalent Canadian products; and our economy would grow faster, as a result. Canada would become a much better place in which to do business. Much of the money that goes out would come back.

We are also told that we need high interest rates to control inflation. The theory is that if it is expensive to rent money (the interest one pays is rent), then business will slow down, buy fewer supplies, fire staff. There will thus be less demand for goods and services. When there is less demand, it is difficult for prices to rise and inflation is curbed.

Indeed, if interest rates are high enough long enough, demand will flag, there will be a recession and inflation will eventually be wrestled to the ground. But in the process, home owners and farmers will be unable to pay their mortgages and will be dispossessed; businesses, especially small and middle-sized businesses that depend on borrowing to finance current operations, will go bankrupt; the public deficit will grow hugely because governments will have had to pay hugely increased interest payments on their debts. This is what happened in 1982, and it can happen again.

A policy of the kind proposed above in (iv) will keep incomes and, therefore, demand from rising at more than five per cent a year, while lowering interest rates. It is a policy with more common sense and compassion than the asphyxiation by high interest rates. Opponents of a legal limit on income increases would call it an unwarranted interference in the workings of the free market.

But isn't the imposition of high interest rates interference by government in the workings of the free market? The Bank of Canada, which sets interest rates, is an integral part of the government. The minister of finance can take steps to render unnecessary the imposition of high interest rates by the governor of the Bank of Canada. Only the devious or the uninformed see this in terms of a major conflict in which the brave governor defends the integrity of the currency, daring the government to oppose him; threatening, in such an eventuality, to resign dramatically, nailing an indictment of the finance minister on Parliament's door.

[Senator Gigantès.]

The governor is paid to worry about inflation. We should all worry about inflation. The theory says that inflation happens when there is too much money chasing too few goods. People bid against one another for those goods and bid up prices, as at an auction. If the bidders suddenly found they had less money in their pockets, they would not be able to bid up the prices. There are two ways of taking money away from bidders to fight inflation: one is to tax it away, as this book proposes; the other is to reduce the amount of money in circulation, which will make money scarce, which in turn will increase the interest we must pay to borrow it.

We have seen that when interest rates climb high enough to throttle inflation, a recession ensues. The banks do not suffer: they make pots of money with the high interest they charge; if there is a shortage of domestic private borrowers, the banks can always lend to governments or to foreigners.

The big-business players do not suffer when money is tight and interest rates are high: big players have access to money markets in Japan, Germany and elsewhere. These foreign money markets are not interested in the small Canadian borrower. So when a recession occurs, as in 1981, home owners, farmers and small businesses see their interest payments climb too high, cannot pay and are dispossessed. Their assets are often snapped up at bargain rates by the big players who, like former president Kennedy's father in the Great Depression 60 years ago, know how to get richer in tough times. This is not a moral judgement. We saw that the whole of economics is based on the assumption that people do what they perceive to be in their own best interests; as long as it's legal, we cannot really object.

To fight inflation, the governor of the Bank of Canada, by law, only has the authority to limit the amount of money in circulation, thus raising interest rates. We haven't given him any other weapon. His weapon is like a bomb: it lacks precision. If he uses it to kill the snake in Paradise that is inflation, he also wounds Adam, Eve and other innocent bystanders.

However, if politicians, through lack of courage, do not use the more precise anti-inflation weapon of taxation, the Bank of Canada governor has no choice but to use the anti-inflation bomb of high interest rates. If politicians were controlling inflation by other means, the Bank of Canada would be happy to be out of the ring, as a spectator, not as a combatant.

It takes guts for a politician to limit prices and wages. When wage and price controls were introduced in 1975, the people with money (and therefore with influence) were all against the idea: they did not like any measure that limited their right to get richer in hard times. The labour unions were opposed because they believed the rich were better able to escape control than the workers. Many economists objected because they have been trained with U.S. textbooks, which are often bibles of the unfettered free-market religion. Most business writers were against wage and price controls because most business writers are clergy of the same religion.

No wonder, then, that politicians choose not to use mandatory controls or taxes to limit the rise in incomes and thus brake inflation. They prefer to pretend that the inflation fight is not their responsibility but that of the governor of the Bank of Canada; and they discourse solemnly on how improper it would be for a prime minister to interfere. Yet compared with high interest rates, the tax measures a government can use against inflation are a more compassionate, more precise instrument that limits misery and does not cause recessions; but it carries electoral risks.

To reiterate, the trick is to find a solution that prevents both economic plagues, inflation and depression (which is also known as deflation). A free-market economy, because it is a free-market economy, is bound to have ups and downs, oscillating between boom and bust. We saw that construction of office towers goes from over-building when there is strong demand for new space, to under-building when there is weak demand. The construction industry is a good illustration of how a market economy works as a whole.

During the over-building phase, there are lots of jobs with good pay. Flush with money, people become free spenders and shopkeepers raise their prices as high as the market will bear, causing inflation. During the under-building phase, construction workers lose their jobs; their suppliers and the suppliers of their bosses lose sales and fire staff, resulting in a recession.

● (0945)

If we want a free-market economy, and we do, we are going to have swings between over-building and under-building, between inflation and deflation, oscillations from boom to bust. We can have government intervene to limit the swings or we can let the swings work themselves out. But that takes too long: the Great Depression of the 1930s lasted more than 10 years and was only ended by the Second World War. And there are plenty of countries, like Brazil, Argentina and Italy, that have been crippled by inflation for years with no end in sight.

Only a few eccentric economic ayatollahs would suggest that governments not intervene to limit the swings from boom to bust. I have proposed a set of government measures that will limit the swings from boom to bust, limit the inflation of boom times through taxation; limit the misery and duration of recessions through a full-employment policy. This solution increases economic growth and national productivity; cuts spending: decreases deficits.

A majority of Canadians do not want their social services cut. To keep their social services and decrease the deficit, Canadians have a choice between two solutions: (1) increase taxes by restoring the level of net business taxation to what it was in 1974, which would make business people howl that investment was being discouraged; (2) adopt the full-employment policy suggested here with lower interest rates and anti-inflation legislation. The second solution, as has been demonstrated, is clearly the better one.

And with the policies proposed in this book, we would not need the Goods and Services Tax the government intends to introduce. The government argues that the GST is needed to replace the federal manufacturers' sales tax that is applied to our exports, whereas competing exports from other countries are not so taxed; whereas imports are less taxed than Canadian products that compete with these imports. These inequities should be corrected. But the correction must not be used as a pretext by the government to increase its tax revenues.

By putting our people back to work, as we saw, we would not have a deficit; therefore, the government would not need more tax revenue.

This is why I object to the GST as a part of my objections to your all-encompassing economic policy.

If policies such as those recommended here are not put in place and the GST passes, people will have less money to spend. There will be less demand, therefore less production, therefore fewer jobs, therefore a lower Gross Domestic Income to tax, therefore less government revenue, therefore cuts in the qualities of essential services such as education, health care, research. Wiping out the deficit by putting people to work is the solution—not taxing people more.

Some aspects of the solutions proposed here will displease business, some will displease labour and the consumers. On balance, everyone will be reasonably better off through what is, inevitably, an imperfect compromise and, therefore, a democratic measure.

The emphasis on full-employment policies may sound strange to some. After all, without a full-employment policy, the national unemployment rate has fallen from 11.8 per cent of the labour force in 1983 to 7.8 per cent in 1988, down from 1.4 million to 1 million. There is something seriously wrong with our economic policy if after five years of steady economic growth, we still have one million unemployed. Moreover, this figure of one million is misleading: it does not include the employable on welfare. When we add them, the total of employable people out of work is close to 1.5 million, each costing us, we saw, $14,822, for a total of $22.2 billion a year.

Which is the borrowing needs of the government this year.

And the national figure of 7.8 per cent is an average: the improvement by four percentage points in five years for the national figure is composed mainly of a 5.3 per cent improvement in Ontario and a 4.9 per cent improvement in Quebec between 1983 and 1988. In the Atlantic region, unemployment has not been below 10 per cent since 1975. It still is 16.4 per cent in Newfoundland, 13 per cent in Prince Edward Island and 12 per cent in New Brunswick. Unemployment is 10.3 per cent in British Columbia, in boom times.

Within each province, even rich Ontario, there are regions of high unemployment. Even certain neighbourhoods of Montreal have unemployment rates half as high again or more than the average for Quebec.

The unemployed have brains that are far more sophisticated than the computer running any expensive robot tool. Any businessman would say that keeping smart robot tools idle is unacceptable waste. Yet that's what we do with human resources: we keep them idle.

Many economists say that the solution is mobility. As one of them put it, "If you take measures to keep Newfies at home, where will Toronto get its cheap labour?" The end result of such thinking is Mexico City, or Athens, metropolitan monsters harbouring half the population of their countries, squalid, polluted, strangling on their traffic, noisy, stressed, unmanageable.

I don't think Toronto wants to become the sort of urban monster where, as in Tokyo, a 336-square-foot downtown apartment costs $7 million.

An Hon. Senator: No way.

Senator Gigantès: To continue:

One of the qualities of Canadian life that other nations most envy is the nearness of the great outdoors, the space, the green backyard. We do not have to sacrifice this by all crowding into Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver.

The policies proposed here suggest a rule I recommend to accountants who have been striving to expand their role from that of mere bean counter to someone who passes judgement on whether firms or governments have derived sufficient value for the money they have spent.

The additional and indispensable role I suggest for those who make budget estimates is that they should work out not only how much a program will cost, but also what will be the cost if we do not carry out that particular program. Pollution is the best example. For years, we have spewed noxious waste into the atmosphere from all our chimneys because scrubbers were too costly, according to our accountants. We now know that not using scrubbers was even costlier for society. Similarly, for years we only looked at the cost of full-employment programs and did not introduce them on the grounds that they cost too much. Table 8 shows that it is much costlier not to have full-employment programs.

Yes, we can give decent jobs to Newfoundlanders, to New Brunswickers and to those who live in high-unemployment regions across the country so that their young need not leave family and friends to live far away from home. Which brings us to one more comparison—

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Corbin: Will you please repeat that last part? I missed it. I missed the beginning of the sentence you are reading?

Senator Gigantès:

Yes, we can give decent jobs to Newfoundlanders—

Senator Corbin: Would you please begin that again? Somebody interrupted me over there.

Senator Gigantès:

Yes, we can give decent jobs to Newfoundlanders, to New Brunswickers and to those who live in high-unemployment regions across the country so that their young need not leave family and friends to live far away from home. Which brings us to one more comparison—between Newfoundland and Iceland. They are both islands in the North Atlantic and similar in size.

Of the two, Iceland is the more barren, 70 per cent of its surface having no vegetation. It has no forests per se and only one per cent of the island can be cultivated. One-fifth is used as pasture land. There are few natural resources. Apart from fish, Iceland has some aluminum.

Over and above its fishery, Newfoundland has oil, gas, minerals and hydroelectric power. It has 11.2 million hectares of productive forests.

In 1986, the Gross Domestic Product per capita was $15,843 in Iceland and only $8,359 in Newfoundland. Both figures are in U.S. dollars.

Why doesn't Newfoundland (or any other disadvantaged region of Canada) do as well as Iceland? Because Iceland is firmly committed to full employment. Unemployment in 1987 was 0.5 per cent in Iceland and 17.9 per cent in Newfoundland.

There is another reason. In Newfoundland, only one-third of the labour force has a high school diploma. In Iceland everyone in the labour force has a high school diploma. And an Icelandic high school diploma certifies that its holder has had a much better education than our high schools provide.

Competitiveness, whereby we measure ourselves against other nations, is not an end in itself. We saw that all citizens must ask themselves how best we earn, defend and improve our living. Where possible, activities that come under earning, defending or improving should be complementary, and this will be a touchstone for judging the policies proposed in the rest of this book, where we shall design action rather than count beans as we have been doing. there are limits to what we can do, but we can still do much more than we are doing.

Learning a living. That is the thing. We should be doing more.

I first heard the prase "learning a living" from the late Marshal McLuhan, one of Canada's seminal thinkers. He told me in 1957 that South Korea, Hong Kong, Singapore and India would vault over entire areas of technological development, go from the wooden plough to computerized tools and challenge the established Western industrialized countries through better elementary and secondary education. We now know that he was prophetic. Educationally, at the elementary and high school levels where it really counts, where the foundation is laid for all later learning, the newly industrializing countries of Asia are beating North Americans hollow.

We cannot earn our living or improve it or defend it, in the modern age, unless we improve education.

It is self-evident that education is the foremost path to improvement. If it is good, it enlarges sensibility, increases the field of one's interests and widens one's horizons. For example, many people enjoy playing a musical instrument. They would not have this enjoyment if they had not been educated, or had not educated themselves, to play that instrument. Substitute reading and writing or math for a musical instrument and the example holds. The better you get at what you do, the more you enjoy it, and the more interesting your life is.

Not only does education make life more interesting, it is also the key to better jobs.

Senator Stewart: May I ask a question? Some time back, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance prepared a report on the financing of post-secondary education in Canada. It is a very good piece of work and has been commended by several provincial politicians. One of the problems we have with regard to education in Canada, specifically post-secondary education, is that education comes under provincial jurisdiction; but the federal government, the Parliament of Canada, helped toward the financing of post secondary education through transfer payments.

So that we get into a curious situation where the provincial governments, especially in the smaller provinces, will say, "Yes, we need to improve education in Canada, and if the Minister of Finance in Ottawa—were he that terrible liberal or that terrible Progressive Conservative, it does not make any difference—would only give us more money, we would do a much better job, Canadians would be better educated, there would be more employment in Canada, and we would have more exports."

On the other hand, when the Minister of Finance and his ministerial colleagues in Ottawa find more money for post-secondary education, and it flows through the provincial governments, there is no assurance that it will be used for that specific purpose.

There is no question but that Canada needs a better-educated populous, but how can we make sure that tax payers' money is brought to bear upon this important problem? I wonder if you plan to come to that?

• (1000)

Senator Gigantès: I will address this issue.

Senator Stewart: Will you do it today?

Senator Gigantès: Oh, yes.

Senator Stewart: Oh, that is encouraging.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you.

[Translation]

Senator David: Senator Gigantès, to continue along the same lines, earlier we were up to page 74 and it was about 8:15.

Senator Gigantès: I am now up to page 92.

Senator David: You are now on page 92. Do you intend to read your book to the very end, that is all 186 pages?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, Senator David, I will do so today.

Senator David: Thank you for that information. I maintain that this is a monumental waste of time that is horribly expensive for Canadians.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you, Senator. I am very grateful for your compliments.

[English]

Not only does education make life more interesting, it is also the key to better jobs. Statistics on earnings are clear; the higher the level of education, the more people earn in their lifetime, the better and more interesting their jobs.

An important Ontario study by the Ministry of the Treasury says that we cannot predict which specific new jobs will emerge in the future but we know which jobs will disappear: those in industries that manufacture standardized mass-produced goods. Newly industrialized countries buy the latest technology and with their cheaper labour take such manufacturing jobs away from us. Only with robots, not people, can we stay in these fields.

But in Canada we have almost left the industrial age when our economy was almost solely resource based and the major engine of growth was manufacturing. In this information age, the Canadian economy in undergoing—and has already undergone, to a great extent, a massive shift to services. Between 1976 and 1986, only 154,000 new jobs were created in the goods-producing sector and 2 million in services. The service sector accounts for 75 per cent of all employment in Canada and for 72.4 per cent of the GDP.

The economists of the Library of Parliament have triple-checked these figures; they were so astonished by them.

The growth is strongest in knowledge-intensive jobs. Between 1941 and 1981, knowledge-intensive services for producers or for business grew by 789 per cent in Ontario; services for consumers (restaurants, cleaners, barbers) only grew by 179 per cent.

This is significant; 798 per cent growth for knowledge-intensive, whereas consumer services was only 179 per cent. It is significant for education and the relation of education to the economy and the jobs.

So our people may find some work in manufacturing complex goods where our current expertise will help. There are conditions: we must increase our research, improve our training and be flexible enough to innovate when developing new products or perfecting existing ones. Only thus can we hope to compete with newly industrializing countries.

What is true of manufacturing is even more true of the service sector. Our service economy is knowledge-intensive. In a world predominantly composed of newly industrializing countries, Canada is still one of the relatively few "post-industrial" societies, has a high degree of saleable expertise, not only in traditional services, such as banking, engineering and computer software, but in a host of other knowledge-intensive services as well. The increasingly affluent developing countries will buy our expertise in project management, health care, agricultural technology and business planning.

To sum up: many of the old jobs will disappear. Many of the new ones will require higher levels of knowledge and skills, including social skills. But since "it is simply not possible to predict what specific skills will be needed in the work force even five years from now . . . we must conclude that the worker with mechanical training and specific skills is bound to be in a far less advantageous position than one who has learned how to study, think independently and learn quickly."

That is from a study of the Ministry of the Treasurer of Ontario.

I have asked many experts here and abroad to tell me what kind of education best equips people to improve their lives and make them better at their jobs. Their answers, when summarized, were as follows.

Education must give "core skills," the ability to read, write and understand complex material; to communicate in one's mother tongue; to know enough mathematics and computer science; to know how nature, society and the world work; and to learn how to learn. As well, we must give people the skills to work in a team, lead where appropriate, innovate and adapt to change.

In short, we must teach people to obtain and understand information; to order it in their minds; to see the relationships between the items of information they have acquired and combine them to reach new understanding of their world. People so equipped would be better able to find, hold or create a job and would be better citizens.

I have now been on my feet for four hours and I do not think it is so tough, as Senator Lowell Murray was saying yesterday when he was doing his little cry-baby bit. I can go on for many, many more hours.

Senator Haidasz: Magnificent. Carry on.

Senator Gigantès: I continue:

Employers no longer simply look for punctuality and conformity: they seek flexible, adaptable people able to respond to new demands and to innovate when necessary. This underscores the crucial role of schooling from kindergarten through university—the importance of "learning and living."

[Senator Gigantès.]

Indeed, no one doubts the importance of education. Yet all witnesses appearing in 1987 before the Senate Subcommittee on Training and Employment agreed that our education system is in terrible shape. Many of these witnesses were educators; others were senior officials of provincial education departments. They all said that our elementary and secondary schools do not give students the necessary core skills.

Some university professors told me that half their students were functionally illiterate, unable to understand what they were reading; they were not able to write comprehensibly.

Senator Frith: From universities?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, unable to understand what they were reading. They were not able to write.

Senator Stewart: Which province?

Senator Gigantès: Alberta, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick.

Senator Stewart: Not true of Nova Scotia.

Senator Gigantès: I didn't hear from anybody from St. F.X.

One-fifth of our work force only has a grade 9 education or less and is functionally illiterate, desperately in need of training and retraining for the more sophisticated new jobs that are replacing the old unskilled ones.

• (1010)

Obviously, we have a massive job to do in our education system if, after nine years of schooling, the students it produces are functional illiterates.

It is unthinkable; nine years of schooling and they cannot read or write or understand what they have read, or express their thoughts with any coherence.

If the school system were even moderately efficient, it should certainly have made people literate in nine years.

As for those who are supposed to make education work, their educational qualifications are dubious. Consider these excerpts from an essay written by an Albertan completing the second year of a Bachelor of Education degree:

A candidate who makes themselves look like a fool every time they speak be a deficit to a political party . . .

Obviously something the Tories have heard about.

The next stop would be to lay out a format incorporating the personality of the candidate with statistics compiled . . . The first quality is does the candidate look good . . . The candidate must have a clean car; they should not drive a dirty car. People do not like to see candidates in a dirty car. People like shiny, clean cars . . . Character alone is not enough to choose a candidate.

This is a person who has completed two years of educational training to teach our young.

Nor does our education system compare favourably with those of other countries. Some Western European countries provide much better education than we do: Scandinavia, Austria, Germany, Switzerland, for example. Britain and France do as badly as we do by those of their young who are not in an elite minority; however, both countries do better by their brightest students, who are taught more mathematics and science than ours.

Britain and France are especially deficient, as is North America, in vocational training. Germany, Austria, Switzerland and the Scandinavian countries provide superior education in this area, and they give their vocational trainees continued heavy doses of academic training. In Germany, youngsters who take the "workshop" rather than the academic stream still get enough academic subjects so that they can change their minds later, leave the factory and enter university.

Education is in trouble in part because we are, once again, at a sort of Gutenberg watershed. In the 15th century, Gutenberg invented the printing press with movable type. Before that, the only books were hand-written and extremely expensive; most people could not afford them. Even university teachers did not have their own hand-written copies of the texts they taught. They had memorized those texts and insisted that the student also memorize them. Most normal scholars had little time after all the memorizing to explore more texts or even to write new ones.

The invention of the printing press with movable type was a watershed: before Gutenberg, access to knowledge was limited, and consequently, the spread and growth of knowledge was slow. After Gutenberg, all the effort that had gone into memorizing could go into reading more extensively, thinking about more things and challenging traditional views. The consequences were not only intellectual but also political and economic: in a very real sense, Gutenberg's invention was the precursor of the assembly line where small, prefabricated components are combined into given patterns to turn out many copies of the same product.

The world of education resisted Gutenberg mightily for centuries. It did not want to cross the watershed. In the early years of this century, my father attended a high school where he was made to learn the whole of the Iliad and the Odyssey by heart, a total of 66,666 verses.

Senator Haidasz: Nothing wrong with that.

Senator Gigantès:

One reason he was forced to do this was to cultivate his memory, and having a good memory is a terrific advantage; but another reason was a continued rejection , five centuries later, of the printing press, a new-fangled device that made things "too easy" and "sapped the moral fibre" of the student.

There has often been a rejection of the new by educators. Socrates, who could write, objected to writing because he felt it "imprisoned thought." We would not know about his thought today if one of his disciples, Plato, had not imprisoned it by writing it down.

I'm afraid that our educational system (and our teachers' unions and politicians) are refusing to cross our contemporary Gutenberg watershed once and for all. They explore it. They take trial runs at it, installing computers and even television sets in schools. But they do not make the changes in curriculum and teaching methods that go with the new technology. Thus, they fail to respond to what our own communications inventions—the moving picture, television, satellites, portable video cameras, videotape, videocassettes and computers—are doing to our young.

Educationally, the most significant and revolutionary consequence of our new technology may be the competition teachers face. Daily, they are compared with the projected image of television stars, and teachers are found to be less learned, less fascinating, less entertaining. Outside the studio, the television star may be much less accomplished than teachers. But with the help of lighting, good scripts, talented camera work and good direction, the image on the tube wins every time.

To take one example, the late Jacob Bronowski did a television series for the British Broadcasting Corporation based on his book The Ascent of Man, which describes human evolution from the ape to Bronowski.

The BBC spared no expense: it flew Bronowski around the world, from Kilimanjaro to the Karakoram so his text had the immediacy of the sites on which the events he described had occurred. Bright 12-year-old children and Ph.D.'s are equally fascinated by this series. They watch it again and again and never tire. There is nothing more riveting than magnificent images of exotic places and beautiful art on which a great mind embroiders a living map with brilliant threads of genius.Bronowski takes all the streams of human history and shows how they have formed the majestic, dirty and bloodied river that is today's world.

How can ordinary teachers compete with Bronowski unless they are Bronowskis themselves? Geniuses are the exception, and they are as rare among teachers as among any other group.

Especially among Tories.

Today, young people can compare Bronowski on the television screen with their teacher in the classroom. The teacher loses.

They there are the calculators that most kids have, as well as the computer and word processor the parents (or the parents of a friend) have at home. In an instant, these devices do sums that take hours to do manually. And word processors have automatic spelling checks. You can't ask school children to forget that machines do instantaneously what takes hours without the machines:

the children wonder why they are made to do things the harder, duller way.

So how can we use our modern means of communication and computation to teach writing and math? Let us look at writing first.

Writing one's mother tongue correctly is the key to reading and comprehension, not the other way around. We can't abandon the written word and simply talk or exchange cassettes. There is astringency to good, disciplined writing that is essential for the development of the ability to understand texts and to think. The process of writing well, which essentially means rewriting again and again, is the only process for learning how best to present one's thoughts while being convincing as well as brief enough to keep the attention of the audience one wants to convince. It is in this process that one learns the advantage of precision, the need for the right word, for a large vocabulary, for sound reasoning.

Mathematics is another form of script for writing one's mother tongue, that part of the mother tongue that deals with measuring quantity, distance, surfaces, solid objects and their movements.

● (1020)

This aspect of the mother tongue involves statements such as "first, take one specific number and add it to another specific number; second, add a third number to a fourth number; third, multiply the result of the first operation by the results of the second operation to obtain a fifth number which is equal to a sixth number multiplied by itself." All of which can be written as follows in mathematical script:

$$[(a + b) \times (c + d)] = x^2$$

One small line instead of a whole paragraph.

In mathematical script, long, convoluted sentences, as in the above example, can be written briefly, simply and precisely. That is why we have developed mathematical symbols, which are, in effect, abbreviations for all the words we would otherwise need.

How can the mother tongue and the use of its two alphabets, the literal and the mathematical, be taught to children without boring them?

Some will ask why today's children should not be bored at school when their grandparents were. Others might say that since much of one's professional life is spent being bored, one might as well learn to put up with boredom at school. It's the anti-Gutenberg argument all over again: things shouldn't be made easier or more interesting for children because that only saps their moral fibre. This kind of thinking is obsolete.

It now widely recognized that children who are called "gifted" often have problems in ordinary classes, even with reading. At home they devour intricate texts like Isaac Asimov's science fiction. At school they seemingly fail to understand their textbooks.

Gifted children are bored with the way they are being taught in schools. However, accelerating their progress through school doesn't help because they then miss necessary stages in growing up and can become maladjusted. A solution that now seems to work is to enrich their schoolwork "horizontally," which means they stay within the curriculum corresponding to their age group, but get into enriched applications and activities that challenge and amuse them.

What works for the "gifted" will work for the so-called average students. I remember an experiment some years ago in which a group of determinedly mediocre students was given to a teacher who had been told they were intensely gifted. Flattered by the challenge, the teacher surpassed herself, and in a few months the mediocre students were all performing as if they were little geniuses. They had been stimulated and they responded.

Incredibly, the reverse experiment was also carried out. A group of demonstrably gifted children were labelled below average and given to a good teacher who did not know that they were truly bright. In a few months, they were performing like below-average students. When the experiment ended and they were properly relabelled, they started acting gifted all over again. (The accounts I read did not say how the parents, or indeed the students, felt about such degradation.) So a rich, interesting, intellectual diet is not beyond the capacities of the so-called average student.

There are many illustrations of this. For example, the Public Service Commission in Ottawa employed some retarded youngsters in the early 1970s to distribute mail from office to office. They did the job very well. What was remarkable was that these young people were perfectly bilingual in French and English.

Some deputy ministers could not achieve these same results.

Learning a language is one of the most complex activities known to man. Developing artificial intelligence through the use of computers is mainly an attempt to translate spoken language through computers. The Japanese are world leaders in this field. They are spending billions, using mega-giant computers, and so far, they think that they are decades away from success. The retarded youngsters of the Public Service Commission could repeat in French a sentence they had just spoken in English and vice versa; they could do something the mega-giant computers cannot yet do. Average youngsters, properly taught, are capable of impressive schoolroom feats.

Teaching must involve maximum active doing by the child and minimum passive listening. And it must also involve the modern objects that are the natural extensions of the child these days: tape recorders, television and computers. Teaching must also give the child maximum opportunities to perform with a team, taking turns at directing the team, being the star, being the bit player, the theatre critic and the author.

This is not an overemphasis on theatrical performance; anyone with children has endlessly heard the cry, "Look at me, look at me!" When we grow older we are a little more discreet about demanding an audience, but deep down we are still calling, "Look at me." The need for an audience, for attention, may be one of the strongest raisons d'être for the formation of human societies. The shy ones, those who shun exposure, may have been ridiculed in some childhood performance. School must restore their self-esteem.

Good teaching must begin early. What follows are examples of the approaches that can be (and in some schools, are being) followed, in grade 9 and below.

Let's take a grade 7 class. The teacher shows them one of Shakespeare's plays produced for television by the BBC. The students then put on the play themselves. They videotape their performance and send the tape to a municipal competition. A jury decides which school submitted the best tape. The municipal winner then advances to a provincial competition; the provincial winner proceeds to a national competition. The national winner is then broadcast on television. The teacher of the winning class gets national television exposure and a big prize, such as an all-expense-paid vacation anywhere in the world.

The teacher functions as coach for the team that produces the play, advising them on the meaning of the words, the theme and significance of a scene. Before the students begin rehearsals, the teacher asks the student director and actors to discuss these meanings and agree on what message each part of the production conveys. All members of the class participate in this exercise.

Once a consensus is reached, students are assigned parts of a scene on which they must write notes detailing what feelings the actors must express. The students write on word processors that correct spelling as the student is writing (after several corrections, students will remember the proper spelling). Several students audition for each part and the class votes on the final casting.

