Senator Gigantès: I stand corrected. I am glad you told me. Unfortunately, I did not have the good fortune to stay longer. I had to return to Ottawa, which itself is one of the most beautiful capitals in the world. Where else in the world can one live in the forest, as I do, 18 minutes from Parliament Hill?

Senator Corbin: In New Brunswick.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, but that is not from this Parliament Hill. That is another Parliament Hill.

Senator Corbin: You don't need a parliamentary building.

Senator Gigantès: I would miss the company of our wonderful friends. Where else would I get to see Senator Cogger? Perhaps in Montreal, but then I would have to go a very long distance to go to the woods.

Senator Cogger: I do not live in Montreal. I live in an equally beautiful part of the world. I live in the Eastern Townships in the town of Brome Lake, which is the result of the amalgamation six years ago of the village of Knowlton, Bonneville and the village of Foster. The village of Foster was named after the Foster family. There was an eminent gentleman by the name of Foster who turned out to be the legislative counsellor in Quebec which was the equivalent of the Upper Chamber in the provincial legislature. I invite you to come and visit with us and acquaint yourself with the good area I am fortunate to live in. Unfortunately for you, our people down there have the good sense not to petition, especially through Liberal senators, against measures that will reinforce the Canadian economy.

Senator Gigantès: You are perfectly right. The Eastern Townships are wonderful. I was Dean of Bishop's University as well. Therefore, I again had the great benefit of the hospitality of the people of the Eastern Townships who were absolutely wonderful. General Price used to downhill ski in his 80s.

Senator Cogger: He was a brigadier, sir. His name was Jack Price. His daughter, Mrs. Winser, subsequently became Canadian representative in Los Angeles. He won the Military Cross in the First and Second World Wars.

Senator Gigantès: In the army, one calls a lieutenant colonel, "Colonel", and a brigadier general, "General". One does not say Rear-Admiral, one says "Admiral". However, one does not expect a civilian to know about military flattery.

There seems to be a preponderance of women on this petition, which may indicate the fact that women who run households and have children are possibly more conscious of the true facts of the economy than are men.

Senator Fairbairn: Many of them are single mothers.

Senator Gigantès: Many are single mothers who are the most discriminated group in our society, apart from our aboriginal people. They are truly discriminated against. Not only do they have to work, they have to run a household as well. If their children are very young, they generally are forced into the great poverty of the welfare system, which takes from them any money they might earn outside. But that is for another occasion.

I now have 27 names on a petition which I will not read individually. The petition concerns the GST, like all the others. It is also from Alberta.

(Names of signatories read.)

There are people of Scandinavian descent in Alberta. They are among the finest people I have ever met. They have brought to this country a great sense of civic pride, just as they did in Minnesota. They are solid citizens whose name is of Scandinavian descent, I am sure.

Our friend, the senator opposite, I am sure has a name of Scandinavian descent. I would be proud if I were of Scandinavian descent. I admire the quality of their character and strength.

I am proud of these petitioners, all opposed to this iniquitous, badly constructed, ridiculous tax that can only harm the country, and I am sure some of them are in business. They know how heavy the burden of administering an ill-conceived tax will be.

Incidentally, when and if we ever get around to discussing the GST itself, around July, I intend to give you a six-hour economic analysis of the policies followed by your government and how they could have avoided this tax, reduced the deficit by $85 million and had the economy in a much better state to enter into this recession, made in Canada as the Conference Board of Canada, the Business Council on National Issues, the Manufacturers' Association and the Chamber of Commerce have just said.

Honourable senators, it is suicidal and masochistic to create a recession. Anyhow, we will get to that, as I say, around July perhaps. That is, if you behave and repent; above all if you repent.

I once encountered a Greek right in the middle of Morocco in Kenifra, in the middle of the Atlas mountains. And it was in 1953, and the French were trying to overthrow the Sultan Mohammad V of Morocco, and they organized a diffa, which is a great big celebration, and all the tribal chieftains and petty sultans and beys, and so on, who resented the centralizing tendencies of Sultan Mohammad V were invited by the French to this diffa in Kenifra and there was a El Glaoui who was the boss of Marrakesh and a friend of Mr. Churchill's. Churchill used to visit El Glaoui and stay in his palace and warm his bones away from the very cold, humid British winters, and there was Sharif El Kitani who temporarily succeeded Sultan Mohammad V.

There also was an, absolutely fantastic spread, the centrepiece of which was a baby camel stuffed with small lambs, stuffed themselves with hare and the hare stuffed with chicken livers, and it was brought on an enormous platter carried by four men and the host, who was El Glaoui Pasha of Marrakech, plucked out one of the eyes of the camel and put in my hand and plucked out the other and put it in the hand of my former wife and I said to her, "Swallow", and that, I think, was the beginning of the end of our marriage.

Senator David: Was that taxable?

Senator Gigantès: If the Tories had been there, they would have taxed the eyes out of that camel, that's for sure.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Michel Cogger: A point of order, please. If I may, my point of order relates to this procedure that has been adopted throughout of reading the names of petitioners, individually. I would like to quote and seek your ruling on the following, Your Honour.

On March 16, 1988, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and and Order, Honourable Senator Molgat presented the Sixth Report. He said:

> Honourable senators, the matter that we deal with in the Sixth Report has to do with the presentation of petitions to the Senate . . .

Further on, he said:

> The problem that arose, and which the committee considered, was the request made by certain senators that the text of the petition itself and the list of names be included in Senate Debates and in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. It was determined that this was a costly procedure and, further, that it was an awkward procedure in that it meant a tremendous amount of extra work for the staff and on at least one occasion delayed the publication of Senate Debates the following day.
> The committee considered this very carefully. The committee considered the practice that is currently followed in the other place and recommends that henceforth names not be printed and that petition itself not be printed.
> Senators must at all times be able to present petitions from citizens, but in order to handle this in a practical manner, it is the recommendation of the committee that the senator so doing be asked to state briefly what the petition is about and how many signatures are on it, if he or she so wishes. But in future there will not be any printing, as such, of those names. This recommendation separates the procedures to be followed for those petitions in the form of requests from a large number of citizens, from the procedures relating to petitions for private bills.

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

It goes on a little further, and Senator Molgat, quoting again on behalf of his committee, gives an example of how a petition should be properly presented and says, for instance,

"If the senator presenting a petition does not wish to say, "I have 7,000 names from Prince Edward Island, it is not necessary for him to do so; it will be satisfactory just to present the petition. If he wants to provide the number of signatories, however, that is something else.

I believe, Your Honour, that what we have witnessed in the last fifteen hours or so is not according to the rules. I suggest to Your Honour that, for instance in the case of Senator Gigantès, apparently it would suffice if he said "I have a petition from however many citizens from Alberta who wish to oppose the tax", and table it. Might I ask that you rule on this matter, Your Honour.

Senator Frith: Senator, speaking to the point of order—

Senator Cogger: Senator Frith—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Yes, I think I am prepared to make a ruling.

An Hon. Senator: Without listening to any debate?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: If you listen to me, I am prepared to make a ruling that would make any intervention by you unnecessary.

Senator Gigantès: Another usurper; another usurper.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: My ruling is, unless you insist, that Senator Cogger has not raised a valid point of order.

An Hon. Senator: I don't think you have taken it so well.

Senator Frith: Senator Cogger, perhaps you would like to go out and call in the press.

Senator Cogger: Win or lose, we appeal.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Balfour certainly has found a way to get my attention.

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: May I ask Senator Cogger a question? Is he implying that the Liberals are filibustering against the GST? Is that the implication of his alleged point of order?

Senator Cogger: I am not implying anything of the sort, Sir, and anybody who tells me this side of the house is partisan, I would fight it.

Senator Frith: Defend it to the death.

Senator Gigantès: What generosity. You see, there is good in everyone, even in Senator Cogger.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Phillipe D. Gigantès: I have pointed out that there have been another four Greeks on the previous petition and I am very proud of them because the Greeks have gone everywhere and, present company excepted on this side Greeks are wonderful.

Senator Barootes: I don't need your insults. I get enough as it is.

Senator Gigantès: I am not insulting you. I said you are wonderful. Now, there we are, they don't understand English. What is this?

(Names of signatories read.)

There is no place with such a charm as Ireland, especially the women of Ireland. They really tug at the strings of your heart and that lilting accent—let us not waste time.

Senator Cogger: No, let's proceed.

Senator Gigantès: There is a petitioner listed here from Medicine Hat. Actually they are spelling it "Med Hat" and I mind, because Medicine Hat is such a wonderful name. It makes one think of the Lone Ranger and his friend Tonto.

Senator Cogger: An old Canadian tradition.

(Names of signatories read.)

Incidentally, they do have mutton and good lamb in Alberta. You need hilly country really for good mutton, otherwise if the sheep are in low plains and the plains get soggy at any time, they get footrot and die. But on the hillside the water drains well, and the sheep thrive.

Senator Cogger: Improbable farmer.

Senator Bosa: You permit a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Bosa: But with all the mutton that is imported from Australia, is Australia a hilly country, a hilly continent that would be suitable for sheep raising like the honourable senator contends it should be?

Senator Gigantès: No, they don't have the moisture that we have in so many parts of Canada. Actually, I have always been puzzled by the fact that we do not raise more sheep in Canada, because we have splendid areas for raising sheep and we need not import as much as we do. I would like to see that, because I like lamb in the spring for Easter. I ask, is there anything better, cooked with thyme and oregano and lemon?

Senator Bosa: And sage, too.

Senator Gigantès: Sage, absolutely and good wine and dancing around the pit where it is being roasted.

There is a Mrs. Shirley Mutton also. Some of these names, you realize, are descended from the job that people performed. The Smiths, for example, were all blacksmiths. I am always puzzled by such names words as bishops and wondering how you can have descendants of bishops before the reformation, because there were people named "Bishop" then. We have name of "Bishop" when celibacy was a natural rule for bishops, so one wonders how that could be. nickname. Somebody behaved like a bishop, had the dignity of a bishop. Who knows. Let's not explore this too much.

I wish Anglophones would adopt the habit of crossing their sevens as do the people on the continent of Europe. It makes it much easier to distinguish between a seven and a one. In this case it was a little difficult to read.

Senator Bosa: It isn't only the Anglophones that are not doing that, it is Canadians in general. I mean, surely the Honourable senator would not point a finger only at the Anglophone community. French Canadians aren't noted for crossing their sevens. I have never seen that, unless I am mistaken.

Senator Gigantès: You cannot expect a Quebec Senator to say anything critical about the people of his province. I will leave that to Senator Cogger.

Senator Cogger: I know I am accused of being suspicious but could I ask a question? Perhaps the deputy leader could answer me. Are the Senators on the opposite side of the house are trying to run up a lot of time?

Senator Gigantès: Perish the thought. How could you possibly suspect us of such a thing? Here we are performing, as Beauchesne says, one of the most sacred and ancient functions of Parliament.

I will give you the reference again: Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms of the House of Commons of Canada with Annotations, Comments, and Precedents, 5th edition by Alistair Fraser, B.A. Ll.b., clerk of the House of Commons, G.A. Birch, B.Sc., D.P.A.M.A., clerk of Committee's House of Commons and W.F. Dawson, B.A., M.A., D.Phil. a great scholar, and a professor of political science at the University of Western Ontario, one of the summits of Canadian scholarship.

Senator Stewart: The son of a great father.

Senator Gigantès: Please tell us about his father.

Senator Stewart: His father was professor R.M. Dawson, Robert McGregor Dawson, whose book on the Government of Canada was for many years the classic text on the Government of Canada. The son at Western has concentrated more narrowly than his father did on procedures of the House of Commons; that is why he became involved in the preparation of the volume to which you have just now made reference.

Before I resume my seat, I must say, we in this chamber must not fall into the trap of assuming that a book prepared for the use of the other place can be applied automatically here. This is a very different house, with very different traditions. We must resist what is almost inevitably a constant temptation to import the patterns of the other house here. We must resist that constantly, honourable senators.

Senator Gigantès: I am glad you pointed that out, sir, so I will shift to Erskine May's Treatise on the Law of Privileges, Proceedings and Usage of Parliament. This is the 18th edition, 1971, edited by Sir Barnett Cocks, K.C.B., O.B.E.—

Senator Stewart: I knew him well.

Senator Gigantès: He was clerk of the House of Commons. A very, distinguished scholar in parliamentary procedure. This book is published in London by Butterworth and Co. (Publishers), well-known scholarly publishers, who also have branches in Sydney, Melbourne, and Brisbane, known as Butterworth and Co. (Australia) Ltd. and in Toronto, known as Butterworth and Co. (Canada) Ltd. All lawyers know about this particular publishing firm. In Wellington and Auckland in New Zealand, they are known as Butterworth and Co. (New Zealand) Ltd. The New Zealand, as the Australian and Canada, are in parenthesis. Also in Durhan, they are known as Butterworth and Co., (South Africa) (Pty) Ltd.

What this particular book is dealing with is the history and the development of parliament—I am referring to Chapter XXXII which is on public petitions, and it talks of the course of development of the form of petitioning.

> The right of petitioning the Crown and the Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the Constitution.

Here he is talking of how the system developed in parliaments of British persuasion:

> It has been uninterruptedly exercised from very early times, and has had a profound effect in determining the main forms of Parliamentary procedure.

I will skip a few lines to save time:

> Public petitions may pray for an alteration of the general law or the re-consideration of a general administrative decision, and they may also pray for redress of local or personal grievances.

The rights of petitioners were laid down by two resolutions of the Commons in 1669. This pre-dates the foundation of Canada by nearly two centuries, and it is clearly stated in the Constitution of 1867 that our Constitution, the British North America Act of 1867, is an offspring of British practices and British constitutional custom.

Senator Stewart: That is before you were born.

Senator Gigantès: A little, yes. I know I look a little younger than my age, as do you, Senator. Your elegance, your sartorial perfection is a wonder to behold. I am delighted that I am your colleague and we are on the same side. I cannot possible imagine you with those people over there.

In any event, the rights of petitioners were laid down by two resolutions of the Commons in 1669. That is the Mother of Parliaments of the British persuasion.

I think the Greeks proclaim that the mother of Parliament universally was the Assembly of Athens established by Solon, 594 B.C. but we will talk about that another time. I quote now—

Senator Stewart: Honourable Senator, will you permit a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Stewart: You made reference to antiquity.

Senator Gigantès: Yes.

Senator Stewart: I have been led to believe that on one occasion Philip of Macedon was approached by an elderly woman who had a matter about which she wished to place a petition in his hands. He was returning, I believe, from battle. He was very, very weary and dismissed her curtly.

Now, I am told that she said, "Sir, if you are not prepared to do your duty as king by hearing my petition then, Sir, the time has come for you to abdicate."

This would suggest that the practice of those in authority, in this case kings, princes, call them what you will, receiving petitions, is of very great antiquity. I ask you, sir, as a great scholar in these matters, to say whether or not this story is accurate.

Senator Gigantès: It is, indeed, true and, of course, it goes much further than that. If you look at the Iliad of Homer, that is the oldest written text of the western civilization. We have a case that is even more applicable to what is happening now, the case of Thersythes. Thersythes was a commoner, an ordinary soldier and he was there, unwillingly probably, with the troops besieging Troy.

Senator Bosa: When sould that have been?

Senator Gigantès: There is a dispute as to when it happened, because the remains of the city which Schliemann assumed to be Troy have been found and there are various layers indicating that there were destructions that occurred at that city. Homer tells us that it was set afire by the Greeks when they captured it.

However, there are two different instances during that geological history of Troy where a fire occurred and carbon tests placed them a couple of centuries apart, but we are talking about 1000 B.C., 1200 B.C. and perhaps 800 B.C. Homer wrote four centuries later, however.

Senator Bosa: If my memory serves me correctly, Homer was blind, wasn't he?

Senator Gigantès: Absolutely.

Senator Bosa: And he could not write—

Senator Gigantès: Absolutely blinded. It was one of the cruel customs which the—

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Michel Cogger: A point of order, Mr. Chairman, please. With respect to senators on the other side, their Bible appears to be Bourinot and Parliamentary procedure, Fourth edition.

Senator Bosa: No, we were talking about ancient history.

Senator Cogger: Yes, I appreciate that. However, I would like to point out that according to Bourinot, page 233, a senator in presenting a petition may briefly explain its purport but other members may not discuss its contents. I suggest to your Honour, that both Senator Bosa and Senator Stewart were out of order in their recent interventions, and I am seeking a ruling on the point.

An Hon. Senator: Don't you understand English? We are not discussing the content; we are discussing the antecedents of the rule, Sir.

[Senator Stewart.]

Senator Gigantès: That was my understanding.

An Hon. Senator: What was that again?

Senator Cogger: You only have an hour to go.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable Senators, what I said earlier with regard to Beauchesne is equally applicable in the case of Bourinot. These are books which derive from the rules, practice and experience at the House of Commons.

The situation which we now find—

Senator Cogger: I am sorry, it says "a senator" it does not say "a member". It says "a senator in presenting a petition may briefly explain its purport but other members may not discuss its contents".

Obviously, in this case, "members" means another member of the same place; of the Senate.

Senator Stewart: I don't take that—

Senator Cogger: Are you telling me you agree you are out of order?

Senator Stewart: I could write a book on the Senate—

Senator Barootes: And you did.

Senator Stewart: No, no, not yet.

Senator Barootes: We are preparing a disclaimer for everything you are going to heap—

Senator Stewart: I thank you, Senator Barootes, you are most helpful. I could write a book, I suppose, on the Senate. Senator Cogger could write a book.

Senator Cogger: No, no.

Senator Frith: Are you sure?

Senator Stewart: I am talking theoretically. I could write a book and say all sorts of things; for example, that members from Quebec may speak only in French. That's one point.

The only authority I think you and I will have to recognize is the Chair. That's why I am asking the Chair for a ruling. The problem, Senator Cogger, is—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What's the point of order? I wasn't here when the point of order was raised. Is there a point of order being raised?

Senator Cogger: Yes.

Senator Frith: Is it being raised because you want to try this on every successive Senator because you have already had a ruling against that?

Senator Cogger: I know—

Senator Frith: I don't know whether the present occupant of the Chair was here when Senator Balfour made a ruling and I take it you intend to raise this point of order 23 times and just keep changing. Do you intend to raise it when you get in the Chair?

Senator Cogger: I am sorry, I didn't realize you people were in a rush. I will shut up. You seem to be in such a hurry—are you getting anywhere?

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Cogger: We have all the time in the world, don't we? My point of order is that—

Senator Frith: That is what I am asking. Do you intend to keep raising the same point of order?

Senator Cogger: This is a different point of order.

Senator Frith: Another way of saying the same thing.

Senator Cogger: Senator, please listen for a second. It says here, that a senator in presenting a petition may briefly explain its purport but other members may not discuss its contents.

I am suggesting that both Senators Stewart and Bosa, in discussing the contents of the petition presented by Senator Gigantès, are out of order.

Senator Frith: What are you citing?

Senator Cogger: Bourinot.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, who has raised this matter in this Chamber is Senator Cogger by quoting Bourinot's rule that applied to petitions and he is the instigator of this debate because what Senator Gigantès was doing was he was giving the roots, where petitions originated so as to inform us, to inform me, to inform maybe the honourable gentleman opposite if he were not aware of how petitions originated.

● (1700)

So it was in order to inform me, to inform, perhaps, the honourable gentleman if he was not aware of petitions originated and how there came to be parliamentary rules, and this is what Senator Gigantès was saying when he was talking about Homer, because it goes back 3,000 years, when these petitions were presented to the rulers of the day; I implore Senator Gigantès to keep that up because I studied this subject, but I admit I have forgotten some of the things of which Senator Gigantès is informing us. Please continue.

Senator Cogger: When I listened to the position as presented by Senator Gigantès, when he refers to contents, it is so wide it encompasses anything and everything. For the last hour we have heard about the wildflowers of Alberta, the cattle, the raising of sheep, the foot and mouth disease, the dance partners in Lethbridge, the RCMP thereat and so on and so forth. That is fine. That is his petition and its content.

I only suggest that when you, Senator Bosa, or you, Senator Stewart, jump into the debate, you are out of order. That is my simple point. Your Honour, may I have a ruling?

Senator Bosa: On the same point of order that Senator Cogger has just mentioned, I was not discussing with Senator Gigantès the content of the petition.

Senator Cogger: So you were out of order, then.

Senator Bosa: We were trying to get to the bottom of the argument that Senator Cogger instigated by invoking the wording and the ruling of Bourinot as to the origin of petitions. This is what we were discussing, this is what we were trying to get to the bottom of, so there is no point of order. You are the one, Senator, who started this.

Senator Cogger: Senator Bosa, if you discussed something that has nothing to do with the petition, I suggest you are out of order, and according to Bourinot, if you discuss or intervene through the contents of that petition, you are out of order. You cannot have it two ways.

Senator Bosa: Perhaps I was not laconic in my way of expressing myself, but may I say that the questions I was putting to Senator Gigantès had to do with the origins of the petitions. I was not discussing the content of the petition but the origin of the rule, and how it evolved into a state where it is now enshrined in Bourinot's rules.

Senator Cogger: Let's wait for the Chair's ruling.

Senator Frith: We have to debate this matter.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, Senator Cogger feels that I should render a judgement or a decision on the matter I would prefer to wait, but if he insists, my predecessor has already ruled that you have no point of order.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Senator Gigantès: I was saying before I was pointedly interrupted—

Senator Frith: When you change Speakers, will you let us know so we can come in and do it all over again?

Senator Gigantès: The first literary mention of a petition episode involving a petitioner and a Tory is in the Iliad. Thersytes—did you get the spelling last time? T-H-E-R-S-Y-T-E-S, was an ordinary soldier, and he presented himself to Agamemnon, A-g-a-m-e-m-n-o-n, Agamnenon, the name of a tragedy, of course, written by Aeschylus, the man who sacrificed his daughter, Iphigenia, so that the gods would—I beg your pardon?

An Hon. Senator: There are two m's in Agamemnon.

Senator Gigantès: Please don't try to challenge my spelling in ancient Greek, okay?

Senator Stewart: Did you learn Greek at the same place?

Senator Gigantès: I have got the marks to show it. I was taught by people who hit me if I made mistakes.

Anyway, Thersytes presented a petition to Agamemnon. Those were really Tory times because the leaders of the Greeks were very conservative. They thought that people had no rights, and had no right to present petitions, and Homer tells us how Ulysses beat up Thersytes and how the other soldiers saw this and felt offended by the behavior of their leaders. So it is a very old custom.

Senator Stewart: Did Penelope do anything?

Senator Gigantès: Well, she was weaving and sort of unweaving her cloth while Ulysses was spending his time, first ten years in Troy and then running around the Mediterranean for ten other years, having allegedly unwilling affairs with various ladies all around, and then he came home and she accepted him. Now, this is remarkable and, in my view, a little stupid.

Anyhow, it is quite clear that the right to petition is very often the right of petitioning the Crown. Have you forgotten the references? It is on page 792, of the 1971 edition. If you want more details, I can give it to you, or I can have it photostated and sent to you.

> The right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the Constitution. It has been uninterruptedly exercised from early times, and has had a profound effect in determining the main forms of Parliamentary procedure.

The great St. Louis of France, Louis IX, used to sit under an oak tree at Vincennes and petitioners would come to him. Of course, there is the episode between Alexander and Diogenes. Alexander, who had just conquered Athens, had received so many petitions that when he arrived before the barrel, where Diogenes, the Athenean cynic philosopher was, he said then, "What is your petition?" and Diogenes said, "Get out of my sun." So I think that the point of order—

Senator Stewart: Would you come back to my question?

Senator Gigantès: The question that Senator Stewart posed relative to Philip is indeed a story that we find in fragments from Greek historians. Ephorus is one of them who mentions it, and you cannot tell if it is a true story or not. The story goes on to say that Philip stopped and listened to the petition and granted it. So he was a good king.

While we were in Greece on a Parliamentary mission we were taken to see the tomb of Philip, which had just been discovered. In that tomb there is an incredible fresco. It is about 50 kilometres from Salonika in Macedonia, and we were being given lunch by the Minister for northern Greece, and one of the members of our delegation, a Tory, naturally, got up and said, "Aw, Minister, we didn't know back in Canada you had this kind of stuff. I mean,. that Philip, he was the dad of, what was his name? Alexander. We knew that you had some ancient stuff, but this gold, we never knew about it." The Minister said to me in Greek, "I don't believe this guy." I said, in Greek also, "Minister, you have people like them in the Greek Parliament, too." He said, "Yes, but we don't let them out of the country." I said, "Minister, you probably are losing the flavour of what he's saying in the translation." And the Minister said, "Don't give me that shit. I'm a Harvard man."

Senator Frith: What?

Senator Gigantès: "Don't give me that excrement. I'm a Harvard man." I do apologize for the use of an unparliamentary word.

Anyway, where were we? We were with the sheep. Yes.

(Names of signatories read.)

Over to you, Senator.

Senator Hébert: To me? All right.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Gigantès: We have more time.

Senator Hébert: Well, I go back to this list of petitions, and I read again the petition itself so that we are all aware that we are on the right subject.

Petition on the subject of the proposed national goods and services tax.

> We the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax."

I am now reading you some of these names. They are all from Nova Scotia, by the way.

(Names of signatories read.)

Senator Hébert: It is certainly interesting place that Senator Gigantès visited. He must have lots of anecdotes to tell us later on the subject.

(Names of signatories read.)

Senator Hébert: Senator Cogger is not here. I am reading the straight list without any comments, and I thought that would have been appreciated by Senator Cogger, but he left. I am sure that some of you people will tell him what happened, that I was reading the names without losing any time.

(Names of signatories read.)

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: I beg your pardon.

Senator Hébert: We were asking you whether you thought Hervé Guénette was an Acadian living in Shearwater, Nova Scotia.

Senator Corbin: I have no idea, I am reading Julius Caeser's Commentari de bello gallico.

Senator Hébert: I picked up a pile of petitions from the Province of Quebec. I can pick and choose, as I have some from all the provinces of Canada. If you would like to hear some from Prince Edward Island, I can grant your wish; I have some from all over.

For the moment I have a few from Quebec which I would like to present to you. Honourable senators, I have the honour of presenting a petition signed by 180 citizens from the region of Desbiens, Quebec. They are asking the Senate to reject the GST bill.

Desbiens is a small village in the Lac St-Jean region. It is a region where, it must be said, the governing party managed to get quite a few votes, with the help of the separatists, of course. However, in the meantime, these people have had time to think and they are asking us to vote against a bill which the government considers to be one of its most important pieces of legislation.

I think it is significant that such a large number of people from such a small place feel that way. Desbiens is not a large village, I do not know what the population is exactly. It is a pretty village, an interesting one, but not a large one.

Senator Corbin: Feeling the full force of the recession.

Senator Hébert: These people are telling us that they feel they were wrong to vote as they did. They are telling the government that they want nothing to do with their so-called important legislation.

Senator Bosa: What riding is the village in?

Senator Hébert: I do not know.

Senator Corbin: You may continue, I will look it up.

Senator Hébert: It may be in the Chicoutimi riding. Desbiens is the name of the village. Among the signatures, I see the name of Jacinthe Tremblay, a name which is very characteristic of the Lac St-Jean and Chicoutimi areas, where half of the people are called Tremblay. That is a figure of speech, of course! 183 9th Avenue, Desbiens. Carol Gagnon, that is also a name typical of the Lac St-Jean area; there are a lot of Gagnons in that part of the world. Ms Gagnon lives at 183 9th Avenue; George Girard, 173 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Laurent Dufour, 128 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Edith Lepage, 163 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Pierre Blouin, 163 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Odile Boudreau, 236 12th Avenue, Desbiens; Jacques Gagnon, 78 9th Avenue, Desbiens; René Boily, 78 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Michel Gagnon, 28 9th Avenue, Desbiens; there follows a name which I cannot read to you, as it is impossible to decipher; Line Boily, 71 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Sylvain Néron, 91 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Yvan Néron, 91 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Gaston Néron—now that is an unusual name; I wonder if there are many of them in that area; Néron is a name one associates with emperors; Néron in French and Nero in Spanish, and in Greek—I do not know! Gaston Perron, 91 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Lousie Turcotte, 128 2nd Avenue, Desbiens; Denise Desmeules, 139 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Brother Edouard Laverdière, he is a cleric, then, a Marist, I would expect; Marise Simard, 224 13th Avenue, Desbiens; Anik Simard, 224 2nd Avenue, Desbiens; when a page is available this sheet is ready to be picked up. Carl Simon, 224 13th Avenue, Desbiens; Michel Cloutier, 284 13th Avenue, Desbiens; Didyme Laporte; now that is a Christian name one seldom sees today, it is a fine name, there is in fact a Saint Didymus; 1202 13th Avenue, Desbiens; Claire Lacroix, 12 Hébert Avenue, Desbiens; Lucette Simard, 391 13th Avenue, Desbiens; Lise Bilodeau, 383 13th Avenue, Desbiens; Jacques Tremblay, here are the Tremblays again, 410 13th Avenue, Desbiens; Chantal Tremblay, 410 13th Avenue, Desbiens.

Senator Bosa: Any relation to Senator Tremblay?

Senator Hébert: Everyone is somewhat related in Quebec.

Senator Tremblay: We are all descendants of the same ancestor who came over here 350 years ago.

Senator Hébert: Are you not yourself from Lac St-Jean?

Senator Tremblay: Yes.

Senator Hébert: Not Desbiens.

Senator Tremblay: No.

Senator Hébert: The next on my list is Martin Martel, Alma. Alma is a very pretty and interesting city. I can see that these people are of age from their handwriting. Colette Tremblay, Desbiens; Lucie Fortin-Scott, Alma; Marc Deschesnes, Desbiens, Lac St-Jean, Province of Quebec; it must be the riding of Lac St-Jean; Esther Dufour, Desbiens; François Tremblay, Desbiens; Manon Piché, Montreal, no doubt a tourist who was visiting; Alain Girard, Desbiens; Denise Girard, 132 Savard, Desbiens; Lina Thériault, 132 Savard, Desbiens; Mrs. Marie-Berthe Thériault, Hébertville, Quebec.

Senator Bosa: Thériault as in Senator Thériault.

Senator Hébert: Yes; I thought you were going to ask me, rather, whether Hébertville was named in my honour. I was going to humbly report that it was not, but rather in honour of my great-great-uncle, Father Hébert, whose name was Nicolas de Tolentin Hébert, and who opened up Lac St-Jean to colonization. Hébertville is a small city situated at one end of Lac St-Jean. They named this small town for my great-great-uncle. The next is Murielle Gagnon, from Varennes, Quebec, which is another area altogether, and she lives at 25 Judith Jasmin Street; Judith Jasmin was an eminent radio journalist, a woman with a great deal of heart, filled with compassion for the poor, and I am happy to note that a street has been named after her, even though it is in a small village like Varennes. I am sure that there are other streets named for Judith Jasmin elsewhere in Quebec. Whenever a page is available, I have sheet ready. The next is Chantal Lemay, 182 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Daniel Fortin, 182 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Julien Gagné 98 9th Avenue, Desbiens. Desbiens is a beautiful village in the Lac St-Jean area, but I do not know what its population is exactly; perhaps we should ask Senator Tremblay. Georgette Boily, Desbiens, ah, here we have someone from Montreal, Gilles Gagnon who was there on a trip. Jean-Marie Boily, Desbiens; Micheline Dufour, 130 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Claire Verrault, 154 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Guy Coulombe, 154 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Gertrude Boudreau, 166 9th Avenue, Desbiens; Brigitte Déry, 49 2nd Avenue, L'Ascension. That is strange, that is not at all in the same area; Claudette Tremblay, 19 2nd Avenue; Georgette Villeneuve, 11A 2nd Avenue West, L'Ascension; Marie-France Turcotte, L'Ascension; Mrs. Brigitte Lemieux, L'Ascension; Natalie Lemieux, rue des Tulipes; Dame Wally Brook, Alma; Gisèle Tremblay, L'Ascension; T. Bouchard, L'Ascension; Rose Hélène, Hébert Street, Desbiens; Patrice Girard, 1020 Hébert Street, Desbiens, Pierrette Girard, 1034 Hébert Street, Desbiens; as I was saying, Hébert Street was not named after me, but after my great-great-uncle the parish priest; he the brother of my great grandfather who was the parish priest of Kamouraska. He went to Lac St-Jean to open up the area for settlers, and brought settlers there. He furthered its colonization. Régis Julien, 1050 Hébert Street, Desbiens; Joël Desmeules, 3465 Desbiens; Fernard Desmeules, 1124 Hébert Street, Desbiens; the address I gave a moment ago, 3465, was on Hébert Street in Desbiens. There follow names here that I cannot make out, so I will skip the ones I cannot read because of the handwriting; Laval Turcotte, 156 2nd Avenue, Desbiens; Jacinthe Turcotte, that must be his wife, 256 2nd Avenue, Desbiens; Jean-Pierre Fox, 1305 Hébert Street, Desbiens, Léopold Larochelle, 1350 Hébert Street, Desbiens; Gérard Poulin, 1396

Hébert Street, Desbiens; Francine Allard, 144 Hébert Street, Desbiens. As you can see, there are a lot of people living on my street.

[English]

Senator Bosa: When did your ancestors come to Canada?

Senator Hébert: As a matter of fact, my ancestors were Acadian and they came with the very first French people to come to North America and they came to Acadia. There were three Hébert brothers. They were deported by these people. You remember the deportation of the Acadians. They put them on ships and sent them away.

[Translation]

Senator Poitras: Who deported them?

Senator Hébert: They were deported by the English, I did not say by the Conservatives.

[English]

An Hon. Senator: Did that take place between 1753 and 1759, just after the battle on the Plains of Abraham?

Senator Hébert: I will tell you the story. These three Héberts were sent down the coast of the United States. Some went as far as Louisiana, and eventually they came back. One of them, my direct ancestor, came back to Quebec City and he had a fiancée that he had left, because they had been sent different ways on, different ships. And so my ancestor came back on foot, I presume, across the United States and back to Quebec City. He did not go back to Acadia, which was not a nice place to go in those days.

An Hon. Senator: Not only in those days, it still is a nice place.

Senator Hébert: It is, of course. So he went back to Quebec City and he finally found his girlfriend and fiancee, and they got married. I was told by an Acadian, a Franciscan brother, who made some research, that the famous poem Evangeline by Longfellow was inspired by this event that concerned my ancestor who came back to Quebec City.

Senator Bosa: I don't know if honourable senators are aware that, when one takes a tour of Charlottetown, a similar story is told about the deportation of French Canadians, and the story is about this young lady who was separated from her fiance and they never got together. She died of a broken heart.

Senator Hébert: That is another poem, but it is not the same.

Senator Bosa: No, it is not a poem; that is a part of history. If you visit Charlottetown, and take a tour of the city, this is one of the stories the guide usually relates to the tourists.

Senator Hébert: I am proud to tell you that I lived in Charlottetown for two years. My father sent me there when I was sixteen. I was at a college called St. Dunstan's College. I am very proud to have been there. That is why I have such direct communications with some of our colleagues on the other side that happen to be from Prince Edward Island, for example Senator Phillips. We have a special type of relationship because of that.

Françoise Allaire, 144, Hébert Street, Desbiens; Eliette Verault, 951 Duport, Desbiens; Mrs. Jean-Marie Tremblay, 648, Hébert Street, Desbiens; Ursule Gagnon, same address, Desbiens; Sylvie Plourde, 370 Nolin, Alma; Gérard Tremblay, 370 Nolin, Alma; Colette Dumas, Desbiens; Lisa Portrusse, 252—17th Ave., Desbiens; Fréménile Desmeules, 279—16th Ave; Rosie Dorée, Desbiens; Odilde Grenon, Desbiens; Gilles Tremblay, 346—5495, Desbiens; Anne-Marie Martin, 24 Marguerite, Metapetchwan, which is a native name given to a village—also charming—not far from Desbiens; Noella Martin, 34 St. Antoine, Metapetchwan; Marlene Martel, 420—11th Ave., Desbiens; Audrey Martel, 420—11th Ave., Desbiens; Bertrand Martel, same address; Madeleine Allard, Desbiens, same address; Paul-Émile Bilodeau, same address; Sylvie Fortin, 251 Olympia, St. Léon, Québec; Frédéric Tremblay, 255 Olympia, St. Léon. (I don't know St. Léon; can anyone be of assistance?) Linda Tremblay, 228 Damas, St. Léon; Rhéaume Martel, 225, Principale Street, St. Lazaire; Marlene Gagnon, 239, Principale Street, St. Lazaire; Julien Boilie, 277, Principale Street, St. Lazaire; Hélène Goudreau, 271 Principale Street, St. Lazaire.

Senator Corbin: That is an Acadian name, the same family as the Boudreaults to be found in Halifax.

Senator Hébert: Annie Bernier, 281 Principale Street, St. Lazaire; Sylvie Gallant, 285 Principale Street, St. Lazaire.

Senator Corbin: Is it Gallant or Gallante?

Senator Hébert: Gallant or Gallante, as the English say, but it is Gallant.

Senator Corbin: Gallant is a very typical Acadian name. The fatherland of the Gallants is Prince Edward Island.

Senator Bosa: There are also Gallants in Czechoslovakia.

Senator Hébert: In Czechoslovakia? Small world, is it not?

Senator Gigantès: Do you think she is a relative of Mr. Edgar Gallant, former chairman of the Public Service Commission, a very eminent Acadian from Prince Edward Island?

Senator Corbin: Senator Gigantès is quite correct. Edgar Gallant was originally from Prince Edward Island. As I was saying a moment ago, Prince Edward Island is Gallant country.

Senator Hébert: Réjean Tremblay, Desbiens; Mario Lalancette, 640 Route 6, St. Ambroise. I think I am going to stop for a few minutes, I have others, but I am going to stop to give the floor to Senator Gigantès.

Senator Cogger: According to my calculations you now have named 796 petitioners; does that tally with your total?

Senator Hébert: Yes, Senator Cogger, that tallies with my total, but there are many missing. As I said at the beginning, I simply had some from the group . . .

Senator Cogger: —24,000, minus 796.

Senator Hébert: Quite so, very good.

Senator Gigantès: I simply wanted to mention it for your information; we have used up part of the total, i.e. two megabytes, that is to say two million signatures, and you are going to hear them all.

For the moment, although I am speaking of the good people of Alberta, I will speak French. As you know, Alberta may be the province in Canada where there are the most French immersion classes. They have really espoused bilingualism in a major way. That is admirable. I want to congratulate the senators from Alberta for this initiative which furthers national solidarity.

Senator Corbin: Senator Gigantès, do you remember the bilingual welcome we received in the spring when our party held a leadership convention in Calgary?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, Senator Corbin, it was absolutely marvellous. I also remember those wonderful young anglophones who welcomed us in very clear French and, of course, I remember the generosity and hospitality of the Albertans, which was incredible. It is extraordinary to see those people out west, in the Rockies, on the Prairies, who are so patriotic that they are promoting the French language.

Senator Corbin: It is also the country from which the dinosaurs hail. Alberta is the land of the dinosaurs, it is in fact the dinosaur capital of Canada. I believe the most ancient dinosaurs, however, are to be found in Nova Scotia.

Senator Gigantès: Are you quite sure they are not on the government benches opposite?

Senator Corbin: We shall see at the next election.

Senator Gigantès: So, back to the beautiful Province of Alberta. The first name is that of Mr. Auguste Roste, from Anna in Alberta. Anna is a biblical-sounding name, do you not think? Anna was Madeleine's sister in the New Testament, was she not?

Senator Corbin: Was she not Mary's mother?

Senator Gigantès: I will have to bring my bible in to check that, but I do know that it is a name the Germans like very much.

Deborah Carry, Post Office Box 97, Anna, Alberta. Mr. Cruickshank, now that is a very British name. I wonder whether he is related to the associate editor-in-chief of The Globe and Mail, whom I used to know. He was my colleague John Cruickshank at The Gazette. I do not know how he can stand to work for the editor-in-chief of The Globe and Mail, who is of course a right-wing sort who is very fond of the Tories.

Senator Corbin: Unless I am mistaken, I believe there was a former president of the CPR named Cruickshank, unless it was the CN. Does that mean anything to you?

Senator Gigantès: John Cruickshank? Unless his father frittered away the family fortune, he did not strike me as the descendant of a president of the CPR.

Sed Jess from Anna, Alberta. The citizens of Anna do not like the GST very much.

Senator Bosa: How long did you stay in Alberta? Because you seem to know a lot of people there.

Senator Gigantès: I stayed in Alberta for a year. When you are the dean of a university and you know the young people and get along well with them, you meet their parents, they invite you, and you wind up knowing quite a few people. That was a very interesting period, as I said earlier, when Mr. Lougheed had unseated Mr. Manning, and replaced him.

Social Crediters had built the University of Lethbridge in the hope that the young people of Lethbridge would not go to Calgary.

Senator Bosa: You mean the Social Credit Party and not the Creditistes?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, Social Credit. They joined forces for a while, as you may recall. So the seniors of Lethbridge, where the Social Credit Party had an important base, obtained a great deal of money from Mr. Manning's government to build that university in Lethbridge, in order to keep their young people there. That is always the way with older people, they always hope that the young people will stay. All of the young always want to leave, to leave their parents, grandparents, uncles and aunts, etc. But young people from other parts of Alberta came to Lethbridge, people from places such as Anna, and to them Lethbridge seemed like a great metropolis, whereas to the young people from Lethbridge, this was not the case and they could only be satisfied by cities such as Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver or Toronto.

Did you want to make a comment, dear Senator Cogger?

Senator Cogger: I simply wanted to ask you whether you were happy in the land of the dinosaurs.

Senator Gigantès: I was perfectly happy with the petrified dinosaurs but the live dinosaurs of the Conservative Party do get under my skin a bit.

So, the last name I read was that of Sed Jess, Anna; West Robinson, Anna; Barry Hutton, Anna; Davie Mohl, Anna; Martin Ackelman, Anna; Sonny Saxon, Anna, Alberta; Aretha Thums, that is a pretty name, Aretha. There is a singer called Aretha, I believe!

[English]

Senator Gigantès: Are you into rock? Is there not a singer—Aretha Franklin, yes.

Senator Stewart: What is rock?

Senator Gigantès: Rock is that music that is so different from Mozart. You hear it generally through your buttocks, because it is played at such a high volume. The ears are emulsified and then it is your buttocks that vibrate to the music of rock. It is very good for losing weight there, especially if you dance to it.

(Names of signatories read.)

Senator Gigantès: May I have a page in order to turn this in? That has reduced the two million figure by another 23 names. Shortly we will reduce it by another 23, although I doubt that, between now and 6 o'clock, I will get through 23 names. So, again, this is a petition against the GST.

Perhaps I can infringe a little and read you the first two lines.

> On the subject of the proposed national goods and services tax, the undersigned, your petitioners . . . .

and then they very politely say that they are against it.

(Names of signatories read.)

Senator Gigantès: I do not like to use "O" instead of zero when I give postal codes. It leads to some confusion. Some people might think that we are talking about a British postal code. The British, as you know, do not have a nice symmetry—letter, number, letter, then number, letter, number, as we have. Incidentally, this system has been devised by engineers who never sorted letters. I am told by people who work in the Post Office that in the old days there was a kind of artisan pride. You would see old post office workers standing a few feet away from a row of pigeonholes with a bunch of mail and actually throwing envelopes into each pigeonhole. Everyone knew the way it worked. Now, one person sits at a machine and the letter passes by on a conveyor belt and the workers print in magnetic letters, the postal code. They do that for eight hours a day, and they go stark raving mad. No wonder postal workers do not very often seem to be satisfied people.

Senator Stewart: You said this system was devised. Do you mean the British system or the Canadian system?

Senator Gigantès: No, the Canadian system. The British system was devised by the British, and the British, as you know, are people who love names such as Cumberland Crescent, Cumberland Square, Cumberland Street, Cumberland Lane, Cumberland Avenue, and you start with number 47, and the next number is a 2. The next number may be 58. Of course, you lose yourself totally. That is a secret conspiracy so you are forced, when you are in Britain, to use British taxi drivers, who are real geniuses. They will get you to the right number on the right Cumberland. All of those are called Cumberland, because they belong, of course, to the Earl of Cumberland—one of the largest landowners in Britain. A descendant of the Countess of Cumberland who threw out her ghillies—ghillies, of course, being her agriculture workers—and turned their fields into pastureland for sheep, because she could get more money selling wool. That is exactly Tory economics.

An Hon. Senator: She was a Tory.

Senator Gigantès: She was a Tory. Of course, there was starvation and, to our great benefit, those people immigrated to Canada and have brought in a strong and wonderful Scottish stock to this great country, for which I am very grateful. I have MacDonald blood, by the way. An ancestor of mine from the Island of Cephalonia—a pirate—went to Scotland and married a MacDonald lady and brought her back to the Island of Cephalonia. When I was young and would go into the village, I would be told by the people of the village, who did not know why, "You cannot trust a Campbell." That is what she had taught many decades before, that you cannot trust a Campbell. She had gone through the massacre of Glencoe as a small girl and had survived. The corner store in the village could not stock Campbell's soup, because the villagers were convinced that if it was Campbell, it was evil.

An Hon. Senator: Was that an Aylmer's soup conspiracy?

Senator Gigantès: No, it wasn't an Aylmer soup conspiracy. They were using other kinds of soup. Maybe it was Greek canning coming up to the surface. I do not know. You could find a Campbell soup in the next door village, which was only a seven-minute walk up a hill. The richest person in that other village was a shipowner, and he built a soccer field in that village. When I visit my village, the people of the village say: "You know, your father and uncle were the leading men that came from this village. They were national heros. "We would have been much better off if they had have been rich shipowners. We would have our own soccer field now, instead of having to borrow the one from those so and sos up the hill." Anyhow, that is the way history is.

I pride I pride myself on from being from the part of Greece that was under the Venetians and not the Turks. When I was young, it was very, very evident that the people of the seven islands that had spent six centuries under the Venetians had totally different characteristics. They had not been browbeaten. They had not been exploited. Naturally, the Catholics had the better fields and the Catholic priest was a little snooty toward the Greek Orthodox priest, but there was amicable cohabitation. I am sure there must be some Italian blood in me. I find it difficult to believe that not one of my lady ancestors raised a joyous thigh to some Italian. I am not saying this critically, you understand. I am glad of my Italian blood.

Senator Bosa: The reason I raise this question is because in Senator Gigantès' biography, it is written that he was born on August 16, 1923 in Salonica.

Senator Gigantès: Salonica is the capital of Macedonia. My father was an army officer and he was serving in Salonica at the time. I was born in the Jewish quarter of Salonica, because the rent there was cheaper than in the other quarters of Salonica. My father, being a young officer living entirely on his salary and married to a wife whose brothers had dissipated her dowry totally, could not afford habitation in a richer part of town. Therefore, we lived in the ghetto. I have friends from there to this day. The Jews are wonderful people.

Senator Bosa: Senator Gigantès says that his father was a poor officer, but here in his biography he is listed as being the son of a general, Christodoulos Gigantès. He was a general. Surely, generals must have been well paid.

Senator Gigantès: Not really, but I am very proud of the following episode. My father likes to live it up, even into old age. One evening, I went back to my father's apartment and he was there, the worse for drink, and a taxi driver was loosening my father's tie and taking off his shoes. I said to the taxi driver, "I am his son. I will take over." At that point I offered him a tip and he, I am very proud to say, indignantly said to me: "I have had the honour to help the hero Gigantès, and you are going to give me a tip? This man who reached the highest offices, and never a penny stuck to his fingers." That is why he was poor.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, it is not that I am questioning the veracity of the way you describe yourself; you describe yourself as a poor humble individual.

Senator Gigantès: Humble, no. I never said that. Poor, yes. Humble, no.

Senator Bosa: Economically, I mean in the beginning. But, for a person who describes himself that way, I read here that you attended the Lycée Janson de Sailly in Paris, and then Athens College, Royal Navy College, Dartmouth England; University of Toronto, University of Carleton.

Senator Simard: Are you reading the biography of one of the petitioners? I'm not too clear.

Senator Gigantès: I am not sure.

Senator Simard: Whose biography are we into anyway?

Senator Bosa: If the honourable senators would hear me out and contain himself for a moment, he would know that I am just trying to question—

Senator Simard: I don't want to use up too much of the precious time of Senator Gigantès.

Senator Bosa: Senator Gigantès now purports to have had a very poor start in life. He said he was the son of a poor officer. His father was a general. I am just reading from his biography. It seems to me to be that of anyone other than a poor starving kid because in addition to that, he studied in Quebec. He is a journalist by profession. In his legislative career, he ran in a general election, but was defeated in 1980.

Senator Gigantès: I am happy; it got me to the Senate. It was wonderful.

Senator Stewart: He was summoned to the Senate in 1984. He was Special Assistant to the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Stewart: He was a journalist with the London Observer, the Globe and Mail, LaPresse and the Gazette, senior executive of the Canadian Public Service, university dean and professor. In 1970-72, he was writer and host of CBC's "The Public Eye". Were you also the Greek Minister of Culture?

Senator Gigantès: I was the Greek Minister of Culture, yes.

Senator Stewart: Look at the outstanding biography he has. In 1964 to 1965, he was Director of the UN Office, Washington, D.C. He was also Secretary General to King Constantine of Greece in 1964. He also served as an officer in Great Britain's Royal Navy.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Pursuant to rule 12, it is now 6 o'clock.

Senator Bosa: Two minutes to 6 o'clock.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Time flies when you're having fun! I now leave the Chair and will resume at 8 o'clock.

The Senate resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, when we broke I was in the midst of completing reading Senator Gigantès biography, and I wonder if I may be permitted to complete it.

Hon. Senators: Carry on.

Senator Bosa: In his private life, Senator Gigantès was a journalist with the London Observer, The Globe and Mail, La Presse and The Gazette. He was special assistant to Prime Minister Trudeau, Senior Executive with the Canadian Public Service, university dean and professor of Classics from 1970 to 1972, writer and host of CBC's TV show The Public Eye, 1965-66. He was Greek Minister of Culture, 1964-65, director of the United Nations Office in Washington, D.C., Secretary-General to King Constantine of Greece, 1964. Senator Gigantès served as an officer in Britain's Royal Navy. He was author of nine books, winner of the Bowater Award for a series on the Canadian identity, 1960.

Your Honour, you will find this reference in his biography very interesting. His party politics are Liberal, his religion is Anglican, and his address is given. That is the complete biography of Senator Gigantès.

Senator Stewart: In view of the important posts that the honourable senator has held, and in view of his distinguished record as a defender of freedom, would you regard him as a suitable person to present petitions to this honourable house?

Senator Bosa: Most certainly.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 27 persons who are deeply opposed to the passage and implementation of the goods and services tax.

The first name on the petition is from Goderich. Goderich is the county town of Huron County, which is the county where I was born. I was born in the Town of Exeter, which is one of many towns in that community. It is a farming community and many of the towns are made up of retired farmers. If there is anyone who will be affected by the GST, it has to be those people.

There are also some names from Bayfield, Ontario. From Bayfield to Grand Bend is a tourist area. I noticed that Senator Grafstein had some petitions from the Grand Bend area this morning and at the time he also had one from St. Thomas. He mentioned that St. Thomas was the home base of Mitch Hepburn. I remember that when Mitch Hepburn was in office he stayed at our place in Exeter. I was a youngster and we went with him to a meeting at Grand Bend where he had difficulty in finding a platform to stand on. Someone pulled up a manure spreader, and he stated that it was the first time he had ever spoken from a Tory platform. I was in the crowd when that happened.

The tourist area of Grand Bend, Bayfield and Kettle Beach, all of that area from Sarnia, will be terribly badly hit by the goods and services tax. Tourism will perhaps be one of the industries worst hit if the tax ever goes into effect.

Brussels is another major town in Huron County. There are names on this petition from Brussels, Brucefield, Kippen and Hensall. As a matter of fact, my father had a law office in Hensall and practiced in Exeter from 1899 to 1936. He also had an office in London, Ontario.

I was born and brought up in this area and I know it very well.

I am happy and honoured to present that petition.

I also have a petition containing 11 names from the London area. I have a series of petitions from the London area which may be of particular interest. I went to the university in London and became very friendly with many of the families there. My sister and her husband and two of my nieces lived there, so I know the London area very well.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Could the senator please tell us how that petition was collected and how it got into his hands? Under whose sponsorship, at which mall or Liberal association meeting? Could he give the details of the collection of that petition?

Senator Stanbury: I would be happy to answer that question. One of the difficulties of answering it directly is that we have something like 5 million petitions and it will be difficult to identify where each one came from. These petitions have been entrusted to me.

Senator Simard: Was it sent to you or Senator Hébert? You say it was entrusted to you. How was it entrusted to you? Was it entrusted to you through Senator Hébert, the official spokesman and mailman?

Senator Stanbury: It was delegated to me in the same manner as all other petitions. It is such a large group of petitions that no one person can handle it. I assure you they are addressed to the Senate.

Senator Simard: You do not know how this petition got to you? Do you know if it is a good petition and legally acceptable?

Senator Hastings: It is an excellent petition.

Senator Simard: Maybe you just picked it up on the sidewalk.

Senator Hastings: No, it is an excellent petition.

Senator Simard: When was it received, by whom, and at what time?

Senator Hastings: Senator Stanbury does not have to answer that.

Senator Simard: No, he does not have to answer that, but in the name of good sportsmanship perhaps he would volunteer the information.

[Senator Stanbury.]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: I think Senator Simard is insulting to the petitioners. It does not matter how their peitions arrived here. They are signed in the original handwriting, and to reflect on the manner in which the petitions came to the Senate is insulting to the petitioners.

Senator Simard: Was it signed under duress? As Senator Hébert would say, were the people bribed like the Queen was supposed to have been bribed? My question applies to each individual petition. If you are going to inform the public, do it completely. In the meantime, have a good evening and relax.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Senator Simard, it is incumbent upon any senator, if he makes a charge of a serious nature towards a named petitioner, which you have done—

Senator Simard: I did not make a charge.

Senator Grafstein: Yes, you did.

Senator Simard: No, no. I did not make a charge. I asked a question. The record will show that I asked a question as to whether these people were bribed, and that is quite different from what Senator Hébert said on television last week, that the Queen had been bribed. That was a charge, and if he were man enough he would withdraw and do more than say it was a live program. After the show he could have apologized.

I did not make a charge, senator. Why do you not go after Senator Hébert and ask him to apologize to the Queen?

Senator Grafstein: Senator Simard, since you have withdrawn any implication, any innuendo or any suggestion that these petitions have come here by any means that are improper, I am delighted that you could acknowledge that. It is inappropriate for any senator to raise an allegation or imply an allegation unless that senator is prepared forthwith to present the proof, the evidence, in order that all of us can sit and weigh such proof, such evidence.

Senator Simard: I did not imply that these people have presented petitions improperly. That is why my question still stands. I urge senators opposite to tell us how these petitions were collected.

Senator Hastings: How can we do that?

Senator Simard: They have been entrusted to you. Before you accepted this trust you should know how these petitions were handled. If it is too much trouble, perhaps when Senator Robichaud's time comes to read petitions he will tell us how he has come in contact with the petitioners. Perhaps Senator Fairbairn will tell us how she got the petitions.

Senator Grafstein: I would like to make a comment. Senator Fairbairn is most capable of speaking for herself. She has spoken so eloquently for her province and for all of Canada on many matters, including the great, pressing issue of illiteracy.

Last night Senator Cogger and others followed the appropriate procedure and examined certain petitions and if they had had a serious question or had some evidence that was extraneous to the petition they would have presented it. Other than that, I believe that if the petition, on its face, is in the proper form, it cannot be questioned unless honourable senators intend to bring additional evidence that all senators can then weigh and then determine whether or not that petition should be presented, withdrawn, or questioned.

In the absence of any evidence that an honourable senator can bring to respond to a heartfelt petition from not one but many petitioners on an important matter, it is incumbent on all of us to either accept the petition on its face, or, in fairness to those petitioners—not to the senators presenting the petitions—to bring the evidence so that we can decide on both sides whether or not those petitions should be withdrawn. Other than that, it is unfair to thousands of Canadians who welcome the opportunity to have their views and their voices heard in what we all believe and have been told is the highest court in the land, the court of Parliament.

Senator Simard: I do not know why, senator, you are so thin-skinned.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: In answer to Senator Simard, I did table a few petitions a week ago and I have some more. My petitions are coming from the bookstore at the University of Lethbridge where students have been signing them because of their concern about the tax on books.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, my only comment to Senator Simard is that I would appreciate if he did not suggest that I picked them off the street, especially when I have my bride of 46 years sitting in the gallery.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Stanbury: We are going to celebrate our 46th anniversary in the middle of this melee, and I think that is going to be a very interesting thing to attempt to do.

I wish to continue presenting petitions.

This particular petition is from the London area. I began to tell you about the London area and my association with that area which goes back a long way and has continued right through my university career at the University of Western Ontario.

London was always a great Tory area until more recently when some of the ridings became very clearly Liberal, with people such as our friend Senator Turner who became a very popular Liberal member there. However, generally speaking, London is thought of as the home of John Robarts and of the Tory Party in southern Ontario. These people all signed a petition stating that the goods and services tax will be anathema to them if it is passed.

These 27 petitioners have signed this petition asking the Senate of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. I have the honour to present that petition.

The next petition is largely from the southern Ontario area. I see names from Simcoe, Princeton, Hamilton, London, Dunnville, Courtland, Burford and a number of rural route numbers in that general area. This is the agricultural heartland of southern and southwestern Ontario.

There are 27 signatories to this particular petition and I have the honour of presenting that to the Senate.

The next petition I present also asks us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. This petition is signed by 27 individuals from a little further east, such as St. Catharines, Jarvis, Thorold, as well as Simcoe. St. Catharines is where I lived when we left Exeter, Ontario during my teen years. I know the areas of Thorold, Merritton, Beamsville, and Grimsby extremely well. The people who have signed this petition from those areas are the following.

• (2030)

Honourable senators, I have some petitions which come from the cottage area. People in the cottage area, as long as they are in tourism, are most seriously affected by the proposed tax. They also have signed this petition asking us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

Senator Lucier: Would Senator Stanbury permit a question at this time?

Senator Stanbury: Certainly.

Senator Lucier: During the course of the Thanksgiving weekend I was told that a Conservative member of Parliament from southern Ontario conducted a poll in his riding. It was certainly not a very extensive poll, but it was a poll of the people in his riding conducted to find out what the support was for the GST. His figures showed that 92% of the people contacted by his office are opposed to the passage of the GST. I wonder how that fits in with what Senator Stanbury has found in the area about which he speaks. I know he spends a lot of time in southern Ontario. Does that fit in with what he has found in southern Ontario?

Senator Stanbury: Thank you for the question, honourable senator. This particular petition comes from the cottage area. The first person on the list is from Coboconk. I was in Coboconk over the Thanksgiving weekend. I was almost grateful to the Speaker for making it so difficult for us here that we didn't get away until Saturday morning since that allowed us to drive across the country through Bancroft to see the gorgeous colours en route to Coboconk.

During the weekend I had the opportunity to discuss the tax on the street and in the stores with the people of Coboconk, Fenelon Falls and Kirkfield. I did not take a formal poll, but I did not find one single person among those with whom I spoke, including the store owners, the people on the street, and the people who have known me for some time, who did not say, "Hold on. Get rid of that tax. Don't allow it to pass".

I think your source is correct, senator, in terms of the results that he received.

I appreciate that this is perhaps boring to those who are listening. But it is not boring to me because I see the real people of this country who are signing these petitions in huge numbers. I have never seen anything like this in my life.

Senator Stewart: Senator Stanbury, may I ask a question? You suggest that possibly the reading of these petitions may be boring; but, of course, you have it wrong. Certainly we on this side do not find it boring to hear from these Canadians. When Senator Simard presents petitions from people in New Brunswick, for example, in favour of the GST, we shall be delighted to hear the views of those people from his province. I think you should proceed without any hesitation whatsoever.

Senator Stanbury: Thank you very much, Senator Stewart. I tried to make it clear that this is not boring to me. I find them the most important part of our proceedings, because the real problem with what has been happening is that the government has not listened to these people. That is why people all over the country find it necessary to sign these petitions, and send them in to us.

If honourable senators opposite have petitions of a similar nature in favour of the tax, then please bring them forward, we would love to see them. We have not had any submitted to us, nor have you submitted any that we have seen.

The next petition has 27 names on it. It is from the same area, although it contains names from various parts of southern Ontario.

(Names of signatories read.)

The next petition is generally from the same area of Fenelon Falls, Norland, Coboconk, Four Mile Lake, et cetera. It is a petition containing 27 names. It asks us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read.)

On the next petition there are 28 signatures. In the same way, the petitioners ask us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. They are also from the same general area, except that there are a few other towns involved, such as Kirkfield, Norland, Oshawa, Jarvis and others.

The next petition which I present to honourable senators is one with 28 signatures on it. It also asks us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. It comes generally from the Peterborough area, but it also has signatures from Kirkfield, Coboconk, Fenelon Falls, et cetera.

Honourable senators, when there are this many signatures from these little communities you know that you have almost the whole community in each case because there are not many people in these towns.

(Names of signatories read.)

I will read one more petition from the same general area. This is a petition with 20 signatures on it, and it asks us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. It is also from Kirkfield, Fenelon Falls, Coboconk and Norland.

(Names of signatories read.)

Honourable senators, that is the last of the petitions I will present to you tonight. I want you to know the extent of the number of people from these small villages and towns all across Ontario who oppose the GST. Firstly, they are from the Huron County area where I was born. Secondly, they are from the London area, where I went to university. Thirdly, they are from St. Catharines, where I spent my teen years; and fourthly, they are from the Coboconk, Kirkfield and Fenelon Falls area, where we try to spend as much of our summers as we can.

I assure honourable senators that it is not only these petitions which tell me the feeling of those people. I have talked to them; I know their feeling. Their feeling about this particular piece of legislation is so intense that they have put a great deal of pressure on me, although they did not need to, since I am opposed to the legislation, in any event. However, because of this pressure, it is impossible for me to let up on my attempt to be sure that this piece of legislation does not pass.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have the honour to rise to present petitions from different areas of Canada, and, as usual, they contian objections to this despicable piece of legislation. The objections come from all parts of Canada, including northern British Columbia.

The first petition is from people in northern Alberta, from the Fort St. John area of British Columbia along the Alaska Highway. Fort St. John is mile 50 on the Alaska Highway. The petitioners come also from Grimshaw and Grand Prairie, Alberta. I was able to visit people in these areas this summer, and they were very disturbed by the fact that they will be faced with this unwanted, unfair and regressive tax, a tax which no one seems to want other than a few Conservatives on the other side of the house, who seem to be very willing to disregard what the rest of Canadians think. They do not give a damn what the rest of Canadians think. They never have, and they are not about to change. We understand that. That somewhat increases our resolve when we decide to fight them.

The Leader of the Opposition continues to say on TV, "Pretty soon, the people of Canada are going to be upset with what the Senate is doing and they are going to let those Liberal senators know that they don't like what they are doing." I wonder to whom he has been talking. I certainly have not received too many phone calls from people telling me they wish I would stop this fight. However, I do receive many phone calls and letters which say, "Keep up the good work and keep going. Keep doing these things on our behalf."

As a matter of fact, I received one letter today from a person in Alberta who supports the GST. He put together a piece of paper in support of the GST. It is notable because it is the only one I have received.

As I said earlier, when I was asking Senator Stanbury a question, a Conservative member of Parliament from southern Ontario, whom I will not name since I was not speaking to him directly, conducted a poll in his riding in southern Ontario over the Thanksgiving weekend. Some 92 per cent of the constituents in his riding who were polled oppose the GST. It seems strange that the other 8 per cent should be so intent on pushing for this legislation. I do not know where the resolve comes from to push it through.

As I said before, there is a small chance that Canadians are wrong, that they really should have this GST. There is a very small chance that that is true. But there is a bigger chance that they have the right to be wrong. I have said that before, and I will continue to say it. That is the beauty of being Canadian. One can make dumb decisions if one wants to. However, one must live with them once they are made. I have made a number of such decisions. I have bought vehicles that were just terrible pieces of equipment. However, I bought them, and I lived with the decision I made. That is one of the great rights of being Canadian. One can make this type of decision.

As one travels through places such as Fort St. John, Grimshaw, Peace River and Grand Prairie, one will not find one person who wants the GST—not one. There are other things about which the people in those areas are worried. They want to know why the government is not dealing with high interest rates. Surely the function of the government is to put through some legislation that would deal with high interest rates, something which would do something for the people, which would deal with the bankruptcies that are now so out of hand. They are multiplying in great numbers in these areas in Alberta, particularly in northern Alberta.

If the government wants to do something for these people, then it should deal with the environment. People want to know about the environment. Are we going to continue to destroy ourselves the way we have been going thus far?

There are some very serious problems. They are not easy problems for the government, or for any government. However, they are problems which must be dealt with.

The Aboriginal people of northern Alberta, like Aboriginal people in other parts of Canada, need some attention. They need to have their problems dealt with. Their problems will not be easily solved. However, they want to think that someone is dealing with them. Why are we using all our energy and all our resources to stuff the GST down their throats? Instead, we should be using the energy to try to settle some of the land claims of Aboriginal peoples. That is not being done, contrary to what we keep hearing from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Surely, after the summer we have just gone through, we do not have to start asking if there are problems with the Aboriginal people of Canada. We know that there are.

Unemployment in these areas is rising. We are into a recession. There are only two people in Canada who do not know that we are yet into a recession, while 26 million people do know that. Unfortunately the two people who do not realize it are the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. The Economic Council of Canada knows it. Everyone else knows it. The business community knows it. Neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister of Finance know it. They think we are in some kind of a slowdown.

Senator LeBlanc: They call it a retrenchment.

Senator Lucier: I have heard that term before. I have been wondering, when you do not have a job, how it feels to be retrenched instead of being unemployed. I wonder if "trenched" people get paid more than unemployed people. I have not yet figured that one out.

Senator Austin: Is not the word "buried" another word for "retrenched"? Would you not say that the Canadian people are being "buried" by this government?

Senator Lucier: That certainly fits the bill. They will be buried by the GST. They will have to pay a 7 per cent tax on services, something which is being inflicted upon them in the midst of a recession. Who, in their lives, has ever heard of anything so stupid as to inflict a 7 per cent tax when we are in the throes of a recession and heading toward a depression? There are different opinions as to how far it will go and how long it will take to get out of it. Surely, the way to get out of a recession is not to impose a 7 per cent tax on Canadians. You do not have to be an economist to figure that one out.

It seems to me that the people of northern Alberta would like to have someone come up and try to solve some of the problems for the farmers who are sitting with nice crops. They had good grain this year. However, they cannot sell it. They cannot even get it into bins. They are piling it in farmyards. When they do sell it, they cannot sell it for as much as it costs them to grow it. We have a solution for that. We are going to stuff them with a 7 per cent tax on their goods and services. That will help them out! It always comes in handy, when you are broke and you are trying to figure out how you will survive the next month, if the government comes in and says, "We will help you. Here is a 7 per cent tax and a whole bunch of paperwork. We are going to create a whole new underground economy here. We are going to see how good you are. We are going to see how tough we can make it for you." What a wonderful way to run a country!

People in the forest industry are facing the same problems. They are trying to survive. They are just trying to keep their heads above water. Now we tell them they are into a recession. Quite frankly, I do not think that we had to tell them. They had a pretty good idea. They have had an idea for some time now that they were heading into a recession. I can tell you, honourable senators, that I spent some time in Alberta this summer. I spent some time in Calgary, in Edmonton, and in Red Deer. I was in Grand Prairie and Fort St. John. I was in some parts of northern Alberta, although not all of them, and not as many as I would like to visit some time. I have yet to run across one person in that part of the country—or any part of the country—who came up to me and said, "We really do not think you should be fighting this GST. We would like you to let it go. Let's get this GST in. We cannot wait to get it. We have a small business here and we cannot wait to do the extra paperwork and suffer the extra burden that this tax is going to inflict on us."

What are you people thinking of? What are you trying to do? There must be some rhyme or reason to this.

The people of New Brunswick do not want this tax. What makes you think you have a responsibility to come here and force it on them? The people of Nova Scotia do not want this tax. Our job is not to see if we can give them something they do not want.

The governments of many of these provinces are now taking the federal government to court to try to prevent this. At what stage are you going to catch on?

It is a transfer of the tax burden from the rich to the poor. There is no question about that. Who are the only people in Canada supporting this tax? It is the manufacturing industry, the rich, and the people who have just been put in this Senate to pass the bill. I have no trouble believing that Senator Eyton will be voting for this tax. I do not even object to his voting for this tax. That is what he was put here to do. He was put here to protect himself and the people he represents: the multimillionaires of the country. They want this tax because they will be paying less tax. There is nothing wrong with his voting for this tax. It is to his advantage.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): On a point of order, Your Honour, is the honourable senator reading a petition, or referring to something, or answering a question? There is something in the rules about speeches.

Senator Lucier: I am reading the petition, honourable senator. I have great respect for Senator Doody, but I think he knows how I feel when I think the people of Canada are being unfairly treated.

Senator Doody: I appreciate that fully. I just have some concern for the rules.

Senator Lucier: Yes, I understand that, sir.

Senator Austin: This is a newly-discovered inspiration!

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Paul Lucier: This tax just seems wrong to me when I look at the names on the petition. How can you listen to these petitions and then sit there and ignore what people are going through and what this tax will be doing to them?

Senator Simard likes to make fun of the people who sign these petitions. I guess that if most people were sitting here making $70,000 per year and, like Senator Simard, receiving pensions from some other jobs, they too could have a little laugh at people who sign petitions. I suppose they could find some of this funny.

I tell you, honourable senators, most of these people do not find this funny at all. They are not finding much humour in what is going on in this country right now. These people from Grimshaw, Peace River and Grand Prairie really do not find it very amusing that a prime minister who has nine per cent of the support of the people in their province should be insisting that a tax, that is opposed by 85 or 90 per cent of Canadians, be imposed on them.

[Senator Lucier.]

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senator, that petition is from Alberta. Could Senator Lucier give us any insight, for those of us from other provinces, into how the province of Alberta feels about this particular tax?

Senator Lucier: Yes, Senator, I could. The people of Alberta have revolted to the point where the Reform Party has made unheard-of advances in that province. Because of this tax, which is the straw that has broken the camel's back, as far as the people of Alberta are concerned, you could not find a Conservative in that province right now to save your life.

Senator Grafstein: Where does the independent senator, the elected senator, from Alberta stand on this issue? Is he remonstrating on this point or has he suspended his judgment?

Senator Lucier: No, he is a very strong opponent of the GST. He has been a very strong opponent, and his party has been strongly opposed to the GST from day one. It is interesting that at least one senator from Alberta, who was put in this Senate on condition that he vote for this tax—and I do not think that is much of a secret—is doing it against the wishes of a minimum of 90 per cent of the people, and the Government of Alberta. Is it not interesting that the Government of Alberta, the Conservative Government of Alberta, is taking the Conservative Government of Canada to court on this very tax?

Senator Austin: We thought they were friends.

Senator Lucier: Yes, we thought they were friends. This GST has proven that they are not very friendly with one another.

Honourable senators, I would make you a bet that if you were to take this list back to Grimshaw, Alberta and ask every person on this list hose they voted six years ago, they would tell you that they voted Conservative. I would then make you another bet that if you asked those same people how they would vote if there were an election tomorrow, not one of them would vote Conservative. It would be a 100 per cent turnaround.

Politics is a weird game. Politicians usually like to pay attention to what the people think. Somehow, this government has got it into its head that once you are elected you have a five-year dictatorship, and if people do not like what you did in those five years, then they kick you out. Well, that is not the way politics works; it never has been. In the old days, it used to be that the House of Commons prevented that kind of behaviour from happening. Since the change of rules after the 1984 take-over, the House of Commons is totally useless as an opposition. There is no more opposition there. If the opposition is not here in the Senate, it is non existent.

Senator Austin: Absolutely right, Senator Lucier!

Senator Lucier: If you do not have an Opposition in the Senate of Canada, you do not have an Opposition.

Senator Fairbairn: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: This is a new phenomenon. It is not a coincidence that we have gone 126 years without ever trying to kill a bill. We have never had to before. The opposition was provided by the House of Commons. There is no more opposition in the House of Commons. The province of Alberta is the proof of that. Although 100 per cent of Albertans are against this tax, which is close to the right number, and the government is at nine per cent in the polls, which is pretty close to the right number, there were only two members of the House of Commons from Alberta who had the guts to stand up and object to the actions of the Conservative government.

Senator Grafstein: What happened to those two Conservative members?

Senator Lucier: They were both kicked out of their caucus. The two members were Mr. Kindy and Mr. Kilgour.

Senator Doody: Is that in the petition?

Senator Lucier: I have not seen their names in the petition yet, but I will continue to look.

Senator Grafstein: We expect them to be there.

Senator Doody: We have some rules here.

Senator Grafstein: Did they not petition with their seats? They put their seats on the line.

Senator Lucier: Yes; I give them full marks. They have a lot of courage. However, they, I think, have shown us what we had to find out. They were the two people who have shown the rest of Canada that the House of Commons no longer works. We all talk about Senate reform, but anyone who suggests that the problems will be solved with Senate reform is wrong. The problems will not be solved with Senate reform. It is the other House that needs to be reformed.

Senator Austin: Hear, hear.

Senator Grafstein: How should it be reformed?

Senator Lucier: It needs to be reformed and put back into a position where it can represent the people of Canada.

Senator Doody: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: The House of Commons no longer represents the people of Canada.

Senator Doody: Good stuff!

Senator Lucier: The only ones who represent the people of Canada are in the Senate of Canada, and I am glad to see Senator Doody agrees with me.

Senator Doody: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: He is one of the most respected members here.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: We will be very pleased after an election because we know that he will be doing the same thing to us as we are doing to him right now—and he will be right when he does it, as we are right when we are doing it now.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Doody: Petitions!

Senator Lucier: We are going to save these petitions. We will just change the names on them, Senator Doody, so that you will have something to attack us with.

Senator Molgat: Doody for Prime Minister!

Senator Grafstein: What a campaign we could put together!

Senator Lucier: I have more names:

Honourable senators, it would be nice if we could break off for a couple of weeks. I know that is not going to happen, but it would be nice if we could have an opportunity to go out and listen to these people, as we did this summer with the committee. It would certainly be nice if we could take the time to listen to these people who took the time to sign these petitions and the time and effort to write the letters and to register the objections to this GST. We do not seem to want to listen to each other very much, but if we took time to listen to the people whom we are supposedly representing here, I think we would have to be pretty heartless not to sit back at some time and say, "What the hell are we doing? Why are we doing this? We are not doing it for us. We are supposedly doing it for them. They do not want it. Why are we doing it?"

I have another petition, honourable senators, from the other end of the country. This one is from the beautiful province of Nova Scotia. We have some Conservative members in this house from Nova Scotia who are going to vote in favour of this bill to inflict this tax on the people who are signing all these petitions and saying, "Please don't do this to us." They are people from your areas and they are saying, "Don't do this to us." There is noone from your area coming to you and saying, "Do it." There is a guy from Baie-Comeau coming to you and saying, "Hey, I'd like you to do this because Michael Wilson from Toronto would like you to do it." But there is noone from Nova Scotia coming to you and saying, "Do it." You are not here representing the guy from Baie-Comeau. He lost the stick the day he put you in here. Do yourselves a favour. Do him a favour. Do yourselves a favour for the rest of your lives. Represent your people. That is what you are here for.

Can anyone explain to me how these people are possibly going to benefit from this tax—this tax which, according to the government's literature, is going to be revenue neutral? The government says it is going to raise the deficit, according to their figures, and is going to lower the deficit, according to their figures; that it will be visible, according to their statements, and will be invisible, according to their statements. We have found out we cannot believe anything they say. We have also found out that there is something that we can believe: that the ordinary citizen of Nova Scotia will be paying more tax after the GST than he paid before the GST. If that is not true, then this is a useless exercise. You shake your head, Senator? I am saying that if that is not true, then this is a useless exercise. If you are not going to take more tax from them, then this is a useless exercise.

Senator Murray: Don't offend Senator Lucier by shaking your head.

Senator Doody: Be patient, Paul, be tolerant.

Senator Murray: I don't want any head shaking on this side.

Senator Comeau: Yes, sir.

Senator Murray: Get on with it, Senator!

Senator Lucier: I am. You have to remember that I am on a time clock here, and I cannot go too fast. I burn out quickly.

Senator Grafstein: Slow but sure!

Senator Doody: What's your deadline? Midnight?

Senator Grafstein: Watch your health.

Senator Lucier: Yes, my health.

Senator Grafstein: Your message is more powerful than the time you take.

Senator Lucier: I am only on until midnight, and it is already 9:43.

I know that the people of Nova Scotia are going to pay more tax with this. Everybody knows that.

Senator Poitras: No, no!

Senator Lucier: We also know that anyone who is running a small business is going to have many more problems. They are going to have a lot more paperwork. It is going to cost them a lot more to do business. I also know that that does not seem to make much difference to some people. This is going to create an underground economy.

Senator Poitras: No, sir, on the contrary.

Senator Lucier: You say, "On the contrary," Senator, but even though your 3,000-man police force will help a little bit, I think it is not going to be quite as efficient as you think. You are going to find that there will be an underground economy. We have been told that. You were on the committee. You were there when the people who are going to be creating that underground economy were telling you that they were going to do it. You were listening to them, sir. You had the advantage that some of your colleagues did not have.

Senator Poitras: We tried to inform them properly.

Senator Lucier: Yes. I know that. General Bullmoose said it would be good for the people, so you tried to tell them, "This is good for you." You saw the reception you got, Senator. You saw how much they believed you. You saw how much the people of Nova Scotia and the people in all parts of the country believed you. The truth is that they did not believe you at all. I guess it starts with not believing your leader; so they are not going to believe what you say either.

(Names of signatories read.)

Honourable senators, it seems to me that when we go through all these names on the petitions, it always brings us back to the same thing: You are inflicting something on people who do not want it. They do not need it. It is replacing a tax that needs to be changed. It needs to be improved. You have to do something; noone has ever quarrelled about that. However, you are replacing a bad tax with a worse tax. We were told that in Vancouver. We were told that by people who were experts in dealing with the manufacturers' sales tax, people who have dealt with it all their lives. All they do is deal with the manufacturers' sales tax, and they said there were some flaws in it and that we should fix the flaws. You can even replace that tax, but, for goodness' sake, do not replace it with one that is worse and which has more flaws in it than the one you are replacing. That is what you are doing.

I have another petition from Halifax, Nova Scotia:

Senator Grafstein: Where are these from, senator?

Senator Lucier: They are from Nova Scotia. These are people from Halifax and Dartmouth, people who really wonder why they should have to be subjected to this; why they cannot have their government deal with the problems that they think are important to them; why they should be subjected to a tax that is a further transfer of the tax burden from the well-off to those who are not as well-off; and why the government had to bring into the Senate a bunch of people who are well-off, to make sure that this was done. I think that is unfortunate. I do not know what the reasons are for bringing anyone into the Senate, but once we are here, our reason for being here should be to make sure that we represent the people of our area in the best way we know how. One should never have to wonder, when one has voted on something, whether it was the best way to serve the people one is supposedly representing.

Senator Teed: Absolutely!

Senator Lucier: Not one of you over there who, after having voted on this legislation, will be able to avoid saying, "I wonder if I did the right thing." I do not even know how you will be able to ask the question, because the answer will be so obvious since you will have been told so often by so many people whom you represent.

Senator Murray: It must be great to be born more virtuous than everyone else. You have a monopoly on virtue, have you?

Senator Lucier: If I have, I learned it from you. I watched you on TV over the last few days. I have watched you standing in front of the cameras and telling the people of Canada not to worry, that the people are turning against the Liberals and that pretty soon they are going to weaken and they are going to pass this thing because the people of Canada, who want this GST, are going to turn on them. I keep wondering about that, because you do not say things that are not true, Senator Murray. I am sure that at least one person besides Brian Mulroney or Michael Wilson has said that to you. I would really like to know who it was who phoned you and said, "I sure hope you get that thing through."

Senator Murray: As a matter of fact, perhaps it was Senators Buckwold, Kirby, MacEachen or Perrault, who, in 1987, signed a report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee recommending that:

as soon as practicable the Government introduce legislation to implement a broad-based multi-stage sales tax to replace the existing federal sales tax system.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: Absolutely!

Senator Murray: I am sure you disassociate yourself from those comments.

Senator Lucier: I support that. That is not the issue.

Senator Stanbury: That is not what we got.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable Senator, could you give us the reference to that, so that we could take advantage of the whole text?

Senator Murray: I am sorry that Senator Grafstein was otherwise engaged on Tuesday, December 1, 1987, when the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, chaired by the Honourable Ian Sinclair, of happy memory, brought in its report containing the recommendation I have just read. Let me give you a sentence or two:

> While the Committee would have preferred that the Government had moved tax reform forward in one complete package, thus obviating the necessity of interim sales tax measures, it understands the present requirement for some transitional changes to the system.

They were obviously dealing with some legislation.

> However, it is clear to the Committee that some of the measures proposed to patch up the current sales tax system are inadequate and will only result in the introduction of further inequities into the system.

And then in bold-face type:

> We recommend that as soon as practicable the Government introduce legislation to implement a broad-based multi-stage sales tax to replace the existing federal sales tax system.

● (2130)

Senators from the other side who are still alive and well and who served on that committee include Senator Buckwold, Senator Kirby, Senator MacEachen, Senator Frith and Senator Perrault. A number of other senators took part or served on the committee at various times in the preparation of this report and its recommendations. To mention a few, they include Senator Haidasz, Senator Olson, and Senator Stewart from Antigonish-Guysborough. At least Senator Steuart of Duck Lake did not have the misfortune to have lent his name to that clear recommendation which his party is now reputing by this filibuster.

Senator Grafstein: Was Senator Lucier a member of the committee?

Senator Murray: Senator Lucier was not, but a lot of his friends were, and if he wishes to repudiate the committee now, he has that opportunity. That is why I made the intervention.

Senator Grafstein: We appreciate your intervention.

Senator LeBlanc: Honourable senators, this is the second time today that members opposite have raised this sort of quotation, being very careful that none of the people named are present in the house. Senator Barootes raised a similar point of order this morning about Senator Stewart's article in the Toronto Star.

Senator Murray: You can send for them.

Senator LeBlanc: I listened to you politely, so would you listen to me for a while?

Senator Barootes neglected to add that this was an issue dealing with the House of Commons. In fact, Senator Stewart had explained the very important distinction between the Speaker of the House of Commons and of the Speaker of this place, who is a creature appointed by the Prime Minister. In the House of Commons, through consultation among party leaders, they eventually came to an even better formula, the election of the Speaker. I have not heard anyone from the other side supporting the idea of electing our Speaker. However, that is another issue.

Senator Murray has pulled this neat little trick of quoting from a report and naming members on this side who are associated with it without any of them being present in this place. I must say that Senator Murray reminds me of the former British Cabinet Minister Ian MacLeod, a member of Harold Macmillan's cabinet, whose political career met some difficulty when a labour frontbencher once labelled him as "Iain MacLeod, too clever by half". I find this technique of raising points without the people involved present to explain things, to say the least, not very good parliamentary practice.

Senator Murray: I shall certainly raise the matter when they are all back here. I will make a note to do so.

Senator Lucier: I hope that Senator Murray will raise that matter again. I really do not understand the problem with what he has raised. The suggestion is that we need some form of tax reform. That has never been argued.

Senator Murray: Good.

Senator Lucier: We have always known that there were problems. The same thing was said before the committee this summer. Everywhere we went people said that there were problems with the MST and that it needed to be changed.

Senator Simard: But your people never had the courage to proceed.

Senator Lucier: We did not have the courage to do a lot of other things you have done.

Senator Simard: Unfortunately you never had the courage to make the tough decisions.

Senator Lucier: No, we did not. Certainly if we had spent more time around you, we might have picked up a lot more courage.

Senator Simard: No, you chose to renovate church basements to gather a few more votes, but that time is over now.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Simard, what happens if the tax measure that we are talking about is tough and wrong?

Senator Carney: Order.

Senator Grafstein: I am entitled to address the senator. He has interjected.

Let me ask the question again. What happens if after Senator Simard has listened to all the evidence this policy turns out to be wrong? Then what?

Senator Simard: Allow me to answer. There have been many studies. Even Senator MacEachen came very close, in his day, to recommending a GST system. In fact, I suspect he did recommend it but decided to say, "No, it would be too difficult. We have an election coming and that is more important that doing what is right for the country." So there have been many royal studies and commissions. Yes, it may turn out to be difficult. The government is not ignoring the fact that some sectors will suffer, but it will be good for the overall economy, for Canadians, because it will put people to work and it will adjust our fiscal taxation system to allow us to compete internationally and eventually, because more jobs will be created, it will bring down the deficit. The tax will be revenue neutral the first year, but in the second, third and fourth years it will have a positive impact on reduction of the deficit. So, to answer the question, will it turn out to be difficult, devastating or as bad as you people paint it? No. Eventually, when we get down to debating the report and the bill at third reading, we will explain everything.

Of course, the unions are against the GST. They say it will be bad for the little people. Yet those same unions protected their rear ends by demanding COLA clauses in their contracts. They used their muscle and their membership to protect themselves, but they are still against it. So maybe they do not want it. However, there are people such as academics and other non-partisan bodies who like the GST.

Honourable Senators opposite like to quote the Conference Board of Canada when it suits their purposes. Well the Conference Board says that it is good for Canada and there are many provinces saying the same thing. Nothing is foolproof. It may turn out that the GST will cause difficulty for some sectors, but you have to have faith because there is no alternative. The governments of Québec and Newfoundland think it is good. Surely if it was so bad they would not try to harmonize their taxes with the GST. There are two or three other provinces who are coming to the same view.

You have to put partisan politics aside for a while and give it a chance.

Senator Grafstein: I appreciate the Honourable senator's candid comments, and we will obviously have to put forward a persuasive and cogent argument to persuade the honourable senator opposite to the contrary. The honourable senator has raised a new point that I had not heard raised before. Is he now suggesting that this tax measure is in aid of deficit reduction as opposed to being tax neutral, as was promised by Michael Wilson in the last election?

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Simard: I am glad that the Honourable senator has pointed that out. Several witnesses raised the same point during the hearings.

Senator Grafstein: Was that point made during the last election? My understanding is that Mr. Wilson and the Prime Minister proposed a consumption tax that would be tax neutral. In other words there would be no new money. The tax would be an equitable one. That is my understanding of the social contract that the Prime Minister and Mr. Wilson made with the Canadian people in the last election. Am I correct in that? Senator Simard appears to be saying that the GST is not tax neutral but is in aid of deficit reduction.

Senator Simard: I know that Senator Grafstein is trying hard and that he is an honest politician, but he does not always listen, or, at least, he chooses to forget some things. I know that you mean well.

Senator Thériault: The voice of a great listener.

Senator Simard: I said just moments ago that the tax would be revenue neutral for the first year. I am supported in that view by many professionals and other people who have studied the tax. So can we agree that it is revenue neutral? My second point was that the tax will be a deficit reduction measure. In years two, three and four, the GST legislation will put people to work because the costs to our manufacturing industry will come down. With those costs coming down they will be able to manufacture more and sell their products nationally and internationally. There will be more production and more people will be put to work, and they will pay more taxes. It is expected that $9 billion of new Canadian production will be contributed in the fourth year.

Is the Honourable senator suggesting that because more people are paying taxes the tax should come down from 7 percent to 6 percent in order to keep it revenue neutral? If he is, that would be short sighted because we must get hold of the beast that the deficit is. So, shortly after the first year the tax will produce more funds as more people go to work and thereby the deficit will be reduced.

The Honourable Senator also asked whether this matter was discussed during the last election campaign. I will sit down after I answer that question, unless the Honourable senator has another question. I could talk for hours on the GST and I hope to have an opportunity to discuss it when we get to Order No. 5. It is a good measure, and we are proud that this government has had the courage to take the punishment at the polls. We are confident that the people, despite the Liberal demagoguery, will see that.

This matter was not discussed during the last election campaign mainly because John Turner decided to fight 90 percent of the election on free trade. The concept of the GST was announced in the budget in 1987. White, yellow and blue papers were produced all over the place. It was part of our platform in 1988. If members opposite thought at the time that it was such a bad idea—maybe Senator Davey followed the wrong strategy or gave the wrong advice—they should have had Mr. Turner fight the election on the GST not on free trade. That is my answer. I look forward to many more hours of debate with you.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Simard has raised an important issue. Rather than take up Senator Lucier's time, I shall allocate a portion of my comments to points that he has raised. Senator Simard has been fair to us and joined issues, and I think it is important that we have an exchange on those views.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I ask that we do everything that we can to get today's Hansard out so that I can send Senator Simard's words to the people of Canada to inform them of how well off they will be. Eighty-five percent of Canadians think that they will be harmed by the tax and that it will be detrimental. They think that it is a regressive tax. I know a whole bunch of people in northern Canada who think that they will pay more tax on food items than people in southern Canada. They think that it is unfair. I cannot wait to get Senator Simard's words to point out to them how wrong they are.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, the Honourable senator cannot wait. Well I cannot wait either. Why do you not agree to jump to Order No. 5 and let us get on with the debate on the GST?

Senator Lucier: I want the people of Hall Beach to know how fortunate they are to be able to pay $3.86 for a litre of milk that costs $1.00 in Calgary. They will be so happy to hear what you have to say. I am sure that they can hardly wait to hear how lucky they are to be able to pay $3.86 for a litre of milk that costs $1.00 in Calgary. Of course, they are paying GST on $2.86 which is the cost of the freight. They will be really happy to find out that this will be to their advantage.

Senator Simard: Put your filibustering aside, and let's go.

Senator Lucier: All the unions and people who appeared before our committee and said, "Kill this stupid tax" meant what they said. How is it that you never understood anything that they said?

Senator Simard: Are your prepared to move the motion?

Senator Lucier: I cannot understand it. Five million people have signed these petitions, and none of them realized how lucky they were. Now they are going to find out how well off they are. I suppose now they will think that they are even luckier because you can introduce this tax just as the country is going into a recession.

Senator Simard: That is the old Liberal way—the time is never right to do what is right.

Senator Lucier: Absolutely.

Senator Simard: That is your problem.

Senator Lucier: So old "Bull Moose" Simard says that the people of Canada should have this tax, and they are going to get it. If they do not want it, they are going to get it anyhow. Any people in his province who are against the GST will get it anyway. That is really smart thinking. That is the way to run a country.

Senator Simard: Let us discuss that.

[Translation]

Hon. Normand Grimard: I would have preferred a more favourable atmosphere for my first statement in this chamber, but I clearly do not have any choice in the matter.

I would just like to add something to what the Hon. Senator Murray mentioned to you earlier about the deliberations of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Hon. Senator Murrray read you recommendation number 24, which, in English, reads as follows. This is what he read you earlier.

[English]

> We recommend that as soon as practicable the Government introduce legislation to implement a broad-based multi-stage sales tax to replace the existing federal sales tax system.

[Translation]

But, further on, there is another recommendation which is much more explicit. I refer to recommendation 26. There is, of cours, recommendation 24, which Senator Murray already read you. For my part, I intend to read you recommendation 26. Now, as you know, this committee was chaired by a Liberal senator, Senator Sinclair, and had a majority of Liberal members. Listen carefully to recommendation 26: "We recommend that the government proceed with legislation to propose a tax on telecommunications services, but that such legislation specify that the 10 per cent tax be withdrawn upon implementation of a multi-stage sales tax levied on a broad range of goods and services, including telecommunications services.

[English]

> We recommend that the Government proceed with legislation to impose a tax on telecommunications services but that such legislation specify that the ten per cent tax be withdrawn upon implementation of a multi-stage sales tax levied on a broad range of goods and services including telecommunication services.

[Translation]

So, that was the recommendation.

[English]

Be withdrawn upon the implementation!

What I want to know is this: three years ago, in 1987, a committee having a majority of Liberal members was in favour of a recommendation to implement a tax on goods and services. And yet, we have been wasting time for weeks now because you are using every means at your disposal to block a measure that you recommended in 1987.

[English]

Senator Lucier: I would be only too happy to answer that question. I do not care who recommended what, whether it be a Liberal, the Liberal Party or anyone else. When something is put before the people of Canada and 85 percent of them say the answer is "no" it is no and it is no more complicated than that. If it is wrong it is wrong and if the people of Canada say to you that they do not want it, then you must listen to the people of Canada. That is what I have said before and that is what I continue to say. It has nothing to do with the Liberal Party, the Conservative party, the Banking Trade and Commerce Committee or anyone else.

[Translation]

Senator Grimard: Honourable sénator, you did not in fact answer my question, which was this: How is it that three years ago you were in favour of legislation that you are now attempting to kill? Forget about the people of Canada. My question is addressed to you.

Senator Lucier: I was not in favour of it three years ago, and I am not in favour of it now. But the people of Canada are now in a position to say whether they are in favour or not. They have said no. Can you not understand that?

Senator Grimard: But the Government of Canada was duly elected.

Senator Lucier: The people of Canada have said no. You cannot understand anything.

[English]

The people of Alberta, Nova Scotia and the Yukon are saying no.

Senator Murray: Are you controlled by public opinion polls.

Senator Lucier: Absolutely. I am always controlled by the public. Show me a government that is not controlled by the public and I will show you a party that is at 15 percent in the polls. If you do not have the brains to listen to the voters, you watch where you are in the polls. Perhaps the honourable senator should be controlled a little bit by what people think.

Senator Grafstein: If we are paying for the polls, why do you not table them? The honourable senator opposite talks about polls. If he has evidence to suggest that the intelligent public, the conservative public—

Senator Cogger: Are you suggesting that there is a difference between the intelligent public and the conservative public?

Senator Grafstein: No. I am suggesting that some of the intelligent public are Conservatives, NDP, and Liberals. My point is that if the question of polls is irrelevant, as some members opposite suggest, and the Government of Canada pays—weekly, monthly, quarterly and annually—for polls, then let us have the polls on the table and let us see what the Government of Canada has learned from those polls as to what the public thinks. I agree that we should not be bound by polls alone. However, that is not the purport of my question. Polls show some evidence of a public opinion and attitude. So let us have the polls on the table.

Senator Murray: As a matter of fact, one of the major differences between the Mulroney administration and the Trudeau government is that, under the present administration, polls taken by the government have become available under the access to information procedure. We tried to obtain polls taken by the Honourable Jean Chrétien when he was Minister of Justice and we were stonewalled in this very place and told that the release of the polls would be prejudicial to Federal-Provincial relations.

Senator Grafstein: Once again I agree with Senator Murray.

Senator Murray: I knew you would.

Senator Grafstein: If the taxpayer of Canada pays for polls, they should be tabled. Perhaps the honourable senator could save us some time as the Leader of the Government and make those polls available to us. Perhaps we could look at the polls of the last three-month period.

Senator Stanbury: And all of the petitions as well.

Senator Grafstein: The petitions are another question. They can bring them forward if they want. So, as opposed to proceeding under the access to information process, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate make the polls available to all Senators so that we can determine what weight to apply to them?

My point yesterday was that we should not listen just to mass public opinion but to informed opinion as well. Public opinion as represented by the polls certainly has some relevance, otherwise why should the government spend the taxpayers' money? I am confident that Senator Murray and his colleagues in the cabinet would not needlessly spend the taxpayers money unless they thought it was important to have those polls.

Senator Murray: A far more direct route is to go through the process that is in place. The people at the Access to Information offices have a whole computer system that can obtain all the polls taken on a particular subject.

Senator Grafstein: Will we be able to get them in sufficient time for the debate on the GST?

Senator Murray: Not if it starts tonight.

Senator Thériault: I want to bring some great news to this house. I just returned from New Brunswick. In fact, I watched Senator Murray on ATV this morning. I was impressed and so were the people with me. Some recent polls were taken in New Brunswick. They show the Tories at 11 percent. The people of New Brunswick, especially those of Beauséjour, appreciate the kindness of Mr. Mulroney in his decision not to put up a candidate there.

The Tories are at 4 per cent in Beauséjour, so it is quite magnanimous of the Prime Minister not to field a Tory candidate. They are at 11 per cent in New Brunswick, but at 4 per cent in Beauséjour. Take those polls into consideration.

Senator Lucier: To continue with my petitions. These petitions are public opinion polls. Public opinion is quite well reflected in these petitions. Polls are to find out what people are thinking. It does not make a lot of sense if senators are not going to listen to what they are thinking. It has become quite obvious, not only on this issue but on many issues, that this government and this Prime Minister have chosen to bulldoze their way through. It is his way or the highway, and it has always been that way. He is going to find out that the highway runs in both directions. Those who are suggesting, especially the new senators, that we should not pay attention to what the people are saying, are going to find that that is a pretty dangerous stand to take in politics. Well, it is not, so far as you are concerned, because your seat is safe until you are 75 years old, as is mine, but I think you are going to find that the Prime Minister is receiving a pretty good indication of what the people of Canada think of him right now and that will continue for some time.

Senator Carney: Would the senator permit a question?

Senator Lucier: Yes, senator.

Senator Carney: In a discussion of polls, is the senator aware of the remarks made by Professor Robert Clark from my own university of UBC who appeared before the committee and stated something we should be aware of? In his remarks he stated, "I realize that all of the members of your committee are under intense pressure to base your recommendations preponderantly on short-term political considerations. My earnest hope is that you will steadfastly give prime emphasis upon what is in Canada's long-term interest."

Is Senator Lucier aware of that plea by Professor Clark, who is a recognized expert in this field, as I think you would agree?

Senator Lucier: Yes, he is.

I know Senator Carney was not a senator at that time.

Senator Grafstein: Could we put on the record who the witness was and what his qualifications are? If you do not have it available, then it can be given to us later.

Senator Carney: I am prepared to do that. Professor Clark, as you should know, is probably one of Canada's foremost experts on public finance. He is Professor Emeritus in the Department of Economics at the University of British Columbia. He appeared before the Senate committee on August 1, 1990. The quotation I provided came from his supplementary additional comments on six questions about the goods and services tax, where he states his support for the principle of a goods and services tax and acknowledges some very real problems, which we hope to deal with should you permit us to debate this issue, and concludes that despite short-term polls the long-term implications of this tax are good for Canada.

Senator Lucier: In reply, Senator Carney, I was at the hearings when Professor Clark appeared. We enjoyed his presentation. He is a very knowledgable person, as you have said. He was also asked if the GST should be passed as it is, and he said "No". He said it should be amended.

Senator Carney: Senator, could I ask you for the very same reference for your comments that I was asked to provide in this house?

Senator Lucier: Just get the Hansard.

Senator Carney: I was asked to provide the reference for the information I gave to the house. I am asking you to give the same information about precisely what he stated and when he stated it to the committee.

Senator Lucier: It will be in the transcripts and I will bring it to your attention at a later date. I am sure you can do that as easily as I can. I was there when he was asked the question.

Senator Carney: I am asking you to give us the same courtesy that I was asked to give you.

Senator Lucier: I am telling you I am not going to give you the same courtesy. Don't you understand English?

Senator Molgat: He was not quoting from a document; you were, but he has told you where you will find it.

Senator Lucier: I have told you I am not quoting from a document. I was there and I heard him, and I was there when he was being questioned.

Senator Carney: You cannot substantiate that.

Senator Lucier: I said that I would provide you with the documents, but you can get them as easily as I can. Professor Clark suggested that there should be amendments to the GST.

Senator Carney: Why do you not allow us to get to debate on the GST so we can examine some of these suggestions?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: There is a little honesty required here. Are you suggesting, for five seconds, that this government is prepared, between now and December 31, to deal with amendments to the GST? Give me a break! You would not agree to amendments before.

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, I can only refer you to the remarks made by Harvie Andre, the Leader of the Government—

Senator Lucier: I am going to jump right out of my chair if you are referring me to Harvie Andre.

Senator Carney: Our job is to study and debate the bill and to make suggestions. You are preventing us from doing that.

Senator Lucier: I wonder if Senator Carney could tell me what direction Harvie is in. I would like to bow in that direction. He is one of the great intelligent Canadians of all time, and a real top democrat.

You mean the member of the government, Harvie Andre, is representing the people of Alberta on the GST? Go and ask the people of Alberta what they think of Harvie Andre right now.

Senator Carney: You asked me a specific question and I gave you a specific answer. Why do you not confine your remarks to the issue before you.

Senator Lucier: That is exactly what I am doing. If you will stay seated, it will be a lot easier for me to do it.

Senator LeBlanc: Must be she was a school teacher.

Senator Lucier: No wonder she got kicked out of the other place.

Senator Carney: Senator Lucier, did you suggest that I got kicked out of the other place? What is the basis for that suggestion?

Senator Lucier: Why are you not still in the cabinet?

Senator Carney: I retired because of arthritis before the election. I was not kicked out and that is a dishonourable and disgusting thing for you to say.

Senator Lucier: If you were not well enough to be there, why are you here?

Senator Carney: You should permit me to answer the question you have raised, because I think it is a dishonourable attack of yours to suggest I was kicked out.

I gratefully accepted the honour of being appointed to this place by the Prime Minister because I was assured that it was an honourable institution that would deal with the work before it in an orderly way. I am disgusted, as many of us are, with the methods that you are using to turn this place into a chamber of turmoil.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senator, did the Prime Minister say those words to you as part of your appointing process?

Senator Carney: Yes.

Senator Cogger: That is a privileged conversation.

Senator Austin: She referred to it.

Senator Cogger: Honourable senators, I know Senator Carney is too discreet to reveal the contents of a personal conversation.

Senator Grafstein: We are always interested in what the other side has to say about this place. We did not ask her to divulge confidential information. She divulged it. I would like to know the nature of that conversation. I would like to know how the Prime Minister feels about this place. It might be very instructive for us. Senator Carney told us some things about the other place that seem to be inconsistent with what she has just said.

Senator Murray: Not about the institution.

Senator Austin: How about the Minister of National Revenue?

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, would you permit me to answer the question.

Senator Lucier: Absolutely.

Senator Carney: Let me assure this house that at the time I was asked to come to this chamber the Prime Minister really believed that it was an honour for me to be asked, that he was doing something that was honourable, and that I would enjoy and be able to contribute to the quality of debate in the chamber. I am sure every single one of the new senators felt that way. The issue is whether we still feel the same way after enduring what Liberal senators have done to this institution in the last two weeks.

Senator Grafstein: I am somewhat curious about the Prime Minister's comments, because they are helpful. They seem to be, honourable senator, very inconsistent with what the Prime Minister has said about this place from time to time in the past few years. Prior to Senator Carney's entry to this place, and prior to the question of the GST, the Prime Minister seems to have been saying one thing to his supporters and to those he chooses to elevate here. He has the prerogative to choose the best and the brightest to come to this place from his side, and I do not quarrel with that. On the other hand, from listening to his comments in the scrums and reading Hansard, he seems to say something somewhat different to the Canadian people than he said to the honourable senator in private during the process of her more important appointment.

Senator Carney: Let me reply to that by saying that the Prime Minister's remarks are totally consistent with the performance of this chamber. I think all of us could agree that the performance in this chamber is less honourable now than it was before because—

Senator Stanbury: Because you broke the rules.

Senator Carney: —because of the activities and actions of the Liberal senators in this chamber.

Senator Lucier: I hope the record will show that Senator Carney said this place was more honourable before she came than it is now.

Senator Carney: I would agree with that. That is my point.

Senator Lucier: So do I. I have no problem with that at all.

Senator Carney: Are you apologizing for your remarks?

Senator Lucier: If you want to believe that the place was more honourable before you came, and I am agreeing with you, then there is no problem.

Senator Cogger: Your Honour, on a point of order I would like to draw your attention to Rule 38, which states:

> All personal, sharp or taxing speeches are forbidden.

I am not suggesting Senator Lucier's speech is anywhere near sharp, but personal and taxing it is.

Senator Grafstein: Senators on this side and that side have diverted Senator Lucier from the most important task he is confronting us with and that is the presentation of these important petitions. I would like to hear more of those petitions.

Senator Carney: I am waiting for an apology.

Senator Lucier: The answer to the point of order is that I was not making a speech, so it could not have been very taxing. I was reading petitions.

I will continue on with the petitions.

(Names of signatories read.)

Honourable senators, I have many more petitions. I will be returning to them at some time. I know it is going to break your hearts to see me sit down, but I will sit down since I know Senator LeBlanc has a few petitions he would like to present.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by some 596 residents of Saint John, New Brunswick, who ask the Senate to reject the goods and services tax bill.

Before I proceed to naming those who have signed this petition, I may say that I find it quite interesting how much importance we attach to the result of polls. National polls are generally a consultation of some 2000 or perhaps 2500 people. If one looks at the number of people who would normally be questioned on a national poll in a city the size of Saint John, I suspect it would be possibly 25 or 30 and that seems very high; perhaps it would be 10. I have a petition here signed by 596 people who were signing their names under a statement that the following people want this member of Parliament and the federal government to know that they strongly oppose the proposed 7 per cent goods and services tax. I have to give some importance to this petition at least in terms of numbers.

I regret Senator Simard is not sitting in his seat. I found his comments on the last election very interesting. Perhaps he will return, so I will save my comments on that for a little later in my remarks.

The petitioners listed on this impressive list would want us to honour the commitment that they made to sign their names to a petition, and I will read a good number of the names that are here.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, might I interrupt for a moment. A few moments ago we had a very interesting and potent exchange about the impact of public opinion on public policies. A legitimate viewpoint, a legitimate question, was expressed by members opposite about what emphasis should be given to public opinion. This evening in the gallery we are graced by the presence of organizers and key officials for the Pro-Canada Network, and also some very distinguished Canadians who are members of the Council of Canadians who are having meetings in Ottawa today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grafstein: One reason the Pro-Canada Network is present is that they have requested a meeting with Liberal senators to deal with their concerns respecting the GST.

I know senators opposite would say we should not give weight to polls, but the Pro-Canada Network is not made up of polls. It is made up of people, over 10 million Canadians. This group is made up of more than 40 national groups and more than 10 provincial coalitions. They include representatives of labour—

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Did you say 10 million?

Senator Grafstein: Over 10 million Canadians.

Senator Simard: Sheer nonsense. You don't believe that, do you, senator?

Senator Grafstein: I have no reason to disbelieve what the organizers have just told me a few moments ago. If senators opposite wish to question their representations, they are here and, although they are not able to speak in this chamber, they will be able to make their voices heard a little later on.

Senator Simard: They did the same thing on free trade. You know what happened to that.

Senator Grafstein: They represent labour groups across the country, which in turn represent important working Canadians. They represent women's groups, church groups from coast to coast, farm groups and small business people. They are an important and vital part of Canadian industry. Not only do they reflect public opinion, but they represent a substantive number of Canadians who work and pay taxes. I would like to welcome them this evening on behalf of all senators and we certainly welcome their efforts on behalf of public policy.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: The number of people they represent echo their sentiments in these petitions which, as I said earlier, require of people that they make a commitment when they sign their names to a statement, something which they have done. I will continue reading their names since I believe that they are entitled to have their names read.

(Names of signatories read.)

Hon. Mario Beaulieu: Why not read the phone book?

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Perhaps the Honourable Senator LeBlanc did not hear the honourable senator opposite say that he might as well read the phone book. In fact, he intimates that you are reading from a phone book.

I think it is important, honourable senators, that we listen to these petitions. We talked about this yesterday and this morning. If honourable senators opposite have a question, or want to question the validity of petitions from Canadians who are trying to exercise one of their rights through their senator—

Senator Beaulieu: You know that it was an association that put that list together.

Senator Grafstein: I am listening to the names of Canadians.

Senator Stanbury: These are the real Canadians.

Senator Grafstein: All I am suggesting, honourable senators, is that if you have a suggestion to make to indicate that these petitions do not represent Canadians, and that they are somehow fictional, then the proper procedure is to address that.

Hon. Michel Cogger: I personally saw Senator Frith deliver this list to the desk of Senator LeBlanc. We do not question that.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: The honourable senator across the way is objecting to Senator LeBlanc's putting these names on the record. What we have been trying to tell senators opposite consistently is that these are the names of Canadians. You are saying that he is reading from a telephone book. That shows the regard you have for the Canadians who took the trouble to sign these petitions. They have signed these petitions themselves. Obviously, you do not like that because they do not agree with you. It just so happens that it is about time you listened to Canadians.

Senator Cogger: Senator Molgat, our worry on this side was that Senator LeBlanc was reading a list of names from New Brunswick, and each and every one of them is anglophone. I turned to my colleague and I said, "What is it?" He said, "It's simple. All the francophones in New Brunswick have deserted the Liberal party". I said, "I think you're going too far. We'll wait and see. Maybe he will get to the other end of it".

Senator Grafstein: I think that is an appropriate response. Certainly in the course of the next few hours, or the next few days, we will be able to satisfy the honourable senator opposite that there are francophones in New Brunswick who also feel as strongly as anglophones about the GST. I appreciate the senator's interjection because we will make those names available to him in the course of the next few hours, days or weeks.

Senator LeBlanc: I happen to have represented all of New Brunswick. Frankly, I did not make distinctions between francophones and anglophones. Whenever they wrote to me, phoned me or asked me to go see them, I did that. I resent this sort of attack, which, frankly, I find despicable. In fact, I have other petitions here, which I may or may not read this evening, which are from francophone areas. Again, there are some anglophones who live in those villages and towns, exactly as there are francophones and anglophones living in harmony together. Frankly, I do not think we need to bring up this subject on the floor of the house.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Would you allow me a question, Senator LeBlanc?

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Senator Simard, I would be very pleased to answer your questions. You have always had the courtesy to rise and ask your questions. I will certainly attempt to give you an answer.

Senator Simard: Honourable Senators, I knew my request would not go unheeded. Your generosity is well known in New Brunswick. Thank you for giving me this opportunity to say a few words on the subject.

I would like to make the following suggestion to Senator LeBlanc. Of course, Canadians do have the right to see their name listed on a petition and mentioned in this Chamber. That is consistent with democracy, with our laws. It is the petition process. And I am happy that there are people in New Brunswick that want to participate in the democratic process. Senator LeBlanc has done more than his share over the years, through all these good years, and throughout his career in federal politics. He was one of our best Canadian ministers and an ally of the Hatfield government of which I was a member at the time. He has done a great deal for New Brunswickers.

Having said that, I would like to ask Senator LeBlanc if he does not believe that our time could be put to better use now debating the GST—our opposition to it, or support of it, and possible amendments to Bill C-62. I am just wondering whether all these hours spent here are really being well spent. We have already spent more than 80 hours on questions of privilege and petitions. I am wondering whether we shouldn't—we do have visitors in our gallery, people who represent Canadians—perhaps not ten million Canadians, but, say, two or three million—and I wonder whether those people really believed in what they were doing or whether they didn't just sign those petitions because they did not want to be pestered or pressured further.

So, considering that these people are here, perhaps we should begin to debate the GST and give the government a chance to respond to some of the concerns you seem to have. Some of your concerns may be perfectly legitimate.

We know that Mr. Wilson promised to improve the legislation either in a future budget, or through regulations or other administrative measures. It seems to me we would better serve the interest of Canadians at this point if we were to table Bill C-62.

I have a hard time understanding how one could possibly consider reading names off—names that will not even appear in the proceedings of the Debates—to be productive work; Senator Thériault, I had some kind words—and certainly entirely justified—for Senator LeBlanc. If you allow me the time to do so, I may have some kind words to say about you later on. But if you cause me to lose my train of thought, we could have trouble; so please be patient. Soon it will be your turn; I'll get to you. If not today, perhaps next week.

Senator Simard: Indeed, since we are taking about productivity, I think it would be worthwhile noting that this filibustering operation costs money, and since Senator LeBlanc—although I would not want to abuse his generosity—is the Chairman of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee, I think at this point I should not only alert public opinion, but read out for the record a letter I sent to Senator LeBlanc today making a specific request—indeed, this letter followed a commitment he made in the Chamber yesterday in this regard.

So, with your permission, I would like to read this very short letter. I realize that Senator LeBlanc is already aware of it, but please allow me to do so for my colleagues' information. This is the letter in question, and it is dated today:

> Senator Leblanc, Chairman
> Ottawa
> Senator,
> I made mention in the Senate Chamber yesterday of my concern with respect to the additional cost associated with our sitting on a 24-hour basis, as well as my intention to forward to you, as Chairman of the Internal Economy,

Budgets and Administration Committee, a request for assessment of these additional costs. I would therefore be grateful if you could provide us, as quickly as possible, with a detailed list of the additional costs, either direct or indirect, occasioned by this situation.

Moreover, I have provided a brief list of certain types of expenditures that could affect this 24-hour operation, including salaries and related expenses, like Senate security, furniture and other services, food, messenger services and transportation, Senate personnel, as well as other expenses.

Thank you for your attention to this matter.

Yours sincerely,

Jean Maurice Simard

The senator from Edmonston.

Some people have been saying that this 24-hour operation that has been going on since Tuesday may be costing us as much as $50,000 or $60,000 more per day. In any case, I am still waiting for an answer. I know Senator LeBlanc will want to move as quickly as possible to provide me with one, as is his wont. But I will not further abuse his trust.

I will just close on that point, and invite Senator LeBlanc and others, like Senator Thériault, to give some thought not only to this letter, but to the appropriateness of discussing something else, given that Senator Stanbury and Senator Grafstein have just said they cannot wait anymore, that it is very difficult for them to wait, probably because Senator Frith has said to them: "Listen, you are going to stay here; you can read the telephone book, you can petitions, you can read all sorts of other things before we get to the GST." But I would hope that Senator LeBlanc, who has always been fairly independent-minded, will want to put an end to this folly being so masterfully directed by Senator Frith and Senator MacEachen.

If you wish to continue in the meantime, Senator LeBlanc, you are perfectly free to do so, but it seems to me you are so much more effective—and you have demonstrated this many times—when you are acting positively, by proposing improvements to things, rather than simply reading off the names of people who will never actually see their name in Hansard. Thank you.

Senator LeBlanc: I would like to thank Senator Simard for allowing me to rest for a few moments. With respect to his letter, I want him to know that I found it waiting for me when I went back to my office at 6 p.m. this evening. I will attend to it as soon as the Financial Services staff are back, and I do hope to be able to provide Senator Simard and other interested senators with this information then.

As to whether it is appropriate to register the opinion of Canadians who have signed petitions in the context of this debate, it is my feeling that one could easily justify spending a bit of time and money to allow people whose voice is rarely heard to make their views known and to register their opinion. In no way do I consider that to be undemocratic. Indeed, I think it is less undemocratic than simply ignoring the people's opinion, particularly when they take the trouble of signing petitions. It is less undemocratic than the process we were forced to suffer through when the senators opposite mounted a filibuster against their own legislation in our initial sittings after our return.

In any case, I am prepared to give the kind of serious consideration to Senator Simard's suggestions that they deserve. There is usually a very genuine feeling behind them. I hope that one day we will be able to come back into this Chamber and resume our discussions and debates in a serene atmosphere. But, having said that, I do reget that I was prevented from intervening on a question of substance, in other words, deprived of my right to vote when I appeared at 5:28 to do so. I admit I find that much more offensive to this institution than the operation we have mounted here, which involves paying some attention to public opinion, without necessarily using polls, the way the big agencies do, at a very considerable profit.

So that is why I will not attempt to paralyse the work of this Chamber, but I did feel it was important to convey the opinion of the people of my province, New Brunswick.

In fact, I would be prepared to share my time with Mrs. McCarver, if she wished to continue reading the list, or any other list; I am selfish, and I certainly do not claim to own it.

On the other hand, Senator Cogger, whom I like very much, said something I regret to say is downright silly when he stated that it was Senator Frith who had brought me the petition. That is completely wrong. I, myself, went to the pile of petitions and said: I would like to present petitions for my province. I then verified their authenticity. I was satisfied that they seemed to be acceptable petitions. That is why I rose to begin reading the names on those petitions.

So, I will continue to do so, with your permission, honourable senators.

[English]

I will continue to read the names on the petition.

(Names of signatories read.)

● (2300)

And that is the end of that petition, which I would like to present to the house. It mainly represents residents of the City and the area of St. John, New Brunswick.

Honourable Senators, I said earlier that I would make a comment when Senator Simard was present. I listened with great interest to what he had to say about the GST, especially his explanation that, in the first year, it will be revenue neutral, and then, afterwards, will increase. I do not wish to push the agricultural analogy too far, but, to me, this is a little like a rather innocent, neutral steer in the pasture, which, by some great miracle of nature, becomes converted into a milk cow, because if I understand correctly, in the second year of the existence of this very neutral species, that neutral tax would, at one point, transform itself into quite a large revenue producer.

Senator Austin: Six billion more!

Senator Simard: As more people go to work!

Senator LeBlanc: I hope Senator Simard's optimism is correct. I am a little worried because of the timetable of the introduction. I am not talking about the substance. I will not even pretend to be knowledgeable enough since I did not follow that file as carefully as I followed the Free Trade file owing to the fact that I was a member of the Foreign Affairs committee. I was not a member of the Banking Committee.

However, that being as it is, Senator Simard then did a remarkable thing. He is very resourceful, very imaginative. He blames John Turner for the fact that the GST was not fully discussed during the election campaign. I have heard the present administration blame us for everything that has happened. For example, if the carrots did not grow last year, or if the tomatoes froze, it was the fault of the Trudeau Government before 1984. We have had six years of passing the buck to those that the people of Canada replaced with a new administration, I assume hoping for better days, which they did not always get. Perhaps John Turner did not discuss sufficiently the GST, but if my memory is correct—and I stand here on thin ice because I have not had time to check the file and to look at the clippings—when that one very loose cannon, the Chairman of the House of Commons Finance Committee, Mr. Blenkarn, raised the issue of the GST, he was immediately silenced by the Minister of Finance. In fact, if I remember correctly, he said, "If Canadians knew what was coming, I don't think they would vote for us."

Senator Stanbury: That's right! He said that.

Senator LeBlanc: I do not know if that quote is exactly accurate and I do not want to be unfair to my friend across the way.

Senator Stanbury: Never!

Senator LeBlanc: However, I can say, frankly, that if I accept a lot of the blame for mistakes of successive leaders of my party, I do not accept that the reason the GST was not discussed in the last election was the fault of the Leader of the Opposition. I find that one a little bit hard to swallow.

Senator Oliver: Is this on your petition?

Senator LeBlanc: However, Senator Simard, I thought I would make that point in your presence.

Senator Simard: It is a good point, Senator.

Senator Austin: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have some petitions from New Brunswick, Ontario and elsewhere . . .

[English]

But, colleagues, I would like to relate to you, if you grant me a few minutes, my amusement when I hear my friend, Senator Simard, worrying about expenditures and deficits. I would like to relate to you that he and I sat facing one another in another legislature. He occupied the important posts of Minister of Finance and Chairman of the Treasury Board, and I do not know what others, but what he seems to have forgotten is that, when he took over with his leader, Premier Hatfield—and that government did a lot of good things, the debt in New Brunswick was $300 million. The total debt of my province when we were kicked out of office in 1970 was $300 million.

As a matter of fact, in 1969, which was the last year of our administration, we had, for the first time since, I think, 1907, if I remember correctly—and it was such a long time ago—we had actually reduced the debt of New Brunswick, and that is something that has not been done in many places in Canada. We had reduced the debt of New Brunswick by $2 million. They took over in 1970, and guess what? I repeat that they have done a lot of good things in New Brunswick, but one thing they were not known for was their frugality, because, 17 years later, when the people of New Brunswick woke up, we had a debt of over $3 billion. Senator Simard and his colleagues—I wish his premier were here right now—

Senator LeBlanc: His whole Cabinet is here.

Senator Thériault: They were not known for their frugality. As a matter of fact, part of that time, Senator Lowell Murray was Deputy Minister in the Premier's office. I repeat, I am amused when my good friend talks of the cost of running the Senate these extra hours.

Senator Stanbury: Especially with eight more senators!

Senator Thériault: Yes. I am amused, because, I repeat, he was not known for his frugality when he was a minister in the Province of New Brunswick. His expense account was never the lowest.

Senator Simard: Would you allow me a question or comment at this time?

Senator Thériault: Yes, sure, I've got time.

Senator Simard: I would just like to remind Senator Thériault that, yes, when we took over in 1970—and we are going to be celebrating the 20th anniversary of that take-over in a few weeks—the budget of the province was around $325 million. The Liberals had prepared for an election in the Fall of 1970 and projected a surplus of about $5 million or $6 million for the year.

Senator Thériault: More than that!

Senator Simard: We took over and had the books examined by a firm of chartered accountants, and those figures were confirmed by the Auditor General of New Brunswick, and they found that, in a budget of $325 million with a projected 1970-71 deficit of $5 million, the actual figure turned out to be a deficit of over $10 million.

You say I was irresponsible, but to this day I remain the only Finance Minister in the history of New Brunswick, presiding over the financial administration and operation and budget, to have had four consecutive annual surpluses.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Simard: Mr. Maher came very close in the last little while to match this record, but he had to admit last week that, unfortunately, he was not going to be able to make it three surplus years in a row. Our record will speak for itself. Yes, the debt of New Brunswick increased, as it increased throughout Canada, but I just want to remind you, Senator Thériault, that we made commitments in the 1970 election campaign to remove the sales tax on clothing, footwear and building materials among other things, which we did at the first opportunity in March of 1971.

Senator Cogger: Hear, hear!

Senator Simard: We took the tax off many items other than the ones I mentioned.

Senator Austin: Why don't you do that again?

Senator Simard: As a matter of fact, the Liberals, in the golden years under our colleague, Senator Robichaud, taxed just about everything that either moved or did not move. Over the first four years we kept removing taxes and reducing taxes, but that does not matter. Perhaps you and I wish to relive those years, but the fact of the matter is that the electors of New Brunswick re-elected the Conservative government in four consecutive elections. So there is no second guessing here. It does not matter what you and I say about those years. In 1987, they chose to elect Premier McKenna, and you should not be saying things that reflect badly on the judgment of New Brunswick citizens. That does not really pay big dividends. Let us let history be history. Let us perhaps draw some lessons from our mistakes and your mistakes, and let us hope that, once the GST is implemented, perhaps two or three years from now people will see who was right. We were not always popular during those 17 years in office. As a matter of fact, we started every election, 1970, 1974, 1978 and 1982, as Senator Murray will testify—

Senator Murray: But not tonight.

Senator Simard: —at least 12 or 15 or more points behind, but the good judgment of the people of New Brunswick prevailed and they realized that we had shown courage and had fought for what we believed, and when they looked at all the alternatives, they decided that, while perhaps we were not perfect, we were the best choice. They said no to Joe Daigle; they said no to Doug Young; they said no to Bob Higgins as they had said no to our friend and beloved colleague, Senator Robichaud, in 1970. Our electoral record speaks for itself. Let the future be and we will see. Do not try to second guess what happened from 1970 to 1987, Senator Thériault; just get on with the GST.

Senator Thériault: You may have noticed, honourable senators, that it is very easy to get under the skin of Senator Simard. He forgot a few things, though. It is true that they started at least two of those elections behind in the poles, but they spent hundreds of millions of dollars of government money to buy their way into office, throwing away money right and left. He talked about four consecutive surpluses. Still, in 17 years, they took a debt of $300 million—$300 million since Confederation—and in 17 years they made that debt into over $3 billion.

I heard Senator Murray, I think this morning, on "Canada A.M." discussing the mountain of debt that the Trudeau government had left to the Government of Canada. Can you imagine? He was Deputy Minister in Premier Hatfield's office when they were piling debt upon debt upon debt on to the poor province of New Brunswick—$3 billion on to 700,000 people.

Senator Murray: You left holes in the ground where there should have been hospitals! You had terrible hospitals. You had not even joined Medicare, for goodness' sake.

Senator Simard: That is right. We had paid for Medicare for three years but we were not getting it. The public libraries were in terrible shape. They had been opened without books and we put books into them.

Senator Thériault: Senator Simard talks about taking the sales tax off shoes or clothing, and that is true. However, for the first time in New Brunswick, his government imposed a labour tax. We had never heard of, or dreamt of, taxing labour. They imposed a ten per cent tax on labour and drove the economy underground in a way that had never been seen before in New Brunswick. A ten per cent tax on labour!

Senator Murray: That is not going to be so easy for Premier McKenna to harmonize with the GST.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, we listened throughout the summer to Senator Simard on the Committee. I did not say very much, but I have watched how he spent government money for 17 years.

Senator Cogger: Senator Thériault, I do not want to raise a point of order because I have not had too much success with those this afternoon, but—

Senator Simard: Try again!

Senator Cogger: —I might just point out to you that it seems to me that you are on the wrong tax in the wrong years!

Senator Oliver: You are on petitions!

Senator Cogger: The last I looked, we were trying very hard to get to the debate on the GST. The year, Senator, is 1990! We are not discussing labour taxes.

Senator Austin: That is so good of you, Senator Cogger. You have so many things to say about the Trudeau past at any time you wish to speak, but the Hatfield past is suddenly not appropriate.

Senator Murray: He is not here!

Senator Cogger: I am sorry, but I was not even in grade school when that came about.

Senator Thériault: As a matter of fact, I sometimes believe that you should still be in grade school, but that is another thing.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Nurgitz: That was funny!

Senator Thériault: I knew I would get a reaction. I did want to say again that I heard Senator Murray this morning with a group of people, and I have never seen a parliamentary leader with a majority bungle so badly as the Leader of the Government did today.

Somebody said some time ago—and I have heard this more than once—that the Liberals don't know what to do in opposition and the Tories don't know what to do in government. We have the proof of that. You people don't know how to run a government! You do not know how to run a parliament! I thought you would learn after you forgot to count when Joe Clark was defeated, but you have not heard.

Senator Simard: Are you telling us?

Senator Cogger: We are listening.

Senator Thériault: As far as I am concerned, I could not care less.

Senator Cogger: Jerry, you could give us a lesson about that using the Liberals in Ontario.

Senator Grafstein: The most glorious interlude in the history of Canada!

Senator Thériault: I heard Senator Murray telling us what senators said in the Banking Trade and Commerce Committee Report of three years ago. I was part of a government that imposed taxes, and people did not like that. Senator Simard was part of a government that imposed taxes, and people did not like that. What bothers me about the present situation in 1990 and going in to 1991 is that the GST is just so unpopular. We never had a tax revolt during the years that I was in the provincial government and I do not remember receiving thousands or even hundreds of names on petitions against any tax that we increased. We increased the sales tax and we increased income tax, like every other government, but I do not remember—and I am sure Senator Simard does not remember from when he was in government—receiving thousands of petitions and phone calls and letters from people and organizations and municipalities and provinces and church groups. This is almost a tax revolt. How do you expect to govern a country when 80 per cent of the population has lost confidence in the government?

Senator Stanbury: Eighty-five!

Senator Austin: Almost 90!

Senator Thériault: You have lost the trust of the people. I would like anyone here to tell me if they have ever seen thousands or hundreds of thousands of signed petitions against any government measure. It has never happened in the history of Canada.

Senator Cogger: Senator Thériault, might I remind you of something? I heard the same story back in 1987 when you went around the country and then came in to this Chamber scaring us and scaring everybody, saying, "I've got petitions. Do you think this government is going to impose Bill C-22 on the country? Look at what the people of Canada say. I've got petitions." It is the same horror story.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

Senator Austin: Here you go with the same old red herring.

Senator Cogger: Senator, how do you expect us to take you seriously? You sound like an old record. I had a similar discussion with Senator Grafstein last night. You missed a good exchange.

Senator Thériault: I've got time.

Senator Cogger: Stick around. Maybe we will do it again. Around 3:30 in the morning, we redid the debate on Bill C-22. Your side of the House keeps repeating the same story. Remember what you did in 1987 over Bill C-22? You said, "If this government has any sense, they will drop this bill because the people are against it." What did the government do? It took its responsibility and put C-22 through. What happened to the price of drugs? Contrary to the scare tactics and the horror stories—

Senator Thériault: They went up 50 per cent!

Senator Cogger: Look at the first annual report of the Drug Prices Review Board. The prices of drugs actually went down.

Senator Austin: That is nonsense!

Senator Cogger: I know you do not like to hear it.

Senator Stanbury: The report did not say that.

Senator Austin: The report says they increased 18 per cent.

Senator Simard: You said the same thing about free trade!

Senator Grafstein: Senator Cogger, perhaps I will come back to the drug question, but to be fair, the government itself has said, in its projections, that the GST is not going to reduce prices.

Senator Simard: Oh, yes, it will.

Senator Beaulieu: It will on some items.

Senator Grafstein: In fact, in the neutral period, in the first year, it will have an inflationary impact of 1.25 per cent. I listened carefully to Senator Cogger's arguments on the drug question and I think it has narrower application than a wide consumption tax, but surely the impact of this particular tax is inflationary, and that is the concern of Canadians who are already concerned with the high interest rates. The government itself has indicated this. To be fair, and to respond to Senator Thériault's patriotic plea to listen to the voices of many Canadians who are concerned about this issue, I think that they are concerned at least about the interim period, the first year. We will talk about the longer period later, but clearly, in the interim period it will have an inflationary impact, and that will cause interest rates to be maintained at a higher level than Canadians—all Canadians, this side and that side of the house—can either afford or deal with. So if we are going to have a more cogent exchange, let us try to deal with the issue and see if we can have an agreement or disagreement on the more narrow point, but let us make comparable analyses that are helpful to this house and to the public.

I will not get to my petitions until sometime after 1:00 o'clock, but let me just say now that, in the gallery this evening, we are graced by the presence of Mr. Morton Smith, and his wife, Carol Smith, who have come from Toronto. They live in the northern part of Metropolitan Toronto, the region I so proudly represent. I welcome them here. I went up to greet them and I asked them what their view was on the GST. I had not had a previous discussion with them. Mr. Smith is a very distinguished barrister and solicitor in the City of Toronto and comes from a great family of professional people who have been in the accounting business and the law business for several generations. He said to me, and I am not quoting him out of context, "Look, this is a terrible tax." And he gave me the reasons for his opinion, such as the cost of dealing with the tax and the impact it will have on professional services and ordinary citizens. Now, this is a raw petition, unsolicited, spontaneous, from somebody I do not think is a partisan politician, and who comes from my fair city.

I welcome Mr. and Mrs. Smith, who have made these poignant and pertinent comments on the debate at hand.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Carney: May I ask a question? Have I missed something or have we moved to the debate on the GST? I ask that in light of the remarks you have been making for some time.

Senator Teed: We are ready.

Senator Grafstein: As I understand the rules, a senator presents the petition, and if other senators wish to question the senator about the petitions, they are entitled to do so. Senator Cogger was responding to Senator Thériault, who has been labouring under some duress in order to deal with these petitions.

Senator Thériault: Yes, I am very upset.

Senator Grafstein: We were responding, I believe, within the context of the rules, where one senator questions another senator. Senator Cogger then directed a comment to me, and I was responding to his comment.

Senator Carney: Honourable senator, you know that an analysis of the bill is really subject for debate. We are very ready on this side to move to debate. Clearly you are giving us the benefit of your views. I think we should move to the debate.

● (2330)

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, Senator Thériault has a number of petitions to present. I understand that Senator Watt, who represents a very important constituency of the country, the far north, has a number of petitions to present. It is important that we hear from him and about the petitions that he would like to address. I have a number of petitions from Metropolitan Toronto, and I would like to deal with them. So I think that we should continue with the petitions.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, Senator Thériault, you were saying that you and I, and perhaps others in this Chamber, had served in governments that had implemented taxes or increased taxation rates. That's quite true. You were very successful for quite a number of years, just as we were.

Senator Thériault: I never lost.

Senator Simard: No, that's right. I was beaten before people got a chance to know me, but once they knew me, they supported me. I was beaten in 1968, when Trudeaumania was sweeping the country. That was a difficult experience, but nonetheless beneficial in subsequent years.

The advice that I gave Senator Thériault earlier was that we should spend less time talking about the past and more time looking to the future with confidence, including passing the GST, which will help us prepare a better future for this country.

Senator Thériault, you and I were both part of a government that increased taxes. I think that Canadians understand that taxes have to be paid by someone. We would obviously prefer that our taxes be paid by our neighbours; that's right, and it's perfectly normal.

As I recall, Senator Thériault, back in 1971, after your government's defeat in the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly, in the course of an evening of debate like the one taking place this evening, you made a confession. I just wanted to remind you of this and say that there was some truth in it. I believe you were serious at the time and that you still are. I understand that you sometimes get too wrapped up in partisan considerations and for too long time a time—but that is something else altogether. But you, Senator Thériault, you admitted that the reason you lost power back in 1970 was not because your government was a bad government or for any specific reason; according to you, Senator Thériault, the main reason for your defeat was that you or your government had completely lost touch with the people. And I believe there is a lesson to be drawn from all of that. A government may become unpopular at various times during its mandate, but it is a fatal error to lose touch with the people.

And I'd like to tie this in with the GST. The current government has not lost touch with the people. The problem is not that the government won't listen to the people; it has listened to them; Mr. Wilson listened, even during the election campaign. We were criticized for this earlier, but in fact, we should have been congratulated for having said: yes, the GST will be a cash cow. The government was so concerned with what the people had to say that the rate was lowered from 9 to 7%. The government also agreed to other amendments even before the legislation was tabled in the Senate. So, the government has not lost touch with the people.

Now, that doesn't mean that a government should necessarily be managing the country's affairs on the basis of polls. The government is listening, and even though, unfortunately, 80% of Canadians are opposed to the tax, for various reasons, we know how many of those who make up this 80%—and we said this in Committee and heard it said in Committee—who are against the GST are opposed to it only because they want their particular sector to be exempt. They want their neighbours to be taxed more and pick up the slack, as they say.

I would just like to remind Senator Thériault of his public confession at a time when he was in a good frame of mind, and I would not want you to conclude that, because the government seems to be somewhat inflexible at this time, it has completely lost touch with the people. Absolutely not!

In due course, this legislation will be passed despite all opposition. We have no choice. And the sooner, the better, in order to ensure that Canadians are ready when the new GST comes into effect. So, Senator Thériault, you, too, should stay in touch with the people. Try to find out why there is such strong opposition to the GST. It's not cash in the bank for you. These are not all votes for you. Don't go thinking that, because you have taken their concerns to heart, when the time comes, they will rush to embrace you, saying: you Liberals defended us, and now we're going to vote for you. The fact is, these same people will eventually remember that the Liberals used them to justify the disgraceful scenes we all witnessed last week. Eventually these people are going to say to themselves: we prefer a government that has the courage of its convictions; although it made it unpopular, the government did something beneficial for the country.

So, Senator Thériault, I'll just end on that point and say that I hope you will find the courage to admit that you have really been a bit too irresponsible, a bit too demagogic, over the past few months, and to eventually say to yourselves: we made a mistake, and now we are going to discuss just how we can make this legislation better. Then I believe your role would be a useful and justifiable one.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I have here a petition, because today marks thirty years that I have been in public life, be it at the municipal, provincial or federal level.

I was stopped by hundreds of people on the streets of Moncton who told me that when I went back to the Senate, I was to try and get their message across to my colleagues here who don't want to hear it. I saw some 1500 people stand up as a group and beg me to try and block the GST. I just say to my colleague, Senator Simard, that polls are one thing, but petitions are quite another. There is going to be a by-election in New Brunswick on December 10, and your government doesn't even have the courage to field a candidate because you're only at 4% in the polls. That's the reality. You're going the see the real polls in New Brunswick, because there'll be people voting for the NDP, the Liberals, and the COR party. And in Ontario, there'll be people voting Liberal, a few voting Conservative maybe, and, of course, NDP. And then you'll see the results of polls on the tax, and everything you've been doing.

Senator Simard: I would just like to stop you for a moment to tell you that I believe you have introduced a new topic into the debate; whenever you're supposed to be talking about something in particular, you're always going off topic.

Senator Thériault: Which is the reason why you're here now.

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Simard: That says it all. I thought I dealt with this subject earlier to my satisfaction. But then he went and introduced something else.

As to what's going to happen in Beauséjour, I must say I've always preferred to leave the polling to the professionals. But even the experts make mistakes sometimes. A perfect example is the provincial election results in Ontario, where Mr. Peterson was leading with 52% when the election was called. But that's another story altogether.

As to what's going to happen in Beauséjour, Senator Thériault, whatever happens, happens. I think I'll just stop for a moment, because I seem to have lost the attention of Senator Thériault. Perhaps silence will have a beneficial effect on him.

If you would be so kind as to listen to my remarks, Senator Thériault, I will attempt to deal with your problem. You seem to want to predict the results in the Beauséjour by-election. But I, for one, am unaware of what the results will be.

Senator Thériault: It's on December 10.

Senator Simard: Yes, that's right; on December 10. And Prime Minister Mulroney didn't hesitate. He decided it would be on December 10, and that we would not field a candidate. He asked—listen, you mentioned this once, and now I would just like you to wait for the answer.

Senator Thériault, you talked about 4%. Well, Prime Minister Mulroney didn't wait too long to announce the by-election, after having put Mr. Chrétien to shame for refusing to seek a seat. That's when Mr. Chrétien decided to run in Beauséjour. Certainly, we can discuss why he decided to run there, rather than in Quebec, another day in greater detail, but that, again, is another matter.

So, he is running in Beauséjour. I really don't know what's going to happen. Now, you're sayin that we're only at 4% in the polls, but the fact is we've never been much higher than that in Beauséjour in the past hundred years, in either the good years or the bad years. So, it really doesn't matter. There is nothing new in that.

But what I would like to remind you of is that Mr. Mulroney, after all, was very nice to do this; your leader, Mr. Chrétien, said himself that Mulroney had been kind and gracious, had behaved like a gentleman because he'd wanted to follow in the footsteps of a former great Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson.

I hope you're not going to get upset this evening, Senator Thériault, about not being allowed your own interpretation of the process that led the Prime Minister to make this decision. So, we can take it, and I don't think there's really much point in saying that we're at 4%, or that Jacquie Vautour is at 6% — you know what I'm talking about. I mentioned Jacquie Vautour, and I wasn't wrong.

But I do hope that Senator Thériault will make a visit to Beauséjour; it isn't far from your riding. Perhaps you could tell them, Senator Thériault, just what you said during the convention in Calgary, when you were being interviewed by Mario Montpetit on the French network of the CBC—just exactly what you said about your own leader who is now running in Beauséjour. I hope that you are prepared to tell them that you yourself, Sénator Thériault, said of your current leader, Jean Chrétien, that he had neither the intelligence nor the stature to be leader of the Liberal Party. And even less so to be Prime Minister of Canada. What's more, we have recordings of that. You yourself said that.

So, if the people of Beauséjour want to vote for Chrétien, after everything you've said, well, too bad for them; we're just going to let them make up their own minds. Don't try to short-circuit the decision-making process, Senator Thériault; tell me you're going to find the courage to repeat the accusations you made in Calgary when you visit Beauséjour. Copies of them are in our possession. Then you may really provide a useful service to the people of Beauséjour, by making them aware of what you said and warning against voting for someone who has neither the stature nor the intelligence to be the leader of the Liberal Party.

That's right, Senator Murray, in case you missed the beginning of my statement. That's exactly what Senator Thériault said on the eve of the convention in Calgary where his leader, Mr. Chrétien, was elected—that he had neither the intelligence nor the stature to be leader of the Liberal Party of Canada—still less Prime Minister of Canada.

So, if the people of Beauséjour want to vote for him, fine; I have no objection.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I have no recollection of the comments that I am alleged to have made. It's perfectly true that I was not a Jean Chrétien supporter. I supported Paul Martin, and I have never believed in doing things behind people's backs. But the people of Beauséjour are probably more intelligent than I, and they're going to vote for Chrétien. I am perfectly prepared to let the people in that riding make their own informed decision. So, I have no problem with that, and really, I appreciate it so much; we have lots of time, and when I rose to begin presenting my petitions, I managed to kill a couple of hours without even starting to read my petitions. I even got senators Simard, Cogger and probably a few others as well—yes, I believe even the senator from Vancouver got up once or twice. That's right.

I would like to read part of a petition that was sent to me by a group of people in the province of New Brunswick. This time they're francophones. So, they say, and I quote:

> "We are confident that you and your colleagues will put a stop to the implementation of the Goods and Services Tax, and that you will take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that we have a fair and equitable taxation system.
> Yours sincerely,"

(Names of signatories read.)

Here we have a group of women very much involved in their community who are begging the Senate to try to put a stop to the most inequitable and unfair tax that has ever been proposed in this country.

Thousands and thousands of people have been signing petitions, imploring the Government to listen to what they have to say. They are demanding alternatives. Dozens of alternatives were proposed to the Banking Committee this summer. But the main alternative is a fair and equitable tax. One has only to think of the low-income people living in apartments in Toronto, Vancouver, Montréal and other large cities, who, as we heard in the Banking Committee, will be facing higher costs when they want to use the washing machines in the basement of their apartment buildings. The increase in the cost of doing their washing will be greater for these low-income families than what they will be getting back from the Government.

Do you really think this makes sense—and I put this question to my colleagues opposite; do you really think it makes sense to tax these people just because the big corporations want this tax? It's for these reasons that we're getting hundreds of petitions. I have some here. I have more over here. There are so many of them that we don't know where to begin—and I'm just talking about petitions from New Brunswick.

Hundreds of people stopped me on the street today to implore me to come to Ottawa and try to get you people opposite to come to your senses. Have you decided that, just because you have a majority in the House of Commons, millions of people are going to let you get away with this? You'll see; you're absolutely right about what I said in 1970. We found this out when we called an election in New Brunswick. Sometimes you do lose an election, and when you do, it's because you've lost touch with the people, because you've forgotten to consult them, and because you haven't been willing to listen to what they've been saying. And as for you people, I don't know; I'm a little afraid for you; I think what you're going to do is destroy your own political party. We need a Conservative Party in Canada. But you are going to wipe it right off the map, because you refuse to listen. That's the reality. But you can go carping at Jean Chrétien all you want.

The Federal Minister of Fisheries was in New Brunswick yesterday, at the University of Moncton. It's not a very big university; there are only about five or six thousand people on campus. He had been invited by a group of Young Progressive Conservatives. There were 38 people at the meeting. And when he began to attack Jean Chrétien—because they're the real demagogues, even though they accuse everyone else—almost half of the group walked out. So, come down to earth; just think about the people who elected you. Think of what the Conservative Party has done for this country since Confederation, and stop destroying both Canada and your own party. Wake up. People are writing you, phoning you, and sending you petitions. They don't want this tax.

Group after group, this summer, said to us that they were prepared to pay their share of taxation. We're prepared to pay our share, they said. But do you intend, for the rest of your mandate, to continue to take care of the big corporations that financed your election campaigns with their millions?

Have you forgotten that you got only 43% of the vote, and that 57% of the population was against you? Wake up! Wake up, my friends. Come back to the real world. You have two, or three, or perhaps ten or fifteen thousand major corporations providing you with millions of dollars for your election campaigns. But there are 25 million people out there in Canada who don't want this tax.

So, my friends, I will come back to this because I still have hundreds of petitions, and I know that my colleagues from other regions of the country also have petitions to present. I promise you more before December 31, 1992.

[English]

Senator Watt: Honourable Senators, I have some 580 petitions in front of me, and I would like to tell you of their significance.

[Editor's Note: Senator Watt continued to speak in Inuktutuk.]

Honourable senators, I understand that in order to have my statement registered in the record I have to re-read it. It arises out of the significant importance of these petitions. One day, senators, I hope there that facilities will be provided in this place whereby senators such as myself and Senator Adams will be able to address you in our mother tongue. I realize and respect that we do not have those facilities, but perhaps one day that might be possible.

Honourable senators, I wish to draw your attention to the potential impact of the GST in northern and other remote regions of Canada. The findings of the 13th Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce makes it very clear that northerners will pay more tax than southern Canadians for the same goods and services.

This is incredible. It means that the GST is designed to take more away from northerners, who are struggling to make ends meet because they have to endure the high cost of living in the north.

Perhaps the government does not understand what it means to have to endure the extremely high cost of living that is found in the north. It means that the Inuit and other northerners are economically disadvantaged.

I come from northern Quebec and the situation there provides an excellent example of what I am talking about.

A 1984 study commissioned by the Inuit-owned Makivik Corporation paints an all too accurate picture of the economic conditions facing the Inuit. The report states:

> Inuit of Northern Quebec face the implications of very high population growth. Inuit children 14 or under represent almost half (43%) of our group, 57% of Inuit are under 19. We know that our population will double in 25 years. This expansion will place heavy pressure on education and local services. It will clog the job market.
> Our detailed report provides one illustration of this pressure. Inuit entering the job market between 1981 and 1988 will equal in numbers those Inuit employed today. Inuit unemployment could reach 70% if something is not done.
> Income statistics are disquieting. As of 1981, the per capita Inuit income ($4,000.) was less than half the provincial average. Per capita income figures for Iqaluit were roughly double those observed in Kuujjuaq.

Iqaluit is the new name for Frobisher Bay, and Kuujjuaq is the new name for Fort Chimo, the community I come from.

> The income picture is further clouded by very high costs and dim job prospects.
> Through a series of calculations, with reference to N.W.T. conditions and to cost of living allowance granted certain employees in our region, the Makivik report concludes $%costs$% are about 70% higher in Kuujjuaq than in Montreal, or about 80% higher in Salluit.

Salluit is in the Hudson Strait. That is almost right across from Cape Dorset which is a parallel from the north to the south in the tip of northern Quebec.

> This means residents have to earn almost $2 when a Montrealer earns one in order to buy similar commodities, if these are available.
> According to a Quebec Government publication, Inuit unemployment reached 45% in 1981, prior to the last recession. The figure is higher now, and probably in line with the N.W.T. (over 50% for the Inuit).
> Inadequate provisions and programmes for training in the region supply an explanation. There is no vocational training course as such in Northern Quebec. Furthermore, Inuit wonder why seven (7) different institutions formulate training policies for a regional population of 6,000.
> In sum, only half of Northern Quebec Inuit are employed in a region beset with a daunting environment. Their per capita purchasing power is about a quarter that of a southern Quebec citizen.
> Inuit do not want to join the ranks of the permanent welfare ghetto. They want jobs and better incomes in order to play their full part in the Canadian adventure. They want to see more monies earned in the region spent in Northern Quebec. They know that future growth will be related to private sector pursuits. These goals are in keeping with Canadian ethics.

But how far can Inuit get in developing their economy when we are faced with a cost of living which is crushing.

Honourable senators, I know that most food stuffs would not be subject to the GST. However, I will use the price of food to demonstrate the high cost of living in Northern Quebec.

● (0030)

I do so because the price of food was the subject of Makivik's most recent study on the region's high cost of living.

In the south milk costs $1.02. In the Innuit communities it will cost as much $2.22. In other words, 110 per cent more than in the south.

Flour costs $2.49 in the south, $5.79 in the north, which is a difference of 141 per cent.

Enfalac baby milk formula costs $1.52 in the south, while it cost $2.59 in the north. The cost is 60 per cent higher in the north.

The price of carrots can be 268 per cent higher. They are often priced at $0.69 in the south, but can cost up to $2.54 in the north.

Potatoes can be 300 per cent costlier in the north. A bag that costs $1.99 in the south will go for $8.00 in many Innuit communities.

That is very high. Honourable senators, you do not have to take only my word for the economic disparities that exist between the north and the south, or between aboriginal peoples and non-aboriginal peoples. Government publications often document these disparities with great accuracy. For example, the booklet describing the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy states, and I quote:

> By all measures of socio-economic disparity, the 600,000 people who identify themselves as aboriginal continue to be the most disadvantaged group within Canadian society. Employment rates among the aboriginal working age population have been about 45 per cent compared with 63 per cent for the non-aboriginal population. Of aboriginal youth aged 15-24, and not attending school, 40 per cent are employed compared with 75 per cent for the non-aboriginal population. Employment rates for registered Indians in remote communities are 30 per cent.
> Aboriginal individuals are three times as likely as non-aboriginals to depend on government transfer payments as their major source of income. Of these employed, incomes are up to a third lower than levels for employed non-aboriginals.
> Almost 30 per cent of aboriginal individuals aged 15-24 have less than a grade 9 education, compared with 7 per cent of their non-aboriginal counterparts. More than 76 per cent have neither completed high school nor pursued post-secondary education, whereas the percentage for non-aboriginal individuals is 44.
> On reserves, in predominantly rural and remote areas, reside about 180,000 registered Indians of working age.

I wish my friend who was recently appointed by the Prime Minister were here to listen to this point. He will vote for the GST. However, perhaps it is possible that he will not. I have known the man for a long time. I hope he will come to his senses and realize that he will have to vote the GST down, because it is a killer.

> At any point during the year, 25 per cent are employed full time and a further 5 per cent are employed part time—often alternating between seasonal employment, Unemployment Insurance, training and Social Assistance throughout the year. Many Indians have worked only in traditional subsistence activities.

I was once asked by someone, "What does subsistence mean?" I will tell you what subsistence means. It means to keep yourself alive, to go out and get the food that you need to put on your table. At times you have to paddle and at times you have to walk. At times you do not have any equipment. You go and get the food and bring it to your table. Perhaps in the white man's language it is called a table; sometimes we do not even have tables. Some of us are a little more fortunate than others. I am one of those since I happen to be here.

> The off-reserve aboriginal population—about 55 per cent of the total—share the same disadvantages and similar prospects as Indians on reserves. Only 50 per cent of adults are employed. The employment rate among women and young adults 15 to 24 is 40 per cent.
> The social cost of so many unemployed adults is enormous. The high incidence of family breakup, alcoholism, vandalism and family violence finds roots in chronic unemployment and the dearth of meaningful activity. Of particular concern is the risk that recent improvements in the numbers of aboriginal students in secondary school will be undermined if children observe their graduating seniors moving on to Social Assistance dependence.

That is something which normally takes away whatever pride one might have. I would say that this happens more so with the people in the orphan communities. I am talking now about Indians. I happen to be an Inuk. I am a full taxpaying citizen just like every one of you here. All my fellow Inuit are taxpayers. We pay sales tax, provincial tax and federal tax, unlike our friends the Indians.

Why have we chosen to be taxpayers? It is something very new. I was one of the leaders back in the early 1970s when we entered into a so-called modern agreement. We entered into negotiations with Hydro Quebec, the federal government, the provincial government and the James Bay Development Corporation. We have come a long way in terms of improving ourselves and being able to be understood by the other side. It was in 1975 that the Inuit decided, unlike Indians, that we would be proud taxpayers in this country.

For some reason, in 1975 we had an opportunity to decide whether or not we wanted to be taxpayers. I do not know whether our legs were being pulled in trying to indicate to us that we had no choice. Anyway, we chose to be taxpayers. But we do not want to pay this GST. It is too much.

> A focus of youth is crucial to the future possibilities and challenges for Aboriginal economic development. For at least the next 15 years, the aboriginal share of the young labour force (15-34 years old) will be rising, reaching a level 50 per cent higher by 1996. Most of this growth will occur in non-urbanized areas. Aboriginal people will account for 57 per cent of the increase in the labour force in northern Canada and 12 per cent in each of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

> For every year in the next five years, more than 5000 individuals will have to find and keep jobs to achieve a level of 50 per cent employment among young Indian adults living on reserves. Only a small fraction of this requirement—perhaps one-quarter—will be met by the Indian public administration sector and other government-supported jobs. Failure to provide additional employment will directly result in high social assistance costs to the federal government.

Let us begin to look at how we can improve living conditions, standards and the education of Aboriginal people. That is the first place that the government should be looking at. I see in this government a denial of recognition of what Aboriginal people might have in terms of rights. I am talking about land claims. I have been involved with land claims since the early 1970s. I was one of the first who came up with a new so-called modern agreement. It worked. However, let me tell honourable senators it is not easy to administer so-called modern agreements, because we have to fight for the little that we have every moment of the day. We understand that. That is democracy. We have chosen to accept and enter that democracy, to live with it like everyone else. All that we are asking for is respect, something which does not often happen. In return, we want to respect you as well.

I had a meeting with the minister of the Quebec government who is responsible for wildlife management. It was about the agreement—we lost out in the negotiations which prevents us from providing hospitality to people who come from the south to the north. When I talk about hospitality, I mean that today, according to the James Bay Northern Quebec Agreement, I cannot feed you Arctic char, salmon, caribou, or any kind of country food. I think that is ridiculous. I don't like that, because it takes away my rights. I am being regulated by the government, which is saying, "You cannot feed the white man." This is crazy. I have to have hospitality. I am a human being just like anyone else. If I can provide something to you, then I want to provide it to you. Do not take away my hospitality rights.

> The answer to this problem is obvious and known to the government. It involves nothing less than promoting economic development in the north and among aboriginal peoples in general.

That is a very broad statement. If honourable senators wish me to define how I see economic development could be promoted and achieved, I tell you that it is not that complicated. I deal with economic development opportunities. I also do a number of ventures in my own region. I do not want to be in a position where I have to go belly up. I do not want to see all kinds of bankruptcies.

I represent a corporation which administers slightly over $200 million. Under the mother corporation are subsidiaries which include airline companies, construction companies, construction management companies, travel agencies, and what have you. They are small corporations. When I set up a company I want only to inject so much capital into it. I then want to avoid putting any further capital into it because I want it to grow. These corporations are already facing a very difficult situation. Over the years various governments have made efforts to do exactly the same thing. Unfortunately, those efforts are often half-hearted and ineffective.

Why is that? I will tell you why. It is because the government introduces measures such as the GST which too often cripple us from the knees down whenever we begin to succeed. This is the way I see the goods and services tax.

> Today's government may have introduced a number of programs to foster economic growth in the north but it also wants to introduce a tax scheme whereby northerners will pay more taxes than southerners for the same goods and services.
> The potential effects of GST would only nullify the impact of whatever programs exist to develop the northern economies. The GST would further drain what little money exists for economic development out of the north. It would simply add that much more to the already high cost of living.
> I believe this is just one more reason why the government should abandon its efforts to push bill C-62 through the Senate.

Honourable senators, do your job with your heart and with your brain. Be careful, because this country is going to suffer along with everyone else.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several residents of British Columbia who are asking that the Senate reject the goods and services tax.

Before I do that, may I seek the indulgence of honourable senators to make a few comments about the address we have just heard from Senator Watt. He represents a particular community in Canada, the Inuit of northern Quebec.

I met Senator Watt originally in 1965 when he was active in his home community of Fort Chimo, which is now called Kuujjuaq. He was a bright and distinguished person in the life of his community in 1965. At that time I was Executive Assistant to the Hon. Arthur Laing, Minister of Northern Affairs and Natural Resources. The issue that took Arthur Laing, myself and others to Fort Chimo was the issue of the demands by the Quebec government, in particular the Minister for Natural Resources, the Hon. René Levesque and his deputy, for the transfer by the federal government of all its responsibility and all of the funding attached thereto in connection with the aboriginal peoples of Nouveau Quebec.

Senator Watt, Charlie Watt as he was then known, was one of the leaders in the Inuit community in resisting that transfer without the Inuit and Cree communities playing a direct role in the proposed affairs of their community. Indeed, history will show that Senator Watt played a very substantial role in the arrangements that were arrived at between the Inuit community of Nouveau Quebec and the Province of Quebec in connection with the James Bay arrangement.

Over the years, he has become a very active business person. He leads the Makivik Corporation with seven subsidiaries, and many millions of dollars of capital. He is president of that corporation. Of course, the corporation is owned by the Inuit people of northern Quebec. Its businesses include air transportation, shrimp fishing, construction management, travel agencies and other businesses. He also separately heads a company which is seeking to establish a hydro facility in northern Quebec for sale of hydro power to Quebec Hydro.

He is a very experienced and active man, a leader in his community. When he addresses us with respect to the concerns of his community and the highly negative and adverse impact which the proposed GST bill will bring onto his community, I think those words should be taken very seriously by honourable senators. It is certainly a defect in this legislation that northern residents, the residents of Yukon who are represented by Senator Lucier, the residents of northern Quebec who are represented by Senator Watt, and the residents of the Northwest Territories who are represented by Senator Adams are being so heavily burdened, so disproportionately burdened by this proposed legislation.

The fact, Senator Watt, that you addressed us in your own native language I believe is very much appreciated by your colleagues here in the Senate. Senator Adams has also addressed us in that language, but I might say not at such great length as did you. I am delighted that you also spoke in English so that we could share your thoughts with you. I concur with your wish that this chamber and Parliament could be equipped technically to have translation from your language and the many other languages that are used in Canada. That is an aspiration which I hope one day will be realized.

Senator LeBlanc: Would Senator Austin yield for a moment on that very question? I was going to consult with my colleagues, but since you raised it I should tell honourable senators and the house that the Internal Economy committee has addressed the question of dealing with other languages spoken, particularly by the original people of this country. We addressed it in terms of special secretarial assistance where required. I think that was resolved satisfactorily. The budgets do provide for that flexibility.

With respect to the question of spoken language, the matter was referred to officials to look at. I think it got lost in other problems such as those concerning the Journals. As very often happens, the urgent took over the important. I hope that we can raise this issue again, at least to take the first steps that are required, which is to have an interpreter available when there is a major speech to be delivered, as Senator Watt did tonight. That would not put him in the situation whereby he would have to repeat his speech in English or French. This would enable him and his colleagues to deliver their speeches in the language with which they are more comfortable and we could listen to the translation.

I thought I should put these matters on the record, because we have improved a number of services for senators. This is an area in which we have some way to go.

Senator Austin: Thank you, Senator LeBlanc. I am pleased to be interrupted to hear such information.

With respect to the petitions which I have the honour to present from residents from British Columbia, may I say that the concern of a very substantial number—in fact, a vast majority—of British Columbians is represented in these petitions. This concern is focused on the regressive character of the proposed goods and services tax and the disproportionate way in which the tax burden will be shared under the tax plan contained in Bill C-62.

As I have mentioned in this chamber, the tax is aggressively resisted by the province of British Columbia. Representing the voices of British Columbians, a unanimous resolution of the Legislature of British Columbia asks this Parliament not to proceed with the goods and services tax and asks honourable senators from British Columbia to resist the tax and to oppose it.

Honourable senators, the province of British Columbia has also taken steps in the courts of British Columbia to test the constitutionality of the goods and services tax, and it is associated in the courts with other provinces in Western Canada.

One of the problems that we are having with this particular tax is illustrated by an exchange between Premier Vander Zalm and the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Kim Campbell. The Minister of Justice is reported in the Vancouver Sun as having stated that there are many in the Social Credit government who privately support the goods and services tax. This has been sharply denied by Premier Vander Zalm, and he asked the Minister of Justice to name names, which she has not done. The Minister of Justice created a very great concern in the province by saying the following, which I quote from the Vancouver Sun of Monday, October 1. She said she:

> was surprised and frustrated the Socred government is not demanding the Senate pass the GST bill when it is seeking federal tax money for a $693-million research project at the University of B.C.
> "The government of B.C. knows perfectly well the GST is very important for the economy of B.C.," Campbell said.
> "It has become a political issue and they have jumped on that bandwagon. The premier is looking for an election issue and it is tragic, because B.C. has a lot to lose."

Honourable senators, I believe it is very regretful that a minister of the Crown, particular one holding the office of Minister of Justice, should threaten the people of the province of British Columbia with the denial of funds for projects of value to Canada because that province has taken a stand against federal legislation.

Senator Doody: Incredible!

Senator Austin: I do not want to use any pejorative words—

Senator Doody: Good.

Senator Austin: —but I will say that the relationship of the one to the other has raised a profound concern in my province. The kaon project at the University of British Columbia is one of the most significant science projects being proposed to be put in place in Canada. It is big science. The university communities of Canada, and many countries in the world, have joined the province of British Columbia in undertaking to assist in financing this particular project. The federal government has been asked by the province of British Columbia for one-third of the financing, or approximately $200 million, and you have the Minister of Justice saying that, unless the province of British Columbia backs off its resistance to the GST, the province may well be damaged in its request for funding for this particular project.

Honourable senators, this is not the way in which the business of Canada should be conducted.

Honourable senators, I want to tell you that it is not an isolated example that we find. For example, to illustrate, in the same newspaper, the Vancouver Sun for Monday, October 1, there is a Canadian Press story that attributes a statement to Trade Minister John Crosbie:

> Senators are scaring off investors and risking a bigger federal deficit by stalling legislation on the proposed goods and services tax, Trade Minister John Crosbie said today.
> Their ploy also means there's no guarantee that legislation authorizing Ottawa's contribution of $2.7 billion to the giant Hibernia oil project will get passed, Crosbie told an open-line radio show.

Well, honourable senators, that, again, is an effort to create alarm about federal funding for a significant project on the Atlantic coast. At least, honourable senators, the government has a two-coast policy in respect of its threats.

This side is fully prepared to enter into an arrangement to give the bill related to Hibernia—I believe it is Bill C-44—expeditious attention.

Senator Meighen: What about the others?

Senator Austin: If house leaders wish to make an arrangement, they will have my blessing, and the blessing of many senators on this side. That does not mean that I am saying at this point in time that I endorse that legislation, but I simply wish to see it come forward quickly.

Senator Meighen: Do you feel the same way about the others, too?

Senator Carney: Let's pre-study them!

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I am not going to hold your attention any longer, although I appreciate that honourable senators are interested in what I have to say.

Senator Carney: Would you accept a question?

Senator Austin: Certainly.

Senator Carney: When you mentioned that you would give quick attention to the bill on Hibernia, are you then indicating that you would agree to pre-study, which is a very helpful way to proceed on that kind of legislation?

Senator Meighen: As Senator Molson pointed out.

[Senator Austin.]

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I was here during the time of the Hayden formula, as we called it, the pre-study formula, and it has its uses. In fact, the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has had a briefing session of some three hours on this legislation, which was attended by senators on both sides, and there is a very interesting information booklet that was made available to the committee. I am willing to resume my seat and not hold your attention any further. I thank you for your indulgent hearing.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, last evening I was proud to read a roll call of petitions from the small towns of Ontario, the backbone of the Province of Ontario. Tonight, honourable senators, I will be turning more closely to the city of Toronto, my home, and the great metropolitan region of Toronto. I should like to deal with petitions remonstrating against the national goods and services tax.

At the top of the list are two petitions given publicly that, I think, should have some weight in this chamber. Earlier this evening we heard some senators question the weight that should be given to these petitions. I would like to mention at the outset two public petitions that have been made, and I would draw them to the attention particularly of those senators here, such as Senator Atkins, who represent the same province as I do, and who, I know, represent their regions with equal, if not greater, ability than I bring to bear.

The Honourable Arthur Eggleton, the Mayor the city of Toronto, has now stated that the city of Toronto is vehemently opposed to the GST. Mayor Eggleton, who represents a base larger than most members of Parliament, the entire city of Toronto, has public support that, I think, transcends party lines. I helped assist Mr. Eggleton in several of his elections. In his campaign committee there was no partisanship because many groups were represented: Conservatives, NDPers, business people, working people, professionals, people from every walk of life. Art Eggleton was certainly elected on a broad base, representing every walk of life in the city of Toronto, and he has seen fit, on behalf of the city of Toronto, to present, I think, a rather potent petition against the GST.

That situation should, I think, help persuade those senators who come from the city of Toronto and the region of Toronto, as I do. If they are holding to one criterion of the composition of this assembly, which is to represent their region, not just their own dictates, not just their own party, this should be a potent petition to persuade them of the concerns that the citizens of Toronto have about the GST.

Now, I do not think that this petition alone is enough to persuade—nor should it be enough to persuade—honourable senators on this side or the opposite side. However, we also had the previous government in the province of Ontario, led by Mr. Peterson—who, in many respects, was a strong and staunch supporter of the federal government and many of its policies—taking a very strong stance against the GST. Yes, in Toronto and in the province of Ontario he was rejected by the electorate. However, during that campaign, although all parties, Conservative, NDP and Liberal, were unified on very few topics, they were all united against the GST. So when one reads the last electoral results in the province of Ontario, we have all of the political parties against the GST. Ontario, until recently perhaps, was certainly the engine of growth in this country. If the city of Toronto and all parties in the last election, representing the sovereign voice of the people in the province of Ontario, have come out against the GST, then certainly, these petitions in aggregate, which I think are representative of the streets and neighborhoods and districts of Toronto, which I will turn to in a moment, should be quite persuasive. However, let me take it up one further step, one further order of magnitude.

Senator Simard: May I ask you for clarification. Did I hear you say that in the last provincial election people voted against the GST?

Senator Grafstein: No. All three parties came out against the GST.

Senator Simard: Yes, all right.

Senator Grafstein: There was consensus on very few issues, but there was total consensus on this issue. Since then, the new premier of the province, Mr. Rae, representing the first New Democratic Party government in the province of Ontario, has given us public notice that he is against the GST. To substantiate his position, in order to get the ear of the government—and again we are not talking about Gallup polls here; we are talking about a party that has been duly elected in the province of Ontario—one of his first public acts has been to represent the consensus—the great Gallup poll, if you will, the last election—by going even further than just bringing a petition. He has brought a law suit against the federal government—

Senator Doody: Incredible!

Senator Grafstein: —in order to catch the ear of the government, because obviously an election campaign by all three parties and statements by the mayor of the city of Toronto do not seem to make a dent, they are not persuasive; so he has taken the next step and is about to take the federal government to court on the GST.

Now, one can be partisan and say, "Well, we are still on a tough course, we are still on the correct course." Even if one were on a correct course, should one not pause, suspend one's conclusions for a moment, and listen to the voice of all of the parties in the province of Ontario, the largest province in the country, and listen to the mayor of the city of Toronto, supported by every segment of the population? Should one not stop and listen to these public petitions? They are supported in the city of Toronto by those who have signed this petition from every part of the city, from Main Street in the east end, Wildwood Crescent, Harrison Street, Walmer Road, Queen Street, Willow Avenue, Balsam Avenue, Queen Street East, Queen Street West, Park Wood, the heart of Toronto, from east to west, every district, every region, every neighborhood, every community! Toronto is not one city; it is made up of a number of small communities and small neighbourhoods. Senator Di Nino is not here, but he comes from a small community. Senator Atkins is here, and he comes from another small community. Toronto, if I can use this phrase, is a community of communities, and each community, every one, says the same thing, with one sovereign voice: No to the GST.

I was interested in these petitions primarily because one or two pages came from the east end of Toronto, the second place where I launched own my political career in the early 1960s. The east end of Toronto was not a very good place for Grits to knock on doors in those days because the east end of Toronto was populated by great Tories who had served the federal government, the provincial government and municipal government with such great distinction. Senator Atkins is here this evening and he will remember these names better than I. There was George Hees, who ran in the streets of these people who have signed this petition. George Hees: great soldier, great politician, extraordinary Minister of Trade, superb minister representing veterans in this country, a bon vivant, a colourful and magnificent figure. I ask honourable senators opposite: Would George Hees today not listen to the voice of the east end of Toronto? After all, George Hees was successfully elected because he kept his ear to the ground. He was not elected because he said, "I am going to bring about a policy over the dead bodies of the people of Broadview."

What about Bill Summerville, the late Mayor of Toronto, and Donny Summerville, his brother, who served the city of Toronto with great zest and ability? Great Tories! Those were the days when the east end of Toronto was the powerhouse of Toryism. Do honourable senators who remember Billy Summerville and his brother Don, think that they would not listen to the petitions of the people from Main Street or Lee Avenue or Queen Street or Balsam Avenue or Beech Avenue or the Beaches? Certainly not, certainly not!

And what about Leslie Saunders, who came from the same area and who was one of the great mayors of the city of Toronto and who represented a viewpoint that, to this day, underlines some of the value systems of the city of Toronto, the quieter, gentler, friendly, sport-directed values of the playground sandlots? Leslie Saunders would not have supported the GST. Why? Because he would have listened, and he would have said to himself, "Is this going to help? Is this the right measure at the right time?"

So, honourable senators, I go through these streets, Victoria Park, Logan Avenue, the heart of the great sandlot athletes of Toronto, such as Charlie Conacher, Lionel Conacher, Roy Worters, Doc Egan, Spike Bacon—athletes, great Canadians, many of them Tories because it was very difficult in those days to be anything but a Tory if you lived east of Yonge Street. Each one of those men, great Canadians, great politicians, great public figures, were successful because they kept their ear to the ground. They listened. They did not bring about tough policies over the objections of the working people. They did not bring in regressive measures. Quite the contrary. They started their careers from the bottom up, not from the top down.

So, when I go through these streets, I remember that I was a scavenger in these streets trying to organize for the Liberal Party, and found difficulty because we were confronted with strong Toryism on the right and radical socialism on the left, and there was not much room for the Liberals to find a place to stand.

I spent my early years in Toronto observing him and other great Tory politicians. My late father-in-law was a great Tory. He dragged me to these places. He said, "Come on and watch what's really going on." That is what they showed me. That is why Toryism in Toronto was so strong. Yet, I say to those honourable senators, who have much more experience than I, let me throw another great name at you, anther great name that I revere: Alex MacKenzie. He was the backbone of the great premiership of Leslie Frost. Alex MacKenzie, great name! Where was MacKenzie every night? Where did he sit every Monday night? He sat in the Royal York in a corner booth listening to the people, listening to what people had to say, and when Leslie Frost wanted to find out what was going on, he did not commission a Gallup poll, he listened to the MacKenzies of this world, and they told him what was going on. They told him how the grass roots were feeling. So these streets were Tory streets: Glen Manor, Winnona, Hubbard Boulevard. This was the Tory base.

Senator Doody: You are speaking to the petition now, are you?

Senator Grafstein: I am speaking to the petitions. These are all petitions.

Senator Doody: Good, as long as you are on track.

Senator Grafstein: So, honourable senators, earlier we talked about Gallup polls. Well, what is the basis of any Gallup poll? These are individual people's views. These are focus groups, if you want to use the modern jargon. These are a sample, if you will. They are not fictional. They are real. They say over and over again the same thing: No to the GST. Let us talk about more streets. Let us move up the streets. Let us talk about Markham. Senator Atkins represents Markham. There are a number of petitioners from Markham, on Adrian Crescent, on Sherwood Forest Drive, on Washington Street, on Robinson Street, on Allensdale Avenue, on Tomlinson, on Timber Circle, on Mayor's Circle, and some of the names are interesting because they represent the diversity of Greater Toronto. In Greater Toronto the police can now arrest people in 57 different languages!

Senator Steuart: That's delightful!

Senator Grafstein: Fifty-seven different languages! So Toronto is no longer the Toronto of old Toryism because there is no majority viewpoint in Toronto any more. Toronto is made up of minorities. Someone gave me this statistic, and I do not know if it is correct or not, but—

Senator Doody: Say it anyway!

Senator Grafstein: —something like 60 per cent of all households in Toronto speak a first language other than French or English.

Senator Doody: That's certainly true where I come from!

Senator Grafstein: They represent every part of the world. Fifty-seven languages; that's a lot! They come from every part of the world. The largest immigration office we have now is the Hong Kong office. Some of us have been to Hong Kong. Their desire to come to Toronto is amazing. But it is not just people from Hong Kong that come to Toronto. People are coming from all of the Asian countries, Koreans, Vietnamese, North and South, Malay, people from Singapore, people from mainland China—and not just from the south but from Shanghai and other places.

Senator Steuart: And from Saskatchewan.

Senator Grafstein: And from Saskatchewan. Every Asian region is represented in Toronto, and all their dialects are on the streets. Go take a ride along Danforth East. Danforth is mentioned in these petitions over and over again.

• (0130)

Start at the east and drive to the west and you will see, after an hour's ride across the face of the city, every ethnic group proudly represented in the small businesses along that street. It is a kaleidoscope of Canada. There are people from Ethiopia, Jamaica, Barbados, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Russia, the Ukraine—name the country and you will find immigrant shops on that street. The names are here. There are Greeks, Italians, Portuguese, Vietnamese, and you name it. Senator Di Nino—and perhaps I should not address comments to him when he is not here, but I shall see him in the days ahead and I hope that we will have an opportunity to have an exchange—knows St. Clair Avenue. We have a number of petitioners from St. Clair Avenue who reside in that great, colourful Italian district of our community that has made such a magnificent contribution to the growth of Toronto and Canada. That is why we have Senator Bosa and Senator Di Nino here representing that magnificent community in Toronto. What are the people of that community saying? Polls were quickly dismissed by the other side earlier today. I hope that Senator Di Nino will go back to Toronto one of these days and walk along St. Clair Avenue and do his own Gallup poll. Let him listen to the people of St. Clair Avenue. They come from all parts of Italy. They come from Friuli in the north to Sicily in the south and they are all represented on St. Clair Avenue, within 100 yards of Senator Di Nino's fine financial institution that he has created there. Let him talk to his depositors and neighbours. They will speak with one overwhelming voice and with one phrase: "No to the GST." They are small business people who work hard and they do not want it. They cannot afford the extra people to do their books; they cannot afford the regressive tax.

Senator Simard: Will the honourable senator allow a question? He has said that he meets with these people and they tell him this and that. Does he try to explain the tax? I am sure he can find some elements of the GST that are good. Even his leader has said that he likes the concept and that he would try to improve on the legislation. So there is a basis there. Is the honourable senator trying to explain to the people that maybe it is not as bad as they think? Is that not part of his work as a responsible parliamentarian?

Senator Grafstein: Senator Simard has raised an important point. I do not think that we can get away cheaply in this debate. I do not think that we can simply say no to the government of the day and that there are no other answers, no other reasonable alternatives.

Senator Simard: That is not what I am asking.

Senator Grafstein: I assume that the thrust of your question is: If you do not like this tax, are there alternatives or are there elements of the tax that you might find acceptable? Let me deal with the last part first by bringing to your attention another petition. It is a learned petition and it is not like the Gallup polls that were dismissed earlier this evening. This is a paper put out by the Canadian Tax Foundation, which was established in 1945 as an independent tax research organization. Its governors are nominated each year by the Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. Its work is supported by more than 9,500 Canadian individuals and corporations. The purpose of the foundation is to provide both the tax-paying public and the governments of Canada with the benefit of expert, impartial research into current problems of taxation in government finance. This work is carried on by well-qualified permanent staff and by outside experts commissioned for special studies. This is Canadian Tax Paper number 88 "The Economics of the Goods and Services Tax" by John Whalley and Deborah Fretz, and it is dated September 1990. The foreword of this study could almost be addressed to us here in the Senate. It reads in part:

> After extensive public hearings in parliamentary debates, the legislation implementing the proposal—the goods and services tax—was enacted by the House of Commons in April 1990. As this volume goes to press, the tax is under consideration by the Senate.

It is a timely, learned petition. I would ask him to read it because it does two things: It questions the research upon which the GST was based, questions that are asked by an independent, impartial group of experts; questions from one of the most prestigious tax foundations in Canada, not the people from Gallup, but thoughtful experts. It is not a Liberal paper. Why do they bring it out now? They say that it is not obvious that these other options, these alternatives, received the attention they merited when the policy decision to proceed with the current GST was made. This paper then goes on to evaluate the alternatives that were not properly evaluated by the government. It talks about the United States. The Prime Minister is a strong supporter of the United States, as am I in many instances when American policy appears to me to be correct. Sometimes we should follow what the United States does. The United States has rejected the GST. It says in the report at page 145 the following:

> The third volume of this report was devoted exclusively to the VAT, which it rejected as part of the reform on the grounds that the tax was a "money machine" for government. The report argued that the VAT made raising revenues too easy and weakened political pressure on Congress to cut expenditures. Subsequently, President Reagan's adamant opposition to the introduction to any new taxes effectively blocked the VAT.

The United States decided in a three volume report prepared by the Office of Tax Analysis of the U.S. Treasury entitled "Tax Reform for Simplicity, Fairness and Economic Growth" to reject a similar tax. However, that should not be the end of it, because the Tax Foundation ranges through the alternatives.

So I say to Senator Simard that there are some elements of the tax that are not undesirable. One of the suggestions here is the reform of the existing sales tax régime. There are thoughtful, impartial, objective alternatives.

I would like to conclude by referring to something for the benefit of Senator Johnson, who has told me that she is persuaded sometimes when there are coherent statements, coherent arguments. This relates to some of the comments by Senator Johnson's colleagues about disregarding public opinion, about taking the tough course and disregarding the voice of the people. This honourable gentleman bent his mind to the problem at hand. These comments took place in a parliamentary forum, and the honourable member was explaining some of the more rudimentary elements of democracy. He said that democracy was not a caucus obtaining a fixed term of office by promises and doing what it likes with the people but that there ought to be a constant relationship between the rulers and the people, that a government of the people, by the people, for the people still remains the sovereign definition of democracy. Democracy does not mean that because you have a majority, and because you will hold office for five years, you can do what you want. That is not democracy; it is a small party pattern which will not go down with the people of this country. We must convince the party opposite that the will of the people will prevail.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. C. William Doody: On a point of order, is the honourable senator speaking to the petition now? He has a textbook in his hand. This is an abuse of the rules.

Senator Grafstein: This is not a textbook.

Senator Doody: It is not a petition; it is a book.

Senator Grafstein: I will conclude in a moment. I quote this text because these are not my words. These are the words of a Conservative, a Conservative who may not be held in high esteem by Conservatives but certainly held in high esteem by me and, I hope, by my colleagues on this side. Who was the gentleman who said those words so eloquently and magnificently to remind Conservatives about listening to the voice of the people?

The reason I went to the Library to find this quote is because senators opposite have said, "Do you respect Conservatives?" I have said, "I do respect Conservatives." There are Conservatives whom I respect, and this Conservative I respect more than anyone— Winston Spencer Churchill. So, Senator Johnson, if you want a quote that might motivate your conscience, do not listen to this side, to us poor Liberals. Listen to the voice of the greatest Tory of them all—Winston Spencer Churchill.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I am rising to present several petitions which have arrived in my office in the last few days from various parts of Nova Scotia. Although they are phrased differently in terms of their "Whereas" clauses, in one form or another they deal with the public opposition to the goods and services tax.

Before I give you illustrations of some of the names, I should like to make an observation. Some of you may be surprised to learn that there has been very good media coverage of the fact that we are presenting petitions in this chamber. There has been a very positive reaction, at least on the basis of the phone calls that have come to my office. This is a compliment to senators on the other side as well as those on this side. There has been a positive reaction to the concept of individual Canadians recognizing that when they go to the trouble of signing a petition, whether it deals with the GST or anything else, that petition is then tabled in this place and names are read out. People are starting to understand that the signing of a petition is not a totally futile gesture.

All of us in this chamber, whether on this side or the side opposite, ought to be pleased with what we are doing for the reputation of the chamber by giving people an opportunity to know that we take their petitions seriously and that the petitions ultimately do get tabled and recorded.

Since widespread news coverage began in Nova Scotia of the fact that petitions were being presented from various parts of the country, my office has had more than a dozen calls that dealt with the process of presenting petitions as opposed to necessarily talking about the GST, although the calls inevitably ended up criticizing the GST.

I would like to note that historically other petitions that have been presented in this place in the seven years I have been here have frequently had a very narrow geographic base within Nova Scotia in the sense that they might, for example, have dealt with a problem unique to the fishing industry. Other examples that come to mind are petitions from parts of Cape Breton that deal with the problems of the Cape Breton coal mines.

What is fairly unique about the petitions with respect to the GST is that they are not simply responses to localized situations; they do, in fact, cover the province as a whole.

I would like to give you three or four names from this petition I have in my hand. It is number 45 of the more than 100 I have received in the last three or four weeks. I have chosen it by way of interest. To give you an idea of what I mean when I say that this is not a localized issue, there are names from Brooklyn, Queen's County and Liverpool. Liverpool and Brooklyn are two communities that are quite close to one other on the south shore of Nova Scotia, although one is inland and one is on the ocean. The people are from that part of the province up to Chezzetcook, which is east of Halifax going towards Cape Breton. There are names from Wolfville. Wolfville, as many of you know, is home of another of Nova Scotia's great institutions of higher learning. It is the home of the Acadia University. For those of you who are truly interested in what goes on at Acadia University, the Acadia football game will be on TSN tomorrow at 12 noon.

There is a name from Tantallon, which, again, is a rural community outside Halifax. There are dozens and dozens of names from Halifax, Dartmouth and Sackville, and from the areas surrounding the metropolitan area of Halifax.

Some of us left this chamber at 2 p.m. this afternoon on what the press have come to call the shift change. A couple of people who phoned me today from Nova Scotia worked at occupations where shift work is a routine way of operating businesses, as it is in coal mine and pulp mill businesses. They made the observation that they thought it was interesting that senators were finally understanding the consequence and the rigor involved in participating in shift work.

In the course of dealing with some of those phone calls this afternoon, after I left here at 2 p.m., I was not only struck by the geographic distribution of names, as indicated on these petitions, but I was struck particularly by what is fundamentally troubling people about the GST bill. You can understand what the problem is in simple terms when you read the "Whereas" clauses. In the "Whereas" clauses, you read about the manufacturing tax not necessarily disappearing; you read about whether or not the new GST will be visible, as had originally been promised by the government. It is clear from the hearings we held this summer that it will be invisible in many cases. People worry about its impact on the rate of inflation. They worry about the administrative burden it will place on small businesses.

The "Whereas" clauses cover the major points of criticism to the GST. More importantly, when you talk to people who have signed petitions—whether or not their names are on this particular petition 45 is not the issue—they tell you they have gone to shopping malls, church basements or legion halls to sign these petitions knowing they will be sent here. When you talk to them about what is truly troubling them, you find something which should be of concern to all of us on both sides of the house. You find a belief that the federal government—the national government of the country—no longer cares what the average Canadian thinks, no longer listens to the average Canadian, and is no longer in touch with the average Canadian.

After 20 years in government, and in politics of some form, I find it very troubling to listen to those conversations and realize that Canadians are losing respect for public institutions, for governments and for politicians at all levels and on both sides of this house. This is not a partisan comment, because from the phone calls we know that while people are opposed to the GST, they see a national government failing to listen to the cries of the average Canadian and this prompts people to sign petitions that talk about the impact on them as individuals, that talk about their being unable to afford the GST, that talk about the impact it will have on the retail sector. I have received several letters, which I will read to you in our next session. They are very moving letters, from Canadians who are not only opposed to the GST but are deeply troubled by the fact that the political process has now become irrelevant, from their point of view. We are all being tarred by the same brush.

Senator Simard: May I ask a question?

Senator Kirby: Absolutely.

Senator Simard: This question relates to the wishes of Canadians, and you will see the connection very quickly. The GST had been publicized by the government previous to the 1988 election. We hear from some of your colleagues that the government is taking Canadians by surprise and that this was not discussed at the last federal election.

I submit that it was announced before the 1988 election. Even Mr. Blenkarn talked about it during the election. We are now being accused of taking people by surprise. They say that this was not discussed at the last federal election.

It is common knowledge that you have been a precious and privileged advisor to Mr. Turner. Mr. Turner decided to fight the election on the free trade issue. Why is it that your party and your leader did not alert the Canadian public and discuss the GST at the last election?

Senator Kirby: Thank you for the question. I will gladly comment on it. I should like to take this opportunity to tell the senators on Senator Simard's side that they should be very pleased with the performance he put on during the committee meetings on behalf of his Conservative colleagues.

Senator Simard: I know what is coming.

Senator Kirby: I'll answer your question, but I mean this seriously. Senator Simard can only be described, from my point of view, as a very formidable opponent. He argued the Conservative party's case from one end of this country to the other, frequently in very trying circumstances, and deserves thanks and gratitude from senators on his own side. In politics, one may frequently disagree with someone and frequently debate an issue with them, but it is also important to recognize when someone has served his party and his cause well. I say that seriously, because he did a good job on your behalf throughout the summer as we travelled across the country.

With respect to the honourable senator's specific question, it is an important issue. Senator Simard made two statements which appear to be contradictory, but, in fact, are not. He made the statement that there had been discussion by the government of the goods and services tax before the last election. That is an absolutely true statement. I have never denied that. The other statement he made is that many people say that the current GST is a surprise to them. I also believe that that is a true statement, and I do not think those two statements are inconsistent.

Governments frequently make announcements which ultimately do not seep into public opinion, and when the government moves on the issue some time later it becomes a big surprise. However, as Senator Simard has said, there had been discussion by the government of a goods and services tax, or a value-added tax, or a sales tax, or a consumption tax of some kind, prior to the last election. That is an absolutely true statement.

The other thing that is true is that even for those people who knew about the GST, for the small percentage who understood that the government was contemplating this as a public policy measure, the economic circumstances which existed at the time this tax was originally proposed, which is back in the spring of 1987 when the economy was quite robust and when economic growth was quite strong, were quite different from the economic circumstances of today. All but two Canadians realize that the country is in a recession. The two who do not understand it are the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister. Everyone else seems to understand it. What is good economic policy, good fiscal policy, responsible tax policy, at a particular point in time is not necessarily the correct policy two or three years later.

Many of you know that Senator Simard was a successful Minister of Finance in New Brunswick for many years when Senator Hatfield was premier. I followed his budgets fairly closely in those days because, in the early days of the Hatfield government, I was in a senior position with the government in Nova Scotia and went through the budget development process. I believe Senator Simard would be the first to admit that what is good economic policy, or good tax policy, or correct budgetary policy, one year may not necessarily be correct budgetary policy three or four years later, because economic circumstances change. When I talk to business people, who were aware that the government was thinking of implementing this tax, they say, "We were supporters two or three years ago, but on the eve of a recession it is the worst possible time to be introducing it." Even if they want to support the tax, they say that it is simply the wrong time to be doing it. As Senator Simard will recall, we heard this at the committee hearings.