Those who do not get the opportunity to act handle the cameras, costumes, lights, scenery or music. They may also make a videotaped documentary of how the Shakespearean production was put together. The voice track for this documentary is written by the students on word processors. Several of the non-actors have talking parts, which they also write, in the documentary: improvisation is not allowed. The documentaries themselves are entered in municipal, provincial and national competitions.

A further aspect of the production is the writing of a program, with notes on the play itself, on all the participants, actors, designers, musicians and director. There will be a similar program on the documentary about the play.

These projects would probably occupy the whole of grade 7 English classes and much after-hours activity. In grade 8 English, the same students go on to translate their grade 7 Shakespearean play into contemporary English and produce it once more for a competition, with all the same activities described above—accompanying television documentary of the production, programs and all.

• (1030)

The role of the teacher is crucial. Like a coach instructing players by showing videotapes of opposing teams in action, a teacher steering grade 7 children through a Shakespearean production uses the BBC tape as the benchmark and gets the student actors to view it repeatedly and be guided by how the professional British actors performed the scene. Members of local theatre groups can be brought in to act as visiting coaches.

Of course, by the time they reach grade 7, the students will have had similar experiences in class but with less complex tests. There are marvellous tapes available for television to teach the children about other countries. They can then be asked to play the role of foreign correspondents and write in their own class newspaper about the country they have "visited" through a television show.

They must edit one another's work and resolve editing disputes on their editorial board, which elects rotating editors-in-chief. Through desktop publishing facilities, they can produce the actual newspaper for sale to grandparents, parents and friends. This sort of activity can start very early as an incentive to learn how to write.

Through this process, and with appropriate TV programs, the children write essays about history, geography, biology, other sciences and the relevant environmental and economic issues.

The students handle word processors and printers from an early age, and are shown by a specialist how these machines work. As they grow older, they are taught about giving commands to the computer, controlling the way it handles input and output. Older students who happen to be computer whizzes can help to initiate the younger ones.

For teaching mathematics, we can turn to the programming wizards who devise computer games—not the Nintendo type, the computer equivalent of a pinball machine, but the more intellectually challenging games. These programmers can be asked to build into a set of progressively more complex computer games the mathematical concepts all children must have, starting with addition, subtract and positive and negative numbers.

Eventually, a computer version of Monopoly might demand that students use the formula $[A=C \times (1+i)^t]$. In this, C stands for the initial investment; i stands for the rate of interest; t stands for the time in years; and A stands for the final value of the investment after t years.

The formula tells you how much your initial investment will grow in a number of years at a certain rate of interest. The same formula can be used to find what was the intitial investment if one knows all the other values in the formula; or what the rate of interest was that made C grow into A over a given number of years.

The game itself takes the players through the reasoning that developed the formula [$A=C \times (1+i)^t$]. The game could include a sequence that gets the students to construct the formula, so that they can pick the right investments, given their potential for growth.

The next phase of the game introduces the concept of risk or probability. Poker is based on probability. So is oil exploration. The designer of this computer Monopoly game can introduce oil properties and indicate the probability of finding oil on each. The game leads the students—

Senator Barootes: Senator Gigantès, may I ask a question of you? There is a term used in police, judicial and other circles which is "cruel and unusual punishment". We on this side feel that you are inflicting upon us cruel and unusual punishment.

I do not like to yield. I do not like to say surrender, but would you have the heart to cease and desist from this cruel and unusual punishment by sparing us any more of your epistle or book and allow us to get on with something else? Perhaps at some other time, and in some other place, we may hear the rest of your wisdom.

Senator Gigantès: I am glad for Senator Barootes's question, which allows me to tell this shift what I told the previous shift. We on this side object to the goods and services tax and are determined to kill it.

Senator Barootes: Don't kill us with it.

Senator Gigantès: Those are the risks of the trade. If you can't stand the heat, get out of the kitchen.

One aspect of this situation is that whenever we criticize one of your economic measures, you say that there is no alternative and that we have not thought it through. I am giving you Liberal alternatives to your economic policies. It is not easy to isolate an aspect of economic policy. They are very complex and multi-dimensional and I have to go through all of them in order to show that what you have been proposing and doing is wrong, which is why we want to stop you from doing it.

The other is the question of tactics. As our leader said yesterday, we inted to use every legitimate procedure at our disposal under the rules. We now have a motion before us which states we should wipe out everything and go directly to the GST. It is a motion and a motion is debatable. I am debating this motion and the argument I am making is that we should not move to the GST at all because it is a wrong policy. Believing it is a wrong policy, I have to do everything that I can at every stage to keep us from getting there. This is what I am engaged in doing right now.

Senator Phillips: And you are getting your book translated at the same time.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Gigantès: I will not make a penny. Since I came into the Senate, the royalties from all my books have been donated to scholarship funds. Unlike some of your colleagues, I earn nothing on the side. I live on my salary.

Senator Barootes: Senator Gigantès I accept your explanation about why you are proceeding in this way. Is it not possible that you are in the right church but the wrong pew?

Senator Gigantès: You do not suggest that I should cross the aisle, do you?

Senator Barootes: No, I do not suggest that, because you would have to be admitted to this side of the aisle, and I do not think you would get a single vote. On the other hand, the right church, wrong pew refers to this: We have a motion as to whether we should proceed to the discussion of the goods and services tax bill, at which time I think your economic arguments may have merit. However, at this point we are discussing a motion as to what we should do in respect to moving to third reading. Perhaps that would be the proper time for you to make these arguments. I think you are bootlegging these arguments in under a motion, rather than under a discussion of the merits of the bill. That is why I bring it to your attention.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. H. A. Olson: On a point of order, this is about the third or fourth time in the last ten or twelve hours that members opposite—now it is Senator Barootes and before it was Senator Simard—have stood up and complained about the speeches not being relevant to the motion. They are always trying to tell us what we can put in our speeches.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: It is not what; it is when.

Senator Olson: That is right. You are setting out the rules for us again. Always making up the rules as you go along.

The senator who had the floor was explaining to you in meticulous detail, because you seem to have to have it that way, why he is opposed to the motion. No great mystery about that.

Now Senator Barootes stands up and says, "Oh, no. This is not the right place to make that kind of argument."

"I tell you this: If we pass up this opportunity to try to defeat this motion by every means available to us. Senator Barootes made a point, and I am speaking on my point of order.

Hon. Pat Carney: You have already spoken.

Senator Olson: I have not spoken. A point of order was just raised.

Senator Barootes: I did not raise a point of order.

Senator Olson: Then why did you get up on your feet and complain about a senator making an irrelevant speech, telling him that he has to do it somewhere else?

An Hon. Senator: Your have had your say.

Senator Olson: I spoke earlier on the motion, you are right.

Senator Carney: Then sit down.

Senator Olson: We are on a point of order. We have to constantly remind senators opposite that we decide what goes into our speeches, not they. Senator Barootes will not decide what goes into the senator's speech.

I heard Senator Gigantès clearly explain why he is opposed to this motion. That is exactly what is in order and relevant at this time.

Senator Carney: You are not relevant.

Senator Olson: When you raise a point of order, you had better be prepared to debate it, because every time you raise a point of order you are inviting 51 more speeches. You have been around long enough to know what the rules are.

Senator Carney: What is the point of order?

Senator Olson: A point of order is when someone gets up and objects to what another member is doing. Instantly, you have a point of order. Senator Carney, every time you get up and interrupt another Senator and say what they are doing is not relevant, then you have a point of order.

I have been around here a hell of a lot longer than you have, my friend, and I know what is in the book and I know what the practices are. The Globe and Mail does not decide what goes into our speeches, either.

Senator Carney: You are using foul language.

Senator Olson: If you don't like my language, take off. I will say things exactly the way I want to say them.

Senator Carney: You are using foul language in this house.

Senator Olson: I decide what goes into my speech, too. You make me sick the way you are trying to dictate how we can act in this house. Every time you do it, you stick your foot in it again. Shame on you.

Senator Carney: Shame on you for using foul language in the Senate.

Senator Olson: They can't stand the heat. You know the old saying, if you can't stand the heat, get out of the kitchen.

All these things that you ought to know, you apparently do not know.

Senator Carney: You are speaking twice to the motion.

Senator Olson: No, I am not.

Senator Carney: Yes, you are.

Senator Olson: I am speaking to Senator Gigantès' right to make his speech on his own terms.

Senator Carney: That is against the rules.

Senator Olson: It is not.

Senator Carney: Sit down.

Senator Olson: Call a point of order. Ask the speaker to make a ruling. That would be great. We will get another twelve hours out of it.

I am not about to sit down because you ask me to. You have demonstrated over and over again that when the government tries to violate the rules of this place, you support it.

Senator Carney: You are violating the rules now.

Senator Olson: No, I am not.

To get back to the point of order, if you sit down and keep quiet about the construction of speeches on this side, I guarantee you will get along a whole lot better. You cannot interrupt another speaker unless it is on a point of order.

Just remember this. Senator Gigantès can decide what arguments he wants to use to make his point. He is trying to persuade you that you should not support this motion. Leave him alone.

Senator Carney: You are setting a precedent.

Senator Olson: Oh, am I? Well, it's a good one.

Senator Corbin: You can always appeal it.

Senator Olson: Go ahead and appeal it.

Senator Carney: Sit down.

Senator Olson: I prefer that you shut up. Disgusting behaviour. You think you can come down here and bulldoze us. Surely you must have got the message by now that we will not be bulldozed by you or by anyone else.

Senator Corbin: Senator Olson, you should not be annoyed by flies. You should continue with your remarks.

Senator Olson: I know, but Senator Barootes is up on his feet all the time trying to interrupt good, legitimate, intelligent speeches which explain why we want to defeat this motion. That is exactly what Senator Gigantès was doing.

I suggest that if you do not have a better reason to interrupt and raise a point of order, it really would be in your interest, if I interpret your interest correctly, not to say anything.

Senator Barootes: On a conciliatory note, if I may suggest—

An Hon. Senator: Point of order.

Senator Barootes: I did not rise on a point of order. It was through the graciousness of my good friend that I was allowed to ask a question. He answered my question and I was delighted to hear from him. However, I am sorry that it was disturbing to my friend from Medicine Hat, because I have been here since seven o'clock this morning and I thought maybe we should change the record, that's all. I thank you for allowing me to ask the question.

Senator Corbin: On the point of disruption, I would like to inform Senator Gigantès that I do not find his remarks cruel and unusual punishment. I would ask him to complete his response to Senator Barootes by linking cruel and unusual punishment to the GST. That is where the punishment and the cruelty is.

Senator Stewart: May I say a word on the point raised by Senator Barootes? What is before this Senate is a motion moved by Senator Doody which was found, improperly, by Senator Charbonneau to be in order. Of course it was not in order and we know that.

Rule 19 sets out the proper order of business in a sitting of the Senate. That order of business begins with the presentation of petitions. Then we would have gone on to various other items, including questions. There are many questions that ought to be asked today; questions raised or prompted by the Auditor-General, for example, concerning the expenditure of public money; the preparedness of our armed forces for a possible war, the war that the Right Honourable Joe Clark talks about in the gulf.

These things will be set aside if the motion which was moved—

Senator Barootes: Because of your filibuster.

Senator Stewart: —by Senator Doody carries. It is shocking that an attempt should be made to set aside a standing order of the Senate in this way. I think Senator Barootes should prevail upon Senator Doody to withdraw this motion so we can present a few petitions and then get on and ask questions and proceed in a normal, orderly way.

This whole situation has been brought on by Senator Doody, prompted by Senator Murray. That is the truth of the matter. How long do you think we would have gone on with petitions? At a certain point we would have all been bored. But, no, we had to have this motion which has been haunting Senator Murray for days. He tried to move it first on the fifth of the month and then again about a week later.

Senator Barootes: Is this your speech on the motion?

Senator Stewart: No, I am addressing the interesting point raised by you concerning the cruel and unusual punishment that was inflicted on the Senate by Senator Doody. He is the man who proposed this motion in order to get rid of this cruel and unusual punishment. Senator Doody should be in here now, on his feet, asking for leave to withdraw this foolish motion which is clearly out of order.

• (1050)

We intend to debate this motion as long as we can. We will continue on this motion much longer than we ever would have thought of going with petitions.

Senator Bosa: There have been many interruptions of Senator Gigantès' address. Many senators were not here when he started to make his case. He had just laid down the basis for his points. I think honourable senators should be patient and allow him to complete his remarks without these interruptions because they will only prolong the agony, if that is what Senator Barootes thinks it is. I found what Senator Gigantès was saying very interesting. It is pertinent and concerns the subject matter we are dealing with now.

I want to tell Senator Carney that she should be the last one to bring members of this place to order because the senators on that side trampled on the rules on October 8. Not only did they break the rules, they trampled on them. They made a unilateral decision and forced the Speaker to invoke a rule that was not in the rule book. Then they had a caucus meeting in the Senate to say that there was a legitimate vote in this chamber. I would like to hear Senator Carney defend that aspect of the case. I think Senator Gigantès should be allowed to complete his remarks.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, as if I would inflict cruel and unusual punishment. You know what affection I have for you. Nobody in this chamber can say that at any time a cross word passed my lips in your regard. In regard to others, yes, but I have always treated you with affection and respect.

Senator Barootes: May I go if I promise to read the book?

Senator Gigantès: Not one of us is hiding the fact that we are trying to kill the GST by all procedural means at our disposal.

Some of you across the way and many members of the press who do not read anymore, have constantly asked what alternatives the Liberals have. They are always harping and criticizing us as being nay sayers, asking what we would do instead.

What we will do instead will depend on the circumstances we will inherit—God knows what mess that will be. There are certain general lines of Liberal thought that produce all kinds of possible alternatives. I am trying to give an insight into some of these alternatives. I am trying to give an image of the comprehensive, complex economic thinking that would go into the making of Liberal policies when we take over the mess we will inherit from you.

An important part of restoring the economic mess and making things like the GST unnecessary, and having a labour force that is more productive and competitive, is education. One cannot divorce it from the economy.

That is what I am talking about. I am against the GST because it is bad economic policy. Instead, economic policy should be along the lines of what I have been describing and will continue to describe.

MOTION TO CALL ORDERS OF THE DAY—DEBATE CONTINUING

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Mathematics becomes more complex. We need to have calculus. I will continue:

> Concepts of calculus and the rate of change can be part of other games. Euclidean plane and solid geometry can be taught through computerized versions of construction blocks. Computer graphics make geometrical exercises come alive as no textbook drawing ever can.
> When the students are older, the logical structure of Euclid's theorem can be introduced as the proper structure for presenting an argument: 'Here is what I intend to prove. Here is the evidence and the inescapable conclusion it leads to. Therefore, I have proven what I set out to prove.' Good editorials, good courtroom pleading, political speeches and business presentations follow this Euclidean structure.
> As the students rise through the years to grade 9, the amount of independent reading and research they do for various projects increases. The work involved in a project should be of such volume that it can only be handled by dividing it among the members of a group. But the project itself should also be designed so that it can only be put together in its final form by the group working as a team under rotating leadership. Projects can involve more than one discipline. They all involve a final presentation, written on a word processor, with appropriate graphics.

By such methods, students completing grade 9 will have learned a second language, English or French, and two scripts: the alphabet and mathematical symbols. They will have written a great deal and acquired a considerable vocabulary to use in a sentence, paragraph and essay.

I now come to some of the points Senator Stewart was raising.

They should then be required to pass a province-wide examination before entering grade 10. Such an exam should test writing ability (in English or French, as appropriate), mathematical skills and knowledge of other subjects such as history, geography and so on. Schools and teachers whose students obtain the best results should be rewarded for educational excellence.

Students who fail the exam have their results analysed and go to special remedial grade 9 classes where the gaps they displayed in the exam are filled in. They would have star teachers specializing in catch-up to help them.

This exam should come into operation three years after it is announced, giving teachers and students the chance to get serious about their mother tongue and math. Too many of our grade 9 graduates would fail such an exam today.

Savings can be made in the cost of such a program by buying second-hand electronic equipment. Business and government are constantly buying newer replacements for perfectly serviceable word processors, computers, TV cameras and recorders. Businesses and even government should be encouraged to donate such second-hand equipment to schools. Equipment repair and maintenance can be done in part by senior students who are learning a trade in the non-academic track.

In grades 10, 11 and 12, school assignments would entail more research using data banks and the library. Students would pass from general understanding to a more specific knowledge of such subjects as physics and chemistry. Laboratory activity would become essential, as would collaboration. A team of students under rotating leadership should engage in actual chemical experiments that demand closely co-ordinated team work. The activities of each team member would dovetail with those of the other members. If the co-ordination, the timing of one member is off, the whole team fails. And of course the student teams would compete against other student teams.

Bayer, the German chemical multinational, has designed such experiments for the training of its apprentices. The apprentices write reports on their experiment, and each person's report is edited by the other members of the team. Then other students who have not performed the experiment must judge whether they can understand the report readily. Teams that produce obscure reports lose.

In the educational approach outlined in this chapter, students in grade 10 choose between an academic track and a professional track in which they learn a trade. But all of them, even those in the academic track, are exposed to the world of work.

• (1100)

Thus, the school year should be restructured so that one day a week, for example, academic students would work outside the classroom and get paid for their work by the federal government at the rate of $4.00 an hour (indexed to the cost of living). If they skipped these work experiences they would not get paid and they lose credits. The academic school day for such students should be lengthened by 90 minutes. This should not require more teachers since the teachers will be working, in effect, a four-day week. Work-study programs of varying design are already in place in a number of Canadian high schools and universities.

We should expand this.

A student learning a trade in the professional track would spend two days a week in school and three days a week as an apprentice (for three years with the same firm). Such students would also be paid $4.00 an hour by the federal government for the time they spent working rather than studying. But they would not be paid if they skipped the two days a week they would have to spend in school continuing their academic studies (these days, too, should be 90 minutes longer).

This insistence on continuing academic studies two days a week would help students if they wanted to leave the workplace and return to school, or if they needed to upgrade their technological skills at work: they would not be handicapped, then, by insufficient knowledge of their mother tongue, of mathematics and our world.

Students in the professional track, spending three days a week as apprentices, would be taught a specific set of skills, agreed upon in negotiation between the unions and the appropriate association of employers, subject to approval by the provincial department of education. There would be yearly examinations to check that the prescribed skills were taught.

In collaboration with provincial departments of education, the unions and business associations, the federal government should sponsor and finance national certification examinations for the various trades at the end of the three-year apprenticeship. Only students who kept up with their academic studies two days a week would be eligible to take this exam. Those who passed would receive certificates recognized by the unions, the appropriate business associations and the participating provinces. These certificates would be a real asset.

Assuring collaboration from business and from the unions would not be easy at first. The program proposed here would be new. It would be seen as a nuisance. But in other countries where this has been tried, the regular employees and the employers of the firms that take apprentices find not only that the students are enjoyable but that they do become assets, provided that they are not treated as mere gofers.

In France, the spokesman for a manufacturers' association told me of a "crisis" when a student intern with spiked green hair competently repaired electronic equipment. He knew how, from tinkering with his own computer.

The "crisis" was that ordinary workers are not supposed to repair anything in most French factories. They are supposed to tell the foreman, who writes a report to the floor engineer, who writes a report to engineering central, which notifies the maintenance directorate, which sends a team to do the necessary repairs, often more than a week later.

That a kid with spiked green hair simply did what needed to be done, disregarding "protocol," was unprecedented and disturbing. He was yelled at and he left, disgusted.

All adults, businesspeople and union members alike, have a duty to help the young develop. Teaching is involved, but also human warmth and a refusal by the adults to take themselves too seriously. Respect and affection are essential components of training. Training is an essential component of economic growth.

Economic growth would make the goods and services tax unnecessary.

A firm that received grade 10 professional students as apprentices would not have to pay them; the federal government would pay. Grade 11 students, in their second year of apprenticeship, would have learned enough to be an asset for the firm where they worked. The firm should pay them a wage, minus what the apprentices receive from the federal government. In the third year, the firm should give its apprentices an increased wage, again minus what they receive from the federal government. These wages should be negotiated by the employers' associations with the unions.

Employers, meanwhile, would get labour costing them less than the going rate: Ottawa would pay part of the cost. Further, the business world as a whole could guarantee itself a supply of workers trained according to employers' specifications and with enough core skills to be retrainable again and again as technology changes. The Germans emphasize that a person who has received good apprenticeship training has learned how to learn a trade; such a person is much more easily retrainable when new skills are needed. The advantages for employers are clear.

Some few firms in Canada understand these advantages and have excellent training programs. They should serve as models for the others. Many other firms neglect training because, among other reasons, they say they fear losing their trainees to other firms.

I asked Herr Richter, Bayer's director of vocational training, whether he worried that his well-trained apprentices would be lured away by other firms. He answered that those other firms would benefit from the skills he taught his apprentices; would do better and the whole economy would do better, increasing the demand for his own products. "Besides," he added, "I am not the only one who gives good training. I can raid other firms for well-trained apprentices, if I lose mine. In any case, passing on skills to the next generation is a sacred obligation."

Honourable senators, I wish more Canadian entrepreneurs understood this and felt this way.

The advantages for business of taking in students from the academic stream one day a week, and for short periods only, may seem less obvious than the advantages of taking in apprentices; but advantages there are all the same. It is in the interest of business that future voters should have an understanding of how the world of business functions. And it is in the interest of business to understand how the voters of tomorrow think and how very much they know. Moreover, a good proportion of the students in the academic stream would end up in public service or in elected office at the three levels of government, or in teaching—in segments of society that need to know more than they do about business.

Grades 10 to 12 students in the academic stream would work one eight-hour day a week outside school for six terms, at $4.00 an hour. As this would not be a three-year apprenticeship for a specific trade, they would spend two terms sampling firms of their choice. During the other four terms they would perform paid national service one day a week as helpers for day care, hospitals, mental institutions, home care for the aged, the handicapped and working in old folks' homes. Such experience is important in understanding those members of our society who cannot manage without help from the rest of us.

Students in grades 10 to 12 who gave satisfaction to firms or institutions where they worked during the school year would have a better chance of being hired by the same employers for summer jobs, replacing employees on leave.

In parts of the country where there is not much industry, high school students would have a smaller choice of trades to which they could be apprenticed. In those areas, the workshops in the schools and the community colleges would have to be upgraded, in compensation. And arrangements could be made for the students to spend summers apprenticing away from home, camping in schools of the host town.

● (1110)

As for education after grade 12, the collaboration between business, universities and colleges has been increasing as it should. In the chapter on defence, I shall propose measures to increase this collaboration on research projects. The federal government would pay to augment the numbers of research assistants for all university projects that received research grants. This would not only help the professors who lead the research but also create new jobs.

Federal financing of university education should be changed. The money should no longer be given to the provincial government. The same total of money should be divided among the students, at so much per student or at so much per course, which would take into account parttime students. Provincial governments would have to cut their grants to universities; but the universities could compensate themselves by raising the fees they charge students. One advantage of this policy would be to let students know each month that the federal government is helping them.

Students would only be eligible for this federal grant if they passed a national university entrance exam to show they had the necessary knowledge of mathematics and either English or French, as appropriate. The first national university entrance exam would take place three years after it is established, to give high schools time to prepare their students for the exam. Students who failed a year would be given a second chance at studying with a federal grant but not a third, save under special circumstances. Students who dropped out would have to repay the unused part of their grants.

The kind of education proposed in this chapter, both general and vocational, need not cost more than the kind of education we now provide. Canada spends more on education, as a percentage of our GDP, than any other industrialized country, except Sweden.

Scandalous!

There is no better investment for Canada than spending on the education of our young.

Hon. John B. Stewart: May I ask a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Stewart: The proposal that you are putting forward with regard to education is certainly an interesting one. It reminds me of the proposal that Mr. Pearson made in 1963 with regard to a Canada fellowship program. In that program 10,000 fellowships were made to qualifying students from all parts of Canada. If I recall correctly, those fellowships were to be attainable at any college or university within Canada. However, that Liberal plank could not be brought to fruition, if that is what you do with a plank, because provincial governments objected. They said that it was an intrusion into the field of education and, consequently, in order to maintain co-operative relationships with the provincial governments, the Pearson government put that particular program aside after the 1963 election; instead, it brought in the Canada Student Loans Plan. It was able to have that plan enacted by the Parliament of Canada under the banking clause of section 91 of the Constitution Act. It was not done as an educational measure, but as a banking measure. That disappointed Mr. Pearson greatly. He would have much preferred to have gone ahead with the fellowship program rather than the student loans program.

My question is as follows: Is your scheme so different from the one discussed a quarter of a century ago that that same kind of problem would not arise, or is it that Canadian public opinion, as articulated by provincial governments, has moved on from that kind of provincialist viewpoint which prevailed, let us say, in 1963 and 1964? Have you considered that, and can you assure us that what you are now talking about is practicable?

Senator Gigantès: Thank you. I have considered that matter, and I even asked Senator Beaudoin, who is not here right now, whether there is anything in the Constitution that would prevent the federal government from saying, "I will give a scholarship to any student who passes the exam." It would not interfere with what the provinces are going to teach, except that the parents of the students would demand that they be taught, in the provincially run educational system, those things that are necessary in order to pass the university entrance exam. It can therefore be done. It is "tough love" and the provinces will not like it, but I think that the crisis in education in this country is so large that this is one instance in which the federal government should say, "We can no longer give you money to dissipate on bad education. We will now pay the students directly." The principle of the federal government paying citizens directly is well established, even in fields that are of provincial jurisdiction, such as social services. So this can be done.

Education is a provincial jurisdiction, but the federal government pays half the costs of post-secondary education in each province. If elementary and secondary education are poor, much of the effort and money going into university education is wasted.

That is the rationale.

Senator Stewart: Senator Gigantès, I believe you are wrong in your facts when you say that the federal government pays half. It is my impression that that was the old arrangement, and that since 1977, under the Established Programs Financing Act, provinces have been getting a sum based on the yield from a certain number of personal income tax points. As I recall, it is based on one corporate income tax point and a cash payment. The provinces can use this money any way they like. It happens that all the provinces except two, I believe, use all the money they receive for post-secondary education, but in fact they contribute very little. Some of them contribute very little of their own money. So to say that half the costs of post-secondary education in Canada are borne by the federal government really does not do justice to the federal government. For example, I believe you would find that in Nova Scotia the federal government provides about 80 per cent of the money that is paid out for post-secondary education.

I mention two provinces which apparently do not put in any money of their own. Perhaps it is no longer true but, as I recall, at one point the contribution from the federal treasury on behalf of post-secondary education in Canada was about 113 per cent of the amount expended by the Governments of Prince Edward Island for post-secondary education. The same was true of Newfoundland. So I wonder if what you just said is fair to the actual situation vis-à-vis the federal government.

Senator Gigantès: On average it is about half. For instance, the Province of Quebec spends more of its own money on education than it receives from the federal government. Even if it is not half, the point I am trying to make is that spending money on post-secondary education to educate students who have been left functionally illiterate by elementary and secondary education is a waste of money. Federal funds would be much better spent, in my view, by giving university scholarships to students, provided they pass an exam. To help students pass the exam, there would be pressure from the populace on provincial governments to improve their education systems.

Reading on:

● (1120)

> The proposals in this chapter need not give rise to jurisdictional disputes. Provinces would participate in these educational shcemes only if they so chose. But provinces that did not participate would not be entitled to the same benefits as those that did. To put it another way, the federal money would be earmarked; it would be money for education; provinces would not be able to take federal contributions to education and use them to pave roads. This is not a federal invasion of a provincial jurisdiction, but federal financial help for those provinces that choose to collaborate with the federal government in improving the education system for the young; collaboration, in other words, between the feds and the provinces, under provincial leadership, in order to improve our education.
> We now come to the retraining of the unemployed. The kind of retraining they need would depend on the jobs we see emerging and the skills the unemployed may lack. The functionally illiterate need improved skills. If they cannot read and understand and write effectively, they will never be able to face the repeated retraining that will be the lot of most people during their working lives.
> Many of the existing programs aimed at eradicating illiteracy rely on volunteer teaching. Such programs can be supplemented by measures that provide employment for both student and teacher. University students can be trained to teach the illiterate as a part-time job. Many physically handicapped people are anxious for employment but require the help of someone who is not handicapped. Illiterates could be employed to look after the handicapped who, in turn, after suitable training, could be paid to teach their helpers to read and write.
> The illiterate often feel ashamed; they hate to admit they cannot read. One-on-one teaching is easier for them to accept than being in a schoolroom with others. Being taught by someone who needs them and whom they can help would boost their sense of self-worth and that of their teachers as well.
> Another serious problem is that of workers who lose their jobs at 50 or 55 and stay unemployed. Many of them would like to work by they are not hired. This phenomenon is common to many Western countries, even though they have found that letting the older workers go deprives them of expertise and of the best "coaches" for younger workers.
> These unemployed workers in their 50s (the "mature" jobless) could be paid, for example, to be members of teams that provide home care for elderly people who do not need constant medical treatment but who cannot cope well enough on their own. A team of three or four mature workers of both sexes could be equipped with a small car, a vacuum cleaner, mops and pails; they would be asked to look after four elderly couples still living at home.
> The team would visit each elderly couple twice a day, clean, cook, shop, chat and leave. Since they would be operating as a team, these mature workers would not be in a servant-master relationship with the elderly couples they would care for. There would be supervision, of course, and training.
> There are many permutations to such schemes, some of them already in effect. A mature worker and his wife have a suitable house or apartment but they may lose it because the breadwinner is running out of unemployment benefits and is going on welfare. They could be asked to take in an old person who is not in need of constant medical supervision and is lucid. They would be paid $70 a day or $25,550 a year for this service, which is very much more than they would get on welfare and very much less than it costs the government to institutionalize the elderly.
> An alternative might be started during a downturn in the construction industry: elementary schools that no longer have enough pupils because of the falling birth rate could be converted into housing for old people. The conversion would include several apartments suitable for mature workers who look after the elderly—several apartments because people who look after the old cannot do so constantly. They have to be relieved for short periods or for vacations.
> Look at what has been proposed: work for jobless construction workers during a downturn; employment and low-cost housing for mature workers who have trouble relocating after they have been replaced by machinery; homes for the elderly. Incidentally, nine per cent of our elderly are in institutions, whereas this is the case for only five per cent in Britain. Home-care schemes, like those proposed above, cost less and the elderly prefer them to being institutionalized. The jobless young could work in such schemes as well as the mature unemployed.