People are opposed to the tax for the reasons that a number of us have talked about, and because they think it is a surprise, even though I concede that there had been mention of it before the last election. Many people who had supported the tax before the last election have changed their minds because of economic circumstances.

I see Senator Simard wants to ask another question.

Senator Simard: Perhaps you could explain to your colleagues that the main reason the Liberal party—Mr. Turner in particular—did not make the GST a big issue in the last campaign was because Mr. Turner decided to fight the last election on the free trade issue. In your last comment you admit that you met businessmen and other people last year, or the year before, who thought that the GST would be acceptable and that there was something good about it. If I understood what you said, these people supported the GST, but because of the timing they are backing off. I agree with you when you said that good policies are not necessarily good all the time, especially in difficult situations. This is major surgery to our consumer tax legislation, and it has taken several years to prepare, after considering other alternatives. Are you saying that people may agree to the GST legislation if it had been implemented in 1987, for example, or 1988 or even 1992? Are you prepared to say that there are sufficient good elements to this tax that perhaps this legislation could be implemented a year or two years down the road—and I am not advocating that at all. If that is the case, then we have made some ground here tonight, thanks to Senator Kirby.

I am told that $1 billion has been spent by companies to prepare for this tax. As you say, the economic situation today is different than two or three years ago. Would it be fair to let all this money go to waste and try to live with the present system? Not only businessmen but municipalities and others have spent much money to prepare for this. We see the unemployment rate going up. Many stores are closing, not only because of interest rates but because they are no longer competitive with their neighbours. This GST legislation will be a further incentive and will have a positive impact on reducing the costs to our manufacturing companies. Is this not reason to go ahead and implement the GST for January 1? There have been projections that $9 billion more of Canadian production will result from this legislation. One may argue that it may be difficult because of the hard economic times, but the logic is that we want to put more people to work, and the sooner the better. The GST will help to do that.

I am sure that when Senator Frith and Senator MacEachen read the transcript of tonight's proceedings, they will perhaps be more inclined to get on with item 5 on the order paper.

Senator Kirby: Thank you, Senator Simard. I will try to reply seriously to your points, as I did to your earlier question, as opposed simply to dismissing them. You will recall that I began by making the observation that Senator Simard had done a good job of representing the views of his side of the house. The comments he has just made illustrate the quality of the way he argued your point of view.

Senator Simard: Don't overdo it now, Michael.

Senator Kirby: I realize that being blessed by me may not necessarily be an asset. I apologize for that. I just want to give compliments where they are due.

Let me deal with the four points the honourable senator raised in a somewhat different order. One of the points you raised, senator, was whether or not it would make sense to waste the several million dollars that have been spent thus far getting ready for the GST. During the course of your remarks that several million grew to a few billion. I am prepared to concede that a considerable amount of money has been spent getting ready for the GST. One of your concerns is that if the GST were not to proceed, that cost would be wasted. Frankly, if that happens, that happens. My reaction would be that your line of argument would lead to a situation in which any time any government wanted to introduce a new policy, it should immediately get representatives from business, labour and other special groups to spend money, and then return to parliament and say that you had talked all those people into spending all that money and now you had better go ahead and pass the legislation because otherwise the money would be wasted.

If money is wasted, we ought to be clear that the wasting of that money would be the responsibility of the government, which enticed people through ad programs and a variety of other means—ad programs, which, as you know, the Advertising Council has said were unethical and broke advertising rules. It is a good thing that many of the speeches made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are not subject to the same test. In any event, if people have spent money, they have spent that money because the government urged them to do so in advance of the bill being passed and in advance of the bill coming to this chamber. If that money is wasted because the bill ultimately dies, it is clear that the responsibility for that wasted money rests with the government.

Secondly, you talked about the fact that the abolition of the manufacturers' sales tax, the MST, would create $9 billion worth of jobs two or three years down the road once the transition period had been completed. I have two or three comments to make on that, based on the evidence that you and I heard this summer. First, that $9 billion figure is based on an assumption that appears, from the evidence we heard from industry this summer, to be invalid. It is based on the assumption that companies that now pay the manufacturers' sales tax will pass those savings back to Canadians, and that the money, once in the hands of Canadians, will increase demand and generate jobs. I am simplifying the economic model, but that is essentially what the forecasting model says. That is where the $9 billion comes from.

The difficulty with reaching that conclusion is that many companies and organizations which made presentations to us in June and July—including the Canadian Manufacturers Association—pointed out that they would not necessarily be passing the full saving from the decline of the manufacturers' sales tax back to the consumers, because, as they correctly pointed out, other costs are increasing; and one cannot therefore say that on January 1—or on whatever date the GST came into effect, if it came into effect—prices would drop by 13.5 per cent on manufactured goods. That is not going to happen. Therefore, the economic forecast that leads to that $9 billion saving is exaggerated. No one has argued that there will not be some savings or job creation. It is clearly not nearly of the order of magnitude that the government has projected, simply because the assumption is not true when you talk to the companies.

Both Senator Simard and I are Maritimers, and when you look at all of the other studies—whether they were done by the government, the Economic Council, the Conference Board or the Canadian Manufacturers Association—it is clear that whatever are the economic benefits, they are geographically concentrated in the centre of Canada, in what Maritimers would call upper Canada, which includes Quebec and Ontario, and there would be relatively little economic benefit coming to the western or Atlantic provinces primarily because we do not have the manufacturing base that will benefit from the reduction in taxes.

One of the things that concerns me as a Maritimer is that not only do we not receive the benefit that arises, whatever the increase in manufacturing jobs happens to be, but we get stung even worse because all the goods we buy—and services to a lesser extent—contain a higher component of their cost as transportation cost. With the GST going on transportation, because it is a service, the Atlantic and western provinces will not get the large economic benefits that arise from the elimination of the manufacturers' sales tax, and we will get a significant amount of the downside because we will be stuck with the increased cost.

I find myself troubled by the geographic inequity, which is the net result of the GST policy. It is worth making the observation that I do not think this government set out, when it designed the GST, to produce a tax policy that was deliberately geographically biased against the Maritimes. I think that happens to be a consequence of the policy. But I think it is a reflection of a whole series of other policies that we have seen in this country since 1984, which essentially say that the national economic policy—whether it is fiscal policy of other economic policies of the government—inevitably has the consequence, when you rely on purely market forces as the means of driving the economy, of biasing policies against the Atlantic provinces and against western Canada.

The whole thrust of the economic policies of the governments of Canada since 1867, going back to the origins of the country, has been to recognize that market forces will lead to a significantly different type of country in a variety of ways, but particularly in terms of economic opportunities across the regions.

Historically governments, Conservative as well as Liberal, have attempted to fight the inevitable geographic liabilities of market forces imposed on the west and on the Atlantic provinces. We heard about these consequences in the north and in all of the Atlantic provinces, including the hearings we had in Moncton—in Senator Simard's own province—and Regina and Edmonton as we worked our way across the prairies. We heard that there is a strong geographic bias that clearly hurts certain regions of Canada as a result of the GST. So, with respect to your second point, about the jobs that will be created by the elimination of the manufacturers' sales tax, my short answer would be that all the evidence we heard is that the figure will not be $9 billion; it will be a lot less, and that virtually all of those jobs will be created in two provinces, Quebec and Ontario.

I had said that a number of business people had indicated in the hearings that they would be in favour of the GST at a time of economic boom, but currently they are not in favour of it. Your question was whether it followed from that that under different economic circumstances there might be greater support for the GST, and I think you asked if my views might be different under economic circumstances. My answer is no. I would be opposed to the inherent regressive nature of a consumption tax on low income people, seniors and on people with little discretionary income. I would prefer some form of an income tax solution, whether it be a flat tax or whatever.

With respect to the point you were raising, it is not true that under different economic circumstances support for the GST might grow from its current level of 12 to 15 per cent to 20 to 25 per cent. I have no doubt that under the best economic circumstances in the world a broadly-based consumption tax would still face opposition from approximately 25 per cent of Canadians. It is clear from the business organizations that appeared before the committee this summer that they have changed their minds, but in terms of counting heads across the country they are a small group of people.

Finally, I cannot resist the bait and respond to your first point, which was: Why was the GST not an issue in the last campaign? Since Senator Atkins is here, perhaps we can engage in a three-way discussion on this subject. To make the point that the issue was not entirely ignored by the Liberal party or its leader in the last campaign, I make the observation that on the Sunday following the two televised debates on Monday and Tuesday nights, Mr. Turner was in the province of Quebec campaigning. In fact, he gave two or three speeches at the events we visited that day. In each case, those events, and also the events of the following day, which I believe were in Ontario, did not deal with free trade; they dealt with the GST. Other books that have been written about the campaign have recorded that. It is also true that by that stage in the game the campaign and the media—and, indeed, the parties—were focused on the free trade issue. I thought that I should set the record straight, that the issue was not entirely ignored by the Liberal Party and, for a variety of reasons, it did not become a central issue.

I circle back to your major point, which is whether or not the GST might be the right economic policy under other circumstances. One could make that case. It is a much harder case to make, and I have not heard anyone, including the Minister of Finance, seriously attempt to make the case that the GST is the right economic policy for the current economic circumstances. The case that the government seems to be making—and indeed which Senator Simard made repeatedly this summer—was that because the government had said it was going to do it, it ought to do it. Certainly all these serious economic commentators we heard this summer said, without a doubt, that a GST policy under current economic circumstances is clearly wrong, and even those people who supported the tax—there were a few of those, although it is not clear where members opposite managed to find them so that they could appear as witnesses—would argue, even if they agreed with a consumption tax in principal, that today there are not the right economic circumstance in which to be undertaking that. I think that has responded to your points, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: Thank you very much. I appreciate this debate. Again, I hope this will encourage Senator Frith and the leadership on the other side to reconsider their filibustering so that we may continue exchanges like this one. You raised the question of regressivity, and there is much more we could say about that. Witnesses have said that because of the credit, and this and that, it is not as regressive as some people would have thought.

I thought you had come close to admitting, along with other people who were supportive of the GST until these recent economic times, that it has taken a lot of planning, time and money. It is not like another fiscal decision to raise income taxes by 2 or 3 per cent. Because of the nature of this piece of legislation and the money that was invested, it is still a good policy for the 1990s. Surely a piece of legislation of that nature should not be abandoned because there have been more bankruptcies in the last few months in Ontario. Obviously the economy has deteriorated. I am not prepared to say we are in a recession. We might be in a recession two or three months from now when marketing figures confirm that that is the trend.

You talk about regional impacts. We in Atlantic Canada know that we cannot wave a magic wand and hope to reverse the trend and that all future job creation will occur in Atlantic Canada. We realize that Ontario and Quebec—for a time anyway—will continue to be the centre of the manufacturing sector; but there is a chance that this GST will encourage people to look toward Atlantic Canada for future expansion. We have not given up on that idea.

So you are probably correct when you say that the job creation will take place in Ontario and Quebec. It is not fashionable for any parliamentarian to say that what is good for Quebec and Ontario is good for Canada but—I have said it before and I will say it again tonight—we are still a country and we want to live together. The equalization program and other programs that have benefitted Atlantic Canada were made possible because we had strong economies in Quebec and Ontario. We have benefitted from that.

[Translation]

It would hurt the whole country if we were to apply that popular notion, hardly acceptable and even demagogic, that Canada should be against the GST because it is Quebec and Ontario who will profit from it. Yes, it is absolutely true. I think that if we study our national programs and our wealth distribution system, Atlantic Canada will eventually benefit from it, as it will benefit, hopefully, from other measures like the Unemployment Insurance Reform.

Your speech has been most interesting. I hope we will have the opportunity to hear Senator Olson, Senator Davey and Senator Hays as soon as possible. When we get over this madness of futile and costly debates which in fact do not change anything to the economic or even the political situation, certainly not in the long run, we will be able to discuss the GST and to talk about Bills C-21 and C-28 and we can have interesting exchanges. Let us get over with this debate which lasts since 2:01 p.m. last Tuesday, October 9. Senator Olson should have a good contribution to make to this debate, because he has been a Minister and he has a long experience in government administration. I think he could contribute to an intelligent discussion, on Senator Buckwold's report and on the bill, in third reading.

I therefore invite all of you to phone Senator Frith, not right now but tomorrow morning, to tell him that we have had a productive and interesting discussion here and that we are anxious to continue in that way and that the filibustering should be put to an end. Thank you, Honourable Senator Kirby.

[English]

Senator Kirby: Thank you, Senator Simard. I would like to make two brief comments in reply to what you have said, including your remarks in French at the end. I do not deny your comment that job creation in Quebec and Ontario is good for Canada. When it has been unpopular to do it at home, I have argued exactly that case. On that issue you touched on almost a philosophical ideological difference between your party and mine. To put the matter in context, I will tell you an anecdote that goes back to 1970 when we both entered the government. I should make the observation, for what it is worth, because we are now into Saturday, the 13th, that it was 20 years ago today that Gerald Regan won an election in Nova Scotia, and it was thirteen days after that when Premier Hatfield won an election to become the premier of New Brunswick. So Senator Simard and I both entered politics on the government side of the house at almost exactly the same time in adjacent provinces.

I remember the first time I came to Ottawa for a meeting with officials in the federal Department of Finance. The Deputy Minister in those days was someone familiar to members opposite. He was a young man in those days by the name of Simon Reisman. At that time, as a Nova Scotian and as secretary of the Cabinet, I held the view that the entire federal government, particularly the Department of Finance, because of its economic policies, was actively and openly biased against western Canada and the Atlantic provinces. That was the impression I had as someone who had been an academic and involved in opposition politics for a period of time. Through the late fall of 1970 and 1971 I came to the conclusion that my going-in assumption was false. In fact, the Department of Finance was not openly or deliberately biased or deliberately designing policies that would hurt Atlantic Canada and the west; that this was not an active policy stance of the bureaucracy. In those days the active policy stance was the philosophy that Senator Simard was talking about a minute ago when he spoke of creating jobs in Quebec and Ontario.

The philosophy was that if you maximized economic growth in some global, macro sense in the country, you would, in turn, maximize what the bureaucrats in the Department of Finance at that time called the "social dividend." I never did find out what that was, and when you asked them to define it, they could not. I see Senator Simard chuckling, so I am sure he has had the same lingo thrown back at him. It would maximize the "social dividend", which meant that the federal government had more money to parcel out to the regions to keep them relatively quiet.

The fundamental issue that Simon Reisman and I used to debate—and I must tell you that trying to debate with Simon Reisman is a real challenge, because he has a tendency not to let anyone else speak—was what role if any was there for the federal government to play in attempting to ameliorate the regional impact of a market driven economy, and to what extent should the federal government take action. Should it be DREE? I suppose DREE did not exist in those days. In fact, I can remember that the very first regional development program in Canada was the old ARDA program which began back in 1964-65. That was the first attempt by any national government to support the argument that market forces should not be the sole mechanism by which economic activity is distributed across the country. Since then, of course, there has been a series of programs with different agencies, under different theories and during different times. However, they were all based on the same principle, that there is a role for the national government to play in softening, cushioning or ameliorating the regional impact of market forces.

This government has gone through a variety of policies since 1984. There is not merely the free trade issue. One needs only to look at the GST and the whole set of policies that this administration has put forward to determine their underlying philosophical position. I understand that philosophical position although I do not agree with it. Fundamentally it is that the mechanism by which economic opportunity ought to be distributed across the country should be unconstrained and unadulterated market forces. I do not have to accept that philosophy.

Coming back to the petitions, one must ask, with regard to the regional impact of the GST, whether it is the correct economic policy or correct philosophical policy for a national government.

The second observation I would make again goes back to the early days when Senator Simard and I were both in government. It deals with the public reaction to sales taxes and consumption taxes in general. The sales tax was introduced in Nova Scotia as essentially a health services tax in 1967, and I believe that is also true of New Brunswick. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and occasionally senators opposite, including Senator Simard, have put forward the argument that people are usually and unalterably opposed to consumption taxes or sales taxes, but it is not true. We cannot even use simple language anymore. We used to call this tax a sales tax, but now we call it a consumption tax. It is like the provincial governments of the 1970s; they ceased to have departments of welfare and changed them to departments of social services. The programs and the bureaucrats did not change. It was simply thought that the new name sounded more genteel. When the sales tax was introduced in Nova Scotia, and I believe also in New Brunswick, it was designed to collect the provincial share or to offset the cost of the national medicare program. As honourable senators know, medicare started in 1966. It came to Nova Scotia a year later.

Senator Simard: The honourable senator has referred to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The sales tax came to New Brunswick during the McNair administration or, if not, in the first few years of the Robichaud government. It was much before medicare, and I think it was around 1 or 2 per cent.

Senator Kirby: I admitted that I was not sure about New Brunswick, but there is no question that in Nova Scotia the first province-wide consumption tax was introduced in the year following the introduction of medicare. It was introduced to raise revenues to pay for medicare. At that time the public readily accepted the tax because they thought that they were getting something for it. All you have to do is read your mail. I assume that people phone Conservative senators to give their opinions, and I assume that they get mail just as we Liberals get mail. So the notion that the public is unalterably opposed to a consumption tax is not true. If the people felt that they were getting something useful for their money, or that it was going for a good cause—and unfortunately they do not think giving the money to the Prime Minister is a good cause—they might be willing to pay the tax. So you must be careful when you dismiss the notion that everyone hates sales taxes and that therefore they will always hate sales taxes and fight them. That is not true. In fact, if you look at the statutes of Nova Scotia, you will see that we do not have a sales tax but a health services tax. Indeed, the money raised through the sales tax is largely used for health services.

Senator Bonnell: Senator Kirby, in the great province of Prince Edward Island we received the hospitalization and diagnostic services program in 1959. The medicare program came in 1966 or 1967. In 1960 the Shaw government came into power and it put in a sales tax to cover the hospitalization and diagnostic care service. So hospitalization and medicare were actually introduced at different times. In 1948, of course, we had health grants which gave us so much for hospital beds, and so on. Of course, the programs for diagnostic services, nursing services, dental care services, and so on, were brought in by Paul Martin of the Pearson Administration. I simply leave you with that information to help you straighten out your dates.

Senator Kirby: Thank you. Again, may I say that the exchange between Senator Simard and me on the terms and substance of many of the issues surrounding the GST has been useful. I should point out that nearly 50 per cent of the members opposite were not members of the Senate when the GST committee hearings took place. At some point you will probably have an opportunity to vote on at least the committee report, if not a third reading of the bill, and I hope that the kinds of exchanges that just went on between Senator Simard and me will help you to deal with the issue and to vote on it.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of Senator Kirby. It flows from the questions and the exchange you have had with Senator Simard and refers to the idea of not introducing major reforms in taxation such as the GST legislation without legislative approval beforehand. I appreciate that when a program is announced in the budgetary process it is inevitably followed by legislation. The GST was part of the tax reform policy discussed by this government as early as its first term in office. That being the case, the far reaching nature of this state of tax reform appears to me to be such that I must question whether it is wise to impose it on our present system without legislative approval. To some degree, that explains why we are here tonight. Senator Simard has talked about the honourable senator's experience as an advisor to premiers and prime ministers, and I am interested to hear his reaction.

Senator Kirby: Thank you. The implementation issue is an important one. One thing that surprised me during the course of the hearings this summer, because I had not appreciated the enormous complexity involved in the implementation which Senator Simard has characterized as "a very significant change in the entire tax structure of the country" is the simple practical problems of individual businesses, particularly small businesses, in implementing the tax. The details boggle the mind. One of the implementation difficulties of the GST, as we were repeatedly told, for most small and medium businesses was that they needed six months between the time of Royal Assent, if and when it occurs, and the actual implementation of the bill. Many of them said that the GST would impose significant changes in the way in which they do business—changes, for example, of computer systems, and so on. So Senator Hays is correct in raising the implementation issue. Many of us on this side of the house have said that one of the four options we considered when putting together our recommendations on this bill was that of putting a six to twelve month delay clause in the bill to enable businesses and people to get ready to pay the tax. Obviously we will discuss that point in some detail when we get to the committee report.

Let me give an example of the enormous complexity of implementation. It was referred to by the St. John's Board of Trade, in a number of western hearings, and in Whitehorse. The chambers of commerce, boards of trade and organizations of small retailers made an observation with regard to cash registers. These cash registers must be capable of calculating the GST plus the provincial tax or the territorial tax and determining which items are taxed and which are not. Many of the witnesses referred to the difficulty of getting hold of these cash registers because only a limited number of them are being manufactured. They were all being purchased by large organizations that needed anywhere from 5,000 to 10,000 cash registers. So that is a problem from a practical standpoint.

Let me finish with a comment on a petition.

By the way, since Senator Hatfield has just come into the chamber, we should inform him that in his absence senators present recognized that it was on October 26, 1970 when Senator Hatfield was first elected Premier of New Brunswick, and I think we should congratulate him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear.

Senator Meighen: Senator Kirby, I realize that I may be abusing your patience somewhat; so I can wait, because I'm more accustomed to talking to you at about 7:15 in the morning, and it is now only 3 o'clock.

Senator Kirby: I am happy to continue the dialogue until 7:15.

Senator Meighen: I would like to pursue for a minute this theory of a relationship between merit and timing. I believe you said that the merits of the GST depend to a significant extent, if not to a determinant degree, on timing. In other words, the merits of the tax are affected by present economic conditions. Would you not agree that something as fundamental as the GST, removing as it does the existing manufacturers sales tax which has been so widely condemned, is greater than the economic situation of the moment and that it is really not appropriate to judge something as basic as this measure on those conditions, because by doing so you fall into the trap of what happened a few years ago when the government of the day condemned wage and price control policies out of hand and eighteen months later implemented them. Surely it is either right or wrong when it comes to something as important and fundamental as that. Surely the merits of the GST do not depend on the latest Consumer Price Index or indeed the unemployment insurance index.

Senator Kirby: Honourable senators, of all the people I know in this chamber, I am startled that Senator Meighen would make such a comment. From our experiences together, I had thought that the honourable senator was what people on Bay Street call "street smart" in the sense that what might be correct theoretically may not be correct in the practical application. Indeed, I can recall a conversation between the honourable senator and me several years ago following a federal budget. One of the observations made by the honourable senator was that while the particular proposal may be theoretically sound, the current economic circumstances suggested that it was the wrong time to introduce it. As I recall, we were talking about the budget of 1982 or 1983, when it was being admitted by everyone, including the then Minister of Finance, that we were in a recession. I made that observation about the timing for two reasons. The first is my opposition to the timing issue and its redistributive effect which makes it a regressive form of taxation. My second point is that many of the business people who appeared before the committee made the argument that while they supported the principle of a consumption tax, they did not agree with the timing.

Mind you, the economic circumstances of today are significantly worse than they were when we held the hearings back in June and July. Many of the business people did comment on the timing, that it is important and that you cannot simply sell economic policy in a vacuum. Honourable senators must recognize that economic policy is not only a function of what is intellectually correct but of its practical application in the environment in which it is introduced. Of course, one of the great problems with economists is the phrase or disclaimer that they frequently use—they must have adopted it from lawyers, as it is in latin—and that is the phrase caeteris paribus, which says that you must ignore the practical realities that impinge upon the theory or, in other words, economists are incapable of building models that deal with the real world.

However, the issue of timing is important in the introduction of taxes, and the same can be said for economic policy in general. Indeed, the economic policy adopted by this government three or four years ago is quite different from the policy it has today. The Minister of Finance, I am sure, would make the argument that current economic circumstances warrant a different economic policy. So I do not think you can take the position that because the GST has whatever intellectual merit you think it has, it automatically is a good thing to do, independent of the circumstances of the economy. That is why the timing issue was raised repeatedly by members of the business community. While they may have felt that it was a good thing to do, in practical terms it was not right.

Senator Meighen: I would like to make one comment. I think you are underestimating the fundamental reform nature of the GST and its associated measures. If I am right in that, it transcends immediate timing and the immediate circumstances of the day. If you are cutting deep or doing radical surgery, there is never a good time. It may well be something that must be done.

Senator Kirby: I appreciate that point, and while this is not the place to debate it, let me make the observation that in no way do I underestimate the fundamental nature of the tax change encompassed in the GST. It is precisely because I understand the fundamental nature of that tax change that I am adamantly opposed to it. The timing question aside, there is a significant redistribution issue involved. That is why I have been very careful to say tonight that my opposition to the GST is essentially based on philosophical grounds. It is an ideological position, and I believe that it is a fundamental shift.

I have several petitions here that I had hoped to present, but because of the very instructive and helpful comments from other senators, I have dealt with only one of them. In tabling the petition, I would make the observation that I began with; namely, that it is remarkable to me that we are receiving petitions from all parts of Nova Scotia, from people in all walks of life and of all ages. When one looks at these petitions, takes the phone calls and reads the mail that comes from all parts of Nova Scotia on this subject, one begins to realize the depth of feeling and concern Canadians are experiencing over this issue. Therefore it is important that we table these petitions, because it indicates to the public that the petitions and the names on them matter. One of the good things we have accomplished in this chamber in the past several days is that we have made the average Canadian, and in my case the average Nova Scotian, understand that if he or she takes the trouble to sign a petition, regardless of the subject, and the time to send it to us, it will be presented in the chamber. So, to the extent that senators on both sides can send out a signal that says "your views matter, we are listening", and to the extent that we are prepared to express those views in the chamber and to speak on behalf of those people, it is a very important message to send to all Canadians. It is important that we be responsive to the concerns and the views of the average Canadian. It is with that attitude and view in mind that I would simply like to table the petition that I have been talking to for the last little while.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I have the honour to rise and present some petitions. As was the case the last time I rose on this notional Tuesday, they are of two kinds. The first I will deal with relate to a group of Canadians from my part of Canada, Calgary. I will go through their geographic location as part of my presentation of the petition.

They address the specific problem of the GST and the effect it will have of taxing printed materials and the departure from the long-standing tradition of not doing so. The petitions represent a large group of people who are unhappy with the goods and services tax and are saying, "Please change it to address our problem". The result of the government's listening to those people prior to drafting the legislation has been a narrowing of the tax base. There are a number of people who have successfully lobbied the government or convinced it that they should be excluded, that they should be zero-rated or treated in some special way so that the tax will not apply to them. As I said, the result of that has been the narrowing of the base of the tax. Of course, that results in the very same problem existing or coming back into play that the goods and services tax as a tax reform was intended to address, and that is the very narrow base of the manufacturers' sales tax.

These petitions relate to the issue of the GST applying to printed materials. The first petition is signed by 25 Canadians who are representative of the community of Calgary. They are from the communities of Lake Bonavista, with addresses on Robson Circle, addresses on the MacLeod Trail, Parkdale, Oakridge, Cedar Brae and Midnapore, which is interesting in that it is one of the few Canadian place names which has its origin in India. There are addresses on Dover Court, Bonavista and Woodridge. I will set aside that petition containing 25 names to be picked up at the conclusion of my remarks.

The second petition I have contains 25 names, again representative of my community. It contains similiar addresses and as I look through this list I will draw special attention to Sunnyside, Hillhurst, Sunridge, a few of the communities I did not notice in the first petition.

The third petition contains 25 names. As I look through this petition, I see no place names of subdivisions that I have not already mentioned, except perhaps for Deerfoot. In this particular petition, there is a signature of a person who lives outside Calgary in the community of Canmore. That then is the third petition of 25 names.

Senator Steuart: I wonder if I could ask a question. Coming from the greatest gas and oil producing province in Canada, could you comment on the petitions coming from Calgary, which is the head office of the oil and gas industry. What effect will the latest apparent shortage of oil and the sharp increase in the price of oil have on costs such as transportation costs? What effect will the GST have on the people in Alberta? Will it make the cost higher or create bigger hardships for both the industry and the people?

Senator Hays: Thank you for the question, Senator Steuart. As a regressive tax, it will add to the costs the people in my community have to pay and will cause a hardship to them. That is one of the reasons so many of them have come forward and signed petitions in opposition to the tax.

The community that I come from is affected by layoffs, notwithstanding the higher price of crude oil as a result of the current crisis in the Middle East, one of three in very recent memory. There are many layoffs in our communities.

There is an Air Canada base in Calgary and, as a result of Air Canada's addressing higher crude oil prices, a number of my fellow Calgarians will be out of work. Imperial's head office is in Toronto, not Calgary I regret to say, but it does have a major office, Esso Resources, in Calgary and the downsizing which Imperial Oil is going through will also have an effect. In the face of higher energy prices, crude oil in particular, we still see this occurring because there is so much uncertainty about where the price of crude oil will end, notwithstanding its current high price. Those people who are laid off by Esso Resources will also suffer greatly because of higher costs.

I have mentioned two large Canadian companies. There are many smaller Canadian companies in the energy sector which have unsatisfactory debt-equity ratios and they are also in the process of laying off and downsizing, notwthstanding the current high price of crude oil. Those people who are laid off because of that phenomenon will also be unhappy with the GST and I assume that is one of the reasons that prompt them to sign petitions.

Senator Steuart: Is what is happening in the oil industry causing a tremendous increase in exploration and development of the tar sands to face the possible shortage in Canada and North America, and what effect will the GST have on that? First, is it happening, and secondly, what effect will the GST have on it?

Senator Hays: I would be happy to respond to that. Higher energy prices will assist energy companies by enhancing revenues during this period of higher energy prices. It is fortuitous that these high crude oil prices coincide with remarkably low prices for natural gas. Senator Carney is not present, but that is something we might have had an exchange on, if she were here. Deregulation has not served the natural gas industry very well, not to this point at least, because it has served to drive down the price of natural gas to the point where, in most cases, it is being sold for less than its replacement cost. As far as the GST relates to these matters, the costs of exploration and development will increase because the GST applies to many of the capital goods, and all of the services that that particular sector uses. Accordingly, that could be a reason for people signing petitions in my region, which is an energy-based region.

The support by the Government of Canada for OSLO was withdrawn in the last budget. The capital costs and services needed to construct the facility will be higher as a result of the GST and that will have a negative effect on Canadian security of supply because it will make it more expensive to put the facility in place. It is desperately needed to address a near-term problem we will have as a result of our declining crude reserves, a point that was made very effectively by Jim Grey, who, I believe, is well-known to most senators. He is a spokesman for the industry from Calgary and he appeared before the House of Commons Energy Committee earlier this week.

Senator Comeau: The way I see it, the capital costs will in effect be actually lower because, not only will they not be paying the manufacturers' sales tax on equipment, but with the rebate on the 7 per cent GST, the actual cost of capital equipment will go down thus making the cost of production and extraction of oil much cheaper.

Senator Hays: On the surface that would seem to be the case. However, we must remember that we are talking about a region of Canada. Much of the manufacturing of the goods from our heavy oil and our oil sands projects is done in eastern Canada and involves a high transportation component. Accordingly, because this is a capital project that will take place in a region of Canada, your suggestion is not necessarily so. I would not say that it is absolutely not so.

I would refer honourable senators to a recent study by the Canadian Tax Foundation entitled The Economics of the Goods and Services Tax. This report highlights that fact, and I wish to quote one short excerpt from it which illustrates a model that Messrs. Jones and Whalley developed. In gross terms, it shows the effect of the tax on a model basis. Those have to be accepted with some grains of salt because they are based on assumptions. The model uses 1981 as a base year. Ontario gains $488 million from the change and Quebec gains $3 million, and all other regions lose. British Columbia loses $76 million and other regions lose over $100 million each. In the case of Alberta it is in excess of $100 million.

In response to your question, the point that I would like to make is that while on the surface it would seem that the elimination of the narrower based manufacturers' sales tax and its replacement with a slightly broader-based GST, which unfortunately is not broadly enough based to do what it is supposed to do, will not work that way for that region.

Senator Comeau: In the model that is used, did the economists calculate the reduced cost because of the removal of the GST on the transporation equipment which is being purchased from Quebec and Ontario, such as trucks and trains, and also the fuel that is used by the transportation companies to transport the equipment?

Senator Hays: There will be an opportunity to look at this document that has been released. I will not spend a lot of time on it, but, as I understand it, it is what is called a general equilibrium model and features six Canadian regions. In each of the regions it talks about 13 industries in particular. I cannot answer the question specifically as it relates to transportation, other than to indulge in what economists do so often and assume that transportation is one of the 13 sectors factored into the model.

I will move to the fourth petition which is related to the tax applying to printed materials. As I go through it, I see a few new communities represented from Calgary, such as Elbow Park. I do not see my own community here; however, hopefully before I have completed these petitions I will encounter that community and be able to say a few kind words about it. This fourth petition contains 25 names.

The fifth petition contains names from many of the communities I described earlier.

Having read those five petitions which are of a different nature, I will now turn to a different set of petitions. The first petition is signed by people from Alberta and it calls upon the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. This petition contains the names of 27 people from rural areas, including Didsbury, Olds, Red Deer, Torrington and Trochu. This petition differs from the petitions I have dealt with so far in that it asks for an outright stopping of the goods and services tax. These people represent rural Albertans. In my explanatory remarks, I would like to draw upon personal encounters with rural Albertans, particularly in the farm machinery business and say why I would think that they would be people who would sign this petition. I do not recognize names of any farm machinery dealers.

As we all know, our agricultural industry is extremely stressed. We talk about slowdowns, recessions and depressions. There is absolutely no question in my mind that we are in about the sixth year of a depression in the agricultural sector in western Canada. This is particularly concentrated in the province of Saskatchewan, secondly in Manitoba, and thirdly in Alberta.

The people who serve that sector, such as the farm machinery dealers, are also stressed. We have seen consolidations in the farm machinery sector and essentially there are now only three lines of equipment whereas ten years ago there were six or seven lines of equipment. These dealers are extremely frustrated and angry about the implementation of the GST.

Although agriculture is zero-rated, the people in the farm machinery sector are obliged to collect the tax on many items. For instance, tractors under 100 horsepower, which is a fairly large tractor, and drills for seeding which are less than 12 feet. Those are two examples and perhaps they could be remedied, but as it stands those are items on which the GST must be collected by farm machinery dealers. That means they have to upgrade their computer systems, the memory and storage, and it is necessary for them to employ people to input the information and basically to look after the high cost of administering the tax. In many cases the cost of administering the tax will either add to the cost of that machinery dealership or put the machinery dealership into a loss. The crowning issue for the farm machinery dealers is that they know that this tax they have collected is paid by farmers who are zero-rated who will have to complete their administrative work and reclaim the tax. In some cases these costs are estimated to be up to $25,000 a year for the farm machinery dealer to process the information. The farm machinery dealer knows that the people he deals with are almost all exclusively zero-rated and will spend a lot of money to claim the tax back. They are also aware of the high administrative costs to Revenue Canada. We are all well aware of how much money has been spent there and how many employees have been hired and nothing has happened. The tax has been collected, the tax has been debated and it has churned the money and generated some activity but it is impossible to describe the frustration and anger that I have encountered from those people when they relate the tale of all of this work and the high costs to achieve absolutely nothing in terms of tax effect.

This petition relates to comments I made about petitions filed on behalf of that community which is concerned about its specific interest, namely, printed materials. This is also an illustration of the narrow base. Quite properly, agriculture should not be stressed with this additional tax, but the narrower base makes the tax almost as flawed in terms of who it draws upon as the manufacturers' sales tax, which I look forward to debating when we actually get to that item on the legislative agenda.

The second petition I wish to present is in a similar form and contains the names of 24 petitioners from Calgary. The difference between the first petitions I filed and this petition is that it asks the Senate of Canada to stop the goods and services tax. This petition represents people largely from the community of Calgary. I do see some names from Strathmore which is a community east of Calgary which services the agricultural sector, in particular a large number of feedlots.

The third petition I wish to present is in the same form. It asks the Senate of Canada to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. The names on this petition are from a different part of Alberta. There are names from Valleyview, Crooked Creek, Winterbourne, Sunset House and Edison. These are all communities south of Edmonton but north of Red Deer. The petition also contains petitioners from the community of Delburne, which is east of Red Deer.

In this case, the petitioners may have signed this petition for a reason different from the one I explained with respect to the petition I have just filed, which was signed predominantly by people serving the agricultural community. These other communities are in areas where there is a great deal of activity in the oil and gas exploration and development which we hope will be revived as a result of higher crude prices, even though the crude prices are higher for the unfortunate reason of the terrible crisis in the Middle East. These people are not busy and have not been busy. Many of the drilling rigs or "iron", as they are called, have been broken up and sold, which has resulted in high unemployment in these regions. People are moving out of the region or people are unemployed. The goods and services tax will be regressive. It will increase their cost of living and will have a negative effect on those communities. Accordingly, I can only share with honourable senators these reasons that this particular set of 27 petitioners would oppose the goods and services tax.

Finally, I have a set of petitions which are of the type I presented earlier. They are from the same community that wished to have the tax not apply to printed materials. The petitioners are from Calgary. Many of the people in this petition have addresses which are box numbers at certain sites and people who have supermailboxes, another controversial item. I see one signatory from Claresholm who is probably a school teacher or someone who has a special interest in education and literacy.

I will add this petition to the five I have placed here for tabling.

The next petition contains 25 names from Calgary, with a couple of exceptions. I see a name here from Vauxhall and one from Taber, a community in southern Alberta.

I have three more similar petitions I wish to table. Again, these principally represent people from the City of Calgary, however, there is a name here from Priddis and the rest are from Calgary with the exception of one from Drumheller, a community in southeastern Alberta, the site of the famous Tyrrell Museum of Palaeontology.

The next petition that I wish to table is in similar form—people wishing to see the tax not applied to printed materials. It is signed by people from Calgary, although there are a few exceptions. One of them is from the community of High River, the birthplace and home of Mr. Joe Clark, a previous Prime Minister of Canada. The other signatures are all from communities in Calgary that I have named earlier.

The last petition is in similar form. It is signed by 25 citizens who are representatives of communities in the City of Calgary. Honourable Senators, I will table these petitions.

There are questions about compliance and about the complexity of the GST, questions about whether or not it will serve any end, being sold as a tax which will not raise much in the way of additional revenues, and fear that it may, in fact, be a tax put in place to raise additional revenues, in which case what will the rate of the tax be? I believe those questions have prompted all of the people to sign the petitions that I have tabled this morning—both those who wish the tax not to apply to printed materials because of their special interest and those who wish the Senate to do everything that it can to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

Senator Bonnell: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Hays: I would be pleased to deal with a question.

Senator Bonnell: Do the people of Alberta think that the GST is revenue neutral as compared to the manufacturers' sales tax, or do they feel it is a money grab for the government?

Senator Hays: I have had an opportunity to talk to many of the people who I feel would be typical of those who have signed these petitions. The answer to that question is mixed, and I would take it that they do not know.

I have asked those people who support the tax why they support it, and they have said, "Because we need the tax to address the deficit." They obviously have not heard the government's sale of the tax; that is, that it is not to address the deficit but, rather, to replace the MST and FST. So, they do not know and then they make assumptions. One of the great problems with this tax is that is not part of a known strategy of the Government of Canada on how to deal with its debt service and its requirements to generate operating revenues to carry out programs and so on. The people of Canada assume that this tax will do this or it will do that. That is one of the greatest faults of the tax, and it is one of the things that prompts these petitions that we are spending so much time bringing forward in the Senate. They do not know, so they assume. Some of them have to be wrong; they cannot all be right.

The great failure of the government in this case is not telling us their agenda. Some who oppose it say, "The moneys coming in are going to be increased, and those moneys are going to be used to introduce new programs or will be used in the lead-up to an election. We don't like that so we oppose that. That is a bad strategy for Canada." Others say, "No, the government wouldn't do that. This money is going to be dedicated to debt reduction." The fact of the matter is that we do not know, and the government has not been forthcoming. The government, in its sale of the tax to Canadians, has failed to clarify those issues. That is the best answer I can give, Senator Bonnell.

Senator Bonnell: Is there any fear from the people who have signed those petitions that the federal government might do exactly the same thing with the GST as it did with the manufacturers' sales tax? The manufacturer's sales tax was only 9 per cent, and they have raised it to 13.5 per cent. In my province, people feel that the GST might start out at 7 per cent, but if the government wastes more money and gives more money, they will have to raise to 8 per cent, 9 per cent, 10 per cent or perhaps 25 per cent. If it starts at 7 per cent, where does it end?

Senator Hays: That is a major fear. If the experience in other countries is any indication of what will likely happen, it is a well-justified fear. I do not know that I can add much more, Senator Bonnell, other than to accept your lead on that question. I can certainly confirm that that is the feeling, as well, of many of the people in my community who I have been trying to serve here by bringing these petitions forward at this particular time in the Senate.

Senator Bonnell: In my province, many people are in the lower income bracket. We do not have any millionaires; we do not have any big banks; we do not have any big corporations. The people feel that the big corporations are off the hook, whereas the poor fisherman, the unemployed or the mother with 3 small children are being heavily taxed in order to let the big corporations off the hook because they supported this government in the last election. Is there any fear of that in your province?

Senator Hays: Yes, I encounter that from time to time. It seems that people sense there is potential mischief in relying on the people who will be paying the goods and services tax to the degree that the government apparently intends to generate revenues for the general revenue fund to serve our need for debt service and funding programs, including programs which attempt to assist in equalizing differences in various regions.

Again, there is no good strategy here that is apparent to Canadians on what the tax base is at the income tax level, the corporate tax level or the excise tax level in terms of how the burden of paying our debt service will be borne in a fair way by Canadians. This particular tax does not fit into a strategy which fairly allocates the burden of tax among Canadians. I am sure that that is one of the reasons many people are signing these petitions and forwarding them to us. They are saying that this is a bad tax and should not be implemented.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I am going to present petitions from various parts of the Province of Saskatchewan. As I go through them, I notice that some of the signatures are from places other than Saskatchewan. In fact, there is one here from Niagara Falls, New York. Why anybody from Niagara Falls, New York, would be against the Canadian government's goods and services tax is beyond me.

Senator Bonnell: They probably want to visit Canada.

Senator Steuart: They may. Most of the names on the first petition are from the Rosetown, Saskatchewan area. For those who do not know Saskatchewan, Rosetown is a good-sized town for Saskatchewan.

Senator Bonnell: What is the population?

Senator Steuart: I was going to get to that. You are being a big help. The population is approximately 4,000.

Senator Bonnell: When you give us the population, you give us a better idea of how big the town really is.

Senator Steuart: Thank you, and bless you; bless you many times. Rosetown is the heart of the farming community. In fact, it has some of the best farmland and farmers anywhere in Saskatchewan or Canada. Today I have been telephoning people whose names are on these petitions because I am interested in why they would sign them. I found out that there is a general concern about things that affect their community.

Agriculture, as I am sure all of you know, is still the backbone of Saskatchewan's economy. When agriculture is in trouble, as it is now, the whole province is in trouble. Agriculture is in extremely serious trouble.

One of the problems with agriculture in Saskatchewan from the viewpoint of the rest of Canada is that some of our farmers and farm organizations tend to cry wolf in good times and in bad times. I presume if you live in other parts of Canada you have a great deal of difficulty deciding when things are really bad in Saskatchewan. Many times when things were extremely good in Saskatchewan, organizations such as the Farmers Union would complain about the terrible situation in Saskatchewan. Sometimes even the Wheat Pool would petition Ottawa for more help. It seemed to be an endless thing. If it rained too much in the spring they were demanding relief because of flooding; if it was dry they were demanding relief because of drought; if the markets were low they were demanding relief because they could not sell their grain.

Sometimes those complaints were not serious and legitimate. However, in the last 3 years, they have been serious and legitimate. Anyone who pays any attention to what goes on in Canada and the rest of the world will recognize that the price war on grains in general between the United States and the European Common Market has almost destroyed the price of grain. The price of wheat right now, relative to what it was in the Thirties, is lower today in real terms than it was at the bottom of the depression. While they have had a bumper crop, many of the farmers are literally dumping it in the fields because it makes no economic sense to invest in granaries to store the grain to wait until the market picks up, if it ever does.

These people from the Rosetown area are not petitioning the Senate to do what it can to stop the GST because they do not like paying taxes. This may be the straw that breaks the camel's back. They are in real trouble. Our whole agricultural industry is in serious trouble.

If you chart the course of the economy in Canada, whenever there was a bumper crop in western Canada, with good prices and good markets, there was prosperity in Canada. The farmers spent their money. They bought machinery, almost all of it made in eastern Canada. It helped central Canada. There was nothing wrong with that.

Someone here said there is a feeling in some places in the extremities of Canada—western Canada or Atlantic Canada—of resentment towards Quebec and Ontario. There is some of that. Some of it is justified, much of it is not. No other nation in the world has been as generous as Canada in spreading money around in cost-shared agreements and equalization grants to the have-not provinces. Saskatchewan is a have-not province again. It has gone from a have province to a have-not province, back to a have province and then back again to a have-not province. The people who live in Alberta are beginning to understand that, because, for a long time, they have been a have province. They carry their share of equalization grants to the other provinces.

The people of Saskatchewan are petitioning us because they are extremely serious and are in a great deal on trouble. They do not need this tax at this time. Besides everything else that has been said about this tax, the timing of it is unbelievable. It is going to be a money maker. I have no doubt that this is going to be a cash cow. I have heard many federal officials say that we need this tax to help pay off the deficit. There is no question that the deficit has to be paid down, but surely there are other ways.

Finance Minister Wilson said the most amazing thing this morning: He will not call this a recession. But what difference does that make? We are in tough times. He said that this is a plan. He said, "I will admit I just missed by three-tenths of one per cent." That is like the captain of the Bismark saying, "I was doing really well, folks, just before we went down, but I steered one degree too far north," or the captain of the Exxon Valdez, saying, "I just missed by 2 or 3 per cent," and we ended up with the most terrible ecological disaster we have ever had in the north. Instead of backing off and saying, "Let's take a look at this; let's study the effects of this for a while," Finance Minister Wilson seems absolutely convinced, determined and stubborn that they are going to push on with this tremendous change in our whole taxation policy.

There are petitions coming into the House of Commons, as well as the Senate. I am sure senators on the other side have received some, but they are not bringing them forward. Again I say to you: Use what influence you have. You have influence and you can make a difference. If 3 or 4 Conservative senators decided they would not support the GST, they would strike a blow for ordinary people across Canada, not just Nova Scotia fishermen or people below the poverty line, they would strike a blow for businessmen. Most businessmen in Canada do not want this tax. Big business and manufacturers want it because it would be of benefit to them, but small businessmen across the country do not want this tax.

Yesterday, in the City of Regina, stores in the largest shopping mall took turns ringing bells. They were ringing bells in support of the Liberal senators' fight against the GST. That might not say much to you people, but Regina is not a Liberal city. It has not been a Liberal city for a long time. It voted very strongly Conservative and now it votes very strongly NDP. The merchants there have been politically stung too often to get involved. They may get involved quietly, but they do not show their colours too openly. Politics is taken seriously in Saskatchewan, and it hurts them. When they will ring bells in support of the Liberal senators' attempt to stop the GST, that is the strongest indication they can give that they are very concerned and dead against it. Right now they are suffering; business is down.

Regina is not too far from the American border. The people of Regina, Weyburn, and Moose Jaw are heading south by the hundreds. They buy all kinds of things, including food. They bring it back. They can save money, even if they have to pay duty. When the GST comes in, it will be worse.

Senator Hays talked about what is happening to agriculture. The people who have signed this petition—people from Rosetown and Swift Current—are pleading with us and petitioning us, which is their right. It is our responsibility to bring to the attention of the government that these people want the GST stopped. For the first few years when the Brian Mulroney government was in power, I believe they took a poll every three days before they decided what they would do. I suppose they think they will get re-elected if they can show courage and statesmanship, and their idea of statesmanship is to do things that are extremely unpopular. Of course governments have to do unpopular things, but this is not only unpopular; the timing of it is desperate and it is a terrible tax.

The government has admitted that they are going to hire 4,000 new civil servants; you and I know that it will be closer to 5,000 or 6,000. That indicates how complicated this tax is. Small businessmen have to collect tax in one area and put it on another area. I think the provincial government is going to meld the tax, which will be even worse. The last time I talked to people in the retail business, the cash register people had yet to come out with a cash register where they could collect the two taxes—the federal tax and the provincial sales—by only one operation on the cash register. They may now have developed that, but it will cost a lot of money. Many businesses are holding back to buy it because it is a big investment.

I have mentioned that agriculture will be hurt by this at a time when it cannot afford to be hurt. It is in serious trouble. Another extremely important part of our economy is tourism. Tourism in Saskatchewan, and I believe in most of Canada, is flowing the other way. The pull of lower prices is increasing the flow of tourism out of Saskatchewan. The gap between the Canadian and U.S. dollar has narrowed, so that advantage for Canadians has disappeared. Prices in the U.S. are far lower than in Canada. When this tax is implemented, there will be a tax on food, hotels, and all services. Our tourist industry will dry up. That will be another serious blow to the province I represent.

Let me deal with the lumber industry. Many people think we do not have a lumber industry, but we do. There is a very large pulp mill in the City of Prince Albert. There is a pulp mill being built in the northwest part of Saskatchewan, near a place called Meadow Lake. There are several saw mills in the northern part of the province. It has always been a relatively large industry in Saskatchewan. It does not compare to the lumber industry in B.C. or Quebec or in some parts of the Maritimes, but it is very important to our economy. It is suffering, and it will continue to suffer. Again, the GST is going to hurt it.

There are names in these petitions from Prince Albert, Big River and Meadow Lake. If you talk to the people there, they are very worried. That pulp mill may not go ahead in Meadow Lake. The market is off. When they made their plans and projections for that pulp mill, they had no idea that the GST would go into effect. When it does come into effect, it may change the whole picture. That pulp mill may not go ahead. The people who are depending on those jobs tend to be Native people, and they need those jobs. Unemployment among the Native people in northern Saskatchewan is among the highest in Canada. It runs as high as 60 per cent. This will be a terrible blow to them. They are petitioning us not to go ahead with this.

I have many petitions regarding education, most of them come from the City of Regina and the City of Saskatoon. However, what is true in Regina and Saskatoon in this particular case is true all over the province. I will read what they have to say:

> To the Honourable Senate of Canada.
> A petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable house will therefore provide a remedy, humbly sheweth.
> Whereas, the Government of Canada has seen fit since Confederation and without hiatus to apply a zero-rated tax to magazines, books and newspapers and now proposes to include them in the GST and,
> Whereas, uninhibited dissemination for the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education, and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by the GST application,
> Wherefore, the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Senate of Canada to reaffirm the historic principle embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by proposing an amendment to Bill C-62 to include retention of the zero rate for these products.

The names of the people on this petition are from Regina, Saskatoon and some of the smaller centres.

The Government of Canada and the governments of almost every province have launched strong and expensive programs to increase the literacy in this country. There were studies showing the percentage of our population who could not read or write at a level high enough to apply for a job or to hold the most menial job. When those studies came to our attention, governments from all parts of the country and at all levels of government set out to do something about it. At the same time, the federal government proposes to put a tax on books and magazines and, in fact, raise the cost of trying to help people learn to read and write. I find that not only counterproductive, but unbelievable. These people are not asking, as are those on the rest of the petitions, that the GST be stopped; they are asking that it be amended. Our aim is to stop the tax. But when we asked officials of the government to make this amendment, our pleas fell on deaf ears. I hope that situation changes.

One of the other parts of the economy in Saskatchewan, which has played an increasingly important role in our economy in the last few years, is mining. This comes as a surprise to some people who do not live in Saskatchewan. In the northern half of Saskatchewan you find forests, and, when the forests run out, you are into the Precambrian Shield. There we have tremendous reserves of copper, gold and zinc. In the southern part of the province we have tremendous reserves of coal, and we have among the greatest reserves of uranium in Canada. Some of these industries are prospering and some are suffering. The application of the GST to this industry is going to be one more blow that we in Saskatchewan cannot stand—I do not think they can stand it anywhere in Canada.

I cannot believe that the government cannot see that this tax is counterproductive. We reach a level in taxation—and I think we have reached it in Canada—when there comes a point of diminishing returns. We have reached such a point with respect to the price of cigarettes and liquor, and I think we may have reached it in many other areas in which the incentive to earn, work harder, start and improve businesses will disappear. This is true of the mining industry. We, in Saskatchewan, have a difficult time convincing people to develop mines. If they can develop them in Ontario, they are closer to the market and closer to water transportation. If they can develop them in British Columbia, they are right on the ocean and much closer to the Pacific market, which is growing by leaps and bounds. But we are land-locked. We have to depend on trucks and rail to get our goods to market. So the slightest change in the economy and the costs to the mining and lumber industries is enough to tip the balance. They have marginal operations at best, and this will change the situation.

Saskatchewan used to have a population of over a million people. Our population is now down to 900,000 people. Over the years, the federal government has spent hundreds of millions of dollars attempting to encourage industries to locate in Atlantic Canada and in the prairie provinces to help us to diversify our economy. All that money now is going down the drain, partly because of circumstances beyond the control of the federal government or any other government. But, in this particular case, adding the complications and the tax increase of this tax is going to strike such a blow to Saskatchewan that, if something is not done, we will have gone from having over a million population to having an 800,000 thousand population in a few years. What is true of Saskatchewan is to a lesser extent true of Manitoba. But it is true of Saskatchewan because we depend far more on agriculture than on the tenuous mining, tourist and lumber industries.

It has been said several times that people do not mind paying taxes, that this tax was brought up in the last election and people did not react, and that the Liberal Party did not raise it as an election issue. When I was the mayor of the city of Prince Albert, almost every year, like everyone else, we were forced to raise the mill rate. We would try not to, but if we did not raise the mill rate, the school boards would raise it, and the city had to collect the taxes on behalf of the school board. So we would have our meeting with the school board and do everything we could to keep the costs down, and then we would announce the increase in the mill rate. I waited for the reaction and there was none. After that first year I thought there was nothing to it. As a matter of fact, I wondered why we wasted all this time because there was no reaction. Then at the end of December all blazes would break loose. The phones would ring and people would accost you.

One thing about being in municipal government, if you do something in a council meeting on Monday night, you run into it on Tuesday morning walking down the street. In the provincial government you could get away from it for a while, and I like it much better in the federal government because most people think I have died and gone to heaven so they do not bother me any more. But in municipal government you got it as soon as you left the meeting. One day I asked the commissioner of the school board, if we raised the taxes in February or March, why were we catching hell about it in December? He said that was when most people paid their taxes. I never thought of that. Most people pay their taxes at the last possible moment because the amount they would receive for early payment did not amount to much.

That is why there was little or no reaction to the GST when it was first announced. Now we are getting a reaction because the implementation date is coming closer. If the government announced it was going to raise the manufacturers' tax by 2 per cent there would have been some editorials, the business community would have been in a state of shock, and it would have campaigned against it; but the ordinary people would not have thought about it until they found that prices had increased. The reason they are reacting to the tax now is because the Liberals in the Senate, the NDP and provincial premiers are talking about it and because businesses have had to gear up for it.

People are talking about the GST and they are angry. They are actually ringing bells in the largest shopping mall in Regina against this. Why? Because right now businesses are laying out the money to gear up for this. They are concerned, and some do not know if they are going to carry on because their margin of profit is so low. They are telling their customers about it and their customers are getting worked up. I hope we are going to show you the millions of letters—maybe close to 2 million since we returned from our cross-country hearing—from people who are reacting. That reaction is growing all the time.

This is another reason we keep going. We think this an unfair tax to the extremities of Canada and to the poor people. It is a bad tax at a bad time. The feeling against the tax is growing all the time, and I am hoping that the Prime Minister and Mr. Wilson will open their ears and hearts and realize what they are doing to themselves, but, more important, what they are doing to the people and to the economy of this country and back off.

I said this yesterday and I will say it to you again: People can make a difference and you new senators can make a difference. If five or six of you senators decide that you have had enough and you are not going to follow like sheep to the slaughter and back this tax without thinking, you would see the government back off so quickly that it would make your head spin because they know that as soon as it came to a vote, the tax would be defeated. I do not have much hope that you will do that, but we hope it will eventually sink in, through our reading of these petitions, that you new senators are allowing this to happen.

I have spoken about the petition with respect to magazines, newspapers, periodicals and books—what a terrible thing it is and how angry people in the education field are. We have petitions here from Rosetown, Prince Albert and Yorkton. These are basically farming communities.

I see petitions from a small city of about 12,000, Swift Current, which is close to the Alberta border. The city of Swift Current lives by the oil patch. It services the oil patch in western Saskatchewan. It is a shopping and communications centre, but its prosperity rises and falls with the gas and oil industry. The people of that city are extremely upset and fearful for the future of their community, and they should be.

Senator Hays talked about the fact that although the price of oil is going up, for some reason—fear that it will not last or uncertainty—the investment in exploration is not continuing as much as people expected it would. Usually as soon as the price of oil goes up, exploration goes up, and the pipeline and steel business goes up—we have a steel mill in Regina—but that is not happening. One of the reasons that is not happening is the uncertainty of the economy in Canada.

Here we are in a recession and it is going to get worse. In 1991, if the government gets its way, it is going to slap another tax grab—make no mistake it is a tax grab—on the people of Canada. I said this last night and I am going to say it again: If this bill passes, the provinces are going to come in on it. They cannot help it. The federal government was stunned when the provinces did not come on line. It thought the provinces would leap at this chance because it would lower the provinces's tax, which would look good to its people, the federal government will collect the money, and the provinces will get more money and have the joy of spending it.

The federal government thought all the provinces would agree, and, for some strange reason, they did not. The government did not expect Alberta to agree because Alberta does not have a sales tax. Saskatchewan is now weakening. Some of the Atlantic provinces are weakening. Quebec jumped in with both feet. I have a feeling that before Brian Mulroney makes a move, he sits down with Bourassa and cooks up a scheme. I think it is an unholy alliance that is not helping the rest of Canada. However, they have come in on it for only one reason: They are going to make more money out of it. Everyone knows that Bourassa had to be getting something extra out of going in with the federal government, not just to help Brian Mulroney, and I do not blame him.

The government of Saskatchewan—which has spent money like a drunken sailor for seven or eight years they have been in power and run up deficits of $4,000 million—is going in on it for only one reason: This tax is not popular. It is not popular in Saskatchewan to be getting in bed with the federal Conservative government right now. Grant Devine has been trying to move away from it, and I do not blame him. Now he is beginning to make noises. Why? Because he is going to make more money, and if he is going to make more money, it will only come from one place, the taxpayers. Now we are going to see a double grab in this country: A grab by the federal government for billions and a grab by the provinces for billions. We cannot stand it. We are already one of the highest taxed nations in the western world.

I am not one of those who think that everything that happens shows that free trade was a bad agreement, but I do not think we were ready for it. I do not think enough studies had been done to find out if we were competitive enough or if, industry by industry, we could succeed and compete with the American industries. If this tax goes into effect, you ain't seen nothing yet. You are going to see factories moving out of Canada so they will not have to pay more taxes. Not long ago the Globe and Mail said that they are already moving out by the dozens. If you had a factory and could move it down into the United States and take advantage of that huge market, sell into Canada, and pay lower wages and lower taxes, of course you would go. There was a company that received millions from the Ontario government and is now moving down to the United States. It is going to happen over and over again. If we implement this tax, it will happen to a greater extent.

Senator Bonnell: Before you leave that proposition, I wonder if you would permit a question.

Senator Steuart: Certainly.

Senator Bonnell: You said you predicted that the provinces would jump on the bandwagon and collect the tax with the federal government. Consequently, things like postage stamps would be taxed by the provincial government. What is going to happen to poor Summerside on Prince Edward Island, which has been promised all these federal government offices, if the provincial governments are going to jump in and collect the taxes on their own? Are we going to lose all of the jobs that were promised to Summerside?

Senator Steuart: I am not sure.

Senator Bonnell: You predicted it.

Senator Steuart: No. I am predicting that the provinces are going to come in. I do not know. If the Province of Saskatchewan melds its tax with the federal government and the average citizen now has to pay a 7 per cent federal tax and, for example, a 5 per cent provincial tax, the theory is that the tax will go to the federal government, which will return Saskatchewan's 5 per cent and take its 7 per cent and put it in its own coffers. It may not not change anything.

The government is telling the provinces that their costs of collection will not be any higher. So if they are not any higher, they will not have to hire any more people. I do not think it will change your situation at all. It may, but I do not know, and I do not know if any one else knows. One of the promises the government gave to the provinces was that their collection costs will not increase. They can lower their rates of taxation, but, because the tax will apply to all kinds of new articles and services, the 5 per cent tax will produce far more money on a wider range of taxable articles and services than the 7 per cent tax. The provinces will then make more money. The federal government is going to take the blame for collecting the money. It will be known as "the tax".

Another thing that the federal government has said is that this will not be a hidden tax. The government always said that the manufacturers' sales tax was a bad tax because it was hidden. I always wondered why politicians did not like a hidden tax. What most politicians, finance ministers and treasurers would like to do is wait until you are sound asleep, walk into the house, pick your pocket, leave you with a dollar, take $50 out and when you wake up you will not even miss it and they will have the money. I have a great deal of difficulty believing that the government does not want this tax hidden.

I cannot answer your question. The government has been telling the people of Saskatchewan that their costs of collection will not increase. If they do not go up, someone's cost of collection will go up, and there will still have to be many civil service jobs created to make sure that the claims are filed correctly. So I suspect that you may get the new jobs that were promised.

Senator Bonnell: I have a supplementary question on the same subject. The Province of Quebec already has an agreement with the federal government, and it is going to hire Quebec employees to collect the tax, thereby keeping the money in the province for a month or so, and then it will submit the cheque at the end of the month, which will be interest-free. If the other provinces jump in, will the government not have to give the other provinces the same opportunities as it gave to the Province of Quebec or will it give them a special status?

Ordinarily they should get the same deal. If they do, the jobs will be provincial because Saskatchewan will want the jobs in Saskatchewan; it will want new big buildings in Saskatchewan; British Columbia will want these buildings in British Columbia; and even Newfoundland will want it in Newfoundland. Where is little old Prince Edward Island going to get these federal jobs to collect this tax if we are foolish enough to say that we want to support the bill, if we ever get ot it? I am getting to the point of thinking, after listening to you, that I should vote against the GST.

Senator Steuart: I hope I have convinced you. I am sure you have heard the old saying that Canada is like a big cow. The feet are in the west, the milk is in central Canada—

Senator Bonnell: And we get the other end?

Senator Steuart: That may not change, but I certainly hope that Prince Edward Island gets its fair share. The federal government has already rented thousands of square feet of top office space in Saskatchewan because there are going to be administrative needs in every province, whether or not the provinces meld. All the employment will not be concentrated in Prince Edward Island. I have a friend who is a real estate agent who said the federal government has already rented excellent, high-priced space in British Columbia. I know that space has been rented in Regina, but I do not know what has been done in Saskatoon. Unfortunately I think there are going to be new civil servants sprinkled right across Canada, and I hope Prince Edward Island gets its fair share.

Senator Bonnell: Are you talking about provincial civil servants or federal civil servants?

Senator Steuart: The federal government rented the space.

Senator Bonnell: So Grant Devine is going to create more positions for bureaucrats there as well.

Senator Steuart: I do not know. He may not even meld. He may back away.

Honourable senators, another thing that is annoying people is the money that has already been spent before this bill is passed. I will admit that the government has to make plans; it cannot pass it and then put it into effect on January 1 without preparing for it. It is interesting that the federal government is trying to seduce the people of Canada into believing what a wonderful thing this is. People from all over Canada are getting notices. I have a petition and a letter here from 666 River Street East, Prince Albert, Saskatchewan from Peter and Kitty Toews. In a letter to me she says:

> Sir:
> I think this letter—which I sent to Senator Lowell Murray today—is self-explanatory!

The letter she sent Lowell Murray reads as follows:

> Sir:
> You have forfeited the right to the use of the title "Honourable" by your actions in the Senate. The whole of your government has acted disgracefully over the past months—and you and your Conservative fellow-senators are leading this country into a complete breakdown of democracy.
> We in the West—who, as you ought to know, are more politically aware and astute than many in the rest of Canada—are appalled and disgraced by your unethical, self-seeking conduct.

I did not dictate this letter.

> Brian Mulroney is a shameful excuse as a leader! And you dare float the wishes of the people to follow his line!
> We do NOT want the GST—and now we do NOT want the Senate, in its present form—let us hope you don't finish ruining this country before we get rid of you all.

It is signed Peter and Kitty Toews. She then says:

> I think this letter—which I sent to Senator Lowell Murray today—is self-explanatory! Thank you and your fellow Liberal Senators for what you are trying to do. I can't understand why Canadians have not literally revolted against this dictatorship we have in Ottawa! They will not survive the next election, anyway.

It is signed K. Toews.

As well, she enclosed a form that she received from Revenue Canada, and I have seen them before. The title is "Notice of the Proposed Goods and Services Tax Credit". It was written to Kate Toews in Prince Albert. It goes on to say:

> The proposed GSTC legislation is currently being considered by Parliament.
> The application form for the GST Credit (T1 GSTC) submitted with your 1989 income tax return has now been processed.

She added her own note that this form was submitted without her knowledge by H & R Block on her behalf. It goes on to say:

> The calculation of your credit for the first half of 1991 is shown below.

Then there is a form from the taxation department and it says:

> If you move or change your name, please complete the notice on the back of the envelope and send it to your Taxation Centre as soon as possible.

Then it goes on to show the calculation of the GST Credit for the first half of 1991. For her basic credit they show an amount of $190. There is a credit for spouse or other supporting person with whom you resided with a figure of $190. There is an equivalent-to-married credit with a figure of zero. There is a credit for qualified children, which is $100 per child if not claimed at line 3, with a figure of zero. There is a calculation of additional credit on line 2, which is zero. She shows a net family income of $6,066. She is to subtract the base amount and "N/A" is shown there. Below it explains that N/A means "not applicable".

Then it says additional credits, 2 per cent of line 7 or $100, whichever is less, with a subtotal of $380. Then it shows a net family income of $32,768; then she is to subtract the base amount, which is $24,355. Then it shows net family income over base amount, line 10 minus line 11, with a figure of $8,413. Five per cent of line 12 is $420.65 subtotal, line 9 minus line 13 is zero, and the GST credit for the first half of 1991, which is half of line 14, is zero. The GST credit payment amount is also zero. Then there is an explanation of why she did not receive anything. It says:

> The calculation of your credit for the first half of 1991 is shown below. You are not entitled to receive GST

> Credit payments because the amount of your credit is less than $1.

She does not know why she received this document because she had no money coming and she did not expect to receive any money. She said they spent money on this useless piece of paper before the GST became law. She cannot believe the dictatorial nature of this government, and they have got to go.

I do not know how many people have run into this problem because this is the first form I have received. Some people are getting notices saying that they are going to receive $190, and I have a feeling that the government is hoping that those people who think they are going to get $190 will immediately write to the senators to ask them to support the GST.

So I will get my $190 shortly after the first year and later on I will get another $190. I think people are smarter than that. They will know that the government is going to spend all that money to process the tax and that they will have paid far more out in tax than the $190, plus in provinces where the province puts their tax on top, they will pay far more. So far I have not seen one province that intends to give back one red cent. This is another example of the waste, extravagance and attempt of the federal government to bribe other people with their own money.

First, they take away $300, skim off $110 and send them back $190. If the government thinks it is kidding anyone, it has another thought coming.

Senator Bonnell: Is it possible that some of these people will receive a $90 cheque just before the next election so that they think that they are getting a gift from the government and so that they will consider putting them back in power? For example, the government might consider giving a handout to people on welfare with four or five children. So the disabled, crippled, deformed and those unable to work will get their cheques just before the next election. It will seem like they are getting a gift from the government when, in actual fact, the government has already taken four times that out in tax. Do you think that there is a connection between the timing and the next election?

Senator Steuart: Of course there is. That is why they are sending it out now. They are trying to convince people like us to withdraw our objections and not fight them anymore. However, it will not work. If they have their way, they will send out their cheque with a little promotion in it. For example, it might be a musical cassette singing, "What a friend we have in Brian. Vote Conservative." I firmly agree with the honourable senator that this will be a political bribe. So far it is not working, but I do not know whether it will work when people start receiving their money. Of course they will pay far more than they receive. Sure, they will get a little back. I hope that the Canadian public is not fooled for one minute.

Senator Bonnell: Do you think that sending out these cheques a few days before the election contravenes the Election Act?

[Senator Steuart.]

Senator Hatfield: They only do that in P.E.I.

Senator Bonnell: Not since I left. Certainly, buying votes contravenes the Election Act.

Senator Steuart: No, but it will certainly contravene the hopes of you and me and the Liberal party. I do not think it will work.

Senator Hays: Yesterday there was a statement on television by a representative of the Institute of Research on Public Policy. He was talking about the difficulties in the Uruguay Round of the GATT negotiations and was saying that if they are not successful, the situation will be that we will have the last farmer in Saskatchewan turning out the lights before he leaves. There is an apparent willingness on the part of the government of Saskatchewan to join with the federal government, and Premier Devine has called for approximately $1 billion in special payments under the Canadian grains program. Do you think that there is some connection between the prices in agriculture and the great need of Saskatchewan for social assistance at this time? Let me tie one other thing into my question. When the federal government released information on the aggregate measures of support and calculated them into the GATT negotiations it was found that Canadian wheat is one of the highest subsidized commodities we produce, even more than the supply management commodities. Would you care to comment?

Senator Steuart: I would hate to think that the Premier of Saskatchewan is so crass that he would do that. All I can say is that, when the Meech Lake Accord started, Saskatchewan was one of the first, if not the first, of the provincial governments to pass and to agree with the accord. At the same time they were in heavy negotiations with the federal government and they succeeded in getting very large payments for farmers. The farmers were extremely happy. There was an election shortly after and the Conservative government got back in. So it looks like there was a connection. I suspect there is a connection here. "Brian giveth and Brian taketh away". So if the Saskatchewan government does not giveth a little, I am not sure that our farmers will get that much. I do not think that the federal government has that much to give.

Let me say in fairness that the federal Conservative government has given a great deal more money to western farmers than anyone else. I had thought that they got every farm vote, but they did not, and I do not think that they will this time. However, there may be some connection there, and it looks very suspicious. It is a "win win" situation for Saskatchewan, and they will lose with the voters.

Senator Lewis: Senator Steuart, you mentioned earlier the problems with the business community gearing up for this tax, and you mentioned the difficulties that the cash register companies would have, as they have not yet devised a machine to handle the tax system. Do you have any idea how long it will take to find a suitable cash register to deal with this problem? If they do not develop these cash registers, there will be chaos if the bill goes through quickly.

Senator Steuart: The last time I talked to someone in the retail business, the cash register people had thought that they would have a machine available late this fall, but they were not sure. The problem is a simple one. Cash registers have one button to punch for sales tax. There are some items in Saskatchewan that are exempt from the sales tax, such as children's clothing, food and so on. So when you have a general store selling taxable and non-taxable items they must have a cash register with a button that will calculate the tax on the taxable items. They do not have even one or two buttons that they can add to calculate the tax. I do not quite understand the problem, but the last I had heard was that they had hoped to develop something before the January 1 deadline.

The Chamber of Commerce said before our committee that they supported the tax. They then proceeded to list five characteristics that they thought a tax should contain if it wanted their support. They then proceeded to say that this tax did not have any of these characteristics, but yet they supported it. I asked them how many of their members supported this view, and they said that they had not done a survey. I went on to tell them that there were all kinds of retail merchants in Saskatchewan who were ringing bells in support of us. So I suspect that the Chamber of Commerce will be in real serious trouble around the country and will lose thousands of members, and so they should for the stand they have taken on the GST, a stand that is not supported by a majority of its members.

Senator Lewis: You said that they hoped to have these machines before the end of the year, but I believe you were referring to the development of it. How long will it take to make the actual adjustments? Will it require new cash registers, or will they modify existing ones? It is going to take some time to implement the new equipment. Where will they get the technicians necessary to go around to all the stores?

Senator Steuart: I cannot pretend to be an expert here. They may have to buy new cash registers or they may be able to adjust the present ones. I do not think it will take any great technician to run it. They are hoping that if the taxes are melded they will not have to go through these adjustments and that they will only have to push one tax charge. I cannot answer your question, but I do know that it will cost lots of money, and many businesses are worried as to whether they should spend the money, as, if we are able to defeat the tax, that money will be wasted. So things are in a state of flux right now.

Senator Bonnell: Most of the population of Canada is close to the forty-nineth parallel. Is there any fear among merchants that they will lose their businesses to businesses below the forty-nineth parallel, to the United States where there is no tax and people can buy goods tax free and come back to Canada? For example, the Province of Saskatchewan could lose millions of dollars in sales to the states on its border. Of course, this will have an effect on the country. It will influence our balance of trade.

Senator Steuart: Businesses in Saskatchewan are already losing hundreds of dollars, and I know that in B.C. they are losing hundreds of millions of dollars, in sales. If the GST goes on and prices go up, the lost business will double and triple. The people of Saskatchewan will drive as far as 150 miles south of the border and load up their cars. You can go to any border point in Canada and you will see a line-up of cars. The merchants have been raising so much cane that the customs people are now looking through everyone's trunks, because people are coming back loaded down with groceries and other goods. That is the situation now, and if this tax goes on it will get worse. It will seriously affect our balance of trade. The merchants of the little towns along the border are going broke. They are suffering and going out of business already, and things will be far worse when this tax comes in.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, the first thing I should do at this hour of the morning, five past five, is thank everyone in the chamber for being here during this great exercise in democracy. I especially want to thank the people who serve the Senate, whether they are at the Table, or, indeed, recording the proceedings.

Hon. John Buchanan: Since it is five past five, I am wondering if it is time for the honourable senator and me to get on the telephone and call a certain individual and nan and ask his advice at this time of the morning as we have done from time to time in other years?

Senator Graham: The honourable senator is referring to Chance Harbour in Pictou County, I am sure.

Senator Frith: Who is it?

Senator Graham: It is a long story between Senator Buchanan and me.

Senator Frith: An inside story.

Senator Graham: However, I do want to extend, on behalf of all senators, the appreciation of, indeed, the Canadian public to the people who serve the Senate so well.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I present a corollary to those comments. It is something that perhaps we should put on record a couple of times or more. Senator Graham has just pointed out that we should frequently express our appreciation and empathy for the hours and hours that the staff is putting in in this endeavour. I arrived here about an hour ago, and I found a letter slipped under my door. The best way I can deal with it is to simply read it. It is addressed to me, and it says:

> Dear Senator Frith:
> It is now 3:40 a.m. on Saturday, October 13, 1990 or should I say 99:40 hours on Tuesday, October 9, 1990 seeing as how it is still Tuesday in the Chamber.

> Just like most other employees of The Senate I have not seen my wife or son for the better part of a week. Without sounding like I am blowing my own horn, and I am sure that you feel the same way, the employees deserve a lot of credit for putting in the hours that we are. However, I think that our spouses and our families deserve as much or even more credit for putting up with our schedules and keeping the home fires burning. Perhaps it would be appropriate for you to mention in the Chamber the forgotten spouses and children who have had to cope with the marathon.

Yours sincerely,

Ed O'Meara
Senate Debates Office

Amen.

Senator Graham: I thank honourable Senator Frith for that intervention, and perhaps we could even extend it to include grandchildren, for those of us who have been blessed in that way.

My office was inundated today with telephone calls of support and appreciation for the efforts that were being put forward, not just by Liberal senators, but by those senators on the government benches who, indeed, have been represented here 24 hours a day. As I said earlier, I cannot think of a greater exercise in democracy where individual parliamentarians have the privilege to present petitions on behalf of individual Canadians and, most particularly, on behalf of the people I represent from my Province of Nova Scotia. Senator Sparrow correctly termed the signers of these petitions as extraordinary Canadians. I had called them, in the wee hours of the morning, "ordinary Canadians." They are extraordinary Canadians facing extraordinary times.

I come from a part of the country that can probably be categorized as one of the most disadvantaged regions of Canada. The level of cynicism in the Canadian population is miles wide and perhaps just as deep. When parliamentarians go through an exercise of this kind, I hope that in some small way we help to instill some measure of confidence in the people we have the privilege to represent.

I was struck by an article in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald dated October 10. The heading is "Demise of C.B. Agency Predicted". It reads in part:

> The federal government's plan to investigate Enterprise Cape Breton is further indication the money-losing development agency is on the way out, says the president of the Industrial Cape Breton Board of Trade.
> "The writing has been on the wall for the better part of 18 months to two years."

This is symptomatic of what is happening all over that part of eastern Nova Scotia, closures the like of which have never been experienced before, unemployment rates that are unconscionable under any circumstances.

One of the petitioners comes from Canso. As honourable senators know, Canso has been one of the hardest hit places in the whole of Atlantic Canada. When representatives of the fishermen came before the Banking Trade and Commerce Committee they said that the list of tax free items designated by the government was inadequate and would not in any way relieve their cash flow problems. They are not only concerned about compliance costs, but also about problems related to the complicated accounting system that will have to be put in place as a result of this tax. People from all over Canada have signed petitions.

Just before I got up, I looked around the chamber and I saw that every province of this country was represented at that particular time. Someone else may wish to do the calculation at this time. The people who signed the petition I have in my hand come from places like Sydney Mines.

One of the biggest problems when people write to us—and it is all tied in with the level of cynicism among people in these difficult times in our country—seems to be transport, and another one is regional disparity. The GST will impact disproportionately on regions, such as Atlantic Canada, that are located further from the major markets and sources of supply in central Canada, and will most assuredly worsen regional disparity. The trucking industry in our region is characterized by a large number of small firms, and they will face large front-end costs to establish the accounting and administrative procedures necessary to deal with the GST. Of course, those costs will have to be passed on to consumers.

The situation is further complicated by the fact that freight rail services are gradually disappearing in our region. One of the big fears that we have in my part of Nova Scotia is that the main-line route between Truro and Sydney will be eliminated. We have already suffered the loss of Via Rail, which was such a severe blow to the people living in Cape Breton who have no other means of travelling to the mainland or to other parts of the country and who relied so heavily on that service.

The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission in its submission to the Banking Trade and Commerce Committee said that the GST will create the perception that goods from the Atlantic region are more costly due to the application of the GST and create higher transportation costs than for those competitors located closer to the marketplace. They also said that there will be a negative impact on the price of goods from the Atlantic provinces in the central Canadian marketplace in those instances where the cost of the transportation is reflected in the final price of the goods to the consumer.

The Banking Trade and Commerce Committee held its hearings in every part of the country, and we heard from sincere, concerned Canadians who told us that they did not want the GST. Pollsters tell us that some 80 to 85 per cent of Canadians want us to stop the GST. I can only hope that the government will listen and that honourable senators on the government benches will use their influence over the next few days to help defeat this terrible piece of legislation.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to present some petitions this morning that are somewhat different from the ones I dealt with the other day. We have had full explanations from various senators representing different provinces and regions of the country about the effect of the GST. I have in front of me this morning petitions from some of the smaller towns and villages in southern Alberta. That is where I come from. I remember that during second reading of Bill C-62 I made a short speech about some of the problems that I could foresee for those who will be expected to do all the work, the bookkeeping, accounting and so on, to comply with the tax.

I remember saying at that time that it looked to me as if the government was about to make accounting slaves out of a very large part of the population of Canada.

I can tell you without exaggerating at all that as the committee travelled around the country, and particularly in southeastern Alberta, I stopped and talked to the various merchants—grocery, hardware, machinery, fuel dealers, and so on—about how they were preparing themselves to actually do the administrative work of complying with the provisions of Bill C-62. I can tell you, honourable senators, that it was even worse than I had previously imagined. These people, in fact, had done some work in attempting to prepare themselves, and get ready for complying with the tax on January 1, 1991. However, the deeper they got into it, and the more and more that they tried to understand what was expected of them in order to comply with the provisions of Bill C-62, the more resentful they became of a big government, the big federal government, doing this to them. Therefore, honourable senators, it is no wonder that so many people like that signed petitions.

I have several petitions here, and, by the way, I intend to write to all of these people because I think they have the right to hear from me, as they say, that I indeed presented their petition to the federal government.

We have heard some complaints about not wasting paper and doing damage to the ecology because trees are cut down in order to make newsprint and that sort of thing. However, honourable senators, these petitions are, in my opinion, vital to the ongoing health, effectiveness and efficiency of our modern democracy. I think people have the right to send petitions to us, and I have had occasion to defend that rather vigorously in the past. However, I also think they have the right to at least receive a small note, acknowledging that we received their petitions, and that we did, in fact, present them to the second chamber. So I intend to do that, and I make no apology for it.

In any event, I just wanted to say that to begin with. I must tell you that I have been to places such as Brooks, Alberta, Rolling Hills, Duchess, Bassano, and Manyberries. These communities are all in the southeast corner of Alberta, which is the area I represented as a member of the other House for most of the years between 1957, when I was first elected, and 1972—almost 15 years. Therefore, honourable senators, I know these people and I know what they are up against. I have been all over that area, to places such as Manyberries, Orion, Etzikom and Taber. All of these places are in southeastern Alberta.

Senator Comeau: You made that speech before.

Senator Olson: Let me explain to honourable senators that I made that speech before I had talked to a lot of the people there in those small towns, because I have some understanding of what a small town merchant is up against with respect to something like this. I was a small town merchant for something like nine years. I bought my father's store just at the end of the war. I think I was less than twenty years old at the time—in fact I am sure I was.

However, when I was a small town merchant, I, too, had to put up with these demands for information by both the provincial and federal governments, and the endless filling out of forms. Some of that was withdrawn shortly after the war ended. However, during that period until the war ended, the bureaucracy was a little more oppressive, and for good reason, since they needed to gather information.

I say to honourable senators in all sincerity that I feel deeply for those people in those small towns because it is not really very productive work to sit down and fill out demands for information about your business when it really did not make much money anyway. Of course, everyone knows that they have to keep a certain amount of books with respect to accounts receivable and accounts payable, and for income tax purposes relating to the deductions that you can take and that sort of thing. However, I used to get forms from the Workmen's Compensation Board. That board wanted to know everything about me, even though I did not have any employees that were covered by that board. That, by the way, was a provincial government agency. In any event, the point I am making is that such a merchant must sit for hours every week, just complying with demands on his time by the various levels of government.

Now, honourable senators, it will get worse. We are about to move into another phase and there is nothing, absolutely nothing now that comes anywhere close to the time required to comply with this tax under any government law that I know of that exists today. Merchants will have to keep track of all the sales of goods and services that they make, then remit seven per cent on those goods and services. I am not arguing the injustice of that at the moment. Next you have to search to see if someone else has paid tax on that particular good or service previously, and if they have then you have the right to make a claim for a rebate.

Everyone says: "Well, that sounds reasonable. If some tax has been paid before, then you should at least have a chance to apply for a rebate". But do you realize, honourable senators, how much work that makes for some of these small shopkeepers? The amount of dollars involved is large enough that it cannot be ignored, so you must apply for it. That is one of the problems.

Honourable senators, when travelling with the committee we went to some places where there was a particular situation that existed. For example, in the north with respect to the tourist industry, we heard from some of the outfitters and the guides who rely very heavily on U.S. clientele or customers. They pointed out to the committee that, as far as they could understand, under this bill and the regulations on which the bureaucrats are now working, there will be all kinds of cases where the customer will be a foreigner in most cases, an American national, who comes to Canada to partake of fishing trips, hunting trips or any of the package trips that these outfitters and guides sell. That customer may, in fact, be able to claim back 100 per cent of the tax that he or she had paid in Canada.

What will then happen is that those outfitters will have to calculate the tax in all its forms, remit the 7 per cent to the federal government and then, if these foreign tourists do, in fact, make a claim to get back their 7 per cent tax, you then have both sides doing a great deal of work and, in the end, the government does not gain a cent or a dollar. What is the sense of that?

That is why, honourable senators, these people whose petitions I am presenting today are so annoyed. They are good citizens. In fact, many of the businesses of these country storekeepers are going down and down already, and the introduction of this new tax will wipe out a great many more of them.

Over the years, however, these country storekeepers have been stalwarts and, indeed, have provided a service to their communities that is just unimaginable if you have not lived in one of those small communities and know what those small merchants do for the people.

Nowadays, there are lots of banks and most people have credit cards and so on. However, I can remember the time when my father and other merchants in that area north of Medicine Hat, provided all of the credit facilities for the people who needed it in the thirties and forties. Those merchants made a tremendous contribution to the development of most of western Canada. It is probably also true for the rest of the country, but this is where I know about it.

Now these same small merchants are faced with a big government which intends to impose upon them bookkeeping and accounting to the extent that they simply cannot cope with it, or they do not intend to cope with it, since their businesses have been going down in any event. Every time the roads are improved to the big cities, these small merchants lose more customers. It is easier for the customers to jump into their cars and drive down the road for 20 or 30 minutes or an hour to the big city to shop. Now the federal government intends to inflict this tax on these same, suffering, small shopkeepers and every one of them is just worried sick.

I do not want to mention any names at this time, but I know the people who keep the store right down the road from my place. It is a service station where they sell a few groceries, and they will fix your tires. They are also bulk fuel dealers for the farmers and the oil and gas fields that are situated around the area. Therefore they do enough business to keep about four or five families going with their living expenses.

However, the business is not quite big enough and will not grow, because there are no more people coming into that part of the province or into that community. Therefore, the owners of that business cannot hire a full-time bookkeeper. The business is not quite big enough to afford that. So the wife of one of the proprietors of that business goes in and does the books for the business. She does the accounts receivable, the accounts payable and she fills out all of the forms that come for all of the things that governments want to know about their business. She told me, "It is a full-time job right now. I also have a couple of children to raise. So when this tax comes in, I just simply cannot keep up with it. I cannot do all of these books." Honourable senators, I can understand that because I have seen that woman sitting in her little office beside that store for hours and hours, doing all of these accounts.

Senator Frith: This tax will make work on top of what has already become a full-time job.

Senator Olson: It is already a full-time job. But here is the hook; that business just does not make enough money to pay another bookkeeper or another accountant to keep track of the paper. So what are they to do? Are they to make a slave out of that woman so that she has to stay there not only for hours during most of the day but into the night as well? That will be the consequence of bringing in this tax.

Just to make matters worse, the federal government will not even make that much money out of the tax in that area because farmers are zero-rated with respect to some of the items that they deal in, whether it is things that they purchase or things that they sell. However, the way that Bill C-62 is written, that particular store owner I am talking about, and thousands more like him, will have to try to comply with this tax, and I am at a loss for words to fully describe their feelings with respect to it.

Honourable senators, it does not matter whether these people are Conservatives, Liberals, or NDP. Most small-town storekeepers, as far as I know, try more or less to be neutral because they know that they have customers who belong to all of the political parties. Of course, some of them—such as myself, for example—get involved in politics. I even changed political parties once and got heavily involved in my own political affiliation. However, most of them try to stay neutral because they want to deal with and to serve people, no matter to which political party those customers belong. Now this big government, with its new tax and bureaucracy, will run these people out of business and, in my opinion, that is sad.

Therefore, honourable senators, I make a plea to my Conservative friends opposite: go out and talk to these people; ask them whether they intend to buy new computerized cash registers that can handle these calculations, or whether they intend to do the calculations by hand, in some way.

Honourable senators, that is the real world. There is no point in bureaucrats sitting here in Ottawa saying: "Business has to keep records anyway. All they have to do is add 7 per cent at the end". These are small storekeepers and shopkeepers all over Canada, but I am talking particularly of the ones in the part of Canada that I know best. I have travelled around my area and I have talked to these people, and the feeling one gets from talking to them is a feeling of despair. They know this bill passed through the House of Commons with the use of closure or time limitation, call it what you like. They also know that the committee in the House of Commons, under the chairmanship of the Honourable Mr. Blenkarn, came to Alberta and held one meeting in Edmonton. They also know that Mr. Blenkarn got annoyed with the people who showed up at that meeting. First of all, he accused them of not understanding the tax, which is not true, and then he made some other disparaging remarks about their comments with respect to the tax, simply because they did not understand it.

Honourable senators, I say to you that they understood it all right; they understood that they would get into this kind of problem, what I have called "accounting slavery". The interesting thing about it is that it was not that they did not know about the tax at that time; the fact of the matter is that the more they learned about this tax, the more they resented what they would have to do in order to comply with the provisions of Bill C-62.

That is why, honourable senators, we are receiving hundreds of petitions from so many places around the country. I hasten to add that, in case you think I promoted these petitions, I have never put out one petition; not one. These petitions have been spontaneous. I expect that some organizations have been promoting the petitions, but in my opinion this groundswell of petitions is the largest, most spontaneous attempt by the people of Canada to try and avoid what they think will be a disastrous law if it is passed.

Honourable senators, you have heard the explanations given by Senator Stewart, Senator Hays and various others this morning and for the last few days about the economic difficulties that will be exacerbated by bringing on this tax. They say that we are heading into a depression. I do not intend to make that speech again today, because I made it earlier in this session.

However, if there is one thing I like about television, vis à vis newspapers, it is the fact that you see the people right there on the screen. There is no intervening interpretation by some journalist. The Minister of Finance appeared on television and he did not apologize for having created what he calls an economic downturn. He did it deliberately: "We have to slow down the Canadian economy and deal with inflation" he said. "What is more", he said "We were right on target". In other words, what we have done to the Canadian economy to date is what we expected we had to do, and we have to do it even more because inflation, or the risk of inflation, is still too high. Therefore the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada intend to do more squeezing of the economy, and the excuse is that it will cool out inflation still further.

Honourable senators, I say to you that this is what will happen in the real world out there, where people have to comply with this new tax in order for the government to collect the revenue that it needs. It is true that everyone agrees that if we are to have the high levels of service that most Canadians are proud of with respect to education, and in particular to post-secondary education, then we need to pay taxes.

It is true that the federal government still pays approximately 50 per cent or more of educational costs across the country. They also contribute to the cost of hospital services and medical services. As we all know, there were some problems in getting some of those services started. However, nowadays, Canadians are generally highly supportive of their medicare and hospitalization services that are now available all across the country, and they understand that those things have to be paid for.

Canadians also understand that the debt service charges that are now starting to approach $40 billion, or approximately 35 per cent of the total revenue collected by the federal government from all forms of taxation and revenue, is something that cannot go on. They understand that that debt must be paid, but they certainly do not want the government to bring in this tax which will be an administrative nightmare for so many hundreds of thousands of Canadians, simply so that the government can collect the revenue.

Honourable senators, we know there are other ways of levying tax, and I do not intend to go into them right now. During the course of our travels across the country, many people explained their theories or gave their views on some of the alternatives that could be considered.

I have spent two terms in the cabinet of this country, for a total of almost ten years and during my terms of service I had a great deal of help—and good help—while I was the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Economic Expansion and so on. When a department puts together a bill or a law, a great deal of help and expertise is needed, and good help is generally available from both sides of the question.

When a minister is putting forward a bill, he must show the advantages of that new law, or of the amendments to the old law that he wishes to make. At the same time, he must look at the other side of the ledger.

Therefore, honourable senators, this simple petition that says:

> We humbly pray and call on Parliament to reject the proposed Goods and Services Tax.

That says it all, and it says it properly. If the public are saying they do not want that kind of tax or that kind of economic or accounting slavery, then the minister should hand that bill back to the Department of Finance. They have thousands of people down there who are equipped with an econometric model of Canada. They can work out another way of imposing this tax.

The problem, honourable senators, is that now the government seems to be immune to public opinion—and that is why people are so desperate and are signing these petitions in the thousands. They do not seem to care about public opinion. I do not know whether they think they can bulldoze this tax through and then hope to get it running smoothly in time for the next election, which is two and a half years or so away. I can predict that we will get into a chaotic situation right after January 1, 1991, if this Bill C-62 is passed, because the bureaucrats will try to enforce it and collect the money. I say this because of what is contained in the bill and in the regulations that they have yet to write which will enforce the law so that it has some semblance of uniformity across the country with respect to the methods and the regulations used to collect it.

Honourable senators, I do not want to spend a great deal more time today on the reasons why we have so many of these petitions, but I think it is useful for us to mention them to the members opposite who have some influence with the government. This is one of the few times in the history of the Senate when we have come to the point where there is a very critical role that the Senate can play, or that some senators can play. As Senator Davey Steuart mentioned, you can make a difference.

Honourable senators, I have personally been to a great many caucus meetings and there are human beings in our caucus as well as in your caucus, so I suppose the situations are approximately the same. I am sure that some of you have at least mentioned in caucus: "In the part of Canada I come from, there is a certain amount of resistance to this proposal," and so on. I know that the ministers of the government must form a solid phalanx and stay solid, or else.

However, I would make a plea to the senators opposite on behalf of the people who are caught in this vicegrip to make some further effort and to try to persuade your government to back away from this tax. You have heard the arguments that it is the wrong time because the country is entering an economic slowdown. I think it was Senator Simard who was trying to make the argument with Senator Kirby that if there were a different set of economic circumstances, would the GST then be acceptable. I say to Senator Simard and to other honourable senators on the other side that this tax will never be acceptable to me because it is a far too complicated way of collecting the revenue that the federal government needs. There are alternatives. I say to the senators opposite, if your government puts in this tax, just think of the tribulations that you will cause in the Canadian economy and within the financial structure. You intend to take away a whole structure that has been collecting somewhere between $18 billion and $20 billion—by that, I mean the manufacturers' sales tax. If you take that away and just set that aside, cancel it, repeal it or whatever and then go through all this difficulty to set up this new goods and services tax with all the problems that are involved, I say to you that that would be a traumatic experience for any country.