If any of you doubts this, ask Dr. Keon. He will tell you he is all in favour of such schemes.

> In all these jobs of looking after the young, the old, the handicapped, the service would be sold to the users. Users would pay according to what is called their income before deductions for registered savings plans, retirement plans or tax shelters. The poor would pay less. The rich would not need to use the service if they did not want to or if they could find a better deal.
> Looking after the old, the sick or the very young is not the only kind of work that can be offered to the unemployed as an alternative to unemployment insurance. There are all kinds of potential jobs aimed at improving towns and their infrastructures, and the unemployed can be paid to do them. Such work is not getting done because the costs are supposed to be too high. But we have seen that it is cheaper to employ people than to keep them unemployed.
> Readers are reminded that by putting the unemployed to work, especially through subsidies to businesses that create verifiably new jobs, we would be reducing the deficit. Moreover, each unemployed person who joins the work force would be increasing our GDP by $26,588. If we put 740,000 employable jobless persons to work, federal tax revenues would increase by $3.2 billion.
> The people in the places where this work needs to be done could determine what should be done, plan the operation and run it. They would know they have labour that is subsidized, so the more labour intensive the projects they chose and the more service oriented, the better.
> The Americans would not be able to say we were engaging in unfair competition if our subsidized labour were not used to make things exported to or imported from the United States. And there would be no preferential treatment for Canadian enterprises: U.S. firms operating in Canada that wanted to create new jobs they would not otherwise have created would receive the subsidy paid to those hiring the unemployed or welfare recipients.
> All such projects would provide workers with the opportunity to work four days and train one day a week, if they wanted to learn new skills to allow them to change jobs or to climb the ranks in the jobs they held. Community colleges have the staff, the teaching experience and often the equipment for this training. Employers and labour unions should participate in writing the curriculum for retraining. And so can the military . . .

So we now come to our splendid armed forces. I am very fond of them. I am a former member of the armed forces.

> The day has not yet come when "the wolf shall also dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together" (Isa. 11:6). We are not yet ready to beat swords into ploughshares.

● (1130)

> We still need the means to protect ourselves from war and always shall. There is little point in striving to improve our living if life is to be ended in war.
> Inevitably, as we shall see, Canada has some role to play in preserving the peace. To better define this role, we need a sensible grasp of the worldwide military situation.

I think the danger of a generalized third world war with nuclear weapons is fast disappearing. Even the necessity for NATO is fast disappearing. There will still be a danger from terrorists; there will still be local conflicts. The American endeavours to produce the Star Wars shield will be shown to be useless and mathematically impossible. Even though there are some people in the United States who still hope to go ahead with such projects, they will not work.

We will be faced with problems such as the one of Saddam Hussein, and similar conflicts and problems could escalate until someone has to play policeman to the world. Therefore, we are going to have to have armed forces.

> Because nuclear weapons are so destructive, we'll never stop fearing madmen. What if some religious fanatic takes power in a state wealthy enough to pay for the construction or theft of a nuclear weapon? What if he fires it at New York from a seemingly peaceful cargo ship? Might the Americans then assume, erroneously, that the weapon came from the USSR and start a world war?
> The likely outcome in this matter of fanatics with nuclear weapons will be increased superpower collaboration to deny such weapons to fanatics. This collaboration might go so far as to launch a pre-emptive strike to keep some madman from acquiring nuclear weapons. His bomb-making facilities should be blasted before they can produce.
> Because they've been sane enough not to use nuclear weapons, existing nuclear powers have the moral right to deprive mad fanatics of nuclear weapons. They also have the right to determine collectively or individually which fanatic is mad enough to use a nuclear weapon. This is not a matter for big-power rivalry; it is a matter for vital co-operation and the big powers will see things this way increasingly.

I will now address the Canadian role and the economic implications.

A more common problem is how to deal with terrorists who do not have nuclear weapons but who are prepared to kill and die themselves in the act. The world has lived with this problem from ancient times, and it remains unsolved. If not for one cause, then for another, fanatics kill.

The only defence is greater vigilance, better spying on the refuges of fanatics and refusal to deal with them. We should never bargain to get hostages back. We should write them off, unless we can rescue them in a military operation. It is brutal, but it is the only way.

Canada has many roles to play in this. For instance, it can play a role in making superpowers feel safer. The Soviets have the White Sea in which their nuclear missile launching submarines are safe. Maybe we should allow the Americans to use Hudson Bay for the same purpose and charge them rent. No Soviet killer submarine can come into Hudson Bay, just as no American killer submarine can go into the White Sea. The result would be a small but utterly stable deterrent which would keep either great power, even if the Russians went back into the hands of a military dictatorship, from using weapons without knowing their country would be utterly destroyed.

Canada should design and build its own devices to make sure that submarines enter Hudson Bay only with our permission. We should also design and build our own ocean-floor devices for monitoring submarine (or fish) movements.

There is a wonderful loophole in the Free Trade Agreement that allows Americans to do this. It was put there for them and we cannot participate in that. However, we could develop our own high-tech armaments which would benefit our research industry.

We should design our own surveillance satellites that could warn of missile attacks. In the case of the 1981 incident when, by error, the NORAD computers showed a Soviet missile attack, an independent Canadian warning system could have told NORAD that it was a false alarm. The Americans might not have believed Soviet assurances that there was no missile attack, but they would have believed us.

The same Canadian satellite warning system could confirm for NORAD whether a single rocket heading for New York had been launched from Soviet territory or from elsewhere.

Since it would be insane for the U.S.A. to launch a surprise nuclear attack on the U.S.S.R., we can be truly loyal allies of the Americans by telling them that we would use our satellites to warn Moscow of any attack against the U.S.S.R.

We don't want the USSR to be nervous. Nervous and trigger happy people with nuclear weapons are dangerous. With a surveillance satellite system Canada can help keep the two superpowers from getting too nervous.

We would thus become an internationally respected contributor towards keeping the peace. We could ask other countries to join us in this endeavour; to control our surveillance systems along with us. Sweden would certainly join, followed by other Scandinavian countries. Poland, if it continues its progress towards democracy, might join, and so might Hungary. These partners could contribute expertise and money. As a team, we and they could form the nucleus of the international surveillance force that the world will need increasingly, as arms reductions start cutting close to the bone and the temptation to keep a cache of bombs grows.

Economically, this is very worthwhile for us.

Further, we should have our own polar and coastal radar, including radar that sees over the horizon, to detect anything approaching Canadian territory, planes or cruise missiles, ships or boats. This would be useful not only for defence and against spying, but also against smuggling.

To police our waters, we should abandon the current orthodox concept of relatively large, super-sophisticated fighting warships. Instead, we should build a large fleet of small patrol vessels that can also sweep mines. The British build a type of lifeboat for their coast guard that literally cannot sink. It rights itself if it capsizes. A large, faster version of these is what I have in mind, with sonar for underwater detection, radar of the kind merchant ships carry, a rapid-fire 40-millimetre gun, and a long-range, radar-equipped, unmanned, recoverable observation plane. Moreoever, we should have one carrier off each coast bearing high-speed helicopters armed with rockets and machine guns. All this equipment should be designed and built in Canada.

Senator Stewart: Senator Gigantès, may I ask a question? It would be most helpful to know about those smaller craft to which you refer. You said that they might be useful for fisheries surveillance, a topic in which I am inevitably interested representing as I do people in Nova Scotia. What length would these craft be? How could you make a craft that was suitable for military purposes, armed as you suggest, suitable for fishery patrol work? Could they haul illegal nets? Would they carry the helicopter to which you made reference? Could you give us a little more idea of what you are talking about, because the Department of Fisheries and Oceans does have a very seaworthy patrol boat which is self-righting, and so on? I just wonder how much adaptation is going to be required.

• (1140)

Senator Gigantès: We don't have enough of those patrol boats. I am proposing an increase. The kind of boats I am talking about are around 72 feet long. They are not heavily armed. They carry only one gun.

Senator Stewart: Where is the aircraft?

Senator Gigantès: They will have a drone. They launch a small, unmanned drone for surveillance. And I have said that there should be carrier on each side with armed high-speed helicopters. So it is a combination of all these things. To continue:

Obviously this kind of naval armament would not be good against enemy warships bent on attacking us. Enemy warships would only attack us in the event of a major war involving the U.S. A. That is most unlikely. For other naval roles, such as helping clear an important waterway that has been mined, harassing a foreign vessel that is trespassing, or catching smugglers, the sort of equipment proposed here makes much better sense. It would also form a useful component of a peace-keeping force.

When our current American-built war planes grow too old, we should replace them with long-range planes built and designed by us. Again, we are not looking for fighter aircrafts that will engage in aerobatic combat with enemy planes. We are looking for equipment that gives as good surveillance, as well as the capacity to launch target-seeking missiles at intruders who do not obey orders to leave. On land we do not really face a threat that we could cope with. The Russians are unlikely to attack us by land over the North Pole, and the Americans are even less likely to march across the border. English Canada will not use force to keep Quebec from separating. We saw earlier that a non-nuclear Soviet invasion of Western Europe would succeed in a matter of days . . ."

But that is now less and less likely. To continue:

A repeat of lengthy land fighting and upper land fighting in Europe, as in the Second World War, is highly unlikely: the Western Europeans do not take such a possibility seriously and are not sufficiently prepared for it.

Eastern Europeans are now no longer satellites of the Soviet Union and would sabotage a Soviet attack on Western Europe.

So what we really need are 3,000 commandos as good as the members of Britain's Elite Special Air Squadron and Special Boat Squadron. They can deal with terrorists who have taken hostages. They can capture and destroy terrorist nests or raid a terrorist arms dump. Generally, troops like Britain's SAS can fight and win against forces far superior in numbers and arms. To continue:

Then we should have other units trained as peacekeepers. The people in such units should know about helping to run elections as well as relief missions for areas affected by famine, natural disasters or epidemics. They should have the skill to negotiate with warring factions, supervise ceasefires and be sufficiently good warriors to protect themselves against kidnappings and bomb attempts. Some of our peacekeepers should be linguists. Ideally, these units should also have skills to help with economic development in the foreign ares where they operate.

All such foreign operations by Canadian armed forces would get support from our navy, air force and commandos, when and if this is necessary.

To make all this possible, we must establish a Canadian Forces Corps of Engineers, CANFORCE. It should have a branch to deal with training our service people for all the functions detailed above, CANFORCED, and another branch, CANFORCEMED, for the medial aspects both at home and in peacekeeping abroad.

CANFORCE would manage the important research we would be doing in radar; sonar; lasers; communications equipment; computers and computer software; engineering, marine and air, both for structures and engines; metal alloys and plastics for our satellites, aircraft and ships; research in harnessing solar energy and wind energy for our satellites and unmanned radar stations. We would involve ourselves in robotics for our unmanned surveillance planes, our ocean-floor detection devices and the submarine robots that would position them. We would be doing intensive research in aerodynamics and hydrodynamics. CANFORMED, meanwhile, would do research in medication, to protect our troops from diseases overseas.

The aim of these proposals is to ensure that we do high-tech research in Canada. Many of our industries are foreign owned and leave the research to the head office. Why should a pharmaceutical branch plant spend money setting up laboratories in Canada when its mother house has the latest in laboratories at Denver or San Francisco? Why should the branch plant of a giant foreign high-tech firm spend money on establishing research facilities here when its mother house already has the best in California's Silicon Valley?

Canadian industry does not do nearly enough research. On August 25, 1989, Prime Minster Mulroney complained that 97 per cent of Canadian manufacturing firms do no research at all. On October 3, 1989, John Roth, executive vice-president of Northern Telecom, told a Senate committee that only five Canadian firms do any research at all. Moreover, where once we could demand that foreign plants do their research at their Canadian branches, buy materials and equipment here, use Canadian subcontractors, we relinquished these rights under Chapter 16 of the Canada-U.S.A. Free Trade Agreement. Hence, we are likely to do less and less research, especially in the high-tech fields of tomorrow, if we leave it entirely to the private sector.

The military should be used, therefore, to fill the Canadian research gap. Since defence matters were exempt, on American insistence, from the provisions of the Free Trade Agreement, the U.S.A. could not invoke the FTA to demand a share of our defence pie. Our defence forces could thus give research contracts of the sort suggested above to Canadian firms rather than to American firms or their subsidiaries.

In this way, CANFORCE could look, for example, into hydrogen-fuel technology. Hydrogen is the cleanest fuel. If it is used in an automobile engine, the only exhaust is distilled water vapour, totally non-polluting. The problem is that the amount of energy needed to make hydrogen fuel is greater than the energy the hydrogen fuel would release when burned. There are two points to consider here: one is that techniques for making hydrogen are becoming more cost-effective; the other is that by using the more expensive hydrogen fuel, we save the cost of coping with the pollution caused by other fuels.

Our hydrogen research, if we undertake it, should be directed at creating plants that will burn fossil fuels to make hydrogen. We would then develop engines to use hydrogen instead of fossil fuels. The plants that burn fossil fuels to produce hydrogen would scrub their emissions: that means that they would remove from the emissions they release into the atmosphere all ecologically harmful components, including carbon dioxide, one of the main contributors to the greenhouse effect. We already know how to do this chemically. It cannot be done when the fossil fuels are being burned in a motor car or an airplane. It can be done at a large plant. Many of the pollutants can be transformed chemically into substances that can be used industrially.

Like the Americans, we have too much support personnel for each of our fighting men. We should cut down on support staff drastically and use the savings for the sort of activity I outlined above.

CANFORCE and its commercial partners will contract out the research to Canadian scientists at our universities. Partnerships between CANFORCE and private industry are the way to operate because the private firm will have an eye for turning a profit. We should duplicate the way Northern Telecom developed. It had a steady and reliable client, Bell Canada, steady and reliable because Bell was a regulated monopoly. Thus long-term planning was possible; long-term research projects could be undertaken. Bell invested in and was partner of Northern Telecom. When new technological breakthroughs were made, Northern Telecom established laboratories abroad near clients who wanted its inventions adapted to their needs. CANFORCE could be the "Bell" of at least some emerging Canadian high-tech firms, the steady client and part-owner.

All the products detailed above have commercial applications that are potentially very profitable. We could sell patents or franchise them under licence and the Canadian state can recoup its costs. Please note that none of the research would be going into developing destructive weapons: these, we saw, are sterile because their use does not generate any economic activity. The kind of research the military should finance and direct would have profitable and beneficial civilian applications.

If CANFORCE and other government agencies help a private firm by buying shares in that firm, it could not be considered a subsidy under the various U.S. definitions of the word. Other methods of helping research, such as tax credits, might be considered a subsidy. By following the CANFORCE route, we have double protection against the Free Trade Agreement: we would be investing, not subsidizing, and since CANFORCE would be part of our armed forces, its activities would be exempt from the agreement because the Americans wanted to exempt their military activities in general; and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, in particular, is not covered by the FTA.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers keeps the Mississippi navigable, for "military reasons." It is on the Mississippi that most American products sail to their foreign markets. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers builds and maintains dams, harbours and roads, all for sound military reasons that, happily, also serve regional development.

CANFORCE should do the same. Since we would have a fleet of small patrol vessels, they would use all the harbours of Canada; CANFORCE could help keep them in repair or develop them further. Our military would need good roads leading to those harbours; CANFORCE could chip in. And there would be military establishments in those harbours and in other towns on the road to those harbours (and air bases and surveillance facilities) and CANFORCE labs or factories; so good sewage would be necessary and CANFORCE could chip in for infrastructure spending.

Out west we have huge deposits of coal that burn cleanly. That coal would be a cost-effective base for a pilot hydrogen plant based on research sponsored by the military. Newfoundland, meanwhile, has a huge hydroelectric potential in Labrador. It cannot market its hydroelectricity except by going through Quebec. Newfoundlanders feel they have had problems dealing with Quebec. Newfoundland's hydroelectricity could be developed to produce hydrogen, which could then be shipped to offshore customers. Nova Scotia could use its coal in the same say.

We could have many small bases for our military personnel around the country; CANFORCE will help the local schools with audiovisual equipment. Educational programs developed by CANFORCE, both for teaching specific skills including languages and for general knowledge, could be made available on videotape to schools across the country. And they would be developed, of course, in collaboration with the educational institutions in the provinces.

All this would be done by agreement between the federal government and each province. Provinces that did not want to participate would not be obliged to do so. We are not talking of a constitutional transfer of power from provinces to Ottawa, but of Ottawa minding its own military business (which is exclusively federal) and offering help to provinces and municipalities that want it.

This implies much closer co-operation than we now have between governments and business. This has been done very imaginatively in Quebec. Its Caisse de Dépot et de Placement is a central investment fund into which all public pension contributions are deposited. Over the past 20 years, the Caisse has become a huge pool of investment capital that has been used to make the economy of the province grow. Hydro Québec has played a similar role, hiring Quebec firms for its huge projects and helping them become world class. Both the Caisse and Hydro Québec are owned by the government of Quebec. Both follow the general guidance of the government of Quebec and give public interest more weight in their decisions than individual capitalists do. Quebec, in a real sense, has been practising co-operative capitalism. It has not stifled the province's entrepreneurial spirit—quite the contrary. It is time the rest of Canada began imitating Quebec.

If we do no research, we are condemned to being second-rate. So we must put in place a defence policy that not only produces armed forces attuned to the role we can usefully play but channels more of our military spending into high-tech research, and the production throughout Canada of items using the fruits of our research.

In doing all this, we must not forget the environment:

In the past two decades, Canadians have become increasingly aware of the urgency of environmental issues and of the fact that they are international: each country that fouls its nest fouls the nests of others; pollution has no frontiers. Pressure has mounted on politicians and industry to respond, and they have done so to some degree. Emissions of lead, carbon monoxide and hydrocarbons have been brought down through reductions in auto-emission levels. An increasing number of companies use, sell or ship recycled products. The federal government encourages local groups to set up recycling and clean-up programs.

We established the National Task Force on Environment and Economy. We have a National Round Table, and Round Tables in each province, to discuss environmental issues and to devise environmentally sound economic policies. Agriculture Canada has begun a four-year investigation into foods that are likeliest to retain pesticide residue and harm consumers. Other federal departments and agencies are busy with steps of their own.

Companies like Loblaws are realizing that safeguarding the environment can be commercially profitable. Many industries have already realized that going green doesn't necessarily mean being in the red through loss of competitive advantage. Manufacturers like Alcan, chemical producers like Dow and resource companies like Noranda and Inco are now investing hundreds of millions of dollars in environmentally low-risk industrial processes. Inco was the worst polluter in the country. It has cleaned up its act a lot and is making more profits than ever.

These companies, like their international counterparts in Japan, Sweden and elsewhere, are finding that it is cheaper to use a process that prevents pollution in the first place than to clean up after, or to install scrubbers to clean polluting emissions.

● (1200)

We have solid, indisputable evidence that we will pay far more to clean up a mess than we would pay to prevent it. We saw that in economics it is not good enough simply to estimate the cost of any action and that we should also take into account the cost of inaction. This is even more important where the environment is concerned. Meanwhile, we are faced with daunting scientific evidence of what we continue to do to our planet. Our responses are so far not enough.

Most of us have heard of the "greenhouse effect," whereby the sun's heat is trapped under the thickening layer of carbon dioxide, methane and other gases we throw into the air. This will cause temperatures to rise as much as four degrees Celsius over the next 50 years. Sea levels will rise as ice caps melt. There will be flooding in many areas, and pressure on all forms of vegetation and wildlife to adapt to completely new environmental conditions in a matter of years, rather than centuries.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

REPRESENTATIVES OF CHOIR OF PAULARO

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I draw your attention to the presence in the South Gallery of representatives of the Choir of Paularo, composed of 40 members. The choir will be performing in the rotunda at 12 o'clock. They are led by a member of the provincial legislature of the province of Udine, Friuli, Italy, Mr. Sergio Tiepoli.

On the behalf of the Senate, I wish them a happy visit to the capital of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO CALL ORDERS OF THE DAY—DEBATE CONTINUED

Hon. Paul David: Senator Gigantès, I would like to know what page you are at now . . .

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: On page 148, senator.

Senator David: . . . in this filibuster that is being going on for how many hours now? What time did you start?

Senator Gigantès: So far, I have been at it for five hours and 50 minutes.

Senator David: Five hours and 51 minutes. Just about six hours . . .

Senator Gigantès: Five hours and 50 minutes. And I will be at it for a few hours more.

Senator David: So that means very close to six hours.

Senator Gigantès: Approximately, yes senator.

Senator David: In other words, six hours of time totally wasted in this chamber.

Senator Hébert: Well, that is your opinion!

Senator Gigantès: That is very unkind!

Senator David: It really disturbs me to see that all this time, there are young people coming in here who are going to realize—and fortunately, they do not stay long—the extent to which you are abusing your freedom. You are abusing . . .

Senator Gigantès: I would just like to point out, senator, that they all began to leave when you rose to speak. While I was speaking, they were still here.

Senator David: Well they would have left shortly thereafter anyway.

Hon. Azellus Denis: What if the GST were to be abolished because of that?

Senator David: I sincerely believe that your example is totally inappropriate—you who are always defending freedom and democracy. I think that from the perspective of Canadians who are going to have to pay for all these totally unnecessary services, you set a very poor example for all the people listening to you, and who are quick to leave, I might add, and for all of us.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to speak to the point of order raised by "cardinal" David . . . sorry, senator David.

I guess he must have a short memory. Perhaps he would like to talk about the antics of his conservative colleagues in the House of Commons when they held this chamber hostage for 21 days a few years back.

I do not think we have any lessons to take from the fat cats opposite, who see themselves as the salt of the earth, virtue incarnate and all the rest.

Do continue your most interesting discourse, senator Gigantès. I am getting a great deal out of it.

I do think that you should perhaps condense, not your speech but your treatise, so that it could be distributed to Canadian school children. I have been listening carefully to your remarks and I know that you care a great deal about educating our young people.

I think it would be very useful to them, if you saw fit to do this. I would certainly be prepared to help you in any way possible.

Senator David: I just want you to know, senator, that I heard your malicious insinuations there; I am gradually getting used to them.

Even there, I think we should show some respect . . . If you want to call me "cardinal", I have no objection to your doing so, but at least you should show some respect for parliamentary tradition and use more discreet language.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, on Senator David's point of order, I, like Senator Chaput-Rolland, would like to tell him that you people opposite are in no position to teach me anything.

I have had a long parliamentary career. I was a docile and faithful parliamentarian for 22 years until you started pulling your tricks here in the Senate.

I have no intention of taking any advice from you, senator Poitras or any of the rest of you who jump up on your feet every once in a while like school principals to try and restore order.

Had you complied with parliamentary tradition, you would not be in the mess you are in today.

So, please save your sermons for Sunday.

Senator Gigantès: Senator David, if you continue to interrupt me, this is going to take a long time!

I did hope to finish before noon. Soon I will be starting a section that has to do with medicine and public health, which is certain to interest you.

> Chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) also contribute to global warming. CFCs are used as propellents in spray cans (or the CFCs are replaced with butane, which is a greenhouse-effect gas), as coolants in refrigerators and in the manufacture of polystyrene cups and foam cushions. They erode the ozone layer, which filters out the sun's harmful ultraviolet rays and protects us from skin cancers, cataracts and numerous other medical problems.
> Recent initiatives have resulted in partial or projected bans on CFCs. But if depletion of the ozone layer continues, we are likely to see cancer rates rise, with an accompanying burden on our health-care system. Even if current CFC emissions were halted altogether, those already in the atmosphere would continue damaging the ozone layer for years to come.
> Meanwhile, deforestation is destroying trees and vegetation that absorb carbon dioxide and other polluting gases. Over eleven million hectares of tropical rain forest are felled each year, and reforestation efforts in most countries, including Canada, are sadly inadequate.
> As we leave ourselves with fewer trees to pump water from the ground, we hasten the process of desertification in some parts of the world. This threatens food production in these areas, as well as animal habitats and food sources.
> Finally, the world's growing population continues to strain the earth's land, energy and other resources. Poor Third World countries often resort to the use of fossil fuels, which are cheaper but more harmful than cleaner power sources such as solar or nuclear energy. Thus, they continue to deplete scarce resources and to pollute.

• (1210)

> Canada, for all our concern, contributes to these problems. Blessed as a nation with a seemingly limitless supply of fresh-water lakes and rivers, coal, forests and farmland, we have become great wasters of energy and water. Our record on reforestation has improved over the past two decades, but it is still abysmal. We spew approximately five tonnes of carbon dioxide per capita, per annum into the atmosphere. Every year we lose 300 million tonnes of topsoil across the prairies because of modern farming techniques that destroy the organic matter in soil. Arable land in Canada has decreased by 2,600,000 hectares in the past 20 years; our food imports have risen.
> We allow pulp mills to produce chlorine-bleached white paper, which pollutes the air and water with toxic dioxins. We provide little incentive for such mills to use recyclable newsprint, and the mountain of waste newspaper grows.
> We have polluted or killed many of our central lakes and destroyed our trees with acid rain. We are threatening the survival of beluga whales in the St. Lawrence and we continue to pay huge sums to export much of our toxic waste abroad for disposal and incineration.

[Senator David.]

About 80 per cent of the five million tonnes of toxic waste we produce each year seeps, untreated, into the environment through aging, inadequately monitored dump sites. Each of us produces about 1.7 kilos of garbage every day — that's 16 million tonnes of garbage a year. Because the earth turns, the muck we throw into the air and the sea ends up at the poles. Iceland, near the North Pole, finds garbage metres deep on its beaches after each major storm. The garbage has labels and can be traced: this was dumped in the sea off Athens, that off New Orleans, this off Montreal. In the same way, ozone-destroying gases drift to the poles, widening the holes in the ozone layer over the Arctic and the Antarctic. The immense Arctic peat-moss fields will rot as temperatures rise and release huge amounts of methane to thicken the greenhouse layer.

We do not need any more studies to prove that we are destroying the earth. We know beyond all reasonable doubt that the pollution we produce is poisoning our air, water and soil, and causing dreadful genetic damage to other species. Eventually, it will do the same to us.

Still, we wrangle about who should pay to clean up, and often this is a matter of foreign relations. Take a pig farmer, for example. His pigs produce enormous quantities of excrement; the excrement gives off methane, which in turn aggravates the greenhouse effect. The excrement also runs off into the water supply and fouls it. Keeping the pigs in pens where the methane is captured and burned cleanly to produce energy (something we know how to do) would cost the farmer a lot, initially. Preventing the pigs' excrement from reaching the water supply would cost even more. Who should pay?

If you ask the farmer to pay for it without increasing his prices, he will make no profits. If he raises his prices but his U.S. competitors do not, their bacon and pork will cost much less. Canadian consumers will stop buying our farmer's products and buy those of his American competitors. He will slaughter his pigs and go out of business. Meanwhile, U.S. farms will get more pigs to replace the slaughtered Canadian pigs. The U.S. pigs will produce just as much methane, the greenhouse effect will continue unabated, and a Canadian farm will have gone belly up.

Or take the coal-fired electrical generating plant New Brunswick wants to build for $850 million. In October 1989, Dalton Camp, former adviser to the Mulroney Cabinet, said on radio that the acid rain produced by this plant would fall not on New Brunswick but on the Gaspé in Quebec. To install "scrubbers" that would remove the pollutants from the emissions of this plant would cost an additional $150 million, Mr. Camp said.

I am glad that they have decided to put these scrubbers in. For a while they were saying that they would not put them in, even though calculations showed that they should have and could have.

If this extra $150 million were borrowed for 20 years at 10 per cent, and if the loan plus interest were repaid in equal monthly payments over 20 years, New Brunswick would be paying some $2 million each month to service the loan of $150 million to clean the pollution out of the emissions of its new power plant.

New Brunswick exports electricity to the United States. Assuming that the electricity from the new coal-fired power plant in question is sold to one million households, these households would have to pay $2 more a month. But then some U.S. power station that does not use scrubbers might offer electricity for $2 less a month. Would Americans be willing to pay more for New Brunswick electricity just because it came from a non-polluting plant?

American Midwest power companies, using very dirty coal, are the main cause of acid rain in North America. They destroy forests, soil, lakes and the life they contain to the east and northeast. These U.S. coal-burning generating plants use the influence of senators and congressmen from coal-mining states to resist legislation that would demand that their emissions be scrubbed. They fear, of course, that if they scrub their emissions, the price of their electricity might rise enough for them to lose customers to, say, Canadian hydroelectric plants, or to Canadian natural gas, which burns more cleanly and is cheap.

The result is that the American Midwest is destroying the American East and Northeast to avoid what may amount to no more than an extra monthly charge of $2 on each household's electricity bill. They are also destroying Canada, but this is a secondary concern for American legislators.

Moreover, American and Canadian businesses (and European, Asian and Latin American) maintain that if their energy costs went up for the sake of "scrubbing" power-station emissions, they would be less competitive than foreign firms using cheaper, but dirtier, electricity.

Meanwhile, we still have the problem of poor, underdeveloped countries. To develop and get richer, they must industrialize. To industrialize, they must rely on the cheapest available sources of energy, often fossil fuels. These are major polluters.

China has one-third of the world's coal reserves. If the American Midwest says that it cannot afford to produce clean power, then China can say it in spades and with much more justification. So can India, Africa and Latin America. But if they all pollute the air and the sea as we did when we used fuel indiscriminately to industrialize ourselves, then no matter what we do in the developed world, the earth will be poisoned at an unremitting pace.

Telling these poor countries not to industrialize is not an option they will accept. It is all very well for the rich to admire the purity of poverty; the poor never do. The elites in these countries preach industrialization, just as we would, if we were in their shoes.

Clearly, the problem is international. All nations should agree to increase energy charges to pay for scrubbing the emissions from their power plants. If they do, no nation's businesses could gain a competitive advantage from the lower costs of using dirty power. At the same time, producers of pollution other than power plants in every country should agree simultaneously to stop poisoning the air and sea. Then no chemical plant or smelter could say that it cannot increase its production costs by cleaning up its pollution when its foreign competitors are free to keep costs down by fouling the earth.

And if we want to persuade poorer countries to stop polluting, we must help them clean up their emissions. We must compensate them for the cost advantage they will lose. Paying more taxes to help China and India put scrubbers on their factory chimneys and filters for their effluents will never be a sexy platform in any developed nation's election. But pollution, no matter where it originates, is directly linked to our personal well-being. We can no longer afford to use the fears of politicians and industrialists or the difficulty of gaining international agreement as excuses for inaction.

● (1220)

Action, predictably, comes fastest when the problem occurs in our own backyard—when the link between our personal well-being and pollution is brought home. The closer we are to the source of pollution, the harder we fight it. Since the disaster at Love Canal in Niagara Falls in the 1970s, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has concentrated heavily on regulating and cleaning up hazardous waste.

The 1980 U.S. Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act authorized funding for the clean-up of the Love Canal and other abandoned hazardous waste sites. The act was amended in 1986 to incorporate stricter clean-up standards and greater public involvement in the decision-making process. The current EPA administrator has said that the EPA will force polluters to pay for cleaning hazardous-waste sites.

Similarly, in the wake of the Exxon Valdez oil spill disaster in Alaska, the newly formed Coalition for Environmentally Responsible Economies, comprising American environmentalists and investors, has proposed a code of conduct known as the Valdez Principles. Among the principles embodied in the code are protection of the biosphere, sustainable use of natural resources, marketing of safe products and services, assessments and annual audits, and reduction and disposal of waste. The drafters of the principles hope to persuade major businesses in the United States to sign the document.

But a crisis-by-crisis response is not enough. We must begin to shape policies, both at home and abroad, that reduce the economic and health costs to society of a polluted environment. Regulatory and enforcement measures at the disposal of governments provide little incentive for business to clean up or adopt environmentally sound ways of doing things. The jurisdictional ambiguity of federal and provincial laws ensures that government efforts are often duplicated in some areas and nonexistent in others. We must look at other approaches to cleaning up the environment.

The American economist Steven Blinder and others promote the idea of a market-oriented approach. Blinder suggests that governments adopt a system of user or emissions fees. Emissions could be monitored, like long-distance phone calls, and polluters would be billed. Alternatively, industries could be required to purchase "pollution permits," allowing the permit holder to emit a certain amount of pollutant—for a fee.

Opponents of this approach argue that a market-driven system of fees, permits and environmental quotas amounts to a licence to pollute. They suggest that a company would rather pay a tax than reduce its pollution. Others oppose fees on the grounds that it is impossible to put a price tag on our precious natural resources. But every business faces the same dilemma when marketing and pricing a new product: if the price ends up too low, it is subsequently raised; too high, and down it comes. We need not treat the use—the sale—of clean air and water any differently.

I am sure the free enterprise barons would agree with that.

The key to designing taxes or user fees is to fix them at levels high enough to discourage even the most prosperous business from polluting, but low enough so that the economy does not grind to a halt because smaller companies must shut down under the burden of stringent controls.

The measures Blinder proposes seem preferable to legislative interdiction, if only because mandatory standards are difficult to design in sufficient detail and then enforce: most fines are so surprisingly small that industrialists may prefer to pay them rather than buy the necessary clean-up equipment.

The Canadian Environmental Protection Act (CEPA) attempts to provide a legislative framework of controls to shape industrial activities by imposing fines of up to $1 million a day and jail terms for offenders. But so far, the largest fine has been $500—not much of a disincentive for corporations and industries. Further, there has been no assessment of CEPA's effectiveness. Such an assessment would be one way to ensure that federal laws do what they intend to do for the environment.

Blinder's proposal would make it economically attractive to respect the environment and reduce effluents by making a company pay only for the quantity of pollution it produces. Reducing pollution would reduce the payments, especially if the price of clean air and water keeps rising. Measures like these would help to raise the environmental awareness of industry.

There are other things we can do. For example, refusing to subsidize farmers who use destructive irrigation and fertilization practices would do much to preserve farmland across the country.

As proposed in the chapter on defence, we should enhance our research into alternative energy sources like hydrogen fuel, and developing technologies that conserve resources, prevent pollution and restore the environment without compromising our economic success.

Further, we could explore obligatory insurance. The insurers of a polluter would pay for the clean-up. CANFORCE could work on becoming the world's best expert on clean-ups, renting its services to polluters.

Economic success becomes an absurdity if we kill the earth. We will act for our neighbourhood first, then our town, then our country and, by extension, neighbouring countries. Cleaning up is inevitable, and it is much costlier than not polluting in the first place. Meanwhile, the scientific evidence is overwhelming: if we kill the earth, we kill humankind.

● (1230)

I would like to come back to some of the objections from senators opposite to my recent dispatch. I will have to read the chapter on health after lunch. Senator Stanbury, may I continue at 1.30? As I promised Senator David, we are now going to pass on to health matters, which are obviously matters on which he is an authority. He is also a learned, kindly man.

Neglecting the environment is not the only thing that can kill us. There are accidents, diseases, the act of giving birth or not giving birth, drug abuse. For individuals, better educational, economic, defence and foreign policies take second place to health. That is why we need the health services we have. Most of us like them, though we would like to see them improved. Some would like them privatized, which is the current fashion.

One is Dr. Michael Walker, head of Vancouver's Fraser Institute, who told me in 1986 that even our health services should be run for profit; only the profit motive can install the necessary efficiency and avoid waste, Dr. Walker said. He cited the fact that after Saskatchewan introduced free medical services, the number of hysterectomies shot up in that province. What this showed, according to Dr. Walker, was that people will be immoderate in their use of a service if they think it is free. What this showed, I replied, was either that there had been an awful lot of women who had needed hysterectomies but had not been able to afford them before medicare, or that there were an awful lot of doctors willing to butcher women unnecessarily for money.

Dr. Walker is not alone in his views. On January 9, 1987, La Presse reported that the Quebec Chamber of Commerce wanted health services returned, as far as possible, to private enterprise; the Chamber repeated its recommendations in 1988. In the same year, newspapers reported that Robert Campeau, who had just bought Bloomingdale's in New York, was on a speaking tour addressing business groups and getting enthusiastic reactions to his suggestion that health care should be privatized.

> A substantial number of Canadian businesspeople seem to think that medicare, which is run by the state, is bound to be more expensive and much less efficient than if it were run by the private sector. They should listen to Lee Iacocca, the boss of Chrysler. He is cited in the October issue of The Best of Business—Inside Guide to the effect that the U.S. per capita health bill is 41 per cent higher than in Canada and higher than in several other countries, too. It would make sense if the Americans were getting better care than other nations, but Mr. Iacocca says they are not: ". . . our infant mortality rate is one of the worst, and we have 37 million people without any health coverage at all."

This was stated by one of the icons of the free enterprise system. If Lee Iacocca admires the Canadian medicare system and does not like the American one, we should pay attention.

> He goes on to say that the cost of health care adds $700 to the price of a car his company manufactures in its U.S. plants, as against only $223 for cars made in his Canadian factories.

> On March 2, 1989, the New England Journal of Medicine (N.E.J.M.), perhaps the most prestigious medical periodical in the world, published a major study comparing medicine in the U.S.A. and in Canada.

> Canada and the United States, the article said, have engaged in large-scale competition between socialized and private-sector health care. Canadian socialized medicine has avoided or solved several of the more intractable problems facing health care in the U.S.A., the N.E.J.M. concluded: overall health expenditures in Canada have been kept down to a stable share of the Gross Domestic Product, and universality of coverage in Canada, without user fees, protects the patients from the often catastrophic costs of health care incurred by their counterparts in the U.S.A., and protects doctors and hospitals from unpaid fees.

> In 1985, the N.E.J.M. says, Americans spent an average of U.S.$1,710 each on health care. If their rate of cost increases since 1971 had been the same as in Canada, Americans would have spent $400, or 20 per cent less. Estimates for 1987 show that the gap between health-care costs in the U.S.A. and Canada is widening, and in Canada's favour. If Canadian rates of cost increases since 1971 had applied to the U.S., health spending by 1987 would have been about $450 less (after inflation) for every person on average, or U.S. $100 billion less for the whole United States.

> Canadian physicians enjoy more autonomy in treating a patient than do their American counterparts who are under increasing restraints imposed by insurance companies and governments. With firm, centralized management of spending, Canada has escaped the more intrusive methods of cost control prevailing in the U.S.A. writes the N.E.J.M.

> Dr. Walker's Fraser Institute, the think tank most wedded to the idea that "only the profit motive works," thinks the word government is an insult. It was therefore surprising to read Caring for Profit, a 1987 Fraser Institute book on health services by Malcolm C. Brown. Brown says that:

> > It is important to get the Canadian system into perspective; that despite all its difficulties it has been, in comparison with any other system in the world, of which I know, the most successful in maximizing the achievement of conflicting objectives of financial access, cost control, and consumer satisfaction.

This was stated by the Fraser Institute, the mecca of extreme, right-wing Reaganomics.

> Free-enterprise medicine, as practised in the United States, behaves in a way that is almost incomprehensible to a Canadian. There is a hospital chain in the United States whose president pays himself $17 million a year. Hospitals in this chain refuse to admit people who cannot pay. The first thing that is checked when a prospective patient arrives is his or her credit rating.

> In 1983, in Alabama, a man was stabbed in the stomach. Three hospitals refused to admit him because he had neither money nor credit cards. He bled to death on the way to a fourth hospital. The Ottawa Citizen carried other such horror stories in a series of articles on health services (February 1986). Readers might think such stories reflect the viewpoint of a Canadian reporter. They should read the lead editorial of the International Herald Tribune of August 2, 1988, which said that U.S. hospitals increasingly resist admitting even emergency patients who have no insurance. The paper added that 37 million Americans have no medical insurance, and their numbers are increasing. According to Mr. Iacocca, those Americans who have health coverage pay 3.5 times more than in Canada for an appendectomy or hysterectomy, five times more for a coronary bypass, seven times more for a simple electrocardiogram.

> In effect, Canada runs a universal group medical insurance. Since the "group" is so large, costs can be kept down because even those who are well pay towards the health care of those who are ill. That's the principle on which group insurance is based: every person contributes, if only through the tax system. Costs can be kept down further because the system is not run by private-sector insurance companies that must make profits.

In the Canadian system, every person is entitled to the same care. There are some small advantages the better off can obtain, such as having a private room instead of sharing with another patient. Otherwise, rich and poor have the same doctors, the same nurses, the same hospitals.

Our medicare has defects, even though it is the best in the world, and even though is is cost-effective. It can be improved, rationalized. But however much we improve medicare, there will be hard choices to make. Should money be spent on expensive new equipment that might benefit one patient in a thousand? Or should the money be spent improving care for the other 999?

Such choices are part of any form of management. They are horrible choices to make when human health, perhaps human life, is involved. One person dies because we did not buy the expensive new equipment and not only do we feel guilt-ridden as managers, but we are hounded by the media for being inefficient and not on the cutting edge of new technology.

The medical world has always had to make such decisions, especially in war. What happens when you have many more wounded arriving than you have surgeons or operating tables near the front? You have to operate first on those who seem likeliest to die if they have to wait. Who makes that choice? If the doctors are desperately busy, a nurse makes the choice and might make the wrong choice. A doctor might have made the same wrong choice too.

This sort of thing happens occasionally in every hospital, not just in wartime at the front. If you are the one who was judged to be a less urgent case and made to wait, you and your relatives might feel you were judged to be less important and you will complain about the terrible state of our health-care system. It happens even in hospitals for very rich patients in the U.S.A. There may be more very rich people demanding attention at the same time, in the same hospital, than there are high-priced doctors or operating rooms.

Inevitably, our medicare system is criticized for not having operating rooms and surgeons available whenever people want them, however numerous these people may be. But this is like saying that the state should provide a limousine for anyone who wants it. It may be reasonable to demand that municipal authorities provide mass transportation or that governments make sure enough taxis have licences. It would not be reasonable to say the authorities should provide each citizen with a limousine.

We can improve our medical services, but however much we improve them we shall not have Cadillac-level medicine because we are only paying for Volkswagen medicine. Our police services and transportation systems operate under the same constraint. We cannot have deluxe service in everything: we cannot afford it.

There are Canadians who could afford Cadillac-level medicine. Some of these are among the most vocal opponents of our medicare system. They would like the Canadian state to let them have their own private-sector hospitals where they could pay for and get deluxe care. This was what the Quebec Chamber of Commerce was suggesting. Hospitals for the rich would have more doctors, beds, operating rooms and equipment for each patient than public hospitals have. Such hospitals would pay much higher salaries to their staff. They would turn down patients without the means to pay their high fees.

Why should we not allow the rich to have their private hospitals? Because those hospitals would attract too many of the doctors we have been training largely at public expense; too many of the nurses; too many of the lab technicians. There would be shortages of such people in public hospitals. It is not inconceivable that some of our most talented surgeons would choose to perform complicated life-saving procedures in the private hospitals rather than in the public ones where their fees would be 10 times smaller. Soon the private hospitals for the rich would be buying organs for transplants. Soon the rich would have a better chance of survival. That is what they have in the U.S.A.

Health care should be one of those equal-opportunity rights for all citizens, like the equal right to be protected by the law and by our armed forces, and the right to vote. Healthy citizens are less burden on society than sick ones. The poor are already more prone to illness than the rich: we shouldn't punish them for this through our health-care system. People are not born equal, but they are born with an equal need for health care when necessary. Equal-opportunity health care makes economic sense. It also makes moral sense, and moral sense is good politics.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt Senator Gigantès. There has been an agreement that the sitting be suspended from 12:30 until 2 o'clock, and I so move.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I will finish in a couple of hours.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, we have discussed this and we are in agreement.

Senator Phillips: It will be just as boring two hours from now.

Senator Gigantès: I am not being paid to entertain you, sir, only to instruct you.

• (1250)

The sitting of the Senate was suspended.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed at 2 p.m.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: The sitting will continue.

Hon Philippe Deane Gigantès: I will continue my remarks from earlier today before I proceed to a question or privilege that I shall raise because of the uncouth and dishonest slurs cast upon me by the Leader of the Opposition. I will get to them.

Senator Cools: Who would do a thing like that to you?

Senator Gigantès: Lowell Murray, who else? He always does things like that. I will continue:

> We should improve our existing non-profit health-care system for rich and poor alike. The problem has been looked at by many experts, and there are two main avenues of improvement, neither of which involves more money.
> In their book Second Opinion, What's Wrong with Canada's Health Care System, Michael Rachlis and Carol Kushner suggest that we would spend a lot less if we spent more on prevention than on cure. These two authors and others have talked about the fact that smoking kills 35,000 Canadians a year and ties up hospital beds, operating rooms and thoracic surgeons. We could teach more about the ill effects of smoking, make better use of advertising to fight this form of addiction.
> We could do more about stopping drunken driving. Accidents tie up thousands of hospital beds and orthopedic surgeons. We should also do more through education and persuasion to reduce the amounts of alcohol people drink. Television advertisements implying that beer drinking is associated with beauty, youth or success in sports should be banned.
> We could all exercise more and later into life; eat less food with animal fat; eat more vegetables with fibre.

Senator Kelleher: Drink lots of water too.

Senator Gigantès: I do. I will continue:

> We could do more to clean the guck in our environment that is poisoning our air and water and getting into our food.
> We could have more effective teaching about safe sex to cut down on sexually transmitted diseases.

An Hon. Senator: What is sex?

Senator Gigantès: Ask the Tories. According to the Mclean's poll, they are the ones who are more sexually active than the Liberals. They say they are. I continue:

> In sum, we could do more to keep ourselves from needing medical care. Healthy living is the best preventive medicine. Prevention is better than cure and far cheaper.
> In another vein, Dr. Ralph G. Hawkins of Alberta made the following suggestions in an April 1988 speech. Here are some of his points:
> Many rural and community hospitals have more beds than they need for patients requiring acute care, and not enough beds for those needing less acute, chronic or auxiliary care. And of course as much home care as possible should be organized. Not only is it better for the patients, but it creates jobs, as we saw.
> Dr. Hawkins proposes, in effect, to de-centralize chronic-care services and centralize acute-care services. This would be both humane in the case of chronic-care patients (getting them closer to home and family) and cost-effective in the case of acute care (getting patients to facilities where care can be expedited and where services won't be duplicated).
> Since it is substantially less expensive to deliver care in auxiliary settings rather than acute-care settings ($100 a day versus $300 to $900 a day) the cost savings would be substantial through this single policy alone.
> To take care of remote regions, Dr. Hawkins suggests either itinerant teams of salaried professionals (physicians, nurses) who would establish and staff facilities in remote regions, visiting on a rotating basis, with air evacuations for patients who need more advanced hospitals, in urban centres.

Alternatively, doctors willing to settle in remote areas should be paid more. Such schemes should give doctors time off for professional updating in urban centres and for continuing education, Dr. Hawkins concluded.

These are good ideas. I continue:

Canadian citizens should carefully distinguish between (a) calls to replace all or part of our non-profit, universal, group health insurance with far less cost-effective, far less equitable private health services and (b) calls to improve our medicare.

One of the best ways of cutting the costs of medicare is to improve our behaviour, as we have already seen—start living in ways that abuse our health less. No such abuse is more in the public eye than drug abuse.

There are three things that we can do about illicit drugs:

Which create a lot of costs and decrease productivity in people who take them:

(1) launch a total war against them; (2) decriminalize them, treating their abuse as a health problem; and (3) do what we do now, which is to fight them ineffectively, calling them illegal but letting too many "nice" people get away with consuming the drugs and letting other even "nicer" people make huge profits from laundering drug money.

It is hard not to think of drug addicts as excessively stupid—so stupid that one is tempted to say that if they want to kill or harm themselves for the sake of a transitory thrill, let them: society does not need such idiocy. On the other hand, we should ask whether we, as a society, have failed in our duty to inform people, especially young people, effectively and credibly that beyond the thrill disastrous risks lurk.

The thrills are transitory but often addictive. People who sniff cocaine feel immense relaxation as well as excitement. They get chatty; they think they have become invincible, strong and clever, immune to physical fatigue. But this "high" lasts only for a while. Cocaine may also cause nausea, vomiting, mental confusion, hallucinations, paranoid delirium and toxic psychosis. These consequences are disastrous: the minds and bodies of addicts are irreversibly affected. Premature aging is a startling result of abusing both cocaine and booze simultaneously.

Heroin gives highs that last from two to three hours. The addicts have feelings of voluptuous wellbeing for about 10 seconds. Then they "float" blissfully for periods that get shorter and shorter with increased use. Withdrawal symptoms between doses involve enormous suffering. There are permanent effects: addicts grow pale and weak; they lose appetite and interest in sex; they are constipated, sweaty and they itch. They have problems sleeping. The more they consume, the more useless they are.

Marijuana and its concentrated form, hashish, provoke euphoria, hilarity and a warped perception of time. The attention span is reduced; short-term memory diminishes. Users may suffer nausea, chest pains, confusion and hallucinations. Prolonged use increases respiratory infections and scrambles the capacity to think and learn. Marijuana and hashish users also have a greater tendency to get hooked on alcohol, tobacco and other drugs. (However, those combating drugs have talked as if smoking one marijuana cigarette does as much damage as prolonged abuse. This exaggeration seriously undermines the credibility of anti-drug information.) A 1985 study estimated that there were one million users of hashish or marijuana in Canada at the time; but estimates are estimates, not facts.

The LSD high lasts approximately 12 hours. The pupils of the eyes dilate. The users may experience hallucinations. Hearing and vision may be reduced. Time perception may be warped. There is a feeling of well-being but an incapacity to think coherently. A bad LSD trip can cause depression, chronic anxiety and even schizophrenia. Those who use it, as well as those who use certain other drugs, believe their "creativity" is enhanced. Careful tests have shown that subjects tend to be deluded about their ability to create.

• (1410)

There is a huge loss of human potential through drug addiction. Some sociologists say that unemployment drives people to drugs, but once people take drugs they are much less employable or re-employable. They are no longer punctual. They are often absent from work. They suffer more industrial accidents. They are confused and apathetic. Studies show that drug addicts, including alcoholics, cost U.S. business $33 billion dollars a year in inefficiency, absenteeism, accidents and illness. For Canada, this cost is estimated at more than $2 billion a year.

Drug addicts (I include alcohol and tobacco addicts) cost the rest of us huge sums in health care. They know better than anyone how destructive and self-destructive their behaviour is.

Honourable Senators, I have had my glass changed because one never knows what might be slipped into one's glass by someone opposite.

As for drug traffickers who enrich themselves by causing human misery, it is tempting not to consider them as human at all, and yet we let them get away with murder while they live like fairy-tale potentates. Despite the hundreds of millions of dollars spent every year by the rich countries to fight drugs, trafficking in narcotics flourishes. Occasional seizures of drugs merely scratch the surface and serve only to increase the price of these substances, wrecking the health of more people.

Law enforcement is failing miserably to stop drugs from entering Canada. An estimated 90 to 95 per cent of the cocaine, heroin, marijuana and hashish destined for this country gets through. And stricter enforcement encourages traffickers to develop less bulky (therefore less detectable) and more potent forms of drugs, the most compelling example being crack.

Another example is the increased popularity of hydroponic growing techniques for marijuana, which can produce a far more potent strain of the plant than earth-grown varieties. This is a simple connection between supply and demand: if the demand is there, the supply will follow, in one form or another. If an addict cannot obtain his or her drug of choice, a substitute will be found.

If we really decide on an all-out war on the drug trade we should attack the demand for drugs; we should also attack the suppliers and their accomplices. We don't.

We do not really attack the demand for drugs, either. We apply our laws very loosely. People who appear impaired while driving or who have accidents are not compelled to take drug tests.

The police know of prominent and not-so-prominent "solid" citizens who take drugs, but these are rarely troubled. Such users are adults who set a terrible example for the youth around them. And it is these respectable adults who account for most of the drug dealers' profits.

Since we cannot exterminate them physically, the best way to attack the drug lords is to take their money away. It is essential for drug traffickers to launder their money—to hide it, that is, by obliterating the connection to its origins. There are endless ways of doing it. A drug dealer can buy a business—a laundry—and deposit much more money in the bank than the laundry actually makes. The dealer will pay some tax on this money, but the money will have been laundered. A drug dealer can deposit money in the bank and say he won it gambling. It would be hard to check out his story. But these are methods good enough for the underlings of the drug lords.

The big drug lords have so much money that they must invest it in big economies: there is nothing big enough for them in Columbia, Peru or Bolivia. They cannot keep billions of dollars in banknotes. They cannot buy a big company, or buy a handful of top-quality diamonds, by walking in with suitcases full of banknotes. They would attract attention to themselves.

A drug lord would not expose himself this way. He would use intermediaries and not care if they were arrested. But he does care if the money is confiscated. He would rather keep it and make it fructify by investing it. To do so, he must put it in some legitimate and inevitably large activity. And that means going through the banking system, having a legitimate account and line of credit.

Of course all this is easier to do in countries that have long followed the lucrative practice of giving refuge in their banks to criminal funds. That is why an attack on the drug lords' money can only succeed through the international banking system. That can only be done through absolute co-operation among the governments and financial institutions of, at least, the U.S.A., Japan, West Germany, Britain, France, Switzerland, Italy and Canada. If these countries agreed among themselves, they could stop the laundering of drug money and seize it.

It has been suggested by a former U.S. secretary of the treasury that those countries that do not already do so should force their banks to reveal to governments all sudden increases in the deposits of a company or individual. The police and tax authorities could check whether the depositor in question is, indeed, doing more business than previously, and therefore buying more supplies or hiring more staff; if not, authorities should be legally entitled to ask where the new money is coming from.

The banks should also be constantly pressed to report on all deposits and bank accounts over $10,000. A bank, moreover, would be obliged to ask that depositors declare, on oath, how they came to have the money they are depositing or holding in their accounts, the country in which they paid income tax, the country where they are citizens and their legal residence; this is done, to some extent, in the U.S.A., but to attack drug money, the practice should be generalized.

Another law, with heavy penalties, would forbid lying to a bank when making a depositor's declaration. Money associated with a false declaration would be confiscated. Money in large bank accounts would be partially frozen until the facts on the depositor's declaration were checked and found to be true.

Smaller drug-money havens such as the Bahamas, the Persian Gulf states, Monaco, Luxembourg, Hong Kong, Taiwan and Bulgaria would be told by the big-money powers to collaborate in the campaign to confiscate drug money or see their trade and financial institutions boycotted by the big-money powers.

Such measures are not impossible but they are draconian and would be unjustifiably cumbersome and annoying for the vast majority of people who have come by their money honestly and who would hate the hassle of being checked by the bank, tax authorities and the police.

If we don't step up our attack on the drug lords' money, then they will use it to pay for helicopters, fast boats, planes and armed goons. They will have enough money to pay small fortunes to amateur smugglers, to bribe police and customs officers, even judges. Their goons will be fighting drug wars in the streets, as in Washington, D.C. The drug trade will not stop.

But if we take measures such as these (and some such measures are essential if we're serious about fighting drug lords) then we shall catch not only the drug money, but a large number of "respectable" tax evaders, accountants, lawyers, dentists, plumbers and others who get paid under the counter and do not delcare all their earnings as income.

● (1420)

We shall also uncover proof that several "respectable" banks have at least turned a blind eye or even collaborated in the laundering of drug money being carried out through their institutions. The police in several countries are pretty sure bankers know they are laundering drug money. Some bankers, some very senior bankers, might see their reputations ruined or might even go to jail. They and all the otherwise respectable tax evaders will bitterly insist that a full-disclosure banking system is an invasion of privacy, an attack on human rights and too costly.

[Senator Gigantès.]

It would not be too costly. It would finance itself with the illicit money that would be confiscated. We are talking of hundreds of billions of dollars earned by the drug dealers; and there is other criminal money stashed away in banks.

A full-disclosure banking system would reduce our privacy. But the very many who have nothing to hide would mind much less than the few who do have something to hide, such as the failure to pay child maintenance. The point is that though the systematic seizure of drug money is easily affordable, it is also a major hassle. But we cannot fight the drug traders without disrupting many cosy practices of other people.

To further damage the drug lords, we would have to attack the demand side by making the use of illicit drugs a costly experience. There are thousands and thousands of otherwise respectable people, living in comfortable circumstances, who sniff cocaine every now and then, smoke pot and drive a car afterwards, or a plane or a boat; or who are absent from work after a bad trip and say they were sick.

Drug tests for drivers appearing to be impaired should become mandatory. Those found to have taken drugs and to have driven should have their licences suspended and their cars confiscated.