Senator Comeau: What about the benefits?

Senator Olson: I cannot think of very many benefits—

Senator Comeau: What about the 60,000 new jobs that this tax will create?

Senator Olson: You talk about 60,000 new jobs, senator. Those are the 60,000 new jobs to do the accounting for this tax? Is that what you are talking about? Let me tell you, the people of Canada do not want that. They do not want those jobs. I heard Senator Bonnell say that he would like to have a few jobs at Summerside now because they have lost the only military base that was in their province, and I can understand that, too.

However, senator, creating jobs to do the accounting for this tax is like taking in each other's washing; there will be no economic benefit arising from it. You can exchange a lot of other things such as that, but it does not do the country any good. Even given that the tax will create 60,000 new jobs, in my opinion it is not a good thing to have 800,000 people working away into the night to keep the books and do the accounting in order to create those jobs, and that is what is coming.

Senator Frith: With no extra pay, let me add.

Senator Olson: No, not at all. No extra pay. Just send it in. The poor little shopkeeper has to pay someone to do the work, or sit up half the night doing it himself.

Therefore, honourable senators, I know that just a very few senators could make a difference at this stage. We could ask ourselves why is it that all of these petitions and all of this fuss is coming to the Senate? The Senate is the last place it should come to. The answer is that these people have been trying to persuade the government that this is a law with which they do not wish to comply.

There is just one other point I was about to make a few moments ago when I was interrupted by the senator with the question about the 60,000 jobs. That point was that once this tax is put in place, it will be impossible to get rid of, because it is a very turbulent thing to discontinue what is involved in setting up a new tax. I would say to this government that you do not do that sort of thing with impunity. I remember something that happened approximately 21 years ago now. It was when the government of the day—and I was part of it—decided that they would do something involving the Carter Report on Taxation. That is, Ken Carter's Report.

An Hon. Senator: Gentle Ken!

Senator Olson: Yes. So we did; we studied that report—and by the way, that report had been around for several years before any government got to the point of deciding whether they intended to do anything with it.

• (0600)

There were problems with the taxation system then, but it is much worse now. They said it was too complex, too involved, too many exemptions; too much of all kinds of things that come out when you have a patchwork.

When Ken Carter's report came out, there was one fairly simple message in it: A buck is a buck is a buck. You tax that buck uniformally, no matter whether you made it with the sweat of your brow working in the ditches or whether you made it in the stock market. A buck is a buck is a buck, and tax it fairly and accordingly. There were to be hearings to hear from the business community and others to ascertain what they thought about the new proposals. However, we backed off because there was so much uncertainty as to what the next set of rules was going to be. We never quite got to finishing, even though it had been going on for several years.

The present Minister of Finance probably was sincere when he said in 1984 that he, too, was going to reform the tax system in Canada. He started with income tax and corporation tax. All the problems that had built up over the years became this patchwork.

Somehow he lost sight of what he set out to do, and that was to simplify compliance with the taxation system in Canada. I suspect what happened was that some of the people who have big money, who could afford to protect their interest, got to him, so he backed off in certain areas. The consequence was that there was no improvement in the complexity of the Canadian government's taxation system. In fact, it got worse.

I am not an accountant, and I am not a very good bookkeeper. I used to fill out my own income tax form, even when I had to account for a small business. I cannot do it any more. In fact, when I take it to the accountant, he runs it through his computer and works out the capital cost allowance and various other things. I do not understand it even after he has done it. I am not alone. I know many people with small businesses—whether small farming businesses or others—who do not fully understand how these calculations are made. I make a plea to the senators who I know could make a difference.

Senator Steuart: Honourable Senator, may I ask a question?

Senator Olson: Certainly.

Senator Steuart: Whatever happened to Ben Benson, and do you think the same thing will happen to Michael Wilson?

Senator Olson: I am not sure that I can answer that question. I have not heard what happened to Mr. Benson. I know he got frustrated with some of the problems he was trying to solve and he left the service of the government some time later. I suppose that ministers of finance who try this kind of thing take a big risk. It is not only the GST that is going to haunt the present Minister of Finance for a long time. Yesterday morning on television Mr. Wilson admitted that he deliberately set out to cool off our economy. He did it with ridiculously high interest rates. He mentioned John Crow, the Governor of the Bank of Canada. They decided that this was the appropriate way to deal with trying to keep inflation under control.

I know many people in western Canada, particularly Saskatchewan. I live in the southeast part of Alberta, which is more like Saskatchewan than most of Alberta. There are many people, particularly farmers but also other businessmen, who have not changed anything. Yet they were caught in these high interest rates and have been driven off their farms. High interest rates are supposed to stop people from borrowing money. I know of family farms that have been in the family for three or four generations. These farmers did not invest heavily and therefore did not take on more debt. However, they did have some debt that they were carrying. Of course, the price of grain has gone down so much, as Senators Hays and Steuart explained.

A few years ago, the interest rate to borrow money was approximately 9 per cent or 10 per cent. The prime rate is now at 13.75 per cent and was up to 14.75 per cent. If your credit is a little shaky, they add one or two per cent so it is then 15 percent or 16 per cent. It is this 50 per cent and 60 per cent increase in the debt service charges that is completely bankrupting people. It is not the fact that they borrowed any more money on the existing debt service charges. This great economic theory that this is the way to deal with inflation is no comfort to people who have been driven out of their homes and off their land. This generation will never forget what this government has done to them.

The Minister of Finance came on television and blatantly said, "I deliberately planned this for you." That is a great way for a government to act. There must be great anguish for people sitting in their farm living room watching their television—perhaps it has not yet been repossessed—watching the minister say, "Yes, I did it to you. I deliberately planned this slow down in the economy and I deliberately planned these high interest rates to break you." That must make them feel really good about their government.

But I am pleading. I am not going to get angry this morning.

Senator Frith: It is like Senator Charbonneau's ruling, which was made for our benefit and to protect our rights.

Senator Olson: That is right. In both Saskatchewan and Alberta, the banks and mortgage companies are taking over. The Farm Credit Corporation has so many farms now they do not know what to do with them, and they do not charge such high rates.

Honourable Senators, I wanted to make that plea today. The real world out there is made up of the people I have described, the people who are caught in the alleged deliberate economic conditions that the government has brought in. They are going to be caught in having to comply with the provisions of Bill-C62. It is not only the large corporations, with a bank of computers and trained personnel to run those computers, that have to comply; it is also the ordinary little shopkeepers and everyone else close to the consumers that have to comply. It is sad that the government cannot understand that.

I hope you have not talked yourself into believing that in the next two or two and a half years all this resentment of the GST is going to fade away or evaporate, because that is not going to happen. I know that those shopkeepers, if they are alive, are going to spend the rest of their lives condemning the government that did this to them. They have a lot of influence in their little towns. Senator Hatfield understands what I am saying. Those people have much influence, and they will blame the government for doing this to them.

I hope you will help us do something good for the Canadian people—that is, defeat this bill and ask the Minister of Finance to start over with something else that is more acceptable. We accept that he needs more money, but not with the kind of complicated taxation structure that is envisaged here.

I appreciate your listening to me. I am going to send out a letter acknowledging that I have delivered these petitions to the Senate. If you will help me do what these people need and want, I will not go around the country crowing that we beat the government; I will praise you for finally seeing the light. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, like those who have spoken before me, I too have literally hundreds of pages of names and addresses sent by Ontario citizens in this case, who are asking the Senate to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. My purpose is to present these petitions to the house. Some of them are embellished with extra notes. This one, for example, says: "January 1st, 1991, refuse to pay."

The petition that these citizens have signed and sent in is their firm but initial step of protest against the tax. If this tax should go through—and I certainly hope it will not go through, at least not this type of consumption tax—then the protests may get more elaborate and less gentle and law abiding than these petitions.

I see Senator Perrault with us, and I should like to ask a question about his comments earlier this morning. He said that the west coast was settled by people of British origin. Being from the west coast myself, I believe you are overlooking the important role played by the Spanish and their part in the exploration and settlement of the islands, in particular, Dionisio Galliano, after whom the island is named. In 1792, he explored the gulf islands and certainly left his ancestors on Galliano island.

Senator Perrault, do you wish to comment on your earlier remarks?

Senator Perrault: That whole period of exploration in the province of British Columbia was very interesting. The British, however, were the first ones to really put down roots. There was some Spanish exploration in the area now known as British Columbia. The Russians were very active down to San Fransisco. There are a number of Russian names along that coast, including the San Fransisco area. There is a famous hill called Russsian Hill. But for the vagaries of history, British Columbia might have been a Spanish-speaking province. The senator's observations are so relevant.

Senator Marsden: You will know, of course, that the people of Galliano Island are preparing to celebrate the 200th anniversary of Galliano's explorations. They have built two large wooden ships which are replicas of his original ships. They have been rowing around the island all summer exercising their arms for 1992, when they will be doing a full-scale re-creation of those explorations.

However, let me come back to these petitions. Many of them come, as those that I have presented this morning, from Peterborough and other similar towns in Ontario, such as Havelock, Oshawa, Warsaw and Lakefield. Among the fascinating aspects of these petitions are how many different ways you can spell Peterborough. Many of these petitioners, all of whom are opposed to the tax and are asking us to stop it, spell it P-e-t-e-r-b-o-r-o-u-g-h. However, quite a few spell it P-e-t-e-r-b-o-r-o. Others, especially those who have long street names, spell it P-t-b-o. There are quite a variety of approaches to the spelling of Peterborough. These people from Peterborough and Warsaw are particularly enthusiastic. On one sheet of paper they have managed to accumulate 60 names, using both the front and back of the sheet. There are signatures from Lakefield, Newcastle, Kent, and Durham. All of them are strongly opposed to what this tax is going to do.

I have another petition in the more usual format of 27 names per page, from different towns in Ontario. There are signatures from Young's Point and from the rural routes around Fenelon Falls, Buckhorn, Lakefield, Warsaw and Peterborough, spelled three different ways, Lindsay, and Burleigh Falls, where there are quite a few citizens who are adamantly opposed to the introduction of this tax.

I have another petition signed on both sides of the page from many of the same towns. There are names from Toronto, Peterborough, and even one from Saint John, New Brunswick. There are names from Bailieboro, Thorolds, Ontario, and many names from Peterborough. Peterborough used to be a great stronghold of Conservatism, but is rapidly becoming less so especially in protest against the imposition of what is regarded as an unfair tax. I have another petition with names from Westin, Scarborough, Lakefield, Curve Lake, Warsaw, Keene, Peterborough again; there are several names from different streets in Peterborough. There is a Howard baker from R.R. 4 in Cobourg, Ontario. There are people from Mississauga, Whitby, Oshawa, Lakefield and Bancroft, all of them anxious to ensure that this tax is not introduced into our already fairly complicated tax system.

I have another petition with names from even further afield: people from Gooderham, Coldwater, Orillia, and Toronto. The people who signed these petitions are opposed to the tax, but a petition does not allow them the opportunity to give any nuance to their opposition in the way we are able to do it here. If they were asked, many of them would think about the problem of the harmonization of indirect taxes, as was brought to the attention of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee by Professor Boadway of Queen's University. He opposes this tax not necessarily because he is opposed to a consumption tax, but because he thinks the interprovincial barriers are going to be very much exacerbated by this tax.

As many of the citizens who are protesting the introduction of the tax know, the GST is going to operate on the so-called invoice method, where the taxes are levied on the sales of firms and the credits are given for taxes paid by the firm on its purchases. Professor Boadway brought to our attention, as would many citizens if given the chance, that if you have cross-border sales the taxes will have been levied in a different jurisdiction from that in which the credits are taken. If you wanted to be consistent with the destination principle, this would imply that tax authorities would have to keep track of all cross-border transactions to ensure that proper credit is given. As everyone knows and many of these people know, the tax base and the rate structure are not common across all provinces. Furthermore, records would have to be kept of all cross-border sales. At the moment, we do not keep records of cross-border sales within Canada. That means you will have to rely on firms to self-assess in order to get back the credits that they require, having levied the tax somewhere else.

Because the provinces are allowed leeway in setting their own rates and exemptions, the problem is going to be extremely complicated. As Professor Boadway pointed out to us, this is a problem that Europe has been struggling with in trying to prepare for 1992 and harmonizing the VAT system in various countries. It is more complicated here because of the two levels of government. There are 10 jurisdictions in Canada with two levels of taxation. We are dealing with the same problem as the Europeans, which is VAT, not direct taxes.

It is these kinds of issues that are causing people to be so outraged by this tax. It is not simply what it will do to the people of Gooderham or Woodville or other small towns, whose people are on fixed income and whose standard of living will go down or who are concerned about what it will do to the cost of living if they are earning money. It is people who live close to the Quebec border or Manitoba border, and do a lot of business across the border. There will be a huge amount of paperwork for their tax credits and tax levying operations. If they do it on a self-assessed basis, of course they will be accused by their clients or customers, or perhaps by the tax department, of not doing that and they will be held in disrepute by other business people. This is a very difficult burden for them to bear.

It is these kinds of worries that are driving people out of business on the basis of this tax. There are many merchants in Toronto who have declared that they will go out of business once this tax comes into affect. One of them is a very good clothes designer where the current Minister of Employment and Immigration buys many of her clothes. They are closing down on December 31 if this tax is levied.

I have another petition here from citizens also protesting the tax who live in Peterborough, Lakefield, Belleville, Havelock, Cavin, Campbellford, Indian River,Burleigh Falls and Warsaw. They too have filled both sides of this sheet. There are 51 names on this petition. There are some rude comments added by one of the signatories from Lakefield, which I will not repeat in this chamber, but which express this man's views about the tax. This gives an indication of the extent of indignation of these citizens toward the idea of this particular form of taxation, which they regard as being so unfair.

There are pages of these. There are many people from Peterborough. I would doubt that there is a single person from Peterborough who has not signed these petitions. I have other names from Lakefield and Warsaw. They filled both sides of this sheet, so there are 57 names on this instead of half that number. We have names from Buckhorn and someone from Warsaw, Ontario, who adds under his signature that he is the business advisor for Sandford Fleming College and is strongly opposed to this tax, as well he or she might be, since the impact of this tax on educational institutions is causing great unhappiness, even though the post-secondary institutions have managed to negotiate a far better rate for themselves than the health institutions. They have 67.5 per cent. Even so, they are very unhappy. This is signed by a representative of Trent University in Peterborough. A member of the Order of Canada has signed this petition in protest against the tax.

I have another petition with 53 signatures on both sides from Peterborough, Keene, Bridgenorth, Omemee, Havelock, Indian River and Thunder Bay. There are many more names from Omemee, Warsaw and someone who says, "No home, no house, can't afford it due to GST". There are people from Cavan. I have a petition with the signatures of 53 more people who are asking the government to listen to them and not introduce this tax. It is a two-sided petition. The signatures are from towns such as Lakefield, Peterborough, Duoro, Bowmanville, Millbrook and on the other side signatures from Peterborough, Lakefield, Duoro, Keene, Bancroft, and a number of people from different addresses on Television Road in Peterborough.

All of these signatures are collected on the petition put out by the "Irate Citizens" of Peterborough. I think that we should thank that group who took the time to collect a carefully-worded petition. I understand that Eugene Forsey consulted with them on how to put together a proper petition. That group has distributed copies all over Ontario in order to collect these signatures. We have more names from Lakefield, Indian River, Oshawa, Nepean, a lot of people from Ottawa, Belleville, Millbrook, Burleigh Falls, Kingsville, Peterborough, Frazerville, which we have not had on a petition to this point, Oshawa, and more people from Television Road in Peterborough.

Honourable senators, the list goes on and on. When we are finished with this lot, more come pouring in. Here is another petition from Trenton and Belleville. All these towns, such as Brighton, are in eastern Ontario.

Honourable senators, I received one letter today that was in favour of the GST—in fact, perhaps everyone received it—from Ken Gregory from Brooks, Alberta, who strongly supports the government's proposal, and he describes why. He thinks it is going to be a wonderful thing, and he supplied a package of information with his arguments. It turns out that this package of information contains early documents from the Department of Finance before the tax was reduced to 7 per cent, which, we know from reading the Canadian Tax Foundation's most recent analysis, contains some gross errors. Senator Hays described some of them to us in his presentation earlier this evening.

One of the striking things about this man's enthusiasm and his presentation is his willingness to accept the analysis that the manufacturers' sales tax will be removed and that no tax will be charged on a whole range of things. He is technically correct. For example, he mentions residential rents, daycare, and health and dental services that will not have tax added. In most cases that is probably correct, but what he does not consider is that residential rents will be pushed up because everything that goes into those buildings will be taxed and the wages of the people who work in those buildings will rise because of wage demands, which have already taken their toll on this system. I am sure honourable senators have read the articles about the layoffs at Air Canada. We had testimony that indicated that daycare for infants would rise on average $2 a day, which is $10 a week per child for the average family.

There will certainly be an effect of the imposition of the tax that will flow through the system.

With respect to health and dental services, anyone who thinks that they are not going to be affected has not visited their doctor or dentist recently. As soon as you are not in a position to talk, they give you a good lecture about the horrors of this tax and what it will do to their costs of running dental or medical offices and how it must be stopped. One of the greatest sources of opposition to this tax comes from doctors, dentists and other health care professionals, who are going to have to bear the cost of this tax but who cannot collect it at the other end because they are on hospital insurance programs, which are not planned to reflect the impact of this tax.

I appreciated hearing from Mr. Gregory. This is the only letter I have received in favour of the tax, in comparison with hundreds of letters and thousands of petitions opposing it. I was looking forward to reading his arguments, and I must say that they are very disappointing. He is using old data that has been questioned and contradicted. He talks about revenue neutrality, which even the government no longer argues in favour of. I am sorry Mr. Gregory is so enthusiastic. Perhaps there are senators from Alberta who know him and would like to have a word with him about his province. I have written back to him. I do not think his enthusiasm is well founded.

I have a few more petitions to present before someone else takes the floor. The next petition contains signatures from people in Fenelon Falls, Peterborough, Lakefield, Woodview, Warsaw, Toronto, Frankford, Trenton and several people from Windsor. I have another petition containing the signatures of people largely from Trenton or Batawa. We have more names from Carrying Place and Belleville. Finally, I will read one more petition before I yield the floor, although I have many more waiting to be presented, containing the signatures of a lot of people from CFB Trenton, Codrington, Batawa, more from Trenton and Frankford, Ontario.

All of these people are determined that this tax should not come into effect because they know, as all of us know—and I am sure the government knows, if it would only be willing to listen to the people's views—there must be far better ways of fairer tax reform than we are being presented with here. We have talked about alternatives, and we will talk about them more; but, for the sake of all these people and these petitions that I am now going to present, I hope that their expectations will be met and the government will withdraw this tax and continue to work on this problem.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions from the Province of British Columbia. I presented some petitions yesterday, and I have additional ones this morning. I can understand why there is a concern in the province of British Columbia. It may be best expressed by the position taken by one of the members of the legislature in the province of British Columbia who introduced the motion:

> Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia is absolutely and unequivocally opposed to the proposed federal goods and services tax and urges the government of Canada to immediately withdraw the GST legislation in the interest of all Canadians.

This resolution is unusual for the province of British Columbia, which has a rich tradition of colourful democracy. It has been the cockpit of disputation on many occasions. I was a member of the B.C. legislature for nine years. The resolution which I have just read marked on of those rare occasions in British Columbia when the NDP actually supported a Social Credit resolution, and where the Reform Party supported both of them, along with the Liberals and most of the Conservatives.

The degree of opposition to the GST in British Columbia is indicated by the fact that for the first time since Confederation all of the parties, without exception, voted to support a resolution attacking the GST. I do not think that these provincial protestations should be ignored. We have been petitioned by all of the parties in the province of British Columbia to bring their concerns to this chamber. The principle petition that I laid before the house this morning is a petition from the province of British Columbia representing all of the political parties. They endorse the Senate's action. They support what the Senate opposition is trying to do and, in effect, are saying that the opposition in the Senate is doing the right thing and is acting for the west.

I think we have to understand one of the reasons the Senate was established in the first place. It was to make sure that regional concerns were brought to the attention of those who served in Ottawa and to the governments empowered to govern. This is not a trivial responsibility. This is a grave responsibility. Some of us in the Senate from British Columbia are attempting to represent our region as effectively as possible. Certain other senators are doing the same for their areas.

I want to ask the other senators, particularly those who were just appointed, if they really believe that the attitudes they support and have adopted authentically represent the regions they are supposed to represent in this chamber. I have no doubt about the support I enjoy in British Columbia because of the position I have taken. I know that Senator Hays feels exactly the same way about Alberta, along with the rest of the opposition senators from the west. They represent authentically their regions. They want their representatives to reinforce those regional attitudes here. We who oppose the GST are speaking accurately of the sentiments of the people of our regions. I wonder if all senators in this place are doing that.

In any case, the Legislature of British Columbia, which has despatched this message to me to be placed before the Senate—and I am pleased to put it on the record of the Senate, honourable senators—explains why so many British Columbians are signing petitions opposed to the GST. I will now proceed to table the B.C. legislative views.

In her remarks in support of here all-party resolution, Mrs. Grace McCarthy, former Deputy Premier of British Columbia, said:

> I want to begin my comments on this motion by saying that there are many ways that this question can be resolved in Ottawa. One would be for the House to turn it down and, of course, that has not happened. The other would be when it goes to the Senate, to have the Senate turn it down.

So here we have the legislators of British Columbia saying that the Senate should reject the GST. They have asked us, as British Columbia's Senate representatives, to turn it down. We have been asked to turn it down, not just by the governing Social Creditors but by the Liberal Party, the Reform Party, and most of the Tories. Again the question arises whether or not we are speaking for our people. Yes, we are speaking for our people. Senator Hatfield, I do not know whether or not you are speaking for your people because we have not heard you speak yet, but presumably, when the time comes, you will speak for the views of the people of the province of New Brunswick.

Then the B.C. petition, which we wree asked to brin here in the form of a resolution, says that the alternative would be to have the Senate turn down the GST. Mrs. McCarthy, during her presentation to the B.C. Legislature, said:

> This debate is important because it says to the Canadian public and to our fellow British Columbians that we in this house are wishing to have our clear comments made on the GST, which has been presented by the federal administration as probably the most unfair and burdensome tax to be put before the Canadian people since income tax was brought in in 1917.

That is the view of the parties in my province, and I convey that message to you more in sorrow than in anger. There seems to be very little appreciation of the concerns of the third largest province in Canada. The people of British Columbia are appealing to this chamber to understand the reasons for their concern.

Then Mrs. McCarthy goes on to say:

> I'm sure there aren't many who would not agree that this tax is going to place an unfair burden on the consumers across the nation . . .

I say to that "Amen". This is a burden that was formerly carried by a section of the manufacturing community. it is a tax transfer to the consumers across the country. That was indicated in evidence presented to us in the hearings we had across Canada during a long, hot summer when we heard presentations by various groups.

It is a demonstrable fact that what we are seeing here is a transfer of the tax burden mostly from the manufacturing sector in Canada to the consumers, a secotr that is already overburdened with taxes. We are now going to load still more taxes on the middle income groups, the lower-middle income groups and the low income groups in Canada. The people I represent in British Columbia resent it, as do the people in these petitions I have brought here this morning.

Mrs. McCarthy said:

> British Columbians have paid their way. We have paid our way in Confederation. We have given our fair share, and sometimes we think we've given more than our fair share.

The Province of British Columbia is a net contributor to Confederation and has been pleased to be a net contributor, grateful for the resources that exist on the west coast and grateful to God that we have been able to give more back to Confederation than Confederation has given us in economic benefits. We are pleased to find ourself in that position. I will continue with the position of the British Columbia Legislative Assembly:

> British Columbia has kept its fiscal house in order. No other jurisdiction in Canada has been able to match our record of growth while controlling expenditures. Therefore it's particularly galling to have the free-willing, free-wheeling federal administration—both this government and preceding federal governments—with their insatiable appetite for more money, more expenditures, telling us that they need even more money through taxation, through the GST. One has to wonder. Do they need more money for paintings for the National Gallery?

I read an article in the newspaper today and it is depressing. We are in a position of having to borrow money for our foreign aid programs. A few months ago we bought some new rolling stock for an emerging nation in Africa, and I am sure that this country needed help of some kind, but the article stated that we are purchasing close to $200 million worht of modern rolling stock and other railway equipment of a kind and quality that we have never seen in Western Canada. I presume that we borrowed this money to provide this aid as part of our foreign aid package.

Honourable senators, the most modern railway rolling stock in the west is vintage 1958—repaired, patched again and again and improved. As a nation, how can we afford to buy state-of-the-art, 1990 rolling stock and donate it to some country in Africa when we have not been able to provide rolling stock for our own railways in western Canada? That causes resentment.

Senator Bonnell: We cannot even afford the train.

Senator Perrault: I made reference to rolling stock that still operates on western tracks on occasion.

Senator Bonnell: We don't even have a track any more.

Senator Perrault: The government is off the track. I read an article in the Ottawa Citizen dated Wednesday, October 10. The headline says "Africa's Ceausescu, A human-rights report reveals Malawi's President Banda, long viewed as a comic-opera eccentric, to be one of the world's most brutal rulers". Let me read you part of this:

> To the outside world, the tiny nation of Malawi appears a harmless-comic-opera state. In reality it is one of the most repressive totalitarian tyrannies in Africa and few despots have been as successful as President-for-Life—

Thank the Lord we have not reached that stage in Canada yet!

> Kamuzu Hastings Banda is camouflaging authoritarianism under a blanket of eccentricity, according to the independent human-rights organization Africa Watch in a recent and thorough 116-page report.

Incidentally, the article is by Jonathan Manthorpe of Southam News, page A2, Ottawa Citizen of October 10. I am quoting:

> Malawi is proof that repression can work, says the report, as it places the little southern African country of eight million people in the same league as the Romania of the Ceausescus and the North Korea of Kim Il Sung. But Malawi, snuggled up on the western and southern shores of the lake from which it takes its name, has managed to avoid serious international scrutiny of its human-rights record since Banda came to dominate its government in the mid-1960s. It has done this, says Africa Watch, by staunchly supporting the West and appearing to be a stable, if somewhat daffy, backwater.

Here in Canada we borrow as though there is no tomorrow. There are some good causes, including some in countries which the government says are in need. but Canadians are in need themselves. I have never been opposed to foreign aid. I have always been an internationalist, but I wonder if we should not question some of the grants we have been shovelling out in every direction.

The article continues:

> In consequence, the country receives about $280 million US yearly in development aid, with the Canadian International Development Agency having contributed $25.96 million in 1988-89.

Yet it is described as one of the most brutal, restrictive countries in the world. Is it unfair to ask why we are shipping so much money to allegedly brutal dictatorships of that kind? Surely this adds unnecessarily to the deficit of the government. Do we have the courage to review all these spending programs, be they domestic or international? Why should the ordinary Canadian taxpayer, who has difficulty filling in his or her income tax form and finding the money to send to Revenue Canada, be asked to contribute to dubious programs, domestic or international? There was a story a few weeks ago about another oppressive state that we have been shovelling money to. I believe in that case $200 million went to them last year.

Senator Bonnell: With our own people starving!

Senator Perrault: With our own people starving and with line-ups at food banks that you would not believe. British Columbia is supposedly one of the richer provinces.

● (0700)

I promise you, I will take you down and show you the line-ups of men and women who are unemployed, line-ups that occur three times a day in the hope of getting a sandwich from the Salvation Army, the Fransiscan Sisters, the United Church, the Anglican Church and other organizations that are doing their very best to help people.

Senator Bonnell: Senator Sparrow is helping out in Saskatchewan, too.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: That is correct. Senator Sparrow has done so much to help the dispossessed and the hungry in his Province of Saskatchewan, and many other senators are engaged in good work.

People are signing these petitions because there is a discontent in the land, a feeling by people that other people are wasting their money. When the government talks so loosely and says, "Let us give this cause $30 million", I wonder if they ever sit down and consider what is involved for people to fill out enough income tax forms to raise $30 million for these causes, some of them of a dubious nature.

Senator Bonnell: Is there much unemployment in British Columbia?

Senator Perrault: The unemployment rate is very high. Job losses in my province are disturbingly high. There is the conclusion—and I hope that we can have a debate on it here soon—that the Free Trade Agreement has been a disaster for the working people of Canada. We are told that it is too soon to estimate whether the Free Trade Agreement is good or bad, but I think it can be said that the preliminary reports are extremely disturbing-160,000 industrial jobs lost so far, companies relocating and establishing themselves south of the border.

Senator Bonnell: Do people in British Columbia go south of the border to buy goods?

Senator Perrault: I am glad the Honourable senator has raised that question. In fact, I saw a news report this morning in which it is estimated that $1 billion in retail purchases is being lost to the United States each year as a result of what many people consider to be excessively high prices in Canada. People who go across the line to make grocery purchases and other purchases should be reminded that this does not help pay the medical and hospital bills in Canada, that you cannot play both sides of the fence and come out a winner. I do not think it is good "Canadianism" to skip across the line to save a few cents and not support our own merchants.

Senator Bonnell: Do you think some of the economy will go underground?

Senator Perrault: That is one of the concerns that we all have, that the underground economy will be the result of all this. A dentist will say to a plumber, "If you put my bathroom in, I will fix your molars." That is the inevitable result.

All of those who have been in politics for any length of time know that a good tax law should be economical to collect, uncomplicated and have public acceptance.

Senator Bonnell: It should be fair.

Senator Perrault: Yes, it should be fair. The GST is not perceived to be fair, it is expensive to collect and it is complicated. That is why people will go to the trouble of signing petitions, to indicate that the GST has so little support across the country. I have coded these petitions. I have with me Petition A which I want to table this morning.

Senator Bonnell: Do you think that any of these petitioners realize that they will pay more tax in British Columbia than they do in Ontario because of transportation costs?

Senator Perrault: I thank the Honourable Senator for raising that point. I know that Prince Edward Island is suffering the same problem. We sometimes ask ourselves, "Why is there alienation in Canada?" There are all sorts of reasons. We have our friendly rivalry in football and other sports, but there is a growing sharp edge of antipathy in certain regions of Canada toward central Canada. It is unfortunate that that is the case, but there are reasons for it.

The petition that I have here is signed by the people of Richmond, British Columbia. It used to be one of the greatest farming districts in Canada. It is still a wonderful place. The Vancouver Airport is in Richmond.

Senator Bonnell: Is that fruit country?

Senator Perrault: They can grow some good Gravenstein apples there. They are not the top apple but they are good for cooking. They are not good for export to areas that like fancy apples. You can grow almost anything in Richmond. Some of the people are from Cloverdale. We have a raceway out there. I hope that when some of you Senators come to British Columbia you will come out to the races.

Senator Bonnell: Will the people of Cloverdale have to pay a tax for betting on the races?

Senator Perrault: They will be subject to tax.

Senator Bonnell: That is probably why they signed this petition.

Senator Perrault: Everything that is moving and everything that is nailed down is subject to tax, as one chap said. Perhaps that is a bit facetious, but it is a comprehensive tax.

There are names on here of people from North Vancouver and from Delta, so most of the people come mainly from the lower mainland. The Honourable senator, and I thank him for doing so, has pointed out the effect of the GST on remote regions. As far as Toronto is concerned, Vancouver is a remote region. Vancouver is closer to the Soviet Union than to Ottawa—not philosophically, but geographically. I suggest that Senator Forrestall's region is closer to them than it is to Ottawa.

Senator Forrestall: I am glad that you pointed that out.

Senator Perrault: It is an interesting fact of life that we have in this country a geography that is different than that of some of the unitary states that have either espoused the GST or the VAT. A unitary state with only one level of government has a small land mass, and is more adapted to the levying of this kind of tax because there are fewer possibilities of injustices. A country with a land mass of the size of Canada makes it more difficult to administer the tax fairly. That is a fact of life.

I am sorry that some Honourable senators were not present at the committee hearings, because I am sure that they would have been impressed with the testimony. Goods and services in the more remote regions of Canada cost more than they do in central Canada, largely due to the added transportation costs involved in shipping materials to these regions, but also due to a lesser degree of competition and higher mark-ups. The FST is imposed at the trade level prior to these transportation charges and local mark-ups. The GST is imposed on the retail value of the sales. So someone living in the north, the Maritimes and so on will experience an even more negative effect on their purchases, in comparison with those in Toronto and Montreal, and I am not even thinking of the escalation costs of gasoline and oil which will only accenuate the problem. I cannot understand why the federal government would insist on this proposal, because witness after witness has said that it is not fair to pay more tax just because they do not live in Toronto.

Senator Bonnell: Would you say that it will make the poorer provinces poorer?

Senator Perrault: The poorer provinces will become poorer. With your usual insight, you have hit the nail on the head.

As a consequence of stage two of tax reform residents of remote regions will pay more consumption tax than residents of central Canada for the same goods and services. That is simply not fair. These residents will also pay more tax under the GST than they did under the FST. Is this tax reform? In the propaganda sheet that I quoted extensively the other day—and I will not haul it out this morning—the government said that its goal was to establish a progressive and more just taxation system. Northerners, westerners and easterners believe, beyond question, that this taxation system is unfair and more regressive than the present FST. So why do we not do something about it?

It means that residents of these regions will pay more tax under the GST than they did under the FST. Numerous witnesses from these regions took this position in testimony before the committee. You could say that there is a credit system, and that credit system will offset any injustices. The GST credits are part of a package designed to ensure that families with incomes below $30,000 benefit from tax reform. However, a $24,000 income in Yellowknife or Iqaluit does not imply the same standard of living as it does in Ottawa. Thus a family in central Canada with this income is entitled to full GST credits—and this is a basic injustice— whereas a family in the North with the same standard of living will not receive full benefits because its nominal income has to be higher to offset the higher cost of living.

This violates the principle of horizontal equity. No one has argued against that. And indication of these higher nominal incomes is contained in the 1966 census which showed that 60.4 percent of northern families had an income in excess of $30,000, while only 48.6 percent of southern Canada families had such an income. Are we prepared to vote for that proposal? No wonder we have people signing petitions. They recognize the basic injustice here. It is not right and it should be corrected. It should not be a matter of political debate as to whether this change should be made. We should not even be wasting time on it, we should say, "Ok, the point has been made that the people in remote areas of Canada will not be dealt with fairly, so let's change it."

The Committee was informed by the Government of the Northwest Territories—and I was at the hearing, I was a member of the Committee that spent much of the summer looking at these complaints—that the cost of living in Yellowknife is 33 percent higher than in southern Canada.

When housing is taken into account the difference increases to forty percent. Yellowknife has a low cost of living compared to other Northwest Territory communities. Similarily the Yukon government informed of the Committee that Whitehorse is of the least expensive place to live in the Yukon, that most other communities have a cost of living that is ten percent higher in some communities is as much as sixty percent higher. Is it the government is really suggesting that because someone lives in the far north they should have to pay a severe economic penalty for that right? Are we trying to encourage everyone to move to Toronto? That is the suggestion of the GST legislation.

Surely this is the time to encourage young people and people who come to Canada to settle in our different regions. If the GST as written is a disincentive, why do we not get rid of it? Again, this view is not inspired by partisan politics; there are defective sections in the proposal. Higher prices mean more GST paid. In fact, the average Whitehorse family is expected to pay $400 more in GST then the average Canadian family. With the increase in fuel costs, that figure will be substantially higher. The Americans like talking about a level playing field. Let us create a level playing field domestically and make sure that just because they have to bring in a stove from Brantford, Ontario, you will not have to pay the world because you happen to live in Newfoundland, British Columbia, the Yukon Territory, or the Northwest Territories.

Senator Bonnell: Some people in my province tell me that no longer will they be able to pay a quarter at the automatic laundry machines, that with the GST they will have to pay $.50.

Senator Perrault: I understand they have to change the coin mechanisms and that these changes will result in an increase that is higher than sever percent.

I know that some of you are interested in sports. The government, quite properly, has been encouraging a more volunteerism in sports by saying, "don't come to us for grants because the taxpayer is already over burdened with the various charges." This is another anomaly, which is noted by some of these people from Chetwynd, and other communities which are actively involved in sport development. Hundreds have signed petitions. Many of the people who signed the petition are in amateur sports. The report says at page 1325:

> "Bill C-62 creates two classes of volunteer sports and recreation associations: those eligible for a fifty percent rebate of GST payed on inputs and those ineligible for such rebates. Registered charities including Canadian Amateur Athletic Association, are automatically eligible for the rebate. Non profit organizations must receive more than forty percent of their funding from governments to qualify".

[Senator Perrault.]

Unless an organization gets more than forty percent of other funding from an amateur sport group, you do not qualify for the rebate. It seems to me that it should be the other way around. If you have the initiative to have a fund raising drive and you have your youngesters out selling chocolate bars and all sorts of other things in an attempt to self support your organization, you should be encouraged. This does not appear to be consistent with the Conservative philosophy of free enterprise rugged individualism. The report goes on:

> The federal government has been encouraging sporting organizations to become less dependant upon government and they have taken this encouragement to heart. Since 1986, the aggregate level of government funding for national sport organizations has declined from seventy-eight percent to about fifty-six percent. At the same time, the government is penalizing them for doing so through the application of the GST.

Is that is progress? While communities from Newfoundland to British Columbia and the north are saying, "we want to develop facilities for our young people so let us raise the money", the government seems to be saying "that is a mistake and we are going to penalize you." The government is actually penalizing these organizations through the application of the GST.

That may have been another one of these "oversights". There are so many weaknesses here that could have been corrected to make this measure more palatable to the Canadian people. Serious concerns were expressed by the Churches, which do a pretty good job in trying to alleviate the social misery in Canada. They have said that the rebate system has certain merits but that the practical application is something else again. For example, many of our transients are illiterate and cannot even fill out forms. Some of them do not live long enough at one address to even get the rebates. Many senior citizens are in such a poor condition that they cannot even write cheques. In other words, the paper work entailed in applying for the rebates simply cannot be done by thousands. That is another problem we should try to solve. What is to be done in this area? The government dismisses the warnings.

Possible taxation on wreaths for Remembrance Day constitute another one of these vexatious problems for veterans. The government should have provided assurances weeks ago that the tax would not apply on wreaths. The Saint John's Newfoundland and Labrador command of the Royal Canadian Legion were among the first to raise the possibility that poppies and wreathes would be subject to the GST. The poppies and wreathes are manufactured by Vetcraft, a shelter workshop run by Veterans Affairs which sells them to the Royal Canadian Legion Dominion Command. From there they are sold to provincial Commands which in turn sell them to local branches for a nominal profit that is used to help veterans and veterans widows. According to the testimony from the Legion, the local branch may be subject to the GST on their purchases of poppies and wreaths.

I took the trouble to call the Royal Canadian Legion last week. I said, "I am sure that by now the government has fixed up what appears to be an anomaly in the GST plan." On the contrary, I was advised that nothing has yet been done and that the government was trying to negotiate an arrangement that would see at least partial taxation of the wreaths. Apparently, no assurances have been received that wreaths that go on cenotaphs on Remembrance Day to honour the war dead will be exempt from taxation. To be fair, I do not think that the Conservative senators espouse a philosophy that there should be a tax on these items. If so, they should join with those of us in the Liberal ranks and contact the bureaucrats who brought the idea into this bill.

Senator Bonnell: In my province the war Vets who are amputees make little number plates for key chains. Will they be taxed as well?

Senator Perrault: There is that possibility. Let me read you a portion of the report found at page 1323:

> On inspection of the legislation, is appears that poppies would not be taxable since it can be argued that they are not sold but are enchanged for a charitable donation. Furthermore, the consideration involved is usually less than $5 and Section 4, Part VI of Schedule V of the legislation provides that fundraising sales by volunteers of goods costing no more than $5 will be exempt from the GST. Wreaths, on the other hand, are sold for more than $5 and may not qualify for an exemption.

So that item may be exempt, but the point is that it has been impossible to obtain a ruling from the government officials as to whether poppies, either singly or when applied to a wreath, will be a subject to taxation. This is not the kind of thing on which we should have a major debate, because I do not think that anyone in their right mind would support the idea of taxing memorial wreaths for November 11th cenotaph observances. That is ridiculous.

Petition B is from Chetwynd, British Columbia.

Senator Bonnell: Since the honourable senator is interested in sports, someone in my area told me that those who register for, say, hockey school and are over fourteen years of age must pay the sales tax.

Senator Perrault: That is correct. The whole thrust of the GST policy will be to discourage the participation of young people in sport. The equipment for some sports is a very expensive. The age limit of over fourteen has been established, and I cannot understand that arbitrary age limit.

Senator Bonnell: What happens to the child who has just become fourteen?

Senator Perrault: That is a question the Committee asked itself. The technical paper proposes that the GST apply to fees charged for kids over the age of fourteen, whereas the bill now proposes to tax on the basis of the age group for which a program is designed. Virtually all representatives thought the age level was too low. I am sure that most amateur sports organizations will take the same position. Teenagers are not adults. If the worthiness to society of such programs is a major factor in determining exemptions from the tax, an age limit of eighteen years makes much more sense according to witnesses.

Mr. John McGrath of Sport Newfoundland and Labrador referred to the advantages of amateur sport in offsetting undesirable peer pressure and in teaching social values. To that I say Amen. As the Minister of Sport I was absolutely overwhelmed with the beneficial effect of sports in communities across the country which resulted in a net savings to other programs as a result of the constructive influence on the young. The Newfoundland sports people felt that these functions were particularly important for youth age fifteen to eighteen years and has suggested that the age limit be raised. That is what the Committee recommends. Sports organizations have convinced us that the age limit is unrealistic.

Senator Bonnell: What about the municipalities? I understand that Edmonton will have to pay $20 million more because of the GST.

Senator Perrault: That is correct; $20 million is the estimated figure. I do not know the accuracy of that figure, but it was not challenged by any government representatives at the meeting. GST is regarded by many of the western provinces, and I am certain by many others, as a way to extract more tax money out of tax payers' pockets, and put it on shoulders of the middle income groups and lower middle income groups who have already had thirty-three tax increases under the Conservatives since 1984.

Is it not strange?. The government has condemned the manufacturers' sales tax as being wrong and iniquitous. I think Liberals see its deficiencies as well. Yet how can Tories possibly condemn a tax that has been increased by the Conservatives from 9 percent to 13.5 percent in the past six years?

Chetwynd, British Columbia is going through a very difficult time, and a proportionately large number of the petitions have come from there. Chetwynd is in the Pine River Valley in the northeast corner of British Columbia. It is 310 kilometres north of Prince George at the junctions of Highways 27 and 29. It is an exciting place because it was built almost out of the wilderness. We in British Columbia are very proud of that part of our Province. It is named after a cabinet minister who served in the B.C. Government in the 1950s, Ralph Chetwynd, who was a B.C. pioneer and the Minister of Railways in the Social Credit Government. There was little development in the region until after World War II with the extension of highways and B.C. Rail. Chetwynd has become a service centre for forestry, oil and gas fields and the northeastern coal fields. Two sawmills are the major employers in the community. Chetwynd was incorporated as a village in 1962, but changed its status to a district municipality in 1983.

Now, however, this community is in real danger because of the following factors: first of all, the difficult coal situation. As honourable senators will know, there has been a cut-back on orders from the Japanese for coal, and a demand that the price be reduced; secondly, the difficulties now being experienced in the housing market and the fact that lumber is not being shipped out of that area on the scale that it was a few years ago. So the people in that community are worried Canadians, and I am honoured to bring on their behalf a list of twenty-seven names from Chetwynd. On this list I see a name, Brian Mulroney. That name is on this petition. I wonder if the Prime Minister was visiting in Chetwynd when this petition was being circulated. Here is the name of Brian Mulroney and the place of residence is noted as "Capital Hill". I might explain to honourable senators that there could be a housing development known as Capital Hill in the Chetwynd area. I wonder whether this would be a relative of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister?

Senator Bonnell: I would not be surprised.

Senator Steuart: Perhaps he is thinking of running there next.

Senator Perrault: It is written in a style of handwriting very similar to that of the Prime Minister's. I wonder if this indicates that the Prime Minister has some uncertainties about the GST bill. Would it suggest that to you, senator?

Senator Bonnell: I would think that that was probably right.

Senator Perrault: It is marked with a star. Perhaps I might just pass it over to you for your assessment.

Senator Bonnell: It sure looks like his signature. I think that is him. He says it is marked with an asterisk.

Senator Perrault: I wonder if he knew what he was signing?

Senator Bonnell: Sure. He was trying to be on the good side of everyone, so he joined in with the people in that community.

Senator Perrault: Perhaps it is just a person with the same name, senator.

Senator Bonnell: I could not testify one way or the other.

Senator Perrault: In any event, this document will be tabled here today and if anyone would like to check out the authenticity of that signature, that will be on the table for them to do.

This petition numbered "B" is also signed by people living in Fort St. John and Dawson Creek. Perhaps with the energy crisis that is presently occuring at the moment in the world, the economy of northern British Columbia and northern Alberta may improve somewhat, even if only on a temporary basis. That may be some good news for them.

Honourable senators, I have another petition here. I will move to petition "D", since "C" seems to have disappeared. Petition "D" is from Ladner. Petition "D" is from Ladner, Richmond, Vancouver, Langley, Burnaby, Coquitlam and Surrey. This is obviously a lower mainland petition. It begins with Mr. Murray Johnston from Ladner and ends up with a Mr. R. Coccia of Vancouver. These people, in the main, will be concerned with the general employment situation on the lower mainland and some of them will be concerned about the ability to compete with American shopping centres, travel agencies and retail operations just below the line. These areas are very close to the US border and the inhabitants are very apprehensive about the effect of American competition on their businesses.

Honourable senators, this may also be true in other provinces, but in the province of British Columbia in particular, the Americans have built a massive shopping centre just south of the border, and they are also building one in Blaine, Washington, which must be approximately 28 miles from Vancouver. In Blaine, the shopping centre is being built almost entirely to divert business from Canadian retail enterprises. That, honourable senators, is very disturbing.

Honourable senators, I hope we will get into the GST debate as soon as possible, because the question that many British Columbians are asking me is this: If we are to establish a level playing field with the Americans, is it wise at this time to introduce a tax that is not being levied in the US? Does that not place us in a difficult competitive relationship with American enterprises?

Senator Bonnell: You cannot compete with the Americans.

Senator Perrault: In 1985, the then President Reagan, after long study, rejected both the GST and VAT taxes. He said that he had come to the conclusion that these were really taxes that were levied by governments who wanted to use them as taxation "milch cows" designed to yield large revenues. He said that as long as he was President of the US, he would reject anything as regressive and reactionary as a GST-style of tax.

Honourable senators, if we are to have a GST-style tax in Canada, what does that do to our ability to compete successfully in the US? We can take comfort in the fact that the manufacturers' sales tax is to be removed. However, if this new style of tax impedes other Canadian businesses in their ability to sell at the retail level, and the Americans establish these shopping centres along the Canadian border, how long can Canadian enterprises survive? I think that is a very good question, and I hope that when we get to the study of the bill, we can canvass the views of the honourable senators opposite on that point. I am aware that there may be some areas in Quebec where you have that same challenge.

Senator David: I wonder if the honourable senator would have this declaration of former President Reagan who, after a study, said these things?

Senator Perrault: I would be glad to furnish that for the honourable senator. It is a quotation which is available on the record, and I will ask that it be sent to you. Quite frankly, I do not think that President Reagan was the world's greatest tax reformer. He was not noted for his ability to construct a progressive tax system. However, his arguments in this regard should be analyzed.

With respect to Petition "C" which I have now come across, that petition comes from Langley, Richmond, Ladner, Delta, White Rock, Vancouver, Surrey, Burnaby and Abbotsford. These are all areas that are known to me. As a matter of fact—

Senator Bonnell: Senator Perrault, before you get too deep into your petition, I understand that, under the GST, when you have a funeral you have to pay this tax on a funeral. In fact, they're paying it now for next year's funerals.

What about cremation? Do you have to pay tax on a funeral if you are cremated?

Senator Perrault: Yes, senator, you have to pay tax on cremation and you have to pay tax on conventional interment.

Senator Bonnell: So they are now taxing even the dead!

Senator Perrault: The funeral directors are quite upset by this tax. They think it is unfair to burden the bereaved with a $400 Tory tax as a late departed man or woman, is being lowered into the ground. They think there is a sort of callous aspect to it.

However, I suppose it can be argued that this is another professional service, and the government people who put this measure together have obviously rejected the arguments of the funeral directors. I am trying to find that section in the report but I am unable to do so.

Senator Perrault: Yes, that is the appropriate page. The heading is: "Funeral Services"

> The Funeral Service Association of Canada told the Committee, "We believe that every Canadian has a right to a burial or a cremation according to the rites and practices of his or her religion and cultural heritage, and that Canadians find it offensive for the Government to tax those services."

Honourable senators, I do not think anyone would argue with the premise that people have the right to be buried in the way that they wish, whether they want the ashes scattered on the ocean or to be cremated. That is a deeply personal decision to be taken by the individual.

However, after studying the evidence, the committee agreed that the direct application of a sales tax to funerals is unwarranted and offensive. That, too, is something that we can discuss when we get to the debate on the bill. I do not want to take up the time of this house now to get into the details of that matter. However, I am sure that honourable senators will recall the testimony that we took on that point.

Senator David: I wonder whether or not the family of the bereaved would prefer to return to the collection of succession taxes, which was a much larger tax than this one will be.

Senator Perrault: Yes, I suppose that is one alternative.

Senator Bonnell: The Liberal government took that tax off, did they not?

Senator Perrault: Yes, that tax was removed. Does the Conservative government wish to re-establish the succession tax? Is that your question? Do you favour the re-establishment of a succession tax?

Senator David: No, I am saying I wonder whether the family of the bereaved would prefer to return to that type of tax, rather than have the GST?

Senator Perrault: Perhaps under certain conditions it might be beneficial for them, and under others it would not.

> Three days before they were due to begin collecting the GST the Ontario Funeral Service Association indicated that they were still unclear on the rules affecting the taxation of prepaid funerals. The fact that this organization was unable to obtain a consistent answer from Revenue Canada is indicative of the confusion faced by business . . .

Honourable senators, this is why some of us have agreed with John Bulloch. John Bulloch said: "With the present state of confusion, it would better if we introduced this task on July 1 rather than on January 1. It is just going to be impossible." Perhaps we should ask Mr. Bulloch for an assessment of the situation which now exists. Perhaps it has changed; perhaps improvements have been made.

Honourable senators, the next petition that I will refer to is the last one. I know other senators wish to speak, and I do not want to take up their time. I have thirty names from Petition "A"; twenty-seven names from Petition "B"; twenty-seven names from Petition "C" and—

Senator Bonnell: What about the tax on books and reading materials?

Senator Perrault: That is a distressing matter. In a year in which we have proclaimed an all-out war on illiteracy, our federal government has decided to tax books. It seems to me that that is a very counter-productive move. I do not know why honourable senators on the other side would support the idea of taxing books in the near year that we are supposed to be battling illiteracy. Perhaps the reasons escape some of us.

Senator Bonnell: What about textbooks put out for students attending university? Will they be taxed?

Senator Perrault: Certain prescribed textbooks will be tax-exempt.

Senator Bonnell: Would you know which ones they are?

Senator Perrault: It depends. Perhaps you could help us with an identification of that section?

Senator Bonnell: Try page 1460.

Senator Perrault: I am referring now to the committee's report:

> The Committee believes that the taxation of books and reading material is a step backwards in promoting literacy and would place an unnecessary burden on students who must purchase their own textbooks. First-year students at the University of Toronto, for example, must budget $700 for textbooks . . .

That is a great deal of money; much more than I had to budget for books when I was going to university.

> Evidence received from a representative of the University of Toronto Press was that professors would respond to the GST by reducing the number of textbooks on required reading lists . . .

Honourable senators, it is not a progressive step to say: "In order to save money, we will simply cut back on the texts required."

That is very disturbing. It is anti-intellectual.

> This is further evidence that education would be taxed under the GST. Finally, it is worth noting that taxing reading runs counter to the Carter Commission report, which recommended that newspapers, magazines and books should not be subject to a retail sales tax.

This will be a first for Canada, and it is quite distressing.

Honourable senators, I want to conclude with the BC petition, representing all parties in the B.C. legislature—Social Credit, NDP, Liberal, Reform and most of the Conservatives. This is what was said on behalf of the province of British Columbia by the Honourable Grace McCarthy, the former Deputy Premier and leading spokesperson for British Columbia:

> . . . when we first heard about the GST, our Premier spoke to the federal administration and told them that a better way to present a new tax regime to the people of Canada would be to do so after they cut unnecessary expenditures in the federal administration. Our Premier told the federal administration to live within their means. Mr. Speaker, can I tell you that today, since I first presented this motion to the House—

Again, the words of the Honourable Grace McCarthy:

> —we have spent $113 million just on servicing the national debt, just in interest? One hundred and thirteen million dollars has been spent today by the federal government.

Honourable senators, that is an appalling figure. That was spent in one day. I do not mean to start apportioning blame. It is Canada's problem as a whole. However, we are saying: "Let us find a better, fairer solution".

> When they first suggested the GST, the Minister of Finance—and here she is talking of the BC Minister of Finance—

> —I went to meeting after meeting in Ottawa. The Ministers of Finance met and tried to bring some sense to the federal administration, and said over and over again that this was the kind of onerous tax the Canadian people and British Columbian's could not tolerate. The record is clear that both the Premier and the Minister of Finance have given the message to an unhearing federal administration."

Mrs. McCarthy then goes on to say:

> I wonder when enough is enough. When are we going to say enough is enough to the federal government? How long will British Columbians, who have long been fiscally responsible, tolerate the kind of expenditures we have seen?
> I want to say that we are here today to try to save Ottawa from making a great mistake.

So here is one provincial government indicating that it wants to save this government from falling into egregious error.

[Senator Perrault.]

> Do you know that even Ottawa recognizes that this tax is going to be inflationary? Even the federal Minister of Finance tells us that this is going to be one of the greatest inflationary taxes we've ever seen. This in a year when we in this province are looking forward to a buoyant economy, but when the rest of the nation is saying that we are going to have difficulties in the year ahead. When every economist in the country is saying that we are going to have problems, the federal government gives us more. This is an inflationary tax.

Then Mrs. McCarthy makes this next comment—and I might say, in passing, that British Columbians with good reason have never been modest in their claims. They have what they believe to be a beautiful province.

> British Columbians are fair people, and when the federal administration calls on us for more money . . . I think British Columbians, if they knew it was fair, certainly would abide—although probably not gladly—by the decision of our federal masters.

Honourable senators, I agree with her there. As I said yesterday, I am just reminded of that elderly gentleman who appeared before the travelling committee, and some other senators will probably remember him, too. He appeared before us flanked by two other senior citizens and he said, "In war and peace, I have paid my fair share. I have paid my taxes and I went to war for Canada. If you want us to make a special contribution in order to get rid of that deficit, I will sign up right now and you'll get my cheques. But I want to make sure that the system is fair and that some people who are not paying their way now will be paying their way under any new system. If taxation is fair, we do not mind helping out again, and helping the country once again." Honourable senators, I think that is very true today.

Mrs. McCarthy continues:

> I think British Columbians, if they knew it was fair, certainly would abide—although probably not gladly—by the decision of our federal masters. Surely they would say: "Well, we asked for some of these services; we have to pay for them." I think that's fair, but we have been paying dearly for the services.
> Our tax administration in this country is not a reasonable one. Had the people in Canada been asked to reduce the debt through the tax, which was the way it was introduced a very long time ago by the federal administration . . . Had they truly been going to reduce the deficit, I think that even in that case we would have said: "Well, we're going to get away from this incredible debt. We're going to reduce that debt which was handed to us, that national debt which is now $380 billion, costing us $113 million a day to service, $41.1 billion annually just to service . . ." Had we even been asked to give to the GST to reduce the deficit, I think that perhaps Canadians would have said: "Well, we've spent the money. It's in the deficit. But no, Mr. Speaker. We find out now that it is > only for more services, which the federal government deem will keep them in power longer.

That is a senior's charge against you government senators on the other side of the house. As I said yesterday, we should not be in a position, surely, of borrowing money so that we can extend largesse to all of the causes in the country. Perhaps it would be possible to have a five-year moratorium on certain big non-priority hand-outs including my own province of British Columbia. I am not exempting my province.

Mrs. McCarthy went on to say:

> I have to tell you this: I don't believe it will stay at 7 per cent.

I can tell Mrs. McCarthy that no one else does, either. As I have been saying all summer, the same tax in the Ivory Coast is now 25 per cent and rising. The same thing is happening in New Zealand and other countries that have this kind of tax.

> I believe that, as in every other jurisdiction in the world, jurisdiction after jurisdiction—and particularly with this federal government—this tax will increase to again satisfy the insatiable appetite of the federal Treasury Board.
> The collection process which has been explained by Ottawa will mean that every small business in this province and across this nation will be encumbered by extra bookkeeping costs and added hours. It may not seem important to people who figure out these kinds of things in the bureaucracy, to the federal politicians who are out on the hustings trying to sell the GST and to Mr. Wilson in the federal administration, but I can tell you that it is an onerous thing for a small business to have to purchase equipment—

Incidentally, Mrs. McCarthy herself is a very successful small business person. Therefore she is talking as someone who has hands-on small business experience.

> . . . I can tell you that it is an onerous thing for a small business to have to purchase equipment—and many will have to purchase different cash registers just to deal with this tax. Do you realize that every small business across this nation, every British Columbian in a small business, which represents more than 95 per cent of all the business in this province—the greatest employer in our province and across this nation is small business—will now have to be encumbered by the costs of what we are told will be hundreds and hundreds of tax collectors.

Of course, honourable senators, Mrs. McCarthy is correct. At this point in the proceedings, some honourable members began to shout "Thousands". Mrs. McCarthy then continued:

> Thousands and thousands. It's a bureaucracy that will grow and grow and again consume more of our people's dollars.
> The throne speech has called the GST unnecessary, and so it is. Business groups have said that the increase in the large corporation's tax rate comes at a very bad time. "One of the things that has been sustaining our economy is business investment, and this tax increase affects that to the tune of $200 million," said Tim Reid, president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. "By increasing taxes to pay for the lower GST rate, the government is taking its hand out of one of our pockets to put it in another." We're tired of having the heavy hand of government in the pockets of our small business people, in the pockets of our consumers, in the pockets of our householders and in the pockets of the senior citizens who need to have security for the future.

Honourable senators, I am almost finished with this, but I promised to put this B.C. petition on the record.

> The repackaging of the GST has taken place in the last few months. They've taken it from 9 per cent to 7 per cent and thought the Canadian people would buy it. I think that's one of the saddest commentaries, that we should even consider that we should be bought off by 2 percent.

> I do have a solution.

Perhaps you Conservatives should listen to this, because this is a provincial idea:

> —I do believe that Canadians and British Columbians would accept a line on the income tax form which addressed reduction in the deficit being carried by the federal administration. I think we would do our part. I think a line on the income tax form—no more bureaucracy, no added inspectors—that said 2 percent, or whatever it would take, on an annual basis would be our contribution to pay for that which we have enjoyed in the past and which we are paying incredible interest rates on today.

Honourable senators, it is not a bad idea to keep it simple. However, I would suggest that the initiative should be given a name. Canadians could be advised tht this is an anti-debt fund. Variations in taxation rates have been suggested such as 1 per cent at $15,000 and going up to 7 per cent on high incomes. Honourable senators, the fact is that people are ready to make a sacrifice for a good cause. Extra tax revenues fairly raised and properly used could be obtained by such a method and with public support. We must ask ourselves, do we really need the complications of the GST and its high collection cost and 5,000 civil servants and all of the "gumshoes" who are supposed to tramp around and lean over people's shoulders to assure compliance. I find it incredible that we are looking to hire former members of police forces with special investigative backgrounds; we will be hiring them so that they can go around to the so-called "Ma and Pa" stores and say: "Ma and Pa, are you sending enough money to Ottawa?"

Then there is this crazy statement by Mr. Blenkarn. He told an audience the other day: "Just keep two shoe boxes. That is all you need; it is very simple." I suppose the idea is that the gumshoe inspectors will be riffling through the shoe boxes.

Senator Bonnell: They will not even be able to afford the gumshoes!

Senator Perrault: That is right, senator. They will not be able to afford shoes.

Mrs. McCarthy said:

> I think a line on the income tax form—no more bureaucracy, no added inspectors—that said 2 percent, or whatever it would take, on an annual basis would be our contribution to pay for that which we have enjoyed in the past and which we are paying incredible interest rates on today.

Honourable senators, I think that idea is worth studying as an alternative. Some honourable senators opposite have made the point that it is all right to criticize, but we should offer alternative proposals. I say again that the debt and deficit are problems created in part by all of us, and no political party is exempt from blame. Therefore we have a responsibility—all of us—to find a solution on a collegial or joint basis.

Mrs. McCarthy continues:

> I would suggest that if we did that, it could be a solution. It would have to be allocated to the national debt. This GST is going to add to our national debt, and we will not get out of the mire of indebtedness for our children and our grandchildren for years and years to come. If our members in this House and our families ever see the end of the national debt, it would be a great surprise going with this kind of fiscal policy. It can't happen, because they spend faster than they collect and the interest rates add up to a mountain of debt.

Honourable senators, Mrs. McCarthy is right. She says:

> I am pleased to move this motion. I would hope that together in this House, in a spirit of cooperation for the good of the people of British Columbia, we can give a message to the House of Commons and to the Senate in Ottawa and to the federal administration that we do not want the GST.

The motion was carried unanimously in the B.C. legislature. Honourable senators, I am today delivering that message. Yes, and you have now heard what Mrs. McCarthy, speaking for the legislature and all of its parties, is saying. We have to pay and we must get rid of that debt and deficit. She, at least, has set forth an alternative plan to the GST.

Honourable senators, I hope I have not overstayed my welcome. However, in my opinion it is important to present these petitions and I appreciate the time that you have given me today.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Perrault. Canada, of course, does not have a very long history but we have a rich history. We have a great many archaeological and antique articles that have been found in this country. I understand that, on the sale of those articles, the purchaser will be charged 7 per cent.

That being the case, the Americans will probably come up here and buy up all our history and take it home across the border because they do not pay a sales tax, and the GST on articles they buy will be refundable. Does that mean that we are liable to lose most of our artifacts and our art?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: That was one of the concerns that was expressed to the committee, that some of the best Canadian art and artifacts and archaeological items are in American hands at the present time, and that this tax will accelerate the process. That is the fear of those who are involved in this field.

Senator Bonnell: I think that is just terrible.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I have much pleasure in tabling a petition from the province of Newfoundland. The petition is on the subject of the proposed goods and services tax. It starts out:

> The petitioners solemnly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail upon the government to stop the introduction of the proposed Goods and Services Tax.

Honourable senators, this petition is from all parts of Newfoundland. I can well understand why these people are so concerned about this tax. Conditions in Newfoundland are quite depressed. As you know, our economy depends to a large extent on the fishery. Currently, the fishery employs a total of thirty thousand people. However, because of the lack of fish, or at least the drop in the fish catches, the fishing industry is being kept down.

Senator Bonnell: And the price is poor.

Senator Lewis: Yes, the prices are poor, but it is the high-priced Canadian dollar that is causing the problem, because our exports of fish are no longer bringing in the same amount of foreign exchange as they were before.

The people of the province of Newfoundland and Labrador—

Senator Bonnell: As well, Newfoundlanders can no longer sell their fish because the airlines have taken off all of the heavy planes. They now only have those little Dash-8s and Dash-7s. Therefore the rest of Canada is no longer receiving our fresh Newfoundland fish.

Senator Lewis: Yes, senator, I will get to the point about the planes. Incidently, they are no longer flying out of Charlottetown either, are they?

Senator Bonnell: No, they are not.

Senator Lewis: Honourable senators, the people in the province of Newfoundland are suffering from this depression in the fishery and are blaming the federal government for the lack of fish by reason of the mismanagement of the fishery and also the government action in allowing foreign fishermen to overfish the fishstocks.

Senator Bonnell: Are the French still coming in there and taking your fish, right inshore around St. Pierre and Miquelon?

● (0800)

Senator Lewis: I understand that there is presently a bill in the House of Commons which is aimed at trying to correct this problem, although I believe it has something to do with fines to be imposed on foreigners.

Senator Bonnell: Would you consider a person from St. Pierre and Miquelon a foreigner?

Senator Lewis: St. Pierre and Miquelon is part of France, so we regard them as foreigners.

Apart from the depression in the fishery, we have the admitted planned downturn in the economy. What you have to understand about Newfoundland is that—

Senator Bonnell: It is not connected to the mainland.

Senator Lewis: No, or to P.E.I. In Newfoundland we have no industry. We are probably the worst off of all the Atlantic provinces. Before Confederation we had our own manufacturing businesses. Since then, we have suffered from the collapse of these industries.

Senator Bonnell: What about the forestry industry?

Senator Lewis: We have a certain amount of that. I should like to read an article from a book written by A. Brian Peckford who was Premier of Newfoundland at the time. In Appendix C, at page 113, he quotes an unpublished manuscript entitled "Economic Growth and Development in Newfoundland" by Brian C. Bursey.

> While the impact of Confederation upon personal income and social welfare seems to be clear cut the effects upon local manufacturing were far less positive. Prior to Confederation local industry had successfully produced a variety of products for home consumption including "creosote, ice cream, furniture, brick, processed meats (hams, bacons, etc.), boats, lime, flavour essences, oiled clothing for fishermen, paper bags, paper wrappers, tinned goods, candy, biscuits, bedding, margarine, marine engines, stoves and similar iron goods, nails, paint, cigarettes and tobacco, clothing, woolen goods, aerated waters, cordage, boots and shoes, etc." All in all giving employment to approximately 3,000 people. Certainly the rising personal incomes and living standards that accompanied Confederation did much to broaden the overall size of the local market for many of these products. Conversely many of the features of the political union created serious problems for Newfoundland manufacturing establishments.
> One of the most immediate effects of Confederation was the removal of all tariffs on Canadian produced goods sold in Newfoundland. Prior to Confederation Newfoundland manufacturers had been able to compete effectively in the limited local market behind a wall of protective tariffs that ranged as high as 65 percent for certain items. With the removal of these tariff barriers Newfoundland was flooded with low cost merchandise manufactured by high volume producers in Ontario and Quebec.
> Another tariff related problem evolved from the fact that Canadian duties on imported materials were frequently different from those in effect in Newfoundland in the immediate pre-Confederation period. In some cases this resulted in higher duties on imported raw materials which frequently caused Newfoundland firms to switch to new sources of supply. In so far as these new or old sources of raw materials were more expensive the competitiveness of local manufacturers was weakened.
> Federal transportation subsidies, intended as a means of reducing Newfoundland's cost of living, served to weaken the competitive position of Newfoundland enterprise. Similarly Federal corporate income taxes, sales tax, and various other taxes and duties brought about a major increase in the tax burden for many Newfoundland firms. Local firms also experienced rising labour costs as a result of wage parity forces introduced into the local economy as a result of Confederation, the creation of Federal government jobs, and the removal of migration barriers. In addition changes in the regulatory and governmental environment resulted in confusion and operational problems for local business.
> All of these factors tended to strengthen central Canadian manufacturers competing in the Newfoundland marketplace. Meanwhile Newfoundland producers, victims of the island's geographical remoteness and high transportation costs, were still unable to compete effectively in the much larger national market against high volume central Canadian producers.
> Within a year these factors had resulted in the closing of a mattress manufacturer, a paper bag producer, and an underwear plant. Other companies, such as the Imperial Tobacco factory and some of the textile producers, survived a little longer, only to be ultimately forced under by the mainland competition. Other firms, blessed with fully depreciated plants and equipment, continued for years but were unable to justify the investment required to replace aging facilities and machinery. A few other enterprises have survived as a mere shadow of their former selves and now operate as wholesale or retail firms only, rather than as integrated manufacturing enterprises.
> The total effects of Confederation upon local business were far from immediate and indeed are still being manifested some thirty years after the event. In the 1960s and 1970s the Province's larger centers have been invaded by the branch operations of such mainland companies as Dominion, Sobey's, Woolco, K-Mart and Sears. Unable to match the volume buying power and management strength of these larger integrated companies numerous Newfoundland enterprises many of these large well respected firms that were household names for more than a century, have been forced to close their doors. It is a trend that will continue.

people in central Canada who do not have the transportation costs to bear.

I would like to refer to the petition that I have. There are 26 names on it. I will read them, because some of them are very interesting.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Bonnell: Would those people be Irish settlers?

Senator Lewis: Not necessarily. The name Garland would probably be English or Scottish. There is a Laura Squires of St. Phillips, which is fairly close to St. John's. Here is an interesting one: Diane Blagdon from Paradise. You may be surprised to know that there is a Paradise in Newfoundland. You probably think that there is a Paradise in your own province, but there is a Paradise in Newfoundland.

Senator Bosa: I should like to ask a question. Where is Paradise?

Senator Lewis: I am glad you asked me that. Paradise lies about halfway between St. John's and Topsail. Topsail is west of St. John's. In the old days there was one road that used to go west from St. John's. Before Topsail, there was a sharp turn to the right and a very steep hill. At the top of the hill was Paradise.

Senator Bosa: How large was that community?

Senator Lewis: Paradise is now a bedroom community of St. John's. I suppose there must be 1,000 people. In the days I am talking about, there were only a few people.

I wish Senator Kirby was here because the story was told about an Anglican cleric. I believe Senator Kirby has an uncle or grandfather who was a cleric. I am not suggesting this was Reverend Kirby, but he did say he had relatives in Topsail.

On this occasion this cleric, who was a rather pompous person, was being driven to Topsail. The driver was getting fed up with the way he was carrying on in the car. As they came along Topsail road, just before Paradise road the driver turned to the cleric and said, "Would you like to go to Paradise?" The cleric said, "I am quite sure I'm going to go there but it's going to be a long time." The driver said "No, it isn't," and he swung up the road to Paradise.

Senator Perrault was talking about the tax on funerals. That poses a question: Is there going to be a tax on the transposition from the present to Paradise?

Senator Barootes: It is an underground tax.

Senator Lewis: We will leave it at that. I will proceed with the names:

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Petten: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Lewis: Yes.

Senator Petten: Would you tell us where Bay Roberts is?

Senator Lewis: Bay Roberts is in Conception Bay, which would be approximately 14 miles from St. John's.

Senator Bosa: How far is that from Come-by-Chance?

Senator Lewis: Approximately 30 miles.

Senator Bosa: Why did you not mention where Giovanni Caboto landed?

Senator Lewis: I was going to do that, but I did not want to get into an argument with you. Honourable senators, I say this despite what Senator Graham, Senator MacEachen, Senator Muir, or Senator John Macdonald might say. In fact, John Cabot discovered Newfoundland in 1497. We all believe that, but people from Cape Breton like to say that he landed there.

Senator Bosa has corrected me on several occasions with regard to this, because he claims that it was not John Cabot, but Giovanni Caboto. That was his proper name. Senator Bosa will confirm that he landed in Newfoundland.

Senator Bosa: Frankly, there are two versions to this. Some historians claim that he landed in Cape Breton; others contend that he landed in Newfoundland. I want to be laconic about this. It does not make any difference where the historians say Giovanni Caboto landed in Canada. What is important is to recognize that his name was not John Cabot or Jean Cabot, but his name is Caboto. He is of Italian birth and he sailed on behalf of King Henry VII. He was not the first one to land in Canada. The Vikings are said to have done that before him. It is said that he left Bristol on May 2 and landed in what is now Canada on June 24. He went back to England and King Henry VII was so happy with his discovery that he gave him ten pounds. Somebody else contends that perhaps he should have been given something else.

It has been proven that Giovanni Caboto was the first one to have charted the voyage from Bristol to what is now Canada. That is what is important to me.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I find it strange that Senator Bosa would lay claim to the discovery of Newfoundland by Giovanni Caboto. The most ancient sagas of the Vikings say that Eric the Red, who was an outcast from his community for bad deeds he had committed, after going to Iceland and Greenland, established himself at the tip of northern Newfoundland near St. Anthony at L'Anse-Au-Meadows. I wonder why we Canadians of European descent—whether we be Norman, Welsh, Scottish, Italian, Spanish or Britons—would want to take any particular glory in discovering a land which actually belonged to the Beothuks, which our common ancestors helped exterminate. If anybody should lay claim to Newfoundland, it ought to be the Beothuks.

I did not expect this matter to rise in the middle of petitions, but I think it ought to be cleared up. Some of the oldest Acadian chronicles say that when the Beothuks met the Micmacs, it was in the early 1600s—before the foundation of Québec. When I hear of Québec City being the cradle of the French civilization in North America, I am offended, not because I am an Acadian but because I advocate honest historical truth and fact. The Acadians are the ones who settled in Nova Scotia, before Québec was founded.

Senator Bosa: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Corbin: Yes.

Senator Bosa: The honourable senator skipped from 1497 to the 16th century. There were many other explorers that played a part in the discovery of Canada from 1497 to the 16th century.

Senator Corbin: I am sad to be dragged into this controversy but I am a serious amateur historian. I am also a serious amateur photographer and certainly a serious senator, not an amateur senator.

The ancient Acadian chronicles say that when they met the chief of the Micmacs in the early 1600s, they had before them a man with red hair, blue eyes, and, contrary to the physiognomy of many Indians, he had a slight beard. Where did this person come from? Are there red-haired Italians? Did Giovanni Caboto have any parents in North America, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia?

The proper claim to the first recorded European invasion of North America ought to go to my ancestors, the Vikings. That is where the truth lies.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, sometimes we hear historical blasphemy in this chamber, and we just had a dose of blasphemy from Senator Corbin. We were talking about Giovanni Caboto. I said that Giovanni Caboto might not have been the first European to land in what is now Canada. I said that he was the first one to have charted a course and told his financier, King Henry VII, that he was going on a voyage of discovery. After landing on June 24 in what is now Canada, he went back to King Henry VII and told him where he had been. When Senator Corbin said that he is not sure where the Mic Mac Indian with a red beard came from, that does not make any difference to me. Giovanni Caboto was a happily married man. He had three children.

Senator Corbin: I am sure his wife stayed home and washed the dishes, did the laundry and swept the floors, as usual?

Senator Bosa: Yes. From then on the British started to cross the Atlantic and they colonized part of North America.

The second person that is of historical importance, but history does not give him proper recognition is Giovanni da Verrazzano. There is a bridge in Manhattan called the Verrazzano Bridge. He was commissioned by the King of France—

Senator Barootes: Send your question to Jeopardy and you go with it.

Senator Bosa: Giovanni da Verrazzano was commissioned by King Francis I because he was jealous of the fact that the Spaniards and the British were making discoveries in the New World. There were three major countries in Europe at that time: France, Spain and England. France wanted to compete with the other two countries.

Francis I commissioned Giovanni da Verrazzano, an Italian, and gave him a ship Le Dauphin with a crew of 50. The king asked him to seek a new passage to the Far East.

Senator Petten: What was the gross tonnage of that ship?

Senator Bosa: Do you mean when fully loaded with goods?

Senator Petten: Yes.

Senator Bosa: I believe it was something like 230 tons. I may be mistaken, and I would not like to stake my life on that.

Anyway, Giovanni da Verrazzano crossed the Atlantic and chose a route that was different from that chosen by Cristoforo Colombo. That is Christopher Columbus, because his name was originally Cristoforo Colombo. Cristoforo Colombo landed in Central America on an island, San Salvador. Giovanni Caboto landed either in Cape Breton or Newfoundland. Giovanni da Verrazzano sailed straight across the Atlantic from France and landed in what is now North Carolina. From North Carolina he veered left and sailed down to Florida. He turned around and sailed all the way to Nova Scotia, tracing the coast. He made frequent landings. He landed, for instance, in what is now New York. He came in contact with the natives in that area. He was the first of the navigators to describe the natives as a kind and gentle people, whereas all the previous Europeans that set foot in North America described them as savages. Giovanni da Verrazzano made this voyage in 1524.

In honour of Francis I, he wrote "Francesca" across what is now Canada. Had that name for this land lasted to this day, we would not be Canadians. We would be called Franciscans because of the fact that Giovanni da Verrazzano named the land Francesca. He went back to France and reported to the French court that there was much promise in the new land. He said that ti was a land that could be colonized but more exploration had to be done. Eight years later, Jacques Cartier came to Canada. In 1532 Jacques Cartier came to Canada and went further than Giovanni da Verrazzano. He entered the St. Lawrence River.

Senator Corbin: He first explored the western coast of Newfoundland.

Some of the names he gave to the new land remain to this day.

Senator Bosa: It is important to know that the four principal navigators and discoverers were all of Italian origin. They all sailed on behalf of other kings, not on behalf of Italy. Italy at the time was divided into 18 principalities.

The other navigator and explorer was Amerigo Vespucci.

• (0830)

And Senator Gigantès is very familiar with this, with Amerigo Vespucci. Amerigo Vespucci was in the service of Charles V of Spain and he, too, crossed the Atlantic on the same route, or practically the same route as Cristoforo Colombo. You know where the name America comes from? Where did this continent get its name? It got its name from Amerigo Vespucci.

Senator Lewis: I wonder if I may interrupt you for a moment. Thank you. We will hear the rest of it, but thank you for your trip and I would just like to ask leave to file this petition.

Senator Corbin: Senator Bosa, you have raised a serious charge. You have accused me of historical blasphemy. I suggest that you withdraw those words.

Senator Bosa: I take them back, Senator Corbin. I got carried away for a moment. I thought you were going to deny that Giovanni Caboto was the official discoverer of Canada, which is what historians contend he is.

Senator Forrestall: What historians?

Senator Bosa: Senator Forrestall perhaps is not aware of this, but I would like to indicate to him where he could find proof of what I have said just by consulting some books that have been written by the Historical and Literary Society, which is based in London, England; their credentials are beyond reproach. Senator Forrestall, if you want to get to the bottom of this . . .

Senator Stewart: Senator Bosa, we are all very anxious to hear Senator Forrestall hold forth, and I am sure he will give a highly accurate account of early history of what became British North America; but have you, Senator Bosa, taken into consideration the achievement in exploration of the Norsemen, the people who came over from Iceland and Greenland to northern Newfoundland and Vineland, or do you dismiss that as some prehistoric myth?

Does Senator Bosa argue that the history of exploration of Canada began with his beloved Giovanni Caboto?

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I guess I have been misunderstand. I only claim that Giovanni Caboto was the official discoverer of Canada.

Senator Stewart: And who said "official"?

Senator Bosa: Official, because he was the only one that went back to King Henry VII with some documents showing that he had left Bristol on May 2nd, that he had crossed the Atlantic, that he had landed at what is now either Cape Breton or Newfoundland. He landed on June 24th. June 24th is also St. John's Day in Newfoundland. It is a very important religious holiday in Newfoundland, St. John's Day. Also in Quebec, June 24th, is Saint John Baptiste day and is the national day of Quebec. So these two provinces have chosen this way to glorify the landing of Giovanni Caboto in what is now Canada.

Senator Stewart asked me about the Norsemen and Eric the Red and so forth, there is no dispute about that. They might have been here many times, but they never charted the waters; they never filed a report. They never said,"This is where we have been." Do you understand, Senator Stewart?

Senator Stewart: I understand what you are saying; that does not mean I necessarily accept it.

Senator Bosa: Some people refuse to believe in the face of clear-cut laconic evidence.

Senator Stewart: Would it satisfy you—

Senator Gigantès: Crystal clear.

[Senator Lewis.]

Senator Stewart: Would it satisfy you, Senator Bosa, if I tell you that I will take it under consideration?

Senator Bosa: That is much better.

Senator Gigantès: Would Senator Bosa yield?

Senator Bosa: To a question?

Senator Gigantès: It is a question that I address to you, of course. Have you heard of Juan de Fuca?

Senator Bosa: Oh, absolutely.

Senator Gigantès: Because I accept, and I admire your pride in the contributions of Verrazzano, Vespucci and Colombo to the discovery of this country, but there is another part of the country on the other ocean. A great explorer called Juan de Fuca, in the service of the King of Spain, discovered that. Very few people know, although they can find out by consulting the Dictionary of Canadian Biography, that Juan de Fuca's real name is Loannis Apostolos Focas, from the village of Valerianatta and therefore he was also known as Valerianatos. He was, in other words, a Greek and from the island I come from, Cephalonia.

Of course, in the Island of Cephalonia, we are a collection of skeptics. When he came back, people said, "You cannot believe a Focas. What do you mean he discovered a strait on the west coast of some unknown continent?" Nevertheless, history books accept his claim. He, too, had documentation. He brought back some of the Haida with him to the Court of Spain.

And I am particularly proud of this fact, because his daughter, Angelica, married the first of my family to bear the nickname Gigantès. At the Battle of Lepanto in 1571, the ancestor of mine who married Angelica Focas was, of course, fighting in the Christian fleet of Don Juan of Austria against the Turkish fleet. That was the year when the Turks nearly took Vienna, and Jan Sobieski stopped them from taking Vienna, if you remember. The same year the Turkish fleet was advancing upon Christian Europe and it was stopped at the Battle of Lepanto, which is halfway down the coast of western Greece at the entrance of the big gulf, the Gulf of Corinth. At that battle, my ancestor, who was rather large—I mean in height—very young, very tall and commanded his own ship, was being particularly murderous to the Turks. He caught the eye of the Commander in Chief, Don Juan of Austria, who said, Eun gigantes which means, "he is a giant." One keeps that kind of nickname.

We have shrunk since then. When I was visiting my village when I was a young man, the older people in the village would look at me entering through the front door of the garden and say, "Your grandfather had to stoop to do that. You are not the man he was. Your family has shrunk." Well, these things happen. Incidentally, human beings shrink. I have lost two inches in my lifetime. I used to be five feet eleven inches. Now I am only five feet nine inches and that is difficult to accept.

I wanted you to know that, like the Italians, who have made a great contribution to the discovery of this continent, Greeks also contributed something to the finding of America. There are great Greek navigators. There was Niarchos, of course, who was the admiral of Alexander. The first to circumnavigate Africa. He left from what is now Suez and went all around and we have documentation from the historians of the time about the various places he landed. He actually went all around Africa through the Straits of Gibraltar and arrived back at Alexandria, a considerable feat considering this was in a rowboat, because the triremes of the time were driven by oars. It was a feat to circumnavigate the Cape of Good Hope, at the bottom of South Africa.

Cape Horn is at the bottom of South America; that is much more dreadful, especially if you are trying to go in a westerly direction because you have those westerly gales and—if you try to evade Cape Horn and go instead through the Straits of Magellan, you have very, very tricky waters and extreme fog, and until the invention of radar, it was a very risky proposition.

Anyhow, I wanted you to know that we Greeks, too, although our achievements in maritime discovery do not compare to those of Italians as far as the North American continent is concerned, have a history like other Mediterraneans. The Spaniards and Portuguese are on that sea—the Portuguese are in fact Mediterranean. I mean, that is a mistake of geography. The coast of Portugal, by rights, should be in the Mediterranean. They are a Mediterranean civilization. They are people of Mediterranean character and disposition. Charming people. Wonderful, wonderful people, the Portuguese are.

I remember well the first time I went to Portugal. It was during World War II. I was flying to the Mediterranean and we stopped in Lisbon. Lisbon, of course, was a mythical paradise with spies and everything but the most remarkable thing was there was no blackout. There were lights everywhere. You could walk in the street without stumbling. You could get anything you wanted to eat. I was coming from Britain, where if you wanted to eat Chinese food, you had to have barley instead of rice, because there was rationing, where if you were invited somewhere you went to Fortnum & Mason's and bought haggis. Haggis . . .

Senator Stewart: Careful.

Senator Gigantès: Well, haggis is the stomach of a sheep, stuffed with offal from the sheep and various herbs and things like that.

Senator Corbin: Awful what?

Senator Gigantès: Offal, which means les abatis—you know the liver, the spleen, bits of intestine.

Senator Corbin: That is "awful".

Senator Gigantès: I rather like haggis, maybe because I was hungry in those days, or maybe my taste has been developed, but there is, of course, a story and I hope my Scottish colleagues, or my colleagues of Scottish ancestry will forgive me.

An Hon. Senator: Tread lightly.

Senator Gigantès: A great French cook once visited Britain.

Senator Bosa: One moment. Before Senator Gigantès leaves the ingredients of haggis, I want to also draw to his attention that there are blood and onions in haggis too. I tasted it myself. I ate it a few months ago. I was returning from Cyprus. I stopped in London and this would have been in the spring. I went out of my way to eat it because I have many friends of Scottish origin.

Senator Gigantès: Who doesn't?

Senator Bosa: In fact, I informed the Senate a few days ago that I learned how to speak English from a Scotsman. His name was flying officer McRae from Aberdeen. I also informed the honourable senators that he had taught me what I thought was an English song, but I did not find out until I came to Canada that it was a Scottish song. Anyway, I sang it last week; I'm not going to sing it again. I just wanted to draw to the attention of Senator Gigantès that there are other ingredients that go into haggis over and above the ones he mentioned.

Senator Gigantès: The great French cook Escoffier, when he was given haggis, was asked what he thought. He said:

[Translation]

> "When I first saw it, I feared it might be excrement but having tasted it, I regretted that it was not".

[English]

I do not know if the word in french is Parliamentary. Excrement. In other words he said "When I first saw it, I feared it might be excrement but having tasted it, I regretted that it was not." This was not my opinion. I like haggis.

Senator Stewart: That is clearly a Tory opinion. Samuel Johnson, a famous Tory, scoffed at the food of Scots.

Senator Gigantès: Would you say that scoff comes from Escoffier? It might, because he went around Britain denigrating the cooking in the British Isles. He said absolutely frightful things about Irish stew.

Senator Corbin: I think we are somewhat abusing the rules.

Senator Stewart: No.

Senator Corbin: I would like to get back to petitions. It is fine to bring a clarification. I am getting on with the petitions, whether you like it or not. This is what we are on now. So I have the honour, senators, to present—no, I am sorry, I heard enough of that discovery nonsense. By the way—

Senator Gigantès: I rise on a point of privilege. I want you to withdraw the word "nonsense". It concerns one of my ancestors.

Senator Corbin: I have the floor. There is now a new theory that the real discovery, the real discoverers of—or the first Europeans, so-called, to land in North America were the inhabitants of Atlantis. Unfortunately, an eruption destroyed their homeland, and all the records were destroyed with them. There is an oral tradition which has perpetuated itself over many centuries that it was, indeed, the inhabitants of Atlantis, that lost island on the other side of Gibraltar, where the continental plates form in the mid-Atlantic ridge. The Isle of Atlantis was just to the west of that. We can say it was European in a sense, but those people have disappeared. A terrible eruption destroyed everything, including their records, their ships. So we will never know.

Senator Bosa: Were there any survivors?

Senator Corbin: The oral tradition has survived.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Corbin, this is my field. I would like to give a clarification of this issue. This was an Egyptian myth which is recorded by Plato in The Republic. There was, indeed, an enormous volcanic explosion at the Island of Thera, otherwise known as Santorini. It is an island shaped like a croissant, and that is the rim of the volcano. It had an advanced civilization, and there are remains of that very advanced civilization. The tidal wave was so colossal that it reached Egypt. There is even a theory that some of the burning ash from the volcano landed in Crete and was responsible for the first destruction of the Minoan civilization at about 1500 B.C., which lead to the weakening of the great Cretan kingdoms and their invasion by Greeks. That is where we pass from linear A, the script called Linear A, to the script called Linear B in Crete. Linear A has not been deciphered, but Linear B was deciphered by a young British architect. Linear B is Greek written in Cretan script.

Now, that is the origin of the myth of Atlantis, the great civilization that disappeared. They were mariners. They travelled everywhere. That is perfectly true, but I wanted you to know that the origin of Atlantis and its first literary recorded existence was in the writings of Plato, The Republic, which is a very Tory book; I am much against it. It is also the ancestor of the bureaucratic philosophies. In other words, the old men choose their successors, and bootlickers generally get to the top. It is beloved of Conservatives, whether of the commonest variety or of the Nazi and Fascist variety. Of course, it is the method of promotion within churches of all kinds. The older people choose the young who flatter them most. So that is the origin of Atlantis, and the first recorded instance is in Plato's The Republic.

Senator Corbin: It is not possible that they are the original first Europeans to set foot in North America?

Senator Gigantès: I think I will let Senator Bosa answer that, because you are attacking something in which Italians have great pride.

Senator Bosa: If there were no survivors when Atlantis disappeared, I do not see how anybody can say with certainty what Senator Corbin states, namely that they were the ones that made all the discoveries. I want to answer Senator Gigantès' question. Firstly, he asked whether or not I was aware of Juan de Fuca, who was a captain in the service of the King of Spain. I would like to draw the attention of Senator Gigantès that in a speech I made in December of 1979 I spoke about several Canadians belonging to minority groups having made important discoveries and important contributions to Canada. I was advocating that we should glorify these people, because in the history books of Canada we have a lot of history about the contributions that the British people made. We have a lot of history about contributions that French Canadians have made, and they have made an outstanding contribution. We have some history about our native people, but there is very little known about the contribution that Canadians of other ethnic origins have made to the development and progress of Canada, and that is why I spoke in December of 1979 about Juan de Fuca. In fact, I am glad that the honourable gentleman mentioned his name, because I thought his name was Valerianos Domodopolous.

Senator Gigantès: Please. No, there are no "opolouses" in Cephalonia. That was in the part of Greece occupied by Turkey.

Senator Bosa: Valerianos is—

Senator Gigantès: It is the toponymic. Valerianatos. Because he came from the village of Valeanata, he was so called. Just as I come from the village of Sporonata and therefore Sporonos is part of my name.

Senator Bosa: I was wondering about the origin of Senator Gigantès' name. I was wondering if the origin of Senator Gigantès' last name is of Italian origin, because in Italian-,"gigante" means giant. I am just wondering if there is any affinity, because the island that he comes from was under Venetian rule for centuries.

Senator Gigantès: Six.

Senator Bosa: Six centuries. So, I am just wondering whether your last name, Senator Gigantès, is of Italian origin.

Senator Gigantès: Well, as I was saying earlier, honourable senator—but before I would like first to thank you for having mentioned my ancestors in that speech in 1979. All Canadians of Greek ancestry when they hear of how you have praised one of us, will be very grateful to you. I did explain to you earlier that Gigantès was a nickname given to my family by Don Juan of Austria at the Battle of Lepanto.

Senator Bosa: Would Senator Gigantès just permit one question? I would like his opinion. Does Senator Gigantès believe that Senator Corbin is engaging in obstructionism? I was on the verge of explaining how the name of America came to be, and senator Gigantès asked me a question. I yielded the floor. Now Senator Corbin wants to truncate my dissertation on how the North American continent got its name. He is practically using obstructionism in preventing me from putting that on the record.

Senator Corbin: My ancestors couldn't be bothered with the finer points of argument. When they decided to invade the land of the Picts and Scots, they did not do any hairsplitting. They just truncated, as you said. I am now on petitions, honourable senator, on behalf of the citizens of New Brunswick. Surely, they have a claim—

[Translation]

Senator David: Senator Corbin, I would like to comment on that. I really believe that you are obstructing a conversation that is very interesting. It is almost a course on geology and history that we have the chance to attend.

Senator Gigantès: We have not talked about geology.

Senator David: Senator Gigantès, you have talked about the earth's crust, you talked about volcanoes, you talked about eruptions, you talked about the movement in the Atlantic and the Pacific and I have been trying to understand the full meaning of your words, and those last 10 minutes have been highly interesting for me. I would suggest that you keep at it and I think, Senator Corbin, that you are really obstructing your colleagues.

Senator Corbin: Senator David, you are not very kind with me. I have been trying for a good number of minutes to come back to the question on the agenda, that is the presentation of petitions. Although I may offend you I will keep obstructing, but in a legal way, for it is about the presentation of petitions.

Senator David: That is an interesting obstruction.

Senator Corbin: The petitioners from New Brunswick are asking the government of Canada to withdraw the goods and services tax.

[English]

The petition I hold in my hand is signed by 38 citizens of New Brunswick. These are bona fide handwritten signatures. There is no doubt about it, a grapho-analyst would confirm this at first sight. There is no way these signatures are forged. These are bona fide handwritten signatures.

Now, some of you, honourable senators, who are more interested in debating ancient history than contemporary realities should know that St. Stephen is one of the old towns of New Brunswick; not the oldest, certainly not the first incorporated establishment. The City of St. John claims that one.

St. Stephen had a post office as early as 1855, which is indicative of the importance of that settlement. The town was incorporated in 1871. It was amalgamated with Milltown in 1973 to form the town of St. Stephen-Milltown, Passamaquoddy, That is an Indian tribe, in Passamaquoddy language, Ktchimedabiauht means "great landing". That was the name of the old locality before Giovanni Caboto, as it is claimed, set foot on Newfoundland.

Senator Bosa: That is 1845. Caboto came here in 1497.

Senator Corbin: The Passamaquoddys were there way before written history and oral tradition.

St. Stephen got its name from Nettamia Marks in 1794. It was then called Morris Town, for Charles Morris, Surveyor General of Nova Scotia, whose son, Charles Junior, and Moses Garrish surveyed the lots. It was later called Dover Hill giving rise to Calais as a name in Maine.

Dover, Calais, the White Hills of Dover, all that stuff. So, Dover Hill has a name selected in 1806. It was later commonly called Saltwater by those living inland. The wife would say to her husband, "Well, let's go to Saltwater and do some groceries today." That is how it got its name, obviously. Commonly called "Scoodic", the Passamaquoddy name for that part of the St. Croix River. So, there you have it, honourable senators, a brief toponymy of St. Stephen.

• (0900)

Petitcodiak, you write it the way you pronounce it. Petitcodiak. There is a Petitcodiak River, as everybody knows, but Petitcodiak Post Office was called Head of Petitcodiak from 1848 to 1865. It was post office Petitcodiak from 1865, and it was incorporated as a village in 1966.

Now, River Glade, that is another of the colourful names that you find in that part of New Brunswick. River Glade is five miles southwest of Salisbury. As a post office it was earlier known as North River Platform. Isn't that interesting? North River Platform, from 1864 to 1904. And it became Post Office River Glade in 1904. The people of River Glade should be very careful because the current government is extinguishing every post office it can lay its hands on.

Now, honourable senators, the following signature is that of Andy Dolan, and he is from Troy, New York. Now, you honourable senators may question—-

An Hon. Senator: Yes.

Senator Corbin: —the right of an American citizen to sign a petition addressed to the Canadian Senate. I have researched this matter very seriously, and to my astonishment I found some interesting information in Parliamentary Procedure and Practice in the Dominion of Canada by Sir John George Bourinot, K.C., M.G., LLB., D.C.L., F.R.S.C., etc, late clerk of the House of Commons of Canada, in his fourth edition, which is edited by Thomas Barnard Flint, M.A., LLB., D.C.L., of the Nova Scotia Bar, as I had earlier occasion to say. He was also editor of Bourinot's third edition, the 1916 edition which was published in Toronto by the Canadian Law Book Company, law publishers. I would like to quote from page 236 under the paragraph heading of "Who may petition", because here we have the signature, the original signature, of a citizen of the United States who resides in Troy, New York. What are the rules as to who may petition?

> "A petition forwarded by telegraph cannot be received in as much as it has no real signatures attached to it."

That is immaterial to the question at hand.

> "When a petition has contained a number of signatures in the same handwriting, those signatures have not been counted."

That would be tantamount to forgery, I suppose.

> "Petitions of corporations aggregate must be under their common seal, and if the chairman of a public meeting signed a petition in behalf of those so assembled, it is only received as the petition of the individual, and is so entered in the minutes because the signatures of one party or others cannot be recognized."

Those are wise, very wise rules, honourable senators. It is amazing that five million Canadians would have bothered to individually sign these petitions and not someone on behalf of five million Canadians.

Now, coming to the specific point:

"Aliens not resident in this country have strictly no right to petition Parliament."

That decision was brought down in the Canadian Commons in 1877. But, as Senator Stewart says, we should not be intimidated by practices in other places, because the source and the fountain head of our practices is the British House of Lords. Is that not a fact, sir?

Senator Stewart: Well, Senator Corbin, it is true that the designers of the Senate of Canada had the British House of Lords very much in mind, and the position of our Speaker to some extent is modelled on that of the Lord Chancellor in the British House of Lords. I made reference to that point the other day. It is interesting to realize that the Lord Chancellor is, ex officio, the presiding officer of the House of Lords. Once you are appointed Lord Chancellor, you are on the woolsack. The woolsack—well, the woolsack is the seat where the Lord Chancellor sits. It is a great square block of wool. Well, it is a great—

Senator Corbin: Would that be comparable to what we call nowadays a bean bag?

Senator Stewart: I think it is much softer. It is a very big square cushion, stands about thirty inches high. It is some feet long and some feet wide, and it was introduced into the Chamber in which the House of Lords meet to remind their lordships of the importance of the wool trade to the British economy over the years. The wool trade was regarded as a staple of the British economy, and the woolsack was there as constant evidence of the importance of the wool industry to the British economy.

Senator Frith: Today it would be an automobile here.

Senator Stewart: Well, yes, quite possibly what we would have in here today would be a bucket seat from an automobile.

I say, Senator Corbin, the Lord Chancellor is perched, I think that is perhaps the correct way to put, he is perched upon the woolsack. That is especially true if he is a man of small stature. But the woolsack is technically outside the House of Lords. That is a very important point, because the Lords conduct their own affairs in their own way, and all that the Speaker of the Lords does is to report to the Queen and to her Ministers the transactions that he has observed in their Lordships' house.

Senator Corbin: He is a government nominee.

Senator Stewart: Oh, definitely; he is a member of the government. He is a member of the government. We had a Speaker in the Canadian Senate back in the 1890s who was a Minister of the Crown. Now, I mention all this because of what you said.

It is true indeed that part of the role of our Speaker descends from the role of the Speaker of the House of Lords. But we also have to remember that those who designed this house as part of the Parliament of Canada had something else in mind. This house was erected to introduce the federal principle into the Parliament of Canada. The House of Commons embodies the idea of responsible government. Key members of the executive government are members of the House of Commons and they are present there to answer, and they cannot conduct business there satisfactorily unless they enjoy the confidence of a majority in that house.

Well, that is one line of principle, a very important line of thought. But one has only to read the debates on Confederation to realize that that line of thought which was constantly purveyed by certain representatives from Canada West, which at that time was growing very rapidly in population and which it was assumed would elect by far the largest number of the members to the House of Commons, that line of thought purveyed, I say, by certain people could not prevail in the Confederation conferences.

George Brown said it clearly on the basis of that approach alone there would have been no Dominion of Canada. Another principle had to be brought in, namely, that of federalism. Consequently, there was added to the Parliament of Canada a second chamber, the Senate, in which initially three and eventually four divisions of the country were represented.

Now, that brings us back to the role of our Speaker. If the Speaker were to be an impartial person, a person divorced altogether from debate and from voting in this house, one of the divisions, perhaps the Maritime division, perhaps Quebec, would have been deprived of one of its representatives. So we always have to remember that this is a very different house from the House of Commons. It was founded with a different purpose. It has an entirely different tradition. It embodies the principle of federalism.

It is interesting to see how carefully the Fathers of Confederation had examined the history and the current developments in the great republic to the south, because as far as federalism was concerned, that was their main laboratory.

Now, we have to remember something else, Senator Corbin. When we talk about Beauchesne as applying in the Senate of Canada; particularly with regard to the arrangement of business, motions to adjourn and the like, we have to remember that since 1927, I believe, the House of Commons of Canada has had a standing order providing for an automatic adjournment every day and at the end of the week. Here we have no such standing order providing for automatic adjournment. The House of Commons does not sit on Saturdays and Sundays. Here we are. This is Saturday. Here we are.

Senator Cools: It is Tuesday.

Senator Stewart: No, this is Tuesday's sitting which has been continued by the government into Saturday.

Senator Corbin: Actually, it is Saturday, October 9. Whatever the other calendar says, this is Saturday, October 9.

An Hon. Senator: October 14, surely, or the 13th.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators are simply trying to detract from the thrust of my argument.

My point, Senator Corbin is that to rely on Beauchesne, particularly with regard to motions to see strangers, to adjourn, to read the Orders of the Day, to rely on Beauchesne, the rules and description of a game played on another field of an entirely different shape is misleading and we should never fall into that trap. It may be that our rules are defective. I have been complaining about them now since I came here.

An Hon. Senator: Should have changed them.

Senator Stewart: They are defective. But let us reform them in our own way. Let us not be misled by assuming that rules which were devised and adopted for entirely different circumstances can, holus bolus, be carried from that other chamber into this chamber where they are most unsuitable. And I say to you, Senator Corbin, any rules with regard to motions to adjourn must take into account the fact that in the House of Commons those motions take place in a larger context, in a context in which the House adjourns daily at a certain hour on the clock, and the House cannot sit beyond that unless the members agree not to see the clock. They take place in a context in which the House does not sit on Saturday or on Sunday. We must always remember that, Senator Corbin.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Corbin: I appreciate your illuminating comments and enlightening comments. I have growing, increasing respect for your knowledge of the parliamentary practice, sir.

As I was saying, since I read the name of Andy Dolan from Troy, New York, on this essentially Canadian petition, honourable senators may question this right to sign a petition.

Senator Gigantès: But he may be a Canadian simply living there in Troy. He may be there sent by a Canadian company, in which case Canada still considers him a citizen. He may still be carrying a passport, Senator. You may be implying a loyal Canadian has changed his nationality when in fact he has not.

When I was sent to the United States by the Globe and Mail, I was informed much too late that I could have started then in 1956 my five years to acquire the honour of becoming a Canadian citizen, because, since a Canadian company sent me to another country, in those days I could have insisted that my true residence was still Toronto and have become a Canadian citizen by 1961 instead of starting my journey towards this very great honour in 1965 when I moved here, and having to wait until 1970. So I submit, Senator Corbin, you have to be careful. He may be a Canadian who, having been exposed to the American way of life, is even more fiercely Canadian than ever before.

I spent ten years in the United States, and my love for Canada kept growing during those ten years, because this was a much better, more humane, more generous society than the society of the United States. I fear that you may have insulted grievously one of our fellow citizens who lives in Troy, New York; a glorious name but the name of a defeated city, a defeated city whose king committed, as I said the other day, the same stupidity as our current Prime Minister and took in a Trojan horse whose inhabitants destroyed the city afterwards, and he did not listen to the warnings of Cassandra, his daughter—that's right. She finished as a slave, a slave to Agamemnon. He took her back with him to Argos, and she was slain by Clytemnestra who hadn't forgiven Agamemnon for killing her daughter, Iphigenia, and she, Clytemnestra, had a lover called Aegisthus. Aegisthus was a cousin of Agamemnon. Aegisthus' father had been slain by Agamemnon's father, and he had been given his children, except for Aegisthus, who escaped, to eat without being told. Truly, Tory behaviour.

Senator Corbin: I would suggest, Senator Gigantès, you save your breath, save your breath, Honourable colleague, because you are going to need it in an instant, because of the argumentation I will be making on the basis of Bourinot.

So, I was saying, quoting from Bourinot:

> "Aliens not resident in this country have strictly no right to petition parliament."

That was a ruling made in the other place, in the previous century.

Senator Gigantès: But you don't know that he is an alien.

Senator Corbin: Just let me finish. You will see. There is some subtlety to this.

> "In the case of applications for private bills, however, this rule is not in force."

Applications for private bills should read: "petitions for private bills", because no private bill is allowed to be introduced in this house unless the house first receives a petition to that effect.

> "It was agreed in 1878—" and, of course, I am quoting from a practice and precedent set in the other place, but I prefer to be inspired by the larger and wiser British tradition because it is so solidly established.

> "It was agreed in 1878 at the suggestion of Mr. Speaker Anglin—" a great New Brunswicker, by the way; his portrait hangs in the hall of Mr. Speaker on the other side of the House of Commons.

> "It was agreed at the suggestion of Mr. Anglin to receive a petition from the Hartford, USA Directors of the Connecticut, USA, Mutual Life Insurance Company, on the ground that it was a mutual company, partly composed of Canadians, and that it was the subject of parliamentary legislation, the company being required to make a certain deposit before doing business in this country."

And the reference for that is Canadian House of Commons Hansard, 1878, page 590.

There is another reference, Canadian Hansard, February 18, 1878. In 1883 a petition from persons in the city of Portland in the state of Maine, asking for an Act of Incorporation, was received on the ground that the subject matter came within the jurisdiction of the house and in the case already cited. Footnote k, Canadian Hansard, 1883, 138.

> "The reception of such petitions may be considered an act of grace, and since 1883 no objection has been raised to their being brought up in the Canadian House."

And I say, Andy Dolan, of Troy, New York, in my opinion, and I will argue, has every right to add his name to a petition signed principally by citizens of New Brunswick residing for the most part in the greater St. Stephen area.

The basis for wanting to validate his right to sign this petition is that we are now in a totally different transboundary situation as a result of the free trade deal. Now, Mr. Dolan from Troy, New York, is obviously highly concerned with the imposition of the goods and services tax by the Canadian government. But to what extent is the Canadian government Canadian? My understanding is that we sold a lot of our privileges and rights when we signed the free trade deal. We sold our rights to the people south of the border. In a certain sense we can say that Andy Dolan is now a shareholder of Canada. He has a stake, he has a claim to events and proposals and bills for the imposition of taxes in Canada, because of the link, the connection with the free trade deal.

Senator Gigantès, you are the recognized expert, you are the recognized critic in this house on the free trade deal, and I would ask you if you feel that you have it in your heart and mind to support my claim that this Mr. Andy Dolan of Troy, New York, had a right to sign that petition and that his name should remain on that petition? Can I hear from you?

Senator Gigantès: If I understand your argument properly, Senator, you are saying that even if Andy Dolan were a US citizen, he has a right to that petition?

Senator Corbin: Absolutely.

Senator Gigantès: Because Prime Minister Mulroney turned Canada into an economic colony of the United States.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, oh!

Senator Gigantès: Through the Free Trade Agreement. Is that the argument you are making, sir?

Senator Corbin: That is the way you are putting it. I am listening to you. Will you develop that concept?

Senator Gigantès: I will develop it. Thank you for your courtesy.

What was the purpose of the Americans in the Free Trade Agreement and what was our purpose in negotiating it? Americans wanted unrestricted access to our natural resources, and they wanted unrestricted access for raiding our companies. We wanted guaranteed, unimpeded, unharassed entry to their market. What happened at the end? They got what they wanted.

Did we get what we wanted? No. The rules, the definitions of what is an undue subsidy, of what is dumping, were left to be negotiated later, and not as in GATT, where the negotiation is among many nations, most of them small, who would side with us and against the American giant, but in a one-on-one confrontation of a mouse with an elephant. In other words, the Mulroney government bungled that negotiation as it has bungled everything. The Americans wanted something. The energy crisis now shows how much they depend on supplies from Canada for their safety. Canadian Hydro Electric Power is immense. The Americans know all these things. We have enough natural gas for three centuries of north American consumption. These were precious things the Americans wanted. We gave them away without getting anything in exchange.

[Senator Corbin.]

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Gigantès: There is that economist from Queens, I forget his name, a former socialist who became a Tory. It is a natural transition from one extreme to another. He said the most important thing in the agreement—I have his book; his name escapes me but I will get back to it; it will come back to me in a while. Maybe it is my age; what can you do, you see? Anyhow, he was saying that the most important thing in the Free Trade Agreement was that it established the right of Canadians to invest in the United States. I mean, whom does that interest, other than the rich people opposite? The ordinary Canadian does not care whether his boss invests in the United States or not. The ordinary Canadian would like his boss to invest here in Canada and create jobs. So we made a process that was already far too advanced, the export of capital from this country to the United States, even easier by the Free Trade Agreement.

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: Would the member allow me a question?

Senator Gigantès: Get my title right, please.

Senator Beaudoin: Listen, Senator, we are at the petition stage. For hours and hours now we have been wondering just to what extent we can discuss this issue in the current context, and the fact is, now we seem to be discussing two things at the same time—petitions and free trade. There is no direct relationship between the two. The right to petition is a right that we inherited from Great Britain at least 300 years ago, and perhaps even 400, and it involves the right of every British subject to appeal to the Crown and to Parliament to have a wrong redressed. That is what the right to petition is all about. We believe in that right, and we have never objected to it in any way.

With respect to the point of order, I, myself, have always said—and I repeated this two nights ago—that if the name is not to be printed in the proceedings, then there is no point in reading it out in the Chamber; it seems totally illogical to me to read off 5,000 names over a period of five hours if they are not even to be listed in the Minutes. But, in any case, I have already raised my point of order; I have no desire to rehash that. But with respect to the right to petition, which I personally, as a constitutional expert, am a great believer in, we must introduce any claims that Her Majesty's subjects, or we, as Canadian citizens, may have against the State or the political authorities. I fail to see what the right to petition has to do with free trade or the common market. I also have difficulty understanding why Canada is being criticized for having relinquished a tiny bit of its sovereignty by signing a free trade agreement. Remember, the Americans did exactly the same thing. The French, German, English and Italian have all done exactly the same thing. It is both a European and North American trend—indeed, a universal one. And there is nothing wrong with it. History is moving in that direction. But we are holding two debates simultaneously here, and trying to link things in a purely artificial manner. There is no necessary link between the right to petition and the right to conclude an agreement on the basis of a certain number of common economic values. Now I am perfectly willing to discuss the common market or the Free Trade Agreement, but the fact is, they have absolutely nothing to do with the right to petition that originated in England under the Bill of Rights of 1688 and the many British Petitions of Acts which are part of our heritage and of which I, personally, am very proud. However, they are two completely different things.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Corbin: I recognize your expertise in constitutional law, and I certainly do not dare engage in a duel with you on such matters, but I do not know whether you were here earlier.

Senator Beaudoin: Yes, I was here.

Senator Corbin: In reading the names of petitioners, I had stopped at the signature of Mr. Andy Dollen, of Troy, New York, and was trying to make the point that an American citizen, under the circumstances, does have the right to sign and, furthermore, we are obliged to receive his signature on a petition opposing the implementation of the Goods and Services Tax. I would like to quote from Bourinot in that regard.

Senator Beaudoin: Are you saying that an American citizen has a right to petition Her Majesty, the Queen of Canada or the Canadian Parliament? Is that the claim you are making?

Senator Corbin: I quoted from Bourinot in that regard. I believe you were not actually present at the time I made that argument. It is not very long, but very interesting. I would just like to quote from Bourinot, page 236 of the Fourth edition of 1916—the one which usually appears on the table.

Aliens not residing in this country have strictly no right to petition Parliament—strictly speaking—it is clear cut, crystal clear. Strictly speaking they have no right to petition Parliament.

In the case of application for private bills, petitions, for private bills—

[Translation]

It is the same thing again, because one cannot table a private member's bill in either the Senate or the House of Commons unless it is preceded by a petition; that is provided for in our rules in great detail.

[English]

It was agreed in 1878 at the suggestion of Mr. Speaker Anglin—whose head office was quite obviously in the United States,

[English]

—to receive a petition from the Hartford Directors of the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company.

[Translation]

Have you come across that term before?

Senator Beaudoin: Oh, yes.

Senator Corbin: Perhaps you could explain it to me later.

[English]

. . . Mr. Speaker Anglin . . .

agreed

. . . to receive a petition from—that company—

> . . . on the ground that it was a mutual company, partly composed of Canadians, and that it was the subject of parliamentary legislation, the company being required to make a certain deposit before doing business in this country.
> In 1883, a petition from certain persons in the city of Portland in the State of Maine, asking for an act of incorporation, was received on the ground that the subject-matter came within the jurisdiction of the house, as in the case already cited.

The reception of such petitions may be considered an act of grace; and since 1883 no objection has been raised to their being brought up in the Canadian house.

[Translation]

So, what actually occurred? A mutual insurance company, composed of both American and Canadian citizens, petitioned the House of Commons and the then Speaker of the House, Mr. Anglin, decided that because this company was doing business in both countries, it was perfectly normal that their directors be authorized to petition the Parliament of Canada, including the House of Commons and the Senate. And I say: Because of the Free Trade Agreement—an agreement that is currently in effect and will continue to operate over the next nine years under the terms negotiated, and which will literally eliminate customs barriers between our two countries—American citizens do have the right to petition Parliament because of the government's decision to introduce legislation to implement a Goods and Services Tax. More than ever now, Americans do have a great interest in everything that is going on in Canada, and they will be closely watching every legislative initiative being taken on Parliament Hill!

Senator Beaudoin: Perhaps you would allow me to say a word or two, now that you have made that clarification; you have quoted Bourinot, who is an authority. You are saying that there were Canadian citizens among the petitioners! Well, of course, that changes everything, doesn't it! I believe you said that the two groups were part of a mutual insurance company.

Senator Corbin: Yes.

Senator Beaudoin: I understand. Of course, if both Americans and Canadians are working together in one way or another—say, in the context of a mutual insurance company—then I do have no hesitation in agreeing that such a right may exist, although it may require further study. I would be perfectly willing to concede that a right to petition could exist in that case, because in my view, any Canadian citizen and, before the Statute of Westminster, any British subject living in Canada, had and still has the right to petition. We have maintained that right. But where I do not follow your argument is when you say: "Because citizens will henceforth be in a position to petition the Parliament of Canada". In law, we would call that a non sequitur. That is a Latin expression used in law. Just because we have a free trade agreement with the United States, Americans do not become Canadians, and we Canadians do not become Americans. Try telling a Frenchman, or Mrs. Thatcher, or Mr. Mitterrand that they are both French and English, and you will see the kind of reaction you get! England is still an independent country. The same goes for France. Germany, too, is an independent country. They are linked by treaty, which is just fine. I fully agree with that. But by the some token, they do not lose their nationality. I do not believe that by signing a free trade agreement, a citizen of the American republic acquires the same right to appeal to the Parliament of Canada that I, Gérald Beaudoin, hold as a citizen. I just do not believe it! I have read nothing written by any Canadian jurist that would support that! This is the very first time I have ever heard such a theory. I do not agree at all that our signature on a free trade agreement changes our allegiance. We are Canadian citizens and we will remain Canadian citizens. We can do what we like with the Free Trade Agreement. We had a free trade agreement with the Americans between 1854 and 1864, and it worked very well. The Americans were the ones who decided to end the agreement following the Civil War. But we did have a free trade agreement with them. I, personally, believe it was a good idea. You say it was wrong. Well, in politics, people frequently disagree. I may say white, and you may say black. But the fact is that the agreement in no way changes my allegiance. I remain a Canadian citizen and I am proud to be one. The fellow from New York or Troy you have been talking about remains an American citizen, and I do not think his allegiance is changed either. We have a constitutional monarchy here, whereas they have a republic. That will continue to be the case. And, for goodness' sake, free trade agreements are a historical trend.

Senator Gigantès: The Honourable Senator Beaudoin, for whom I have infinite respect, is certainly a great expert on constitutional matters, as well as being an absolutely charming man whom I like very much and who is adored by this students. That much is clear. He is certainly someone we are very pleased to have here. It is an honour to have you here, in fact, but you did misrepresent what I said. I am not opposed to free trade. What I am opposed to is the ignorant way in which this government, your government, negotiated the agreement. You make a comparison with Europe.

Senator Beaudoin: You are not opposed to free trade?

Senator Gigantès: To the principle, no. Not at all. I actually wrote a book on it, entitled, in French "Le libre-échange?", and, in English, "Is a Free Trade Deal Really for You?". In fact, I would be delighted to provide you with autographed copies. As I say, I am in favour of free trade, but we do not want to be "screwed", and we certainly got screwed with this agreement. With your permission, that is a parliamentary term (laughter). It is not prohibited language. So, what exactly is my objection to this free trade agreement? Well, you in fact gave me the reasons for my opposition. You make a comparison with the European Economic Community, which includes the four major countries and all the small ones. They have a weighted vote. The major countries have two votes each, while the small countries have one vote each—except for Spain, which has two, thereby giving a majority to the small countries. So, within the European community, the small countries can actually vote together and beat the big countries. It is also possible to divide Italy and France, because they have disputes over wine and their interests do not always converge. So, a small country within the common market is not facing a monolithic partner, as we are under this agreement with the United States. Within GATT, there are arbitration commissions and in the case of disputes between us and the United States, there are neither American nor Canadian judges; the judges are selected from third countries, and most of them represent small countries who have a tendency to understand the kind of problems facing a small country such as ours, living next to a giant like the United States. So, if we are talking about signing a free trade agreement with a giant where only two parties are involved, first of all, it would have been better to avoid it, ifi possible, and try to achieve free trade with the United States in the context of the GATT, where we would have had support from other countries that have problems similar to the ones we have with the United States.

But if we wanted to sign an agreement with the United States, we should have made sure we got what we wanted; instead, we simply gave the Americans what they wanted without receiving anything in return. If I get my book, I can quote the statements of Mrs. Carney, who was the minister responsible for the negotiations at the time. She said that we wanted immunity, that we did not want trade-restrictive American laws to apply to our exports. She said they were iniquitous, unfair laws that the Americans change whenever it suits them. The agreement confirms that the Americans will be entitled to change those laws whenever they wish. They have only to inform us of their intention. So, the government said: We are going to negotiate with them now, for another seven years. We have some four and a half years left in which to negotiate with them.

So, these people may reach an agreement with us. Their Congress may decide to change the ground rules. The "level playing field" they have been talking about will be marked out by them. Did we have any assets? Yes, we did. But we gave them away. We gave them all away, including access to our energy resources. We could have made them pay a price for that. But we simply gave them the right to come and buy up all our Canadian companies.

I have a very strong objection to that—very strong—because that means an American company can come to Canada, eliminate the research function within that Canadian company and simply replace it with research to be conducted by the parent company in Colorado, or San Francisco. What we are left with is a warehouse. Furthermore, they have unconditional access to all our companies. Which branch plant do you think they ae going to close first when a crisis arises? If you are a major American industrialist, you need American government contracts. And there are senators in the United States who are an awful lot more influential than we are. Suppose one of those senators, who is the chairman of a committee, calls you and says: Listen, if you close your plant in Montana, do not bother coming before my committee to get military contracts. Well, of course, you are going to close your branch operation in Alberta, not in Montana. You do not need to have a branch operation in Alberta, because you can simply take the natural gas out of Alberta, in any case. There is absolutely nothing to prevent you from doing that. That is my objection. We behaved like utter fools. It was total incompetence right from the start, just as it was when we launched the Meech Lake negotiations without leaving ourselves a way out, without preparing alternative positions and quite unprepared for Mr. Trudeau's opposition, which was certainly predictable. If someone had asked you if Mr. Trudeau would oppose it, you would most certainly have said yes. So what are we going to do if Mr. Trudeau voices his opposition and a lot of people agree with him? The fact is, the whole thing was not properly thought through nor was it properly negotiated. And it has done terrible harm to our country.

Now the question of Canada's constitutional future is out of the hands of the federal government. It is now in the hands of the Quebec government. Okay, fine; I am going to go from being a Canadian citizen to being a Quebec citizen. I will be a good Quebec citizen. But when you are the Prime Minister of Canada, you have a duty to defend the federal government. When you are the Prime Minister of a little mouse like Canada and you are negotiating an agreement with the giant living next door, you have a duty to protect that mouse by allowing him to be associated with other small animals who can harass the elephant. But we did not do that. It was pure stupidity. That is what I am complaining about. We could have done a much better job of negotiating.

Just look at what happened when a number of small countries joined the European Community. Look at what the Spanish, the Portuguese and the Greeks got. They got a lot more than we did.

Look at the free trade agreement between Israel and the United States. And yet, Israel is totally dependent on the United States. Israel could never survive without several billion dollars' worth of American military aid every year. And yet, they have a free trade agreement that gives them more privileges and a lot more protection than we have, and which provides for a lot less control over their economy than the Americans will have over ours. Those are my objections. I am not opposed in principle to free trade; you are absolutely right to say that this is a universal trend, that everyone is moving in this direction. But we must realize that capital will go where labour is cheapest. That is going to happen. What are we going to do to defend ourselves? One does not immediately decide to sell out to the United States. That is the mindset of the director of an American branch plant, which is what our Prime Minister once was. Yes, Sir; you do not go saying no to your American boss in Cleveland, but that is a bad habit to get into if you want to defend Canada's interests. He did not defend them. He has not managed this country well. He has shown only indifference towards the real interest of this country. He has not shown any foresight.

When I was at naval school in England, we used to have to do exercises. One of those exercises was this: you are in command of one of the smallest vessels in Her Majesty's navy. You arrive with your vessel on one of Her Majesty's smallest possessions—say a small island in the Pacific out in the middle of the ocean that has been completely devastated by a natural disaster, either a huge fire, an earthquake, a tidal-wave or a hurricane. What is the first thing you must do upon your arrival—the very first, the most important thing? Telling young people aged 17 or 18 to think in this way is really training them. Well, the answer is to find a source of drinking water. Why? Because without drinking water, you cannot care for your wounded, and without drinking water, humans cannot survive; so if you have a source of drinking water, because you control that source, you also have political control. That is what foresight and intelligence are all about, and the current government is totally devoid of both. Je ne lui permettrais même pas de faire fonctionner un ascenseur.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to continue reading this petition. I hope the Clerk charged by the Senate with considering the admissibility of this petition will take into account the following names.

[English]

(Names of signatories read)

Now, I have relatives—I have a sister-in-law, I have nephews and nieces in Quispamsis and I know where it is. I go there from time to time and I would like to tell the honourable Senators about Quispamsis. It is 3 miles northeast of Rothesay and Rothesay is some reasonable distance from the city of St. John, the port city of St. John, New Brunswick but I would guess roughly some 10, 15 kms. Roughly, yes.

I once attended a wedding in Rothesay, I was best man at a wedding. I'm sorry to say the marriage didn't work out. But the people whose wedding I witnessed remain faithful Liberals, loyal Liberals throughout their trials, great people. One of them is a writer, and an esteemed friend.

In fact, that friend happened to work with me when the first Department of Youth was established in the province of New Brunswick in the very early 1960's when my compatriot, Louis Robichaud became Premier of New Brunswick. He had made the establishment of a youth department an electoral promise and he kept his word and I was one of the very first—not the first, but one of the first five employees hired to man, if I may use that term, to man that department. Of course, we had women who came—who joined the staff and it has grown into quite an important department in New Brunswick with a variety of programs and it has evolved and even though I do not follow it to this day because my main interests are now at the level of federal politics.

Anyhow, Quispamsis, three miles northeast of Rothesay, post office established around the year 1885. It was known as Rothesay Post Office, I should say, from 1885 to 1931. The village was incorporated in 1966. It was named by the European-North American Railway in 1857, from the Maliseet Quispem Sis, which means "Little lake" in reference to Ritchie Lake, as it is now known. It was also formerly known as Wetmore's, Gondola Point Road and Lakefield. That, then, is Quispamsis, not to be confused with Quisibis or Quisibis River, which is in my former riding of Madawaska-Victoria, and I will come to Quisibis and Quisibis River later.

So going down the list, there is a signature from Moncton, New Brunswick, one from Saint Andrews and another from St. Stephen.

I notice that on this petition there is a signature with the address Scarborough, Maine. I put this petitioner in the same class as the petitioner from New York whom I spoke of earlier. However, this petitioner's name is Tinker, and she is telling the government not to tinker with the GST. I think the government ought to hear her voice because there are many Americans all along that Maine-New Brunswick border up to the boundary with the Province of Quebec, who do business in New Brunswick, who cross the border each day to buy their groceries, their clothing and who come into Canada for various services. We in New Brunswick, of course reciprocate. We in New Brunswick enjoy an excellent relationship with the citizens of the State of Maine. Some goods are cheaper in Maine, and, for them, some of our goods are cheaper.

However, honourable senators, these American citizens who use our facilities and our services will be affected by the GST, and they are protesting strongly. They think it is something in which you should not be engaging.

As far as I'm concerned, if we intend to tax goods and services, the net result will be disastrous. Just think, for example, what it will do to the tourism industry. The provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and, to quite a degree, the province of Newfoundland, rely heavily on tourism. In fact, I would say "heavily" is putting it mildly. Those provinces rely to a very great extent on tourism from the United States.

Do you think for a moment that Americans will come to Canada and subject themselves to paying through the nose and the ears this goods and services tax? These Americans are sending a serious signal to the Canadian Parliament and to the Canadian Senate. The message is, "Very well, boys and girls up there -" as they often refer to Canada. We are "up there"; we are that area of the continent from which all the cold fronts go down into Boston, New York and along the Atlantic coast. They are telling us, "You boys and girls, go ahead, tax. We can vacation elsewhere. We can buy our goods, our groceries and what have you, elsewhere. We do not need to go into Canada and pays a goods and services tax on top of the provincial and federal taxes that you have on gasoline. You can lump it, Canada. We will go elsewhere. Even though we would dearly like to continue to sojourn on the beaches of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia."

Just think, honourable senators, for a moment what this tax will do to the tourism industry in Nova Scotia. We were told, in no uncertain terms what it would do to the tourism industry in each of the four provinces that the committee visited.

Therefore, honourable senators, when Ms. Tinker says, "Don't tinker with the GST", I take that very seriously, honourable senators.

Senator Bosa: I was just wondering, since you mentioned Nova Scotia, Senator Forrestall is from Nova Scotia. Have you asked him how he feels about the imposition of this value-added tax and the consequences that it will have on the tourist industry in his province? I was just wondering whether you had put that question to Senator Forrestall.

Senator Corbin: No, I have not put it, but I notice that he is in deep discussion with a colleague. He is deeply concerned about the GST. It has suddenly struck him that he was asked to become a senator in order to help the government get their program through the Senate, but I believe he had not examined in detail what the government program entailed, and he is now awakening to the facts. Honourable senators, I think we have shaken him in his very foundations. I see him discussing with a colleague as to what his stance ought to be if we ever get to a vote on this tax.

Senator Forrestall is definitely concerned. I have known him for 22 years, and he always stood up, in the House of Commons for example, and defended to his last breath the rights of Atlantic Canada. This GST really concerns him. He knows it will wipe out the tourist industry in Nova Scotia. It will literally wipe it out. Is that not a fact, Senator Stewart? If you rush to your seat, you could answer me.

In the meantime, I want to point out again that this is the second signature of the person residing in the United States who is protesting the imposition of the Goods and Services Tax. I think if senators read very carefully through their millions of petitions, they will find many more signatures of this nature.

Senator Stewart: Senator Corbin, you asked about Senator Forrestall's stand on the GST. I think there is very little doubt what his stand will be when he votes in this house as a senator from Nova Scotia. It is obvious that the GST will penalize very heavily those people who live at the extremities of the country.

If the GST is acceptable to the people of any part of the country, it is to the people in and around the Golden Horseshoe. Certainly it is not acceptable to the people of Newfoundland or Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia.

Just in case Senator Forrestall, on his own, would not see this; in other words, if, out of modesty, he had some doubt and declined to accept his own reasonable conclusion, he has only to read the words of Senator Buchanan who, speaking as Premier of Nova Scotia, denounced the GST in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia.

Senator Frith: You mean, as distinguished from how he will vote on it, of course?

Senator Stewart: I still have hopes, Senator Frith. I think that, at the end of the day—to coin a phrase—he may yet be willing to vote on behalf of the people of Nova Scotia.

Senator Bosa: I heard something that was said by Senator Stewart a moment ago and I cannot let it go unchallenged. I would not want it to be part of the record of this house without trying to redress the wrong impression that he has created when he said that the GST affects the extremities of the country, such as Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and New Brunswick. He then went on to say something like "Unlike the people in the Golden Horseshoe".

Senator Stewart: No, Senator Bosa. You misunderstood me. I said if there is any part of the country in which the ordinary person might find the GST acceptable, it would be those parts of the country which, by reason of location, would not have to pay this punitive tax on transportation; in other words, those parts of the country that are central. However, I started off by saying "If". In fact I believe—and I think this was the point that you are making, Senator Bosa—that even in the "Golden Horseshoe, this tax is unacceptable.

Senator Bosa: I would like to point out that when Senator Stewart says "the Golden Horseshoe", he is talking about Toronto, Hamilton and the adjacent areas. I want to reassure Senator Stewart, if he is not already assured, that the opposition to the GST in these areas is phenomenal. I have thousands of names here from Oakville, Toronto, and from Hamilton. They are all against GST, so the honourable gentleman should not be under the impression that central Canada, or Toronto, or these other populated areas are indifferent to the imposition of the GST.

Senator Stewart: I do not doubt what the honourable senator says. It would be appreciated, I believe, by all honourable senators if he would adduce proof by reading petitions to that effect.

Senator Bosa: I will.

Senator Corbin: Thank you, honourable senators for your contribution. Again, I will reiterate; Ms. Tinker of Scarborough, Maine is saying "Don't tinker around with the GST or we will stay home". In other words, don't tinker with the people of Maine by imposing the GST, and don't take us for suckers if you think we intend to continue touring your fair provinces and using your lovely, sandy beaches, because we will not sojourn in Canada and pay another tax on Canadian goods and services.

On the petition, there are three more signatures from Saint Stephen. I must admit that they are difficult to make out.

Some honourable senators have told me that we have strange names in New Brunswick. I would like to explain to you where the name of Campobello came from. Campobello, of course, is an island in the Passamaquoddy Bay, which is at the head of the Bay of Fundy tides area. It constitutes part of the Canada-US border. Campobello Island was named by Williams Owen, its grantee. The Crown gave William Owen the whole island in 1770 and he says:

> I named the Island Campobello the latter partly complimentary and punning on the name of the Governor of the Province, Lord William Campbell, and partly as applicable to the nature of the soil and fine appearance of the island—

That is a compliment, I believe, Senator Bosa, to the Italian language. Is "Campobello" not pure Italian?

Senator Bosa: It most certainly is; it means "a beautiful field", "Campo" being field and "bello" meaning beautiful.

Senator Corbin: Yes, that is how beautiful that island is; Campobello. It is a musical name. I wish I had musical talents; I would write a song to celebrate the beauty of Campobello. I continue:

> —and partly applicable to the nature of the soil and fine appearance of the island. Campobella in Spanish and Italian being, I presume synonymous to the French "Beau-champ".

[Translation]

Beauchamp, what a beautiful name! Senator Gigantès, shall we go to the races at Beauchamp?

Senator Gigantès: That's Longchamp.

Senator Corbin: Longchamp! I stand corrected. I am a little rusty this morning.

[English]

Senator Bosa: It could not be Spanish, because the Italian word "Bello", meaning "beautiful" in Spanish is "lindo".

Senator Corbin: "Bello" in latin means "war".

Senator Bosa: No, that is "bellum".

Senator Gigantès: No, it has nothing to do with war. It has to do with beauty. It is a different root altogether. There are two roots in latin; one with a double "l" and one with a single "l".

Senator Corbin: Thank you, senator. I will have to research that further.

In any event, as I read, William Owen explained the origin of the name he gave to his island.

In a book by Admiral W.F.W. Owen in 1842, it is translated "Fairfield". In other words, Campobello as being "Fairfield". I think I prefer Campobello myself. It is so musical.

However, going back into the night of history, the Passamaquoddy, an Indian tribe, inhabited that general area of New Brunswick, Maine and the Islands, and in Passamaquoddy, the word "Abahquit" means "lying parrallel with the land". The book says "refer to the Mic-Mac name of PEI". It has the same meaning.

Southack, in 1733, refers to this island as the Great Island of Passamaquoddy; D'Anville in 1755 refers to it as "Isle Pascamadie. Mitchell—incidentally, the trouble Mr. Mitchell has caused us over the Maine-New Brunswick border! If only his map had been lost in the archives of the King of France, Maine would not be jutting into Canada, as it is now. It is Mr. Mitchell's map which has created all the problems and allowed the Americans to claim the so-called disputed territory which was only settled by the treaty of 1842, commonly known as the Webster-Ashburton Treaty.

Senator Gigantès: Is the honourable senator aware of the fact that, despite the attachment to their roots in France, Quebecers do resent the neglect of the French Kings, who spent money on their mistresses and festivities at Versailles instead of looking after the fleet. In consequence, Quebec was lost. France would have been able to keep Quebec, and at an even earlier date France would have been able to keep Acadia, which it gave up under the Treaty of Utrecht, because Louis XIV was depleting the fortunes of France by maintaining all of these foppish nobles in the garrets of Versailles and in having fantastic celebrations every night, such as masked balls and the like.

Later, the same thing happened with his grandson, Louis XV. He also depleted the fortunes of France. There was a great french Admiral Le Baille de Suprême who invented all of the tactics that Nelsen later used—such as crossing the "T", for instance—and Nelsen admitted that. The great French admiral however never had enough money to scrape the barnacles from the keels of his ships. Those senators on this side and opposite who know about sailing ships will realize what loss of speed a grave encrustation of barnacles represents. Also, the French admiral never had money to line the keels of his ships with copper sheets, whereas the British had started doing that, and whenever he had to go anywhere, such as crossing the Atlantic, all the British fleet had to do was go a little way from him, arrive well before him and be in a position such that, when he faced them, he was at a disadvantage. They always went to windward of him. That is why, today, North America is English. It could have been French North America.

So the Kings of France betrayed the people of Quebec and the people of Quebec resent that to this day. Although they love France and they love their roots and they are proud of their language and the history of France, still, they do feel that they were let down and betrayed.

Of course, they received the most inestimable gift from France which is the people of Quebec themselves. They are a race of survivors with wonderful spirits, with bonhomie, with great joie de vivre, and I will say this—and I do not care who contradicts me; I have visited 65 countries in my life and nowhere have I seen women who are as wonderful as the women of Quebec.

Senator Corbin: Senator, I would now like to conclude my recitation of the origin of the name "Campobello". I was saying that Mitchell, in 1755, put the island on his map as "Isle Pascamadie"; Lewis, in 1756, refers to it as "Pasmaquidy Island"; Morris, in 1761, calls it "Passamaquodi Island"; Owen Grant, in 1767, called it "Passamaquoddy Outer Island". Finally, in 1779, Des Barres called it "Camp Bello Island".

Honourable senators, yesterday and today I have been talking—and of course, yesterday and today is October 9th, as far as parliamentary business is concerned. People in the gallery are not aware, I am sure, that in this house, we are now on Saturday, October 9. Do not be confused. This is the Parliament of Canada; this is the Senate of Canada. In this room presently, you have left behind Saturday, October 12—

An Hon. Senator: The 13th.

Senator Corbin: —Saturday the 13th on the front lawn when you set foot in this building. In this house it is now Saturday, October 9th.

Senator Stewart, what is your problem?

Senator Stewart: Senator Corbin may I help at this point? I am reading from a book entitled The Canadian House of Commons. I quote from page 51:

> Each sitting of the House of Commons normally takes place on a separate day of the week, but there is nothing to prevent the House from continuing to sit beyond midnight or into a third of fourth day. For this reason, the sessions are divided not into days but into sitting days, or even more exactly, "sittings". There were 111 sittings in the 1912-13 session of Parliament, but two of the those sittings lasted a total of 12 days. One sitting began 3:00 p.m. on Monday, March 3, 1913 and continued to 12:00 p.m. midnight on Saturday, March 8. On the following Monday, March 10, the House met at 3:00 p.m. and continued until 11:32 p.m. on Saturday, March 15.

Therefore when we use the expression "days", we must be careful. There may be many calendar days in a sitting day in the House of Commons or in the Senate.

The book then goes on to say:

> However, when there is no chance of misunderstanding, "day" and "sitting" are used as interchangeable terms.

Perhaps while I am on my feet, Senator Corbin, you will let me clarify a point I attempted to make earlier; a point which I suspect I did not succeed in making. I mentioned that it is misleading to carry into this house the practices of the other place.

Senator Corbin: Yes. That is the very point I had asked you to make, and you left that aside. You went on to something else, so please explain the connection now.

Senator Stewart: There are many differences, indeed, in the foundation of procedure between the House of Commons on the one hand and the Senate of Canada on the other hand, and one of the most important differences relates to the hours of sitting.

In the 1920s the House of Commons designated the hour of 11:00 p.m. on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday as the hour of adjournment. Since that was a period of relatively short sessions, no need was felt for a rule enabling the House to decide to sit late without unanimous agreement. In other words, in that period any one member could stop the house sitting beyond 11:00 p.m.

In 1952 the hour of adjournment on Friday was set at 6:00 o'clock in the evening, but that simply followed a pattern which had been set in 1906 for the adjournment on Wednesdays. Therefore there is a notable difference in the basic procedure of the House of Commons; a difference between what happens there and what happens here in this chamber. In the House of Commons today, now, Saturday, we would not be in a sitting which started last Tuesday.

Senator Corbin may remember that, in 1965, this rule for an automatic adjournment at a specified hour had been found to create difficulty. There were certain members in the House of Commons after the 1963 election who always insisted on seeing the clock. I can hear their oratory yet: "Mr. Speaker, it is five minutes after six. This house is adjourned." And of course they were right, under the rules. Therefore in 1965, as a result of that annoyance caused repeatedly by two or three members—the name that comes to mind is Monsieur Gilles Grégoire.

Senator Corbin: By the way, Senator Stewart, who was the Speaker at that time?

Senator Stewart: The Speaker at that time, I believe, was from Montreal. I believe he became a senator later.

Senator Frith: You mean from Cornwall.

Senator Stewart: No. In 1965, the standing orders were changed so that now, under Standing Order six (6) the House on any day may decide to sit beyond the regular hour of ajournement if ten or more members do not object.

• (1030)

Now, when that account says "now", of course, it refers to the situation a few years ago. That Standing Order of the House of Commons is effective only against isolated mavericks. Those members who, in a particular instance, do not wish to cooperate with the government, almost always can rally at least nine other members with them. For example, in the long 1970-72 session, the government tried to use that Standing Order eight times, but was successful only once. Consequently, it was fair to say that with very rare exceptions the House of Commons adjourns at the early hour appointed by the Standing Orders. It is most extraordinary for the Commons to sit late. And, of course, they do not sit on Saturdays and Sundays. So, we are operating in a different world here. We are operating in the 18th century.

Senator Bosa: That's right. We are behind.

Senator Stewart: That is the major difference.

An Hon. Senator: Senator Stewart, would you permit a question? Would you think there would be any advantage for this House to abolish the rules of the Senate of Canada and adopt forthwith the rules of the House of Commons?

Senator Stewart: I think, honourable senator, that we would have to discover what all the implications of that proposal would be. Let us take, for example, the problem of the Speaker. The Speaker here is one of the 24 representatives from a division and that is why the Speaker, our Speaker, not by Standing Order but under the Constitution, has a right to participate in votes, leave the Chair and to debate.

The situation is quite different in the House of Commons. There, the speaker does not vote except to break a tie. And even when he is breaking a tie he does not vote according to his own views. He votes according to certain rules. You might say the rule is that the Speaker is never to break eggs. The Speaker votes to leave the situation to be decided later.

An Hon. Senator: He votes for the status quo.

Senator Stewart: That's correct, honourable senator; he votes for the status quo. He maintains the existing situation. In other words, he does not exercise his own judgement, his own reason on a particular question. So, there would be real difficulties in simply adopting the rules of the House of Commons in the Senate. That's not to say, and I think this is the real thrust of the honourable senator's question, that's not to say that we ought not to consider modernizing the rules of the Senate.

What has happened, honourable senators, is that because of two great developments, the House of Commons has ceased to be a good debating chamber. One of those developments is the increasing complexity of the business now coming to that House. The second development is that by reason of the very limited hours the House sits, it is difficult to have truly good debates in the House of Commons. As a consequence, more and more business, more and more real business is being extruded from the House of Commons into the Senate. A lot of that business is uncontroversial, but takes a long time. We had here, for example, a couple of years ago the emergencies bill, a most important bill which conferred upon the government of the day, any government of the day, power to make Orders-in-Council affecting the property rights of the citizens, their civil liberties and so on.

Now, this was not a topic on which there was little political excitement at that time. It didn't have, as they say, much political sex appeal. The bill swept through the House of Commons. It was uncontroversial. But when it came here, senators on both sides of the House read the bill pretty carefully. It was found that the bill as it came from the House of Commons, not with the opposition over there dug in and screaming, would have allowed the Governor-in-Council to draft men and women into the armed forces and send them overseas to fight in war. That was the kind of power that the House of Commons was prepared to delegate to the Governor-General-in-Council.

Senator Gigantès: To Mulroney.

Senator Stewart: Well, to any Prime Minister.

Senator Gigantès: Mulroney is the bad example.

Senator Frith: It's a bad principle for any.

Senator Stewart: No, no, no, Senator Gigantès. I think Progressive Conservatives would have been as uneasy if it had been Mackenzie King or Pierre Elliott Trudeau. It was bad legislation. Some of us on both sides of the House saw this, and we put forward an amendment. When we sent the amendment to the House of Commons there was no controversy. They just had not thought of it. Indeed, apparently the law officers of the Crown had not thought of it. I tell you that that bill took a long time. It was uncontroversial; yet it ate up a lot of time in the Senate.

Then, of course, we have had highly controversial bills. The pharmaceutical bill is an example. The unemployment insurance bill is another example. So, I say, more and more business, some controversial, some non-controversial is descending on the Senate. I tell you the rules of the Senate are directly out of the late 18th century. That is the truth of the matter.

Senator Frith: That does not make it bad.

Senator Stewart: That does not make them bad but it means they are not prepared for the volume of work that is coming here. So, there is no question in my mind but that at an appropriate time we have to do something about that. I find it unthinkable that we do not have our own book of commentary on our rules and practices. We use Beauchesne. But the Commons is different. Theirs is basketball and ours is football or vice versa. We use Erskine May, an authority sutied to the Parliament of a unitary state; but Canada is a federation. The procedure of the two Parliaments has moved apart. We have moved away from them and they have moved away from us since 1867. The Senate of Australia has a very good book, Odger's Senate Procedure. It is a splendid book. We ought to look at it. So, there is no question, senator, that at the appropriate time we ought to get on with procedural reform.

The problem that now confronts us is that here we are halfway through what appears to be the crucial game of the season, and the speaker—the umpire—undertakes to rewrite the rules on his own. We all agree, I suspect, that was not the way to go about reform. It didn't work. The problem then is, can we do it ourselves halfway through the crucial game? It would be very difficult. I hope I have dealt with the question the honourable senator asked.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senator, can I ask a question of Senator Stewart? You will recall, oh, some time ago, Senator, two years ago, Senator Molgat either through an enquiry or some other means suggested that the speaker of this place be elected. And I for one supported it. I asked him, however, if just the election of the speaker was sufficient; did he intend to go further and to take away some of the archaic privileges that the Speaker has the right of the one party to overrule the speaker's ruling.

Senator Frith: The right of the majority rather than one party.

Senator MacDonald: Yes, yes. There is a mixture here that I do no understand between the Constitution and the rules. Supposing that the Prime Minister was to agree that although this would be a Constitutional matter because the Constitution requires that the speaker will be appointed by the Prime Minister, he would accept the person elected.

[Senator Stewart.]

Senator Frith: He could agree to follow an election finally. He could just say I will appoint whoever.

Senator MacDonald: Exactly, exactly. He retains the power of appointment. He says in effect, I will appoint that person whom the Senate has elected.

Now then, if he had done that, does it simply require a change of the rules in the Senate to determine the powers of the speaker? In other words, on the one hand if the Prime Minister agrees to appoint and does not give up his powers to appoint, but agrees to appoint, then the rules could be changed more in conformity or similar to that which exists in the House of Commons except for the fact that the speaker would not have the same power, he would not run the administration, just a matter of his powers. Is there anything—

Senator Frith: It could become—if enough Prime Ministers did it, it could become a convention.

Senator Stewart: Well, we have, I suppose, a kind of parallel that may be helpful. The Government of Alberta against the objections—over the objections of the present government—held an election for a person to be a senator from Alberta. Eventually, that person was summoned by the Governor General on the advice of the Prime Minister of Canada. That seems to suggest, Senator MacDonald, that there may be something in your line of thought as to how this could be done. You know, let's not get mesmerized by the word "election". Let us not get mesmerized by the word "elect." Let's not think that if we could get an elected speaker we have suddenly solved a large part of our procedural problems. They have had an elected speaker in the House of Commons since 1867 and from time to time there have been serious problems. The great blowup, as we all know, was in 1956.

When we were working on the reform of the rules of the House of Commons, we looked at Westminster, again and again and yet again. Members from all three parties went over there; we consulted. They kept telling us that one of the most efficient and simplest methods to reform procedure is to enhance the powers of the Speaker. But we now tell you, Senator MacDonald, that you cannot do that unless you have a speaker whose impartiality is beyond question. They invited us to look at all the things they had done there, to ensure that once a person is elected Speaker by the members of the House, in a sense that person has taken the veil. Yes, this is correct, he has taken the veil. He is out of politics. He ceases to go to political meetings, to attend caucus. They have surrounded their Speaker with rules and arrangements to assure that his impartiality is unquestionable. The person selected at Westminster to be a speaker is a person who is learned in the law and practice of the House. This is very important. Second, he has a large and learned staff, the kind of people that produce the successive editions of Erskine May. Perhaps one of the greatest powers that is entrusted to the Speaker at Westminster is the power given to him under the Parliament Act, 1911, as amended in 1949. The power to say that a bill is a money bill. He does not do that on his own. He does that, where practicable, as advised by members of the Chairman's Panel. These members are from both sides. Consequently, when he makes that decision, when he certifies that a bill is a money bill, nobody can argue convincingly that that was a hasty or partial decision.

So that, simply to say that we'll have an elected Speaker in the Senate doesn't take us very far. The task before us is much greater than that, Senator MacDonald. I don't know whether that helps or not. I am afraid it is a little bit discouraging.

Senator MacDonald: I was curious to see whether the election of Speaker Fraser by the House of Commons had resulted in some kind of a salutary effect. He seemed to enjoy the confidence of both Houses.

Senator Frith: Both parties, you mean.

Senator MacDonald: All three parties. All parties. As a matter of fact, if I remember correctly he ran in Vancouver south in the last election as the speaker of the House of Commons. He didn't run as—he took no part in any partisan matters. I know that for a fact. Is that getting any closer in the House of Commons? I realize it is not a Senate matter.

Senator Stewart: Yes. I think, Senator MacDonald, it is getting closer. I think the Beaudoin incident in the House of Commons had a salutary effect there. Speaker Michener and Speaker MacNaughton commanded great respect.

Senator MacDonald: And Speaker Lamoureux.

Senator Stewart: Yes, I was going to come to Speaker Lamoureux. I was going to put Lamoureau on an even more impartial plateau. I don't know much about Speaker Jerome. But I think it is fair to say that after Beaudoin an effort was made on all sides to make the Speaker more and more impartial and to surround him with the circumstances in which impartiality would be possible.

After the 1984 election there was something of a deterioration. I don't blame Speaker Bosley, I am not suggesting that partiality was his problem. There were other problems. In that situation, as you say, Senator MacDonald, it was decided that there had to be a genuine election of the Speaker. I will not comment on Speaker Fraser's performance or the judgments he had made. But I must say this, Senator MacDonald, in all candour, you recall that last spring Speaker Fraser gave what I described as, not a ruling from the Chair, but as a speech from the Chair.

Senator Cools: A lecture.

Senator Stewart: He addressed, not the House of Commons, but the House and the nation. I was reminded of those—what are they? encyclicals that the Holy Father from time to time delivers to the city and the world. I felt that that was a serious stumble on the upward road to a truly impartial speaker in the House of Commons.

Senator Corbin: Honourable Senators, I would like to terminate the reading of the petition and to conclude my explanation of Campobello. But Senator Bosa, I believe, has a valid point to raise.

Senator Bosa: I just want to say a couple of words about the intervention that was made by Senator Kinsella. I believe that this is the first intervention, brief as it may have been, in the Senate since his appointment, and I appreciate the quality of that intervention.

Senator Stewart: When the history of these sad days are recorded, it will be recognized that his was a constructive intervention.

Senator Bosa: Senator Stewart has stolen the words from my mouth, because I wanted to say that it was a constructive suggestion and we look forward—in fact, I am sure that Senator Kinsella will be a valuable addition to this Chamber and if this is any indication of the quality of speeches that he is going to make in the future by the brief intervention that he made a few mintues ago I am sure that he will enrich the quality of the debate in the red chamber.

It also shows a degree of efficiency on the part of Senator Kinsella that he wants to get to the nub of the problem right away.

Senator Stewart: And Senator MacDonald, too.

Senator Bosa: But in doing so, I think Senator Kinsella overlooked one very basic fact, and that is that the rules of a—House of Parliament have to evolve, they have to be embraced by all its members. There must be acceptance of those rules for the rules to work.

If we were to import into the red chamber the rules of the House of Commons holus bolus the way they are now, I doubt whether we would have an acceptance of the rules by the honourable members.

Senator Corbin: Excuse me, you said holus bolus. Is that like "haggis baggis?"

Senator Bosa: I will let Senator Gigantès deal with that question.

If we were to adopt the rules of the House of Commons in the Senate, without us having debated them, without us having contributed to the evolvement of those rules, I don't think they would work in the Senate. And I would like to cite an example, in fact there are many examples about this matter. I just want to cite a couple of examples.

For instance, during the constitutional debate of the late seventies when there was a great desire by many Canadians to reform the Senate, there was one proposition by the government of the day to abolish the Senate the way it is now, and forming another upper house which would be known as the House of the Federation. The members of the House of the Federation would be representative of the federal—and Provincial legislatures on a proportionate basis it was a very complicated formula for selecting its members. Let me deal with that without going into details. The representatives of the province of British Columbia, they were advocating to replace the Senate of Canada with something similar to what West Germany has, The Bundesrat, which could be considered to be the equivalent of the Canadian Senate. They wanted us to adopt the Bundesrat, but there are such profound differences between our system of Parliament and Germany's system of Parliament. For instance, the members of the Bundesrat are ministers of the provinces of Germany or Landes, as they are called. And they are—

Senator Corbin: Honourable Senators, while that dispute is going on I would like to continue the presentation of my petitioners. I don't see the connection of the Bundesrat with the petitions that I am presenting at all. I think we ought to respect the rules. There has to be a connection. So, where was I? I mean, there have been so many brutal interruptions that I lost—yes, I had completed the recitation of the origin of the name Campobello Island.

By the way, Honourable Senators, did you know that Campobello Island is part of an archipelago of some over 30 islands and reefs and shoals and what have you. Of course, the larger islands are well known to easterners from that part of the continent. I mentioned Grand Manan.

Campobello, by the way, has an international park—a small one—an international park as the summer residence of former President Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt, and that park is administered jointly by a commission made up jointly of a Canadian chairperson and an American chairperson. And a distinguished former Senator of this House held the position of the Canadian Chair for a while. That was Senator Robichaud, who went on to become Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick and I believe at the time he held that Chair his counterpart in the U.S. was I'm not absolutely sure. I thought it was Edmund Muskie—I may be right. I may be right. Anyhow, so that is quite a sight. I visited the Roosevelt summer home with my family some years ago and I recommend it highly to everyone in this House. I think you ought to bring your families down to—yes, sir, I can carry on—I think you ought to take your family down to the West isles, to Deer Isle, Campobello and Grand Manan. It is a world within the world, and there you will see, of course, the work of the high tides and the Bay of Fundy. And you will see rare species of marine birds. Some birds are now seen on that Atlantic coast, nowhere else but there. And tourists in huge numbers take these small flatbed ferries between the islands to be able to observe those birds. So, I invite the pigeon-watchers of Ottawa to take a summer holiday in the Fundy archipelago.

I would like to complete the presentation of this petition. I have four names. I will leave the Campobello with the standing invitation.

(Names of signatories read)

And as I said yesterday, St. George is at the—shall I say the head of an inlet which comes in from Passamaquoddy Bay, and St. George is not the point of embarkation to the archipelago to the islands of Grand Manan and Campobello, but you must take the ferry either at Back Bay for Deer Island or at Black's Harbour for Grand Manan.

Senators, you will enjoy your visit to that part of New Brunswick. I, therefore, ask the messenger to lay this honourable petition on the honourable table of the Senate.

Senator Stewart: May I intervene at this point to clarify something I said earlier? May I intervene to clarify a point that I made earlier?

[Senator Bosa.]

Senator Corbin: Oh, by all means.

● (1100)

Senator Stewart: Earlier, when I was talking about the role of the Speaker of the Senate, I referred to the role the Lord Chancellor performs in the House of Lords in Westminster. I said that the Lord Chancellor sits on the woolsack, and that the woolsack is technically outside the chamber of the House of Lords. Well, that is correct, but I should have said that there is not just one woolsack, that there are three woolsacks. The Lord Chancellor sits on the one in the middle.

I have in my hand an excerpt from the last edition of The Oxford English Dictionary, and there under the heading "woolsack" I read that it is, "A seat made of a bag of wool for the use of judges when summoned to attend the House of Lords (in recent practice only at the opening of Parliament); also, the usual seat of the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords, made of a large square bag of wool without back or arms and covered with cloth." The term is often used allusively with reference to the position of the Lord Chancellor.

There is reference to a book of Sir Thomas Smith on the Commonwealth of England, published in 1589, at page 49, where he says:

> In the middest thereof vpon woolsackes sitteth the Judges of the realme, The master of the roules, and the secretaries of estate. But these that sit on the woolsackes haue no voice in the house.

That was in 1589. And then in the work of Hooker, on the History of Ireland as set forth in Holinshed, the second volume, we have the following:

> In the middle roome beneath them sit the chiefe justices and judges of the realme, the barons of the excheker, the kings sergeants, and all such as be of the kings learned councell, . . . and all these sit upon great woollsacks, couered with red cloth.

In Chamberlayne, his work on the Statutes of Great Britain, we are told that:

> The Lord Chancellor . . . sits on the first Wool-Sack . . . Upon other Wool-Sacks sit the judges, the King's Council at law, and the Masters of Chancery.

Well, the term "woolsack" has also passed into literature. In Morton's work, Way to Get Married, 1800, we have one character say, "Pray stick to the law", and another says "And to the woolsack. Does not the hope of that . . . cram our courts full of barristers, with heads as empty as they leave clients' pockets?"

I quote that with apologies to all lawyers here present.

And there is a later reference in the Empire Review, 1901, to the fact that the woolsack is not in the House, ". . . a fact recognized by the Standing Orders which provide that when the Lord Chancellor wishes to speak, he is 'to go to his own place as a Peer.'" It is important to bear all this in mind because it is easy for a Speaker to be betrayed into thinking that he is the image, in this House, of the Speaker of the House of Commons or the Speaker of the House of Commons in Westminster. His role is entirely different.

Thank you, Senator Corbin, for your courtesy in allowing me to make that clarification.

Senator Corbin: I have one clarification, Senator Stewart. I thank you very much for those illuminating comments. How fortunate for the new senators to be able to get all this information in a nutshell. It took me years of hard work and attendance in the House of Commons to pick this up, and look at the lucky new senators; they learn about it just like that, you know.

Senator Stewart, you mention the woolsack. I have seen older photos of the opening of Parliament where their Honours, judges of the Supreme Court, were seated on some kind of a huge structure; I do not know what it was, some kind of bench with their bodies backing to each other facing out in all directions. That thing would be just about where the Clerk's chair is now. That has disappeared from our traditions. Can you explain the nature of that piece of furniture, whatever it was called? It was an honest-to-goodness woolsack, wasn't it? And how did it come to disappear? Is it because the judges did not like facing the public—I do not say this in a demeaning way. I know I would find it sort of tiring if, during the reading of the throne speech I had to be looking in that direction and my friend looking in the northeasterly direction and so on and so forth. Now they all sit in square chairs and they face His Excellency or Her Majesty, whoever is reading the Speech from the Throne.

Senator Stewart: Well, I think, Senator Corbin, the fact that the law lords in the House of Lords sit facing four different ways is a result of the fact that this great block of bagged wool faces all ways. We sit in here, the two sides facing each other as a result of an historical accident. That is right, as a result of an historical accident. It happened that at one time the House of Commons at Westminster found itself without a place to meet, and they assembled for a time in a chapel. The seats in the choir of the chapel, of course, were arranged with rows facing one another. That was found so satisfactory that it was perpetuated. It may even have had an effect upon the development of the two-party system. There are only two sides in a gothic choir.

Of course, while I am on the topic, Senator Corbin, may I say that that historical episode is the origin of the practice of bowing in the direction of the Speaker. In those days people bowed to the holy sacrament present upon the altar in the chapel. Nowadays, Speakers think when you bow to them deeply that you are recognizing their lofty status and they are pleased to smile condescendingly and incline their heads at you as you go out the door. That is the origin. But I say, Senator Corbin, it is a function of the shape of the woolsack.

Wool never has been a staple of the Canadian economy. Consequently, a woolsack would not have had the significance in Canada that it had in Westminster. Perhaps nowadays they are beginning to forget the meaning of the woolsack, but certainly in earlier centuries it was a prime tenet of English public policy that, above all else, the wool trade must be fostered and protected. That particular tradition never was received here. I think that is the explanation of the fact that the judges, when they come here to honour us with their presence at the opening of Parliament, do not sit in a square, as at Westminster, but rather, sit facing the throne.

Senator Corbin: They used to sit in a circular fashion. Why has that disappeared, senator? That was my question.

Senator Stewart: I simply cannot explain that. I suppose that as time went by, people forgot the meaning of these things. Many of the practices of Parliament which had meaning in earlier times, you know, carry on like drifts of snow into the spring, when gradually they melt away. They melt away or become meaningless.

Let me give you an example. In the Canadian House of Commons, Bill C-1 is a bill for the administration of oaths of office. Now, Bill C-1 is given first reading prior to any business. The Speech from the Throne is heard here in the Senate. The Speaker goes back to the chamber of the House of Commons and he reports the speech. But before any business is done, Bill C-1 is introduced and given first reading. It is given first reading before any business from the Speech. Now, why is this done? Well, historically this symbolized the fact that the Commons did not have to await the initiation of business by the King's ministers. They were showing that they were competent themselves to initiate legislation. They didn't have to wait for the ministers to pitch in order for them to go to bat. They could pitch themselves. At Westminster, that motion, the comparable motion—it is a different bill—is always moved by a backbencher. However, when the practice was transferred to British North America, it was brought over without its true meaning being appreciated. What happens now is that the First Minister moves Bill C-1. Here is a symbol intended to demonstrate the competence of backbenchers, persons not of the executive government, to initiate legislation. But in Canada that bill, in the period which I have studied, always is brought in by the Prime Minister. So here is an example of a symbolic act which has lost its meaning when it was received in Canada, and I suspect much the same applies in the case of the seating of judges. It is so easy for symbols to become meaningless when you carry traditions into a new place. The same happens when you carry stories of Santa Claus and his reindeers into the Pacific Islands.

Senator Corbin: You could say, monkey see, monkey do, I suppose.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senator, what happened, Senator Stewart, with C-1? Does it make its way to the Senate?

Senator Stewart: No. C-1, it is regarded as sufficient to have given it first reading. It is of no legislative importance. It is of mere symbolic significance. It does not go forward.

Senator Gigantès: Will the honourable Senator Corbin forgive me for an intemperate remark I made earlier when he asked me about the origin of "holus-bolus"?

Senator Corbin: I forgive you.

Senator Gigantès: I want to answer your question, sir, and I have written for the reporters—don't be worried about it—what it comes from in Greek, and I will give the spellings in a minute. It means "the whole sphere". "Bolos", in Greek, refers to the sphere of dung that the dung beetles make, and Aristophanes makes a great deal about it. There is a comedy of Aristophanes that deals with dung beetles. And if you like, it means "the whole thing", "the whole lump".

In medieval Britain and in medieval France, there was a whole class of semi-literate priests. They did not understand the Latin they were reading but they would latinize many things and apparently on one occasion some unlearned prelate spoke of "holos bolos" and it was immediately latinized to "holus bolus". Pig Latin of the high school nature of Pig Latin such as:

> Boyabus kissabus sweet girlorum,
> Girlibus likabus wanti somemorum,
> Fatherbus hearabus sweet kissorum,
> Kickabus boyabus out of the doorum.

So holus-bolus is in that category. That is why it is beneath my scholarship. Here I have to specify a little bit about the accent. Holus-bolus. The ancients would have pronounced it "olos volos". However, there was a school of pronunciation started by Erasmus, the Dutch philosopher. They did not how ancient Greek was pronounced and Erasmus reasoned that if we read Homer and we do not break the diphthongs and we do not stress the omega longer than the omicron- the small "O"—omega in capital letters is a circle with a line under it—then Homer would not rhyme. At first this was an unnecessary thing to say, because Homer was sung. So when you sing you can hold a note a little longer. You do not have to break the diphthong, and the rhyming, the feet of the rhymes, the dodeka, there are twelve feet in each Homeric line, it depends on the singing how long you hold the note. Cherry red and apple blossom white: the "white" is normally held a very long time which gives it the same length as the next line in the song.

So the Erasmic pronunciation has taken hold in the West, so a scholar, a classical scholar trained in western universities, listening to a classical scholar trained in a Greek university, does not understand what he is saying. The classical scholars in Greek universities have adopted the pronunciation of the Greek Church. The Greek Church still reads the Bible in ancient Greek. It is a second century A.D. version. It is still the same, and there is a traditional pronunciation. There is some proof that this tradition of pronunciation is the correct one, and we find that in Thucydides when he describes the plague that hit Athens at the beginning of the Peloponnesian War. He says there, the plague hit Athens. "Plague" written in Greek is "loimos", pronounced in Greece, "leemos". Modern Greeks pronounce O-I as "ee". It is one of the five ways of pronouncing the sound "ee". Thucydides says:

> And now the Athenians understood the meaning of the old Delphic oracle which said, "War will come with leemos."

[Senator Corbin.]

Because there is another word pronounced "leemos", l-i-m-o-s, which means "famine". So finally they knew that war would bring—when they had heard "limos", because the oracle did not write its predictions, it spoke them, they knew which of the two leemos it was. So obviously, in the Fifth Century B.C., already the diphthong "O-I" was being pronounced "ee", as in modern Greek.

Therefore, I would like to put on the record in this noble Chamber that the Erasmic pronunciation, with all due respect for all the remarkable western scholars much more advanced than modern Greek scholars in classics, and for my learned and distinguished teachers at University of Toronto where I did my classical studies, the Erasmic pronunciation they have adopted is based on the false premise that you needed it in order to make Homer scan, and Homer was sung so it did not matter; and also is based on the false premise that ancient Greek pronunciation is not what it is in the modern Greek Church which, as I demonstrated with the example in Thucydides, was already the case in the 5th century B.C.

Thank you, Senator Corbin.

[Translation]

Senator David: Senator Gigantès, I think I have missed the premises of your most scholarly speech, but I would like to know what "Holus bolus", "Erasmus", and "Homeric line" have to do with Senator Kinsella, Senator Stewart and the petitions presented by Dr. Corbin . . . by Senator Corbin (laughs in the Assembly).

Senator Gigantès: "Holus bolus" is an expression used with the verb "to swallow"; you are asking us to swallow "Holus bolus" a procedural putsch dating from October 4th and absolutely intolerable. You are asking us to swallow this outrage without protesting. That is where the link is. I was talking about Erasmus to help with pronounciation, but if you read him, you will also find great comfort in his philosophy.

Senator Corbin: Senator Gigantès, I was right to make a parallel between "Holus bolus" and "Haggis-baggis" because both are difficult to swallow.

[English]

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I just want to make a couple of points to sustain my thesis on the intervention made by Senator Kinsella, but before I do so I want to say that during this debate I learned a new dimension about Senator Gigantès. He has a profound knowledge of ancient history. He is a polyglot. He speaks many languages. When I read his biography I was really impressed, having been the Minister of Culture in Greece; he fought in Korea; he was in the British Navy; he was at the United Nations. He was special assistant to Pierre Trudeau. He has known them all. But anyway, he is invariably accurate in what he states, and, you know, he made one intervention, a little earlier, in which I think I caught him in a slight error, not a full error but just a slight error.

Senator Corbin: Have we cleared up the fact that he is listed as a V.C.?

Senator Bosa: No, I was going to refer to that, too. When we were discussing the origin of "bello", Campobello, Senator Corbin asked me, he said "What does Campobello mean in Italian?" Italian being my second language, I said, " Campobello means a beautiful field, and in French it is 'beau champs'", and then I believe Senator Gigantès said, "The origin of that word comes from the Latin," and I cannot recall now exactly all the nuances of the words that were expressed during that heated debate but I believe Senator Corbin said, "I believe it originates from 'belligerent' or 'bellos.'"

Senator Cools: "Bellum."

Senator Bosa: "Bellum". Now, "bellum" means "war" in Latin, and from the word "bellum" we get the word "belligerent".

Senator Cools: "Bellicose".

Senator Bosa: "Bellicose", "belligerent". Like some of the senators in this debate, sometimes they have a tendency to become bellicose. And Senator Gigantès has made an intervention at this stage. He said "bellos", it is Latin but you spelled it with one "l". Senator Gigantès, it is spelled with two "l's". "Bellum" is spelled with two "l's". Pardon me. You will have an opportunity to set the record straight. "Bellis", which means "war" is spelled with two "l's" and so is "bellos" which means "beautiful" but there is also another word in Latin to describe the same adjective, "pulcra". "Pulcritude", which we have in English, it is an English word derived from the Latin "pulcher". This is the first time that I caught Senator Gigantès making an observation that was not entirely correct. He said it was spelled with one "l"; instead it is spelled with two "l's".

Senator Gigantès: Senator Bosa, I regret to have to disagree with you, but orthography and correct spelling is something that was first developed in the 3rd century A.D. by the grammarians of Alexandria, who dealt with both Greek and Latin. If you look at the old inscriptions that you find in Rome before the orthography was set, you will find that "belum", war, is sometimes with one "l". Thank you.

We should strike a committee, Senator Kinsella, to discuss the origins of "belum" versus "pulcher", "belos", "war" and whatever.

Senator Kinsella: Would the honourable senator, either Senator Bosa or Senator Gigantès be prepared to demonstrate the post hoc ergo propter hoc relationship between this important discussion and the matter before the House?

Senator Gigantès: I would be delighted to do this. "Bellum" in one instance, "casus belli" means "war", you provided a casus beli with your incredible and infamous attack upon the rules of this house. Casus belli. When it comes to bellum, "beautiful", you refer to the interventions of my colleagues and also to yours, the intellectual beauty of what you said, what Senator Corbin has said, Senator Bosa, my colleague Senator Hébert, Senator Cools, Senator Stewart. That is the connection. Thank you, sir.

Senator Kinsella: I appreciate the honourable senator's explanation of the post hoc ergo propter hoc relationship because, of course, that is the fallacy of no relationship at all.

Senator Stewart: But surely I must spring to the defence of Senator Murray. Senator Murray, every hour on the hour, speaks to the media and—I cannot imitate his solemn tones—he says, "The Liberals are conducting a filibuster against the GST." He repeats that again and again and again, and the telegrams come in saying unto the Liberal senators, "Keep it up, boys, you're doing a grand job."

Senator Gigantès: And I would like, if I may, Senator Bosa, to tell Senator Kinsella, since he is beginning to show scholastic—"scholastic" in the sense of the scholasticists of the church, and ontological tendencies, I would like him to turn his obviously wonderful and well-trained mind to the general problem of mathematics. This is how it is stated. Having given the number of instances respectively in which things are both thus and so, in which they are thus but not so, in which they are so but not thus, and in which they are neither thus nor so, he is required to eliminate the general quantitative relativity inhering the mere thingness of things and to determine the special quantitative relativity subsisting between the thusness and the so-ness of the things.

This is the most concise definition of the general problem given by M.H. Doolittle May 25th, 1887 at a meeting of the Mathematical Section of the Philosophical Society of Washington and this problem has not yet been solved as the problem of how to cure the infamy of the Prime Minister and his minion in this house, the leader of the government, Senator Lowell Murray has not been solved and is as insoluble as this is.

Senator Cools: If I may be indulged for a moment and in the interests of what Senator Kinsella has raised and in the interests, of staying on the subject matter before us, I wonder if Senator Stewart could continue a little bit in the vein on the question of the impartiality of the speaker because the question of speaker's impartiality has been one that has vexed members in both chambers for several centuries.

I wonder if Senator Stewart could share with us from that splendid mind of his a little bit of the history of the Committee of the Whole and its relationship to the impartiality of the position, Speaker?

Senator Stewart: Well, the question comes to me without notice. Lets see now. There was a time when the speaker of the House of Commons was selected by the King just as the Lord Chancellor is now selected by the Queen as advised by her ministers and just as the Speaker of the Canadian Senate is selected by our Prime Minister.

There was a time when those Speakers all were agents of the government. Indeed, the function of the Speaker in those dark and dismal times was to serve as a spy upon the work of the Commons. The Speaker sat in the chair spying on what went on, making notes and he reported on the activities of particular members back to the King. Bold commoners sometimes would receive little billet doux telling them they had better rein in their expressions and their objections to proposals of the King's government, else they might find a head missing.

This, of course, was in the days of Henry VIII when tyranny was the order of the day.

Well, in order to escape from the subversion which was the work of the Speaker, the commons adopted the practice of going into a Committee of the Whole. This had the effect of getting the Speaker out of the Chair and they did business in the Committee of the Whole with a chairman presiding.

Now, that historical episode is important procedurally even today in the House of Commons. As we know, bills to appropriate money are not introduced. Ordinary bills are introduced in Parliament either in the Senate or the House of Commons, but bills to appropriate money from the Consolidate Revenue Fund originate in the House of Commons. What is the significance of that term "originate"?

It reveals that the first reading of the bill is a consequence of an earlier stage, a stage taken in a Committee of the Whole.

In other words, at times in the remote past, in the early times when the king wanted money, the Commons refused to consider his requests until they had had a opportunity to examine the requests and the reasons given by the ministers, and until they had had an opportunity to examine the requests without a Speaker in the Chair. They wanted to be able to discuss the request for supplies frankly among themselves, without being spied upon by the King's agent.

Senator Cools: That's right.

Senator Stewart: So procedurally, that phase is still there insofar as appropriations are concerned. That committee, of course, was the Committee of Supply. The Committee of Supply was the Committee of the Whole House that dealt with requests for supplies.

The same applied in the case of taxation legislation. I remember in the House of Commons back in the 1960s, when a tax bill was in the offing, the Minister of Finance would move at the end of his budget address that the House go into a Committee of the Whole. That particular Committee was called the Committee of Ways and Means. There always was what was called a financial resolution, a ways and means resolution, which had to precede the first reading of a taxation bill.

What has happened, Senator Cools, is that the House of Commons has truncated that early stage in the process by which tax bills are passed. What was found was that members of the House of Commons were becoming repetitious. They are inherently—

Senator Frith: That is not possible, surely not.

Senator Stewart: They are inherently—

Senator Gigantès: Senator Marshall, I am sure, never was repetitious.

Senator Stewart: No, no, not Senator Marshall.

[Senator Stewart.]

Senator Gigantès: Lets look across, I am perfectly sure Senator Marshall was never repetitious. Perish the thought. How could it be? Senator Macquarrie—

Senator Stewart: No, no. Senator Macquarrie was a good member of the House of Commons and the same would be said for Senator Marshall.

What was happening was that the Minister would move his Ways and Means motion in the Committee of Ways and Means and there would follow a long debate in the committee.

I remember well the financial critic for the Progressive Conservative party, the Hon. Marcel Lambert. He was very good in the Committee of Ways and Means. "We don't know what this proposed resolution means. If on the one hand it means this, then the following follows. If on the other hand, it means that, then the following follows. If on the third hand, it means—." He explored all the legs of an octopus before he sat down.

Then when the motion, the Ways and Means motion, had been carried, the minister would bring forth his bill. The bill would originate in the House of Commons. He would bring it to the House on the basis of a resolution in the Committee. Then when the second reading stage had been reached, all the ground would be ploughed again. And it would be ploughed yet again at the committee stage—that is the committee stage after second reading—and it would be ploughed, or should I say harrowed at the third reading stage.

That is why the House of Commons decided to abolish the ways and means committee stage prior to the beginning of tax bills. However, they had to retain the ways and means motion for an important purpose. When the Minister of Finance produces his budget and puts forward a taxation proposal in modern times, given the complexity of our economy, he generally does not presume to go forward immediately. He lays upon the table a notice of a ways and means motion and that may be on the table for many months. The purpose is to allow tax experts, accountants, tax lawyers, who might be affected materially by the proposal, to have an opportunity to go the minister and say, "All right, of course we don't like your tax, but if you insist, make it as painless as possible, improve your scheme in the following ways."

So the minister has an opportunity through the notice of ways and means motion to tell them the direction in which he is moving.

At some point later when he is satisfied that he has heard all the constructive proposals, he is now, under the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, allowed to move the motion of which he has given notice and it is dealt with without debate.

In the case of appropriation and taxation we still have in the House of Commons a lively reminder of the original function of the committees, namely, to do the crucial phase of the work without the Speaker, without the King's spy being present. In the case of taxation, atrophy has set in for the reasons I have just explained, honourable senators.

It is a complicated matter but it is important to remember that there has been a most interesting transformation in the office of the Speaker of the House of Commons. That transformation took place in the 17th century.

Senator Thompson referred to some of those transactions here the other day, transactions in which the Speaker, instead of being the King's agent, appointee, or spy, changed his role. The Speaker began to say, "I have neither eyes to see nor ears to hear, nor tongue to speak save as this House commands me."

A very important transformation took place and, Senator Cools, the point really is that that transition has not taken place with regard to the speakership of the Canadian Senate.

Senator Bosa: Honourable Senators, before I deal with the two points I began to elaborate on the intervention made by Senator Kinsella, I would like to put a question to Senator Stewart.

He had mentioned, of the speakers that sat in the House of Commons from 1955 on and in 1955, I believe it was Senator Louis Rene Beaudreau—

Senator Stewart: Beaudoin.

Senator Bosa: Beaudoin. I stand corrected, in May of 1976.

Senator Stewart: In 1956.

Senator Bosa: Yes, during the pipeline debate he had made a ruling, he allowed a procedural motion by the opposition, by her Majesty's loyal opposition to go ahead and then when he discovered that the opposition would continue to take advantage of that ruling, and that the government would not be able to meet the deadline for certain obligations that it had undertaken about the pipeline, he reversed his ruling, he reversed his ruling.

Senator Stewart, do you recall when he reversed his ruling and because he did that, he went down in history as the worst speaker that ever sat in the history of the parliament of Canada. Now, he had just reversed himself. Now, in our case with Senator Charbonneau, he had made—he had concocted a rule, he had changed the rule unilaterally which means that Senator Charbonneau has now immortalized himself as a speaker of Parliament who had made the biggest blunder in the tenure of office.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Bosa, please forgive me, it wasn't just a blunder. To inform the Tory Senators that a vote would really take place at 17:30 and then proceed to take the vote at 17:25 I don't think is just blunder. I think it is something that I can only describe in unparliamentary words which I will leave to the imagination of the members here, and there is no speaker in the history of the British Parliament who committed such an act and this is not a blunder.

This is deliberately mislead honourable senators which denied them the right to vote. Independent senators were notified, and some of them, voted with the Conservatives. It is their right, we are in a democracy. But we were denied the right to vote. We were not notified only the Tories knew the true time of the vote and that is something that will live go down in infamy and will be in the history books and it will be in all the history on the evolution of the British Parliamentary system in Canada, that a speaker nearly destroyed this House, in fact, it's still not functioning, and I don't know when we can return to the functioning of it this Speaker has to go.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I used "blunder" because I did not want to be too severe on the speaker.

Senator Gigantès: You are too nice.

Senator Bosa: Because it is a known fact that that ruling was made in the office of the leader of the government in the Senate.

Senator Gigantès: But the speaker obeyed him, the speaker obeyed the leader of the government in the Senate. The speaker is not supposed to obey an order to behave in a manner that is unconscionable.

I mean, this was established in the Nurenberg Tribunals also, the fact that you have been given an order does not relieve you of the responsibility when you have obeyed an order which is wrong.

Senator Corbin: Senator Bosa, you should use the word that precedes, the word "laconia" in the dictionary. Remember that word?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, I do.

Senator Corbin: L-a-c-k-e-y.

Senator Cools: Spy for the King. This is funny.

Senator Stewart: Senator Beaudoin's name has been mentioned in this Chamber again and again during the last few days and I think it is fair to say that the common presupposition has been that he was a thoroughly bad Speaker.

I rise in defence of his memory. We are putting a false account on our records. Until the pipeline debate, Senator Beaudoin was very successful—

Senator Frith: Speaker Beaudoin.

Senator Stewart: Yes, Speaker Beaudoin. He has an excellent reputation as Speaker of the House of Commons. But he put his feet badly astray during the pipeline debate. It has been suggested, you know, that a minister of the Crown was seen leaving Speaker Beaudoin's chambers. In fact, I don't think there is any question but that at least one minister saw him. But it is also true that other members of Parliament, members from the two opposition parties, were also seen emerging from Speaker Beaudoin's chambers. That fact has been seldom noted in the history of that episode.

You know, if Mr. Pickersgill—his name is the one you will hear most frequently—if Mr. Pickersgill visited the Speaker, Speaker Beaudoin, is it not true that Stanley Knowles was also seen coming out of his chamber?

Senator Lucier: No. are you serious? Stanley Knowles?

Senator Stewart: Well, there's evidence but, you know, I am making a serious point.

Senator Lucier: You are.

Senator Cools: Very serious.

Senator Stewart: Beaudoin has been much maligned. There is no question that he put his foot astray, but he certainly did not do it under pressure from the government alone and he apparently did not do it deliberately, after much consideration, as in the case of Senator Charbonneau. I thought, in fairness to the man's name, I ought to say that.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators—

Senator Bosa: Senator Haidasz, I am sorry, I have the floor.

Senator Haidasz: Again? It's the third time since nine o'clock.

Senator Bosa: No, I have been trying to get on for the last three-quarters of an hour.

Senator Stewart: He has been trying to get a word in edgeways.

Senator Bosa: I am still terminating the point that Senator Corbin had raised and I yield the floor to Senators who want to ask me questions and in doing so I do not intend to be finessed out of my right to continue on the subject.

Senator Cools: You are generous.

Senator Bosa: Now, we were talking about speakers—-

Senator Cools: And their impartiality.

Senator Bosa: The impartiality of speakers, yes. The following speakers were the ones who succeedded Beaudoin: Mr. Michener, Mr. Lambert, Mr. MacNaughton—and at that time I was the special assistant to the government house leader, so I have some recollection of some of the happenings—and Speaker Lamoureux. Senator Stewart has described Senator Lamoureux as the most impartial speaker, as having a reputation of being the most impartial speaker that sat up to that time in the House of Commons, but I recall, and I am wondering whether Senator Stewart remembers this, that the Creditistes , they moved a motion of censure against the Speaker Lamoureaux. Either censure or they challenged a ruling that he made. This challenge was very much regretted by everybody including Her Majesty's loyal opposition, because they saw in Speaker Lamoureux a really impartial individual but the Creditistes, led by Gilles Gregoire, who was the house leader for the Creditistes under Caouette, at the time moved the motion of censure because Lamoureux didn't yield to a motion that the Creditistes had made.

I am just wondering if Senator Stewart remembers this event?

Senator Stewart: Senator Bosa, I have to say that I do not recall that particular episode.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senator—

Senator Bosa: No, I haven't finished.

Senator Haidasz: Holy mackerel!

Senator Bosa: I wish to speak. I will yield to you, I will yield to you, we have until 2 o'clock to speak you know.

Senator Haidasz: No, no—

[Senator Lucier.]

Senator Stewart: Senator Bosa, I think you have made a most constructive suggestion, I think you should yield to Senator Haidasz who obviously has some important petitions.

Senator Bosa: I will yield to you.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable Senators, I first would like to thank Senator Bosa for yielding the floor in order that I may perform my important task this morning during these famous debates in the Senate. That of presenting a petition to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, Queen of Canada, on behalf of her loyal subjects.

I see in the chair a person that I first came to know 40 years ago in the Burnside Institute of the Toronto General Hospital where he was called to see one of my patients who had some problems, a patient in labour with some problems, with cystitis. He was a young man, Dr. Efstathios Barootes, a senior intern in urology at that time.

At that time I didn't even dream that I would meet him again in this Chamber, but today he is occupying the Speaker's Chair. Senator Barootes, as you know, was baptized Efstathios after a famous Greek saint whose name translated into English means "he who is well placed" and our senator is well placed in the speaker's chamber this morning; and his family name is Barootes, which means in English "gunpowder". This is a man who, as a practising neurologist in Regina, Saskatchewan, was the source of a lot of gunpowder during the battle against The Health Act or Health Insurance Act in Saskatchewan which was being promoted by the Premier of that time, Premier Tommy Douglas.

Honourable senators, I am engaged in presenting to you a petition to be relayed to Her Majesty. As you know a petition is a respectful and humble request in the form of a supplication or a prayer addressed to the Senate to be heard ultimately by Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, the Queen of Canada.

This duty for us as senators presenting petitions on behalf of the loyal Canadian citizens is a privilege and, a pleasant duty.

I refer you to Beauchesne's Rules and Forms of the House of Commons of Canada, fifth edition, by Alistair Fraser, W.F. Dawson and G.A. Birch, where they state or—they talk about the right of petition and they say,

> The right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the Constitution and has been exercised without interruption in Canada since 1867.

This is a continuation of public petitions which originated in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom. The right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances has been exercised for many centuries.

The historical and constitutional aspects of petitions to the Queen in Parliament which were originally directed to the judicial rather than legislative remedies and from which, in the medieval period, the form of legislation both by public and private bill was only gradually derived—was not considered in the work by—Erskine May's Treatise on the Laws and Privileges, Usages, of Parliament, from which I am reading.

> Public petitions may pray for an alteration of the great law for the reconsideration of a general administrative decision and they may also pray for redress of local or personal grievances.

What we are doing here in this Senate at the present time is to petition Her Majesty to stop the GST which is opposed by 85 percent of the Canadian people and which, in the minds of many bishops of this country which appeared before the Senate Banking and Commerce Committee, the GST is an immoral law.

• (1200)

Honourable senators, I commence with the first petition as follows:

> With respect to the proposed national goods and services tax, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the induction of the proposed goods and services tax.

For the edification of the ladies and gentlemen in the gallery and all honourable senators here in the Chamber, St. Catharines is the garden city of the Province of Ontario, situated halfway between Toronto and Niagara Falls, which is the honeymoon capital of Canada. St. Catharine, as you will recall, was an Italian saint who originated from Sienna and was noted for her great knowledge and wisdom. I am sure that is one of the reasons why the founding fathers of the City of the St. Catharines chose her name for their place of settlement in that beautiful part of Ontario.

May I add that last weekend St. Catharines was the city which hosted the 31st Bi-annual Convention of the Canadian Polish Congress. The delegates to that conference received a very warm welcome from the people of that city. The main speaker at the convention banquet happened to be the Minister of State responsible for Multiculturalism and Citizenship at this time, the Honourable Gerry Weiner. Mr. Weiner announced at that time a new initiative in the federal government's policy of multiculturalism relating to the treatment of heritage languages in Canada, the establishment of a heritage languages institute, which is to be, in effect, a university without walls, situated in Edmonton, Alberta.

What the minister in charge of multiculturalism omitted, or neglected to bring to the attention of his listeners at that banquet was that October 8 was the 19th anniversary of the proclamation of the official federal government policy on multiculturalism which was announced in the House of Commons by the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

Senator Murray: Read us your petition, honourable senator.

Senator Haidasz: In a moment, sir — a policy which apparently struck a responsive chord in the leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the Honourable Robert Stanfield of Nova Scotia, leader of the Conservative Party; followed by David Lewis, leader of the New Democratic Party; and then by Réal Caouette, the leader of the Creditiste Party.

When I was called to the podium, honourable senators, I told the delegates in convention that not only was that policy as proclaimed by the then-Prime Minister, an enlightened policy, but also a just society policy because of the way in which the then-Prime Minister thought about multiculturalism and why he had chosen to adopt it as an official policy of his government.

Honourable senators, I was given the task as the first Minister of State responsible for Multiculturalism to implement that policy across Canada. I was followed by many others, including our former colleague, Senator Joseph Guay. What Mr. Trudeau said in the House of Commons on October 8, 1971 helps us to understand the rationale, the justification, and the need for this policy which is already 19 years old this weekend.

At that time, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau stood up in the House of Commons and said the following:

> Mr. Speaker, I am happy this morning to be able to reveal to the House that the government has accepted all those recommendations of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism which are contained in Volume IV of its reports directed to federal departments and agencies. Hon. members will recall that the subject of this volume is "the contribution by other ethnic groups to the cultural enrichment of Canada and the measures that should be taken to safeguard that contribution".

Honourable senators, Volume IV examined the whole question of cultural and ethnic pluralism in this country and the status of our various cultures and languages, an area of study given all too little attention by scholars.