It seems improbable, considering how many people outside the drug trade would have to be inconvenienced, that we shall do what is necessary to fight it. Most likely we shall continue, as now, waging a token, largely ineffectual fight against drug trafficking while it wrecks the health and lives of countless citizens.

So far, the war on drugs has succeeded only in pushing up prices, increasing the profits of the drug lords and creating battalions of smaller drug criminals, many of them minors, who take care of the delivery for wages unimaginably higher than what they could earn delivering, say, pizza or the mail. How can we preach the value of honest work to the young who are poor when they see adults grow immensely rich simply by selling drugs?

The ingestion of harmful substances is as old as mankind. Maybe even older. Recent studies have found that certain species of animals do what humans do and drug themselves. Personally, I am exasperated by the fact that people harm themselves, often irreparably, just to imitate their peers. But though they exasperate me, these are my fellow human beings and I cannot abandon them; I am talking of the victims, not of the drug lords.

Attempts have been made to solve this old problem by police-state methods throughout history. They have never worked. Besides, though to have a police force is necessary, to have a police state is to be avoided at all costs. The sins of freedom are less dangerous than the sins of tyranny. And punishment must not be an end in itself. We saw that Solon believed laws should take prevailing circumstances into account and punish a few to some purpose rather than many to no purpose.

Since our half-hearted war on drugs is failing, we should study all the aspects of decriminalizing drugs. This means that they could be sold legally and could be bought legally, in legitimate businesses or, preferably, in government outlets like the liquor control boards.

Before exclaiming that it would be immoral for governments to sell addictive, harmful substances, people should consider alcohol. It is as addictive as any other drug, more addictive than heroin. People who drink too much are damaged irreparably. It is a major cause of murder on the roads. It breaks down families, ruins careers, rots livers, scrambles brains and leads to violence. Yet governments either sell alcohol or allow it to be sold; in both cases governments derive huge revenues from taxes on alcohol.

The only difference between alcohol and other drugs is that we have come to accept the drinking of alcohol, officially, as a potential evil that cannot be stopped and that can be taxed to increase government revenues. We have not so accepted cocaine, marijuana, hashish, LSD or heroin, though they are demonstrably doing no more harm than booze to the individual who abuses them.

In 1919, appalled by the ravages of alcohol, the Americans made the sale of alcoholic drinks illegal. Gangsters took over, became enormously wealthy, defied the law when they could not corrupt it. People boozed as much or more than before. So the law banning the sale of alcohol was repealed. Alcohol still destroys people and families. Youngsters who do not have the legal right to buy drink still manage to buy it and we do next to nothing to stop them.

Consider also tobacco. Health statistics show that 35,000 Canadians die each year as a result of smoking. They die painfully, horribly and very expensively. Yet governments allow the sale of tobacco and only demand that a small warning appear on cigarette packages. Revenues from the tax on tobacco sales are huge.

Morally and logically, there is no difference between allowing people to harm themselves drinking booze or smoking tobacco and allowing them to take drugs such as cocaine, heroin, marijuana or hashish.

The problems of who would sell the drugs legally and which drugs and who would have a right to buy would be no different for decriminalized drugs than they are for the alcohol and tobacco that can now be sold legally. There will always be people with underdeveloped survival instincts who ingest something, however dangerous, banned or not. The ban makes no difference. Human stupidity on such issues is astounding at any age. The young will always want to buy something before they are legally allowed to do so: breaking the rules makes them feel grown-up. And adults do not sound convincing when they condemn drug use but allow the sale of alcohol and tobacco: the young are quick to think of their elders as hypocrites. This is not a minor matter. We must consider seriously young people's opinion of the laws.

Then there are the addicts who need psychological and medical help. When drugs are criminalized, addicts are afraid to seek help and they sink deeper and deeper into their habit, as the Le Dain Commission of Inquiry into the Non-Medical Use of Drugs observed. Addicts who inject themselves intravenously are afraid to buy clean syringes or ask for help, for fear of the police. By sharing needles, they can now catch AIDS and give it to others.

But our half-hearted, ineffectual war on drugs has diverted attention from health concerns and underlying social problems. Actually, some sociologists consider a war on drug users an act of social injustice.

Drug use has been going down, these sociologists say, rising only among the disadvantaged. Statistics Canada reported in 1988 that the incidence of drug crime (mostly charges of possession of a narcotic) declined in the 1980s, and the 62,000 drug offences recorded by the police in 1987 represented less than 2 per cent of all recorded offences that year. Between 1980 and 1987, the number of people charged with drug offences fell 30 per cent from a total of 62,000 to 43,000. Experts on addiction believe that drug abuse is going down among high school students and the general population. But as a result of falling prices, particularly of cocaine, the one group increasing its use is the disadvantaged. All of which must be taken with a pinch of salt because all statistics on drugs are unreliable, as every statistician admits. This "enemy" mentality helps to justify sanctions that are sometimes cruel, very costly and totally ineffective at solving any underlying problems. For example:

● (1430)

—A district court judge orders a divorced mother of five to leave her four-bedroom apartment in a public housing complex within a week because she knew her cousin was selling crack in the complex.

—An unemployed grandmother faces eviction from her Metro Toronto Housing Authority town house because her sons have been involved since 1980 in illegal drug transactions.

Both these women are clearly casualties of the current "war on drugs." It is appalling treatment, bordering on abuse. They have committed no crime and yet are being punished. The startling aspect of these cases is that the enforcers have the public's support.

According to sociologists, the law-and-order approach to fighting drugs has led to a dearth of treatment programs for drug abuse. No amount of jail time, fines or probation orders is going to help a person get over a drug problem. Indeed, past studies show that being treated like a criminal often makes a user's problem worse.

"We are seeing a new youth who is unconcerned with sanctions, unconcerned with consequences, a youth who lives on the streets and fears nothing—fears nothing largely because of drugs." (Gordon Hogg, counselor at a British Columbia youth detention centre, White Rock, B.C.)

The view that drugs cause crime is not supported in the professional literature. Studies show that some form of juvenile delinquency generally precedes drug use; and studies of adult addicts also show criminal behaviour most often precedes drug addiction.

However, other researchers say that among the young, criminal behaviour does not necessarily precede drug addiction: peer pressure is often the reason a youngster tries drugs—the need to be cool, like other young drug takers.

Young offenders frequently have no traditional supports because of family breakdown, alcoholism and abuse, or because they have dropped out of school. How can we ignore these factors and simply blame drugs, sociologists ask?

So what do we do? Do we listen to the sociologists who study crime or do we say that they tend to see all criminals as victims, rejecting the possibility that there may be people, even young people, who are not victims but who are stupid enough to take drugs because their stupid peers do? It is a question many will ask, but it is not relevant to our problem.

Our problem is that we cannot keep drugs out of the market. That being the case, some version of the steps we have recommended should be seriously considered as an alternative to our current, ineffectual or war on drugs:

(1) Try to convince the world's major banking countries to launch a real war on drug lords, uncovering their funds and confiscating them. But this should be done without intruding into the lives of honest citizens. Whatever else we do, we cannot allow the drug lords to get away with what they have done and are doing. We must confiscate as much of their illicit wealth as possible. We cannot let them keep the money with which they are able to fight a veritable war against the government of Columbia, to corrupt the justice system in many countries, to turn battalions of disadvantaged youths into criminals and to fight gang wars in major cities.

(2) Our governments should take over the sale of drugs, much as they now sell alcohol or allow the sale of tobacco. Buying a drug from the government store would not be a criminal offence, but a purchaser would have to prove that he or she belongs to one of the provincial health services. Buying drugs from unauthorized dealers would be considered criminal drug trafficking, and both seller and buyer would be subject to heavy penalties, including prison, confiscation of automobiles and whatever else hurts. Selling to minors would be an even more serious crime, with intent to cause bodily harm.

The government sales centres would be equipped with giant video screens showing the behaviour of terminal drug addicts and recommending to buyers that they get free counselling and treatment to break their habit. No buyer would be able to get more than a reasonably small amount of drug. They would have to show proof of identity if they looked too young.

(3) The government would import and process the drugs. It would buy locally grown marijuana. A grower selling marijuana to any buyer other than the government would be committing a serious criminal offence. Admittedly, this would leave many questions unanswered. Would the government sell crack, which kills some people the first time they take it? This is like asking whether the government would sell wood alcohol in its liquor stores. It does not. But there are still people stupid enough to drink it. Not much can be done about such people, whatever their age, beyond redoubling the volume, effectiveness and credibility of our information effort. Nevertheless, there will always be people who are suicidally stupid and will ingest substances they know to be lethal.

(4) It would also be a serious crime to take any drug, alcohol included, while performing any task in which a clear mind is needed to prevent accidents: driving any vehicle on land, air or sea; operating machinery; performing surgery and so on. People acting as if they were impaired would be legally obliged to pass a drug test.

(5) Drugs sold by governments would be taxed as alcohol and tobacco are and would be a major source of revenue used to finance the other parts of this program, including law enforcement. Money confiscated from the bank accounts of drug dealers would also be used in the same way.

(6) These policies must be pursued in combination with other steps recommended in this book to provide employment and training to the jobless; to teach the young skills that will allow them to have a good life. To the extent that we reduce the numbers of young jobless, we might reduce the numbers of these who allegedly take drugs out of despair. And we must have readily accessible treatment for those who are controlled by the drugs they take.

The drug problem is a health problem. Unfortunately, it is also a criminal problem and we cannot pretend otherwise. We must deal with both aspects.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, on a question of privilege, I am told Senator Murray spoke to the press outside this chamber and said that what I was doing was fraudulent. If he says that is not true, I will accept his statement.

This is a book I have written. It has been published in English. I submitted it in French to the French publishing houses, and they did not think that the book on Canadian unity and how to achieve unity would be saleable, and they did not print it.

● (1440)

I am writing another book which I will dedicate to you, Senator Murray, and I will give any royalties to a charity of your choice. The title of that book in French is Postulons un Québec indépendant: La conversion amère d'un québéçois de laine impure. The rough translation is: Let us postulate an independent Quebec, the bitter conversion of a Quebecer of impure blood. The book is based on the premise that the Mulroney government will lead to the break-up of this country within the next two years. I am pessimistic because of the incompetence and trickiness of its Prime Minister and his apprentice to the apprentice sorcerer, Senator Murray.

I am a Quebecer and I will have to live in a new country. My nationality will be changed. In that book I intend to ask: How can an independent Quebec get along and have relations with whatever is left of Canada, in one piece or otherwise? It is a bitter book to write, because I love Canada, but I cannot help it. I intend to be a Quebecer. I will be a Quebecer and not a Canadian, and not both, because of that man there and his boss, that man who prevaricated all through the negotiations on the Meech Lake Accord, who said one thing in Quebec and another thing in the rest of the country, like his Prime Minister.

This man has the gall to accuse me of being fraudulent.

An Hon. Senator: What are you talking about?

Senator Gigantès: This is a point of privilege. To be fraudulent, I would have had to try and make some money out of my activities as a senator. I published a book in 1988 entitled: Is The Free Trade Deal Really For You? It was almost entirely based on a very long speech I made in the Senate. It also appeared in French. It states in the book that any royalties from that book will go to pay for scholarships. I do not make a single penny. As I say, I pay my taxes and I have not been engaged in any shady business activities, like so many other people whom I will not mention.

My privilege has been grossly attacked by the statements of Senator Murray. If indeed he has made such statements outside the chamber and from their notes members of the press can show me that he has, I shall sue him in civil court for having defamed me. It is defamatory to say that someone has done something fraudulent when no fraud is involved. He should not judge other people by the company he keeps.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will read the honourable senator's remarks in Hansard to see whether there is a matter of privilege to which I should respond.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to rise on a point of order, if I may, to comment upon where we are in the business of the Senate. In the normal course, we would continue with debate on Senator Doody's motion until we could move the adjournment under the new rules at 5:45 p.m. We would then resume tomorrow at 2 p.m. and continue until 5:00 p.m., at which time we would move an adjournment for the weekend.

It had been my intention, and it was signalled by the Deputy Leader today, that we would permit this motion to be carried not later than late tomorrow afternoon so that third reading could be moved and we could begin on our amendments on Monday. That is what our intention had been. It was not our intention to prolong this debate on this particular motion into next week. However, that is what we are facing unless we interrupt that scenario.

What I propose, if the Leader of the Government finds favour with this, and I think he might, is that today we could agree to have the motion on third reading carry in order to get to Orders of the Day. Third reading could then be moved and the session then suspended until 2:00 p.m. Monday when I would begin by moving the first amendment. We on this side would be agreeable to that procedure. We would welcome the additional time for the preparation of our amendments. We are aware that the Senate has been under considerable pressure in the last several days and I believe that this alternative might meet the objectives of both sides of the house.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there have been discussions between the Leader of the Opposition and me on this matter. I have considered the matter and consulted with colleagues on this side. I have also considered the alternative, which is to continue with the present debate through tomorrow. Considering the alternative, this proposal is, in my opinion, manifestly superior—no offence meant to any honourable senators opposite. I left here at eleven o'clock last night and returned at 6:30 this morning, as have a number of honourable senators.

I take it then that my motion that we move to Orders of the Day would be put by Your Honour now and would carry on division. Senator Kelly is ready to move the third reading of Bill C-62 after which, if it is agreeable, we could suspend under the provisional rules until Monday at two o'clock.

MOTION TO CALL ORDERS OF THE DAY—CONCURRED IN, ON DIVISION

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer that the Orders of the Day be now called. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

• (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to take the adjournment and begin the debate on Monday.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that debate be adjourned until Monday at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, Debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that all other orders be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, under Provisional Rule P-1(a), with leave of the Senate, I move that this sitting be suspended until Monday, November 5, at 2 p.m.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I support the motion, but I don't think it needs to be done under the provisional rules, because it is a mix-up between the Thursday and Friday. Why not just move that we suspend until Monday at 2 o'clock?

Senator Murray: Yes. I so move.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the motion is to suspend the sitting until 2 o'clock in the afternoon on Monday next. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until Monday, November 5, at 2 p.m.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I thought you might have called Presentation of Petitions first. We were all waiting eagerly for that opportunity. However, we will postpone that pleasure until a later date, possibly tomorrow when we return to the routine proceedings.

Under the provisional rules that we have adopted, we will be asking to have the vote on the question on the amendment which I will be proposing deferred until tomorrow. It may be unnecessary to defer a decision until tomorrow if the government would accept the amendment immediately. Of course, that is a lot to expect, but we were encouraged this morning to hear Senator Castonguay tell us that the government would consider reasonable amendments, that reasonable amendments would be carefully considered and any effort to improve the bill would be accepted in good faith.

Honourable senators, if there is a single amendment that would qualify under that particular description, it is the one that I propose to move today to Bill C-62. It is a simple amendment and one which has universal appeal. It has to do with what can broadly be described as reading materials.

Even the Prime Minister, in his visit to British Columbia, expressed the view that he himself had concerns about the imposition of a tax on reading materials, particularly books like the Bible, and reading materials in general.

The acceptance of such an amendment at this stage would give a signal that the government indeed is truly concerned about the views of the Canadian public on such an important matter as reading materials. It would be too much to expect at this stage to ask the government to withdraw the GST, although many Canadians would appreciate that decision; but I do not think it is too much to ask the government to consider a number of important amendments.

Honourable senators, I am sure, are fully familiar with the current situation with respect to reading materials. It was explained fully before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce by representatives who appeared before the committee and by a submission which was delivered to the committee in respect of the proposed goods and services tax on behalf of the Don't Tax Reading Coalition. The Don't Tax Reading Coalition represented the following organizations: Antiquarian Booksellers Association of Canada, The Association of Canadian Publishers, The Canadian Book Publishers' Council, The Canadian Booksellers Association, The Canadian Community Newspapers Association, The Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association, The Canadian Library Association, The Canadian Magazine Publishers Association, The Canadian Teachers' Federation, the Canadian University Press, and Periodical Marketers of Canada. A patron of the Don't Tax Reading Coaltion is Mr. Stephen Lewis.

Honourable senators who have not had an opportunity to read this submission will find it interesting, and that it covers most of the pertinent information that any senator would require in deciding whether there is merit in the request of the coalition and in the amendment which I intend to propose. I do not intend to take a long time addressing this subject because a number of other senators on this side wish to speak and because the matter is really fairly simple and clear cut.

In the testimony which was presented before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, it was made very clear that books and similar materials, printed materials, are not presently subject to any federal sales tax at any stage during their manufacture. They are free totally from the burden of taxation.

In the presentation to the committee, the coalition asked that the government maintain the present position. There is no federal sales tax on any aspect of the production of a book or printed material. As was pointed out by witnesses, there is no federal sales tax on the paper, the binding or the colour separation that is involved in production of printed material. In fact, the testimony went further and pointed out for example, that there was no federal sales tax on the purchase of printing equipment.

The lead speaker for the coalition before the committee said:

> Not even on the capital costs of the purchase of printing equipment. Except for a very small percentage of what we might buy in terms of office equipment, furniture or supplies, we incur no FST at the moment. We are zero all the way from the bottom to the end product.

That is the present situation. Under the proposed GST, all printed material would be subject to a 7 per cent sales tax and, in the view of the witnesses before the committee, if harmonization took place they would probably face a possible tax of up to 15 per cent. They have appealed to the committee and the Senate to listen to their representations and to propose an amendment that would delete the application of the tax to printed materials.

Honourable senators will understand that there is an exemption, for example, on textbooks, if those textbooks are bought by an institution. Textbooks purchased by an institution will be subject to the tax, but they will be eligible for a rebate; and witnesses stated that the rebate would not cover the full extent of the tax itself but might amount to only about 4 per cent, and that the recipient of the rebate would be the institution, not necessarily the purchaser of the textbook. Whatever may apply, and whatever the inequities of this particular tax on institutions, the tax will fully apply to textbooks purchased by students. I believe it was the manager or executive director of the book store at the University of Toronto who made the comment about the tax that would be placed on a student entering any book store at a university to purchase textbooks. They would be fully taxed.

It was interesting that, in the discussion which was participated in by a number of senators who are present here, that reference was made to the dollar limit that is usually suggested at universities and high schools on the amount that students ought to spend on textbooks. Senator Marsden pointed out that at the University of Toronto the dollar limit on textbooks is $700. The question was asked, "What will be the impact on this dollar limit?" The answer was that the dollar limit of $700 will not be changed but, because of the application of the tax, fewer books will be available to the student who is working under this dollar limit. It seems that it is unnecessary for any of us to argue at length about the undesirability of applying a tax to the purchase of textbooks, particularly for students in all the institutions of learning throughout the country. I think we can all agree that that is not a good thing.

● (1410)

In his comments, Senator David stated, "As Senator Marsden said, books for students should have a special status." But they do not have a special status under this particular bill now before us.

In that context, Senator David went on to raise a very interesting question with respect to Canadian magazines to the effect that these are commercial magazines that sell advertising and have commercial revenue. He asked why they should be tax free, as he inferred students ought to be. I thought the answer was very interesting from the point of vue of those in the industry. The answer was to the effect that the number of successful commercial magazines in Canada was indeed very limited, that the average profit margin, if I remember correctly, was about 2 per cent or 3 per cent, and that any additional burden on the magazine industry would be a burden that might be very serious indeed.

I think I should read the comment made by Mr. Jeffrey Shearer, President of Telemedia Publishing and President of the Canadian Magazine Publishers' Association, who said:

> We wish that magazines were more a commercial business than they are—commercial in the sense that they produce strong and healthy profits for magazines across the country. The reality is that they do not. The average magazine produces a 2 per cent or 3 per cent profit margin. Many operate at a loss or break-even point.
> . . . we compete directly with American titles both on the newsstands and by subscription. We are all at what we consider to be the highest price at which we can maintain our circulation. What we believe and what all our modelling has done on the impact of the GST demonstrates that we will lose circulation, that our ability to amortize our magazine over a smaller circulation base will erode, that advertising dollars will be less because circulation is less and that, over all, the business will weaken. At 2 per cent or 3 per cent you do not have to have many revenue-weakening dollars to end up with a net loss. So the ultimate fact is that the GST imposes an enormous negative impact on magazines—enormous in the sense as it affects subscriptions, newsstand prices, and even as it affects advertising.

I did not read any evidence that would contradict the assertion by the representative of the Canadian Magazine Publishers' Association; but what ought to be borne in mind is that in addition to the magazines which we normally identify as magazines—for instance, Maclean's or Time—there are other periodicals and magazines that are more of a literary, educative or historical nature. It was Mr. Mozersky who said:

> For every one successful Maclean's, Time or Chatelaine, there are literally hundreds of periodicals, journals, scholarly and literary publications that one does not see on the newsstands that are no different from essential scholarly works or the kinds of books that institutions are buying for their students. We make no distinction. The printed word is the printed word. True, some magazines are successful in the commercial sense, but the vast majority of them are not and have no commercial impetus behind them. They are educative. They are fulfilling a mandate, whether it be social, political or literary. They are magazines, journals and periodicals that fulfil a very important function in our society.

I doubt whether those who framed this tax, which is of such general application, were able to discern clearly at the beginning the many effects that the tax would have. One effect that was surely not intended was that which would place a burden upon the magazine publishing industry, which is not a robust industry to such an extent that its work will be seriously hampered.

I do not know what honourable senators think about newspapers, but the witnesses refused to draw any distinction between newspapers and other printed materials. They argued that newspapers should receive the same treatment as magazines or textbooks, that they were in the field of opinion and that newspapers were, if I may again quote from one of the witnesses:

> ... the symbol of freedom of speech and freedom of expression and therefore they should remain untouched. But they happen to fall into the category of the printed word. Therefore we are not splitting hairs. We say the printed word includes magazines, books, periodicals and newspapers.

That is the argument. What will the Senate think of it? What will the Senate say to the textbook question, the magazine question and the newspaper question? What will the Senate say to the competition which the Canadian publishing industry will receive from the United States?

I understand that much of the business they do depends upon the distribution in Canada of books that are imported from other countries. These will attract the GST immediately upon crossing the border. They worry about the burden of the inventory which they will have to carry before these books are disposed of. That is another effect which I am sure was not intended or foreseen by those who framed the tax.

● (1420)

I found it interesting that reference was made to the level playing field and whether a level playing field had been achieved in this industry.

In the magazine publishing business and book publishing business, Canadians face a competitor in the United States which does not carry a 7 per cent burden of GST. When it comes to subscribers and the whole subscription business, which is 90 per cent of our circulation, we will have the 7 per cent disadvantage. That 7 per cent disadvantage against our American counterparts, who already have the economies of scale that are 10 and 20 times as large as ours, will just add another burden to make it difficult to maintain a healthy or existing periodical industry in this country.

These are the main points that were made before the committee, and they were repeated in the committee's report.

There was no contrary evidence that I could find that successfully rebutted the main arguments that were put forward. It seems reasonable to us that an amendment, that would restore, in a sense, the status quo, that would protect or safeguard printed materials against the GST, would be appropriate. It would maintain a system that is presently in effect in Canada and, at the minimum, would give a fighting chance to the publication industry in Canada.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

> That Bill C-62 be not now read the third time but that the Schedule of the Bill be amended, on page 342, to make provision for reading material by adding to Schedule VI, and numbering accordingly, a new heading and Part as follows:
> "READING MATERIAL
> 1. A supply of a book, periodical literature or other reading material."

[Senator MacEachen.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honorable senators, how long can a government get away with pushing everyone around without listening to anyone, ruining entire sectors of the economy without the tiniest bit of compassion and jeopardizing our culture while ignoring the pleas of the authors, poets, editors and distributors?

"Quousque tandem abutere Catilina patientia nostra?"

In spite of the largest ever general outcry, in spite of the advice of experts in all fields and circles, including the business circles, in spite of the recession which will make even crueller the consumption tax, the Conservative government is stubbornly going ahead with its suicidal plan for imposing the GST at all costs ...

In their hundreds of thousands of letters, phone calls and especially petitions, Canadians have sent us senators a clear message: "Elected or not, you are required under the Constitution to improve bills, whenever possible, or to block them in the case of repressive, unfair and immoral legislation.

It is therefore our duty to oppose with all our might the GST and to use all the legal means the procedure affords us to delay ad infinitam a vote on this bill. Each day, more and more Canadians understand the disastrous effects the GST will have on our fragile economy. Each day that goes by sees a growing number of Canadians oppose the GST, as indicated in the Gallop polls. In September 1989, 72 percent of Canadians indicated clearly their opposition to this flawed bill. Four months later, in January 1990, the opposition had grown to 74 percent. In the most recent poll, published on November 1st, 76 percent of Canadians say no to the GST, with a 92 percent peak in Atlantic Canada.

On this side of the Senate, we are determined to keep up fighting, to continue showing the people the negative impact of the goods and services tax. And one day, Gallup polls will tell us that only a very small percentage of Canadians are in favour of the GST. They will be the inveterate supporters of the GST. I would say that the names of Brian Mulroney, Michael Wilson may be, and Laurent Thibault, president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, would be in that category.

In the next few days, weeks or may be months—who knows?—Liberal senators and probably some independents, may be some Conservative troubled by their conscience, will be denouncing the most odious aspects of this already infamous bill.

As far as I am concerned, I will limit myself to talking about the catastrophic impact of the GST on the book industry. Newspapers and magazines will be hit as well, but it is the book which is the base of our cultural development.

• (1430)

I will probably use freely the most remarquable submissions received by the committee so ably and patiently chaired by Senator Sidney Buckwold. Just the presence of Senator Simard opposite is enough to test anyone's patience, and we all congratulate him.

I will quote publishers, booksellers, journalists, authors, but I will try not to mention my own experience in this field, except to say that I probably published more than 1000 articles in dailies, weeklies and magazines, including a polical weekly that I founded and published for five years; that I authored 25 books; that I founded a bookstore, a book club, book distribution companies and two publishing companies which have published more than 800 books in fifteen years, with Pierre Tisseyre, J. Z. Léon Patenaude, and several others, to develop in Quebec and Canada a book industry which in the early 60s was still in its infancy.

As an example, I would simply remind you that, in those days, when I started working in the publishing business, in all of Quebec you could only find about twenty bookstores, and they sold essentially books imported from France. Today, there are more that 400 bookstores, and books published in French in Canada are not relegated to some obscure corner anymore. In thirty years, the publishing industry has made giant strides in Quebec and the rest of Canada, as you will see by the numbers that I will quote later.

I will especially emphasize the doubly catastrophic situation of this industry in Quebec, although it is not very reassuring either in the rest of Canada. For example, this is what Lysiane Gagnon wrote in La Presse of October 20th:

> Until now, books were not taxed in Canada.

Some of us may be not fully aware of that. Never since Confederation has any tax been imposed on books. I quote further from Lysiane Gagnon:

> "Everything will change within a year. The GST will put a 7 per cent tax on books. To which Quebec will add its own 8 per cent tax. All at once, the price of books will go up 15 per cent or rather almost 16 per cent, since the provincial tax will be calculated on the after GST amount.
> Booksellers and publishers are, rightly, in a state of alert. They forecast a 25 per cent decrease in sales and expect that publishers will be less inclined to "take chances".

I must tell you that this is an anglicism that Lysiane Gagnon herself put in brackets. In French, you should have said "take risks". However, I read a quote and by the brackets, I assume that Lysiane Gagnon knew she was taking risks with the French language.

> . . . Only guaranteed bestsellers will be published. The next Réjean Ducharme whose manuscript will raise doubts will have to be published at the author's expense. Or else stop writing."

Of course, many culturally-oriented magazines—MacLean and l'Actualité will probably get by—will not survive the GST.

The letters, documents and briefs opposing the GST in general and especially as it applies to books and magazines are so numerous and of such high quality that it would be difficult to quote even their most essential parts. If there is an industry which is unanimously against the GST, it is the book industry. As evidence of this, here is a partial list of associations which have indicated their opposition to a bill which would destroy all the progress accomplished over the past 30 years. Although incomplete, this list deserved to be heard. I have just received an updated version which is twice as long, but I will dispense with it, limiting myself to the one I had here already.

Association des Éditeurs, Société des éditeurs de manuels soclaires du Québec, Union des écrivains québécois, Union des éditeurs de langue française, an international organization, International Publishers Association—which is not stricly French—Association des éditeurs de périodiques culturels québécois, Association québécoise des salons du livre, Association des distributeurs exclusifs de langue française, Association des librairies du Québec, Association québévoise des presses universitaires, Corporations of Professional Librarians of Quebec, Association pour l'avancement des sciences et des techniques de documentation, National Catholic Communications Center, Canadian Magazine Publishers Association, Communication Jeunesse, British Columbia Library Association, Association of Canadian Publishers, Canadian Book publishers' Council, Canadian Booksellers Association, Canadian Community Newspaper Association, Canadian Library Association, Canadian Teachers' Federation, Canadian University Press, Periodical Marketers of Canada, The University of Toronto student's administrative council . . .

As I told you, a few days ago I received a list which is twice as long, but I will spare you.