> It was the view of the Royal Commission—

—a member of which at that time was our deputy leader on this side of the Senate, Royce Frith—

> It was the view of the royal commission, shared . . . I am sure, by all Canadians, that there cannot be one cultural policy for Canadians of British and French origin, another for the original peoples and yet a third for all others. For although there are two official languages, there is no official culture, nor does any ethnic group take precedence over any other. No citizen or group of citizens is other than Canadian, and all should be treated fairly.
> The royal commission was guided by the belief that adherence to one's ethnic group is influenced not so much by one's origin or mother tongue as by one's sense of belonging to the group, and by what the commission calls the group's "collective will to exist". The government shares this belief.
> The individual's freedom would be hampered if he were locked for life within a particular cultural compartment by the accident of birth or language. It is vital, therefore, that every Canadian, whatever his ethnic origin, be given a chance to learn at least one of the two languages in which his country conducts its official business and its politics.

A policy of multiculturalism within a bilingual framework commends itself to the government as the most suitable means of assuring the cultural freedom of Canadians. Such a policy should help to break down discriminatory attitudes and cultural jealousies. National unity if it is to mean anything in the deeply personal sense, must be founded on confidence in one's own individual identity. Out of this can grow respect for that of others and a willingness to share ideas, attitudes and assumptions.

This was the conclusion of the Volume IV of the Royal Commission. As I mentioned, the name of Royce Frith, now our colleague here in this chamber, was affixed to that Report.

On October 8, 1971, in the House of Commons, Mr. Trudeau continued to say:

> A vigorous policy of multiculturalism will help create the initial confidence. It can form the base of a society which is based on fair play for all.
> The government will support and encourage the various cultures and ethnic groups that give structure and vitality to our society. They will be encouraged to share their cultural expression and values with other Canadians, and so contribute to a richer life for us all.
> In the past, substantial public support has been given largely to the arts and cultural institutions of English-speaking Canada. More recently and largely with the help of the royal commission's earlier recommendations in Volumes I to III, there has been a conscious effort on the government's part to correct any bias against the French language and culture. In the last few months the government has taken steps to provide funds to support cultural educational centres for native people. The policy I am announcing today accepts the contention of the other cultural communities that they, too, are essential elements in Canada and deserve government assistance in order to contribute to regional and national life in ways that derive from their heritage yet are distinctively Canadian.
> In implementing a policy of multiculturalism within a bilingual framework, the government will provide support in four ways.
> First, resources permitting, the government will seek to assist all Canadian cultural groups that have demonstrated a desire and effort to continue to develop a capacity to grow and contribute to Canada, and a clear need for assistance, the small and weak groups no less than the strong and highly organized.
> Second, the government will assist members of all cultural groups to overcome cultural barriers to full participation in Canadian society.
> Third, the government will promote creative encounters and interchange among all Canadian cultural groups in the interests of national unity.
> Fourth, the government will continue to assist immigrants to acquire at least one of Canada's official languages in order to become full participants in Canadian society.

[Senator Haidasz.]

In my experience, travelling throughout Canada in order to promote and explain this policy, I would bring to the attention of all honourable senators that I was most impressed with Sydney, Nova Scotia on Cape Breton Island—the inhabitants of which were so attached to their Scottish ethnic roots.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Haidasz: Not only was I impressed, but I was edified by the citizens of Sydney, Nova Scotia, and that experience helped me a great deal to keep on working to promote further this policy throughout Canada.

Senator Murray: Do you have a petition, senator? Have they given you a petition to present to parliament?

Senator Haidasz: Yes, there are many petitions from Nova Scotia.

Senator Murray: Then kindly present them, senator. We are now at the point of presentation of petitions. Kindly operate approximately within the rules.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I continue.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Phillips: Do I understand that you are refusing to present petitions from Cape Breton?

Senator Haidasz: No, senator. However, they will be presented by the senators from the Province of Nova Scotia. I do not want to trespass on their privilege. Furthermore, they know more about Nova Scotia then I do, Senator.

The second name on this petition is that of a petitioner from Warsaw, Ontario. That reminds me of Warsaw, Poland where the original Warsaw was founded. It was the third site for a capital of Poland—

Senator Gigantès: What was the first capital?

Senator Haidasz: The first capital was Gniezno, which means "the nest". In other words, where the nest of the Polish nation was situated.

Senator Gigantès: Is there still a city of that name?

Senator Haidasz: Yes, there is.

Senator Gigantès: Where is it, Senator?

Senator Haidasz: It is adjacent to Poznan, just 40 kilometres from the border of West Germany. It was the area which felt the initial brunt of the Nazi onslaught on Poland on September 1st, 1939.

Senator Gigantès: Therefore the territories on the west side of Poland were originally Polish?

Senator Haidasz: Yes, and which, in the settlement after World War II, were ceded back to Poland. As I mentioned, Warsaw was the third capital. The second capital was Krakow—

Senator Gigantès: On this question of the territories which were ceded back to Poland after the war, do you believe from your contacts with the Polish nation that it feels sufficiently reassured that there will not be the usual German irredintism, now that the two Germanies have united themselves, leading to another attempt to despoil Poland of her traditional territories?

Senator Haidasz: That is a very interesting and serious question. The new government of Poland has always petitioned the four occupying powers of West Germany that, before unification of East and West Germany could take place, the Chancellor of West Germany, on behalf of the German nation, would have to make a solemn pledge that, for evermore, the western boundaries of Poland would be guaranteed.

Although Chancellor Kohl made the solemn statement and promise on behalf of the German people, I want to answer Senator Gigantès' question specifically that there still is a burning sensation under the skin of the Polish people in this regard; a fear that a Poland situated between Germany and Russia is not a secure country. I think the majority of Polish people live with this sort of feeling of insecurity. That is one of the sad aspects of the present thinking and feeling of many Poles.

Warsaw, as I mentioned, also felt the onslaught of the Nazi armies of Adolf Hitler. They bombed Warsaw and burnt it to the ground. There was not one building left standing. However, to the credit of the Poles, their architects succeeded in preserving the architectural plans of old Warsaw and, after World War II, rebuilt the city to what it had previously been before it was demolished by the Nazi hordes of Adolf Hitler.

The next address on this petition is Toronto, Ontario. Toronto, as you know, is the largest city in Canada. I happen to have been born there in 1923 and had the privilege of representing Toronto Trinity riding in the House of Commons when I was first elected there in 1957.

Toronto, as honourable senators well know, draws a lot of tourists. Every year, the Caribana Festival is held in Toronto when black Canadians, black Americans and black people from Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago, and even blacks from Nova Scotia come to Toronto to take part in the Caribana Festival every August. This Festival shows the culture of these people to Canadians and helps us to understand them and feel enriched by what they have to contribute to multicultural Canada.

The next address on this petition is Peterborough. As you know, Peterborough is the home of Quaker Oats in Canada. It is also the home of one of the factories of General Electric, where many Canadian electrical engineers contribute to the building of Canada.

The next address mentioned on the petition is Lakefield, Ontario. Lakefield is situated between Peterborough and Barry's Bay. As you know Barry's Bay is the heart of the Madawaska Valley of Ontario where the first group of permanent settlers from Poland settled in Canada in 1859.

Senator Corbin: That is correct. I know the area.

Senator Haidasz: I recommend that you visit the Madawaska Valley. It is one of the most beautiful areas of Ontario.

There is an address here on this petition in Belleville, Ontario. We have heard a great deal about Campobello and other cities that have this prefix or suffix of "belle". "Belleville" is a french name meaning "beautiful city" and Belleville, Ontario is indeed a beautiful city on Lake Ontario, situated almost halfway between Toronto and Ottawa.

There is an address here in Lindsay, Ontario. Lindsay, Ontario was the home and the riding of Premier Leslie Frost, one of the most popular and successful premiers of the Province of Ontario.

(Names of signatories read)

There is an address on this petition of Hudson Street, Peterborough. The founding fathers of Peterborough wanted to honour a famous Canadian and thus named one of their streets after the famous Henry Hudson, who was one of the original explorers of North America. His great feat was to explore that big body of water which we call today Hudson Bay, which lies between, on the one side, the North West Territories, Ontario and Quebec and Ungava on the other.

(Reading of names from petition continues)

Senator Cools: Senator Haidasz, might I interrupt you? I wanted to tell you that Lakefield is the home of a famous school called Lakefield School. One of Her Majesty's sons went to school at Lakefield.

Senator Haidasz: A very good point, Senator Cools.

Senator Gigantès: My daughter had a boyfriend from there. He was a charming boy with excellent manners. He used to pretend that he could not open a jam jar and would pass it to me to do it. He was really charming.

Senator Haidasz: I will continue with the petition.

There is an address on this petition in Bancroft, Ontario. That riding was well served by the members of the famous Maloney family. Arthur Maloney, who was a famous lawyer, had a brother, Monsignor Maloney, who was the pastor of the Roman Catholic parish in Bancroft. His other brother was a member of the provincial legislature of Ontario for that area.

The original Maloney, Dr. Maloney, was a doctor from the Madawaska Valley.

Senator Murray: I think we can be certain, however, and I am sure my learned friend would agree, that none of those Maloneys, either living or dead, would have signed that petition.

Senator Gigantès: What was that?

Senator Murray: I said that none of those Maloneys, all of whom are known to me, would have signed the petition that my honourable friend is bringing to the attention of this House.

Senator Haidasz: I am not the prophet that Senator Murray pretends to be, but nonetheless—

Senator Murray: Well, you do not know the Maloneys.

Senator Gigantès: Are you saying that these signatures are forgeries?

Senator Murray: You weren't listening, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: I do not listen when you speak. It makes me too angry.

Senator Haidasz: I will continue with the reading of my petition:

(Names of signatories read)

• (1230)

Senator Gigantès: How do you pronounce it yourself, sir?

Senator Haidasz: Well, in Polish it is pronounced phonetically "Haidasz".

Senator Gigantès: What is wrong with "Haidasz"? It is not difficult to pronounce.

Senator Haidasz: Well, for some it is, senator. You are a polyglot and a philologist. It is easy for you, but there are people who have difficulty.

Senator Gigantès: With Haidasz? Well, if they have difficulty with Haidasz, how would they manage "Protopadacopoulos"?

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Haidasz: I am asking myself why there are so many people against the GST in Peterborough. Well, I am afraid that those poor, hardworking people have enough of high taxes in Canada. The people of Ontario are now, today, the most highly taxed in all of Canada. I fear that the people of Peterborough feel it badly and fear the GST; and that is why they came and signed this petition.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Haidasz: Well, I really sympathize with the people of St. Catharines. There is a lot of unemployment there at the present time. They fear that the GST will not only increase inflation in Canada, but also will cause the bankruptcy of still further small industries, many of which are situated in St. Catharines, Ontario.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Haidasz: Oshawa is the home of the biggest GM automotive plant in Canada.

An Hon. Senator: Broadbent, Ed Broadbent.

Senator Haidasz: Yes, I hear the words Ed Broadbent.

Senator Gigantès: Has he signed the petition?

Senator Haidasz: Not on this one, but I am sure that he is against the GST.

Senator Gigantès: Despite the fact that they gave him patronage appointment which he accepted and which the Tories have the bad taste face of rubbing his nose into every time they speak about it in the House of Commons. Because if they thought it was a wrong appointment, to make, why the hell did they make it? Forgive me for the word.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Haidasz: Well, Senator Gigantès, the Conservative government has made a lot of mistakes, a lot of bad appointments. So it is nothing new what they did with the appointment of Broadbent to that International Human Rights Institute.

(Names of signatories read)

There is one from Burlington. Now that is another place where the people will be hard hit by the GST as this government proposes. Burlington, Ontario, as you know, was considered suburb of Hamilton. Now, it is a city of its own. A lot of people that work in Hamilton commute and live in Burlington.

Since we have heard names from Warsaw, I just would like to add, at the present time in Warsaw is being held the International Chopin Competition. It is held in Warsaw every five years. It brings together the most famous pianists and many judges in the piano field to Warsaw where the competitors are to play any piece composed by Frédéric Chopin. His father was French, who moved to Poland and married a blue-eyed blonde in Warsaw and remained there and became the father of Frédéric Chopin who is one of the greatest piano composers in history.

An Hon. Senator: In Ontario or Warsaw, Poland?

Senator Haidasz: In the city of Warsaw.

Senator Cools: Warsaw, Poland.

Senator Haidasz: Warsaw, Poland, is about 50 kilometres from the birthplace of Frederic Chopin. The birthplace is called Zelazowa-Wola, which means the Iron Will.

Regis. I suppose that is the place of Regis College in Scarborough, which is a most eminent Jesuit school for boys. As you know, the Jesuits are an educational Order. They are celebrating their 450th anniversary at the present time. The Jesuits were founded by Ignatius Loyola who came from Loyola, Spain. There are more than 25,000 Jesuits throughout the entire world at the present time.

Ottawa was honoured by a visit of a former Jesuit last Tuesday and Wednesday. He name is Malachi Martin, the Reverend Malachi Martin, a priest who left the Jesuit Order after having taught at the Pontifical Biblical Institute in the Vatican.

An Hon. Senator: He would understand then the purposes of the value added tax and a broadly based sales tax. I cannot imagine why Father Martin signed that petition. I presume my friend is alleging that he did.

Senator Haidasz: Father Malachi did not sign this petition.

An Hon. Senator: Well, who did sign the petition? I think it rather out of order for my friend to give us a list of people who did not sign the petition. Perhaps he might tell us who did sign it.

Senator Haidasz: I am talking about Regis, where this signator comes from. Now, he comes from Regis, which is the Jesuit College, I told you, in Scarborough. The Jesuits this year are celebrating their 450th anniversary; and one of these former Jesuits visited Parliament Hill last Tuesday and Wednesday. I had him as a guest for dinner just before he gave a speech on the faith.

An Hon. Senator: And you made him pay.

Senator Haidasz: No, I paid. The next day he spoke at the Ottawa public library about his 15th book the 15th book he has written. He wrote one on the Vatican, one on the Hostages to the Devil, about the exorcisms. He wrote one about the Bear. And this latest book, which is being sold in Canada and the United States, is entitled "The Keys of my Blood" and the sub-title is "A Struggle for Power by John Paul II, Mikhail Gorbachev and the Capitalist West". It is a 700-page book, which I have just finished reading last weekend. It has many interesting details and it has a very deep insight into that struggle for the world, for the soul of the world being fought now by John Paul II, Mikhail Gorbachev and the capitalist west.

An Hon. Senator: Who is winning?

Senator Haidasz: I think that so far, Pope John Paul II is winning because he had a lot to do with Solidarity and the liberation of Poland from the communist regime, which was then followed by the overthrow of the communist regimes in many other eastern European countries.

An Hon. Senator: Did he happen to mention how they deal with a question of privilege and point of order in the Jesuit congregation?

Senator Haidasz: In which congregation?

An Hon. Senator: The Jesuit congregation.

Senator Gigantès: Would you please answer his question? You were asked a question.

Senator Haidasz: I think that is a good question, but a question which probably can be better answered by a Jesuit or a Jesuit scholar.

Senator Gigantès: I was taught by the Jesuits.

An Hon. Senator: You do not need a Jesuit scholar, you have got my friend, Senator Gigantès; he is everything.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, at general request and to applause that makes me feel extremely modest and humble, I must say that in the general congregation the rules that prevail are those of Plato's Republic. Everyone appointed to the general congregation is appointed by the Pope. So, there are two categories of people, as in the Soviet system, as in a bureaucracy. There are the dissemblers who lick books, but wait with a stiletto in their hand to stab their leader and take over. And there are the genuine believers. But, generally, if the head of such a system is agile and strong and well informed, there is usually information that is available to him. He can generally cut off people at the knees before they overthrow him.

There are wonderful examples of this sort of stuff.

An Hon. Senator: John Turner.

Senator Gigantès: I was going to go a little earlier than that, a similar example, with Cardinal Diez of France. At the famous conclave in a church in southeast France, where various factions wanted to move the papacy from Avignon back to Italy, they did not want to hold the meeting. And Prince Philippe of France, who later became Phillippe VI of France, lured them into the church and said they would get nothing but bread and water, which, of course, for Cardinals is a great hardship, until they elected someone. And one of them, Cardinal Diez, who was 72 years old—people who think that we are old should consider what happens next—pretended he was mortally ill. And the other cardinals thought they were going to be extremely sly, elect this moribund person and then get out, the doors would be open. Jean Diez would die. No, John XXII. The XXXIII is the one we had recently. So he became John XXII. They were hoping that he would die within a week, because he looked so very ill. But it was dissembling; he survived, and he lived to the ripe age of 93 as an extremely strong pope, who brooked no opposition whatsoever at all. He was into alchemy. He really believed that he could transform base metals into gold. And into numerology. And his opponents suggested he engaged in some sort of witchcraft now and then, but also demonology, but despite all these rumours he remained in power, and he is the one that made the greatest exploitation of indulgence letters in the church. So, the rules are different in a general congregation. They probably resemble what happens in your cabinet, rather than what happens in a democracy.

An Hon. Senator: Thank you, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: Anytime.

Senator Haidasz: I have some more names.

(Names of signatories read)

Hastings. Well, we have the honour in this chamber to have a Hastings. One of his ancestors was, I guess, the one who owned the field of Hastings. You recall the Battle of Hastings? Tell us something about the Battle of Hastings.

Senator Gigantès: I was asked a courteous question by a fellow senator. The Battle of Hastings is a very important battle in the history of the world because it established, in effect, the political regime that formed modern England. The Saxons who were there and who had begun subjugating and integrating with the Gaelic population that, to this day, is downtrodden, although downtrodden—if you talk of the Scots they complain they are downtrodden, but they actually run the whole of Britain, but I think the Welsh with the exception of Lloyd George, who had 22 mistresses during the First World War, some of them concurrently; maybe that is why the war lasted so long.

The Battle of Hastings was extremely important because the Norman forces, which had Scandinavian blood—and there already was a well—established Scandinavian presence on the east coast of England, Norfolk, you know, and Lincoln, strong Scandinavian roots; Whitby. That is a Scandinavian name.

In that battle, the forces coming from France, Normandy and bringing, therefore, a strong element of the Latin culture which they had acquired there, and taste for French wine, battled the—unready king and won. Now, it is regrettable his plight was romanticized, but, you know if you are not able to properly prepare, to foresee, to know what the dangers are and know avenues of retreat and new positions, you will be defeated, and your people will suffer, as the people of Canada are suffering because Mulroney is a bad commander who does not know how to lead us out of the valley of darkness into which he has plunged us. Thank you.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am happy to interrupt the thesis of Senator Gigantès that Chopin was actually Greek and inform the house that there has been agreement between both sides that we shall have a lunch break from 12:30 to 1:30.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I am informed that there is a mutual understanding that I should leave the chair at 12:30 and return at 1:30. Is there agreement on that?

Senator Frith: Precisely as we do under our rules, at 6 p.m. and 8 p.m.

Senator Haidasz: I would like to bring to your attention that I was standing when this motion was made. I have the floor. Thank you.

The Senate recessed during pleasure.

At 1:30 the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, it is my privilege and duty to resume reading into the record petitions by the loyal citizens, subjects of Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth II, the Queen of Canada, with regard to their supplication and prayer that the Senate do prevail on the government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed Goods and Services Tax.

This presentation of petition's is the right that we have in this hamber, enabling the loyal citizens of Canada, such as the men and women even in the public galleries of this chamber, to make such petitions to redress grievances. This is a fundamental principle of the Constitution which has been exercised without interruption since 1967 in Canada, and for more than 600 years, a tradition in the United Kingdom. These public petitions pray for an alteration of a general law or a proposed law, and they also may pray for redress of personal grievances. The reading of the petitions I began earlier and which were interrupted by our lunch break, and for us Liberals, by a meeting with the Pro-Canada Network, an umbrella organization of unions, farm organizations, consumer organizations and other organizations, who are here in Ottawa this afternoon while we continue this historic debate in this Chamber.

And so, I continue with petitions signed by citizens from Ontario. The next name on the list that I have in my hand is from Scarborough, Ontario. As you know, Scarborough used to be a suburb of Toronto. It is now one of the six boroughs of Metropolitan Toronto. It has a modern municipal building. It is one of the fastest-growing municipalities in Canada. It is diverse in ethnic composition, in the various small businesses and even big industry. These people feel that the proposed GST is going to not only harm their personal and financial status, but also may even lead to the loss of jobs because of possible bankruptcies of the many small businesses in Scarborough and the cut-down of staff in many large industries, some of which have already left Scarborough and gone to the United States or Mexico because of free trade, and that will be further menaced should the GST hit them.

The next name is from Westhill, Ontario. That is in Scarborough. The next petitioner is from Agincourt, Ontario. Agincourt, that is a glorious name of an historical event in England.

Senator Gigantès: No, no, it is in France, and it is called "Agincourt" in French.

Senator Haidasz: Would you explain that?

Senator Gigantès: This is a famous battle where King Henry IV encountered the hosts of France who had superior calvary and, of course, much superior numbers.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps more wine?

Senator Gigantès: I do not know whether the wine was a factor. What was a factor there was the arrogance of the ruling class, which really believed that because they were richer and they had armour, they were superior to the yeomen of England who were good, hard working farmers and terrific with a long bow. It was a fairly simple tactic that King Henry adopted. He arrived early and chose high ground surrounded by marshy meadows, through which the horses of the French knights had travelled in the past. He dug into the ground strong stakes which were then sharpened into points and which were not visible to the knights on horseback because in front of the stakes stood the bowmen. As the knights of France in their glorious raiments with banners flying rushed towards them, a cloud of arrows left the long bows and killed large numbers of them, and those who did not get killed suddenly found that their horses were impaled on the stakes. The lower orders from the bowmen, the ordinary peasants with their long skinning knives destroyed what was left of the French chivalry. The King of France was taken prisoner. So were the princes. This was a victory of Sweet Prince Hal, as he is called by Falstaff in King Henry IV, a young prince who was supposed to be dissolute but was in fact a reformer; a very liberal king he turned out to be, who showed flexibility; the flexibility that lacks in the Conservative mind. And that is a long lesson of history.

For instance, in Athens, there was a conservative faction, the rich Athenian who could afford armour. But so could the Spartans. The Spartans were professional soldiers. They were training eight hours a day, at least. Whenever the army of infantry of Athens met the army of infantry of Sparta, the Spartans won. If, perchance, the army of infantry of Athens was engaged elsewhere and the Spartans invaded Attica and arrived at the gates of Athens, of necessity Athens sent out the peltastes. The peltastes were the rabble, the mob that came out throwing stones with slates, they may have had some arrows, and they stood away from the Spartans and they literally lapidated them to pieces. Now, every time the highly trained Spartan infantry met the unruly mob of Athens, it lost.

Now, would the good Conservative rich burghers of Athens understand the lesson? No. They felt that it was socially demeaning to let the poor actually show themselves to be better than the rich. They kept insisting on going out and getting cut to ribbons. It is a sad commentary.

The nadir of Conservative military thinking was the First World War, where you had these idiot generals fighting trench warfare and butting against one another like rams in rut, instead of trying some tactic of going around the lines, and millions of young men were slaughtered in senseless attack against barbed wire behind which were massed machine gun nests.

The folly of it is that the Conservative government that followed the Liberal government of Lloyd George—Lloyd George was otherwise occupied during that war because he had 22 mistresses, some concurrently during the First World War, which, of course, sapped his energy. Twenty-one, twenty-two, is a lot.

The Conservative government that followed Lloyd George's government actually gave an earldom to General Haig, the man who had said that the victor in such a war was the one in whose army one soldier was left standing, whereas in the other army no one else was left standing.

The nation of France statistically lost about an inch in height because of that. It had lost an inch of height in the Napoleonic wars. By the way, Napoleon is the one who made that absolutely intolerable reference when he was told at Austerlitz that he had lost 100,000 men dead; he said, "That's nothing. One night of love in Paris replaces them." Anyhow, this is the kind of mind that the military people have. They are a very conservative lot and they seldom, if ever, tolerate the innovators among them, like the great Lord Windgate, the fellow who founded the British Commandoes who were dropped behind enemy lines behind Burma and Thailand, and who tied down many, many Japanese divisions, each one being able to tie down a hundred.

[Translation]

Senator David: On a point of order. The person presenting the petition is supposed to do so briefly. This brevity, we have been enduring it since yesterday, since 1h00 yesterday morning, that is almost 24 hours ago. I suppose that according to the same regulations, the person giving an explanation should also be brief and not necessarily give us a wonderful lesson in history to show us how learned he is, but to give a reasonable explanation to Senator Haidasz, otherwise we will wonder which one of the two has the floor at the present time.

Senator Gigantès: The Honourable Senator could not find anything in the regulations saying that if the senator ask me a question I should answer in such and such manner; I cannot see the word "briefly" apply to the answer I am giving to Senator Haidasz, and the only application of the word "briefly" or rather "brief" deals with the content of the petition itself and not with the names written on it; so, reading the petition for instance, (do you have one? yes, the Senator has one here), the integral text of this petition is:

[English]

> "On the subject of the proposed national goods and services tax, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax."

Now, our rule says that we must make a brief statement about that, and generally I say an anti-GST petition, which is an abbreviation of what the petition says, there is nothing in the rules that says that I must not read the names.

[Translation]

Senator David: There could be some logic.

Senator Gigantès: But there is absolutely nothing a Conservative can say about logic! There is nothing in the rules saying that my answers to Senator Haidasz should be briefer than you. Would you like me to give you a long dissertation for example on the battle of Hastings. I have not spoken yet about the Bayeux tapestry. But I could speak about the Bayeux tapestry for hours because it is a very interesting find.

Senator Haidasz: I want to thank Senator Gigantès for his explanations, which are not only interesting but also give us a lot of information about our predecessors' history in England and in France.

[English]

Senator Gigantès: The Bayeux Tapestry, yes, this is what I wanted to talk about. I forgot earlier when talking about Hastings, because we have this magnificent document.

Senator Doody: On a point of order, the gentleman knows very well the presentation of the petitions has absolutely nothing to do with the history discourses that we are being treated to here. If the object of the honourable gentleman opposite is to try the patience of the people on this side of the house to the extreme, then this place deteriorates to the state it was last week. If that is the object, the honourable gentleman has headed down exactly the right course, I can assure him this is flagrant abuse of the rules and will not be tolerated. Now, stick with the rules. Stick with the rules. Get on with the petitions and we will patiently listen to you; but if you are going to get off on this nonsense about the battle of Hastings and these other irrelevancies, then I think we are in for a different sort of a session.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I would like to answer Senator Doody. I am very sympathetic to your cause, but the Chair has no power; so having no power to limit the debate, I must listen.

An Hon. Senator: It is not a debate, sir, it is a presentation of petition.

Senator Haidasz: We in Canada have a parliamentary system, a system which allows us, as the word says, to talk. In other words, we have the freedom of speech. Anyway, in thanking Senator Gigantès, who gave the petitioner and signatory on this petition from Agincourt, Ontario, an explanation, how he feels, I am sure that the petitioner, too, is interested in the history of the town which carries the name of Agincourt, and as Senator Gigantès told us about the good and liberal King Henry IV.

Senator Gigantès: Fifth.

Senator Haidasz: Fifth. This reminds me of something opposite. The bad King Henry VIII, bad because of his marital misbehaviour—

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): A point of order. When a member presents a petition, he may not make a speech nor present argument in support of the petition. He may speak to the petition. The bad King Henry V has got absolutely nothing to do with this.

Senator Gigantès: He said the bad King Henry VIII.

Senator Doody: Henry the VIII, I meant, sir.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Well, I should remind him that our sovereign, the Queen of Canada, Queen Elizabeth—

An Hon. Senator: She is not a king.

Senator Haidasz: —Queen Elizabeth II had an ancestor named Queen Elizabeth I.

An Hon. Senator: This is a coincidence.

Senator Haidasz: One of the daughters of King Henry VIII. Queen Elizabeth I, an ancestor to Queen Elizabeth the II, the Queen of Canada, at one time said something pertinent. Some bishop of the Church of England came to her complaining, and Queen Elizabeth I said, "Proud prelate, you know what you were before I made you what you are." This reminds me of something else, but I will continue with what she said. "If you do not immediately comply with my request, I will unfrock you, by God." Well, this applies to all of the patronage appointments, even to the appointment of the Speaker Charbonneau to this Chair, which, as you know, although not present, has some relevance to what we Liberal senators are conducting.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Anyway, I will go to the next name on the list, a person from Lakefield College. We heard about Lakefield before. That is where one of the sons of Queen Elizabeth II—one of the grandsons of Queen Elizabeth I—

Senator Gigantès: No, son.

Senator Haidasz: Son of Queen Elizabeth II, spent his high school days with his fellow-Canadian boys.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Then there is a petitioner from Lakefield, Ontario; another from Lakefield, Ontario; Highland Grove, Ontario, another Canadian citizen who fears the GST and its ruinous effects, of course, upon his family and our country.

The next page has the following signatories. From London, Ontario, the home of one of our colleagues, Senator Charlie Turner, London; former home of former Premier John Robarts.

Senator Bosa: And Peterson.

Senator Haidasz: And former Premier David Peterson. London, of course, was named after the capital city of England. London, England, which is the seat of the British Parliamentary System, of which we are an heir.

Then there comes another petition from North London, Ontario; have is one from Bancroft, Ontario. I told you that Bancroft is a place where the famous Conservatives like Arthur Maloney and his brother, Monsignour Mulroney, and then another brother of his, who was the Minister of Mines and Resources in the—

An Hon. Senator: Maloney.

Senator Haidasz: I mean Maloney. I am referring particularly to Arthur Maloney, whom I defeated in the federal election in 1962.

Here is another petitioner, from Oshawa, Ontario. Well, we know where Oshawa is. It is a suburb of Toronto.

Senator Bosa: Oh, no.

Senator Haidasz: The home of General Motors and the home of Ed Broadbent, who was the Leader of the New Democratic Party in the House of Commons and who was rewarded recently with an appointment by Prime Minister Brian Mulroney to be Chairman of the Peace Institute.

Another petitioner from Oshawa, Ontario—

Senator Cogger: I would like to know what has become of M. Broadbent. I did not understand the—Senator Haidasz: I will repeat it: The Prime Minister, Brian Mulroney, appointed Mr. Broadbent to be chairman of the International Peace Institute of Canada.

Senator Cogger: I do not think you are right.

Senator Haidasz: What is the name of that institute?

Senator Kinsella: International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic—

Senator Haidasz: If we have human rights, we are going to have peace, not only here, but also in Canada and in the world, but we have to respect human rights.

An Hon. Senator: Even in this chamber.

Senator Haidasz: A petitioner from Toronto, Ontario. I do not think I have to repeat again what a great metropolis Toronto is. Many of us come from there.

A petitioner from Indian Grove, Toronto, Ontario. Well, Indian Grove is one of the nicer streets of Parkdale which I represented in the House of Commons from 1962 to 1978. Indian Grove also comes—

Senator Bosa: It is in the west end.

Senator Haidasz: It should remind us that it is a street named in Toronto to bring memories of the Indians, our native people, our Canadian Indians who are our Aboriginal peoples and how they contributed to the building of Toronto.

Next to Indian Grove is a street called Brulé Gardens, and you know that Brulé is the surname of Etienne Brulé, one of those explorers and fur trappers who made a big name for himself.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Haidasz, would you allow me to take my leave of the Speaker as my shift is over?

Senator Haidasz: Thank you very much for your great contribution to this debate.

Senator Gigantès:

And now we go, sweet Lord
Adorned as if with rubies on our hose
By drops of blood that spurteth from our foes
To hard layings on the battle's floor.

Thank you. I will give the text.

Senator Haidasz: What a beautiful poem, and to the point.

An Hon. Senator: From whom was that poem?

Senator Gigantès: From one of my favourite authors.

An Hon. Senator: It is not acceptable. It is not in the proper form.

Senator Haidasz: The next signature on this petition is from Scarborough, Ontario. Even the Kennedy family has been honoured in Scarborough. It is a main north-south thoroughway in metro Toronto.

The next Canadian petitioner complaining about the GST is again from Scarborough, Ontario, followed by a petitioner from Toronto, Ontario, on Manning Avenue. Manning Avenue is the street upon which borders the great Honest Ed's Emporium. If you have never seen or heard of Honest Ed's, please come to Toronto to Bloor and Bathurst and Manning Avenue, where you will get real value for your dollar.

Senator Bosa: It is an Italian district.

Senator Haidasz: That is right. There are many Canadians of Italian ethnic origin who live on Manning Avenue. It used to be inhabited by Canadians of the Jewish faith, but they have moved north to North York.

The next signatory is from St. Clarens Avenue, Toronto. St. Clarens is another street in Parkdale which I represented in the House of Commons between 1962 and 1978.

Then there is another petitioner from Toronto; a petitioner from Peterborough, Ontario; a petitioner from Wolsley Street, Peterborough. Wolsley. Now, that brings to mind a very famous Englishman, Cardinal Wolsley.

Senator Cools: Thomas.

Senator Haidasz: Cardinal Thomas Wolsley.

Senator Cools: Yes.

Senator Haidasz: Is there someone who would like to give us a word on Wolsley? He served his king faithfully and then he regretted the fact. I guess he lost his soul.

Senator Cools: He lost more than that.

Senator Cogger: Who? The king or the cardinal?

Senator Haidasz: Cardinal Wolsley, just like Cardinal Richelieu.

There is a petitioner from London, Ontario; a petitioner from Cobourg, Ontario; a petitioner from Peterborough, Ontario, Brunswick Avenue. Brunswick, as you know, is named after Brunswick, who was one of the earlier settlers in New Brunswick, Senator Corbin, could you give us a little history of New Brunswick?

Senator Corbin: The Maliseet and the Micmac Indians are the original settlers of New Brunswick. I think we ought to give a good part of it back to them.

Senator Haidasz: Thank you, senator.

The next signatory is from Lakefield, Ontario, and the next signatory is from Lakefield, Ontario.

I come to the end of this page, and I see that it is past 2:00 p.m. two. I will like to yield the floor to the next senator who wishes to speak on this shift.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Senators, I, too, have some petitions that I have been entrusted to the attention of the Senate. The petitioners are very upset about the goods and services tax. They are generally from the Peterborough area. They call themselves "IRATE Citizens". I gather "IRATE" stands for "I'm Rebelling against Tax Excesses." They include a petitioner from Hawkstone; a petitioner from Barrie; a petitioner from Beaverton, Ontario; another petitioner from Beaverton, Ontario; another petitioner from Beaverton, Ontario.

Senator Bosa: Don't they have the streets?

Senator Kenny: No, these are rural routes which has a postal run.

An Hon. Senator: The post office was shut down, was it?

Senator Kenny: The post office was probably shut down.

There is another petitioner from Beaverton; a petitioner from Bracken; a petitioner from Beaverton; another petitioner from Beaverton; a petitioner from Birkfield, Ontario; a petitioner from Beaverton; a petitioner from Brechin, Ontario; a petitioner from Beaverton.

These are people who are unhappy with the GST and I have a petition that I am presenting on their behalf.

An Hon. Senator: Where are they from?

Senator Kenny: They are from the Peterborough area.

An Hon. Senator: They are working people?

Senator Kenny: I am sure they are.

An Hon. Senator: Ordinary people, working people?

Senator Kenny: I am sure they are ordinary working people.

A petitioner from Beaverton, Ontario; a petitioner from Beaverton, Ontario.

These are all members of the group of IRATE Citizens.

Honourable senators, I have here another petition on the subject on the goods and services tax. It is from a group of citizens from Ontario, the province that I represent, and they have asked me to convey to the government through this chamber that they are very unhappy with the goods and services tax and they would like the Senate to do whatever they can to stop that tax. They are also IRATE Citizens, IRATE, I gather, standing for "I am Rebelling Against Tax Excess." They include people from a little further north in Ontario.

Again, all these people are very unhappy with the GST.

Honourable senators, I have another petition from Ontario. The citizens are unhappy with the goods and services tax and are petitioning the Senate of Canada to intercede on their behalf to stop the tax from being introduced. A great deal of trouble has been taken to collect these signatures.

Honourable senators, I have another petition, from a group of people who are petitioning the Senate in the hope that the it can stop the goods and services tax. They have indicated they are very unhappy with this tax and at least we can do something to persuade the government not to pass it. They are from Peterborough, Ontario.

Honourable senators, I have a petition that I have been entrusted with. The petitioners are very concerned about the goods and services tax and they are asking the Senate to use its good offices to ensure that the tax does not go ahead. The petitioners appear to be generally from the Peterborough area, and again the group that has worked so hard to develop the list calls itself IRATE Citizens. These people have chosen that name because it stands for, "I am Rebelling against Tax Excesses". Included on the list are:

Honourable senators, I have a petition from citizens living in Ontario. They are petitioning the Senate of Canada because they are unhappy with the proposed goods and services tax and would like the Senate of Canada to do whatever it can to intercede and ask the government not to introduce the tax. The petition has been organized by a group of citizens from Peterborough who refer to themselves as IRATE citizens. I am told that that stands for "I am Rebelling Against Tax Excesses".

The last petition I am going to present today, Honourable senators, is from a group of citizens from Ontario who have petitioned the Senate of Canada to indicate that they are unhappy with the proposed goods and services tax. They would like the Senate to do what it can to stop the introduction of this tax. This is also the group which refers to itself as "IRATE Citizens." I understand that "IRATE" stands for "I Am Rebelling Against Tax Excesses."

Senator Lefebvre: Not very many people in Mascouche are in favor of the GST.

Senator Hastings: Is it near Quebec City?

Senator Lefebvre: No, the people of Mascouche are almost all opposed to the GST.

Senator Lefebvre: Honourable senators, I have another petition from the north of Témiscamingue county, an area not very well known by senators.

Senator Lefebvre: I have here a petition to the Senate of Canada. The petition is signed by residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in a certain assurance that your honourable Senate will therefore provide a remedy. Humbly sheweth Whereas the new universal 7% federal goods and services tax adopted by the Conservative Government will create serious, unjust and inhuman difficulties to Canadians; Whereas the implementation of this tax will constitute an unprecedented assault on the income of Canadians, not only by forcing them to pay higher taxes, but also by confronting them with a rise inflation, interest rates and unemployment. Wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to reject this new goods and services tax. The Canadian producers are carrying out their job perfectly by flooding the market with products, but they cannot produce money. The government must therefore set up a national credit office to create the money required by the existence of new wealth and abundance. And your petitioners will never cease to pray.

Thank you very much, honourable senators, for being so patient.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I have been asked to draw the attention of the Senate to 105 petitions which I have received from the Don't Tax Reading Coalition. The Don't Tax Reading Coalition consists of the following organizations: The Antiquarian Booksellers' Association of Canada, the Association of Canadian Publishers, the Canadian Booksellers' Association, the Canadian Book Publishers' Council, the Canadian Community Newspaper Association of Canada, the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers' Association, the Canadian Library Association, the Canadian Magazine Publishers' Association, the Periodical Marketers of Canada, the Canadian Teachers' Federation, and the Canadian University Press.

Each of these petitions is in respect of maintaining a tax rate of zero for books, magazines and newspapers. I propose to read some of these petitions at the present time.

(Names of signatories read)

I want to remind honourable senators that all these petitions are from the Don't Tax Reading Coalition. These are people who want to maintain a tax rate of zero on books, magazines and newspapers. So honourable senators can see the importance of this petition and how strongly these people feel.

I have a further petition:

I have a further petition, honourable senators, from the "Don't Tax Reading Coalition." While most of the signatures appear to be from Toronto, there are some from other parts of the country.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: I know that honourable senators are not following the rules too much; however, is there not a rule that states something to the effect that the honourable senator should speak from his place?

Senator Davey: I did not hear what you said.

Senator Kinsella: Is there not a rule saying that a Senator must speak from his place?

Senator Stollery: Senator Davey is in his place.

Senator Kinsella: No.

Senator Stollery: I am in my place, he is in his place, everybody is in their place.

[English]

Senator Davey: I will continue reading the names on the petition.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition containing signatures from the west.

(Names of signatories read)

These petitions I am reading, honourable senators, are all from the organization "Don't Tax Reading Coalition." This coalition is anxious to maintain a tax rate of zero for books, magazines, and newspapers. As I mentioned, I have received 105 of these petitions and I have dealt with a few of them this evening. I will complete one more, but I hope I will have the opportunity to return and put some more names on the record.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Stollery: I am not catching all of those names as clearly as I might.

Senator Davey: Perhaps you want me to repeat them. As a matter of fact, for the time being, this is my final petition and that is why I was perhaps being hasty.

(Names of signatories read)

I hope I will have time to read more petitions, and I thank you.

Senator Hastings: That was an excellent petition.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I am pleased to be able to take part in the presentation and reading of petitions, this most honourable of traditions in the democratic process. I have a number of petitions from the lower mainland of British Columbia, and a number from the City of Kamloops which are not in the proper form. I wish I could put them on the record. This petition is from a business called Lynne's Place. Lynne Aves is the owner of this small business. She points out in her letter that she collected approximately 900 names in her small business in a little less than two weeks. If I were able to put them on the record it would be interesting, because I recognize that many of the names are Conservatives who worked against me in previous elections.

Senator Stollery: So these are Conservative names you are putting on the record?

Senator Kelly: Not Conservatives opposed to the tax? Read the names slowly; I will take them down.

Senator Marchand: I will not give the Conservative names I recognize.

I have to apologize. I am fighting a cold and I may not be able to go on for very long, so perhaps Senator Stollery, if you are ready to speak, you can carry on. I will go for as long as I have some voice.

Senator Hastings: As long as you have breath, keep going.

Senator Marchand: I have lots of breath, but I might not have too much voice.

Senator Hastings: We will never give up.

Senator Marchand: I have a whole bunch of petitions that are in the proper form and they are concerned about the taxation of books and newspapers. They point out that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is the cornerstone of democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by the GST applications. The undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Senate of Canada to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax-free status for the printed word by proposing amendments to Bill C-62 to include retention of the zero rate. As in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray, and it is dated September 28, 1990.

(Names of signatories read)

That is about all that I have for this group. Perhaps Senator Stollery would like to carry on now.

Senator Stollery: Senator Fairbairn has some pressing names to read, and I would like her to continue at this point.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Senator Stollery, I do have some names that I was quite keen to place before the Senate today. The people who have signed these petitions took the trouble to come to Ottawa and bring themselves and their signatures personally, because they felt so strongly about this issue. I should explain that all of them are, in a variety of capacities, part of the Pro-Canada Network. They met with us this afternoon and urged us to retain our resolve and our commitment to work against the passage of the GST.

The first petition simply asks to prevail upon the government to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax as law. The first person on my list is Mr. Harvey Weiner of 99 Rochester, Ottawa, Ontario, who represents the Canadian Teachers Federation.

• (1700)

Mr. Weiner, I might say, has told us that a quarter of a million teachers—elementary and secondary school teacher—across the country are supporting this battle against the GST. He also noted—and this is something common in all of these petitions—that this a non-partisan battle in this country. These people certainly represent every political stripe and every region of the country.

Mary Boyd of Blooming Point, Prince Edward Island, also signed this petition and wants us to know about the force a small province can have in national battles. Prince Edward Island is the smallest province in Canada and has the smallest population, but nonetheless it has been involved in many battles since Confederation. Mary Boyd described to us her feeling that we in this chamber are dealing with an issue that has in it a great sense of history in terms of defending our democracy and the rights of Canadians and the rights of Parliament.

Mary Boyd was happy to hear the other day that there had been readings from the Bible as part of the deliberations of this house. She said the feeling on Prince Edward Island is so strong that parishioners are signing these petitions as they come out of Sunday Mass. She has been hard at work on this Pro Canada coalition. That completes petition numbered 110.

Petition numbered 111 urges us to defeat the GST. The first name on this petition is that of Larry Katz of 37 Craig Street, Ottawa. He is the Director of Research at the Canadian Union of Public Employees, possibly the largest union in numbers in Canada. They are actively supporting a campaign against the GST. They have also added their strength to the court challenge a number of senators have launched respecting the appointment of eight extra Senators. Mr. Katz is also very supportive of our efforts.

Next on the list is a name that honourable senators have become familiar with over the years, that of Wayne Easter. Mr. Easter is the president of the National Farmers' Union and has appeared frequently before the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. He is from North Willshire, Prince Edward Island. He indicated to us that the movement among the farming community from coast to coast against this tax has been, as he said, a little slow because of the harvest, but is escalating at a rapid rate as we deliberate on this issue in this chamber.

Another person who signed this petition is Sandra Sorensen of Laurier Avenue West, Ottawa. She is a member of the Committee on Policy Alternatives, which includes a number of independent economists. She underlines to us that the GST is the wrong tax at the wrong time for Canada and her colleagues are determined to bring forward progressive tax alternative that would help Canada instead of this tax, which, coming as it does, as we are into a recession, will, in her words, "destroy the country".

Barbara Byers of 804-2323 Hamilton Street, Regina, Saskatchewan has also signed this petition. She is on the executive of the Pro Canada Network and represents the Saskatchewan Federation of Labour, which has been engaged in lively opposition to the tax.

Next on the list is Arthur Kube. He is the director of Campaigns for the Canadian Congress of Labour. He resides at 287 Centerpoint Drive, Ottawa. The CLC, as Honourable Senators know, is a major national organization which has been very supportive of all efforts to stop this tax. Indeed, Mr. Kube and one of his colleagues brought a strong message of support to us from the CLC President, Shirley Carr.

John Doyle also put his signature to this petition. He is from Winnipeg, Manitoba. He represents the Manitoba Federation of Labour on the Pro Canada Network Executive.

Mike McBane also signed this petition. He resides at 251 Laurier Avenue West, Ottawa. He is Political Action Director of the Pro-Canada Network.

Maurice Smith also journeyed here. He probably lives the farthest from Ottawa. He resides at 8134 111-A Street, Delta, British Columbia. He is with the coalition in British Columbia, working under the umbrella of the Pro-Canada Network.

Geoffrey Johnston of Montreal also signed this petition. He represents the Ecumenical Commission on Social Justice.

The final name on here, one I am proud to see, is that of Lucien Royer from Edmonton, Alberta. Mr. Royer has been an extremely active member of the coalition. For many months he has organized groups in 85 communities in Alberta. Indeed, he told us that he had come in on Air Canada Flight 176 and that there were 120-odd passengers on that flight. He talked to all of them, and 102 signed their names so that they could be brought to the attention of honourable senators. They placed some comments on the document they signed. Mr. Royer wanted those comments presented to Senators.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

For example, Mr. Dale D. Mark of 1151 33rd Avenue, Edmonton, Alberta, wanted to register his complaint that this is an unfair burden on middle-income families, particularly those living in the prairie provinces where tax rates are already far too heavy.

George Bockwell of Post Office Box 581, Regina, Saskatchewan, gave us a message that he is against the tax. He also wanted to give special mention of commendation to the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Also from Regina is Shauna Parent. She resides at 1528 Gregson Court North.

Allen Butler of Box 336 Stoney Mountain Manitoba suggested there should be a national vote so that Canadians can express their opinions on the GST.

A Dianne McCrae of Box 4136 Golden, British Columbia, told us that she feels the whole tax system is getting out of control, and that should the GST come into play, she would have to move back to Alberta where there is no provincial sales tax.

Mrs. W. E. Harris of 9212 118 Street, Edmonton, Alberta, expressed strong views about the regressive nature of the tax, the administrative costs of the new bureaucracy that has been set up to administer it, and so forth. She takes issue with the exemptions. She feels they are far too complex. She also suggests that a decline in Canadian interest rates would be much more useful than another tax.

Alice Bada from Box 1131, Cochrane, Alberta, also said that she would like this bill defeated.

I should tell honourable senators that most of these people are strong in their desires not to opt out of paying taxes, but that they want to see a fairer tax than the GST. They all express a desire to have the wishes of Canadians on something as personal as tax restructuring to be taken into consideration.

Bob Brown, 17 Stirling Close, Red Deer, Alberta, said that "enough was enough" and that governments should not proceed with the GST.

The views of S.M. Toner of Sturgeon-Thompson, Manitoba, where that the middle class was being taxed to death, and that the GST should not be proceeded with.

Stewart Robbins of Montreal feels the tax discriminates against entrepreneurs in Canada. He is against the tax.

(Names of signatories read)

I could go on and on, but I tender this petition which was organized by the Pro-Canada Network. We had that group visit us in Ottawa today. We sincerely hope they will continue with their work across the country. They urged us, on behalf of the millions and millions of Canadians they represent, Canadians from all political parties, to stay with our battle.

The next petition I have is similar to the one presented by Senator Davey. These people, one way or another, are in the education field. They are either students, administrators or teachers. They are deeply conscious of rising costs in education. They urge, as did Senator Marchand's petitioners, the government to retain the zero rating that has always applied to written materials.

The names I wish to read out are of particular importance, because as I told Senator Simard last evening when he was asking where my petitions came from, I was able to tell him that a number came directly to me from the bookstore at the University of Lethbridge in my home town.

Today is Convocation Day at that University. As well, they are holding a ceremony to open new residences that have been named after the aboriginal tribes of southern Alberta. They are going to do that with the smoking of the pipe and prayers.

They are concerned because, for the first time since this university began to function in the mid to late 1960's, it is in a position of having to turn away students. The quota system is taking its toll across the country. Costs are rising. This is of great concern to students at a time when money is becoming harder and harder to get.

Honourable senators, Alberta has always been thought of as a province supported by its natural resources. Lethbridge is in the southwest corner of the province near the B.C. and Montana border. It does not have access to the resources that the cities of Calgary and Edmonton do. It is in a farming area. Part of the appeal of the small liberal arts university is that it allows students, who would have otherwise not gone on to post-secondary education if they had to go to larger centres and finance themselves away from home, to go to university in their home area. This university has, in a very sensitive way, responded to their needs.

In Ottawa, where people are now just discovering we are in a recession, that we are in dreadful economic straits, people on the ground have known that for some time. They live it every day. That is why there is an anger regarding a tax that will add to what is already an extraordinarily difficult burden. This tax is causing these people deep anguish. Some students have expressed to me the possibility that they will not be able to continue with their education because of this tax.

I spent a long time the other evening talking about learning and literacy in Canada. In this petition we are going from anxiety at a level where people have difficulty with even fundamental skills to what we are counting on for our future, the young people who are entering our universities.

• (1745)

Bow Island is one of those small communities I was telling Senators about.

Senator MacEachen: Is it an island?

Senator Fairbairn: No, it is a little gem of a community, a farm community between Lethbridge and Medicine Hat. A number of young people from Bow Island are getting their post-secondary education at the University of Lethbridge.

Senator MacEachen: How did you get that student's name on the petition?

Senator Fairbairn: I will have to research that when I continue with some other petitions another day, Senator MacEachen, but I would be pleased to do that.

My next petition is also from the bookstore at the University of Lethbridge. Again, it is focusing on the need for the dissemination of the printed word as a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society being uninhibited by the kind of taxation now proposed under the GST.

(Names of signatories read)

That concludes this petition. I certainly have a great many more that I will be prepared to read later.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I am sure we join in commending the Honourable Senator Fairbairn for the excellent petitions she has presented to us this afternoon.

Your Honour, in consultation with the Honourable Senator Phillips, the Whip of the government side, I think we concur that Your Honour should now see the clock and return to the Chair at 8 o'clock.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate recessed during pleasure.

At 8:13 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, at noon today I had the pleasure to meet two prominent Prince Edward Islanders, who asked me to present petitions on behalf of Maritimers this evening. One of those Prince Edward Islanders was Mary Boyd, an activist from Charlottetown. She has been up to the Senate many times in the past protesting the GST, protesting the unemployment insurance bill, protesting the Patent Act, protesting much of the legislation that this government has brought forward since 1984.

I also had the privilege to meet the president of the National Farmers' Union, Wayne Easter. He is a fairly prominent Canadian and a fairly prominent islander.

Senator Petten: What part of the island does he come from?

Senator Bonnell: He comes from the western part of the island, but he represents all of the farmers' unions in that province and all of them in all of Canada, even Saskatchewan.

The National Farmers' Union represents the farmers, whereas the Federation of Agriculture is a federation of different types of farmers, such as hog raisers, dairymen, egg producers, chicken producers, and so on.

Senator Lewis: Are hogs the same as pigs?

Senator Bonnell: No, hogs are not quite the same as pigs.

Senator Simard: What's so funny?

Senator Cools: Hogs are not the same as pigs.

Senator Simard: I didn't hear anything funny.

Senator Cools: Senator Simard, we don't have to laugh at the same things. I can laugh.

Senator Simard: One of these times we may, I suppose. Carry on, sir.

Senator Bonnell: Thank you, Senator Simard. I know you are a real Maritimer. Senators realize that Senator Simard is from New Brunswick.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, may I raise a point of order?

Senator Bonnell: Certainly.

Senator Kelly: Thank you. Let me first say that I do not want to offend Senator Bonnell because of his roots in the Maritimes, Prince Edward Island. My family comes from Prince Edward Island, as well, from Charlottetown.

My point of order is this: I have not attended for the last day or so and I am alarmed at what the proceedings have descended into. Page 57 of our rules, on Presentation of Petitions—and I do believe we are on Presentation of Petitions—states:

> A Senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition; the petition itself is not read.

Honourable senators, we are ten or fifteen minutes into this sitting.

Senator Petten: We were late starting.

Senator Kelly: Perhaps we are six minutes into it, then. While I find this whole discussion on the geography of the Maritimes, and so on, interesting, I do believe we should try to adhere more closely to the rules. I would draw Senator Bonnell's attention to page 57 of our rules.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I want to thank the former Prince Edward Islander for bringing me to the point. We Prince Edward Islanders have that great ability to remind each other sometimes if we go astray just a shade.

Honourable senators, I have the petition in my hand. Are you not going to listen, Senator Simard?

Senator Simard: I will listen from over here.

Senator Bonnell: That's good, as long as you listen.

Senator Kirby: Did Senator Bonnell suggest that Senator Kelly is a former Prince Edward Islander? I know a lot about Senator Kelly but that is one of the things I did not know. I wonder if you might elaborate on that, because I think it is part of the Senator's history that many of us would like to understand.

Senator Bonnell: I always knew there was something good about Senator Kelly; I just didn't know exactly what it was.

Senator Petten: He is an easterner; he is a great fellow.

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Bonnell: Yes, since he told us that he is a former Prince Edward Islander. Even if he was only there for the weekend, that is good.

At any rate, I have a petition which I would like to present. The petition states:

TO THE HONOURABLE SENATE OF CANADA

The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable Senate will therefore provide a remedy.

HUMBLY SHEWETH

WHEREAS, the Conservative Federal Government is acting against the will of the people by introducing a regressive G.S.T. (Goods and Services Tax);

WHEREAS, the manufacturers tax may not disappear from manufacturers prices as the Government projects;

WHEREAS, the proposed tax may not be visible as the Government predicts;

WHEREAS, the proposed tax may increase inflation beyond the limits set by the Government;

WHEREAS, the imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small business and thus the economy;

WHEREAS, the Taxpayers Council on National Issues, on behalf of Canadians, strongly oppose the Goods and Services Tax which will do nothing to address the current deficit problem;

WHEREFORE, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed Goods and Services Tax;

AND as in duty bound your Petitioners will ever pray.

They are going to pray forever, or until the government stops this tax.

Senator Steuart: Is that a relative term?

Senator Bonnell: These signatures are handwritten in ink.

• (2015)

Senator Steuart: I wonder if Senator Bonnell would permit a question? Could you give us a little background on where some of these places are? I know that you are very familiar with them.

Senator Bonnell: As you probably know, senator, Halifax is the site of the first responsible government ever held on this continent. We had responsible government first. We seem to be loosing responsible government now. The government no longer goes by the wishes of the people. It was in Halifax, Nova Scotia, where responsible government came to this continent, not just to what we now know as Canada. Of course, Prince Edward Island was very close behind, as was New Brunswick with responsible government. They led this nation in terms of responsible government. That is why the addresses on these petitions are so important and why the views of Haligonians, as we call them, should be heard.

Senator Hays: Would Senator Bonnell follow up on the question asked by Senator Steuart? Is there some specific reason why these people would sign a petition, in particular the petition you are reading now? Could you explain what that reason might be?

Senator Bonnell: Most of these people feel that the manufacturers' sales tax may not disappear from the manufacturers' price after the GST is in effect. The manufacturers' sales tax will stay on the price of goods and the goods and services tax will be added on top. Many people are upset because they feel that this tax might not be visible, as the government has been predicting. Others feel that it might cause inflation beyond the limits set by the government. If the economy is in a recession, or perhaps I should say depression, to add the goods and services tax onto the backs of the consumers will cause more inflation and be harder still for the people.

They also feel that this tax will create an onerous burden on small business by having them do all the paperwork that will be required. Some will have to hire accountants to fill out all the forms. This must be taken in the light of the fact that 20 per cent of Canadians are illiterate and that they will have to fill these forms out. As well, they will have to try to understand the complications of provincial taxes and federal taxes, as well as the health tax, tobacco tax and excise tax. Trying to keep it all straight for most business people is more than they can stand. They do not have the kind of profit which will allow them to hire people to do this accounting for them. A great many small business people in the Halifax area will probably be in trouble.

Senator Hays: Could I follow up a little bit further on your comments? What is the main business in that area? Are these people engaged in some kind of special business, perhaps the fishery, manufacturing or agriculture?

Senator Bonnell: Most of the businesses in Halifax are small businesses, such as restaurants and clothing stores. Halifax is a central area in Nova Scotia for goods and services. People come to Halifax to buy their clothes, their cars and to eat in restaurants and to see entertainment. There is not that much manufacturing in Halifax. It is pretty well a service city which is built on other areas which buy from Halifax. It will hit Halifax very hard because there are so many services there. There is of course some shipping in Halifax. There are some ship repairs when there is work, but there is mostly none.

Senator Lewis: May I ask the hon. senator a question? Is Halifax not also a university seat?

Senator Bonnell: Yes, it is.

Senator Lewis: How will that be affected by the GST?

Senator Bonnell: It will affect transportation costs for students who must go back and forth to university. They will have to pay tax on their transportation to go back home to see their parents on weekends. Their books will be taxed. If they go to the theatre the price of admission will be taxed. The popcorn that they eat at the theatre will be taxed, as will the butter that they put on the popcorn. When they write home to their mothers and fathers even their stamps will be taxed.

Senator Lewis: By how much?

Senator Bonnell: By seven percent, the same as everything else.

Senator Lewis: What will that mean for a 39-cent stamp?

Senator Bonnell: I would say for a 39-cent stamp it will probably mean about four cents. They will have to pay about 43 cents to get a 39-cent stamp. I am told that the Post Office intends to increase the price of the 39-cent by one cent.

Students go to the laundromat to wash their clothes. They put in a quarter to wash their shirts. They will now have to put a second quarter in to pay for the tax on the first quarter. It will now cost them 50 cents to get a 25-cent wash.

Senator Olson: Do they not get any change?

Senator Bonnell: No shirt, no change. They are paying 100 per cent on getting their shirts washed. This will happen to all students, whether they are in Halifax, Toronto or Ottawa. Many of the poor people in the Halifax area have to use laundromats because they can't afford to buy washers. Consequently, they will see a 100 per cent increase in taxes. That is the reason why they have signed these petitions asking us to stop the GST.

There is the name MacDonald on this petition—

Senator Olson: Is that not an unusual name for that area?

Senator Bonnell: It is not that unusual. It means son of Donald. They had quite a few of those in Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton. Some even got over to Nova Scotia, to Halifax. At one time Cape Breton was a province unto itself, and Prince Edward Island was part of Nova Scotia. Then Prince Edward Island became an island unto itself, and now it is about the only island left. They then connected Cape Breton to it. Cape Breton is now a peninsula of Nova Scotia. There is a causeway connecting the two together. It stops the fish coming over to Prince Edward Island. We lost all our mackerel and other fish which used to go through the causeway. There should be a petition about that.

Some of the tuna of course were stronger. They swam around the causeway. The largest tuna in the world are caught off the coast of Prince Edward Island.

I would like to tell honourable senators an interesting story. Governor General Michener, who was one of the Speakers of the House of Commons, came down to Prince Edward Island to visit at one time. At the time I had the privilege of being the Minister of Tourism. I said to Mr. Michener, "There is a Stanley Cup from Governor General Stanley for hockey players. There is a cup from all the Governors General, but there is no Michener Cup. Why don't you give us a trophy called the Michener Cup for the largest tuna caught in Prince Edward Island's waters?" He thought about it and returned to Ottawa from where he wrote me a letter. He told me that he would do it. He got a lovely trophy made up and sent it down to me asking me what I thought of it. I sent it back to him saying that it was lovely, "But perhaps it should state 'The Largest Tuna Caught in Canadian Waters' because you are the Governor General of Canada, not just of Prince Edward Island". He agreed with me. He changed the trophy to another design with the emblem of Canada on it and the words "For the largest tuna caught in Canadian waters". He sent that down to me and I approved it. We now have the Michener trophy—

Senator Carney: Would the hon. senator permit a question?

Senator Bonnell: I certainly would.

Senator Carney: You are telling us a charming story, but what does it have to do with the petition?

Senator Steuart: Nothing.

Senator Bonnell: Nothing in particular to do with the petition. I thought especially for Senator Carney who perhaps knows the former Governor General since he was a Speaker of the House of Commons and since she was a member of the House of Commons that she would love to hear the story of how a good Conservative Speaker of the House of Commons could do such a great thing for Prince Edward Island.

Senator Carney: It is very thoughtful of Senator Bonnell to think about my regard in this matter. However, I really would prefer that he stick to the issue of petitions, unless of course he wants to move on to debate the bill which we are so anxious to get to.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, let me say that I do not think that tuna have much to do with the bill either, or petitions. I thought that since Senator Carney looked so interested in what I was saying that she would like to hear about that trophy. Since it came from Governor General Michener I thought it would be good to put it on the record just to give him thanks. I think that this is the first time in the history of the Senate that Governor General Michener has received honour and recognition for sending us the Michener Cup. I bet not one senator knew that Governor General Michener instituted such a trophy.

Senator Carney: We know enough about it now.

Senator Bonnell: Does that mean that I can go on? Do not forget it. It might come in handy to remember it.

Senator Lewis: I wonder if I could ask you a question, senator? You were talking about Prince Edward Island being an island. You mentioned the straits and the fish. With reference to the promise of the connecting link being established between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, there has been some question about the possibility of this link actually being established. There is some question of it stopping the fish flowing through the passage between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Senator Carney: I should like to point out, honourable senators, that the missing link has even less to do with petitions than does tuna. Could the discussion be confined at this point to petitions, as set out in the rules of the Senate?

Senator Lewis: When you interrupted me, Senator Carney, I was just getting to the link.

Senator Steuart: You have to give these chaps from the Maritimes a bit of time.

Senator Lewis: I was wondering if you could explain the connection between the connecting link and the petition.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, tonight for the first time I heard from government sources that it is a missing link. I thought it was to be a permanent link. The connecting part is that they have procrastinated with a fixed link. We will now have a 7 per cent sales tax on all the material and equipment being brought in as of January 1, if this bill ever passes.

To be serious and to the point, honourable senators, a fixed link would be one of the greatest assets for Prince Edward Island, if it did not destroy or hurt the fisheries or the environment. Perhaps we should be thinking about a tunnel instead of a fixed link. In that way we would not affect the fish or the temperature of the water. Since the government has procrastinated in this matter it will now cost the company which builds the link at least another 7 per cent, and perhaps a great deal more, since as time goes on the price of everything goes up, especially the price of fuel. However, I am getting away from my list.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Carney: Could I ask the honourable senator another question? I have a cousin in Halifax, and I would like to know if her name is on your list.

Senator Cools: What is the name of your cousin?

Senator Carney: Frick.

Some Hon. Senators: Frith?

Senator Kirby: There are certainly a great many Friths who would have signed a GST petition. It seems to me that it is probably true that the entire Frith clan has their names on the list. I will be delighted when the honourable senator gets to their names.

Senator Bonnell: I knew that Senator Carney was interested in something about this list. Now I know it is her relatives. I would also be interested in knowing if my cousins had signed it.

Senator Carney: I want to know if cousin Bonnie signed it.

Senator Bonnell: How do you spell her name?

Senator Carney: "F" as in Frank, "r" as in Romeo, "i" as in India, "c" as in Carney, and "k" as in kilo.

Senator Cools: Her first name is Bonnie.

Senator Bonnell: Senator Petten tells me that he cannot understand me because I talk too fast.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Steuart: I like it better that way. Keep going.

Senator Bonnell: I will try to take my time since no one seems to be in a hurry anyway. Another fellow said that I have a potato in my mouth. He is probably right because I had potatoes for supper.

There is now the name of K. Spicer—

Senator Perrault: Is it Keith Spicer?

Senator Bonnell: No, it is not Keith. It is K. Spicer. It could be his sister Kate.

The next signature has the place name Whycocomagh, Digby County, Nova Scotia.

Senator Murray: Whycocomagh is not in Digby County, it is in Victoria County.

Senator Bonnell: It says Digby County on the petition.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: On a point of order, thas been a suggestion made that there is a false address on the petition which the honourable senator is reading. That sheds a very great shadow on the whole petition. Is it possible that there has been some funny business going on?

Senator Perrault: It could be honest confusion.

Senator Kelly: Could that petition be set aside for further investigation? You could then go on with your next petition.

Hon. H.A. Olson: I would like to speak to Senator Kelly's point of order. One learns things from certain people. I think that right now Senator Bonnell is following what I may call the "Kelly rule". I first learned about it in committee. I have seen it happen several times since. A very serious point of order was raised in committee. There was a discussion about carrying the hearing on by Senator Kelly. We convinced the Chairman that he was out of order and that he should change course. He acknowledged that that was the proper thing to do as a result of the good and substantial arguments made by a number of people. Everyone then decided that we should get on with the business and Senator Kelly carried on as if he had not heard the discussion at all. I think that is what we are doing now.

Senator Murray: I have an apology to make, honourable senators. I made a statement a moment ago for which I humbly apologize. I said that Whycocomagh was not in Digby County but in Victoria County. I had a moment to sit back and reflect on that comment. I have come to the conclusion that Whycocomagh is in Inverness County. I apologize to all.

Senator Bonnell: Everyone is entitled to a mistake.

Senator Murray: That is mine for this year.

Senator Bonnell: That is yours for this evening.

My eyesight is not so good since I turned forty years of age. I look at this petition and see that this person lives in Digby County in Weymouth. Her writing was not so good and I took it for Whycocomagh. Senator Murray was right that Whycocomagh is in Cape Breton, in an altogether different county.

Senator Lewis: Could I interject? Is there some question as to what the proper address is on one of the petitions?

Senator Bonnell: No, the address is correct. It is Weymouth.

Senator Lewis: I was thinking that if it is not correct then we should adjourn for a few hours while the matter is investigated.

Senator Carney: Let us vote on it.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: There is the name of a person on this petition who has signed the address Arbutus Avenue. I do not know where it is. Does anyone know where it is?

Senator Murray: Arbutus Avenue. Senator Kirby knows where it is.

Senator Bonnell: Do you know where it is?

Senator Kirby: It is in the north end.

Senator Cools: Senator Murray said you would know, Senator Kirby. He has great confidence in you.

Senator Kirby: As Senator Murray knows, that particular street happens to be in a riding which was represented from 1977—in fact starting 20 years ago today on October 13, 1970—until 1978 by the Premier of the province. The reason Senator Murray knows the name quite correctly is because that street is in the riding of what was the provincial riding of Halifax North. As we all know, twenty years ago today Halifax North was the riding in which Gerald Reagan was elected Premier of Nova Scotia. I thank Senator Murray for bringing that point to the attention of the house.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Pat Carney: I rise on a point of order, honourable senators. Senator Kirby said that today is October 13. I want to remind him that in this chamber it is still October 9. I think I should bring that to his attention because it is his side of the chamber which is keeping the calendar on October 9.

Senator Kirby: Thank you, Senator Carney. I am glad you did that. I think it shows that one of the fundamental differences between your side of the house and ours is that our side has a tendency to be up to date, which is why of course I used the date, and as you pointed out your side of the house is still three or four days behind.

Senator Carney: Four days of lost debate.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: At any rate, we certainly found out where Arbutus Avenue is.

Senator Perrault: Do you not have any western names on that list? Those names all seem to be from Nova Scotia.

Senator Bonnell: These are all from the Maritime Division.

Senator Perrault: Is this one of the divisional constituencies?

Senator Bonnell: No. Halifax is not a divisional area. It is one of the first places in Canada where there was responsible government. It is not one of the divisional areas, although we do now have a senator from Dartmouth. He came to Prince Edward Island for a short time to help our veterans but then left very quickly for a better place in the Senate of Canada. He was an excellent MP for Dartmouth for many years. The last time, the way the ball bounced was not in his court.

• (2045)

Senator Kirby: Precisely!

Senator Bonnell: The dice were rolled again. Somebody rolled the dice and got it wrong. Instead of getting seven they got "snake eyes".

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable Senators, I am just going to keep on raising the same point of order. Can we please get on with presentation of petitions? This is all very interesting, but this is not really what the rules say you should be doing. You are supposed to present the petition and make a brief statement about the content of the petition. The rules say nothing about giving the CVs of the people and saying nice things about the villages and towns and cities they live in. There is supposed to be just a brief explanation of what the petition is about and then you should get on with it.

Senator Carney: Are you asking for a ruling?

Senator Kelly: I think I have to remind honourable senators. I just want them to get on with it.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I have a petition that I would like to present on behalf of those names that I read out, and I would ask the messenger if he might just take the petition.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators—

Senator Bonnell: Perhaps Senator Murray has one he would like to present.

Senator Murray: I have an article from the Ottawa Citizen entitled "Jean Chrétien's handling of the GST battle in the Senate has left observers wondering Who's in charge?"

Senator Bonnell: I guess we are all wondering that. Right now, I am in charge. I have the floor.

Senator Murray: I commend this article to honourable senators.

Senator Bonnell: We had a saying in the Prince Edward Island Legislature that whoever had the floor was in command. I have the floor at the present time, but I will give it to Senator Carney.

[Senator Bonnell.]

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Pat Carney: I would like to have a ruling from the Speaker on the point of order raised by Senator Kelly, if the Speaker is prepared to give a ruling at this time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I have listened to the point of order, and I serve as the humble servant of all honourable senators when I am in this Chair. We have all had our attention drawn to page 57 of our rules, and, of course, the critical term is the term "brief". Since it has, as has been pointed out, a certain relative nature to it, I can only leave it in the hands of honourable senators to interpret the term "brief", unless an argument is made as to whether or not, in the order of time, that term is to be defined. I do draw the attention of honourable senators to the classical dictum that we find inscribed on the walls of Rome that says, "tempus, tempere, tempore" which means that time ought to be tempered by time. So I would perhaps remind honourable senators that the term "brief" might be tempered by time.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Thank you, honourable senators. I want to thank the Honourable Speaker for at least looking to the red book and following the rules of the red book. It was a good decision and I am glad to know that you are reading the rules from this book and not making up your own. That is a big improvement in this place.

Senator Simard: Which red book are you referring to?

Senator Bonnell: He read from the Rules of the Senate of Canada and he ruled according to the red book, and he did not make up his own rules. We have to respect that ruling. So I must try to get to the point quickly. I tabled that petition but now I have another petition, and I will be brief.

Senator Simard: Smart Alec!

Senator Bonnell: I was told by an honourable senator, Senator Petten, that being brief was between three minutes and an hour and three-quarters. Somewhere in there would be brief, as far as he was concerned. Since Senator Kelly raised the point of order, I will try to live within that ruling. I thank you for it.

Senator Ottenheimer: In Latin, please.

Senator Bonnell: In Latin? Well, I can do a little bit of Latin but you might not understand it.

Senator Ottenheimer: The Speaker will.

Senator Bonnell: That is good. I speak in many languages. In the Pentecostal Church, where I come from, they speak in tongues, and perhaps we could do that here.

Senator Ottenheimer: When it becomes Sunday, after midnight, that may be appropriate.

Senator Bonnell: Perhaps it might be a good idea if we stopped at 12:00 o'clock tonight and, by unanimous consent, went home and prayed a little bit—prayed like the petitioners are praying. We could take Sunday off and give the staff Sunday off.

Senator Carney: Are you asking for unanimous consent?

Senator Bonnell: Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could do that. We would all come back at 2:00 o'clock on Tuesday and start at the top of the Order Paper. That would give the staff a break, the clerks a break and the constables a break.

Senator Simard: Sure, you really care about the staff.

Senator Bonnell: That would give us a chance to pray with the rest of the petitioners. Even the Lord took the seventh day off and rested on Sunday, but we senators will have to continue working until, perhaps, July.

Senator Oliver: We have to give unanimous consent.

Senator Carney: Why not ask Senator Murray?

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have another petition which reads:

TO THE HONOURABLE SENATE OF CANADA

The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable Senate will therefore provide a remedy.

HUMBLY SHEWETH

WHEREAS, the Conservative Federal Government is acting against the will of the people by introducing a regressive G.S.T. (Goods and Services Tax);

WHEREAS, the manufacturers tax may not disappear from manufacturers prices as the Government projects;

WHEREAS, the proposed tax may not be visible as the Government predicts;

WHEREAS, the proposed tax may increase inflation beyond the limits set by the Government;

WHEREAS, the imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small business and thus the economy;

WHEREAS, the Taxpayers Council on National Issues, on behalf of Canadians, strongly oppose the Goods and Services Tax which will do nothing to address the current deficit problem;

WHEREFORE, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed Goods and Services Tax;

AND as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

(Names of signatories read)

I would ask one of the messengers to take this petition and lay it on the table so it will be kept in the records. That way, these people who went to all this trouble will know their petition has been read.

Senator Steuart: One of your better readings!

Senator Bonnell: I hope the government will take heed and try to do away with this goods and services tax, to relieve those people. They are probably not sleeping at night, worrying about what is taking place. I am glad that Senator Murray brought to our attention that I was in charge while I had the floor. I want to thank you for it, and now, somebody else can have charge of it.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Thank you, honourable senators. In rising to continue presenting a number of petitions I have received from Nova Scotia in the past several months, I perhaps might pick up where I left off several hours ago. I will be mindful of Senator Kelly's and the Speaker's comments on the need for only a brief introduction. Indeed, I will attempt to be reasonably brief—as, of course, honourable senators know that I normally am—in presenting only a half dozen petitions this evening, and I will save the rest for another time. In so doing I should point out that one of the interesting things about the petitions that we have received on this side of the house with respect to the GST, in comparison with other petitions we have received over the years, is the wide diversity of people who have signed these petitions, not just in terms of where they live, geographically, either within a province or across the country, but also in terms of the diversity of ages, the diversity of incomes, the diversity of communities, and the diversity of backgrounds that has accompanied these petitions. I think one of the most striking observations one could make about the petitions we have seen on the GST is the rather wide-spread, broad-based public support for these petitions that exists.

I see that Senator Kelly looks as if he is momentarily to stand up.

Senator Kelly: Would Senator Kirby accept a question?

Senator Kirby: I would be delighted as always to answer a question from Senator Kelly.

Senator Kelly: I just want to be sure that we do not misinterpret the last observation that Senator Kirby has made. The wide-ranging nature of the petitioners could perhaps be the result of the process by which the petitions were gathered, a little like polling. You are not suggesting that all these people, from all these various walks of life, came together at the same time to create that piece of paper. It is likely that the person was carrying the piece of paper around and decided to try to build the picture you are presenting.

Senator Olson: It was spontaneous all over Canada!

Senator Kirby: I want to thank Senator Kelly for his question because, as he knows, the subject of polling and public opinion is near and dear to my heart. I am delighted to have the opportunity of saying a few words about the nature of polling, and indeed, the nature of the public opinion polls that have been done with respect to the GST.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: May I raise a point of order? I am not trying to close off Senator Kirby in response to my question, but I do not want to induce him into making a speech on another subject entirely. I was asking about the way in which these petitions were gathered, and the relationship between that piece of paper and those particular petitioners. It might be interesting for another time, Senator Kirby, but not tonight.

Senator Olson: We want you to understand!

Senator Kirby: Senator Kelly, I was not attempting to launch into a speech. I was merely attempting to respond to your question. I did not go to the trouble of writing a text on polling because I did not expect you to ask the question. However, it does seem to me that, if you have asked the question, it warrants a reasonably full and complete answer. You always seem to ask thoughtful questions and I was going to attempt to give you a thoughtful answer.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Kirby: That was really why I was beginning to answer your question from a polling perspective. However, I am quite happy to answer in another way.

Senator Simard: Would you allow me a comment or a question? Last night we had a very interesting debate, and I thought it was the start of an improved situation and possibly an end to this filibuster, but obviously, you are back in the fold. You are back in charge of this filibustering. As part of my question, I would like to use an article in the Citizen—

Senator Steuart: Be brief!

Senator Simard: —from Saturday, October 13, 1990, written by Mark Kennedy. I will not read the whole article right now, although I might do that later on, at three o'clock in the morning.

Senator Kirby: Honourable senators, I have not read the article but I would be delighted to read it.

Senator Simard: I will have it sent it over to you, but in the meantime, for the record, I should like to read this. My comments might cause you to change your mind and improve your behaviour. This article says:

> A month had passed since Jean Chrétien captured the leadership. He was keeping a low profile, trying to solidify cracks in party unity, devise a plan to clear the party's debt, and prepare for a two-week summer vacation in Italy.
> It was a strategy which came under criticism for its naiveté in a summer of crises on nation unity, Indian uprisings, and a Persian Gulf crisis.
> It was also a strategy, some Liberals privately complain, that might have cost Chrétien control of the party's powerful Senate wing.

Now I am coming to you, Senator Kirby. I am getting to my question here.

> The high-stakes showdown in the Senate has grown in intensity, but the question remains: who's in charge?
> Chrétien has made every effort to appear as the leader in the GST battle. But his early public comments suggest he's either made a remarkable conversion or been swept along by the rebellious "Trudeaucrats" in the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Simard: Reading on:

> Chrétien would like it to be perceived as his first skirmish with Prime Minister Brian Mulroney. Instead, it's become known as The Last Stand of a dying regime.
> Among the Liberal senators at the helm: former cabinet minister Allan MacEachen (now the Grit leader in the Senate); long-time Ontario Grit Royce Frith; Joyce Fairbairn and Michael Kirby, both former assistants to Pierre Trudeau; and former MP John Stewart.
> As a team, they have set the Senate tactics and run the show.

I will put the whole article in the record later on, but I want to ask Senator Kirby if what I have just read is true?

Senator Cools: Why should he know?

Senator Simard: Is he really in charge of, or part of, this group that makes decisions and is responsible for this filibuster? I have my doubts as to whether you are really one of the four in charge because of the comments you made last night indicating that you were eager and ready and hopeful to debate the content of Bill C-62. Would you unequivocally deny that you participated? Would you ask your colleagues that they revert to something that resembles more a responsible wing of this Parliament.

• (2115)

Senator Kirby: I thank Senator Simard for the observation on the point he and I both shared during our discussion earlier this morning between 2 a.m and 3 a.m. when we had what we both felt was a lengthy but nevertheless instructive discussion on the whole issue of the GST and both the economic and philisophical underpinings of consumption taxes in general.

I would be delighted to respond to questions on the substance of the petitions. The point that he and I made this morning was that in the preamble clauses, in relation to many of the petitions that we have received, there are comments that deal with the administrative complexities and the impact on the average Canadian's ability to pay a consumption tax like the GST. It was in that context that Senator Simard and I got into that discussion, and I would be absolutely delighted to continue that discussion.

Senator Simard quoted from an article that was handed to me, but which I have not yet read, which suggested that a number of us on this side of the house are "in charge" and it goes on to imply that, because a number of us were associated with the Honourable Senator MacEachen or were in the cabinet of the Honourable Pierre Trudeau, that is assumed to be a pejorative state of affairs.

I have said publicly for many years that I am enormously proud to have had the opportunity of working as closely as I did with Pierre Trudeau and I feel very honoured to have been involved in the patriation of the Constitution and, above all else, the inclusion of the Charter of Rights in the Constitution and thereby providing Canadians with a significant degree of protection from the tyranny of government. Perhaps I should make the observation, in light of the Speaker's ruling last week, that it is unfortunate that the rights of senators were not included in the Charter, because perhaps it would have solved some of the problems we had last week.

Senator Simard: Were you there when the War Measures Act was put into effect?

Senator Kirby: To return to the discussion we had last night, I was involved, as Senator Simard was, with provincial politics, I in Nova Scotia and Senator Simard in New Brunswick, during the fall of 1970. We were both in the process of coming into government while the War Measures Act was put into effect and we both had the experience of going through a change of government in our respective provinces. At that time there was a pall of gloom and doom in the country because of the state of Quebec separatism, the FLQ and the War Measures Act. I was not involved in any way, shape or form with it.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: May I raise a point of order?

Senator Kirby: I thought I was responding rather briefly compared to what I did last night to Senator Simard's question.

Senator Kelly: Senator Kirby, my point of order involves both yourself and Senator Simard. If those two gentlemen have a matter that they would like to discuss further, I think it should be done somewhere else and the presentation of petitions should be continued. The discussion is very interesting, and if all senators are interested then I think there should be some time when a meeting is convened outside the chamber to discuss this history of politics in Canada. Why can we not get ahead with the presentation of petitions?

Hon. Michael Kirby: Senator Kelly, I was in the process of beginning to deal with my first petition when you asked me a question which prompted Senator Simard to ask a question. If you do not mind, I would like to answer your first question.

Senator Kelly: Let me preempt that and apologize profusely for raising the first question.

Senator Kirby: I am absolutely delighted that you raised the question.

Senator Kelly: I know.

Senator Kirby: I really appreciate the fact that you have raised the question and it would be rude of me not to respond to the question, which is what in fact that I was trying to do in the first place.

Senator Kelly: Please be rude.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Senator Kirby, Senator Kelly is withdrawing his question. I do not intend to withdraw my question. The question has been put and, of course, you can always decide on the length of preamble, but I would hope that you could get to your answer shortly. My question was, are you one of the four in charge of these tactics and filibustering that we have witnessed in the last ten days? Yes or no?

Senator Kirby: The short answer to your question is, no, I am not. I don't know if that is the answer you would like to hear, or whether you regard that as a good sign or a bad sign. It is merely the state of affairs. I will come back to Senator Kelly's question. He withdrew the question, but I cannot withdraw the answer because I have not yet given the answer. I will be happy to give the answer and then withdraw it, if that will make the situation any simpler.

Senator Bonnell: Senator Kirby, you gave us a short answer, but we would like to have a long answer because we do not quite understand the short answer.

If you and Senator Simard go outside and confer together in a corner, you might start more gossip than if you actually give your answer in here. I would suggest that you not discuss this matter together in a corner but that you stay here and give all of us the answer.

Senator Kirby: Given the fact we are both Maritimers, I can assure you there would be no misinterpretation of the fact we were talking together in the corner.

Briefly, in response to Senator Kelly's question, I might make the observation that I think the point he was raising was how these were names collected. It is my understanding that the names on most of these petitions, received by those of us on this side of the house, were in some cases collected when people went door to door; but in large measure they were collected in shopping centres, church halls, and public places across the country where passers-by were invited to fill in a name and address.

To address the technical point raised by Senator Kelly which he will understand from his business career, in market research terms it would be fair to describe this sample as a mall intercept interview rather than a telephone interview or a personal door-to-door interview. Statistically, if the sample is large enough, small intercept interviews are every bit as accurate as statistically random samples. Those of us on this side of the house have been inclined to believe that these petitions are a reasonably true reflection of public opinion across the country. I think that answers your question. If it helps matters, because you withdrew your question, I am now happy to withdraw the answer, but I thought I ought to put it on the record before I withdrew it, because I did not see how I could do otherwise.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Michael Kirby: Having said that, I will return to where I was a few moments ago, which is on the first page of the petition. There is an interesting feature about these petitions which was reflected in the testimony we heard before the committee this summer. The comments on the GST contained in the Whereas clauses of the petition do not only deal with the impact of the petition on the average Canadian in terms of the difficulty of being able to actually pay the tax. The petitions also talk about the onerous burden which the GST will place on businesses in general, but particularly on small businesses.

One of the things that struck many of us this summer was the number of small business organizations that appeared before the committee. I think specifically of organizations such as the St. John's, Newfoundland, Board of Trade, since I see Senator Cochrane present, which underscored the fact that small business organizations in Newfoundland were opposed to the GST. Small business organizations in general across the country have expressed concern about the practical problems of actually having to administer the GST and the implications that will have on the cost of doing business.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Pat Carney: I rise on a point of order. If Senator Kirby wishes to discuss this very interesting point, surely he will support our bid to move to debate this bill so he can bring forward these very important points. Last night Senator Olson brought forward points that could be discussed in terms of Bill C-62. Those of us on this side of the house are very anxious to move to debate. Surely, if he wishes to bring these matters forward he will support our bid to move to the debate on this issue.

Hon. Michael Kirby: I thank Senator Carney for her comments. It is always delightful to hear from Canada's west coast maritime province.

I should point out that I was not trying to debate the GST. As I understand it, there will be time down the road to debate the committee report at some point, and presumably to debate the bill itself. What I was attempting to do was explain the bill a little bit, and perhaps I was not being Senator Kelly's definition of brief. I was merely commenting on the introductory clause of the bill. In case that is causing some problems, since I talked about the geographic distribution of the names, let me give you some flavour of that from this particular petition I have in my hand.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Michael Kirby: The first name on the petition comes from Kemptville, Nova Scotia. It is spelled the same as Kemptville in the Ottawa area. However, Kemptville, Nova Scotia, is a small rural inland community outside of Yarmouth. It is in the middle of Yarmouth County in the southwestern corner of the province. It is an agricultural area with some logging and forestry and mixed farming. The next name on the petition is from Shubenacadie, Nova Scotia, which is up towards Truro. I think we talked about Truro in one of Senator Bonnell's petitions.

We then move on to a name on the petition from Halifax, so we then move from Kemptville in the western part of the province to the centre of the province in Shubenacadie and on to Halifax. There is another name from Bedford, which is just outside of Halifax. There are a number of names from smaller communities within half an hour or 45 minutes of Halifax. This address is on Purcells Cove Road in Halifax, which is not very far from Senator Buchanan's house which is just off Herring Cove Road. It is the same general part of town.

There is another name from Brooklyn in Queens County. Queens County is part way along the south shore of the area I am most familiar with. I spent a great deal of time in the part of Nova Scotia. Brooklyn has always been near and dear to my heart, in part, because it is a lovely community. I was born and brought up in Montreal in the days when Montreal did not have a major league baseball team, but a team called the Montreal Royals became famous because it was the first team in organized baseball on which Jackie Robinson played, the first black to play professional baseball. The Montreal Royals were the Triple A farm team of the Brooklyn Dodgers. One of the reasons I have always been fond of Brooklyn in Queens County is that I am an old Dodger fan.

Senator Kelly: It is getting late in the evening and I lost track of what you were saying. Did you say that the whole baseball team were on that petition?

Senator Kirby: It is quite right that the development of these petitions was certainly a hit. It does not necessarily follow that the entire baseball team signed the petition, although frankly had we gone to members of baseball teams most of them would have signed it. The problem was unless it was a slow pitch league there would have been a tremendous male skew to the sample. You may not know, but in this day and age slow pitch teams are largely mixed teams; baseball teams are not. For the reasons you pointed out in your opening question, Senator Kelly, it was desirable to get a cross-section of Canadians representing all ages and incomes, and obviously both sexes. Therefore, there was no attempt merely to sign up baseball teams. There was an attempt to get a cross-section of Canadians, although I repeat that I am sure baseball players would have signed.

I raise that only in the context that one of the addresses I read was from Brooklyn in Queens County and I was merely pointing out to members opposite, including a number of the members from the province of Quebec who would recall with fondness as I do the old Montreal Royals when they played at Delorimier Downs on Delorimier Street and that is a clear linkage to what were then the Brooklyn Dodgers and are now the Los Angeles Dodgers. It was, therefore, with some fondness that I was recalling the name Brooklyn.

Since Senator Buchanan raised the issue this morning, I perhaps ought to make one other observation. Some 19 years ago he and I were involved in a provincial by-election campaign in Queens County in which he had just become Leader of the Opposition in the Nova Scotia Legislature and I was the campaign manager on the other side. We had a very famous rally in Brooklyn in Queens County which Senator Buchanan and I were reminiscing about around four o'clock this morning. I am sorry Senator Kelly was not present to hear that, but it was an interesting piece of Nova Scotia history.

Senator Bonnell: In this day and age, Senator Kirby, if the baseball team had signed the petition they would have been mostly males and therefore you would not be getting a female viewpoint. However, is it not true that in 1990 female reporters want to go in the dressing rooms when the males are changing and you would therefore get the views of the females in the dressing room.

Senator Kirby: That is a subject which I do not think I should touch, honourable senator. It is certainly a topical subject for discussion, but since I was talking about baseball teams and not football teams, and as I understand the current popular issue is a football issue, I think perhaps I ought to leave that issue alone. Aside from my remarks, in light of Senator Kelly's admonition, I have been trying to stick fairly close to the substance of the petition.

I am on petition Number 45. Lest honourable senators think we are starting to run out, my office told me this morning that there were something like 101 so there will be plenty of time yet to talk about petitions. The people who signed this petition come from all over Nova Scotia. The next name is from Chezzetcook, Nova Scotia, and for those senators who do not know the province I have moved from Halifax up the eastern shore toward the Strait of Canso and then into Cape Breton.

There are several names on here from Greenwood. Greenwood is in the Annapolis Valley and where there is one of the few military bases that the government has agreed to leave open. I say that in light of the fact that there are two Prince Edward Islanders in the house tonight and I notice that the issue of the closing of air bases, in particular the closing of the Summerside base, is an issue of considerable concern to them.

Senator Bonnell: Do not forget our new senator from Prince Edward Island.

Senator Kirby: You mean Senator Kelly. To that extent, I guess that one could argue that Senator Kelly has mixed allegiances. I would be delighted to welcome him as another Maritime senator, although of course it is somewhat difficult to do that since it appears that the Maritimes already have one too many as a result of recent decisions by senators opposite. Nevertheless, as an honorary senator, I am delighted to accept Senator Kelly certainly as an honorary Maritimer.

The list covers other parts of the province. It covers Tantallon—Senator Kelly, were you about to ask a question?

Senator Kelly: No, senator. I am terribly anxious, since you stated that you had half a dozen petitions and you are still on the first one.

Senator Kirby: I thought, Senator Kelly, in order not to take too much time in the house tonight, I would only bring half a dozen with me. I pointed out these are numbers 45 through 50 and I left approximately 100 in my office. On a Saturday evening, it seemed to me that I ought to take only a modest amount of time tonight.

Senator Teed: Nice way to spend the evening.

Senator Kirby: It is an important way to spend the evening. I would not necessarily describe it as nice, although goodness knows I enjoy the company of members opposite; there is no question about that. That has been obvious from the comments we have all made. Aside from the camaraderie and the pleasantness and delight of spending a Saturday night with all of you, it seems that the important part of this evening, and indeed the important part of the last several evenings, has been the tabling of petitions and the reading of names into the record sending a very clear message to Canadians across the country, whether or not they support the GST, that if Canadians go to the trouble of signing a petition and sending it to the Senate, whether it is sent to senators on this side of the house or senators on the other side of the house, there is an important message, that it really matters, that it counts, and there is an element of the democratic system where if you take the time to send a petition it will in fact wind up getting tabled in one of the Houses of Parliament. That is an important message which goes beyond the GST and merely being Liberals.

I thought something I said might provoke Senator Kelly to ask another question and I would be delighted to answer.

Senator Kelly: Senator Kirby, I agree totally with the comments on the importance of people understanding that this is a right they have to sign petitions and send them in. However, can you imagine if you were unfortunate enough to be one of the persons who signed a petition that is being handled by Senator Kirby tonight. You would sit with your family and wait all night to hear your name. He would go on and on and the person would get more and more tired, the grandparents would go to bed, the parents would go to bed, and the poor little gaffer who signed the thing—probably not knowing what he was signing as these people Senator Kirby says are against it may not necessarily be against it. By the time the poor little chap has gone to sleep Senator Kirby comes up with the name at the last minute at 12:15 which is the end of that particular petition and the person missed it.

Senator Simard: And he has missed all the good shows on television.

Senator Kirby: I must say, Senator Kelly, you have obviously lost an element of your Maritime heritage when you suggest that, at ten o'clock at night, people in the Maritimes might be starting to fade. I could perhaps give you an excellent example. I remember a person at one social occasion describing 5:30 in the morning to me not as early in the morning but merely a little late at night. I would have no fear speaking in this chamber at midnight or one o'clock and it would never occur to me that Maritimers, particularly on a Saturday night, would necessarily be asleep. I know some of them might have some difficulty understanding or comprehending at one o'clock in the morning, if I could put it somewhat more delicately, but I have no fear that they would be asleep. I see the three New Brunswickers agree with me that, my goodness, on a Saturday night it would be absolutely unheard of to be asleep.

As an interesting aside, I perhaps ought to point out that one of the names on this particular petition is from Camelot Lane in Halifax. One of the points I suspect that this petitioner was attempting to make in signing this petition was that the GST will certainly ensure that Nova Scotia and Halifax in particular do not become a Camelot-type environment. That is why, clearly, people from Camelot Lake Lane decided to sign the petition.