Allow me however to quote a few passages from the excellent brief of the Conseil consultatif de la lecture et du livre:

> The publishing industry is the oldest of all activities now described as cultural industries. However we will have to wait for the industrial revolution if we want the organization of the work to be comparable with what it is today, complete with a division and specialization of duties.
> There are various stages in the production of a book, beginning with creation and on through the distribution of the product. The creation stage, that is the work of authors and translators, gets the production process under way. The second stage, editing and publishing, is the major activity of the editor who runs the risk . . . oftentimes.

For oftentimes it is an incredible and extraordinary risk in Quebec . . .

of publishing a text proposed or written at his request. The following stage includes the publicity work required to make the book known, as well as the distribution operations to get the book to the sales point or to the consumer in cases or direct sales. At the end of the process the book reaches the public in one of three ways: through sales point, particularly book stores . . .

. . . but certain types of books can be found in smoke shops, department stores, drug stores, and so on.

. . . or in libraries, or through the mail and book clubs.

Until the 1960s the Quebec publishing industry was concentrated in major teaching or near-teaching institutions where some of the major collections are the very foundation of our culture.

Also, up until then, the major distribution networks, especially those dealing with general literature, belonged to foreign interests.

During the sixties and the seventies, Quebec companies publishing both specialized and non-specialized works, grew in number. Soon, every niche of our market would be represented by national products published by Quebec firms. That was true for works of fiction as well as non-fiction. Many creative people could better reach their public just as the first generations of publishers were becoming more professional and anxious to increase their share of the market, so far dominated by French publishing companies, not to mention the competition on this small market coming from English publishers, both Canadian and American.

That is something people often find amazing when Canadian publishing is discussed abroad. No market is as much sought after as the Quebec market for the simple reason that, being bilingual, most Quebec readers have readily access to two large cultures, the French and the English. That means that they have direct access to the American production, which is enormous, largely through pocket book format, as well as to English literature from Great Britain, Australia and, of course, English Canada. Furthermore, we are also faced with strong competition, in our own language, from the French industry, one of the largest in the world, not to mention, to a lesser degree, but nevertheless a significant one, the competion coming from Belgium, Swiss and even Monaco in specific areas.

Today, only 33 per cent of French general fiction books on the Quebec market are produced by Quebec publishers.

Only 33 per cent! Imagine what it was like in the 60s!

"In the Seventies and Eighties, another battle started: the take-over and consolidation of distribution networks. Although the situation is still far from ideal, an increase in national distribution agencies and take-overs of major foreign agencies have brought about profound changes in the Quebec publishing sector.

But what about our marketing infrastructure? If we consider traditional distribution networks, European French-language imports have long benefited, as we said before, from the fact that distribution networks in Quebec were a monopoly of major French publishing groups. This was a real obstacle for Quebec publishers, most of whom had to use the distribution networks of their French competitors. Take-overs of foreign distribution agencies and the creation of new Quebec agencies have been a first step towards genuine control over our own market.

At the next marketing level, we find bookstores and a network of small sales outlets.

And, as I said earlier, sometimes some of the major newsstands, smoke shops or drugstores.

After the 1972 order in council, the number of bookstores in Quebec increased significantly, not only in the big cities but also in the regions . . .

This is of course a provincial order in council. It would take too long to explain, but it was a measure to help bookstores become more or less viable.

Nowadays, there are between 300 and 350 bookstores in Quebec, and the five chains own close to 50 more.

That is over 400 all in all.

More than 80 per cent of certified bookstores are independant concerns. But all bookstores do not derive the majority of their intake from the sale of books; several of them also sell stationary.

That helps them survive.

There is also a network of sales outlets other than bookstores like drugstores, smoke shops, convenience stores and department stores. In these 2,000 to 6,000 stores, they mostly push pocket books and practical books.

You will not find any great literature in this kind of store but only at the 350 or 400 professional booksellers.

This network is needed for comprehensive coverage of the market, but its operation is costly and its potential is but partially developed by many publishers in Quebec

As to the printers, very few of them print only books. And the network of libraries is unfortunately very poor in Quebec.

I think that the GST will deal a fatal blow to the book industry.

The economic significance of all the players in this industry should not be overlooked. Income generated by those businesses contribute an important capital to the economy. Registered libraries contribute some $125 million and publishers $75 million. Although no figures are available on distributors, it can be assumed that their income totals at least $100 million.

Thus, income in the book industry as a whole can be estimated at more that $300 million annually. This is a very conservative estimate because the income of non professional booksellers and of foreign publishers in Quebec is not included.

Because salaries in the book industry are not high, it generates more jobs than an industry about the same size but with a larger payroll.

● (1440)

It is particularly surprising to see how low salaries are in bookstores and publishing houses. The reason, I think, is quite simple: the product sold by these so-called businesses is not similar to other products. Moreover, working with books even at a ridiculous salary is often more interesting than having a better pay to sell products other than books.

"Publishing houses have a very important cultural place in Quebec. They have a vital influence on book contents and readers' tastes. Their contribution to cultural life and education is also of the utmost importance.

However . . .

and God knows I learned that.

. . . this is shaky industry. Shaky because it is a young industry which does not have control of its entire infrastructure; shaky because it lacks needed capital since almost 80 percent of publishers and 75 per cent of bookstore owners have incomes of less than $1 million; shaky because its market is too small to allow economies of scale and because of the strength of foreign competition.

That is often forgotten but according to the United Nations standards, a publishing industry cannot be viable in a country of fewer than 10 million people speaking the same language. In Quebec, even including those few on the outside, we are about six million. As I explained earlier, those six million are very fortunate, as far as book readers are concerned at least, to be bilingual and have access to two great literatures, which reduces further the part of the market that remains for the purely French language Quebec publishing sector.

The strength of foreign publishing

. . . must not be neglected

. . . is also manifested in book clubs. Almost all book clubs in Quebec are foreign-owned. Apart from the fact that all benefits realized on the national market escape Quebecers, strictly speaking, no benefit accrue to our publishing companies from the existence of those clubs that feature few of our books. In fact, the Quebec content in the catalogue of Québec-Loisirs, a subisdiary of France-Loisirs and the most important French language book club in Quebec, varies between 8 and 10 percent while, as we have seen, the real performance of Quebec books amount to 33 percent of the market.

Thus, Quebec books account for 33 percent of the market but, in the largest book club of the province of Quebec, scarcely 8 to 10 percent of the books that are proposed to the readers are from Quebec.

"On the other hand, since the average period of time that books remain in bookstores is considerably reduced now, an average of 3 to 6 months . . .

At the end of which the bookseller says to the publisher: "Take back your books because we are expecting new ones.

. . . Quebec publishers must constantly increase the amount of new releases, with the important investments it involves, and forget about the establishment of a publishing fund they absolutly need to make their investments profitable.

Although Quebec publishers are exporting an increasing number of their books, those exportations now represent no more than 5 percent of all the sales of our publishing industry.

Despite all the efforts which have been made and which started at the time I was getting myself into the publishing business in the late 50s or early 60s, all kinds of operations undertaken to try and sell our books abroad failed or were extremely difficult and not profitable. As for the French, of course we have to understand that there are three things they do not like imported from abroad: perfumes, wines and books. They think, not without reason, that they produce themselves and provide the rest of the world with the best in those three areas. The fact remains nonetheless that the result for the moment may not be very satisfactory with only 5 per cent of the total sales of our publishing industry going abroad, mostly to France.

The difficulty inherent in benefitting from these rights can be explained by the fact that Quebec publishers have so few outlets, and it is a significant loss of a source of income for all people involved in the book publishing industry, whereas European and American competitors take full advantage of these rights which account for interesting additional profits.

The weakness of our cinema industry and the extremely low CBC budgets which the government keeps paring down are all factors which contribute to reducing even more the opportunities for publishers to sell their rights to movie and TV producers.

With respect to publishing, it is a fact that government policies have played a significant, indeed a determining role in the growth of the book industry. This also needs to be said today because there is a long standing tradition—it goes as far back as I can recall—concerning books.

First, as I pointed out earlier, never has a tax been levied against books in this country. Not only that, but grants have been awarded to authors and sometines to publishers to help pay for translating and publishing books, particularly in the field of literary works.

It goes without saying that such initiatives on the part of both provincial and federal governments gave added currency to a belief which some people want to deny today, namely that books are not products like all others, that publishers and book sellers are not ordinary tradesmen but indeed key agents of culture dissimination at the most accessible level—books.

This has always been recognized by both levels of governments through a wide range of policies and supportive measures. I will not go into the fine details, but there was a great variety.

It is passing strange that practically overnight, now that we are beginnning to reap the benefits of this provincial and federal public policy, the government should say: Listen, provincial or federal government policies did make for some progress that enabled the industry to grow, but now we intend to do away with them all by introducing the GST.

Senator Simard: No way!

Senator Hébert: That is what I am saying, Senator Simard. When you deliver your brilliant speechy in a few minutes I hope you will try to show us to what extent the Conservative government is attuned to cultural matters, particularly the Quebec book publishing industry!

• (1450)

[English]

Senator Cools: Senator Simard cannot make a brilliant speech.

Senator Hébert: He cannot? Give him a chance; he may. We don't know.

[Translation]

Now listen to this, Senator Simard.

> In the last decade, the federal and provincial governments gave publishers tens of millions of dollars in direct and indirect subsidies. With that money, Quebec publishers were able to compete with foreign publishing companies on our domestic market.

Those grants may seem enormous, but for the publishers, a million dollar subsidy only represents 8 percent of their annual income. No one should believe that we were supporting them completely. With those subsidies, the governments made it clear they did not consider books just like any ordinary goods and publishers like mere merchants.

The 1972 Order in Council and the 1981 Act greatly enhanced the development of a network of licensed bookstores. I just referred to a couple of pieces of legislation in Quebec which were rather felicitous, since they helped bookstores build a solid base for survival.

On the other hand, investments in public and school libraries are far from meeting the minimal needs of their users. The Sauvageau and Bouchard reports made that very clear.

Why approve the GST in general, as the witnesses am I referring to did, but reject it when it comes to books? That's interesting, because the group I am talking about is not willing to abolish the GST totally. But they are totally against taxing books.

The industry cannot offset the negative impact of the tax by absorbing price increases resulting from the application of this tax. As was shown in a study conducted by Woods Gordon on the impact of a 15% GST on books (since in Quebec, it is 15%), Quebec publishers and bookstore owners will have to charge their customers that tax.

> They won't be able to absorb it themselves. Their profit margins are too narrow.
> Unfortunately, customers are not in a position to absorb the increase in publishing costs either. Although sales in bookstores have kept pace with retail sales, book purchases by the average Canadian family dropped 38 per cent during the period from 1978 to 1984. Furthermore, the worst impact will be on students and low-income families.
> The industry agrees that putting a new tax on books will cause sales to drop 25 per cent. Take Spain, for instance. The Conservatives kept reminding us that many if not most European countries had GSTs on everything and that we were lagging behind the times.

However, they seldom mentioned the example of Spain where a 6 per cent tax (the Canadian government is talking about 7 per cent which, combined with the Quebec tax, will add up to 15 per cent) resulted in a 25 per cent drop in sales.

This happened in Spain, with a 6 per cent tax.

> According to Woods Gordon, only the big text book publishers . . . Conservatives like to think big. The big corporations come first, and little guys can look after themselves!
> The big publishers of general fiction and text books . . .

The big guys will survive . . .

> The chains and big bookstores will survive the GST on books. All the others will collapse, sooner or later. We think that in this respect, the situation in the Quebec publishing industry reflects what is going on in the industry, across Canada.

The statement I just quoted was not made by a particular pressure group but by Woods Gordon, and concerns the situation in Canada generally.

So the situation will certainly not be better in Quebec.

> Those who do survive will see their net income drop by between 65 and 84 per cent, for publishers, and between 62 and 93 per cent, for bookstores.

You heard the figures.

> With a tax on books, the Quebec publishing industry will be wiped out, to all intents and purposes, and the Quebec book will cease to exist.
> Without thriving enterprises, the Quebec publishing industry will be a sitting duck for foreign take-overs. Here come France and the U.S.! This is what free trade means!
> It means that as far as publishing is concerned, Quebec will be back where it was 30 years ago. When I started in the publishing business, and I know what it was like 30 years back, the industry was dominated by foreign, often European and, increasingly, American interests.

In the 1960s, we had to fight against the Hachette publishing house which wanted to grab everything we had. They were battles on merit. We won these battles! Now, 30 years later, I just cannot understand this ill-advised and ill-conceived legislation which does not exempt books as is the case in most European countries the names of which are so often listed here. I just cannot understand that after 30 years everything we have fought for will be destroyed simply because of a lack of flexibility on the part of the people opposite. I should say on the government side because Conservative senators (or rather some of them) do not decide. They simply say "yes" in the caucus and then it is "bye-bye"!

In every country in world, except in Denmark—I hasten to say that in case Senator Simard would be nitpicking as usual! So, in every country except in Denmark, the tax on books has either been reduced or completely eliminated.

I suggest that this is worth repeating: "in every country in the world". Heaven knows how often we have been told that the value added tax was something normal which all civilized nations had adopted. That is right, but in every nation except Denmark, the tax on books has either been reduced or completely eliminated.

Hon. Paul David: Senator Hébert, could you tell us in how many countries the tax has been reduced compared to those where it has been completely eliminated? Could you do it some time, Senator Hébert?

Senator Hébert: I suggest that you have those figures because it was your side which constantly referred to foreign countries. I do not have these figures at this time. Don't worry, Doctor David, I will find them for you if they can shake a bit more your conscience which I feel is already weakened.

If this could help that I should provide you with the list of all the European countries which already have started reducing the tax of books, you can be certain that I will get their names for you within minutes following my speech.

Senator David: The tax reduced compared to what it was before?

• (1500)

Senator Hébert: Yes, compared to what it was before.

In Ireland, for instance, the elimination of the 10 per cent value added tax on books (10 per cent, that is quite a reduction!) resulted in a 10 per cent increase of sales over the following quarter.

That is not so bad when we realize that we are dealing here with books, and not potatoes or jet engines.

As you may have noted, the situation has improved considerably in Quebec. However, it remains precarious, and a tax such as that proposed by the government would result in a few months in the destruction of thirty years of hardwork by the Quebec cultural industry.

I should like to repeat here the comments made by the many authors and publishers who emphasized the negative effects the GST will have on the publishing industry: their forecasts are nightmarish. For instance, one third of all Quebec bookstores will close—are you denying that, Dr. David?

Senator David: I was not talking to you!

Senator Hébert: I am very sorry. I thought you wanted to say that such a disaster should never happen. Perhaps that is what you meant.

One third of all Quebec bookstores will close, not to mention the publishing houses which will go bankrupt.

All these little stores will disappear within three or four months following the introduction of the tax.

For a Conservative who associates constantly with the rich and the affluent—They say that such is the law of the market place that small publishing houses should go broke. The corner bookstores should disappear because they are insignificant as far as free competition is concerned.

Except that, small publishers are often the ones who bring us little marvels big publishers might overlook.

Small publishers take risks unheard of on behalf of writers they like and believe in.

The small insignificant bookstore often becomes the only cultural activity centre in a whole neighbourhood.

Let's not forget that a bookstore is not simply a plain business as one might think. It is an arts centre. It is a meeting place where ideas are exchanged, where literary discussions are held, where the mind is aroused.

So, if the bookstore disappears, it does not mean a plain business has vanished. It does mean that an arts centre has been destroyed. That is exactly what will happen with this bill.

Think of all these writers who will not find other small publishers to suit their convenience and who will be rejected by big publishers who would need larger numbers of copies for the new market created by the Mulroney government . . . Well, I let you add up the number of murdered Mozarts or, closer to us, murdered Marie-Claire Blais, murdered Réjean Ducharme, murdered Victor Lévy-Beaulieu, and many more.

In an article published in Le Devoir on Wednesday October 3, 1990, the author Jean Éthier-Blais, The newly reelected president of the Quebec chapter of the PEN CLUB, expressed his concerns in these terms, and I would like to quote him. This is an author speaking, not one of my party's supporters nor someone calling for the death of the Conservative Party, although 85 percent of the population are calling for it. What I mean is that this is his reaction as an author and nothing more.

> The double taxation of books will have a devastating effect on young authors . . .

That is to say the great authors of tomorrow.

> . . . because the publishers will not want to take risks any more.

There are limits to what can be expected of publishers. It is already difficult enough as it is to publish a young author's work. In the circumstances I described and will go on describing, that is going to become complete heroism. Such heroism is usually short-lived because it leads straight to bankruptcy.

> Come January, the price of books will go up . . .

Well, that is not sure yet.

> . . . by 15 percent (due to the increase in both the federal and provincial tax). Echoing many others who sounded the alarm, I suggest that, in reality, the increase will be closer to 30 percent, due in part to the lower sales and the higher printing costs.

> However, editors are not to be pitied too much, because . . .

Notice this is still the author speaking, and there is always, at least on the surface, a degree of agressivity or perhaps a somewhat agressive form of complicity between authors and publishers. I have often worked on both sides. Of course I know how authors react to their publishers, whom they always view as the ones with the money and the power. It always seems to the author that the publisher does not attend to them well enough.

● (1510)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): And without any literary savvy.

Senator Hébert: Indeed, without any literary savvy and who do not understand why their masterpieces gather dust on their shelves. I return to Mr. Blais's text:

> But editors are to be pitied the most because they are organized and hold some negotiating power with governments.

It is true that governments in the past listened to publishers. They listened to the Association des éditeurs de littérature générale. They listened to the Association des éditeurs de manuels scolaires. It is no longer true at the federal level. Right now nobody is listening to publishers. I know publishers' representatives tried to meet with senators on the other side today. They could meet none or very few. So Jean Éthier-Blais says publishers are organized and hold negotiating power with governments. Again I quote:

> For authors, on the other hand, things are very much different. At the publishers' they will come against a stone wall.
> A handful, five, ten at best, live by their pens.
> Let us try a comparison with other honourable professions, law, medecine and even journalism. According to Éthier-Blais, already in Quebec, there are maybe five authors, ten at best, who live by writing books, by their pens. Such a statement is an unbelievable acknowledgement of the poverty of a society. Quoting again:
> Others earn between $700 and $1,000 a year by their pens.

Seven hundred or a thousand dollars a year by their pens! Quoting still:

> —that does not allow for any luxury but it is status recognition.

A recognition of the status of the author, meaning that you may be starving but you nevertheless receive $700 a year in copyright and you can consider yourself having a status. You do not give away your books totally. So it is not a real income but a nominal and ironical recognition of your status. It goes on:

> . . . but it provides for a certain upgrading of the writing profession.

Listen, I have made $700 this year with my books. That is something. Mr. Blais goes on to say:

> The government shows disrespect toward intellectual activities. We rank among the slaves in that greedy society.

I saw that the word "money" stirred something on the other side. In fact, I am getting some information that senator David seemed to need urgently. I will try to make sense of this. The VAT in the European Community and taxes on books in Europe in 1990—this information is not too old. So in Germany, the normal rate is 14 per cent for the VAT and for books, it is 7 per cent. But there was no special low rate in 1990. There was one in the previous years, because the rate was lowered from 14 per cent to 7 per cent. In Belgium, the normal rate is 19 per cent and the rate on books is 6 per cent. In Denmark, the exception that I mentioned earlier, they kept a flat rate for books and other things. In Spain, where the normal rate is 12 per cent, the rate is 6 per cent on books. In France, where the normal rate is 18.6 per cent, it is 5.5 per cent on books. In Greece, where the normal rate is 16 per cent, it is 3 per cent on books. You see the difference in rates. You cannot say that the rates were lowered every year. In Ireland, the rate is 0 per cent on books, while the VAT is 25 per cent. In Italy, the normal rate of the VAT is 19 per cent.

You see what awaits us. They talk about 7 per cent, but you see where we are headed. The government read also those numbers. In some countries, rates are at 25 per cent now. The Conservatives are doing some small calculations. They are good at those. They say: Well, by God, we start at 7 per cent. They wanted to start at 9 per cent, but there was too much protest. They reduced the tax to 7 per cent. Someday, when people are used to it, they will increase it to 20 per cent and 25 per cent, like in Ireland.

In Italy, the general rate is 19 per cent and the rate on books is 4 per cent. In Luxembourg, the general rate is 12 per cent and the rate on books is 6 per cent. In the Netherlands, it is 18.5 per cent and on books, it is 6 per cent. In Portugal, the VAT is 17 per cent and on books—you are still taking notes, Senator David—0 per cent. In the United Kingdom, the general rate is 15 per cent and on books, 0 per cent.

Jean Éthier-Blais warns us that a decrease in book sales will affect literature first and foremost. It is clear that it is not the recipe books that will be affected first. It is evident that it is not the books which explain how to stop smoking in three days, or how to repair your garage at no cost, things like that, that we are talking about. We are talking about literature. That is what will be affected first.

It is not the worst, but the best literature that is always hurt first. I will give you a small personal example. I will not abuse of that because I told you I did not want to get too personal with my examples.

Marie-Claire Blais is certainly one of the most famous Quebec writers. There are others but nonetheless she was a big name a few years ago. She was a very young girl from Quebec City when she was discovered by chance by Father Georges-Henri Lévesque who had sensed in a letter she had written him that here was a great talent. As he was from Quebec City, he introduced her to a publisher of that city who published her first novel which was, I believe, Tête blanche.

I was not yet in the publishing business at that time, so it must have been in the 1950s. She was barely 20. It was already an outstanding book.

Then, she wanted to publish another book entitled Le Jour est noir. She submitted it to her publisher, a small publisher of Quebec City who thought: "This is a difficult book, I could not publish it, the risks are too high." That was how, because of this Quebec City publisher, Marie-Claire Blais came to the publishing firm I was running at that time, Les Editions du Jour, to show me her work entitled Le Jour est noir. I remember taking the manuscript home and finishing it in one night. In closing it, I said to myself: Here is a superb book, but not—as we say erroneously and in brackets—a commercial success. In other words, it will not sell. I nevertheless told myself: it is impossible not to publish such a book even if it does not sell.

Therefore I decided to publish 3,000 copies of it, which is the minimum number of copies for its selling price to be reasonable. I had copies in warehouses for I don't know how many years. Finally, when she published Une Saison dans la vie d'Emmanuel, that started obviously a whole process. She won the Médicis prize, one of the great literary prizes of France. Then, I had to reprint Le Jour est noir I had hesitated to publish some six years earlier. All that to tell you that a little publisher, in a difficult economic situation, will tend to reject a good book, even if he believes it is good, for fear of losing his shirt in publishing it.

In the context we can expect, if the GST is ever applied to books, publishers—whether we want it or not, this is often done in a subtle way, but it will be done—will favour practical books, recipe books, How to books, sure bestsellers. Even if we know they might not be great literary works, that is what will be happening. This is to tell you how the effects of this law are more insidious than one thinks. Publishers—we must understand them to an extent—will chose the safest investments.

So, faced with a manuscript like Le Jour est noir, by Marie-Claire Blais, a very difficult book, the publisher will say to himself, "I think we will wait until next year, when things are better." I will quote Jean-Éthier Blais who said:

> In literature, there are 90 per cent of just mediocre books and 10 per cent of good ones.

I can tell you that I have personal proof of that. It means that you must publish books that are not so good because the author is talented and if you don't publish his ou her first book—which will not sell and on which you will lose $2,000—this person will never become a good writer. This is the kind of decision a publisher must make all the time.

Very often people would ask me why I chose to publish a mediocre book by an unknown author when I knew I would lose money. Yes, I lost money but I think this author shows promise. There is in him or her the potential for a masterpiece. So, when you accept to publish a first book you invest in the future. Reginald Martel from La Presse and other critics will help teach the writer his or her job.

Do you think publishers will be tempted to do that in the new situation the federal government is offering them? I do not think so. This explains why it is not just a matter of money being lost, of jobs being lost in book stores, in the publishing trade and courier services. There is a human dimension to this problem that we must deplore. This is not what really matters in my opinion. What matters even more is the fact that all these talented writers and poets will never be published because of this tax.

As Mr. Éthiers-Blais said: you have 90 per cent of second-rate books for 10 per cent of good ones. The best ones could vanish with the not-so-good ones. And it is not the cook books or those on parapsychology which will disappear from the shelves. As I was telling you earlier, they will always be there. Do not worry, people will keep on cooking. There is no problem for the cooks.

Furthermore, the implementation of this new tax on books which, I must remind you, have always been tax free, will bring about at least a drop of 25 per cent in the sales. And that is not all: this drop in sales will have an effect on the number of copies which will be reduced also, and this will increase production costs which in turn will raise the retail price of books.

It is very easy to understand. In the 60s, I brought out a book called Le Jour est noir. Then, 3,000 copies were printed. Today it would probably be too many for a difficult to read book which, we know, wouldn't be a big seller. After the implementation of the GST, it means that we would have to restrict publication to about 1,500 copies. You know very well that the fewer the copies printed, the more expensive the book sale price will be.

In an aticle published in the Sunday, 30 September edition of La Presse under the byline of Bruno Dostie, Jean-Claude Lapierre, a bookseller from Verdun, not the most important bookseller in that town, he is just an average bookseller, was expressing very well the difficulties the booksellers will be faced with after the adoption of the GST. And I quote:

> The new GSTs—we are lucky in Quebec, we are distinct, we have two of them. 15.56% if both federal and provincial taxes are applied, as expected, on January 1st—will drive the nail into the coffin of the book industry.

Jean-Claude Lapierre is the owner of the book store Sons et Letters.

> The book is not isolated from the rest. It is an integral part of the world of consumption. Everything is tied together. Housing, transportation and food come first. As far as I am concerned, the reduction in social support of this summer, I felt it at the beginning of the school year.

People are growing poorer and who suffers from it before anyone else? The corner book store because, before buying books, one has to buy food, and buy clothing for children in order to send them to school. Books will be bought only if there is any money left.

The real question, for Mr. Lapierre, is how much money consumers will have in their pockets once they have paid everything, and I quote:

> It is not necessary to be a statistician to realize that we are in a recession. You need only take a walk on a commercial street or visit a shopping centre to see a great many stores with signs "to let" in their windows. Our sales are already down. First, the GST will apply to all sorts of things; then they will apply also to pieces of clothing and footwear. If, because of the Persian Gulf crisis, the prices of gas and fuel oil increase too, this will mean less money for us. Not to mention all the money the various levels of government are already taking out of the pockets of overtaxed consumers through income taxes, property taxes, lotteries, Hydro-Quebec dividends and all sorts of fines! Will there be any money left for books?

Jean-Claude Lapierre sees the application of these two GSTs from the concrete and daily point of view of an average businessman, already affected by the new legislation on opening hours and trying to earn a living in spite of the traffic and heavy competition of a commercial street, far from the cocktail discussions on the importance of reading.

I wonder if people realize what a bookstore means for a businessman like him who gets about 1,000 bills a month from his various suppliers. Each book is a different item. He may buy as many as ten copies of some books with a large run, but he has also a great many other objects in his bookstore, i.e. books. Therefore, an infinity of suppliers. So, for this man who is getting as many as 1,000 bills a month from his suppliers, the GST will be an unbelievable nightmare, because he has no computer: he cannot afford one. His business will get bogged down.

As I was saying, in such countries as Spain which imposed a 6 per cent tax on books, sales fell 25 per cent. On the other hand, in Ireland, sales increased 10 per cent after the government abolished its tax on books. These two examples should be enough to convince the 16 per cent of Canadians who are still resisting that the GST is a very bad piece of legislation, that should be killed without the slightest hesitation.

Along the same line of thought, last September the coalition against any kind of tax on books gave newspapermen a document on the social, cultural and economic impact of a tax on books. Coalition spokesmen held a press conference ealier today , and I must say the conference was well covered by the press. The conference was held in French because that delegation came from Quebec. Even so the English media were well represented. Allow me to quote a few particularly telling abstracts from their presentation.

> Access to books is one of the essential condition of an individual's intellectual development. It is a right to literacy, culture, information and education.
> From a social and cultural standpoint, taxing books is tantamount to harming the French language, impoverishing our culture—and, by the same token, society as a whole—and turning books into luxury products which only the wealthy can afford to buy.

By the way, wealthy people are not necessarily the most avid readers in a society. Earlier today I saw coalition representatives circulating a petition in some kind of a book whose rather interesting slogan was: Taxing books is encouraging ignorance!

> From a social and cultural standpoint, taxing books is taxing young people from poorer families. Book prices will become one more barrier preventing access to education and will worsen the drop-out trend among the secondary and high school student population. The tax will further weaken the already precarious situation of the French book publishing industry in Quebec and provide us with a front-row seat to witness the decline of written culture and the impoverishment of society as a whole.

Quebec culture therefore stands to lose as a result of this short-sighted economic measure; a book is neither a product nor a service but a tool to develop and increase one's knowledge.

Every study and every foreign experience have shown that a 1% increase in the retail price of books results in a decrease of up to 2.5% in sales.