• (2145)

The last three names on this petition—and I think that Senator Kelly will be pleased to know that this is the end of my first six petitions for this evening—are all from Hubbards.

Any of you who have ever gong to Halifax to attend conventions have, inevitably, gone to Hubbards because that is frequently where lobster parties are held. Hubbards is one of the best places in the province to get lobster.

I should now like to move on to my next petition. Again, I notice, from looking at this quickly, a good cross-section of communities.

Senator Simard: May I ask a question?

Senator Kirby: Certainly.

Senator Simard: I know that some honourable senators on this side tried to convince Senator Bonnell that he was wrong, but let me try the same on Senator Kirby.

Senator Kirby is obviously a very devoted citizen and senator. He is respectful of the rules of this place. As a matter of fact, we have had a week-long debate on the need to protect the rules.

Senator Steuart: Who is going to protect the rules?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: I am rising on a point of order.

Because rule 57 states that presentation of petitions be brief, does the honourable senator not think that he has been rather lengthy, to put it mildly?

I do not care if you present 105 petitions if the purpose is only to use up time, but I think we are setting a dangerous precedent in this chamber. When this is all over, when the GST is passed next year or the year after, I think some honourable senators will be able to say that the debate that has taken place over the past few days has been in order and today's precedent would set future rules.

Would you like to comment on that?

Hon. Michael Kirby: I would be delighted to respond to that specific point. For the record, I point out that although to the rest of the world it is October 13—and indeed in 13 minutes from now it will be October 14 in Newfoundland—the fact of the matter is that in this chamber it is still October 9. Those people in the gallery will think that the Senate is out of touch in that the calendar on the table reads October 9.

The Honourable Senator Simard has raised a valid point respecting a dangerous precedent. I point out that it is precisely that issue of the danger of the irresponsible precedent which has caused all the trouble in this chamber dating back to last Thursday.

I have no difficulty dealing with the fact that if what I am doing is a dangerous precedent, is an unwise precedent, or however you wish to describe it, it is nothing near as dangerous as the assault on democracy which took place in this place last Thursday when a vote was taken when members on this side of the house were in fact prevented from voting, were locked out of the chamber because the government was attempting to railroad the democratic system.

I have no difficulty in using the rules as they are defined, and they are very clear. I think Senator Simard is absolutely right that the rules respecting presentation of petitions call for a brief introduction of the petition. I would be quite happy to simply read into the record the names contained in these petitions, if that is what is desired, rather than educating honourable senators opposite on the history of the various communities of Nova Scotia.

Senator Simard: May I have a 30-second question which I should like to have answered?

Senator Kirby: If the honourable senator would like to ask a 30-minute question I would be more than delighted to respond to that.

Senator Simard: I will see how much success I enjoy before asking a 30-minute question. I certainly do not want to participate in this filibuster. I should like to know whether it is now the philosophy of the Liberal Party of Canada that two wrongs make a right.

Senator Steuart: So you finally admit that you were wrong!

Senator Simard: I ask the "little bugger" to wait a minute. Let me finish.

Senator Steuart: You can't call me that.

Senator Simard: I am referring to you as you were described and pictured by the Ottawa Citizen. I am not calling you a "little bugger" tonight. I won't do that tomorrow either, but that is what the Ottawa Citizen is now calling you.

To Senator Kirby, I hope that the Speaker will not resign because I do not think he has done anything wrong. You have said that what happened last Thursday was wrong. You have almost admitted that what you are now doing is wrong.

Are you telling me that the new philosophy of the Liberal Party is that two wrongs make a right?

Senator Olson: No.

Senator Steuart: I am saying that two wrongs make a Tory. That is what we are all saying.

Senator Kirby: I think that Senator Steuart deserves all of the labels he has been given, and I think he ought not to be proud of them.

Respecting the honourable senator's question—

Senator Simard: A 30-second question.

Senator Kirby: I could not even get through a preamble in 30 seconds. I could not even get through an opening sentence in 30 seconds. I could not even get through saying that I want to respond to your question in 30 seconds.

A number of those in this chamber have been in the academic community. The notion that a professor would answer a question in 30 seconds, or that a student would ask a question in 30 seconds is unheard of.

Senator Kelly: I am reading the rule book. I know I will find a rule that will slow you down.

Senator Kirby: That will take some searching. I have read the rules carefully. There is no gag rule of the form you would like to find in our rules. I apologize for that. That is not in our rule book yet, although I am sure the Speaker would like to find a way to put one in.

I should like to respond to Senator Simard's point about there being two wrongs. I truly appreciate the fact that he has at least conceded that the first point was wrong.

Senator Simard: No, I did not concede that.

I raised this matter to say that the Speaker and I will never agree that we did something wrong. You have taken it for granted that tonight's proceedings and the proceedings of a week or so ago make things right, although you are wrong on both occasions.

Senator Kirby: We ought to be clear on this. The people in the gallery ought to understand what the fundamental issue is; it is that in any and all legislative chambers there are rules and the members of those legislative chambers are entitled to operate within those rules to achieve whatever objective they want to achieve. Those of us on this side of the house have made no bones about the fact that what we would like ultimately to achieve is the defeat of Bill C-62 respecting the goods and services tax. In fact, that is what caused all of the problems on September 24. The only difference between senators on this side and the Speaker is that senators on this side believe that the rules should be respected. As Liberals we want to operate within the rules. As Liberals we believe that the game ought to be played fairly and that due process, as is set out in the rules, ought to prevail.

The difference between senators on this side and the Speaker is clear: the Speaker believes that the rules ought to be what he unilaterally interprets them to be from time to time; our view is that that is not due process, that is not the way this institution or any other institution can legitimately operate. It is precisely that issue on which we have had a disagreement.

As for the honourable senator's point respecting how senators on this side are tabling petitions, if the public were not so annoyed at Bill C-62, if they were not so frustrated, if they were not telephoning us and writing to us and pleading with us to defeat the GST, we would never have these petitions in the first place.

We did not go out looking for these hundreds of petitions. I did not go out looking for these, nor did Senator Perrault. These petitions were presented to us because Canadians are upset, mad, infuriated and totally disgusted with Bill C-62. All that we are doing is attempting to read those names into the record.

Senator Kelly: Would the honourable senator entertain a question?

Senator Kirby: Absolutely.

Senator Kelly: At the end of honourable senator's explanation—

Senator Kirby: Just so that we are clear, that was my preamble.

Senator Kelly: The honourable senator talked about due process on what Canadians expect. I wish the honourable senator would spend some time discussing whether what we are doing now, carrying on a filibuster respecting the GST, is accomplishing what Canadians expect of us; or does the honourable senator want us to get into the debate on the bill itself and debate the legislation on the floor of this chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Kelly: Is this really what the Canadian people expect?

Senator Kirby: What the Canadian people expect is crystal clear; they expect that the government will withdraw the bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Kirby: That being done, the debate will be over in this house. That is what Canadians expect.

The fact that honourable senators opposite are not prepared to withdraw the bill—to be more precise, the Prime Minister and Minister of Finance are not prepared to withdraw the bill—all we can do, since we are now outnumbered because of the British eight, is to try to use the rules in a way which allows us to achieve the objectives the Canadian people want, and that objective is that the bill not be passed, that it be withdrawn, that it be killed, that it disappear.

Senator Murray: You are preventing Parliament from making a decision.

Senator Olson: We are going to try to persuade you to change your minds.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Would the Honourable Senator Kirby answer the question. Are honourable senators opposite going to prevent Parliament from coming to a decision? Is that the strategy?

Senator Kirby: Those on this side of the House have never said that. We are happy to recognize that it may be some time, though, before Parliament makes a decision.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for Senator Kirby. The honourable senator has talked about the rules and how they should be respected. I respectfully submit that Canadians have a right to petition the Senate. Since the time this procedure was introduced, petitions have been tabled, and no discussion took place respecting them.

I think honourable senators opposite would accomplish what it is they wish to accomplish by simply tabling these petitions. They are now twisting the rules and saying that two wrongs make a right. That seems to be the new Liberal philosophy.

Is the Honourable Senator Kirby, being one of the quartet, telling us that he has made up his mind respecting this legislation?

We have had a filibuster on questions of privilege. Now we are on a second phase. I suppose there will be a third phase and a fourth phase. Is it the ultimate end of the honourable Liberal senators opposite to kill this bill?

My second question is: Since the honourable senator seems to be well-versed in the rules of this place, would he say that there should have been a different set of rules to apply to the meeting of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee of September 24?

Senator Kirby: I would be more than delighted to reopen the debate on the meeting of September 28—

Senator Simard: September 24!

Senator Kirby: My apologies, September 24. It is difficult to know what day it is when October 9 is staring at us from the Clerk's Table.

I thought it was clearly established that the Speaker had ruled that the procedures used at that meeting of September 24 were within the rules, or at least that is my understanding.

Respecting the honourable senator's question regarding whether the rules can be used to slow down the coming vote on the GST, the answer is that one has to wait to see what happens.

I do not pretend to be an expert on the rules of this place. Frankly, I have just recently read those parts of the rules that pertain to presentation of petitions.

I read the rule found on page 70, which made it categorically clear that there are to be no votes in the Senate until both whips had gone into the chamber, which was clearly violated last week.

There is a set of rules and we try to operate within those rules, but each side uses the rules in whatever fashion they can to achieve their objective, as honourable senators opposite did on September 25 and 26.

We have not concealed our attitude towards the GST. I think what started the filibuster on September 25 was our position, our desire and objective was to see the GST not come into effect. That continues to be our objective.

As I understand what we are doing, we are simply using the rules to achieve that objective.

Senator Murray: Then why not have a debate in this finely-balanced house and try to persuade those honourable senators who sit here as independents, and who have said that they have not made their minds up, to the rightness of your point of view, and then we will hold a vote on the GST and see then whether it lives or dies.

The honourable senator's party can take their chances with that, and we on this side will take our chances. That is the way Parliament is supposed to work.

What I find unconscionable—

Senator Steuart: Unless the Senate is stacked with eight British senators.

Senator Murray: —is the proposition, especially coming from senators with some experience in public life, that Parliament should be prevented from reaching a decision.

[Senator Simard.]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Kirby: Just so that the Honourable Senator Murray is clear, I am sure that in due course that will occur, although there is some legal debate as to who is eligible to vote in this place. Indeed, as we all know, there was a hearing in an Ontario court in Toronto yesterday in which considerable time was spent discussing the issue of whether or not some senators opposite are eligible to vote.

I cannot resist making the observation—since it has appeared in newspaper clippings several times over the past few days—that I have some difficulty with Senator Murray's making the observation that there is a need to bring this issue to a vote.

I am going to quote from an article written by Frances Russell in the Winnipeg Free Press of Thursday. To set the context, it states:

> In 1982 the fertile and furtive mind of Senator Lowell Murray devised the most serious threat ever posed to the survival of parliamentary democracy, the tyranny of the bells.

It then goes on to talk about the opposition Conservatives objecting to the omnibus nature of Liberal legislation to implement the National Energy Program. The Conservatives then called for a recorded vote and let the bells ring for 14 days before reaching a compromise with the government.

I have no idea, frankly, whether the Honourable Senator Murray was the architect of the bell-ringing strategy or not, but he has certainly achieved the notoriety that goes with such actions.

Senator Perrault: How many days did the bells ring then?

Senator Kirby: They rang for 14 days.

I have a little difficulty, given the fact that you have been associated with that particular event, with your admonishing us that it is important to let things come to a vote fairly quickly.

Senator Murray: I was absolutely astonished when I read that article. I thought briefly of writing the author a letter, because that was the first time I had seen any reference anywhere holding me responsible and suggesting I had the slightest connection to that incident. I was a member of the Senate at that time.

It is not that I disassociate myself from my friends down the way who were involved in that—

Senator Olson: That is not what they have told us.

Senator Murray: —I simply say for the record that I had absolutely nothing to do with that.

Senator Kirby: I thank the honourable senator for clarifying that.

Senator Steuart: We believe Senator Murray as we always have.

Senator Kirby: In fairness to the author, and her opening description of Senator Murray as having a "fertile and furtive mind" I noticed the leader did not disassociate himself from that. Most of us sitting on this side of the house would not do that either. I think the problem is that when you have that kind of a mind, and such events occur, people have tendency to put cause and effect together and assume there is some kind of linkage.

In any event, I note that there are a number of other honourable senators on this side who wish to speak on presentation of petitions, so I yield the floor; but in so doing I should like to pass my petition to the clerks at the Table and let them know that this is petition No. 47 and that I have 111 in case honourable senators opposite want to learn more about Nova Scotia.

During the coming weeks and months I will be delighted to do what I have done tonight and recognize that we have only another 60 to 70 hours to go before I have completed my presentation of petitions.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I rise to present petitions. As a preliminary comment, I followed with interest the exchange on the orderliness of the way in which these petitions are being presented.

I have many petitions to table. I will try to keep order, and, if I do not, I am sure honourable senators opposite will react in the appropriate way. If questions are asked, I will try to answer them. In the course of presenting these petitions I will make some remarks. I hope honourable senators bear with me as to why I think the petitioners are presenting these petitions.

I am not sure whether, during the course of my time on my feet, there will be questions about the role of the Opposition; however, if there are, I would be happy to discuss that in the context of what is happening here, which is a delaying procedure, which is a proper use of the rules, and which will undoubtedly be characterized as an abuse of the rules by honourable senators opposite.

Where we will fit in the spectrum between use and abuse is going to be an interesting question and one to which we will probably not find the answer to this evening.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Nancy E. Teed: In the honourable senator's preamble he indicated he would be following the rules closely. I think I just heard the honourable senator say that he was going to read the names on the petitions. On page 77 of the rules it says, clearly, that the petition itself is not to be read.

I posed this question the other evening but did not receive an answer. Perhaps we should ask the senator in the Chair for a ruling on this specific point.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I think the honourable senator is raising a point of order, to which I should like to respond.

If I said I was going to read the petitions, and that is not strictly in accordance with the rules, let me say that I would be quite happy, in summary form, to give a brief explanation of what the petition sets out. It may be that I will not read every single word, but I will likely follow the tenor of the petitioner.

We should be speaking to the Speaker on this, and I will address the tenor of what it is I see in these petitions. What I have to say may be somewhat repetitive because some of them are in similar form; nonetheless, that goes to the point I made earlier as to whether I will be using the rules, or as members opposite may think, abusing the rules. As I said, that is going to be difficult to draw a conclusion on because it goes to the heart of the role of the Opposition and the role of government. Things will not happen as they should happen unless both play their roles, and those of us in opposition have to oppose.

We have to use whatever means are available to us, in some cases to delay, and in some cases to expedite, and to serve what we think is the proper role of the Opposition.

In any event, I will take my seat for a moment. I do not know whether other honourable senators want to address this point.

Senator Teed: Did I understand the honourable senator to say that his role in Opposition is to oppose? Forgive me, but I thought our role as senators was one of responsibility, and that we respect the rules of this chamber, and if the rules do not exist for this chamber, that we respect the rules of the chamber down the hall.

As a newly-appointed senator, I find it difficult to hear the honourable senator say that he was specifically appointed to oppose. I should like him to clarify that.

Senator Hays: I will, and with pleasure. I am a member of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. You are a member on the side of Her Majesty's government.

I am fairly new to Parliament myself. I do not have a long background in Parliament. I am a lawyer and am familiar with procedures of the courts. It seems to me that they arise out of what happens in Parliament.

In that context we seek the truth through an adversarial means, and the government and opposition are adversaries. I must say that one of the things which concerns me most about the events of the days of the bell ringing was that after the vote, without the Opposition being present, it seemed that with too great haste there was a willingness to get on with Orders of the Day, the business. Had not that business been stopped, then it is conceivable that those senators present in this chamber would have gone through the Orders of the Day and dealt with all of the business, which they said they could have done. That would have been an incredible abuse of Parliament.

● (2215)

I do not know whether that would have happened, because that is hypothetical, but it is a good illustration of the reason why the role of an Opposition is a necessary one in a parliamentary body. If there is no Opposition, then Parliament is like a car with no brakes—it only goes in one direction.

Oppositions are just that—they are there to oppose. They do not always oppose; sometimes they agree, sometimes they do not. This was my point, senator, when I talked about our role being that of opposing. I will not always oppose; I will sometimes agree, but it is extremely important that the judgment of the Opposition as well as that of the government be brought to bear on a piece of parliamentary business. That piece of parliamentary business cannot be properly conducted unless those roles are properly played. Justice is not done unless, in our adversarial system, adequate representations are made for both sides of the issue.

As I said, that is the way we determine the truth. We ask questions and we use—some would say misuse—rules.

Honourable senators, that is the additional comment I would like to make in the context of the point of order that was raised.

Senator Teed: I do want the Speaker to rule on my original point. But, following through on your comment that you believe in the rules and you look to the rules, if indeed you had been serious about the situation that occurred last week, why, then, did you not look to page 71 of the rule book and exercise that rule? It reads:

> If there is confusion, a mistake or irregularity in the conduct of a division, the Speaker interrupts the proceedings, puts the question again and orders that the division be taken again.

At that point you could have asked for another go. Before you answer my question, however, I would ask for a ruling from the Speaker.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: On the point of order, last week we could not ask the speaker to rule under the rule at page 71 because we were locked out. We could not even get in to speak to the Speaker. The doors were locked. How could we get in when the doors were locked?

Senator Teed: Your Honour, could we have a ruling on my question on the reading of the petitions?

Hon. Anne C. Cools: The order of business before us is Presentation of Petitions. It seems to me that we are quite in order to be presenting petitions.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I first remind honourable senators of what I had to say somewhat earlier this evening, that the senator in this Chair is but the humble servant of all honourable senators.

In reply to question raised by the Honourable Senator Teed, I shall first read from page 57 of the rules:

> A Senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition; the petition itself is not read.

It would appear to me that it might be helpful to look at the french version of the same rule which provides:

> Un sénateur qui présente une pétition publique fait une brève déclaration dans laquelle il informe le Sénat du contenu de la pétition, sans en faire la lecture intégrale.

If the "statement" in English or "declaration" in French leads us to understand that what takes place is a form of explanation, that the honourable senator presenting the petition has the right to provide an explanation of it, then perhaps we are also assisted in understanding the different kinds of explanations possible.

There are, of course, nominal explanations, which would merely mention the name, or the title of the petition. The mere reading of the name or the nominal explanation, might not be sufficient to meet the test of "statement" or "declaration."

Then there is the essential explanation. The essential explanation would involve going into the detail, or the essence, of the petition. Perhaps that would be almost equivalent to the reading of the petition, for which our rules do not specifically provide.

Perhaps it is the third sort of explanation, the descriptive explanation, which might be most helpful to us. I leave with honourable senators the suggestion, with reference to page 57, that in presenting a petition, the petition itself is not read but a descriptive explanation would be very much in order.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Dan Hays: Thank you, Your Honour.

Having made those preliminary comments, I will now come to the petitions. As I said, they are from two areas of the country, one being my home province of Alberta and the other Nova Scotia, which has featured prominently here. I will begin with the first petition, which is signed by some 45 petitioners.

It is addressed to the Honourable Senate of Canada. Of course, it makes reference to the ancient and undoubted rights about which we have heard so much in points of order here. The petition is one that relates to the goods and services tax, which honourable senators will recognize as Bill C-62 in this context, a bill which has been, and will continue to be, controversial. This particular petition mentions problems that these petitioners see with Bill C-62; in particular, problems related to the fact that savings under the MST, the manufacturer's sales tax, might not find their way through to consumers if the tax is implemented.

Another concern of these petitioners is the visibility of the tax.

Also of concern to these petitioners is the fact that inflation has not been dealt with in a frank and adequate way by the government. They fear that inflation will result from the goods and services tax to a greater degree than the government has anticipated.

The petition goes on to explain that the imposition of the tax would create an onerous administrative burden on small business and thus the economy. It explains also that the petitioners are concerned that because of what the government has said, the goods and services tax will do nothing to address the deficit, which might have been a reason to bring in the tax.

Finally, the petitioners pray that the Senate do everything that it can to stop the Government of Canada from introducing the goods and services tax.

This petition is dated July 2, 1990 and is signed by a group of people. I do not intend to read all of their names, in the interests of time, because I have a large number of petitions here; but I would like to give some indication to honourable senators of where these people are from.

As I look through this list, I see a number of addresses, to begin with, in Halifax, Nova Scotia. Other addresses are shown as: Sackville, Nova Scotia; various regions of Halifax; Porter's Lake, a subdivision of Halifax; Bedford, which from my few and all too brief visits to Nova Scotia, I know is actually part of Halifax.

As I continue reading this, I see an address at what looks like Mt. Uniacke and Windsor, Nova Scotia. The rest of the addresses on this petition are essentially those of petitioners from either Halifax or Sackville, with the exception of the last, which is from New Glasgow.

The next petition I would like to present is in similar form. Honourable senators, I may repeat some of the things I say, but I will not do so with respect to this petition. Rather, I will simply do as I did in the case of the first petition, which is try to give honourable senators some idea of who has signed it by stating where they live.

These 45 petitioners are from: Halifax, Dartmouth, and Wolfville, Nova Scotia. Several petitioners are from Newfoundland. Another is from Dartmouth, another from Bedford.

In the interests of time, I will go on to the next petition. This also contains 45 signatures and is dated July 2. It is in a form identical to that of the first two petitions I presented. In this case, a number of petitioners are from the same general area, Sackville and Dartmouth. As I look through it, I see a number of other cities mentioned: Truro, Nova Scotia; Bedford; Coldbrook, and Sackville.

The fourth petition I wish to present this evening is dated July 2. It is in a form similar to that of the other petitions. The people who have taken the trouble to sign this petition are, for the most part, from Halifax. However, some of them are from Shubenacadie, Waterville and New Glasgow. Also represented are Halifax, Wolfville, Moncton, and Dartmouth. It is interesting that there would be some addresses from other provinces on these petitions. People must have been visiting these areas over the summer.

This petition is again dated July 2 and it contains the names, addresses and, in most cases, postal codes of 45 petitioners.

The next petition is again in similar form, dated July 2. The petition is signed by petitioners from Sackville, Halifax, Bridgewater, Centreville, New Glasgow, Pictou, Shelburne, Bras d'Or, Windsor Junction and Wolfville.

Honourable senators, here nestled in among the names of all of these Maritimers is a petitioner from Calgary, Alberta. I see names of people from New Waterford, Elmsdale, Newport, Nova Scotia and Windsor, Nova Scotia.

Senator David: May I put a question, senator?

Senator Hays: Yes, Senator David.

Senator David: I am a little surprised that 99 per cent of all of the petitioners seem to come from Nova Scotia. If I remember well, you are from Alberta. How do you explain this? Did you make a special trip down there to receive all of these petitions or were they given to someone else to be transmitted to you?

Senator Hays: That is a good question. I would like to present petitions from my own province, Senator David, but in the interests of trying to assist my colleagues I am presenting petitions from Nova Scotia.

They have come to my hand having been addressed to the Senate of Canada and are sent by a group which I gather has been involved in collecting the names of petitioners. This group is called the Tax Council on National Issues. It has an address in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. I can only assume that these petitions come to my hand more readily than the petitions from my own province because of the domination in this chamber of people from the province of Nova Scotia, both on the opposition side and on the government side. It seems that they play a remarkable role. It is something that you and I, Senator David, should note well and try to remedy so that in future we will have other provinces and other regions of Canada represented in the leadership in this house.

This does not reflect on the quality of the leadership we presently have, it is simply a desire that in the future we have more people from other regions playing a role.

Senator David: If my understanding is correct, then, if you receive a box of petitions from anywhere, it is distributed between all of you on the other side so each of you have a couple of dozen or perhaps a few hundred of them and will read them one after the other?

Senator Hays: Yes, Senator David, you have more or less got it. However, I should like to elaborate somewhat. There are not hundreds or dozens but thousands and perhaps tens of thousands. I do not want to take a lot of time on this, but what is remarkable in itself is the fact that so many Canadians, perhaps in unprecedented numbers, although I am not sure of that, have taken the trouble to sign these petitions. They are encouraged by groups like the Taxpayers' Council on National Issues.

This leads into the kind of discussion I had earlier with Senator Teed about the role of government in opposition. These petitions tend to find their way into the hands of opposition senators because opposition senators are representing a point of view they want made.

Senator David: The way I see it, and I do not think I am wrong on this, is that this gives you the occasion to continue your filibuster as long as you wish.

Senator Hays: That, again, is not an unfair characterization Senator David. Filibusters are not unknown in the Canadian Parliament. I would like to know more about them, particularly those in this chamber. I gather that a filibuster in the House of Commons is not possible due to changes in the rules, although I do not know that for certain. But, yes, I think that in answer to your question it is fair to say that we are taking an extraordinary amount of time.

I am aware of filibusters in the second chamber of the United States. They have been used on many occasions. I do not know why upper chambers seem to have rules that allow this to happen, but they do. Here we see some considerable delay, as I look at the date of October 9 on the Clerk's Table.

I do not deny that extraordinary time is being taken. I give as my reason an extraordinary circumstance. That is how I see it. You may not agree.

My next petition, then, is similar to the previous ones and is also dated July 2. It is from communities in Nova Scotia. I see Moncton, New Brunswick; Dartmouth, Sackville, Lower Sackville, Shubenacadie, Truro and Windsor. I think it is a good thing, having regard to what we are trying to do here, to give senators some ideas of the breadth of concern in terms of where these people have signed these petitions.

Senator Bonnell: Would Senator Hays permit a question?

Senator Hays: Yes.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Does he think the fact that so many names are coming from Nova Scotia and the Maritimes stems from the fact that those areas of Canada away from the centre are being effected harder than the centre itself? Does he not agree that, consequently, most of the people from Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, the Yukon, Alberta and British Columbia are going to protest harder and more often than those in central Canada?

Senator Hays: That is a similar question, Senator Bonnell, to the one put by Senator David. I will just recap that.

I suspect that the tax is unpopular throughout the country. We have heard expressions of concern in the form of petitions from everywhere, but it seems to me that because we have such a dominance in the Senate of Senators from Nova Scotia, it is easier for these petitions to find their way into our hands than it is for petitions from other areas to do so; but that is something that we will try to remedy in the future.

Senator Bonnell: May I put another question? I know that we have good representation from the province of Nova Scotia in this chamber. We have from all of Atlantic Canada the very best people on both sides of the house. But it seems to me that most petitions are coming from this side of the house. Is that because in Atlantic Canada the other side of the house has less than 15 per cent national support and consequently can't get anybody from those areas to support them?

Senator Hays: That is an excellent question, Senator Bonnell. I suspect that the reason is quite simply that in our party structure and in the parliamentary system we have a ferocious party discipline. Those on the government side, and those on this side who have been on the government side at other times, tend to be supportive of government issues. I suspect that senators who represent the government, particularly recent appointments, because they are extraordinary, controversial and questionable, may be picking up on some unhappiness with the government initiative. But I think there is also a genuine concern on the part of people on our side, and it has been demonstrated, and will be demonstrated here tonight, at this late hour on Saturday evening—officially October 9 but actually October 13—for these petitioners. Would that answer your question?

Senator Bonnell: Partially, but I would think that if the people of Atlantic Canada, Alberta, British Columbia or the Yukon were so strongly in favour of the goods and services tax, they would be sending petitions to the other side in support of it. Surely senators opposite must have received petitions of support. It would be nice if they could bring forward some of those petitions. If they do not want to waste time, they could simply table them, but at least we could look at them and see who those people are. I cannot find a soul in Nova Scotia who really supports this tax.

Senator David: Can you give me an example in the history of Canada where a senator has received a petition in support of any tax?

Senator Bonnell: Yes, honourable senators. In fact, I have a letter in my briefcase from the mayor of the town of Summerside in support of the GST, but he was the only one. The reason he supports it is because he hopes to get the GST offices there. I do have examples of people who write in support of it.

Senator Hays: I should like to reclaim the floor.

Senator Cools: If you could defer, Senator David's question is illogical. A petition is something whereby the supplicant petitions, prays before us, and beseeches us for a remedy; so it is unlikely that there would be petitions in favour of an unpopular measure.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, if I may, I should like to continue. I will not be much longer, and I know, since our intention is to sit a long time this evening, that other senators will have an opportunity to rise in their place with questions or, in fact, with petitions.

My next petition is in similar form to the previous one, again from July 2. It was a busy day.

Senator David: Coincidence?

Senator Hays: Yes. I am looking forward hopefully to a different date. The people who signed this petition are again from Nova Scotia communities such as Sackville, Truro, Dartmouth, Halifax, Bedford and Musquodoboit. It is a petition with 45 names.

My next petition is in similar form. This, however, is from July 9, a later date. Again, it has the same prayer, and the communities represented here are, again, Sackville and Dartmouth, and there is an address from the community of Kingston, Ontario. This is a petition with the names of 45 petitioners.

I have another petition for presentation in similar form, dated July 2, and the communities represented here are, again, from Nova Scotia: Bedford, Sackville, Halifax, Waterville and Waverley.

I have a further petition dated July 2, in similar form, that is again representative of Nova Scotia communities for the most part, such as Bedford, Sackville, Halifax, Kennetcook, Trenton and New Glasgow.

I have a further petition, honourable senators, dated July 9, with the names of 45 petitioners, in similar form, representative of Nova Scotia communities such as Halifax, Sackville, Musquodoboit, and Upper Musquodoboit.

I have a further petition in similar form, dated July 9, again with Nova Scotia addresses in Halifax, New Bedford, Dartmouth, Waverley, and so on.

The next petition I have to present is, again, in similar form. I will not go through that again. This one is also dated, as are many of the others, July 9, and it contains the names of 45 petitioners from Halifax, Dartmouth, Sackville, Lunenburg, Waverley, Musquodoboit, Sydney and others.

I have a further petition, honourable senators, in similar form, with the names of 45 petitioners, and it is dated July 9, again representative of Nova Scotia communities of Dartmouth, Sackville, and so on.

The next petition is in similar form and is dated July 9 and contains the names of 45 petitioners from Nova Scotia communities that I have already mentioned, although there are some exceptions. There is a petitioner from Ottawa.

The next petition that I wish to present, honourable senators, is in similar form to the ones that I described earlier. It is dated July 9 and is from petitioners from Nova Scotia. I will look through to make sure that I have already described the communities. These are wider-spread communities. We have here Lunenburg, Eastern Passage, Hacketts Cove, Bridgewater, Shubenacadie.

The next petition, honourable senators, is in similar form. It is dated July 9 and is from petitioners whose addresses are in Nova Scotia, mainly in communities that I have already mentioned. The only community that I have not seen for a while here is the community of Yarmouth.

The next petition, honourable senators, is in similar form. This one has an earlier date, February 26, and is signed by petitioners from Nova Scotia and is representative of a number of different communities, principally the communities of Halifax and Dartmouth.

As I said earlier, I have some petitions from Alberta and I will take advantage of an opportunity under this order to deal with those petitions later on this evening or tomorrow morning.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, perhaps I could just take a moment, in speaking on the question of petitions, to explain perhaps why there are so many petitions from my part of Canada, namely Nova Scotia and Atlantic Canada. I think everyone would agree that there are serious regional economic consequences in moving to a GST, because, in the transition to a broad-based tax, the service and primary sectors will be hit particularly hard. The inherently regressive nature of this kind of tax ensures that those hit hardest by the GST will be the poor, the disadvantaged, the elderly, the single-parent families, and so on, and we have many of those in Atlantic Canada.

Many honourable senators surely know that the provincial sales tax rates in Atlantic Canada are already the highest in the country.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, may I please raise a point of order once again, with great respect to the senator speaking? This is perfectly reasonable material to be handled at a time when the bill is being debated.

Senator Murray: Hear, hear!

Senator Kelly: But this is presentation of petitions. I have the greatest respect for the senator, as he well knows, but that is not the stage we are at, unfortunately, at this time. This is presentation of petitions, not debate.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: I am responding, in part, Senator Kelly, to the very proper question that was raised by Senator David—and perhaps you were not in the chamber at the time—as to why there were so many petitions from the province of Nova Scotia. I am just making the point that provincial sales taxes in the Atlantic area of the country are already the highest in Canada, and when they are combined with the GST—

Senator Murray: They will be able to lower them, Senator.

Senator Graham: —the taxes will be crushing to the people in our part of Canada. On your point, while I do not intend to get into debate now, I do want to make the point that this is a golden opportunity for members of this chamber to speak on behalf of the people they represent.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Graham: The people of this country have petitioned us in an unprecedented way to try to stop this regressive piece of legislation.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The people in the House of Commons represent the voters.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Graham: As long as we are working under the present constitution, I am representing the people of my province, and under the Constitution I have a right to vote in this chamber. I was denied that vote last Thursday.

Senator Murray: The people down the hall represent the voters. You represent yourself.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, please, I would like to get back to my point of order. I do not argue at all with the point being made that there are many matters that have to be discussed at the time when we are debating, and I do not quarrel with the fact that there are totally legitimate arguments, many of which have been started now, but I am arguing that we have a process here that we should try to adhere to.

Senator Thériault: That is new!

Senator Kelly: Let us either present petitions in the way set out on page 57 or let us get at the bill and debate it.

Senator Thériault: When you follow the process, we will follow the process!

Senator Graham: Senator Kelly, that is exactly what I am doing. We have never had an opportunity like this before, and there has never been an issue facing this country where the people have expressed their opinions in such a very firm and positive way. They do not want this tax. Please give me the opportunity to list a few of the names of the people.

Senator Kelly: That is all I am asking.

Senator Graham: All I wanted to do was to answer the question that was raised by Senator David as to why there were so many people on these petitions from my part of the country, the province of Nova Scotia. I am here to represent their interests.

Senator Thériault: Hear, hear!

Senator Cools: That is right!

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: For example, I am here to represent the following interests:

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Kelly, you mentioned earlier that you have roots in Prince Edward Island, but you should know, as a senator from Ontario, that there are regional disparities and that the Atlantic economy is dominated by small business firms. The cost of compliance for those smaller firms will be very burdensome. They will clearly have a greater difficulty in incorporating those costs. I should also make the point, Senator Kelly, that the Atlantic region is largely an importer of goods and services, and because of the distance from the originating manufacturing centres, prices in our region are higher than in other areas of the country. Indeed, that point was made by the Newfoundland and Labrador Chamber of Commerce and by other Chambers of Commerce in the area.

Senator Murray: I thought I should mention the mayor of St. John's who, by the way, I think, is a Liberal sympathizer, and he is strongly in favour of the GST.

Senator Graham: That makes two mayors in Canada in favour of the GST.

Senator Petten: And he is a businessman.

Senator Graham: Those people made the point that the purchase price of manufactured goods is already eight to 14 per cent higher than the prices in central Canada. Other Chambers of Commerce have made the same point.

[Senator Kelly.]

(Names of signatories read)

As I said earlier, provincial sales taxes in Atlantic Canada are already the highest in country, and these people are expressing serious concern, honourable senators, that the GST, combined with provincial sales taxes, will be too burdensome to carry.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, today the telephone calls continue to come in in support of our actions here, presenting petitions on behalf of, as Senator Sparrow said, extraordinary Canadians. This is a wonderful opportunity for us in this chamber to spend time on petitions, to register the names of those people before the people in this chamber, and to let them know that we really care. This is a way, honourable senators, for us to attempt to persuade the obviously intransigent members on the government benches to withdraw this terrible piece of legislation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, I rise to present several petitions, but before I do I should like to express concern that the senators on the other side seem to have very little interest indeed in listening to these petitions.

Senator Murray: With only six of your own Liberals in attendance? You ought to be ashamed of yourselves. There are 15 or 20 of us here and we are listening very intently.

Senator Thériault: You have to keep your quorum.

Senator Murray: Let the record show that there are a mere half dozen Liberals in the chamber.

Senator Cools: Senator Murray, I feel no shame. You are walking away. As usual, you start something and then you go running.

Before I proceed to these petitions, I should like to place something on the record that is not technically a petition but is certainly expressive of many thoughts that are around. It is something that I received in the mail. When I was a child, we called these "rubbers", but the word now is "erasers", and this is accompanied by a letter which I shall put on the record:

> Dear fellow Canadians,
> It is indeed with great pleasure that we enclose for your edification a wonderful new therapeutic device designed to relieve the symptoms of an over-taxed psyche. With the needs of the common man in mind, we have developed this magnificent new product so that, in times of anger and distress, he can vent his spleen.
> Governments have, for too long, been over-taxing our patience as well as our pocket books, and a universal rage is emerging.
> The proposed new Goods and Services Tax (GST) is the last straw for many upstanding citizens. Now we offer the opportunity to focus that frustration.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order again. Every senator in this chamber knows that this is presentation of petitions, and they know that a letter written to a senator cannot be presented as a petition.

Senator Thériault: Why not? Explain.

Hon. Anne C. Cools: I was not trying to present it as a petition.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: It is part of the explanation.

Senator Kelly: It is not possibly receivable as a petition.

Senator Thériault: Explain!

Senator Simard: The rules, the rules, the rules!

Senator Kelly: I do not object to the letter being read, if you want to read it, but this is not the appropriate time.

Senator Thériault: How do you know that? Explain yourself.

Senator Cools:

> Governments have, for too long, been over-taxing our patience as well as our pocket books, and a universal rage is emerging.

Senator Kelly: Could I have a ruling on that?

Senator Perrault: Be fair! Let her be heard!

Senator Simard: Order, order!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I believe that Senator Olson wishes to speak to the point of order.

Senator Perrault: Stop trying to bully the Speaker!

Senator Kelly: I am not.

Hon. H.A. Olson: I want to speak to the point of order.

Senator Kelly: I want to apologize to Senator Cools if she feels I was being impolite. In normal practice, the Speaker suspends and waits until a point of order is described. I was reminded a moment ago of last week and I hope we do not return to that.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to draw Senator Kelly's attention to the dictionary we have at the Table, The Concise Oxford Dictionary. The definition of "petition" is as follows:

> Asking, supplication, request; formal written supplication from one or more persons to sovereign.

There are several ways in which a petition, or a request, a supplication, can be made, and what Senator Cools is doing is one of those ways. Senator Kelly does not have a right to say that a senator, or even a Canadian citizen, is obliged to make a supplication to this chamber in some certain way and that he must not make it in another way. If he listened carefully to Senator Cools' explanation, and to what was in the letter, he would know that it is certainly a supplication. That is what a petition is. He should look in the dictionary once in a while.

Senator Kelly: I would point out to honourable senators that, last week, in reference to the definition of a petition, I believe I gave three references, one from Bourinot, one from Beauchesne and one from Erskine May describing the standards that must be met if a petition is to be receivable as a petition as opposed to a letter written to a senator with whatever comments the writer wanted to make. Such a letter can be read out, but during another stage of proceeding. When we are talking about presentation of petitions, it is a question of what is receivable as a petition. That is all.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, this is one of those situations, again, where we are going to make up new rules, new interpretations of what a petition is. These dictionaries and these definitions have been around for years, and I do not think that Senator Kelly would like to try now to say that there are certain forms in which he believes a petition ought to be made, and none other. That is ridiculous. It is a supplication, a humble supplication, as it says in the dictionary, which is exactly what Senator Cools is doing. So she is completely in order.

Hon. Nancy E. Teed: Mr. Speaker and honourable senators, could I ask Senator Olson to read the rule on page 57 and to delete, in the third line, the word "petition" and replace it with the definition as he has just read it?

• (2315)

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: The senator from New Brunswick has just broken the rules because she is supposed to address honourable senators, not the Speaker.

Senator Cools: Absolutely. She has been doing that all evening.

Senator Simard: How petty can you get?

Senator Teed: Honourable senators, I have been following several other speakers and I have heard it done both ways. I am sure you will forgive me that error and could we please ask the honourable senator—

Senator Cools: Please, honourable senators, I have the floor and I don't appreciate these somewhat feeble efforts. Our indulgence has been asked for, and I tell honourable senators across the way, especially the new ones, you are asking for indulgence because traditional custom in this place has it that when you are new you keep quiet for a few days.

Senator Simard: Don't you lecture her. How mean can you be?

Senator Cools: Not very mean, not nearly as mean as you. Honourable senators, I have the floor.

Senator Simard: Is this what you call "Saturday Night Fever"?

Senator Cools: I have never had it, honourable senator.

Senator Simard: Take it easy. Please don't lecture us.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order, please. I don't think there is any need to go through what the rules state about petitions. That is on the record and it has been there for a long time. Quite a complete reading of it was given by Senator Frith when petitions started off, as well as citations from Beauchesne and Erskine May. There is hardly any need to go through all that again. I will read three or four lines from page 57—

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I rise on a point of order—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I will hear the point of order, but when the Chair is speaking and standing it is part of the custom not to be interrupted. It is not for myself, but for the office of the Chair, so perhaps the honourable senator will allow me to finish.

Senator Bonnell: I have a point of order I wish to raise.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: A point of order was brought up by an honourable senator to my right and was commented on. I realize the Honourable Senator Bonnell has a point of order he wishes to raise, but I am dealing with one now and then the honourable gentleman can bring his up later. It is difficult to deal with two at the same time.

Senator Bonnell: What makes you think it is not the same point of order? You never waited to find out.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: That could well be. As I say, the honourable senator will have time to speak. I wish to finish reading the three or four lines:

> A Senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the content of the petition; the petition itself is not read.

All honourable senators know what that means and it is almost impossible for the Chair to interrupt every time. I ask honourable senators to guide themselves by the letter and the spirit, because in these proceedings it is up to all of us collectively to see that the rules are observed. It is not something any one person or the Chair can do. We have to do it collectively and responsibly, and that is all I am pointing out.

Senator Thériault: The Chair is obeying the rules.

Senator Teed: I appreciated Senator Austin's attempt—

Senator Bonnell: I have the floor, senator. If you want to say something you stand on your feet and do not do it from your seat.

Senator Teed: I really do not have to take orders from you.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: On a point of order, it is my information, after 20 years here, that you as Speaker do not rule or say anything about a point of order unless you are asked to do so by the members of the Senate. The Senate rules this place and the Speaker has no authority. Unless he is asked to rule on something, he does not interfere. Honourable senators, if you have any points that you ask the Speaker to rule on, that is a different situation, but for the Speaker to rule before he is asked to is going beyond the power of his authority.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I may point out that I was asked to rule. The Chair was asked to rule by Senator Kelly at least, and perhaps by others. I did not volunteer. There is no extra pay for fortuitous action. Senator Kelly asked, as a matter of fact at least twice, and insisted that the matter be dealt with by the Chair. The record will show that and that is all I can say on that.

Senator Bonnell: On the same point of order, honourable senators, Senator Kelly did ask and he already received three rulings from the Speaker. The Chair has already ruled three times; therefore, Senator Kelly should be told he has already heard the decision and not to interrupt the proceedings of the house by asking, every time there is a new Speaker, for the Speaker to rule again, because we cannot be overruled in the form of the Chair, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, before we finish this topic, I would like to draw the attention of senators to rule 5(m) on page 4, which states:

> "petition" means a written prayer presented to the Senate, and includes all petitions whether relating to public or private matters, matters of general policy, or to redress of local or personal grievances;

In Part V under Petitions and Bills, Rule 51 states:

> A petition shall clearly be written and signed by the petitioner.

As far as I can see, there is nothing in the rules which states a petition has to be in a particular form. It would seem that possibly the letter could be a petition in the definition under our rules.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Let us assume it is a petition. Could I ask honourable senators also to read page 57 where it states that a petition cannot be read in full.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, the Speaker has made a ruling and it is a reasonable one. It has been done twice before tonight and I know that Senator Kelly was present every time. I wonder if he could get it written out for him so he would not have to ask every hour for another ruling on the same matter, because he receives the same answer every time. Maybe he is tired, but it seems unreasonable that he cannot remember for more than 60 minutes what the ruling was. I do not think he would want to interrupt senators and receive the same ruling every hour on the hour.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, may I respond briefly. In my opinion, and it is only in my opinion, I believe that I am a most reasonable person. I really do believe, however, in the purpose of this book.

Senator Thériault: Why did you vote when we were not in the chamber last week?

Senator Kelly: I think this book was put together to guide us so we do not get into a jungle.

Senator Perrault: You did not follow it last week.

Senator Kelly: If we have a process for presenting petitions, all I am suggesting is that we stick to it.

Senator Perrault: Not to taking votes though?

Senator Thériault: Why do you not read a few of the letters that you have received, Senator Kelly?

Senator Bonnell: I wonder if Senator Kelly would read page 70 and see if he agrees that that should be followed exactly as written in the book and that the opposition should be in the chamber with the Whips when we have a vote.

Senator Kelly: I do agree with that totally and that is why I was puzzled that Senator Petten did not come through the door when the whole process commenced.

Senator Olson: Do you decide when he comes in the door?

Senator Kelly: No.

Senator Olson: Then he did not come in, so you did not have that decision to make.

Hon. William J. Petten: I already stated my position. It is on the record. You can read it in Hansard when we get it, or do you wish me to go all through the process again? I will be happy to if you want. I received the famous or infamous letter, as I said the other day, between 15 and 20 past 5. The doors were locked at 5:25 p.m., according to Hansard and I presume we all agree with that.

Senator Bonnell: That is the record.

Senator Petten: There was no way I could possibly inform 50 people in five or eight minutes. The doors were locked and they could not get in. If we had followed our rules, as you say, and the two Whips had entered and the vote had been held, or if we had been advised one and a half or two hours ahead of time, but five minutes, or I will even give you ten minutes, that is a little much and there is no way it could be done. I would appreciate it if that was not brought up all the time. I am happy to answer it every time anyone brings it up, but it seems a little redundant.

Senator Kelly: I did not bring it up. I was talking about rules, and I agree with all the rules.

Senator Petten: It is no trouble. I just want to keep the record straight.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Senator Cools: In the interests of brevity and in the interests of providing what I thought was a reasonable and brief preamble to the petitions, it was my intention to read a letter which was received, and I would like to so table it with the eraser that accompanied it. The purpose in mind in so doing is to demonstrate that people avail themselves of the tools in different ways and this particular letter is one statement. I have read most of it, but the essence of the letter was to ask politicians to heed the people and to register that objection by sending all of us these erasers, which I am pretty confident most of us would have received. The intention by so tabling this was to demonstrate that other good, solid outstanding Canadians have chosen not to take this route but rather to take the other route of presenting—in the interests of satisfying Senator Kelly—extremely formal petitions.

Senator Kelly, in this chamber we have the advantage of being able to speak to each other very directly, unlike in the Lower Chamber where we address the Speaker, I want you to be assured that I have taken the time and the trouble to scrutinize this entire petition. I have perused it very carefully to ensure that the signatures are all different, even sometimes that the ink is different and I have observed very carefully that this is not a fraudulent document. I have looked at it very carefully to be sure that the formal process has been observed.

With all due respect, Senator Kelly, you are exercising great insensitivity tonight when you are suggesting that the presentation of these petitions is somehow a boorish process we seem to be imposing upon you. Senator Kelly, there are many people who are going about in their daily lives taking these petitions to people for signature and I think you should think on that for a few minutes.

If I may continue, this is a petition to the Honourable the Senate of Canada.

> The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable Senate will therefor provide a remedy
> Whereas the new universal 7% federal Goods and Services Tax adopted by the Conservative government will create serious, unjust and inhuman difficulties to Canadians;
> Whereas the implementation of this tax will constitute an unprecedented assault on the income of the Canadians, not only by forcing them to pay higher taxes, but also by confronting them with a rise in inflation, interest rates and unemployment.
> Wherefore the undersigned, your Petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to reject this new Goods and Services Tax. The Canadian producers are carrying out their job perfectly by flooding the market with products, but they cannot produce money. The government must therefore set up a National Credit Office to create the money required by the existence of new wealth and abundance.

Senator Kelly, I want you to be assured that the people circulating these petitions—

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: On a point of order, page 57 of the rules states that the petition itself is not read. The Senate is informed of the contents with a brief statement, but the contents of the petition itself are not read. That is all.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Anne C. Cools: If I may continue, in order to give assurance to the other side, many of whom have been questioning the validity of some of these petitions, on the printed petition itself there are instructions to the good Canadians who are collecting these petitions to complete the forms properly, write the full name and to sign individually. This particular one is quite interesting. In the place of a stamp to mail it to us, it suggests writing O.H.M.S.,—On Her Majesty's Service.

Senator Kelly, the people who represent this particular petition do honestly and sincerely believe that they are "On Her Majesty's Service."

POINT OF ORDER

Senator Lewis: On a point of order, I would like the record to show, particularly in answer to a remark made by Senator Murray before he left the chamber when he made the terrible observation that there were so few members on this side of the house—

Senator Simard: Around five or six.

Senator Lewis: I would like to let the record show that it is only because these six, seven or eight senators are present there is a quorum. The government is not even prepared to have enough members here to have a quorum.

Senator Perrault: Disgraceful. There are only ten over there.

Senator Lewis: They are not here in the chamber and that is what Senator Murray said and I do not like the reference he made.

Senator Simard: Do you want to call a quorum?

Senator Perrault: There is a quorum, thanks to the Liberals.

Senator Cools: Senator Simard, there is a quorum here because of us Liberals.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: I rise on the same point of order, that whenever another senator rises usually the one who is standing takes his or her seat. I think the visitors will testify that there have been 14 or 15 senators present regularly on this side, and too many times there were only four or five senators on the other side. That is their problem, if they are satisfied with having four or five to maintain a quorum. We know in the adjoining room there are a total of 18 or 20 Tory senators. We are here because the Liberals have decided to filibuster.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Let Senator Cools be heard.

Senator Simard: You people have no concern. You don't care if this place sits for 24 hours a day at an additional cost of $70,000 or $75,000 a day. Four or five of you come here and go through the exercise. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, according to the rules that four or five on the other side is not a quorum. There should be a quorum of 15.

Senator Perrault: Senator Simard needs a restraint jacket. To interrupt a senator attempting to present a petition is totally undemocratic and inconsistent with the standards of this chamber. I would ask him to please attempt to keep his emotions under control.

[Senator Cools.]

Senator Simard: Senator Perrault, I will refrain. Other people have tried before and have failed, but that is okay. I will follow your advice, if Senator Lewis will do the same.

Senator Lewis: My only point was to reply to the snide remark the Leader of the Government made when he left the chamber about how few Liberals were present. Those senators who just came in from the reading room, can they tell us what the score is in the hockey game?

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, if, for a moment, I have been sounding uncharitable or mean, I would apologize. There was an honourable senator, Senator David Walker, who sat on the other side. He was a former minister in the government of John Diefenbaker. Many of us were skinned by him, and when a new senator tried to speak he would call across the room, "New Boy!" Quite frankly, I was a little more clever than some of the boys, so he did not get a chance to call me "New Girl!" but I say to some new senators that they will get to hear a little bit of that. I want to put on the record that I am not a mean person and I am not an uncharitable person; however, there are certain things that have been done in this house. Granted, it is changing and it is changing rapidly. My point, honourable senators, was to be crystal clear that I was not trying to be mean or uncharitable. I was only reminding people on the other side that they have dosed out a lot of medicine, and that some of it is coming back to haunt them.

These particular petitioners have been very attentive to following all of the necessary probity and decorum and have chosen to use an extremely formal methodology. As I look through the names and addresses of the petitioners, I have observed that most of them are from the area of North Bay. In the interests of those senators who hail from other regions, and in the interests of providing a little balance to the rather large amount of petitions that have been presented from the other regions of Canada, I thought perhaps we could discover a little bit about the people who have presented and signed these petitions from the area of North Bay.

I took it upon myself to inquire a little bit about the area of North Bay. I am a quintessential Torontonian and, as Senator Frith described in one of his speeches, find myself frequently confined to my own region of Toronto and central Ontario. On viewing these petitions, I thought to myself that I really didn't know too much about North Bay and northern Ontario. I have never even been to North Bay. I took the trouble to look North Bay up in the Canadian Encyclopedia and I discovered the following facts.

North Bay is a small city that was incorporated around 1925. It is described as Canada's "Gateway to the North". It lies along an area where the fur trade portage connected the waters of Trout Lake and the Ottawa and Mattawa rivers with Lake Nipissing. So many of us from urban central Canada are not close to those areas, but I discovered that its development was very much a function of the railway. If Senator Sinclair were still here he would probably be able to tell us a lot more about it. Apparently, it was dependent on the arrival of the CPR around 1882. It still remains a major fur centre. It did not "boom" in the manner of many northern centres, but it also avoided the "bust". So that is not the kind of language I would traditionally use.

• (2345)

Of particular interest is that this area is populated by the largest concentration of Finnish people outside of Finland.

Let me continue with the reading of the names on this petition.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Cools: There are pages and pages to these petitions. I believe there are 150 names on these petitions.

With the indulgence of honourable senators, I should like to table these petitions in the sincere belief that honourable senators opposite will treat them with a modicum of seriousness.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Cools: After the last exchange I am not sure I should, but go ahead.

Senator Robertson: From time to time the honourable senator has made observations about communities she has not visited. I have noticed over the years that the honourable senator has been anxious to visit new communities.

Of course, the honourable senator is now familiar with the communities of Canso and Port Hawkesbury, Nova Scotia, as a result of a committee travelling to those communities last winter.

I did not notice the names of residents of Port Hawkesbury or Canso on the petitions, although I may have missed that.

The honourable senator should be aware that as the temperature and climate changes, people change. I am sure the honourable senator will be interested in knowing that this evening on a CTV television newscast a reporter interviewed many people in those communities, and without fail, the residents of those communities were practically unanimous that this Senate get on with the business before it. They said that they were fed up with the delaying tactics. They said they also wanted the Senate to get on with passing Bill C-21.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Then call an election!

Senator Cools: I said that I was prepared to enter a question, but I am not sure what the question was.

Senator Robertson: The question was: Do you have any names from Canso or Port Hawkesbury on those petitions?

Senator Cools: Perhaps I neglected to say at the outset that the petitions I was presenting were from the residents of Ontario.

Senator Olson: I have 6,000 here from citizens of Nova Scotia.

Senator Cools: Fine. Let me tell the Honourable Senator Robertson that I am flattered she thinks that I should be presenting petitions from Nova Scotia. Were they entrusted to me, I would happily do so.

Senator Simard: Are you going to go back and check?

Senator Cools: If I happen to encounter any names of citizens from Canso while perusing these petitions, I will be happy to share that with the honourable senator opposite.

Senator Robertson: The honourable senator should realize that those people want the Senate to stop this foolishness and get on and pass Bill C-21, and other legislation that is being stalled in this chamber.

Senator Cools: I really do not understand how the Honourable Senator Robertson can describe this as foolishness.

Senator Robertson: May I try to explain that to you?

Senator Cools: Certainly.

Senator Perrault: Senator Cools has the floor.

Senator Simard: Oh, come on!

Senator Cools: I would like Senator Robertson to explain why she thinks this is foolishness. Get up and tell us why this is foolishness. Let the honourable senator tell us why she thinks it is foolish for these people to have signed these petitions and presented them to us.

Senator Robertson: The honourable senator is going through this process to stall debate on the legislation. I believe honourable senators opposite are upset with a ruling the Speaker made. Is that not the bottom line?

Senator Simard: They are worried about losing their majority.

Senator Robertson: I believe it is because senators opposite have some problem with the Speaker that they are doing this. They are upset. I want Senator Cools to comment on this.

Senator Perrault: Stop filibustering and sit down.

Senator Robertson: I will sit down when I choose to, senator.

Senator Cools was a member of the committee that considered this legislation. What happened on that infamous September 24?

Senator Cools: It was Monday, September 24, 1990.

Senator Robertson: At that time every privilege of government members sitting on that committee was abused. Senator Cools never defended our rights. We sat there and listened to the chairman, and whatever he said was law. Senator Frith told the chairman: "We are the majority. What we say goes." He told us that there was no time to read the report, that the discussion had to be over by 7 o'clock.

Senator Perrault: We are tabling petitions. Let's get on with it.

Senator Robertson: Senator Cools sat there and agreed with that procedure. What does the honourable senator think a member of a committee is supposed to do when their rights are taken away? The Speaker correctly ruled that he could not rule on what had taken place at that committee meeting.

Senator Perrault: This is nothing but a filibuster.

Senator Robertson: Why were we not treated properly by the chairman of that committee?

Senator Cools: Is that Senator Robertson's response to the statement that this process we are going through is foolish?

Senator Robertson: Of course it is. We had no opportunity to defend ourselves.

Senator Perrault: Wait until the GST debate to discuss that. We are now tabling petitions.

Senator Robertson: If honourable senators opposite want to debate the GST now, put it on the floor and we will debate it. Senators opposite are contradicting themselves all over the place. If we on this side had no rights at that committee meeting, why are the Liberal senators being holier than thou—

Senator Steuart: Is this foolish?

Senator Robertson: Yes.

Senator Steuart: That is always a Tory's answer.

Senator Robertson: My rights were taken away at that committee. Don't start swearing at me. If you want to swear, leave the chamber. I have had enough of your profanity.

Senator Perrault: You are out of order.

Senator Robertson: I don't care if I am out of order or not, because what you are doing is wrong.

Senator Olson: At that committee meeting Conservative senators went on for seven hours without getting to the substance. They simply raised points of order.

Senator Perrault: You did not debate the report.

Senator Robertson: We didn't have time to read the stupid thing!

Senator Simard: Can I make a connection here?

Senator Cools: Senator Robertson was putting a question to me.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: I rise on a point of order.

Hon. Anne C. Cools: This is not a point of order. Senator Robertson asked me a question.

Senator Simard: I will take only 30 seconds.

Senator Robertson has made a good point. Senator Olson, who is always among the guilty parties, has raised an objection. September 24 was the darkest Monday in the history of the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Olson has said that we had seven hours. That report consists of 300 pages. We francophones had to read the French version, which consisted of another 300 pages. We got that at 11.30 a.m., and the meeting took place at 1.30 p.m.

[Senator Robertson.]

Let me tell honourable senators opposite that the Ottawa Citizen ran an article stating that Senator Buckwold did not care on September 24 whether we had seven hours or not. Senator Buckwold is quoted as saying that on September 11, 13 days before that meeting was held; the Liberals had made up their minds. They held a parliamentary caucus. They told Mr. Chrétien then that they were going to kill this bill. They had given Mr. Chrétien his marching orders. They said they were in charge and their recommendation was to kill Bill C-62.

The seven hours we were given was not sufficient, and we raised a point of order. The Speaker said in the Senate that because he was not at the meeting he could not rule on the matter, and we all understand that. The fact of the matter is that the decision, which was announced on September 24, had been taken on September 11.

That is why we are talking about the mockery of this process. Please put an end to it, Senator Olson. You have been around for years. They have been good years for you. You were responsible for good legislation. In 1984 Canadians said no to the Trudeau regime, and in 1988 they said no again. But, from the lips of Senator Buckwold, you decided that, regardless of the will of the Canadian voters, from the Senate you were going to try to operate as a government in exile. That is what is wrong. I have heard in interviews and read in the press that people from Canso and the general area that Senator MacEachen comes from, have said they have had enough of you. Will you ever listen to Canadians and get the message and let the elected people run this country?

Senator Graham: I wish you people would listen to Canadians and get the message.

Senator Simard: There is another person from the Trudeau regime.

Senator Graham: And I am proud of it.

Senator Simard: We have a lot of respect for all of you, and I think the Canadian people will continue to have respect for you and these institutions if you listen to the elected will, regardless of the polls or whatever the opinion of the moment is. People know that the proof will be in the pudding. When Bill C-62 is implemented, they will adjust to it and understand that it is a good thing for Canada. Perhaps it will take several months or a year or two, but the people will make up their minds.

I am sorry I took so much time, and that may not be to your liking. Senator Kirby was saying that perhaps we should delay the bill by six months or a year. According to him, the timing was not right. Senator Hébert was telling us in La Presse this morning that, as far as he was concerned, Bill C-62 could take effect in February. Perhaps another senator will say it should take effect in April. That is not the way fiscal policy is implemented and handled.

Senator Olson: What has this speech got to do with petitions?

Senator Cools: Honourable senators, what does this have to do with petitions?

Senator Simard: People have to know what the rules are. Please conform to the wishes of the elected people. Thank you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Cools: Senator Simard and Senator Robertson, I have listened to you carefully. I am still trying to understand the argument about foolishness that was made by Senator Robertson, but we can return to that. As I was listening to Senator Simard, I was taking notes for responses to the issues he was raising. I kept writing no, no, no, and, after the fourth no, I decided to stop taking notes.

I would like to say one or two things. Senator Simard and Senator Robertson are the ones who have taken us off on this little frolic away from the petitions.

Senator Simard: We tried to get you off petitions. Don't you get the message?

Senator Cools: Since you have taken us off on this frolic, I would like to say, and I am sure my colleagues will agree with me, that we don't like to hear the name of our colleague, the Chairman of the Banking Committee, maligned in any way. He is not here tonight, but I would like the record to show that our chairman, Sidney Buckwold, acted properly on September 24, 1990.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Cools: For the most part, I have remained silent on this matter because I thought this was the business of the chairman. But, honourable senators, the truth of the matter is that there was no conspiracy. All through those committee hearings, all summer long, I thought all of us had agreed that the intention of the committee was to table a report on the first day we returned, which was September 25. We agreed on that. Senator Simard, we know that you were given to terrific outbursts. You yourself said that it was hard to restrain you.

Senator Simard: I was given to what?

Senator Cools: Let me finish. Throughout the hearings, Senator Simard, you would have these outbursts on a daily basis. Sometimes we jested about them and other times hid from them. In any event, throughout that time you were urging us to speed up, telling us that the situation was urgent. Your colleague, Senator Barootes, would do the same thing. Day after day, the chairman would keep assuring you that it was his intention to present the report of the committee the first day we came back, or September 25.

I want to remind honourable senators that even when we were in Toronto—and I think Senator Robertson was there that day, but, if not, she was there that week—Minister Otto Jelinek came before us and begged us to report the bill immediately because it was so terribly urgent.

I would like to come to the date of September 24. Honourable senators, the truth of the matter is that there was no foolishness, impropriety or misconduct that day. The truth of the matter is that the government bungled again. This government is very proficient in the business of bungling. The truth of the matter is that they set out on their filibuster to delay discussing the report, and defeated themselves. That is what happened that day. Again, they bungled, as has been the practice of this government.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Cools: While we are at it, we can say that this particular government, the Prime Minister and cabinet, govern by Triple-B, which is buffoonery, bullying and blackmailing. I have given the Rt. Hon. Prime Minister the name "Bungling Brian". Honourable senators on the other side engaged in a voyage to delay the discussion of that report because they were waiting for Section 26 to be invoked, and they failed in their mission. They failed miserably.

Honourable senators, having gone off on that tangent, I would like to return to the matter of petitions.

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators—

Senator Perrault: Let her finish. Give her a chance.

Senator Cools: I would like to present these petitions.

Senator Robertson: I would like to respond to the ridiculous comments you made—

Senator Cools: I don't call you ridiculous.

Senator Robertson: —on September 24.

Senator Perrault: Make your own speech.

Senator Robertson: I shall if she wants to finish, but she can't put that garbage on the floor without having it responded to.

Senator Cools: Senator Robertson speaks a different language from myself. She speaks of "foolishness and garbage." That is not my language.

Senator Simard: This is Saturday night fever!

Senator Cools: What is Saturday night fever? Perhaps someone can tell me.

Senator Forrestall: You should not talk to anyone about languages.

Senator Cools: We are having another outburst from Senator Forrestall. I am a social worker.

Senator Forrestall: I am talking about your language.

Senator Cools: No, Senator Forrestall, I was asserting the fact that I don't use the language that Senator Robertson just used.

Senator Forrestall: Direct that comment toward your colleagues. Show some shame for them. They are shameless!

Senator Cools: You seem to be doing a good job of "shamelessness". I will let you carry on.

Senator Forrestall: I will remember the vulgarity that came from your side of the chamber in this last week.

Senator Cools: If we want to go down this road, there is a lot to be said. We talked about this for a few days.

Senator Forrestall: I guess you did.

Senator Cools: If you want us to talk about it for another few days, I am sure there are many of us who will be happy to indulge you. We saw a lot of upset that day. We thought we had moved onto the next point. We thought we had moved on from points of privilege to presentation of petitions. However, if you want us to continue, some of us will indulge you. But I would like to continue reading these petitions.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Cools: In closing, Senator Simard, I want to tell you that for a person such as myself—

Senator Simard: When you say "Senator Simard", is this just for me or can the other senators listen too?

Senator Cools: I am sure that everyone is listening, because you are. You are indicative of what is going on over there. All I have to do is to watch you. Let me say to you, Senator Simard, that with respect to this business of quoting the Ottawa Citizen that you have been engaging in for the last while, that newspaper is no authority.

Senator Simard: What is your authority, the Toronto Star?

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Senator Cools: I don't quote such authorities. As a matter of fact, I rarely quote from newspapers at all. It is not my style, and it is not Saturday night fever, whatever that may be.

I would like to continue with my petitions. I have 262 petitioners on this petition. I perused it to see that some decorum and order has been followed. This petition is attentive to things such as signatures and addresses. Some of these petitioners are asking for different things. Some are asking for specific amendments on particular things. Some are asking that the bill be rejected. I do not understand the unenlightened view that suggests we should not inform the chamber as to what it is they are asking for. In any event, this petition says that the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the honourable house to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

So this particular batch of petitions is clear as to what they are asking us to do. Again, if we look at these petitioners, we see the racial mix of the areas. That is important because, as one looks at different parts of Ontario, one sees reflected the mixes that are in Ontario. That is interesting because a lot of these names come from small towns and hamlets. I have several petitioners from St. Catharines. In the interest of those who have some love of horticulture, let me say that St. Catharines is the rose growing belt of Ontario. As a matter of fact, anyone who loves to grow roses would be better off to move to St. Catharines. This may sound somewhat sentimental, but I have several friends who have moved to St. Catharines so they could grow roses.

Continuing, I have the signatures of people from Vineland, Thorold and surrounding areas. I have another name from St. Catharines. This particular petition has 25 names on it. I will put them together and submit them. I have more names from St. Catharines, the rose belt of Ontario. Interestingly enough, these people continue to be sprinkled throughout Ontario.

I have another name from Oshawa, Ontario. Oshawa is known for its car industry, but it is also known for other reasons. It seems to me that when people live in different areas and regions, they acquire a psychological unconsciousness or what Carl Jung might have called the racial and the collective unconsciousness. They carry these things into their lives. For those who may be interested, Oshawa was tested early, in the 1840s, because cholera struck on the immigrant ships coming from Ireland. Most people did not know that, and those who did know have probably forgotten about it. Apparently, the situation was so bad that the people in the ports along the lake were faced with the terrifying problem of having dozens of dead and dying men and women deposited on the wharfs by captains who were anxious to rid themselves of the disease.

Senator Forrestall: What has that got to do with the petition?

Senator Cools: I have another factor about the background of these people. There had been some families living in Oshawa—and perhaps this explains the attitude of a lot of people there—who had suffered because of their liberal views and peace principles. Some of these families had assisted fugitives from the Mackenzie rebellion.

Continuing, there are several names of petitioners from places such as Lindsay, which is a small community that needs no explanation. It is the home of Leslie Frost.

Senator Kelleher: Who was he?

Senator Cools: He was a no-name Premier of Ontario.

Senator Kelleher: From which party?

Senator Cools: Not mine, Senator Kelleher. Continuing, there are people from Bracebridge and Gravenhurst, which was the birthplace of Dr. Norman Bethune, a famous Canadian who is unknown to most Canadians but well known to the people of China. I see names here from Burlington, which I personally have an interest in because I collect old Canadian glass and Burlington had a famous glass factory. I have names from Orillia, which is Stephen Leacock's birthplace. For those who need some levity, I looked up a work of Stephen Leacock. He too was not of my party. In one of his books called Feast of Stephen he humourously writes about the sort of processes we are going through. It says as follows:

> "There is no doubt," says one of the recent Outlines of the Sidelines of History, "that the adoption of legislative procedure marked a great forward step in the progress of government. It lent to debate an order and position before unknown; it clarified thought, and restrained the turbulence of argument by the dignity of formal address."
> Quite so. But did it? Let us see how it has worked out in some of the Meetings.

Then he proceeds to play with the points of order of various meetings.

I have another group of petitions that includes people from places like Chatham, which was one of the points on the underground railroad that brought fugitive slaves from the United States to Canada. Honourable senators, I hope I have not driven too many of you away. What I propose to do is to close by saying that this right of petition is an extremely old and important right. I see life differently from some on the other side. I think if so many people have availed themselves of this right, perhaps they should be listened to. But, as I said before, we see life in different terms. So I thank honourable senators, and I hope I have done the people justice in praying for a remedy to the GST. I hope I have been of service, and I hope I have justified my existence in a small way. Thank you, honourable senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Nancy E. Teed: Honourable Senators, I would like to correct the record and address a comment made by Senator Cools earlier this evening. When I accepted my appointment to the Senate, there was not a caveat attached as to when I could or should speak in this chamber. I would like to advise honourable senators and you, Your Honour, that I have had parliamentary experience. I have had the honour of being elected to represent people, and I have also had the shattering experience of having been defeated. I come here with some experience and knowledge. Let me assure all honourable senators that when I wish to ask questions or to speak to this chamber, I will feel quite comfortable in doing so.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (0030)

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I fully agree with the comments that have just been made. My only comment is that when someone has the floor, that right must be respected. I am sure the honourable senator will respect that right.

In the past hour or so a number of senators opposite—including Senator Kelly who is not here now—demanded that we get on to discussing Order No. 5 on the Order Paper. We would like to do that, but members on both sides of this chamber know that this is a filibuster. We must take into account that we have never had so many petitions in the history of the Senate, certainly not in the years that I have been here since 1977. Before that time I had some experience with some very contentious issues that were laid before Parliament, and even then I never saw such a volume of petitions. This indicates that Canadians are disturbed about Bill C-62 and the reason the Senate is receiving these petitions is easy to understand—we are the last resort.

Bill C-62 was passed by the House of Commons with the use of closure or time limitation. I do not know how many times it was used.

Senator Bonnell: More times than at any other time since Confederation.

Senator Olson: Yes, I have heard that closure, or some form of closure, has been used more times since the Conservatives took office than in all of Canadian history. So these disturbed citizens see us as their last resort.

I did not ask a lot of questions of the witnesses who appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking Trade and Commerce. As Senator Simard will remember, I was fairly modest in the number of questions I asked, but one question I asked over and over again, because I wanted to know the thinking of the people, was, "Do you believe the Senate should defeat this bill?" and they all said "Yes". I would then instruct them that I wanted them to be clear on what they had said. I told them that the Senate has the constitutional authority to defeat this bill and that no bill could become law unless it was passed by the Senate. I indicated to a number of people that I was aware of what the honourable member for Calgary Centre, who is now the House Leader in the Commons, and who was on television almost every day while we were cross the country, was saying—that an unelected Senate has no right to interfere with—and I think I used the term "budgetary matters," although some people call them "money bills" and others call them "financial bills"—and that Bill C-62 is a bill of that nature.

I would then ask people why they wanted the Senate to defeat Bill C-62. I am not sure how many times I asked that question but the committee staff was asked to do an analysis of certain aspects of the testimony, and they came to the conclusion that 137 different groups had said that they thought the Senate should defeat this bill.

I wondered whether there was a new interpretation of the function of the Senate in 1990 vis-a-vis what happened prior to 1867 when the Confederation of Canada was in the making. There would not have been a Confederation had there not been an agreement to provide an institution called the Senate. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick said flatly—and you can find this in the debates—that they would not join Upper and Lower Canada in Confederation unless they had some regional defense against what they knew was a larger population in Upper and Lower Canada.

In any event, Bill C-62 was passed by the House of Commons with the use of closure. They even used closure in their committee hearings. The committee chairman, Mr. Blenkarn cut off people who had made application to be heard by the committee.

Therefore, it is clear why the Senate is receiving so many petitions, it is because people feel so strongly about this bill. The petitions are not ambiguous in what they say. In part, they state:

> . . . humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax; . . .

It is completely clear what these citizens want us to do. They are sending their petitions to the Senate because the bill has already been passed by the House of Commons. If it passes here, it will be proclaimed by the government, and the government has indicated that it is determined to do that in spite of all the opposition.

Senator Simard, did you have a question?

Senator Simard: The honourable senator mentioned my name, and, in doing so, he reminded me of some of the other Senators who attended those meetings. The honourable senator seems to be very proud and unrepentant when he said that he posed only one question in committee.

Senator Olson: Not just one question, but that was my main one.

Senator Simard: You came back to that question all the time—to kill or not to kill, to reject or not to reject. Of course, he knew, in most cases, the answer he would get.

Senator Olson: In almost every case, yes.

Senator Simard: He repeatedly asked that question, and on September 11 he joined with Senator Buckwold in approving the decision to kill the bill. That was 13 days before September 24. Would it not have been wiser and more productive if he, Senator Hastings and others of their party—with the exception of Senator Marsden, who asked deeper questions, and was obviously looking for ways and suggestions to improve the bill—had been more interested in asking for suggestions on how to improve the bill rather than polling people? I suggest that his time might have been better spent in inviting possible amendments.

Senator Olson: Get to your question, please.

Senator Simard: That is my question. Your party has a new Chairman of its Economic Policy Committee, Mr. Roy MacLaren. In an article of the Financial Post of October 12, Mr. MacLaren said that as far as he was concerned it was more important that the Liberal party offer new policies and suggestions and be more positive, as opposed to just saying no.

Senator Perrault: Is this a point of order?

Senator Olson: He is supposedly asking me a question, but he never gets to it.

Senator Perrault: He is making a speech. What is the question?

Senator Simard: He said that the mood of the country is being increasingly directed towards economic issues. He went on to say the following:

> People are seized with the major economic questions—our ability to compete abroad and our ability to produce at home.
> That has to be met by any political party that's interested in winning office. I don't think any longer a few slogans and a pretty face is going to win elections.

Senator Perrault: What are we talking about here?

Senator Simard: I am setting the stage for positive debate.

Senator Perrault: That is not a question.

Senator Simard: I am offering Mr. Maclaren's comments here as words of encouragements to stop your filibustering and to begin the debate on Bill C-62. Let me close with the last paragraph of this article which I would be glad to table with the honourable senator's permission. It reads:

[Senator Olson.]

> Maclaren said the party must stop looking back to the policies of its years in power before the Mulroney Era. The party has suffered somewhat in the past year from a tendency to look backward, to relate itself to the policies of previous decades.

That is good background material which will, perhaps, enlighten Senator Olson so he can tell us why they question he asked 95 per cent of the time, as he informed us earlier, was whether the Senate should kill or not kill Bill C-62.

Senator Olson: Senator Simard has a bad habit of misinterpreting everything, and he throws in numbers once in a while. I never said that I asked that question 95 percent of the time.

Senator Simard: That is my assessment.

Senator Olson: I must say, however, that I agree somewhat with what Senator Simard has just pointed out, that not only Roy MacLaren, but all Liberals have a keen interest in the major economic issues of the country. It is highly likely that we will be expanding our membership in the House of Commons such that we will have to deal with those questions very shortly, indeed, within two or three years. The mismanagement of the economy is one of the reasons why Canadians are so disturbed today.

The other day I saw the Minister of Finance on "Canada AM". As Honourable Senators know, there is no distortion on television. I have been in politics long enough to know that it is dangerous to believe everything you read in newspapers. On television, however, there is no reporter's interpretation of what was said. You hear the comments directly. I heard the Minister of Finance say that this slowdown in the economy of Canada was a deliberate action embarked on by him and by the Bank of Canada. They deliberately set monetary policy to create the stress that we have in our country today on the basis that it had to be done to fight inflation. That is what the Minister said and he did not apologize for it. In fact, he said that we were right on track and were only three tenths of one percent out in government spending for the period he was talking about.

Of course we are concerned, and that is why the people of Canada are concerned. I have been complaining in this house every chance I get and I am rather disappointed that we have not had a Question Period because I want to ask about the intentions of this government with respect to the economic future of Canada and what it intends to do with regard to monetary policy.

Let me come back to these petitions. They include people from Millicent, Rosemary, Brooks, and Sunnynook, most of which are small towns. Brooks is fairly big with nearly 10,000 people, but the others are small towns. I was born in that area and have lived there ever since. I know these places well. Many of these good Canadian citizens will lose their homes and their farms, farms that have been in the family for three or four generations, which is a long time in that area because no one was there prior to 1908. The area was not open for homesteading prior to that time, so it is one of the younger farming areas of Canada. Families came to what was then a wilderness area, built farms, homes and communities, and all of that will be lost because of the policies of this government in trying to fight inflation in southern Ontario.

Senator Simard: Do you have the figures on the farms that were lost in 1989?

Senator Olson: No, but I can get them for you, and the Farm Credit Corporation can get them for you as well.

Senator Simard: That is because of your policies.

Senator Olson: It was not our policy. These people are frustrated because they feel that they have done nothing to contribute to inflation in Canada. Many of them did not borrow money to make purchases which would drive up inflation. I can tell you what happened as a result of the monetary policy embarked upon by the Minister of Finance and the Government of Canada: It raised farmer's costs on debt service charges by 50 or 60 percent. Some of them were paying debt service charges slightly under 10 percent when they initially borrowed the money. They cannot pay such debts off when the selling price of their product has gone down by half of what it was four or five years earlier, before this government came into office. These people cannot keep up. They are sinking.

The Farm Credit Corporation has had to take over a great number of homes. That is not to say that they are heartless, because they have tried to give the farmers and the borrowers every opportunity to pay. Some of them have been in this economic downturn for so long that they have given up. There are all kinds of farms in western Canada—more in Saskatchewan than in Alberta—where people have just walked off and left everything behind. They have left to find a job or some other means of income. That is sad. It is happening in other parts of the country as well.

As I said, these petitions come from all over southeastern Alberta. I have a whole block here from Burdett, Bow Island, and so on. Not all of these people are in the same kind of business. Southeastern Alberta probably has more land under irrigation than all of the rest of Canada put together. Major irrigation work was begun way back in 1912 when the Canadian Pacific Railway put in what was then the largest irrigation system in all of Canada. I believe that it is still pretty close to the largest one, with some 1,000,000 acres capable of irrigation. So, while the drought was a problem in parts of southeastern Alberta, it was not a problem in the irrigated areas. However, those people are now also facing difficulty. In fact, a recent news article I saw said that the people in the north of the province had had a good crop, but that they were claiming that they probably would have been better off if they had had a bad crop because the crop insurance they took out earlier in the year valued the grain at a price higher than it is today. If they had a clause in their crop insurance policies with regard to a reasonable yield, financially they would be better off if they had had a bad crop. If a famrer has an above-average yield for his district he cannot collect crop insurance. These farmers have the grain on hand in their granaries but they cannot sell it because there are insufficient sales to move large amounts of grain. Not only are there no sales, but the price is so low because of a number of factors, the main one being the subsidy war between Europe and the United States. Wheat now brings less than 50 percent in income to the farmer than it did in the mid 1970s.

Senator Simard: Are we still on the introduction of petitions?

Senator Olson: I am giving a brief explanation as to why there are so many people sending in petitions. I am only presenting petitions from a small area in Alberta; there are hundreds more from people all over Canada. Honourable senators opposite have been constantly asking why we are receiving all of these petitions, and all I am trying to do is explain. I shall not be very much longer if honourable senators have got the message. Parliament is a place to talk, discuss and persuade. Senator Simard should get to his feet and say, "I realize that Canada's economy is in a downturn and that there are people who are suffering great hardship because of that. I do not want the GST to further exacerbate the situation." I would be very happy if he were to say, "I have listened and listened well and I am now persuaded that I shall do everything I can to stop this measure."

Senator Simard: Obviously you and I have not listened to the same people, or, if we had, we did not get the same meaning from their testimony.

Senator Olson: I think I have the right impression: That honourable senators opposite will not prevail on the government to cease and desist from bringing in the provisions of Bill C-62.

Senator Simard: Are you prepared to submit amendments?

Senator Olson: We considered that.

Senator Simard: You made your decision on September 11.

Senator Olson: Senator Simard acts as if he were at the meeting.

Senator Simard: I read what Senator Buckwold said.

Senator Olson: That was a Liberal caucus meeting. Senator Simard is acting as if he heard the discussion that took place.

Senator Simard: I did not need to be there. Senator Buckwold told us in The Citizen what went on.

Senator Perrault: He did not.

Senator Olson: I am always suspicious of stories that are second and third hand, especially when they relate to politicians. I am sure that Senator Simard will understand. I could report a few things that he said in the halls outside the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee meetings in Edmonton. Does he remember those?

I wonder whether he remembers the times we had coffee. He is a nice, social person. He implored us to do whatever we could to have this bill ready for passage. The government didn't even want us to go on the road, and I can remember, morning after morning, he would come in with a new question of privilege to try to disrupt the meetings. At the end of his intervention he would say, "Let us conclude these hearings and move on as quickly as we can."

Senator Simard: When was that?

Senator Olson: It happened in St. John's, Halifax, Edmonton and, I believe, in Vancouver. I am now having some difficulty, because we acquiesced and said that we would have a report ready for the first day the Senate resumed, that being September 25. We met on September 24 to meet the commitment we had made to the government supporters on the committee.

May I be allowed to make a point here. Obviously, perhaps unintentionally, you have left out the fact that the meetings from Prince Edward Island to British Columbia took place in July.

• (0100)

We also had a few meetings at the end of August. Almost every morning we had to raise points of privilege.

Senator Olson: Yes, we did.

Senator Simard: The chairman did not call those steering committee meetings.

Senator Perrault: He is not here to defend himself. Don't attack him when he is not here.

Senator Simard: It is true that we tried to put pressure on you and your colleagues so the report would be completed for the first day of the session, which at the time we thought would be September 25. We have minutes of the last steering committee meeting in early August which state that the steering committee would be getting a first draft of the report. It was promised to us for September 11; then it was postponed until September 15. There is no record of the postponement to the 15th, but it is on the record that we would get it on the 19th.

You conveniently have left out these arrangements. We expected to have the report of the committee, proposed under the direction of Senator Buckwold, in time to read it before September 25 and be in a position to consider other alternatives.

Senator Olson: There are a few things that need to be said at this time for the benefit of people who were not on the committee. All the evidence that we heard was available to every member of the committee. The staff was doing a summary of that evidence. I did not see the so-called report or the draft of the report any earlier than you did.

Senator Perrault: That is correct.

Senator Olson: I had sorted out the evidence in my mind, and I believed that the bill was so badly flawed that it was almost impossible to make enough amendments to make it acceptable

When the committee first started this exercise, we attempted to take some of the administrative complexities out of the bill. However, when I heard the people from the south shore of Nova Scotia and the Trades and Labour Council, they convinced me that it was a discriminatory bill and that it would discriminate against the regions. When you add transportation costs to the products produced in central Canada, the farther away you are from central Canada the more tax you pay on the same item. It was no longer a substitute of the Manufacturers' Sales Tax for the GST because the calculation is done on a different basis. That is why those people on the south shore of Nova Scotia realized that they were taking on a significant additional burden of taxes and revenue that the Canadian government needs.

That is also true for western Canada. The farther away you get from the manufacturing plants, the more tax you pay. Senator Simard was not with us in Whitehorse, but there were people from Old Crow who appeared before the committee. That is not a big community, but it is an important community to the people who live there. They claimed they would be paying, on average, 158 per cent more federal tax on the same package of goods than people living in central Canada.

Senator Perrault: It is not fair.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that simply is not fair. That is an extreme case. It is slightly less in British Columbia and Alberta, because the cost of freight goes down as you travel east.

Senator Perrault: Now that the cost of gas and oil is up, it is going to be worse.

Senator Olson: That is another problem that will make this worse. It seems that we have to make a separate and new explanation every day as to why there are so many petitions coming in. I would think you would understand by now so we would not have to go through this exercise of explaining why there are hundreds and thousands of petitioners, who are making a last desperate attempt to impress on the government that they do not want this tax. It is regionally discriminatory.

I don't care if economics are going up or down, I would not bring in this kind of tax because I have sympathy for the people who will have to comply with the accounting aspect. Senator Simard knows about accounting; he knows what small businesses have to go through to look after accounts receivable and accounts payable and what the Income Tax Department requires them to do. Additionally, bookkeeping has to be done in connection with workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance. The government is putting a burden on these small business to collect the revenue in a very complicated way. Sales tax is bothersome also, but not quite as complicated.

Senator Simard: You are obviously well versed with Bill C-62. Why can't you convince the people on your side to put an end to this second phase of the filibustering—the petition stage—so that we can get on to Order No. 5. You and your colleagues have heard the testimony and read the report. We would like to have a good exchange with you. Surely an old soldier like you, a veteran politician, would know that there are times to debate something. We have to be on the right order of the day, and we are now on petitions.

You have been rather eloquent in the last twenty minutes, and I have been inclined to jump up more often in order to have an interesting debate. However, we should be on the right order of the day. Would you agree that that might be more productive?

Senator Olson: I would be glad to give you the reason for that. No matter how anxious Senator Simard is to get on with the discussion of the details of Bill C-62, I am not willing to trample on the rights of Canadian citizens to petition their Parliament. I don't think I have persuaded you that you should do what you can do to stop this tax.

Senator Simard: I don't intend to stop it. I intend to support it. Perhaps we will entertain amendments.

Senator Perrault: You are not fighting for your people.

Senator Olson: I have to continue because I believe these people have a right to prevail on the government to stop the process of implementing Bill C-62. I therefore am obliged to try to persuade you and your colleagues. If I could get eight or ten of you to support us, we could stop this bill.

Senator Simard: Senator Olson, having heard all the testimony and looking at the polls, you say that 85 per cent of Canadians are opposed. You must know why they are opposed. You might want to move a motion now so we can proceed to Order No. 5, and then you can make those points. You could echo the wishes of the petitioners and take your chance on some of the Conservatives or independents changing their minds. If you should have more votes than this side, you could meet the wishes of the people who have told you to kill the bill. Why don't you take your chances?

Senator Olson: I have been in games of chance where you take your chances, but I don't roll the dice with people's rights. I want you to feel confident that we have, as the petitioners have been asking us, explored to the limit and attempted in every way possible to comply with their wishes. Until I have done that, I do not feel we have a right to run roughshod over their rights to petition their Parliament.

When we do get to a detailed discussion of Bill C-62, which I look forward to as well, we are going to have to make approximately 120 amendments where there are profound injustices in the bill. Senator Simard told me in Halifax that we need to correct a particular section. He knows that there are flaws in the bill because of the way it went through the House of Commons.

I hope you do not force us to make every single amendment, because it will take months to do so. The Department of Finance and the Department of Revenue have thousands of people who are skilled in tax law. When the politicians look over what they have crafted, such as Bill C-62, and it is presented to the people of Canada and they say "No thanks", and they are so aroused that they send in hundreds of thousands of names dealing with what is in Bill C-62, surely the sensible thing to do is to send the whole thing back to the bureaucrats. Why should we sit here in the Senate and craft a tax law when we have these bureaucrats who are paid to do that?

It is not difficult to understand why the petitioners tell us to defeat it and send the whole thing back to the House of Commons—and ultimately to the Minister of Finance—and say, "Start over again." This is a major bill. If the government had lost this bill in the House of Commons, they would be obliged to resign. I don't think they have to resign if they lose a bill in the Senate, but they could start a new session.

I would hope that Senator Simard, Senator Doody, or Senator Murray will be able to tell us soon that they have heard enough from the petitioners-the people of Canada—expressing their ancient and undoubted right to petition the government.

Senator Simard: We have heard from the petitioners again.

Senator Olson: It says that they humbly call upon the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. I will not violate the rules by reading the petition in detail.

Senator Simard: Senator Olson, that is a serious condemnation of what your colleagues have done in the last few days, because they have read everything. I suspect they may have added a few things in their comments.

Senator Perrault: That is not fair.

Senator Simard: Are you telling me that the practice that your colleagues have used is contrary to Senate rules and you will have no part of it? If that is the case, that is good news.

Senator Olson: I hope Senator Simard is not speaking for all of his colleagues on the other side. If he is, it is a sad state of affairs that he is unable to grasp the message that we have been trying to convey to him. The brief explanations about these petitions is to try to impress upon you how profoundly these people feel with respect to Bill C-62. Apparently that is not getting through. What does it take to get through to the government? Two or three days ago I said it looks like we have a government that is immune to public opinion. That is a dangerous situation. No democracy can function if the government has no regard and no respect for public opinion. That seems to be what has happened.

In my part of the country, and in every place I travelled across Canada with the Banking. Trade and Commerce Committee, it seemed to me that a majority of the people wanted this bill stopped. That is what they told us over and over again.

The Minister of Finance says that if we do away with the Manufacturers' Sales Tax and use this as a substitute it will be good for the economy of Canada. Firstly, the people have demonstrated that they understand this is no substitute tax structure. It is a massive transfer of the tax from one group of Canadians to another. They do not want it that way, and they do not want the complexities, the bookkeeping, the accounting and the worry about compliance with the rules of Bill C-62. I hope that it will not take us many more hours to persuade some senators on the other side to agree that it is time we stopped this.

I would be satisfied to take another 12 months to work out the problems in this bill. We have to try to persuade you with these petitions, which is a very direct way of people conveying their views to the Parliament of Canada.

In conclusion, I should like to present two petitions from places in northern Alberta. I have a petition with names from Rimbey, Alberta, and Ranchview Circle in Calgary. I even have a few from Edmonton. I would like to table these petitions. It is a matter of understanding how deeply people feel and how much they resent this.

Senator Bonnell: Do you have any names from Fort McMurray?

Senator Olson: I don't have any petitions with me from Fort McMurray, but there are many from there. I understand other senators are dealing with those.

I thank you for your attention. I hope I have been able to persuade some of you to take another look at this. In southern Alberta, 90 per cent or more of the people say they do not want to be governed like this and do not want Bill C-62 implemented. I plead with you to make some adjustments. The greatest adjustment you could make is to go back to the Minister of Finance and tell him that this is not acceptable to the Canadian people. The Canadian people know that they have to pay taxes and are willing to pay taxes, but not under the complex structure proposed in Bill C-62.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable Senators, I take great pride in presenting a petition from 27 residents of Newfoundland on the subject of the proposed goods and services tax. The petition humbly prays that the Senate will prevail on the government sufficiently to stop the implementation on the proposed goods and services tax.

Senator Bonnell: It is now Sunday. Could we all pray?

Senator Lewis: You should start it.

Senator Bonnell: We have not had a prayer from the Speaker for at least three days.

Senator Lewis: I am pleased to see that there is new-found interest in the rules by the government. They seem to have great concern and interest to see that they are followed. This is quite a turn and is welcome.

In conformity with the rules, I intend to be quite brief. I will read the petitions but there are a few things I should like to say in answer to statements made not only this evening but earlier this day when I presented a petition.

On page 57 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada, it says:

A Senator may present any petition entrusted to him.

Earlier when I was presenting a petition, Senator Cogger wanted to know how the petition had come to be here and why I was presenting it. It is clear from the rules that a senator may present any petition entrusted to him. The petition is signed by people, they pass it along and the senator has a right to present it. How it actually got here, whether by courier or whether the petitioners brought it here, does not matter. I would doubt that it came by mail because if it had been entrusted to the post office, a post office run by the present government, we all know what might have happened. It might not have reached its destination.

Ten days ago I had occasion to send a cheque to someone who lives a few streets away from me in St. John's. As far as I know, it has still not arrived. If mail from my office in Ottawa is posted on a Wednesday or Thursday at the post office in the building, it is not delivered to me until the next Tuesday. Apparently the post office stops working on weekends.

Senator Bonnell: What about the House of Commons' post office?

Senator Lewis: Perhaps that is where we should post our mail, if we are allowed. I don't blame the individual workers in the post office here. It is the general operation of the post office.

Senator Bonnell: Do you mean Canada Post as a whole?

Senator Lewis: Yes.

Senator Bonnell: Is the price of stamps going to be raised from 39 cents to 40 cents?

Senator Lewis: Stamps are going to go up in price from 39 cents to 43 cents.

Before I deal with the petition, I would like to mention a point raised by Senator Murray a short while ago in the chamber. He beseeched members on this side to get on with the presentation of these petitions so we could get to the debate on Bill C-62.

• (0130)

What I find offensive is that it was government members who originally delayed debate on Bill C-62. Honourable senators will recall that it was on September 24 the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce settled on its report. On September 25, the committee chairman attempted to table it. What happened? There was a filibuster by the government members to delay the consideration of that report. Had they not done that, consideration of the report would have progressed. Now they berate the opposition for delaying consideration of the bill, and that is a bit much. The whole thing smacks of hypocrisy, along with a lot of other things that have gone on.

I feel I should get to the petition itself.

Senator Bonnell: What was the main purpose of the people signing the petition?