A report published by Coopers & Lybrand Consulting Group, entitled "Consumers sensitivity to increases in book prices", prepared for the federal Department of Communications in August, 1986, and a study made by Woods Gordon, "Impacts of a multi-stage sales tax on book publishers, booksellers and periodical publishers", prepared in September 1987 for the Don't tax readin Coalition, an English coalition similar to the Quebec group I referred to earlier, showed that if the price of books was to increase by 20%, then 50% of book readers would stop buying new books.

Let's not forget our industry was able to develop thanks to the financial and political support it received from our governments. And that is why I think there is a huge contradiction between what is going on now and what the governments, both Liberal and Conservative, at the federal and provincial levels, have done for the book industry. Our industry, specially in Quebec, would never have been able to develop without the financial and political support from our governments, which have always recognized the importance and cultural value of the book industry for the social and economic well-being of our society. That particular point of view is shared also by a the vast majority of Western governments which generally apply a tax-exemption policy on the printed word and especially on books.

Quebeckers gained control of their publishing industry only recently. The vast majority of Quebec publishing houses are only 15 or 20 years old. Quebec publishers only account for 30% of sales made in Quebec.

As you see, that industry is in the first stages of development and is only starting to fend for itself.

For Quebec publishing companies, that is 90 French companies and 12 English companies in Quebec, net sales in 1988-

1989 totalled $156,522,000. Statistics Canada released data in September 1990 showing that those firms paid that year $34,937,000 in wages and salaries, $14,586,000 in copyrights, and spent $92,289,000 in printing costs and so on to publish their own books.

Nevertheless, the future of our publishing industry is still uncertain. Its recent obvious successes, over the last two decades, should not cloud reality. That industry is still not in a totally confortable situation.

The dramatic decrease in sales following the implementation of that tax on books will bring about in the publishing industry a major crisis which will lead to the closing of a significant number of publishing houses and bookstores.

The situation will be just as much dramatic within the book distribution and shipping sectors. Many printers, typographs, graphists, proof readers, carriers, translators and so on will lose their jobs. Last, the number of authors published in the province of Quebec will decrease sharply.

School publications will be greatly affected by this new tax. The price of books bought by college and university students will increase from 20 to 30 per cent. You know what such an increase means for them. The same situation will prevail for private school students at every level.

As for primary and high schools, only book procurements by school boards will benefit from a partial rebate to compensate for tax paid by the boards. Every other item paid for by the students or their parents will be fully taxed, namely copybooks, school supplies, reading books, dictionaries, and so on. Parents usually buy school supplies for their children, and they will have to pay 15 per cent in tax in the province of Quebec.

Furthermore, the tax will impose a heavy administrative burden on publishers and school boards while its benefits in the form of tax revenues will be relatively small. Interestingly enough the government will gain almost nothing from that tax.

Lastly, our financial partners, not to inclined to invest in our publishing industry as it is, have already started to worry about the future viability of the industry following implementation of the GST on books.

I remember one bank manager who was not too happy to see me enter his office to tell him how important it was to invest in authors like Marie-Claire Blais and Victor Lévy-Beaulieu. They didn't understand what I was taking about.

We must gather our courage and say "no"! I know that there is no problem on this side, but I am thinking of you, on the other side. We must say "no" to the annihilation of 20 years of work. We say "no" to any tax on books. That is what we should all say.

Senator Simard: Did you say "yes" to the preliminary study in March or April? You got caught in your own net and now try to blame others.

Senator Hébert: I don't think a preliminary study would have convinced you.

Senator Simard: That's the problem!

Senator Hébert: I don't think that a preliminary study would have convinced Senator Simard because I never saw the senator swayed by any argument appealing to the intelligence or to the heart. But you could perhaps give me one example of change—

If books are essential to the intellectual health of all Canadians, including Senator Simard, if they are the traditional instrument of freedom of expression and form the basis for building one's national identity, for the French-speaking population in this country they play an altogether unique role. They are the guardian of a minority culture's knowledge and linguistic expression, in a way that is unique in North America. And they are particularly important to this Francophone cultural minority.

For the same reasons as our Canadian Anglophone colleagues, and aware of the disastrous impact the application of this tax would have on a product that is so basic to cultural enrichment, we ask . . . I yield the floor to the Coalition I mentioned earlier:

We ask that books be considered an exempt product.

Books have never been taxed in Canada. And I say this for the third time since I started my speech. However, I imagine this may have escaped the senators who are talking. Since Confederation, books have never been taxed in Canada. Recognizing the educational value of books and their importance to the public, Canada has always refrained from introducing measures that would have made books an elitist product.

The Canadian government has made books accessible to all, in all regions of this country. It promoted the birth and growth of a national publishing industry thanks to intelligent policies, supported by substantial programs to assist the publishing industry. The Department of Communications has spent $23.5 million and the Canada Council $23.9 million on the publishing industry over the past three fiscal years.

Why do some people think it is worthwhile for a government department and for the Canada Council, which is still independent but which those gentlemen would dearly love to control . . . Why do these two agencies keep giving substantial grants to the publishing industry, when the GST will come and take it all away?

The government has even planned measures regarding the postal rate. There was a special rate for books so that the vastness of our country would not be a discriminatory factor in the availability of books. Because of the cheaper rate, we were able to send books to the small French bookstore in Vancouver.

The government has taken all these measures for a simple reason: the government believed in the written word and accepted the fact that it was the basis of culture in society.

Gestures like those clearly show how the Canadian government has always tried to offer the people of Canada a truly democratic education. The government has never imposed discriminatory measures on books. It wanted to give Canadians the same access to knowledge, to favor the freedom of expression, and to permit all Canadians to express the country's many cultural realities.

Until now, the Canadian people have benefited from these measures. Despite the fact that Canada is relatively young, that its population is scarce, and despite the strong foreign cultural trends sweeping over it every day, Canadians have managed to recognize and define themselves through their own writers.

The Canadian consumers could gladly say that to the East as to the West, books were equally accessible to all families, whatever their means.

The fact that the written word has never been taxed in all the history of Canada shows the importance the people and their leaders—when these leaders listen to the people, which is not always the case—attach to this unique medium for knowledge and the expression of human thought.

Taxing books is extremely serious and bears a lot of consequences, whatever the rate or enforcement mechanism. It denies the fundamental values that have always been recognized by the Canadian people and supported by the successive representatives of its government, whatever the party.

The imposition of the GST on books and magazines, discriminatory in the way it will limit their affordability, will produce or the Crown revenues estimated at about $13 million or 0.0005 per cent of total revenues expected from the GST, that is $24.5 billion.

You can imagine what a trivial amount it is for the national coffers, unless you totally reject all the disastrous results I foresee.

And at what price will we obtain this extremely small percentage of revenues? Taxing books in order to obtain revenues as small as these is all the more contradictory, since the government reaffirms otherwise the importance it gives to the population's intellectual development. In the document that I'm sure you all know, entitled Goods and Services Tax, An Overview, the Hon. Michael Wilson wrote—

It is too bad, I would really like Senator Simard to listen to me because I am quoting the Bible!

Senator Simard: I have been listening reverently from the very beginning!

Senator Hébert: Good. Now this is Mr. Wilson speaking. It's important, and I quote:

> Conscious of the fact that people are one of our most valued resources, the government took steps to make literacy, education and skills development a priority.

Obviously, taxing books is not exactly the way to achieve that!

● (1540)

This concern is all the more relevant—for once, I have an opportunity to congratulate Mr. Wilson—when we realize that illiteracy plagues 24 per cent of the population in Canada and 28 per cent in Quebec. Given those facts, a tax on books would jeopardize basic needs of Canadians. A book is an instrument of knowledge but when its price is raised, it will become a luxury item, which it is not and should never be. Does this government really want knowledge to become a luxury?

At a time when our society must react efficiently to the demands of technological change, which is both lightning fast and unrelenting, should we set for our society discriminatory conditions on training and retraining and also on the development of its most valuable resource, its capacity for thought.

Reading is the only true gymnastic of the mind. With other media, mainly electronic media, only the eye and the ear are put to work. But a book needs a reader to become real. And reading requires only intellectual abilities. The reader has to make use of complex mechanisms of the mind like logic, abstraction—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Pascal!

Senator Hébert: Of Pascal. Imagination and memory too. It is more complex than watching television.

Senator Frith: You have to think when you watch television.

Senator Hébert: If they had the GST in Pascal's time, I do not think his works would have been published.

Somebody said that a tax on thought is a tax on ignorance.

What I said on reading is valid for any book read for recreation or education. The only difference is a more intense effort to retain the information if you read for education. No other media demands as much discipline of the mind.

Books represent the most accessible, "insidious" and democratic way to knowledge because they can be freely acquired without any prerequisite though the simple will or wish of an individual, irrespective of age, social status or educational achievement. Whatever its subject, whether it be fiction or non-fiction, a book always teaches something new to its reader who often does not even realize how much he learned or kept from his reading. This is so because the written word harbours so much information and requires such a great understanding of what is described. Finally a book is an expression of the human spirit which necessarily uses language as a vehicle. It can express anything in any field, calling on the freedom of thought both of the reader and of the author and achieving the supreme act of free communication of thought, however commonplace it may be.

By deepening the knowledge of reality, books permit appropriation of that reality. Contrary to the electronic media which are instantaneous by nature and which our senses perceive instantaneously, a book requires the reader to embark on a slow process: reading can only proceed one word at a time, requiring the reader to construct a logic. It gives power to the imagination, if I may say so.

Books are the privileged keepers of civilization, they are the memory, a durable memory always accessible and mostly inexpensive. Writing a book requires much less money than making a single movie, teleplay or radio program. It is still the most economical way to propagate and deepen knowledge, express ideas and communicate thoughts and it is still the most democratic instrument of knowledge.

Books do not require any specific tools to be consumer nor do they impose any restriction of space or location on their consumers.

Even senators on the other side are reading a good book while I speak! And they do the right thing!

Books are still the most "open" way of communicating, after the spoken word. Because they store information, because they last, books have deeply marked all our civilizations which are civilizations of the written word: What would the western world be without the Bible, Islam without the Koran?

Because books have all these properties, they cannot be considered, even in our present-day world, as a business product only, nor as a product that can be replaced, their impact on individuals and communities being so deep and important.

I remember the beginnings of television when people would say: this is the end of the book, it is over. When television invaded us, it was so much easier, so much more attractive. People thought: Books do not count any more, they belong to another era. This is not true, television has stimulated the publishing business.

Through its policies, Canada has up until now recognized the important role played by books and those policies have found support among Canadian people.

I have no recollection of governments' support for books having ever been criticized.

As a society, we cannot allow ourselves to tax books. Let us remind ourselves that books are first and above all a matter of language, be it French or English. And language is our only means of access to knowledge. Have we assessed the social cost of imposing the GST on books?

In the context where the implementation of the GST would bring about new paperwork which would increase the burden for businesses, let us remind ourselves that if Quebec publishers have earned income of about 70 millions of dollars in 1986-1986, that is an average of less than one million dollars individually, nearly 80 per cent of them have income of less than one million dollars.

● (1550)

It has to be pointed out also that 16 per cent of the publishers have income of less that $50,000. This is the income of publishing businesses!

That industry, small when compared to the giants of the international publishing world, produced 2,701 titles in 1986-1987. This achievement is all the more outstanding when considering that the average print run for publishers generating income of over one million dollars is 3,960 copies only whereas it drops to 2,500 copies for publishers whose income lies between $200,000 and $500,000 a year. Can you imagine!

There are 953 copies for publishers with revenues under the $50,000 mark, which is surely the case for those who publish mainly poetry. The average number of copies for youth publishers specializing in novels or storybooks is 4,000 copies, while it is 3,061 copies for textbooks. Those are small print runs. But, as in other areas, competition must nevertheless be maintained with children books published in France, at 50,000 copies the very first edition, which reduces the sale price. In literature, the number of books printed averages only 1,289 copies and in general literature, 3,395 copies are produced. These figures are more recent than those I had when I was in the business, for example, I mentioned before the book entitled Le jour est noir by Marie-Claire Blais. If I was publishing that book today, I would have to reduce the number of copies to 1,289 instead of 3,000, as I did in the sixties.

For French-language publishers in Quebec and in Canada, to succeed in producing a book that will compete on the market is a miracle when one thinks of the small number of copies they produce.

Yet, one must do it and the competition is fierce. On this small market for a population of six millions, one finds French, Belgian, Swiss, American and English Canadian products. These are available not only in hardbacks, but also in paperbacks, which are cheaper, although they cannot reach the bargain you find in the English paperbacks. Clearly, a book published in the United States goes from 100,000 to 150,000 copies, while even a pocketbook in Quebec can hardly reach 5,000 copies, for heaven's sake. These foreign books are also available at bargain prices and distributed with all sorts of advantages through readers clubs, and, in Quebec, there is mainly one, foreign owned, and the Quebec production represents only 20 to 22 percent of what is available.

In other words, the publishing industry in Quebec has succeeded its takeoff in spite of an enormous competition.

Hon. Paul David: May I ask you a question about the book club in Quebec you mentioned? The name you gave has Quebec in it. You are now saying it is a foreign publishing business. I take it it belongs to someone from another country.

Senator Hébert: It is probably a subsidiary of a business in France.

Senator David: That may be the reason why they have far more books from outside Quebec in their catalogue.

Senator Hébert: Yes, that must be the reason. Among Frenchmen they manage. In other words, the book industry in Quebec manages to soar against fierce competition, without the benefit of economies of scale that characterize large publishing industries, without the benefit either of revenues generated from the exploitation of related rights—sale of film and television rights, sale of a pocket edition or sale to a book club—that require a generally strong and rich cultural industry. The average length of time publishing companies have existed in Quebec is only 16.4 years and the median length of time is 13 years. That means that industry is far from enjoying a maturity that will guarantee Quebec consumers the stability and full development of national books production. Besides, that industry gains from government support as was mentioned earlier. In 1986-87, 84 per cent of Quebec's publishing companies received government aid totalling $6,439,300 or 9.3 per cent of the revenues they generated.

To jeopardize ever so little the fragile equilibrium so hardly achieved that at the moment allows French speaking consumers to buy Quebec books at reasonable and competitive prices is to put at risk the very existence of those books and show a lack of concern for what they represent for people who are fully entitled to derive their education and entertainment from books made and written for them, that resemble them. And Quebec consumers have been enjoying that privilege for such a short time—

The GST would be slammed on all books, including school books. But many people—up to sixty in the case of a reading book—are involved in making these books. School publishers represent 41 percent of the publishing houses in Quebec and generate nearly 67 percent of the revenues in the industry. The literary field represents 44 percent of the industry, but generates less than 30 percent of the revenues. Finally, "other" publishing houses (for musical scores for instance) represent only 15.1 percent of the industry and generate only 3.4 percent of the revenues.

The Coopers and Lybrand study entitled "Consumer Sensitivity to Increases in Book Prices", which I mentioned earlier and was prepared by the Department of Communications, shows that everytime the price of a book goes up by one percent, the sales go down by 2.5 percent. We must remember that. It also underscores the fact that, for all types of books, even a 10 percent increase in price would deter more than 25 percent of the people interviewed from buying new releases and to wait for them to be published as paperbacks. If prices were to rise 20 percent from the original sales price, 50 percent of the people interviewed would not buy, while the other 50 percent would. The study dealing with consumers also shows that among the consumers who would stop buying Canadian books first would be the households where French is the most commonly used language, the people who have completed a college degree, the students and the households with the highest or the lowest gross income.

Considering the present circumstances in Quebec, with its small population pool, can we afford to turn books into an elitist product?

Moreover, in the school sector in Quebec, the school boards do not have a separate budget for book acquisition. It is part of their global budget. It can therefore be expected that an increase in the price of books will result in a decrease in the number purchased. Then, lower sales will make the unit price go up. Will the school book become a privilege? Finally, let it be known that the school boards budgets are already insufficient and do not allow to achieve the goal set in Bill 107, that is that every pupil must be given one basic book per compulsory subject. Even that cannot be achieved at the present time. So, what do you think will happen if there ever is GST on top of everything?

Publishing is a high-risk industry. It involves high production costs that must be distributed over a modest number of copies. The more complex the productions are (such as school books, mathematic or chemistry textbooks, illustrated children books, general and specialized litterature that must be illustrated such as history books that very often need colour illustrations, geography books, architecture books, the so-called gift books, art albums, visual art books, et cetera), the higher the production costs and the more difficult it is for the national publishers to provide consumers with quality books at competing prices. Unfortunately, the Quebec consumer cannot benefit from the economies of scale as do most of the foreign publishers in countries where the cultural activity and industry in general is strong enough to be self-sufficient.

Increasing the risks of the Quebec publishing industry will lead to a strict selection of safer products—potential bestsellers—and to ending the publishing of new and unknown authors. No more risks! It will mean the end or at least a very substantial decrease in the production of more specialized books with a restricted market in, for example, social sciences, essays, special scientific fields. We will quit trying to compete in certain basic sectors. Right now, French-speaking university students in business administration, sciences and many other fields mostly rely on English textbooks that would be too costly to have translated or produced in French. Imagine what it will be after the GST!

Unfortunately, it is impossible for the GST to be implemented without those projections becoming real. The Quebec and Canadian French-speaking consumers will find less books from Quebec and Canadian authors (in this respect, studies by the Canada Council and the Department of Communications have shown that national publishers publish the greater number of national writers, and if it is true for English Canada, it is even more so for French Canada). You should not be under any illusions, because Canadian subsidiaries of American or French publishers are not big publishers of Canadian books. Rather, they sell books from their own country's authors, which is totally normal.

They will also be faced with much less varied Canadian products. Because of higher prices, would consumers not be right to buy the cheapest products? Francophone writers from Canada will fight a losing battle against the American paperbacks or books of science and technology.

Let us listen to what the Don't Tax Reading Coalition, a particularly representative group, is asking us.

> "With its long democratic tradition, the Government of Canada has given books a special rank in its cultural policy and has recognized, with concrete actions, its preferential status."

It is the whole history of Canada that proves that.

The reasons behind this approach and these decisions - the exceptional educational and cultural value of books - justify their existence as much today as before. Trusting that this respect for books and for reading is part of the Canadian values, we specifically ask that books not be taxed. By doing so, Canada will follow in the footsteps of the United Kingdom, Ireland, Australia, Portugal and many other countries that recognized that books are essential to their intellectual well-being and cultural fulfillment and that did not tax reading materials.

Given that the Government of Canada has, with vision, conferred a preferential status to food products, which are essential to physical well-being, it would be totally logical that books, which are essential to intellectual well-being, enjoy, like food products, also a preferential status and be also declared untaxed products.

Canadian publishers who publish in English have problems very similar to those in Quebec who publish in French. However, here are some relevant Parliamentary proposals submitted by the Don't Tax Reading Coalition:

• (1600)

[English]

Canadians have expressed their view on this subject to no avail. A recent poll, the Environics Focus Report of July 1989, indicated that 80 per cent of Canadians support a zero-rate of tax on books. Further, a record number of postcards advocating the zero-rate have been received by government members, including the Prime Minister. The coalition now looks to the Senate to ensure that Canadians' voices are heard.

A motion to zero-rate would be both precedented and wholly consistent with current international and domestic policies. Norway, Spain, Switzerland, Ireland, Italy, Australia, Japan, the United States and the United Kingdom have applied a value-added tax rate of zero to reading materials. Further, domestic policies related to the support of the print industries, including those of the Canada Council, Secretary of State and Department of Communications, have traditionally supported the primacy of reading. In book publishing, for example, current annual federal direct assistance totals some $18 million, applied to retail sales of about $400 million. If the GST were applied it would raise approximately $26 million. However, any federal tax gains would have to be offset in new aid to our sector.

A zero-rate would also be consistent with current federal taxation policy. The GST, if applied to the print industries, would not supplant a federal manufacturing tax.

[Translation]

As I was saying earlier, everything that went into the manufacturing of books since Confederation, the paper, the thread to sew the book's spine, has been exempted from taxation.

[English]

Indeed, the Department of Finance has estimated that the industry bears a one per cent "FST trickle down" at most.

Such federal support was, and is, essential. Expressly, because both producers and consumers have never paid tax on reading materials, the impact of the tax, and the concomitant price increases, would be deeply felt by both. Recent Canadian studies, as well as experience in the U.K., show that a 10 per cent increase in prices would mean a 10 per cent decrease in sales revenue. Given that the government's own findings indicate that the book and magazine industries, including the retail sector, operate on minimal profit margins, and given that companies cannot pass on increases to the consumer, a decline in both output and employment is inevitable. Ironically, the decline will be most conspicuous in those areas where the government has targeted its policy priorities on cultural and social grounds: writing by Canadians on subjects of interest to Canadians.

Canadians are proud and fortunate to be able to enjoy the best English-language books available from Canada, the U.K. and the U.S.

[Translation]

As I was saying earlier, French-language books published in Quebec face competition from books imported from France, Switzerland and Belgium, and, as very often their readers are bilingual, also from the United States, English Canada and elsewhere. During all the time I was an active member of the profession, we never wanted competing foreign books to be taxed. We were even against taxation of books coming from France, against taxation of books coming from the United States, because we wanted that the free circulation of ideas be respected to the full extent, and in our case, those were ideas expressed in the French language.

• (1610)

[English]

Fully 75 per cent of the books sold in Canada are imported from the U.S—and, by the way, part of them are bought in Quebec by francophones. The Canadian publisher-agents of these books would have to pay the GST at the point of entry. Because publishers' receivables often run as long as 80 days, fronting the cost of money to do so will have serious cash-flow implications. Furthermore, because existing mechanisms for collecting taxes would be overburdened, individual consumers might find it cheaper to purchase books in the U.S., thereby avoiding the GST and disadvantaging Canadian books. Similarly, non-taxed U.S. magazines will be put at an advantage over Canadian. It will not be possible to capture the tax on a vast proportion of the books and magazines crossing our border.

While the government has claimed that education is essential to remaining competitive internationally, the GST applied to books, magazines and newspapers would undermine that stated goal. Educational institutions will be unfairly hit, we submit, since, for example, the school board, not the school, would be the recipient of the rebate. There are no checks and balances to ensure that funds will be returned to the school and spent on learning materials. Similarly, rebates to public libraries will be sent to the municipality. University students will be required to pay 7 per cent on textbooks.

Educationally, the prospect of applying the GST to the production and consumption of scholarly and academic works, we submit, is alarming. Institutional learning, research, literacy, and independent ongoing study all require full and fair access to books, magazines, and newspapers. The printed work is the foundation of our education from the early childhood years through the rest of our lives. We submit that any "educational exemption" should encompass tax-free status for all print materials. To apply that exemption in any other manner can easily be construed as anti-democratic.

Canada's system of education does not exist simply to create elites in which knowledge is protected and safeguarded; the principle of tax-free reading and writing is a democratic one which must not discriminate among Canadians. This coalition submits that the government's failure to fully address and support the importance of reading and writing in Canada is an inappropriate cost of the GST, and one which this country cannot afford.

Therefore, the Don't Tax Reading Coalition strongly recommends that all inputs and supplies related to the production, dissemination and consumption of print materials must be subject to a zero-rate of tax. An exemption would not be sufficient, as it would lead to unrecovered tax and increased prices on reading material produced for domestic use and for export. The benefits that would accrue to Canada from a signal to Canadians and the world that the principle of tax-free reading is sacrosanct would be far greater than the loss of revenue resulting from zero-rating. They urge senators to return the bill to the House of Commons substantively amended in support of zero-rating of the written word. Education is, to each and every Canadian, subjective. Learning through the printed word occurs at all ages, in all environments, and in any way we choose. A tax rate of zero for reading will ensure the democracy of education.

[Translation]

Moreover, the Canadian Magazine Publishers Association backed the submission of the Don't Tax Reading Coalition, insisting on the fact that reading as such, which includes books and periodicals, should be exempt. Allow me to quote one paragraph concerning magazines in particular.

I will read only one because everything that has been said on books also applies to magazines.

● (1620)

[English]

They also stress the unique contribution that magazines make to Canadian culture, that our publications are a major source of support for writers and illustrators. Indeed, many of the nation's best-known writers were first published and polished their talents in Canadian periodicals. A full 93 per cent of the writing and illustrations in our magazines are created by Canadians. These publications are a major outlet for creative talent. To jeopardize this industry would deal a severe blow to Canadian culture.

[Translation]

I hope that for once Senator Simard will refrain from shouting: "So what?" He did not shout "So what?" because he is not here. Senator Simard is in a position to know that a magazine is essential for the preservation of a society's cultural values.

Magazine publishers in Quebec support the contentions of their English-speaking counterparts.

In their conclusion, they refer to the example of Mrs. Margaret Thatcher with the assurance that it should impress Mr. Mulroney, although these days he is under the spell of President Bush.

And I quote:

[Senator Hébert.]

> By exempting magazines, newspapers and books from the GST, Canada would remain among the countries eager to protect as much as possible the access of their citizens to knowledge. Several countries alreay do. It is the case for instance of Great Britain where Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher has recognized the need to protect magazines, books and newspapers.

George Bush would have had greater impact, but Mrs. Thatcher is better than nothing.

It has been repeatedly stated that the public in Canada generally and in Quebec in particular oppose in large number the GST. It is undeniable. If a poll were taken on the particular issue of applying the GST to books and magazines, I am sure the results would show that nearly 100 per cent of Canadians are against it.

Senator Gigantès: Except the Tories who do not read!

Senator Hébert: Then let us say 99.9 per cent of all Canadians. This does not seem to impress Mr. Wilson and Mr. Loiselle, two ministers who repeated hardly a month ago that they would remain inflexible. I quote Hon. Gilles Loiselle, who as a Quebecer should know what this will mean for Quebec. During a Question Period, he stated that the decisions are made, that they are well known, and that they will not be changed.

That is the kind of people they are. Even if all Canadians are against it, they will not listen and will go ahead just the same. The Prime Minister, for one, is slightly less convinced. It was enough for him to spend 45 minutes with the students at Burnaby South High School on October 22 to be shaken. He finally confessed, and I quote his statement as reported in English-speaking newspapers.

● (1630)

[English]

> . . . "Of all the criticisms I have heard, (concerns about tax on religious books) worries me the most", adding that he hoped the tax code would be revised to deal with that issue.

That was stated in the Globe and Mail on October 23, 1990.

[Translation]

If Mr. Mulroney had spent another half an hour in that high school, books and periodicals would have been GST-free! Another fifteen minutes, and that would have done the trick.

The conscience of each and every senators on the other side of this house is our last hope. When the time comes to vote for or against the amendment were are dealing with, to vote for or against the destruction of the publishing industry in Canada, the closure of a third of our bookstores, and everything else, I am sure some senators will put the preservation of our culture before partisan considerations. I think in particuliar of senator Solange Chaput-Rolland: when the time comes to vote, she will remember, I hope, that she is a reporter, that she even published her own periodical at a time when it took a lot of courage to do so.

When the time to vote comes, I hope she will remember that she was once a reporter, that she directed her own periodical at a time when much courage was needed for that kind of undertaking. When the time to vote comes, I hope she remembers also that she published many books through publishing businesses which might disappear if not exempted from the TPS. When the time to vote comes, I am sure that Senator Chaput-Rolland will not want to betray writers, publishers and bookstore owners because she would be betraying herself.

When the time to vote comes, all eyes in Quebec will be on her and on some conservatives senators who keep talking about "culture".

Senator Simard: I hope that some will remember your antics and that you have fed

Senator Hébert: I did not get what you said but it is probably not very important in any case!

I am almost through. Unless you want to delay the process, I will conclude my remarks.

Senator Simard: Please do!

Senator Hébert: If you would keep quiet for a few minutes—

[English]

Senator Stewart: He wants to make a speech!

Senator Hébert: He will make a beautiful speech in a moment.

Senator Simard: That is all right. We will finish with you in due course.

[Translation]

When the time to vote comes, the province of Quebec as a whole will watch Solange Chaput-Rolland and some of the Conservative Senators who are always mouthing the word "culture".

And history will draw its revolver!

Honourable senators, I thank you.

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, I believe it is appropriate at this time of the debate on Senator MacEachen's amendment to recall the basic principle we stand up for concerning the GST.

As we know some senators try to distract the public as well as this Chamber from the fundamental principles involved. They try to frighten us with horror stories. According to them every business and sector of activity would be in bad shape, and heading for unavoidable bankruptcy.

True, we are heading for bankruptcy, but the fault lies with the Liberal governement, which has been leading us in that direction for about twenty years.

I would like to begin by recalling the basic principles of this tax, because we must keep in mind that it is fair and equitable.

The first principle is to impose the tax only at the consumer level, rather than taxing companies from the start in such way that they cannot compete with their foreign counterparts. With this tax, our companies would consequently be better able to compete and, above all, to export their products more fairly and efficiently.

The current situation favours importation instead of exportation of our own products.

The second basic principle of this tax is that we taxed companies for 40 years—we are the last country to quit this system—we taxed those who provided the primary products, our manufacturers and contractors. We were taxing them while an economy far different from what we had 50 years ago was emerging. Today, there is a whole sector that we call the service sector. I believe both the public and the initiators recognize it is fair and reasonable that those sectors that are the driving force behind our economy be less severely but more fairly taxed.

The third principle is to establish the lowest possible tax rate and make it universal. This means that, at all levels, in the production or service sector, as a consumer earning $15,000 to $20,000 or $100,000 to $150,000, every one will pay his fair share of taxes. So that some day, we will be able to live within our means and stop piling up debts as we did under the various Liberal governments.

Moreover, senators on the other side seem to forget that it is a replacement tax. Today, 26 million people in Canada pay in excess of $18 billion in tax without knowing it, without realizing how everybody, students, seniors and children are penalized. They pay a sales tax without knowing it and without being able to make themselves an idea of its scope.

We will replace that tax. We are not creating a new one. In a way, those $18 billion will stay in the hands of individuals of our society to promote development. We don't ask for an additional $18 billion. Of course, the opposition doesn't want that tax. They ignore it. It is a new scarecrow. I think that people must realize that it is a replacement tax and keep that in mind.

People were invited to express their views, despite a limit imposed on the numbers and some kind of screening of those who wanted to debate and present their submissions to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

At that stage, we had 300 witnesses or, to avoid repetition, perhaps 250 who came to tell us, each in his own way, how this tax would change things for them and how they would adapt to it. They often made constructive suggestions.

We also had many people who wanted to be exempted from the tax for one reason or another, because they got used to the government always helping them.

You all know, honourable senators, what this kind of policy did year after year with the sales tax. Today we have over 22,000 special arrangements for permanent exemption in some cases and for special treatment in others. These arrangements are detrimental to other people who do not benefit from them.

If we start granting exemptions for whatever reason, we will surely get to the same point. What senators on this side want to avoid is a higher tax, but if we start giving exemptions, we will have no choice but to raise the tax and increase the burden on those who have to pay it. Many people called for all sorts of exemptions. Today, as a first amendment out of eight, senators opposite want books to be tax exempt.

Of course, I recognize that senator MacEachen wanted to be non-partisan, that he wanted to avoid diverting attention through the use of imaginary words and catastrophic situations.

Honourable senators and members of the public, you have to know that publishing, reading, culture and research do not exclusively belong to liberal senators. On this side of the House, we also want Canadians to be better educated, to acquire more knowlege and to undertake more research.

Some Hon. Senators Hear, hear.

Senator Poitras: Senator Hébert was talking before about books which are not selling.

On this side of the House, we have authors of books which sell!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Poitras: When a book has value, whatever the price, it always sells and it is read.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Poitras: So, one diverts the question when one leads the public into believing that, on the one hand, we are for education, and, on the other, they know nothing and they will give up everything!

Senator Hébert has presented a number of arguments, saying that the great majority of publishings are supported either by the Communications Department or the Canada Council.

There are more than one way to support publishing. And, one does not necessarily have to go through the Department of Finance, but through taxes, our taxes on such or such item. I firmly believe that tomorrow our government will again find ways to help entrepreneurs, to help those who take risks, to help those who want to promote young writers. There are many other ways than taxation or non-taxation.

I can assure you, honourable senators, that our government will manage to accept the challenge to support all our publishers, that the Department of Communications, the Canada Council, and many others will find new ways to enable our authors to tell us what they have to tell us, and to inform us. Finally, in research, we will, as much as in the past, publish the findings of the research done here, so that we will support our very best researchers.

There is an attempt to single out the GST and make it responsible for everything. Let us not forget, honourable senators, that at the most this tax accounts for 10 to 12 per cent of the national budget. With a taxation package the government is trying to achieve in this term of office, and will surely succeed, a new tax system that must change as does the economy that can no longer develop the way it did fifty years ago.

[Senator Poitras.]

We must be open to the world. We must find new ways and new approaches. When talking about taxing corporations and individuals, we must remember that our corporations remain Canadian because individuals invest in them. They will do so as long as the corporations are profitable and survive. If not as the publishing companies Senator Hébert mentioned they will fall into the hands of publishers of foreign countries.

Honourable senators, Senator Hébert admitted it. The Leader of the Opposition was too scrupulous to admit the ultimate purpose of the whole exercise was to prevent this new tax to pass.

That is the objective, because these are stalling tactics. The purpose is not to improve to such and such a tax under the pretext of saving the publishing industry, books and culture.

In Quebec and everywhere else, the culture will live on. It will be supported by our two levels of government. I am convinced that with the GST or sales tax we will continue to grow, to make our culture known here in our country and abroad.

That is why I ask you, honourable senators, not to proceed with the amendment put forward today. It is a new partisan strategy. Having heard the last speaker, I think we must say it is demagogy.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Would Senator Poitras accept a question?

Senator Poitras: Yes senator.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senator, I think I heard you say, at the beginning of your speech, that it was a replacement tax. But there is no tax on books and other such printed materials at the present time. In this particular case, it would not be a replacement tax, but indeed a totally new tax. If you decide to impose a tax on something that is not taxed now, you can not call it a replacement tax or can you?

Senator Poitras: I think you need to be much more broad-minded to understand what I was driving at. At present, you and I and all our fellow citizens pay 18 billion on one tax. We pay it only on goods we purchase. In a new and more rational system, we are proposing a tax which, effective January 1st, will apply to one sector of the economy as well as the other, that is to say production of goods and provision of services.

At the same time, we will make sure that the burden of the tax will be fairly and equitably borne by everybody, and not by one single group. In that way, it is a replacement tax. It will not apply exactly to the same things, because the economy is not what it used to be 50 years ago. There were very few service-oriented businesses then. Today, there are more.

On various other points, that is also the difference I see in a replacement tax that will apply to different things. There are other means today to encourage entrepreneurs in the publishing industry and in other sectors of our economy.

• (1640)

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of Senator Poitras? I gather from what he just said about this amendment that he would regard a zero rating for books, scholarly books, for example, as a kind of tax expenditure in relation to the new goods and services tax. It is on that ground that he proposes to vote against Senator MacEachen's amendment. Would he carry that line of thinking against tax expenditures over into the income tax field, let us say the corporate income tax field? If so, would he tell us which tax expenditures in that field he would first abolish?

Senator Poitras: Honourable senators, those are two different matters. I feel that the GST should apply to everybody at every level. If other ways to support the book publishing industry are needed, I feel, as Senator Hébert mentioned, that there are other ways of doing it. He mentioned in his remarks the Department of Communications as well as the Conseil des Arts du Canada. Thus, there are various ways to support entrepreneurship in this country. They are the ways in which I am sure the government will support this sector, as it has done in the past.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, in the past week—

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Mr. Speaker, I thought that you had recognized Senator Chaput-Rolland, who was on her feet until she was interrupted by Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: I did not interrupt the honourable senator. I asked a question, which is perfectly proper. Questions are to be asked immediately after a speech is made.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Senator Fairbairn has the floor.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, in the past week we have relearned that more than three out of every four Canadians continue to object strenuously to the GST. The numbers continue to grow despite government expenditures to sell it to the Canadian public.

Canadians understand that Bill C-62 represents a radical increase in the scope and breadth of federal taxation on individuals. This bill will tax the most profitable and the most marginal activities alike. Articles and services which have never been taxed before will now be taxed at every level of manufacture and sale. Indeed, this is a form of taxation which will reach into every pocket in the land. In doing so, the GST will have a particularly devastating and long-reaching impact on the activities that are already under most pressure in this country.

In particular, Bill C-62 will introduce punitive taxation on materials fundamental to our future progress, materials that must be made more accessible rather than less accessible. That is why our first amendment in this debate on the GST urges tax-free status be retained for books and printed matter of all types, including, as has been mentioned, the Bible—materials crucial to learning, to knowledge, to education and to spiritual fulfilment which are in turn activities fundamental to Canada's ability not just to compete but to survive in the 21st century.

Honourable senators, this tax is as hurtful as it is unnecessary. When confronted recently by a student in British Columbia, the Prime Minister conceded that it was not right. He was asked by a young man from Burnaby South High School why the GST would be applied on school textbooks and the Bible. The Prime Minister responded, "Of all the criticisms I have heard this worries me the most". He added, "When the tax has been applied across the board for a while the government will want to look at its impact, perhaps review it and revise it later after it has been put in place".

I guess the question we have to ask today is this. Why wait? Our amendment to zero rate books and printed materials gives the Government of Canada a golden opportunity to remove that tax right now. I think it would be an honourable response to public concern.

The Prime Minister has also called for a collective national effort in education, a call which I very strongly support. A year ago he cried out for renewed cooperation from his provincial colleagues toward educational excellence, and a national task force on human resource development was established. I think it is working toward some guidelines for the year 2000, if I am not mistaken. However, in view of this stated priority the Prime Minister is now bent on implementing a tax on the very materials essential to reaching such a state.

Let us look at his words for a moment. Those on the other side will recognize some of them from the annual convention of the Conservative party held in Ottawa at the end of August one year ago, at which time the Prime Minister told his Conservative supporters, "The quality of a nation's system of education is a reflection of its civilization. It is also a measure of its wisdom because no nation can succeed without the full participation of all its people."

Others will remember similar concerns and commitments from the Prime Minister's opening remarks to the first ministers conference a year ago:

• (1650)

> We are here to ensure that Canada's youth finds challenge and reward, as they grow and build this great nation.

Honourable senators, testimony before our Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee suggested that students were very deliberately exempted from any tax credit relief from the GST. We know from the hearings—and other senators have referred to this—that students currently pay about $700 per year for required textbooks. With the GST, plus whatever top-up provincial governments might tax, students could be looking at an additional $100 a year in costs. I have no doubt that Canadian students will find that challenging, particularly those least able to pay in the first instance. These are people that many of us have heard from in vast numbers.

Honourable senators may recall that I have read hundreds of names from petitions that have been sent in by students from the University of Lethbridge. Recently, a number of us met with students from the University of Toronto, who came here to see Finance Minister Wilson, as well as members of the Senate. They tried to explain to him the tremendous strain that this was going to put on their lives at university.

I have a number of petitions, which I will not read at the moment. However, I will quote one sentence from the personal petition that was signed by students:

> Furthermore, a sales tax on text books and periodicals would, for the first time in Canadian history, undermine the importance of education and literacy nationwide. Most of us surviving on limited, inelastic incomes cannot afford the nightmare of the GST.

The students continue to say that it heartens them to see many of the senators fighting for them.

I should like to go back to the Prime Minister; when he was talking to his Conservative supporters, he said:

> I want to see Canadian educational standards that match those of our toughest competitors. I want to see reforms that will generate excellence in education from coast to coast. I want to see action, on behalf of all young Canadians, who ask only for equal opportunities.

Clearly, Mr. Mulroney forgot to remind his tax advisors of these lofty objectives when they were devising the GST. He forgot to remind them that equal opportunity for Canadian students was one of his priorities for the future of this country. He went on to say to his Conservative convention:

> I assure this great convention that this government will carry its fair share of the burden to ensure that all young Canadians receive a first class education as they confront a world class challenge. At the federal level we are going to focus more and more of our attention and resources on long term investment in people, education, literacy and the upgrading of skills.

What will the GST do to ensure all young Canadians a first-class education? Is the GST the government's way of shouldering a fair share of the burden and of focusing attention and resources on long-term investment in people, education, literacy and the upgrading of skills, as the Prime Minister has said?

I would submit that the GST, coupled with Bill C-69, which is yet to come before this chamber, fly directly in the face of the Prime Minister's professed priorities. Bill C-69 will reduce federal cash support to post-secondary education over five years through a conversion of direct federal financing over to the provinces in the form of tax points. In doing so, Bill C-69 will effectively eliminate the leverage that the federal government once had for working with provinces on national standards of education.

As Robert Fulford commented in the Financial Times, in response to the Prime Minister's plea for education standards to match our toughest competitors, national standards are exactly what our strongest competitors have and are exactly what would allow us in Canada to tell whether students across the country have comparable skills in language, mathematics or physics. Mr. Fulford said:

> On the basis of our performance to date, it seems likelier that Mulroney will see our competitors pull farther away from us, indefinitely.

Certainly without some power of negotiation, we will continue to have barriers a mile high to national education standards and credentials. In turn, they will adversely affect true worker mobility and economic flexibility in this country; in other words, barriers to the educational excellence and economic competitiveness which is this government's rhetorical goal. The only exceptions to the tax on the GST in terms of printing and materials will be official texts purchased by an educational institution, which will then receive a rebate of about half the tax. The major individual purchasers of books—students, teachers and professors—will not be spared, nor will libraries, many of whom have virtually given up maintaining up-to-date and relevant collections.

None of the supplementary texts that are so important for full understanding and enriched learning will be exempt, nor will learned papers, journals or periodicals, nor any of the materials essential for a current and timely understanding of issues, events and advances. Not even published research and development findings—the stuff that is so vaunted by the Prime Minister as the key to Canada's economic future—will be exempt from the tax.

At a time when education—not just the learning of specific technical skills, but the ability to think creatively, to problem-solve, to articulate, to instruct, to lead Canadians towards excellence—could not be more critical, the Prime Minister has chosen to slap a tax on the very activities that are fundamental to his strongly stated and laudable objectives.

Honourable senators, I would like to broaden the context further. Last week I had the privilege, as I believe several senators did, of speaking with representatives of the Canadian Federation for the Humanities. As a classification, the humanities, as we all know, encompasses a group of disciplines: language, literature, philosophy, religion, fine art, history—disciplines that have been subject to a great deal of pressure over the last two decades. To a large extent they have been eclipsed by the social sciences.

It seems that an arts degree is just not on any more. One should have a technical degree, or better yet a Master of Business Administration, according to our business pages. Yet as the Humanities Federation pointed out to some of us, the business community itself is continually complaining that business graduates cannot write. They cannot communicate, and by extension increasingly they seem to lack the skills of critical analysis, of creative problem-solving and, overall, of communications.

● (1700)

John Godfrey, the editor of the Financial Post, made this point in his newspaper back in June. As a matter of fact, he wrote quite a good article and received an award from the Federation for the Humanities who, in order to encourage their point of view, are presenting awards for excellence in writing and communicating that they observe within the business community. John Godfrey wrote, and I quote:

> One of the most persistent complaints about recent graduates of business schools in Canada is that they can't write. In his series on business schools which has been appearing in the Financial Post, Gordon Pitts quotes Westcoast Energy Inc. President, Michael Phelps on today's MBAs: "Spelling, syntax and grammar are atrocious. Number crunchers are a dime a dozen. But when you walk into a room and try to find the leader, it is generally the person who is the good communicator."

What this suggests to me is that if we turn completely away from the language, the thought and the articulation skills that are the core of the humanities to strictly applied and technological skills, we will not have the ability to adapt to the societal changes that accompany that technological advancement.

In our focus on technical and workplace skills, we sadly seem to be withdrawing from a long-standing commitment to the very abilities that will allow us and our children to adapt to rapid change, that will keep our workforce from becoming obsolete, and that will ultimately allow us to reach and maintain the competitive position that we seek. It seems to me that our current fixation with the bottom line, with specific marketable skills, particularly technological skills, and the de-emphasis of the core humanities in favour of the social sciences, have all helped to set the stage for a GST that does not exempt knowledge and learning. It is a large and a dangerous step and we should be aware that European countries and Britain, in implementing the value-added tax, have themselves either zero rated reading materials or set them at a lower rate. Authors, printers, librarians and readers, along with parliamentarians, educators, churches, the professions, commerce, and the public at large have all joined forces in making that case in those countries. In response, the United Kingdom, Ireland, and Portugal have zero rated books, while Italy, Greece, and Spain have set tax rates of 2 and 3 per cent.

Both Ireland and Spain reported grossly disproportionate reductions in sales when they initially applied the full valueadded tax to those items, and in fact Ireland was forced to zero rate them, and Spain reduced the rate from 6 per cent to 2 or 3 per cent.

Within the European Economic Community, the book trades are all facing acute problems arising from the fierce competition of the electronic media, reduced public spending on books and increasing costs. Consequently, pressure is mounting in advance of legislation, to give these industries some relief by zero rating these materials across the board.

Here in our country there are many reasons, specific to the Canadian publishing industry, why we should not begin to tax printed material now.

First, as many have stated, printed materials are not currently subject to federal sales tax at any stage of their manufacture. The application of the GST at each stage of purchase of materials and processes means that the ultimate increase in the cost to the consumer will most certainly be more than 7 per cent.

The addition of provincial GSTs, if they come in, by provinces who choose to harmonize their own sales tax systems with the federal GST, will mean that the retail cost of printed material may rise by 13, 14, as high as 15 per cent.

Honourable senators, Canadian book publishers, as well established as McClelland and Stewart, have grave concerns about their own future viability. So where does that leave the smaller publishers of books and periodicals? Indeed if British and European publishers are under pressure, where, with our much smaller market, does that leave our Canadian counterparts, publishers, like Annick Press? Annick is a small and innovative publisher of well written and beautifully illustrated, yet affordable, children's books. Just as I was listening to Senator Hébert this afternoon, I was reading some of these books which I have been loaned by a young friend, Whitney Jennings. They are wonderful books for small children, books that interest children at the earliest possible age in the excitement of reading.

Annick has been in business for 15 years. Its books and its writers are internationally recognized, and yet its owner said in a Globe article recently that they are "very apprehensive about what is coming . . . publishing at best can be a pretty marginal undertaking." They fear that the GST will shrink those margins to nothing, which would be a real loss to the publishing of Canadian children's material.

The Don't Tax Reading Coalition points to what happened in Ireland when books were not exempted from the value-added tax. Sales fell instantly and the government was forced to bring in an exemption of printed materials. The coalition estimates that as a result of the GST book sales in Canada will drop 7 to 21 per cent and cost the industry as much as $60 million in lost revenue.

As for periodicals, during the Senate committee hearings, the vice-president of public affairs of the Periodical Marketers of Canada quoted studies within the industry that show that for every one per cent increase in cost there is a one per cent reduction in the purchase of reading material. On the basis of these figures, this industry could be looking at a critical reduction in sales with a consequent loss of jobs and an irreparable weakening of the periodical publishing industry in Canada.

Canadian magazines are now operating with profit margins ranging from a loss, a non-profit margin, to a maximum level of 2 to 4 per cent. Dozens of small, creative and distinctly Canadian publications are already priced at the highest acceptable level, because of their production costs and their small subscription base.

• (1710)

The Canadian Magazine Publishers Association did a survey on a representative group of magazines to analyze what the effect of the GST would be on them. The five publications were: Canadian Art, a special interest publication supported in part by grants; Canadian Business, one of Canada's best known general interest business magazines; Coup de Pouce, a large circulation, advertiser-driven, French language women's magazine; Eastern Woods and Waters, a regionally based, special interest magazine; and Owl Magazine, Canada's largest circulation children's magazine, which has become internationally famous and operates with negligible advertising revenue.

Running through those five magazines, the survey of profit as a percentage of revenue shows that Canadian Art is now operating at minus 5.67 per cent and with the GST will drop to minus 12.07 per cent. Canadian Business, operating at plus 6.59 per cent, will drop with the GST to 0.07 per cent. Coup de Pouce, now operating at 7.66 per cent, will drop to 1.10 per cent with the GST. Eastern Woods and Waters, now at 0.20 per cent, will drop down to 3.16 per cent with the GST; and Owl Magazine, now operating at a profit percentage of 2.09 percentage points, will drop to minus 1.36 percentage points.

Canadians have discovered, through these kinds of magazines and books, that we have a taste for home-grown literature. The demand has become sufficient that these kinds of publications are staying alive in spite of high saturation, mass marketing competition from U.S. publications. But the economics of this new tax will make it tough for these kinds of publications to survive its imposition.

This brings me to a second point, honourable senators, namely, that the government has constantly claimed that its free trade deal with the United States creates a "level playing field". Yet with this tax it turns around and creates a distinct disadvantage for Canadian publishers and distributors who are already struggling to survive in the new and "freer market."

As the president of the Canadian Magazine Publishers Association pointed out before the Senate committee, Canadian publishers will face United States competitors who do not have to charge their subscribers a 7 per cent tax. That 7 per cent disadvantage, combined with economies of scale that are 10 to 20 times bigger than what the Canadian market can provide, may make it even more difficult for Canadian publishers to maintain a periodical publishing industry in this country.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

My final point, honourable senators, pertains to literacy and the shocking levels of functional illiteracy among Canada's adult population. I have spoken about this at some length during debate in the Senate. The government's own statistical research body, Statistics Canada, stated a few months ago, in a special survey done for International Literacy Year, that over one-third of our adult citizens—that is, 38 per cent—are not strong enough readers to meet every day reading demands.

If more than one-third of our adult Canadians had an infectious disease, we would declare an epidemic and take radical measures to cure it. But, instead, despite of all of the good intentions that have been reiterated by the government, and measures launched by the government in recent years, in 1990, in International Literacy Year, the government is imposing a tax that will make reading materials even more inaccessible to potential learners and volunteer teachers.

What kind of symbol is that at a time when we are trying to persuade Canadians to become a nation of readers? And what about Canadians on the margins? In his speech, Senator Poitras made a statement, which particularly impressed me, to the effect that when a book— possibly a valuable book—is written, whatever its price, people will buy it and read it. To a degree, I think that is true. I think that is true for everyone here in the Senate. In other words, with or without this tax we will buy it and read it.

But what about Canadians on the margins — that is, people who do not budget by the month or even by the week, but who budget by the day, item by item? For those people books very definitely fall into the category of being a luxury. They may be poor parents with children who are starting off with a whole lot of strikes against them. It is very difficult in such circumstances, when such people are struggling to maintain a home, to feed and clothe a child, to instill in them an interest or an understanding of the importance of learning to read and the lifelong enjoyment that that learning can produce. It is the same thing with single parents who are trying to cope with a job and at the same time trying to find enough dollars to afford child care. A tax on books will really make that item transfer from the table of "family necessity" to that of "family luxury."

Senior citizens are another group of Canadians who will be affected by this tax—and this is something that I observe constantly. I spend a great deal of time in senior citizens' homes and nursing homes. Very often the residents are people who are living on fixed incomes, pensions and the supplement, with nothing to spare, and their entire support system of friends and family has virtually gone. Books, in many circumstances, are their only continuing friends. For those people a 7 per cent tax can be a monumental sum. They also have great difficulty in availing themselves of a library service.

• (1720)

They are the kind of people in our society to whom this is an unfair tax. It is an inhibiting tax, not just for their pleasure or leisure but perhaps for their whole productive personal future.

As I have mentioned, a number of European countries have taken this into consideration. In fact, on the question of literacy, for some reason Canada has fallen behind not only the United States but many countries in Europe in how it has dealt with this issue over the years. In Europe, literacy is rightly seen as a condition fundamental to democracy and as something to be encouraged, not inhibited.

In the last several decades, we Canadians increasingly have come to appreciate and value our own cultural expression through a proliferation of Canadian books and periodicals, along with other forms of Canadian cultural expression. Our authors are acclaimed around the world, and are becoming more so every year. We rightly value these truly precious assets because they reflect our unique experiences as Canadians and because, as a people, we have a basic need to continue developing and nurturing our cultural identity.

The GST applied without relief to Canadian cultural products, including printed materials, may well make them so inaccessible that Canadians once again may lose sight of their own creative expression. But more than that, the GST will make it harder for those Canadians who are least equipped to meet tomorrow's educational challenges.

In other words, this tax, in a sense, is neutral for the winners and, in some cases, perhaps, disastrous for those who are not as fortunate as we in this chamber. True to the spirit of this government in recent years, the GST seems to slant the field even more steeply for those who will have to struggle the hardest to catch up.

For these reasons, I urge everyone in the chamber to think seriously about supporting this amendment. The Prime Minister has opened the door for us to do it. I hope that the Senate has the courage to take the first step and walk through that door, and to do so now.

[Translation]

Hon. Solange Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senators, first I would like to answer to Senator Jacques Hébert. He gives me a lot of credit when he says that Quebecers are very anxious to hear what I am going to say about that tax.

If I pay great attention to Senator Hébert's comments, it is because of him that I am an author before being a senator. In 1963, he was the publisher of my first book, Dear Enemies, a small publication that still sells today and that was written in co-operation with a famous author whose name was Guetilyn Graham.

He wants to know what is the position of this author on the GST.

Last week had to be fateful. I have published my sixteenth book, strangely entitled Agony and Relief. The title becomes probably real today since I am torn between the agony of being an author and the relief of being loyal to the party I have the honour to belong to. As you, Liberal senators, have been loyal to your leaders all along those tactics against the GST.

I will read to you two paragraphs that say exactly what I think as an author of the application of the law to books. They are taken from a letter I wrote on September 20th, 1990, to Senator Lowell Murray, who will forgive my indiscretion. If I took the trouble to write it, you can be sure I really meant it.

> I am writing to you as an author, sir, and not as a senator, in order to call upon you to try and understand the danger that threatens French and English literature in Canada.
> GST will burden our publications so dramatically that our identity as Quebecers and Canadians may lose its strength and richness because of it. The authors who form a distinct and essential social group know how important that tax is to reduce the heavy deficit but all of them, including myself, believe with the publishers and booksellers that the publishing industry should be exempted of that tax . . .

I do not think, Madam, that what I am saying is funny at all. It goes on:

> . . . that may jeopardize the sale of our books in our society.

If I had stood up in this House tonight to speak on the GST or its effect on our books, I would have spoken against it. As much as you, I think that this tax is dangerous. Also as much as you, I am loyal enough to assume that when the prime minister states on television that he himself is extremely worried with the effect of that tax on our books, it is my duty as a senator to make him understand and to commit myself in front of my Conservative colleagues to remind him of his commitment. It is also my duty to remind as much as I possibly can to Mr. Wilson, the Minister of Finance, that he ought to either abolish it or amend it.

Believe me, there are many instances in life, as you know better than I do—but I have a certain experience as a writer and as a person—when one has to choose between strong personal principles and loyalty to one's own people.

As a French-speaking Quebecer, I know that the collective well-being must often come first. It is in that heartbreaking situation that I am today. That is why I stood up to share my thoughts with you. They are nothing compared to the general outcry against the application of that tax to our books. As much as Senator Fairbairn and Senator Hébert, I am worried about the future, but I am convinced that a tax can be amended once passed.

[English]

I would like to remind you that when we adopted Bill 101 in Quebec, it was a terrible fight. My colleague, Senator Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, put up that fight for four months. But a few years later, because of the protestations and accusations, because of the fries for justice of so many Quebecers, that tax—

[Translation]

I don't know how to say it in English, my apologies to the interpreters; this tax was relieved of all its irritants. I very strongly believe that the tax must be relieved of its irritants, as far as books are concerned.

As a woman and a writer, I believe that we must change this element of the GST, and I beg the pardon of my colleagues who disagree with me on this. However, my loyalty to the Prime Minister of Canada remains unchanged, and that is why I will vote against your amendment.

• (1730)

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Will the honourable senator deal with a question, please?

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senators, I have said everything that I have to say. I have said it all.

Senator Stewart: I was just going to point out that there appears to be a contradiction between the honourable senator's position and that of Senator Poitras.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: I have said, senator, that my position may not be the same as that of my colleagues, but it is mine. In this institution we all have our freedom, and I have mine.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to Senator Chaput-Rolland.

Senator Simard: She said that she had said everything she wanted to say.

Senator Hébert: I thought I heard you say at the end of your speech that you were going to vote against this amendment, and throughout your speech, you said that you were against the tax.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senators, I am afraid I expressed myself very badly. I stated my position as an author by saying that I was afraid of this tax, but I wished very strongly that the Prime Minister of Canada would fulfill his promise to amend or transform it, and that, out of loyalty for him, I would vote in favour of this tax because, generally speaking, Canada needs it.

I have now said everything I had to say and I certainly cannot be blamed if you do not understand me.

Hon. Claude Castonguay: Honourable senators, had Senator Hébert been here when Senator Chaput-Rolland had the floor he might have understood.

Senator Hébert: Perhaps I understood better than you think, but if you want the floor I will listen.

Senator Castonguay: You missed most of the remarks of Senator Chaput-Rolland. No wonder you cannot understand.

Senator Hébert: She repeated something that was very clear at the end. Indeed I did miss the beginning of her remarks, you are right. But when she summed up at the end she said: As a Quebec author I fear that tax and I hope the Prime Minister decides to change it. On the other hand, because I belong to the Conservative Party I have to vote on the side of my Prime Minister. That is what I understood. I see a contradiction between what she thinks of the tax and her partisan approach which will dictate how she votes.

Senator Simard: Partisanship is something you would know.

Senator Hébert: When it coincides with my conscience it does not bother me. This is not a clear-cut case to me.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, pursuant to provisional rule P-3(a), I request that the division be deferred until 5:45 o'clock p.m. on the next sitting day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the division on the motion stands deferred until tomorrow at 5:45 p.m.