Senator Lewis: It is understandable why these people have signed this petition. These are people from around Newfoundland who are also consumers. I do not know if they have heard, through government progaganda, what the effect of the GST will be, what its purpose is and what the result is going to be, but they are not fools, they know they are being duped because they are the people who will pay the tax. The ultimate user and consumer will have to pay this tax. These are the people who will be affected.

Mr. Wilson estimated that this tax will bring in $18 billion. I wonder if that estimate is going to be like the other estimates he has made in the last few months. These are the people who are going to pay that $18 billion, and they are concerned.

Newfoundlanders, in particular, exist in a depressed enconomy because—apart from general matters—of the downturn in the fishery. Thirty thousand people in Newfoundland make their living off the fishery which has almost been a complete failure because of the lack of fish resources. It is quite obvious to these people that the lack of the resource is due to mismanagement of the fish stocks by the present government. They are finding out that there are a lot less fish than they were led to believe by the government. The fish stocks are just not there. The government has also allowed foreigners to overfish off our borders and that has resulted in the terrible situation in Newfoundland which will be compounded by the planned downturn in the economy. This government is almost congratulating themselves because they have achieved their planned downturn. They are pleased that they have achieved a recession. The government wants us to congratulate it. Maybe it should get the Order of Canada.

As I said, honourable senators, these people will have to pay this tax.

Senator Bonnell: The other day I read in the paper that the government has allowed the Russian fleet to fish for capelin off our coast. It seems to me that cod feed on capelin so, if the government is selling the food source, to the Russians, how can we expect the fishery to recover?

Senator Lewis: You are quite correct. That is the utter stupidity of the whole situation. Fish are predators: One species feeds on the other. The capelin are the food source of the cod. In Newfoundland, we know that the cod follow the capelin; and if we have a good capelin run in the spring, the cod are not far behind. We know we will have a good season. But now the Government of Canada is allowing the Russians to deplete the capelin stock. Thousands of tons are being taken by the Russians with the permission of the Canadian Government.

Senator Bonnell: Is it true that foreign ships are taking the resource away, and that the seals are also taking food away from the cod? How will the fishery in Newfoundland ever improve with that kind of mismanagement?

Senator Lewis: We are facing disaster down the road unless something is done. Probably the only thing that can turn the situation around would be a change of government, but that is another matter I will not get into.

Early in the evening, Senator Murray made a remark about the Mayor of St. John's being in favour of the goods and services tax. Yes, he is. The Mayor, John Murphy, is a good friend of mine and I respect him. But let me tell you something: He is in the retail business and we all know how business operates. I am sure the Deputy Leader of the Government, who is sitting over there, has a lot of experience in business and in the retail trade. He knows exactly what happens. A businessman buys goods and resells them at a mark-up. That is how business is done. Out of the mark-up, he pays his costs, and what is leftover is his profit. It is done by means of a percentage charged on all of the costs. I imagine businessmen are wringing their hands in glee.

This reminds me of the story about the old businessman who did not have much education. He owned a retail store. He attended a seminar where costs and mark-ups were the subjects of discussion. He could not understand the discussion, so he interjected and said that he did not know much about percentages, but he knew that there were a hundred cents in a dollar. He said he never made more than 1 per cent. He said that he bought for 1 and sold for 2, making 1 per cent for himself. This is what people in the retail trade will be doing. The merchants of St. John's will buy their goods in central Canada. At one time, products were manufactured in Newfoundland itself, but after the great event of Confederation, our manufacturing went by the way. We now buy everything from central Canada.

The businessman buys his products in central Canada at a certain price. The goods are then shipped to St. Johns. Then the businessman sits down and adds up the price of the goods, the costs of the freight plus the taxes. He will have to calculate the costs associated with freight, insurance, off-loading from the ship and transportation to his warehouse, unloading the goods into his warehouse and the GST. He will also have to include the rental costs of his property, which is probably owned by some big corporation in central Canada, which will have to pay GST on its rent. On top of all that, he will add his mark-up which will be increased by the cost of the GST. He then determines what price he must charge for those goods. He puts the price on the product and then the GST must be added. Who will pay for that tax? The ordinary Newfoundlander who goes into that store.

Honourable senators, these people are not fools. They have not been fooled by the government's propoganda. They know how the GST is going to affect them, and that is why they were anxious to sign these petitions. Have you ever tried to get people to sign a petition if they are not particularly interested in the proposition you want to petition against? People just do not do it. Here you have petition after petition which thousands and thousands of people have voluntarily taken the trouble to sign. There is a reason. They are concerned, and let us hope you government members will show concern for these people.

Senator Bonnell: Do you think the average businessman will fill up his store with goods in November and December so that he will be able to make a bigger profit by claiming he has paid GST on those items?

Senator Lewis: I presume so. I have not bothered myself with the actual mechanics of it, but he will be lucky if he has not paid the extra tax on those goods. I gather that businessmen will receive rebates from the government. That is probably why some of them want this to go through. Some will get windfalls, and there will probably be a lot of cheating regarding overestimations of stock on hand. Thank you for bringing up that point.

Senator Bonnell: Since most manufactured goods now come from Ontario and not Newfoundland, do you think that the savings to be had by the reduction in the manufacturers' sales tax will be passed on to the consumers of Newfoundland? Is there any guarantee of that?

Senator Lewis: There is no guarantee of that. There have been remarks about how wonderful it will be because prices will come down. That remains to be seen. I would suggest you do not hold your breath.

I have a petition from 27 residents from various places in Newfoundland. The first person named on the petition is from Windsor, a town in the center of Newfoundland. It joins the city of Grand Falls where the Abitibi pulp mill is situated. The next person on my list is from Pasadena in western Newfoundland. I recognize some of these names. There is another person from Grand Falls.

Senator Corbin: Grand Falls, Newfoundland, or Grand Falls, New Brunswick?

Senator Lewis: All of these are from Newfoundland. There is another person from Port au Bras and a number of names of people from St. John's. I have other names of people from Robert's Arm, Mount Pearl, Windsor, Grand Falls, St. John's, Botwood and Grand Falls.

Senator Bonnell: Are there falls there?

Senator Lewis: Yes. The falls are used for power for the pulp mill.

Senator Stewart: Is there a ladder for fish on the river at the falls?

Senator Lewis: I have not been there recently so I cannot say that I have seen one, but my understanding is that the salmon left the river due to the dams and power plants and that they have now installed a fish ladder and that they are restocking the river with salmon.

Senator Stewart: Is this a salmon river? I ask that question because in my part of Nova Scotia we are not allowed to fish salmon commercially. At one time, there was an active salmon fishery—Atlantic salmon of course—but that has been closed down. Licences have been bought back. The salmon that is now commercially available is either aquaculture salmon or what we call "Newfoundland salmon." The Newfoundland salmon that appears on the Nova Scotia market is considerably smaller than the salmon that were caught in the waters in the Northumberland Strait area. I wonder if the river on which Grand Falls is located is one of these Newfoundland salmon rivers.

Senator Lewis: Apparently there has been a successful restocking of the river. I imagine it will eventually become commercial or that, at least, sport fishing will be allowed.

Senator Stewart: Would the GST have any impact on the sale of that salmon?

Senator Lewis: I suppose you would have to determine whether it would be regarded as food stuffs, in which case it would be taxable. It would be taxable if it were processed.

[Senator Lewis.]

I have more names from Grand Falls and Gander. I would ask that this petition be tabled.

Honourable senators, I have another petition that I was going to present tonight, but in the absence of Senator Kelly I am not going to present it because a matter arises from it that he referred to earlier today. I would like to hold on to it until he is present in the Chamber because I would like to hear his views on what should be done about it.

Briefly, I can tell you that earlier today we had a petition which contained an address outside of Canada. In this case, there is a similar situation. It raises an interesting topic on which I am sure there will be considerable discussion and on which a decision will have to be made. If Senator Kelly were here, I would suggest that we might adjourn for a couple of hours to consider how this could be dealt with. But seeing as he is not here, I will save this petition until later. Thank you very much.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, if no one else wishes to present petitions at the moment, I have a stack of them that I would like to present.

This is a petition relative to the proposed goods and services tax. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax. This particular petition is signed by Tim McNamara, 5270 Tobin Street, Halifax: It is signed by Wanda Bowen of Rocky Bay, Richmond County, Cape Breton Island. That village is across the Chedabucto Bay from places like Queensport, Fox Island Main, and Canso. Honourable senators, I am sure, have heard more about Canso than about the other places.

Senator Cools: Senator Stewart, you are absolutely right. In fact, Senator Robertson was asking earlier whether or not we had received any petitions from Canso, so perhaps you could address that matter.

Senator Stewart: This petition is from Rocky Bay, which is across the way. It is signed also by Michael Fitzgerald of Enfield, Nova Scotia. That is very close to the City of Halifax. It is signed also by Eric MacNearny of Windsor Junction, Nova Scotia. Windsor Junction takes its name, as one might expect, from the fact that there is a railway junction there. The CNR line runs from Truro to Halifax. At Windsor Junction there is a line that goes up through to Windsor, Wolfville, Kentville and down through the Annapolis Valley to Yarmouth. That railway was operated by the Dominion Atlantic Railway, a branch railway of Canadian Pacific. I knew the railway very well, because when I was an undergraduate at Acadia University in Wolfville I often travelled back and forth to the university over it. One could go two ways. One could go down to Windsor Junction, which is near Halifax, and then by the DAR to Windsor and then on to Wolfville. Alternatively, one could detrain from the CNR at Truro and take a train that ran down through Kennetook to Windsor. Many jokes were told about that particular line. It was a very slow train. One story is that one could pick a pail of blueberries if one got off at the front of the train and got on at the back of the train. Nevertheless, it got us there.

Senator Gigantès: Was it very long or very slow?

Senator Stewart: Sometimes it was very long but it was always very slow.

The petition is signed also by Anne J. MacNearney, also of Windsor Junction; David Spears of Waverley, which is very close to Windsor Junction; Jo Ann Spears, also of Waverley; Dorothy Lutz of Halifax and then by Dora Chisholm, 41 Moirs Mills Road, Bedford. The connection there is Moirs Chocolates, and the factory was about half way up along the shore of Bedford Basin between Halifax and Bedford. It was signed also by D. Chisholm, also of Moirs Mills Road; alsy by A. Anderson of Shelburne, which is down in the southeast part of the province. At one time, after 1783, Shelburne was one of the largest towns in North America. Many of the United Empire Loyalists at the time of the American revolution, the time when the Americans broke away from the British parliamentary tradition, which we are attempting ardently to defend in this house, settled in Shelburne.

The petition was signed by Karen Nicholson of Halifax; Barry Clarke, Halifax, and Heather and Wayne Hillis of Lower Sackville. Sackville, Nova Scotia is very close to Halifax. It is easy for those who are not familiar with the area to confuse it with Sackville, New Brunswick. Sackville, New Brunswick, did not quite make it into Nova Scotia. It is just across the border in New Brunswick. Amherst is on one side of the Tantramar Marshes and Sackville, New Brunswick, is on the other side. There are many fine poems about the Tantramar Marshes. It is a staging area for birds as they migrate north in the spring and south in the fall.

Senator Gigantès: As they pass through, are they taxed?

Senator Stewart: They may well be exempt under the Migratory Birds Protection Act.

Senator Gigantès: At last, we have found something that is exempt.

Senator Stewart: Conceivably, the matter will be tried in the courts and lawyers will be enriched thereby.

Sackville, New Brunswick is the site of Mount Allison University. Mount Allison was established by the methodist denomination.

You cannot understand the post-secondary educational structure of Maritime Canada unless you realize that these institutions were founded on a denominational basis. King's College, which originally was at Windsor, Nova Scotia, is the oldest educational institution in the area.

Senator Gigantès: Does it have a school of journalism?

Senator Stewart: It does now.

Senator Gigantès: Is George Bain at that school?

Senator Stewart: Yes. I don't know his title, but he was the top person there. He may still be, because I have noticed articles in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald by him.

Senator Gigantès: I believe he has retired to a farm with his dog which, as he says in his articles, has only one testicle.

Senator Stewart: I am in no position to comment.

Senator Gigantès: Mr. Bain keeps telling me.

Senator Stewart: I go back to King's College. King's College has a very interesting history, a history that is intimately associated with Windsor, Nova Scotia and Halifax, Nova Scotia. At the time of the American revolution, there was in the City of New York an institution called King's College. Many of His Majesty's loyal subjects left the City of New York and came up, first, to Shelburne and then to other parts of Nova Scotia. They revived King's College in Nova Scotia. They claimed that, indeed, it was the true King's College and that the King's College in the City of New York was a kind of illegitimate remnant of the original college. A recent president of King's College, one Mr. John Godfrey, who is now active in publishing in the City of Toronto, went down to New York City at one time and presented himself to the President of Columbia University in the City of New York, which is the descendent of that illegitimate remnant from the original King's College, and said that he had come to take over the keys, the lands, and all the property owned by Columbia University in the City of New York. This created a list of a flap in the New York papers at the time. However, I am sorry to say that he was not successful in bringing home the bacon.

Senator Gigantès: What does bacon have to do with all this?

Senator Stewart: Perhaps I have the present Premier of Nova Scotia too much on my mind at this hour.

Senator Gigantès: Is he called Bacon?

Senator Stewart: He is called bacon. At that time Columbia University held the title to a parcel of land between Fifth and Sixth Avenues, the site of Rockefeller Centre. If Mr. Godfrey, on behalf of King's College, now in the City of Halifax, had been successful, it might have been the Canadians, not the Japanese, who would have acquired title to Rockefeller Centre. It is lamentable that he was not successful.

King's College was founded in Nova Scotia shortly after the American revolution. It was an Anglican institution. In order to take a degree there one had to take certain oaths which were offensive to persons other than those of the Anglican persuasion.

Senator Gigantès: I am sorry, sir. I am an Anglican and how could anything Anglican be offensive?

Senator Stewart: There are people who do not have what you regard as your omniscence in matters of religion.

Senator Gigantès: We are going to have discuss this at greater length.

Senator Stewart: I hope so. The other denominations, to make a long story very short, decided that they would have to make arrangements of their own. The Presbyterians in Pictou County put up their own institution called Pictou Academy and made a move toward establishing a genuine institution of post-secondary education. They soon transferred that facility to Halifax. It was endowed with money from the Castine Fund. If Senator Hicks were still with us he would tell us all about that fund. Pictou Academy became a Presbyterian institution bearing the name Dalhousie University, as we would pronounce it, but the Scots would say "Dalhoosie" University.

The Baptists decided that they should have an institution according to the true faith. In 1828 they established Horton Academy. Then, in 1839, a college now called Acadia University in Wolfville. The Irish Catholics in Halifax, not to be left behind, established St. Mary's University in Halifax, and the Scots Catholics in the eastern part of Nova Scotia founded St. Francis Xavier University. Eventually the Acadians in what we call the Clare shore founded a college at Church Point called College Sainte Anne.

The result is that we are wonderfully endowered with institutions of higher education, but it must be said that by reason of this multiplicity of institutions the kind of specialization which probably would be desirable from a financial viewpoint has not been achieved. There are those who say that these small colleges are very good, that, indeed, some of them are the best in all Canada as compared to the factories in places like Toronto with which some of our colleagues have been associated.

Senator Corbin, do you have a question?

Senator Corbin: I am very glad to hear you mention Church Point and Sainte Anne College. In fact, it was 100 years ago this year that the Eudist Fathers came to Canada.

[Translation]

—the Eudist fathers of the Congregation of Jesus and Mary. Saint Jean Eudes was the founder of this congregation. His mother's name was Marthe Corbin.

Do you see the connection?

In any case, I was in Quebec City a week ago today. The Eudists had invited former students of the Charlesbourg seminary to a reception to commemorate the hundredth anniversary of their arrival in North America.

They were forced to leave France because of decrees issued by the government of the day and fomented by the Freemasons. They had been expropriated and had come to settle here, first in St-Anne-de-la-Pointe-de-l'Église. They also founded colleges in Caraquet in New Brunswick. The college was destroyed in a fire. They rebuilt it in Bathurst. They also opened a boys' college in Edmunston. The two colleges of Bathurst and Edmunston have since become affiliated to the University of Moncton.

The Eudists also founded colleges in Quebec. L'Externat classique Saint-Jean Eudes in Limoilou, for example, was founded by the Eudists. They had a seminary in Charlesbourg just outside Quebec City. They also founded a college in Montreal.

Finally, they helped teach several generations of French-Canadian Catholics. I am a former student of theirs and I owe a great deal to the Eudists for the work they have done in North America.

The Eudists are also very active in South America. They have colleges and seminaries there. In fact, they are missionaries in South America.

So, Senator Stewart, I am sorry to have interrupted but I did not want to miss this opportunity.

[English]

Senator Stewart: I appreciate that intervention, Senator Corbin. I am sure that if Senator Comeau were here he would be more than anxious to elaborate on College Sainte Anne because before he was summoned to the Senate he was closely associated with that institution. It is a fine institution serving a very splendid group of people.

I don't speak about them from mere hearsay. My original constituency in the House of Commons was Antingonish-Guysborough. It is found in the eastern end of the mainland of Nova Scotia, and not on Cape Breton Island, Senator Haidasz. Senator Haidasz keeps insisting that I live on Cape Breton Island, but I don't. I do not qualify. Antigonish-Guysborough is at the very eastern end of Nova Scotia—Antigonish on the Gulf side facing north towards Prince Edward Island, and Guysborough, named after Sir Guy Carleton, on the Atlantic side. That constituency disappeared subsequent to the census of 1961. It disappeared effectively in the election of 1968. It was gobbled up by Cape Breton-Highlands-Canso, by an act of imperialism by Cape Bretonners, Allan MacEachen being the principal villain in this case. I was invited by the Liberal Party in a new constituency called Southwest Nova, which includes Yarmouth, Digby, Shelburne, Saulnierville, and the like, to be their candidate. I was their candidate in the election of 1968. I had a good campaign, but I was not successful. I had the second best showing in Nova Scotia. While "Trudeaumania" was sweeping most Canada, "Stanfieldmania" was sweeping Nova Scotia in the election of 1968. I went down to defeat at the hands of one Louis Comeau, who was on the short list to be a senator this year. Certainly he deserves well of the Progressive Conservative Party.

As a result of being a candidate in that election in June 1968, I came to know many of the people in the Clare area where College Sainte Anne is located. I was greatly impressed by their quality. They are a God-fearing, industrious, frugal people, and it would have been a great honour to have been able to represent them in the House of Commons. If it had been up to them alone, I would have represented them in the House of Commons. I did extremely well in the Acadian sector of the constituency. The places where I did poorly were places where the anglophones were all too numerous, and I could not prevail upon them to vote for me. They still remember their Tory roots from before the American revolution. I don't hold that against them. So I say that College Sainte Anne is a great institution serving a very fine people, a people who are probably not surpassed in Nova Scotia. There may be others who equal them, but they are certainly not surpassed.

Senator Bosa, did you have a question?

Senator Bosa: Was the honourable gentleman elected in 1963 or 1962? Also, the honourable senator referred to Senator MacEachen as the principal villain in the redistribution that became effective in 1968 and in which the honourable gentleman lost his original seat. Would he clarify?

Senator Stewart: Perhaps I will start with the second question first. Antigonish-Guysborough was one of the smallest constituencies in terms of population in all Canada. That is not to say that it was not a very demanding constituency. Anyone who has been in the House of Commons representing what I call a "warm water" constituency will know what I mean.

Senator Gigantès: What do you mean?

Senator Stewart: As a member, you have wharves, breakwaters, dredging to get done in the spring before lobster season; you have rural routes. I had two canals as part of my responsibility. There was a great deal of work, much more than done by those members who represent the people of the City of Toronto. My seatmate in the House of Commons came from the second largest constituency in all Canada in terms of population, Jimmy Walker of York Centre. At one point we compared our correspondence; my constituents outdid his ten to one.

Senator Bosa: Perhaps he was receiving a lot of phone calls.

Senator Stewart: Then we analyzed the nature of the correspondence we received. What became evident was that I had many things dealing with those who go down to the sea in ships—fishing, navigation, light houses, harbour masters, you-name-it. When we looked at his correspondence and his phone calls, he discovered that one subject predominated all others—immigration. I had virtually no immigration cases. There were a few involving Chinese cooks who were coming in to work in local restaurants, but other than that, virtually nothing.

Senator Gigantès: Are there good Chinese restaurants in Antigonish-Guysborough?

Senator Stewart: The restaurant in Antigonish is reputed to be the best Chinese restaurant in Nova Scotia.

Senator Gigantès: Is it of the Szechuan or Cantonese persuasion?

Senator Stewart: I am not in a position to say.

Senator Gigantès: Is the food spicy?

Senator Stewart: That is a matter of taste. So that was the constituency I had the honour to represent in the House of Commons. Nova Scotia was due to lose one constituency after the census of 1961, and the people who drew the new constituency lines decided that the old constituency of Inverness-Richmond, which was Senator MacEachen's constituency would, for the most part, be merged with Antigonish-Guysborough, not all of Antigonish-Guysborough, but most of it. That is what happened. Perhaps I was unfair to Senator MacEachen when I said he was the principal villain. The villains who did this were the members of the redistribution commission which had been set up in, I believe, 1965. That was when the commissioners became operative for the first time. Prior to that, redistributions had been conducted by a committee of the House of Commons. While those committees were sometimes accused of engaging in gerrymandering, there was no doubt about their knowledge of the traffic flows or, you might say, the anthropology of the areas.

In 1965 we got these new electoral boundaries. They took over in a very lordly way with maps drawn here in the City of Ottawa, and they chopped up the country with, in some cases, total disregard for the way people lived, where people bought their groceries, where they went for services such as law, medicine and the like. I do not want to sound as if I am complaining—

Senator Corbin: That is a legitimate complaint.

Senator Stewart: Yes. Marcel Lambert used to talk about the same thing having happened in Alberta.

Senator Gigantès: What do these people in Ottawa know about where to go to find a doctor in Antigonish-Guysborough?

Senator Stewart: Quite right. The point is that the constituency vanished. As a consequence of that, in 1968 I was a candidate in the new constitutency—

Senator Simard: May I ask a question?

Senator Stewart: Yes, of course.

Senator Gigantès: We would be very pleased to hear from Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: Well, I have not missed you. I see that Senator Corbin is going back to his seat. I was beginning to wonder whether Senator Gigantès, Senator Stewart and Senator Corbin were sitting in the corner as a subcommittee to discuss electoral reform. Are you holding a subcommittee meeting, or are you addressing the chamber?

Senator Stewart: It has been repeatedly announced to the entire nation, by Senator Murray, that the Liberal senators in the Senate are opposed to the GST. Yes, the Liberals in the Senate are conducting what is called a filibuster against the GST. That is what is going on, Senator Simard.

• (0230)

Senator Gigantès: His credibility is so low that they would not believe it unless he gave absolute proof. It is out of generosity towards the man's reputation that we are carrying on like this.

Senator Stewart: If Senator Simard wishes to assist us in lending verity to Senator Murray's words—

Senator Gigantès: A difficult thing to do.

Senator Stewart: If Senator Simard were to participate, it would be a great help. It would confirm our efforts.

I should like to come back to Senator Bosa's question. The other tyne of his question was this: Was I elected in 1962 or 1963? I was elected in 1962, which was very fortunate for me. It was a great experience.

Senator Marsden: And for the voters.

Senator Gigantès: For the voters, in particular.

Senator Stewart: I don't know about that, but it was a great experience to sit in the House of Commons when John George Diefenbaker was Prime Minister of Canada.

Senator Gigantès: A true patriot.

Senator Stewart: Whatever else one might say about Mr. Diefenbaker, he was indeed a true patriot and he was a great House of Commons man. In 1962-63, my seatmate in the House of Commons was none other than a hockey player by the name of Red Kelly.

Senator Bosa: He was elected in 1963.

Senator Stewart: Are you saying he was first elected in 1963?

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Senator Stewart: I believe you may be wrong.

Senator Bosa: If the honourable senator would permit me to say a few words, I recall that period very distinctly. I was the special assistant to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and Superintendent General of Indian Affairs at that time.

Senator Stewart: Who was the minister?

Senator Bosa: The minister was the Honourable Guy Favreau.

Senator Gigantès: After whom that complex in Montreal is named?

Senator Bosa: That is right.

Senator Gigantès: An unfortunate architectural piece of work. It is technically very bad.

Senator Bosa: I am in no position to pass architectural judgment.

Senator Gigantès: The brick work is bad. It has had to be redone.

Senator Bosa: I should like to assist Senator Stewart in recalling that Mr. Kelly was elected in 1963. He served for one term, and in did not seek re-election in 1965. I recall very distinctly that I participated in a conference at Memorial University in 1964 when the honourable gentleman was also present in St. John's, Newfoundland.

Senator Stewart: I stand corrected, Senator Bosa. My memory has betrayed me. As the years march on that will happen more and more frequently. My seatmate was James Walker.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Alzheimer stocks these halls.

Senator Stewart: Is he one of the new senators?

Senator Gigantès: I believe there is one on each side.

Senator Stewart: In 1962 the House of Commons was an electrifying place.

Senator Simard: Are we still on petitions, Senator Stewart?

Senator Stewart: Yes.

[Senator Marsden.]

Senator Simard: This seems like a long detour. If you say you are on petitions, I will take your word.

Senator Stewart: Senator Simard, I have here a copy of the Oxford English Dictionary, giving the meaning of the word "filibuster". I will be more than happy to send it over to you for your enlightenment.

Senator Simard: That would not be on petitions; that would be phase three of the filibuster.

Senator Gigantès: What is the origin of filibuster?

Senator Stewart: Before I answer that, I should like to do justice to Senator Bosa's question. The 1962 Parliament was an important Parliament, not only because of the rhetorical displays in the House of Commons but because it was a political crossroad.

Senator Bosa: There was a minority government.

Senator Stewart: That is correct. After the pipeline debate of 1956, by reason of fumbles by the Speaker and the use of closure by the Liberal government, the Liberals, after having been in power since 1935, fell from favour.

Senator Gigantès: That was the election of 1957.

Senator Stewart: You are quite right. In 1956 the Liberals returned with a minority. Then Mr. Diefenbaker formed a government and in 1957 he won a magnificent majority.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I have to correct Senator Stewart. Mr. Diefenbaker formed a minority government in 1957. He won 209 seats in 1958, which was a majority government.

Senator Stewart: I thank Senator Bosa. Mr. Diefenbaker was a great politician, but he has been blamed by many people—Progressive Conservatives, Liberals and New Democrats—for the failure of his government. That is quite unfair. There were many reasons why he was not able to continue to command the support of Canadians.

In the election of 1962 Canadians were scrambling for a government. They had lost confidence in the Progressive Conservatives, but they were not ready to vote for the Liberals. That experience of 1956 was still too fresh in their memories for a return to the Liberals. Nor were they prepared to vote strongly for the New Democratic Party, and the Social Credit Party was able to gather a great deal of support in certain rural parts of Quebec. It was an election such as perhaps we will see in the next two or three years.

Senator Corbin: Will the honourable senator allow a question?

Senator Stewart: Yes, but I have agreed to answer a question put by Senator Gigantès. For the sake of clarity and brevity, let me deal with his question first. What was your question?

Senator Gigantès: Senator Stewart, would you give us the origins of "gerrymander" and "filibuster"? You are an expert at such things.

Senator Stewart: The word "filibuster" seems to have had its origin with the people of the Netherlands. I will not attempt to pronounce the word, but it is spelled v-r-i-j-b-u-i-t-e-r. It was adapted to the English language, and came to prominence in the West Indies. In approximately 1884 the form "filibuster" began to be employed as the designation of certain adventurers who were active in the West Indies and central America. Then it was picked up by American politicians to describe those who defended their views vigorously against the tyranny of the majority.

We find a reference to filibusters in the U.S. Congress lasting for nine continuous calendar days. Bills were talked to death.

The word "gerrymander" has its origins in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts or, at least, a politician from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is supposed to have been the first gerrymanderer. Congressmen were engaging in drawing up new constituency boundaries, what are called new district boundaries in the United States. Congressman Gerry was a smart politician. He knew how to hive his opponents and how to concentrate his friends. The product of his labours was a strange-shaped constituency. Someone commented that it looked like a salamander; then others said that it was a gerrymander. That is the origin of that term, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: I am grateful to you for that information.

Senator Stewart: Senator Corbin, I believe I agreed to hear a question.

Senator Corbin: I wanted you to bring a precision to your definition of "filibuster" and its origin.

Senator Stewart: Senator Corbin, I am quoting from the Oxford English Dictionary, the new edition. That work is regarded as definitive. It may be that there are nuances that have not been caught in the Oxford University product, which American dictionaries would pick up. Perhaps you have some light from an American source to shed on the meaning of this word.

Senator Corbin: The origin of the word goes back to the French "flibustier". "Flibustiers" were men of the sea who interrupted navigation. It was more or less piracy.

Senator Gigantès: Filibuster has something to do with fire ships, self-sacrificing sailors that would put flammable material in their ships, attach it to an enemy ship, set their own ship on fire and try to escape in small boats.

Senator Stewart: Senator Corbin, we are not far apart because, as I look at the definition given in the Oxford English Dictionary, I find that the ultimate source is certainly Dutch. It is not clear whether the sixteenth century English form, filibutier, of which we have only one example, was taken from Dutch directly or through some foreign language. Late in the eighteenth century the French form was adopted into English and continued to be used with occasional variations of spelling until after the middle of the nineteenth century.

My definition added a subterranian layer to the provenance of the word. As I said before, in 1854 the form filibuster, which seems to have come through the Spanish, began to be employed for certain defenders of freedom in the West Indies and central America.

Senator Corbin: Which means that you are a defender of freedom, Senator Stewart.

Senator Stewart: I certainly hope so.

Senator Gigantès: You have demonstrated that, sir, with every word. Senator Simard would be happy to testify to that.

Senator Simard: You were doing very well, Senator Stewart, Senator Gigantès and Senator Corbin. I will not be a member of your committee tonight. Perhaps tomorrow I will consider the invitation.

Senator Corbin: Never wake a sleeping lion. Go back to sleep.

Senator Simard: I have not been sleeping. I have not missed a word.

Senator Stewart: I am happy to see that Senator Comeau is with us. When he has an opportunity, perhaps he will leave the Chair and help us with regard to the history of College Sainte Anne, which figured in our debate earlier this evening.

Senator Simard: He will do it after the GST bill is passed.

Senator Stewart: I am sure the GST will have a considerable impact on our institutions of post-secondary education, but I am not now in a position to spell out the damaging effect that the tax will have upon these institutions.

Senator Bosa: I have consulted two dictionaries as to the correct meaning and root of the word "filibuster". I have in my possession an Italian dictionary by Nicola Zingarelli. This is the eleventh edition. The definition of "filibuster" in the Italian dictionary gives its roots as an English expression.

In the Webster Third New International Dictionary, it says that the origin is Spanish.

Senator Stewart: Senator Bosa, that is taken into account in the Oxford English Dictionary.

Senator Bosa: I don't want to read the complete text, but it does say that it was used by the Communist Party in Italy to obstruct the adoption of a new Italian electoral law. It is interesting to see the connection.

The Italian dictionary does not admit that it has Italian roots. It attributes this expression to the English language, whereas the English dictionary states that it is a Spanish expression used by the Italians.

Senator Stewart: I would prefer to rely upon the Oxford English Dictionary rather than the Webster Dictionary.

Senator Gigantès: That is linguistic imperialism.

Senator Stewart: I am sure that the Webster people try to tell the truth as far as they can see it, but the people at Oxford University Press are good at preparing dictionaries on the English language.

Honourable Senators, I have here a petition relative to the proposed goods and services tax. The undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax. This petition is signed by many people, one person being from Newellton, Nova Scotia. Newellton is in Shelburne County. If I am not mistaken, the ancestors of Stanley Knowles, sometime an M.P., came from the Newellton area in Shelburne County. His ancestors left there, and he was born in Chicago. That may explain why he carried a strong Republican flavour into his discussion of Canadian constitutional matters. Newellton, Nova Scotia, is a fishing community of considerable importance.

This petition is signed also by someone from Barrington Passage. Barrington Passage is the narrow strait which separates the mainland of Nova Scotia from Cape Sable Island. This is not to be confused with Sable Island, which is far out at sea and is part of the constituency of Halifax. Cape Sable Island is part of the constituency of southwest Nova Scotia. Senator Comeau could tell you about this much better than I could. Barrington Passage is not deep. There is a causeway going across to the island.

Another signatory on the petition is from Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, which is opposite Halifax. There is a signatory with the last name of Buchanan.

Senator Haidasz: Is that any relation to Senator Buchanan?

Senator Stewart: I have no evidence on that point. Certainly Frank Buchanan's views are similar to those of Senator Buchanan, as expressed in his address at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, approximately one year ago. It is not inconceivable that there is a familial relationship there. Certainly Frank Buchanan's views on the GST are very sound, as were Senator Buchanan's when he spoke on this topic a year ago.

Another signatory is from west Chezzetcook. The Chezzetcooks are along the eastern shore, travelling east from Halifax in the direction of Canso. It is a splendid area. It is one of the areas of the province of Nova Scotia which retains its original 19th century charm. There are many beautiful parts of Nova Scotia, but if you want to experience the quality of the good old life in Nova Scotia, drive the eastern shore road. It is called the Marine Drive.

Senator Marsden: Senator Stewart, what were the charms of the 19th century?

Senator Stewart: One of the qualities of life was that people were not harassed by income taxes.

Senator Marsden: Or sales tax.

Senator Stewart: They did not have to pay provincial sales tax. Even though life was simple, it was probably very happy.

Senator Marsden: Were their petitions heard in Parliament?

Senator Stewart: Yes, petitions were heard in Parliament. They did have some complaints. I don't say that the people of west Chezzetcook were involved.

The presentation of petitions in Parliament was an important part of public life, particularly in the 19th century in Canada. Early in the 20th century—that is to say from about 1906 forward—there were not many presentation of petitions until recent times. In the late 19th century and the first few years of the 20th century it was common for loyal subjects to pray that Parliament would hear them on topics of importance to them. There were two great surges of petitioning to the House of Commons, which went on for years. The first topic was temperance, and there was a storm of petitions that went on for years.

Senator Gigantès: In favour or against?

Senator Stewart: In favour of temperance. That was in the 1870s and 1880s, which ties in with the development of Canadian Constitutional law, the local option case which took place in the 1890s.

Senator Marsden: West Toronto is still dry by reason of local option.

Senator Gigantès: West Toronto?

Senator Marsden: Not all of it.

Senator Gigantès: I studied in Toronto so I know all about it.

Senator Stewart: The second great topic of petitions had to do with railways. They were petitioning for the provision of cow catchers on railway locomotives and for other protective equipment along railways. This went on for years until about 1905. After 1905, the use of petitions died away. It is wonderful to read the Confederation debates and see how smug the Fathers of Confederation were. They boast about how definitive the line was between matters on which the Parliament of Canada could legislate under section 91 of the British North America Act and topics on which the provincial legislators had exclusive jurisdiction under section 92. They spent far less time agonizing over this line as compared with the composition of the Senate and the topic of the proposed clause 26. Much more attention was given to the Senate than to sections 91 and 92.

Senator Bosa is a great scholar in the Italian language and he knows all about Fortuna. Machiavelli tells us about Fortuna and how she intervenes to put aside the well-laid plans of constitutional legislators and other statesmen. It soon emerged that sections 91 and 92 were not as distinct as the Confederation fathers had thought. Predictably, the government of the Province of Ontario began to argue that under section 92 it had jurisdiction over traffic in alcoholic liquors or what would be called "ardent spirits." On the one hand the federal government contended that it came under the trade power, or, if not under that, under "peace, order and good government." Ontario argued that it came under section 92. So it went.

● (0300)

There was much litigation with respect to the control of traffic in ardent spirits in the 1880s and 1890s. Much of the jurisprudence on the interpretation of sections 91 and 92 was worked out in this spirited area.

The second topic of litigation which showed how Fortuna derailed the intentions of the fathers had to do with navigable waters. The activity which brought on the litigation related to floating sawlogs down streams. The Government of Ontario insisted that it had exclusive jurisdiction, whereas John A. Macdonald, as he then was, contended that it came under federal jurisdiction. There was much litigation. Again, it was in dealing with these specific and, some would say, relatively minor topics that the groundwork for the interpretation of sections 91 and 92 was worked out.

One should never underestimate the importance of the temperance movement in the political history of this country, both with regard to its constitutional development and its politics. For instance, the influence of the temperance movement on the political history of the Province of Manitoba is important; and if Senator Roblin were here, he would explain how his ancestors were involved in that struggle.

There was excessive consumption of alcohol in western Canada. It was a different problem from what you would have found in Nova Scotia. In the west there was a large number of relatively young men who were away from home in construction camps. They were away from their sweethearts, wives and families. In this situation excessive drinking was common. After a time, women of the west rose up to put an end to the liquor traffic, or at least to moderate it. It was their desire—and I think Senator Marsden would agree—to influence the laws of the land that led many women to become interested in getting the vote. They figured that, if the liquor trade was ever to be brought under control, the women would have to get the vote because they could not rely on the men to do it. I see Senator Marsden confirming my view.

Senator Gigantès: But they did not control the dreadful drug. They got the vote.

Senator Stewart: They did for a time, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: Then they restored it and now there is a lot of drinking among young women.

Senator Stewart: Let us not be anachronistic. We are talking about a problem of a specific period. I think it is fair to say that as a result of the enfranchisement of women there were considerable improvements in the law of the land regarding the consumption of alcohol.

Senator Bosa: But they themselves started drinking.

Senator Stewart: But that was in a later period and as a result of new social problems.

Senator Bosa: Drinking is always a consequence of some kind of economic or social situation.

Senator Marsden: Like the GST.

Senator Corbin: How do you explain Sir John A. Macdonald?

Senator Stewart: Let us not go into that. Sir John A. Macdonald had difficult family problems. The pressure of public life and not having a satisfactory family life caused him to retreat into the use of alcohol.

Senator Bosa: Would Senator Stewart elaborate on sections 91 and 92 and why the Fathers of Confederation were not more specific with respect to jurisdiction, but allowed these grey areas to remain which became areas of contention between the provinces and the federal government? Senator Stewart has given us a couple of examples, but he has not given us the reasons why this inadequate clause in the Constitution did not foresee these events. Senator Stewart also mentioned that the Fathers of Confederation spent 11 days establishing the Parliament of Canada. Why did they spend six days devising a Senate?

Senator Stewart: Those are two big questions, and if we are to have a filibuster against the GST—which Senator Murray says we are conducting—then these are topics that we can talk about as well as any other.

Senator Bosa, I think it is fair to say that the Fathers of Confederation thought that you could draw a clear line between what were topics of general importance on the one hand and matters of local and private interest on the other. If you look at the discussion as to the cost of the legislatures, you will see what they had in mind as the business of Parliament in contrast to that of the provincial legislatures.

One of the complaints against the Confederation scheme was that there would be a multiplicity of legislatures, but it was George Brown who asked politicians not to be misled. He agreed that there surely was going to be a multiplication of legislatures in the case of Canada—and I speak here of the old province of Canada, not the proposed Dominion of Canada. There would be three legislatures instead of one. There would be the Parliament of Canada, located here in Ottawa; there would be a provincial legislature in Toronto; and there would be a provincial legislature in Quebec City. Mr. Brown said not to be misled by this multiplication of legislatures because what would happen would be that many of the bills, those of a local and private nature, would be taken away from the Parliament of Canada and taken up by the people in their local legislatures who would know exactly what they were dealing with.

Senator Bosa, if you look at the experience of the Parliament of Canada in the years after 1867 you will find that what Brown anticipated, to a large extent, came true. You will find that the sessions of the Parliament of Canada were very short, comprising a few weeks or a couple of months, because they were only dealing with general matters. Matters of a local and private nature had gone off to Quebec City and Toronto. I think that is the distinction they had in mind.

What happened was that life became more complicated. Pressure was put on both the provincial legislatures and the federal parliament to deal with the liquor trade, the regulation of navigable waters and the like. Gradually what had seemed to be a simple distinction became very complicated.

But there was something else. Why was it that the jurisdiction went the way it did? Why was it that a provincial rights' views became dominant? There are many explanations for that, Senator Bosa. One of them is that the law lords, the members of the judicial committee of the Privy Council in Westminster, regarded the provincial legislatures as private persons. There is a rubric of legal interpretation which says that you do not deprive the ordinary person of his or her rights unless the statute is explicit. Where there was a doubt that could be interpreted in favour of the provinces, some law lords were inclined to interpret the British North America Act in favour of the provincial governments. That is one of the lines of explanation. There are several others.

Senator Bosa: But there was the residue.

Senator Stewart: Two areas in sections 91 and 92 came to be interpreted. First, there were the enumerated heads under sections 91 and 92. They seem to collide on matters such as property and civil rights in the province in the case of section 92 and the trade clause in section 91. Second, there was the clause to which you now refer, namely, the "peace, order and good government clause" and the way that is to be interpreted in relation to the generality of matters of a local and private nature in the province, which is the final provision in section 92. Those two areas had to be sorted out.

I would now like to address your question with respect to why so much time was spent on the composition of the Senate. This is a topic in which we are all very interested these days. If you go back to the Confederation debates and read particularly the notable address given by John A. Macdonald in 1865, you will notice an interesting transition. He starts out by explaining how responsible government was going to work in the new dominion. By "responsible government" John A. Macdonald meant something very specific. He meant that the executive government would be responsible to Parliament. He did not bring in that layman's notion that, in turn, Parliament would be responsible to the people because he was far too smart to accept that nonsense. For example, he knew that a Prime Minister who has no intention of running again and, indeed, many members of an elected body who have no intention of running again have no great sense of responsibility to the people. This could be said of Prime Minister Trudeau after the election of 1980 when he knew he was not going to run again. This notion that responsible government is a two-phase concept is nonsense. It is a one-phase concept, namely, if the executive government is to remain in office, it has to continue to enjoy the confidence of the elected representatives of the people.

That principle was to be incorporated in the working constitution of the new dominion or the "kingdom," as they sometimes called it in 1865. It is also true that they accepted that the House of Commons would be elected on the basis of representation by population. Of course that meant that Ontario would dominate the House of Commons. In that period the population of Ontario was burgeoning. It had greatly exceeded the population of Canada east, or what is now Quebec.

Initially, back in 1841, when the union of Upper and Lower Canada took place, Quebec had had the bigger population, yet each of the two parts was given the same number of members in the assembly and in the legislative council. That was fine for the people west of the Ottawa River as long as their population was smaller than that of Canada east. But, as the years went by, the population west of the Ottawa River grew rapidly, and they began to think the system was unfair. They came to demand "rep. by pop." so that democracy would prevail. The good people west of the Ottawa River, being more numerous, would then be able to control the politics of the entire province of Canada. That is the origin of the great zeal for "rep. by pop."

At the Confederation conferences some representatives from the province of Canada pressed for responsible government and representation by population in the new Constitution. Some of them actually thought that it would be fine to have a uni-cameral legislature with "rep. by pop." and responsible government. But, as George Brown said, if they had persisted in that position, there would have been no possibility of a new dominion. It had to be modified. Consequently, the federal principle was introduced, which found its expression in the Senate of Canada where the new province, Quebec, was to be equal to Ontario, notwithstanding that the population of Ontario was already larger and growing rapidly. The lower provinces, as John A. Macdonald liked to call New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, as a division, would have equal representation in the Senate with Ontario.

Senator Bosa: There were two provinces. The three divisions were Upper Canada, which was Ontario, Lower Canada, which was Quebec, and New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Senator Stewart: Initially, yes, but they anticipated that Prince Edward Island would join. Indeed, when it did join in 1873, it was assigned four of the 24 senators given to the maritime division. That is why we have the Senate.

Senator Bosa you have heard me on this topic before. It is misleading to think that the Senate of Canada is a kind of North American version of the House of Lords. The House of Lords may be a commendable body now but there was a period when it was scoffed at as being not the peerage, but the beerage. That age is gone. It is now a respectable body, and I understand from recent works that it does indispensable work in the legislative process. Certainly, the Senate of Canada was not modeled to a great extent on the House of Lords. It was intended to be a second chamber of a federation. It is for that reason that the powers of this house are comparable to those of the House of Commons, insofar as legislation is concerned, in almost every way—the only distinction being that bills that impose taxes and appropriate money must originate in the House of Commons.

We understand why the word "originate" is used. They are not introduced. They arise from a committee of the house. Anyone who is familiar with the House of Commons knows the process by which bills to spend money originate from the work of the supply committees and bills to impose taxes originate from ways and means motions.

I hope, Senator Bosa, that that deals with your question.

Senator Bosa: I have one further question. Did the conference of the Fathers of Confederation that led to the establishment of Canada take place in 1864 in Charlottetown?

Senator Stewart: It took place in Charlottetown and in Quebec City.

Senator Forrestall: And in Halifax.

Senator Stewart: They paid a visit to Halifax.

Senator Forrestall: They were in Halifax first and then went to Charlottetown.

Senator Stewart: Great tales are told about the conference in Charlottetown. Much ardent spirit, to use a term employed earlier, was consumed there along with much champagne. Halifax, too, was a very cosmopolitan city then as it is now. I hope my explanation suffices on that point, Senator Bosa.

Senator Bosa: I think that the honourable gentleman gave us a laconic explanation of what led to the establishment of the Senate of Canada and the purpose behind it.

Senator Stewart: I accept the implied criticism; the next time I shall bring my documents.

Senator Bosa: It is praise, not criticism.

Senator Stewart: I misunderstood. In any event, the next time I shall bring my documents and cite cases.

Senator Corbin: He did not use the word "laconic" in the same way as the Speaker used the word.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, now to the business at hand. The first petition says that the loyal subjects humbly call upon and pray Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax. We have signatures from places such as New Glasgow and Westville. Those places are in the county of Pictou, which is immediately northwest of Antigonish county. During World War I more munitions were produced in Pictou country than in any other comparable area in the British empire outside Great Britain itself. There is a long tradition of work in metallurgical industries there, a tradition which goes back to the early part of the nineteenth century. It is fair to say that the people of Pictou country are largely of Scottish origin, as are most of the people in Antigonish county.

When the settlers came to the northeastern part of Nova Scotia the land was taken up along very sensible lines. Religion was very important in those days, and to avoid duplication they sent Scottish highland Roman Catholics down into Antigonish County. The Presbyterian Scots took up land in Pictou County. That meant that you would have communities in both counties where one church would serve all the people and in which there was no problem with schooling. It was a reasonable arrangement. Each of these counties continues to have its distinct traditions, even to this day. They get on very well but there are notable differences.

Pictou County has always contributed to the economy of Canada and to the public life of Canada far more than its population would lead anyone to expect. The names of people from Pictou County who have contributed to law, to medicine, to geology, to public life and to the enrichment of this country in many other ways would fill a volume. It is a wonderful county, no doubt about it. We have two petitioners from that county.

Honourable senators, I have many petitions here, and I look forward to presenting them all to you, but not now, because I know that there are other senators who are impatient to perform their democratic duty.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Stewart, on behalf of all honourable senators, I truly have learned more about this country and its constitutional history from you than from all of the books I have read until now, and I am most grateful to you, sir.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: Honourable Senators, I have here a petition signed by 172 residents of Victoriaville.

In contrast with Senator Stewart's brilliant speech, I will make do with reading out the names of citizens from Victoriaville, a small, very typical Quebec town.

They read like a poem. These are old French names. Since they are all from Victoriaville, I will save time by not reading out their addresses. I will just read out their names and you will see that it is like a song, it is like music.

You will notice that there are always a lot of Jean-Baptistes in Quebec, because as everyone knows, he is the patron saint of French-Canadians.

I would just like to point out that the name Jeanne d'Arc always suprises the French. Although she is a French heroine, Jeanne d'Arc is not a given name in France. In fact, her real name was Jeanne, who lived in Arc.

There was an actress in Quebec who was very popular at one time—I think that she is still with us—and her name was Jeanne d'Arc Charlebois. Because of her success, she was invited to Paris to give shows. Obviously, in Paris, she was told that it was unthinkable that someone could be called Jeanne d'Arc «Charles» «bois» (think of King Charles VII who was burned at the stake). Jeanne d'Arc Charlebois was a bit much, so eventually she had to change her name to «Jeanne d'Arbois».

Our pages are getting a little tired, but when they come by I will ask them to take the list of all these good people of Victoriaville who have asked us senators to stop the GST.

The people of Woburn in Quebec are asking us to do the same thing. I believe this is a little village in the Eastern Townships, but I am not quite sure. This is the sort of name that you find in the Eastern Townships.

I will read out their names, again, because they are very musical, but I will leave out the addresses this time.

Here is a list from Desbiens. This list follows the one that I began to read to you a few days ago.

We are in a completely different part of Quebec now. This is the Lac St-Jean region. These people are from Desbiens. It is like a kind of poem. I will come to the addresses in a minute but I think it is lovely to hear the names that sound like a song. It is really lovely.

I have another list here signed by 101 citizens from the region of Ormstown in Quebec. It must be in the Eastern Townships too, unless I am mistaken. I will read you the names without the addresses to finish off this morning's poetry.

It must be in the Eastern Townships because I see that it is an anglophone area; so now we have heard from Ormstown!

Coaticook is also in the Eastern Townships, in the Wellington region, which I am honored to represent here. As you know, senators from Quebec represent a specific senatorial district and mine is Wellington, the capital of which I might add is Sherbrooke. Coaticook is one of the towns in the region. Even the names of the streets are lovely!

Now we come to Coaticook.

These are small regional municipalities. La Patrie is the name of a municipality in the Eastern Townships.

Now, we come to Worburn.

Gérin-Lajoie is obviously a street name given in honor of Paul Gérin-Lajoie, who is still with us and who played a very important role as you know in reforming the education system in Quebec. He was the first Minister of Education that we had in Quebec under the Jean Lesage government.

Paul Gérin-Lajoie got education reform off the ground in Quebec.

Senator Corbin: Senator Hébert, may I ask a question?

Senator Hébert: Yes, please do. I do not know whether I will be able to answer, as your questions are always a little intellectual.

Senator Corbin: It is not an intellectual question. It is because of my ignorance that I am asking you this question.

Why was there no department of education in Quebec before Paul Gérin-Lajoie became minister? I am from New Brunswick, and there has always been a department of education in that province.

Senator Hébert: It was because of opposition from the Church. In Quebec, education at all levels was controlled by the Church, which obviously was in no hurry to give up its jurisdiction to civil authorities.

Furthermore, with all due respect to his memory, I think Jean Lesage declared either before or after his election that there would never be a department of education in his lifetime. At that time he also said something that was to follow him to the grave: "We are the quiet holders of the truth".

He said that about the problem of education in Quebec. He was an intelligent man and he soon realized that education reform would have to take place in Quebec. I must point out that this reform cost us quite dearly. There were advantages and disadvantages to it. That is how Paul Gérin-Lajoie entered the Cabinet and became our first Minister of Education.

Senator Corbin: Senator Hébert, could I ask you another question?

● (0330)

Senator Hébert: Yes, but there are all these people from Coaticook who would like to have their names heard in this Chamber.

Senator Corbin: But you have been reading out names since 3:37 a.m. and it is now 4:00 a.m. You have been reading out the names of people from the region of Coaticook without a break.

It is as if the whole region is against the GST. That might be going too far, but from what you are telling us, almost the entire population is dead set against the GST. That is in Quebec, actually in Quebec.

Senator Hébert: I do not think Quebeckers feel any different from the rest of Canadians about the GST.

We have unanimity in Canada on this topic.

Senator Corbin: Journalists seem to be saying the opposite. They think it is ridiculous for the Senate to be blocking the GST. Yet Canadians who have spoken to us are telling us a story which is quite different from what we read in the newspapers and in editorials.

Who is telling the truth in Quebec?

Senator Hébert: We often talk about the silent majority. I think this is a good example of how journalists can be wrong.

When we speak of "journalists", we mean editorialists and those in charge of the economic sections, etc.

Ordinary Canadians, I can assure you . . . I was not here yesterday, but I think my colleague Senator Fairbairn mentioned the meeting we had yesterday at noon.

We met with representatives from all the provinces and Quebec was represented.

The Canadian Labour Congress, which represents millions of workers, was there. The Quebec Teachers' Council was there. I am not sure if that is the exact name, as I jotted it down quickly. The committee for Policy Alternatives was also present. We had the Public Service Union, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, the Ecumenical Commission on Social Justice, the Canadian Federation of Teachers and the CNTU.

All these organizations, which represent millions of Canadians, met with us, as you know, yesterday at noon, to tell us that they are behind us, that they support us and that they want us to continue our fight against the GST.

Obviously, there is a minority of business people, richer Canadians, multinationals, and consequently editorialists from some of our newspapers who continue to claim that the GST will be good for Quebeckers.

I do not think that has anyone convinced.

I have not met any Quebeckers who are in favour of the GST, except of course for some Quebeckers who have just arrived on the other side of this Chamber. In everyday life, when I walk in the street, when I go into shops and when I meet friends, I have not met anyone over the last few months who has said that we are wrong to be fighting the GST.

On the contrary, I have received a lot of support from all circles in Quebec. People are saying: "Keep it up, we are counting on you".

So, I was speaking to you when Senator Corbin interrupted me to ask me a question that was very much to the point.

In Quebec it sometimes seems that people do not feel the same way about the GST. Rest assured, this is a case where there is unanimity and where Quebeckers are as up in arms about the GST as Canadians in the other provinces.

I think I was reading you the poem that I began earlier.

I had stopped at Gérin-Lajoie Street. That is where we strayed from the point a little.

Florence Patenaude, 20 Chartier Street, Coaticook.

And the name "Patenaude" is an interesting one, a name that is very common, or at least quite common in Quebec. The name comes from pater noster.

In the Middle Ages, people used to make rosaries. I cannot remember what these people were called, but the name comes from pater noster, and although the craft has virtually disappeared over the years, the name survives, transformed into Patenaude.

We wonder if, as Senator Corbin asked earlier, there are any people in Coaticook who are for the GST. This must be one of the revelations that Senator Simard has in store for us. He must be secretly stockpiling the petitions supporting the GST which we are not receiving.

But then why would they send them to us when they know that we are against it! So they send them all to Senator Simard. Any day now he is going to come into the Senate and table thousands and thousands of them!

As I mentioned earlier, some say that Quebeckers are not as keen on supporting the senators. This is not true. In my opinion, the opposite is true. I talked about the letters that have been addressed to me. A few days ago Mr. Brian Mulroney received a letter from Quebec. The letter is dated October 12 and it is from the Conseil provincial du Québec des métiers de la construction. This association represents a great many people in the construction industry; and they are Quebeckers. This is what they had to say to the Prime Minister:

> Mr. Prime Minister:
> Our organization, the Conseil provincial du Québec des métiers de la construction (international), which represents over 45,000 workers in the construction industry . . .

Now, that is a lot of people!

> . . . hereby expresses its profound disagreement with the proposed passage of the bill to introduce the goods and services tax. According to our specialists' information, this tax will have a disastrous effect on the construction industry, especially in Quebec.

I hope that my colleagues in Quebec are listening to this. I hope that they have not gotten into the Conservative habit of not listening when people speak.

> It would seem, according to our advisers' projections, that the cost of a home assessed at $100,000 will increase by $2,200. To this cost must be added the high interest rates that Canadians are presently enduring. In our opinion, this new tax will certainly not help to revitalize the construction industry. Furthermore, we believe that this new tax will create a heavy burden for people in the middle class as well as for those in our society who are less well-off.
> We therefore ask that you withdraw this bill.
> Yours sincerely . . .

And so on and so forth. I do not know whether or not the Prime Minister has acceded to their request. In any case, there is nothing at the moment that would allow us to believe that he has done so.

So I do not think there is any reason to be concerned. There are as many Quebeckers, proportionately, as there are other Canadians who are against the GST. They support us wholeheartedly.

I believe that one of my colleagues—Senator Haidasz?—has a few petitions. I could go on; I may have as many as 100,000.

Senator Haidasz: Do continue.

Senator Hébert: Very well, I shall. Are there any others?

Senator Gigantès: If you feel tired, I can take your place!

Senator Hébert: Me? Tired?!

Here is a petition signed by 342 people from the region around Rouyn-Noranda, people from Abitibi, which is yet another interesting and beautiful region, a pioneer region.

Senator Gigantès: That is true, it takes courage to live there!

Senator Hébert: These are people who have come from all over Quebec.

When I was reading the list of names of people from Victoriaville, I said that there was every reason to believe that these families had lived in that town for a very long time, for 100 years or more. On the other hand, in regions such as Lac St-Jean or Abitibi people have come there from elsewhere. From all over Quebec. So they have the pioneering spirit.

They may have, therefore, fewer groups of similar names than did the people listed in the petition I read earlier. Still, it makes for a pretty poem, as you are going to see!

I think that it is quite obvious that all the people living on Des Pionniers street are against the GST. that is the impression one gets. It seems that everyone living on that street, from one end to the other, has signed.

Senator Corbin: We do not accept children?

Senator Hébert: No, they are all adults with very business-like handwriting.

Senator Grimard: Honourable senators, I might be able to help. I have been living in Rouyn-Noranda for the past 41 years.

So, if you need any explanations . . .

Senator Hébert: Would you like to read the petition yourself?

Senator Grimard: You do not have many names. Rouyn-Noranda has a population of 35,000, so I hope you have several thousand signatures.

All this is of interest to me. And, as concerns place names, if you need any information just ask me and I will give it to you.

Senator Gigantès: How very kind! And how splendidly generous!

Senator Grimard: Thank you.

• (0400)

Senator Hébert: From now on, I will consult with you every time . . .

Senator Haidasz: May I ask you if this region was part of a riding represented in the House of Commons by Mr. Réal Caouette, the leader of the Social Credit Party?

Senator Hébert: We will ask our colleague from the region.

Senator Grimard: To ask that question is to answer it. Everyone knows that Réal Caouette did represent what is called the riding of Témiscamingue. There is no federal riding of Rouyn-Noranda.

Réal Caouette was, then, the member for the riding of Témiscamingue—a riding that includes Rouyn-Noranda and the region that is called Témiscamingue, south of Rouyn-Noranda.

Senator Hébert: That explains why so many people in the region are against unfair taxes. As the senator said, Réal Caouette did not like unfair taxes much.

Senator Corbin: Senator Hébert, are these people who voted Conservative in the last election?

Senator Hébert: I really could not say, but in any case . . .

Senator Gigantès: Did they vote Conservative in the last election, Senator Grimard?

Senator Grimard: I am sorry, but I did not understand your question.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Grimard, I asked you if these people whose names Senator Hébert is reading voted Conservative in the last election?

Senator Grimard: It is quite possible they did because we have the honour of being represented by a Conservative member, Mr. Gabriel Desjardins. It is quite possible. But it is not necessarily the case, because there certainly are people who voted against Mr. Desjardins.

But I am not impressed with your list. If you can reel off thousands of names, I will be. In Rouyn-Noranda alone, there is a population of 350,000. When you began to read your petitions, you said that you had 4,000 names from all over the province; well you certainly do not have 4,000 names from Rouyn-Noranda.

Senator Hébert: Do not worry, we will give you as many as you want. Do not worry. I cannot put them all here. My desk is so cluttered that I can barely use it. I have more up in my office; and other senators have more.

Senator Gigantès: One of the senator's assistants—poor fellow—is up to his neck in letters. It is a bit awkward, because we do not know where to put them. But, as he is a rather unpleasant young man, I think that he deserves it.

Senator Hébert: So, we were reading a list of people who may have voted for the Conservative Party who will never do so again.

• (0430)

[English]

Senator Stewart: Will you permit a question for clarification? You say that, possibly, some of those people voted Conservative.

Senator Hébert: I do not know.

Senator Stewart: You say that, possibly, they may have, but that surely they will never do so again. Is it not true that the Prime Minister has said that in the 1988 election the present government received a mandate from the people to bring in the GST? Forty-three per cent of the electorate voted for the Mulroney government.

Senator Hébert: A big majority.

Senator Stewart: It would follow then that 43 per cent of the people are in favour of the GST. If they are not, it would seem there must have been some misunderstanding.

Do you not think we should ask the people who voted Progressive Conservative, the 43 per cent—forget the rest because they did not vote for the Mulroney government—if indeed, it is true, as Mulroney says, that when they marked their ballots in 1988 they were voting in favour of the GST?

Senator Balfour: You want an election on the election?

Senator Gigantès: That would not be a bad idea.

Senator Stewart: Well, no, senator, I don't know how one would do that. I am simply questioning the validity of the proposition that when people voted for the Progressive Conservative Party in 1988, (a) they were voting for the Meech Lake Accord and (b) they were voting for the GST.

My guess is that a lot of people who voted Progressive Conservative in 1988, perhaps because they were in favour of the Free Trade Agreement, did not know and that they were voting for the Meech Lake Accord or for the GST. That is my only point, Senator Balfour.

Senator Haidasz: Let us clarify the situation and have an election on the GST.

Senator Gigantès: I would like to know: Why do you suppose, Senator Hébert, that the honourable members opposite do not have stacks of petitions from people who want the GST and who are saying, "We beg you, get this tax through?" I am thinking of people who are not big tycoons and their paid lobbyists like D'Aqunio and others who used to tell us wonderful but misleading things about the Free Trade Agreement?

Senator Hébert: I think the Conservatives have thousands and thousands of petitions in favour of the GST that they are hiding in their offices as a secret weapon and that when we finally get through reading our petitions—I don't know in how many weeks or months—then they will take their secret weapon out and start reading them.

Senator Gigantès: Will this be sort of debate by petition?

Senator Hébert: Yes, and we will have to count who has the most signatories. That is my theory.

Senator Balfour: Do you think we should have an election on the election in Ontario as well? You obviously can't stand to lose.

Senator Stewart: That's provincial politics.

Senator Gigantès: Perhaps Senator Stewart should elucidate his earlier remark. To have an election on the result of an election might be complicated for all organizations.

Senator Balfour: Wy does he propose it?

Senator Stewart: I did not realize that Senator Balfour had misunderstood.

My point is simply this: when you have an election involving many issues, it is very difficult to say that the successful party has a mandate on one specific question such as the Meech Lake Accord or the GST.

It is possible, of course, to say that it has a mandate to deal with one issue if that issue is pushed right to the front of the stage. I would argue, for example, Senator Balfour, that in the election of 1988 the Progressive Conservative Party succeeded in getting a mandate for the Free Trade Agreement with the United States. That was one of the reasons why I felt that when the bill came to us after the election it should be dealt with expeditiously, both in this chamber and in committee.

When I moved the report of the Senate Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs on the Free Trade Agreement bill in December, 1988, I tried to make that point as succinctly as possible. There was no question—insofar as you could get a decision with a multi-party system—that the Canadian people had voted for the Free Trade Agreement. It is true it was 43 per cent but with a multi-party system, that was pretty strong support.

But to say that at the same time the electorate were giving a mandate for the Meech Lake Accord is, I think, reading far too much into the outcome of the election. That was my only point, Senator Balfour.

Senator Balfour: Could Senator Stewart then tell me whether or not he took a similar position when the government, of which he was a part, imposed the National Energy Program on western Canada?

Senator Stewart: Senator Balfour has asserted that in the election of 1980 the people voted for the National Energy Policy. As I recall, that assertion was not made.

Senator Balfour: Isn't that the very point that the National Energy Program was not an issue in the election to which you refer, yet the government, of which you were a part, unilaterally imposed this massive tax grab on western Canada?

Senator Stewart: I now understand why we are like ships that pass in the night. It is one thing to say that you elect a government to deal with whatever eventualities arise. That is what you call electing men—that is "men not measures" type of election, if I may use that language without arousing Senator Marsden's ire.

Senator Balfour: I don't think you need to worry about Senator Marsden.

Senator Stewart: All right, but speak quietly.

Senator Gigantès: Just watch it.

Senator Stewart: It is another thing, Senator Balfour, to say that the electorate gave a mandate for a specific measure.

It seems to me the example I gave is a pretty good one , that is, that you could argue quite effectively that the election gave a mandate for the Free Trade Agreement. In contrast, it is very difficult to argue that they marked their ballots in favour of the Meech Lake Accord. In my part of the world, most of the Conservatives whom I know, for example, did not mark their ballots with the GST specifically in mind.

Perhaps we can discuss this later, Senator Balfour, but if you want to continue now, I would be more than happy to do so.

Senator Balfour: With the greatest respect, Senator Stewart, if I am following your argument correctly, it seems to me you are sucking and blowing at the same time.

Senator Stewart: That comment is so vacuous that there is no point in trying to comment on it.

Senator Gigantès: Excuse me, senator, that is based exactly on this exactly.

Senator Stewart: Senator Balfour would certainly know about the bagpipes, given his name.

Senator Gigantès: I suppose.

Senator Stewart: He probably wears a filleadh-beag in honour of his Scottish forebears.

Senator Gigantès: I would like to congratulate Senator Stewart on being a member of the cabinet between 1980 and 1984. Senator Balfour says you were a member of the government.

Senator Stewart: That is not true, but we all make mistakes, we all make these little mistakes.

Senator Bosa: Honourable Senators, I have just one brief intervention to clarify the record. Senator Balfour made reference to the fact that there was a tax grab in the early 1980s imposed by the government of the day. But , to be fair, I think Senator Balfour should also have mentioned that the Diefenbaker government, either in 1959 or 1960, imposed a 10-cent additional cost on every gallon of gas that was consumed west of the Ottawa valley in order to support Alberta.

This was at a time when the oil industry in western Canada could not support itself, so a great chunk of Ontario paid an additional premium for the oil that was extracted in order to support that industry.

We should have both sides of the coin in order to balance things out.

Senator Balfour: First, Senator Bosa, the tax was not imposed west of the Ottawa Valley but east of the Ottawa Valley.

Second, the object of the tax was to encourage exploration in western Canada so that when the energy crunch inevitably came, eastern Canada would be able to draw on supplies of oil discovered in western Canada instead of paying exorbitant prices for imported crude oil.

Senator Gigantès: That makes sense.

[Translation]

Senator Grimard: We owe the mining industry in Rouyn-Noranda to one of the first mining prospectors.

Senator Corbin: He is against the GST. That is all what counts.

Senator Hébert: I am ready to learn how to pronounce names, because I have quite a few here.

[English]

Senator Gigantès: I would like to draw your attention, Senator, to how helpful Senator Grimard is being on these toponynics about Quebec. I hope that when I get back to Alberta you will also help me with names sir.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: Senator Gigantès, you miss Senator Simard already!

Senator Gigantès: Yes, Senator Hébert, I do.

Senator Hébert: Is it Mont-Brun?

Senator Grimard: Yes, Senator.

Senator Hébert: That is correct. Senator Grimard tells me that it is indeed Mont-Brun. It must be a municipality or a village.

There are people from all over Quebec in this region.

The Cliches come from the Beauce.

Senator Gigantès: There are Cliches everywhere.

Senator Hébert: That is what I mean. There are people from all over Quebec in this region.

Senator Gigantès: You have not come across even one "Tremblay" yet?

Senator Hébert: Do not worry, I will. Look, if there are not any Tremblays on the list there must be something wrong. It is just not possible.

But here is one, right here.

Senator Gigantès: You found a "Bédard" from Victoriaville. My wife is a Bédard.

Senator Hébert: From Victoriaville?

Senator Gigantès: No, not from Victoriaville, from Quebec City.

Senator Gigantès: But then, there are Bédards everywhere as well.

So, Senator, is Mont-Brun a village?

Senator Grimard: Yes.

Senator Hébert: How far is it from Rouyn-Noranda?

Senator Grimard: It is 25 kilometres away if you take the La Sarre road.

Senator Hébert: Is it a farming region?

Senator Grimard: Yes it is, Senator.

Senator Hébert: I hope I am not speaking too loudly because I would not want to waken Senator Castonguay who is deep in slumber!

Senator Gigantès: Speak louder.

Senator Hébert: Come now, I am not going to wake him up! We might waken Senator Lavoie-Roux at the same time. I would not want to do that because it would not be very nice of me.

Senator Gigantès: Well, they have wakened Senator Marsden. There she was, quietly sleeping away, not bothering anyone. They made so much noise—even mentioning her name—that she woke up.

Senator Hébert: "Grenada"; that is not the Grenada in the Carribean, is it?

Grenada—does such a place exist, Senator Grimard?

Senator Grimard: It is another village and it is south of Rouyn-Noranda.

Senator Hébert: How many kilometres away?

Senator Grimard: Ten at the most.

Senator Gigantès: How did it get its name?

Senator Grimard: A number of townships and villages were named after soldiers or captains in the Carignan regiment.

When the County of Rouyn-Noranda, Abitibi and Témiscamingue was being established, towns were named after former members of the regiment. So there are names such as Cadillac and others. New name were required because it was a new region. Abitibi and Rouyn-Noranda have existed for barely 75 years.

Senator Gigantès: Was that part of the agricultural colonization that the Quebec clergy wanted to put in place? Which bishop was promoting that idea?

Senator Grimard: Look, I am not a history teacher. I would like to continue reading names. I intervened partly to wake myself up, because I have been terribly bored since I have been a senator. With everything that is going on here, I decided that maybe speaking would wake me up. I am quite disgusted with the way in which you are proceeding. That is the end of my geography lesson.

Senator Gigantès: Do you prefer that we simply read the names, as Senator Hébert is doing, or would you rather we intersperse them with courses in political science, as Senator Stewart does from time to time?

Do you prefer these interjections, for some variety in the diet, so to speak?

Senator Corbin: I think he is falling asleep.

Senator Gigantès: All right, we will do our best.

Senator Grimard: Honourable senators, there has been considerable variety since I have been in the Senate. We started with the cacophony of desk-thumping, kazoos and whistles, and now we are getting the petitions.

I think we have had quite a mixture as it is.

For a young senator like myself (that is, a "young senior"), I can tell you that being here makes me want to cry for help from my mamma.

In my view, your tactics show contempt for all the people of Canada, not just us. That is what you Liberal senators are doing at the moment. It is disgusting to waste the people's time and money in this way.

So I spoke in order to wake myself up. If you want to be serious, I will be too.

Senator Gigantès: Great! Go ahead, we want you to be serious!

Senator Hébert: Senator Grimard, I would like to point out that the people of Rouyn-Noranda may not be pleased to learn that you found it disgusting that a senator would rise to read their petitions and their names. I do not think they will like that very much. I do not think that Jacynthe Éthier, of 395 Trépanier Street, in Rouyn-Noranda will find it funny that I was interrupted just before reading her name by a senator from her region, who has just said that it is disgusting that we are reading petitions and giving the names and addresses of the petitioners.

Senator Corbin: We have the names and addresses of all these individuals, Senator Hébert. Perhaps we should write to them to tell them what Senator Grimard thinks of their petitions.

Senator Hébert: We will send them today's copy of the Debates of the Senate.

I think they will all be pleased to read Senator Grimard's intervention just when their names were being read out in the Senate.

I come back now to the petition.

Otherwise, Senator Grimard will think that I do not have enough names for Rouyn-Noranda. Unless, of course, you are in a hurry?

Senator Gigantès: We are not in a hurry.

Senator Hébert: In that case, I will continue with the petition, and I will try to read a little more quickly.

Senator Gigantès: Can I come back to the name "Hébert"? Was one of your ancestors the Hébert of the French Revolution who was not an agreeable sort and sent people into the woods, and also hung them?

Senator Hébert: No, I have no idea. I have not really checked. But from what you have just said, I do not intend to check into it, in case it turns out to be true.

Larder Lake is in Ontario. These must be some people from Rouyn-Noranda who went off on a trip to Larder Lake and took the petition with them. Is it a resort town, is it pretty there? They went for a little trip, and they took the opportunity to get more signatures on the petition against the GST, because people are opposed to it both in Ontario and in Quebec.

Senator Gigantès: Are there any maples there, so far north?

Senator Hébert: That far north, I think the maples would have had to be planted, because we are getting into regions where maples do not grow easily. I know some maples were planted, but evergreens are the more natural vegetation in the region.

We are back to that region. According to what Senator Grimard was telling us, the name apparently comes from . . .

Senator Corbin: Grimard?

Senator Hébert: No, the senator was telling us a little earlier that the name came from the Carignan Regiment.

Senator Corbin: There are not a lot of "Grimards". There is not even a handful of them! I checked in the phone book.

Senator Hébert: I must say that so far I do not have any on my list. But this is just a tiny part of my Rouyn-Noranda file.

Senator Gigantès: Go a little more slowly so that he can check that. It is a very good idea to check whether these people really live where they say they do. By checking, we can certify that they are genuine petitioners.

Senator Hébert: I do not think anyone is questioning that.

• (0500)

[English]

Senator Frith: I want to look up Lander Lake.

Senator Haidasz: Is there a gold mine up there?

Senator Frith: I don't know. Senator Kelleher probably knows.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: I think I was saying that nobody who lives at Place Tourigny is missing. We are going to have every name!

Senator Gigantès: I know, Senator, that if the senators opposite allowed us to print these names, I think the senate could sell those copies of its Debates to all the individuals concerned, so that they could see their names in print in the Debates of the Senate. We could make a profit by selling them!

Senator Corbin: We could become self-financing by selling the transcript of our sessions.

Senator Gigantès: Definitely. That is what we should do in future: publish the names, and people will buy the proceedings just to see their names.

Senator Corbin: Make a motion to that effect.

Senator Hébert: As I was saying, I think that we are going to have each and every person who lives at Place Tourigny.

I do not know how many people live there, there cannot be a thousand people with that address.

Senator Corbin: Rouyn-Noranda is big!

Senator Hébert: Yes, but Place Tourigny, is just one "place". As you can see, they all signed the petition.

I think we got absolutely everyone there.

I hope the same will be true of Ménard Street.

Senator Frith: You are going to fast!

Senator Hébert: So I am going too quickly. I am in such a hurry for these people to see their names printed in the Debates of the Senate. I will try to slow down a little but . . .

That is La Sarre. It is not Rouyn-Noranda, but a neighbouring town.

I can tell you that the people on D'Allaire Street do not seem to like the GST!

Senator Corbin: Hébert Street is lovely!

Senator Hébert: Yes, but there are lots of Hébert Streets everywhere. Imagine how many there will be when I die.

Senator Haidasz: Senator Grimard is leaving us!

Senator Hébert: Never mind, we are going to continue talking about his fine region anyway.

That is just a small batch of the petitions from Rouyn-Noranda. When I get out my reserves, I know that Senator Grimard will be raked over the coals.

Senator Gigantès: We are reminding him of his friends!

Senator Corbin: Did you know that Senator Grimard lives on D'Allaire Street?

Senator Hébert: Is that so! Well these must all be his friends. We are talking here about his neighbours.

An Hon. Senator: Are you sure?

Senator Corbin: Well, it says here Normand Grimard, 155 rue D'allaire.

Senator Hébert: The addresses I am giving are in the 300s, so it is not far off. I am two blocks away from him.

Senator Corbin: It is certainly in the same neighbourhood.

Senator Hébert: It is very nearby. He has not had much of an influence on his neighbours!

Senator Corbin: We will never know because he is not talking to us anymore!

If a page were to come to my desk, I would turn the floor over to my colleague.

• (0530)

[English]

Senator Haidasz: Honourable Senators, that was a formidable list.

Senator Hébert: Formidable, that is nothing: It is just a start.

Senator Haidasz: Now I understand why the people of Canada are against the GST. They heard that in 1987, 93,405 corporations paid no income tax on profits of $27 billion. They also heard that in 1988 the corporate tax rate was reduced from 36 per cent to 28 per cent and that more than 60,000 corporations paid no taxes at all. They heard that Brascan, whose president is our colleague across the aisle, John Trevor Eyton—and whom, incidentally, we have not seen for several days made a profit of $263 million in 1988 and paid no tax on that money and that Brascan donated $50,362.92 to the Progressive Conservative party.

I understand why Canadians are against the GST: It is because they have had enough of taxes. The Government of Mr. Brian Mulroney has raised our taxes several times since he came to power, and now he is trying to impose upon Canadians the goods and services tax, which many people, including the bishops of Canada, have described as not only regressive and unfair but immoral. I feel morally obliged to speak against the GST as we all should if we have any morals left.

An Hon. Senator: Do you have any petitions to present?

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, according to the the following British parliamentary system and our own, I have the ancient privilege and duty to present the following petition on the subject of the proposed goods and services tax:

> The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read)

Simcoe, Ontario, honourable senators, is an interesting town. Honourable Senators, I hope it will not be confused with Lake Simcoe or Simcoe county. Simcoe is named after John Graves Simcoe who became the first Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, which was created under the Constitutional Act of 1791. John Graves Simcoe, arrived in Upper Canada in July of 1792. He chose the town of Newark, now called Niagara, as his capital, and later, in 1794, he moved the seat of government of Upper Canada to York, which is now Toronto. I am just giving you the background. I notice the rest of the pages are signed by people from Simcoe, Ontario.

An Hon. Senator: I believe it.

Senator Haidasz: Simcoe is now a city. It was first incorporated, as a town in 1878. It is now a city very much involved in the flue-cured tobacco industry. Fruits are also canned in that area. I would now continue, to read the names on this petition.

(Names of signatories read)

Welland, Ontario the main town on the Welland canal, is also a very interesting place. I remember my maternal grandfather telling me that when he emigrated from Poland to Canada he settled in Welland. His first job in 1911 was to widen the Welland canal.

Senator Bosa: Your father?

Senator Haidasz: My maternal grandfather, Adabert Justynski. Well, actually in Polish he was called Wojciech, but the English name for Wojciech is Adabert. St. Adelberg was the bishop of Prague who came to Poland and baptised the first Polish King, Mieczyslaw I. Mieczylaw became a Christian just before he married Dabrowka, a princess from Bohemia, today's Czechoslovakia.

Senator Gigantès: What was their religion before they converted to Christianity?

Senator Haidasz: I am sorry to say they were heathens. They did worship some gods so, perhaps, I should not have said that they were heathens. I retract that.

Senator Gigantès: Christian imperialism.

Senator Haidasz: Anyway, today Welland is represented in the House of Commons by, I believe, Mr. Parent.

Senator Corbin: Is Welland a wine area.

Senator Haidasz: Yes, it is a wine area.

I will now continue reading the signatures on this petition.

(Names of signatories read)

I would ask the page to lay this petition on the table.

Senator Corbin: Laying the petition on the table is a very important and symbolic process.

Senator Haidasz: I will now read page 27 of signatures.

(Names of signatories read)

It appears that almost all the residents of the area of Simcoe are against the GST.

(Names of signatories read)

Delhi, Ontario is the capital of the tobacco farming area.

Senator Gigantès: I wonder why an Ontario town would have be named after the capital of India.

Senator Haidasz: I can't explain that but, perhaps, someone else in this chamber can.

Senator Gigantès: We could send for the book on the toponymy on Ontario.

Senator Haidasz: Yes, and the history of Ontario.

As an MP, I spoke at a meeting of one of the Polish organizations there.

Senator Gigantès: Perhaps they should have called it Warsaw.

Senator Haidasz: I was surprised to find there are so many Canadians of Polish and Slovak origins living in Delhi.

There are continue further, two more names on this page which I should like to read in.

(Names of signatories read)

I would ask that this petition be laid on the table.

Honourable senators, I have another list of petitioners which I would now like to read in.

(Names of signatories read)

There are almost a million Canadians with Italian names. I am not surprised that there are Canadians of Italian origin living in Port Dover. Palermo, as you know, is the capital of Sicily. Sicily is a very picturesque island. If you are visiting Europe, I would recommend that if you should include a visit to Sicily. There are many interesting historical sites.

Senator Corbin: What do they manufacture in Palermo?

Senator Haidasz: Perhaps Senator Bosa can answer that question.

Senator Bosa: They grow olives, oranges and lemons. It is the Florida of Europe. They have also discovered oil on the islands.

Senator Haidasz: Oh, yes, the Denison mine people were out there.

Senator Gigantès: For those who are interested in Sicilian history and archaeology some magnificent Greek monuments are to be found at Agrigento. Pollution is now destroying the Parthenon.

An Hon. Senator: Get on with the petition, please.

Senator Gigantès: The same architect who built the Parthenon also built the temple at Agrigento. I would highly recommend that Senators opposite visit Athens, to see the full glory of Greek architecture before it is destroyed by gasoline fumes and nitro-oxide. We should do something about this kind of pollution in this country too.

Senator Doody: Order!

Senator Gigantès: Order?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, we are dealing with the presentation of petitions. We do not need a lecture on the historic cites of Sicily from the honourable senator this evening. We are just wasting valuable time. Neither do we need a lecture on architecture in Sicily. We want the senator to get on with presenting his petitions.

Senator Gigantès: You are picking on me.

Senator Doody: You are abusing the rules.

Senator Gigantès: I beg your pardon. I didn't hear the last sentence.

Senator Hébert: You are abusing the rules.

Senator Corbin: Senator Doody says he is sorry they stopped the bells five minutes before the appointed time.

Senator Gigantès: Is the abuse of the rules a Tory monopoly? Could I be given an answer to that? Is the abuse of the rules something you have reserved for yourselves?

He picks on me and then he won't answer.

Senator Corbin: In any case, whether Senator Doody likes it or not, my ancestors, the Normans, occupied Sicily at one time and they founded a kingdom there.

Senator Haidasz: May I also say that Palermo is a city where there resides a Prince Roberto III, a descendant of the Aragon kings. He is also the Grand Master of the Sovereign Order of Saint John of Jerusalem, Knights of Malta. He visited Canada twice to take part in investitures.

Senator Bosa: When?

Senator Haidasz: He visited once in 1979, and as a member of the Sovereign Order of Saint John of Jerusalem, Knights of Malta, I am happy he was able to visit us and conduct the investiture of the knights.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I think I am being discriminated against. Senator Doody does not object to us talking of a Prince Roberto who is the Grand Master of the Order of the Knights of Malta but, he does object when we talk of Greek architecture in Agrigento. I want to know why Greek architecture is a subject which should be suppressed more in this chamber than the Order of the Knights of Malta.

Senator Stewart: There may be Knights of Malta here.

An Hon. Senator: He does not object to discussion of Greek architecture or Italian architecture or anything else in their proper place; he objects to you raising these subjects to waste time.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, but why pick on me? Why does he not object to what others have to say? I have never said a word about Senator Doody that was not complimentary. I have always expressed my admiration for his equanimity, his good manners, his courtesy, and his sweetness. I could certainly understand Senator Simard or Senator Cogger picking on me. I could understand Senator Lowell Murray picking on me; but Senator Doody? I have always treated him with the utmost courtesy. I must say that I am hurt.

Senator Haidasz: I wouldl now continue reading the names listed on this petition.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Haidasz: Kowalski is the most popular surname in Poland. It means Smith.

An Hon. Senator: Kowalski was a wrestler.

Senator Haidasz: Yes, he was a wrestler from Edmonton.

Senator Corbin: You don't fool around with Kowalskis.

Senator Barootes: Would the honourable senator entertain a question? Will the series of names he has just read appear in the Debates of the Senate?

Senator Haidasz: No.

Senator Barootes: Then your speech, I take it, will not be reproduced.

Senator Haidasz: According to the stenographer I talked to about a half an hour ago, only my comments will appear in the text. He said that the names and the addresses will not appear in Hansard.

Senator Gigantès: My comments about the Greek temples in Agrigento will also appear. Canadians of Greek descent in this country have a right to have the glories of their ancestry mentioned in this chamber. You should be the last one to criticize that. I am surprised at you.

Senator Barootes: Have I criticized something?

Senator Gigantès: No, but your friend, Senator Doody, didn't want me to talk about Greek architecture in Agrigento.

Senator Doody: Senator, I do not want you to talk.

Senator Gigantès: Why pick on me?

Senator Barootes: Honourable Senators, when you speak of a city or a town where one of the petitioners comes from, and you then you describe the beauty of his name, the beauty of the town's name and the beauty of the town, what relevance will all of that have in Hansard if the name does not appear?

Senator Haidasz: At least we in this chamber will have a better understanding of the loyal subjects of Her Majesty who are petitioning us to vote against the GST, Bill C-62. It is also of historical interest to comment on where they come from because that might help us to understand their grievance a little better.

Senator Barootes: Senator Haidasz, my definitive question is: will those names and addresses appear in the private proceedings or not?

Senator Haidasz: Again, I say no.

Senator Barootes: I am given to understand that the story about Greek architecture in Sicily will appear, but what relevance will that have without the name? You read the name "Kowalski" and then you went on to say that it is the equivalent of the name "Smith". What part of your speech will appear in the Debates? Will the name Kowalski appear?

Senator Haidasz: No, that name of Kowalski will not appear, neither will the street address.

Senator Gigantès: It will not appear as part of the list, but it will appear when mentioned elsewhere.

Senator Corbin: It will appear every time you mention it.

Senator Barootes: Senator Corbin has made the point for me. What is going to appear in Hansard? According to our suggestion here, the text of the petition and the names of the petitioners attached thereto will not be printed in the Debates of the Senate or in the Minutes of the proceedings of the Senate. I want to know how that is going to be clarified.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, that good translation—

Senator Barootes: I did not ask you. Please sit down. I am not talking to you.

Senator Gigantès: Don't get so excited.

Senator Barootes: I am going to get excited because you are a Mr. Buttinsky.

Senator Gigantès: Think of your health.

Senator Barootes: I am not using a Polish name. You are a Buttinsky. Sit down. I am asking Senator Haidasz to answer.

Senator Stewart: Senator Barootes, might I try to help?

Senator Barootes: Another Mr. Buttinsky.

Senator Stewart: I am trying to help. Senator, I know that you are deeply disturbed about this matter. My understanding is that the comments made by a Senator, such as Senator Haidasz, will appear in the records of this house, but in addition to that, the several petitions will be kept in a file.

Senator Gigantès: Great art is never irrelevant and the temples are great art.

An Hon. Senator: You are the one who is irrelevant.

Senator Gigantès: It takes one to know one, sir.

An Hon. Senator: Brilliant.

Senator Bosa: You did not have to come here.

Senator Stewart: When people come to look at the record of this debate, they will have both the official record of the debate and the actual petitions, will be on file, so it will be possible to relate one to the other in that way, I have no doubt that scholars aspiring to masters' degrees and perhaps to doctorates will, at some time turn, to this material, because this is a historic occasion. Some might regard it as a sad occasion; others might regard it as a joyous occasion; but that will depend on the outcome.

Senator Barootes: May I pursue that question, if you can keep your stand-up comedian in his seat for a while?

I want to know if the names that have been read in will appear in the text of the Debates of the Senate.

Senator Frith: If you had read the rules you would know it, the answer to that.

An Hon. Senator: Will they appear in it?

Senator Barootes: How are we going to understand that Kowalski is the equivalent of Smith if Kowalsky is not mentioned?

Senator Hébert: You will mention Kowalski.

Senator Haidasz: I read the name "Barbara Kowalski" as being a petitioner.

Senator Barootes: You then made the comment that "Kowalski" is equivalent to the surname "Smith" in English. What portion will appear in our printed Debates? Please, give me the exact quotation.

Senator Haidasz: I cannot say. This is the first time I have done this. I have never seen any petitions read in this way appear in Hansard, so I cannot answer your question.

Senator Barootes: What I am saying is that this procedure, never having been followed before in this place—

Senator Haidasz: It is unique.

Senator Frith: No, that is not true.

Senator Barootes: This kind of a procedure, never having been followed, I am in doubt as to what exactly the Debates of the Senate will contain of these elaborate one-sided discussions that have been going on. I am sure that some of these names will appear in the record but they are not supposed to.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps we had better proceed in the old fashioned empirical way. Let us wait till the end of the first week and we will know how to handle the second week.

Senator Haidasz: It is now six o'clock.

Senator Frith: Just to finish this point. Senator Barootes rose with the rule book in his hand and found reference in the appendices to the precise point he was raising. He was asking how this will actually appear in the Debates?

The method that is being applied here has never before been used as extensively as it is being used in this instance. It was used a bit on the drug patent legislation and I did not recall what actually appeared lin the Debates. Having now had the experience, no doubt the rules committee will, of their own motion, consider the matter, or we might refer it to them in due course. How it will look in the Debates when used as extensively as it has been here, I agree with Senator Barootes, we will not know until we see it, and then, perhaps, we might adjust the rules.

Senator Barootes: We are breaking new ground with this. I was just asking how we are going to handle this situation. It is best to know in advance rather than doing a lot of typing and printing and then expunging or extracting things. I think there are going to be problems and that is why I raised the matter.

Senator Frith: I hope we will agree that the most important thing is that the people are now aware of the fact that there is some method by which they can address Parliament. Iit is something that has existed for hundreds of years.

Senator Barootes: After Richard II, there was the Petition of Rights.

Senator Gigantès: It was in place before that.

Senator Frith: I do not think that most Canadians were aware of the fact that they could do this but as Senator Barootes says, now that it has been quite extensively used in this case, we will have to see and profit from the experience by making any necessary adjustment to our rules.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Haidasz, on this issue, even if the name "Kowalski" does not appear and there is "blank" means "Smith" in Polish, there are good English-to-Polish dictionaries, and without a doubt, somebody could look up "Smith" and find the name "Kowalski".

Earlier Senator Haidasz and I were discussing the name of "Delhi".

Senator Haidasz: Delhi, Ontario.

Senator Gigantès: Delhi, Ontario. I apologise if I am not pronouncing it correctly.

Senator Haidasz: That is how it is pronounced in Delhi, Ontario.

Senator Gigantès: It is a town, part of Delhi Township, Regional Municipality of Haldiman-Norfolk, and the position is 42 degrees 51 minutes north and 80 degrees, 31 minutes west.

An Hon. Senator: What township?

Senator Gigantès: It is Delhi township. In municipal terms Delhi is "the tobacco capital of Norfolk", in quotations marks.

Senator Barootes: Quotation marks are not insulting things at all; they are like little hugs on either side of a word. Delhi is no longer a town. In 1974 it annexed parts of the Norfolk County townships of Charlotteville, Middleton, South Walsingham and Wyndham to establish the township of Delhi in the newly-created regional municipality of Haldiman-Norfolk.

Senator Doody: Will the honourable senator tell me which petition he is reading now? Is he speaking in support of a petition? He should not make a speech to support his argument.

Senator Gigantès: I will not stop talking if I do not want to stop talking. I have a louder voice than you have.

Delhi was first settled—

Senator Doody: There is no question about that.

Senator Gigantès: —in the early 1800s when Joseph Lawson, Frederick Sovereign and Henry Sovereign took up land at the site of the present town. Henry Sovereign's son, Jacob, built the first saw and grist mills at the locality. The place was known for a number of years as Fredericksburg despite the fact that the post office had been established in 1854 under the name of Delhi after a city in India.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senator, I see it is 6 o'clock. For everyone throughout the Catholic Church at 6 o'clock the Angelus is recited and, since Sundays used to be observed in Ottawa under previous governments as a day of worship, I will retire to the Chapel.

Senator Marsden: Honourable Senators. I have so many petitions here that I am worried we will not get through all of them. There are only 1,728 hours until Christmas, and the petitions keep pouring in.

Yesterday, while attending a rally on another subject, I was handed another bundle of petitions against the GST; and at the airport last night the security staff had more petitions to be passed along. I fear this will never end.

I have a number of petitions here from the citizens of Alexandria and Long Sault, towns in eastern Ontario; Ste-Marie Bois, Québec, and from somebody visiting Alexandria from Québec. The address is: RR 1, Vankleek Hill, Ontario. I have petitions from Glen Robertson—

Senator Gigantès: Is it "Vankleek" or "Van Beak?"

Senator Marsden: It looks as if it is "Van Beak".

Senator Gigantès: I will check to see if there is a "Van Beak" in Ontario.

Senator Marsden: I have petitions from Glen Robertson, Cornwall and Dalkeith, Ontario. There is a petition from a citizen from St.-Isidore, and three from Green Valley, Ontario. All these people are petitioning the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. There are 27 citizens on this list.

The name of the town Senator Gigantès asked about is "VanKleek".

Senator Gigantès: It is "Vankleek" and not "Van Beak". It is important to have the correct name and, since we are reading petitions from people in the locality, to note the existence of the locality and to pay respect to it by commenting on it.

The town was named for the Vankleek family, whose ancestors were pioneers in the area. Vankleek Hill became incorporated as a town in 1897. The first mayor was Colonel John Shield. James Steele, A. R. Metcalfe, John Hunter, Xavier, Lajeunesse and Hermas, Labrosse were all councillors. Prior to the time of incorporation, the Hill was a well known place of business and education for the surrounding area. It is misspelled in this book. It is spelled "a-r-a-e" and it should be "a-r-e-a". We read our blues, because printing errors do creep in.

One of the original settlers, Simon Vankleet was a native of New York State of Dutch ancestry, as one would suspect with the word "Van" in the name. Simon was a loyalist, and when the War of Independence broke out he found himself forced to flee his estate in Duchess County, New York, with his wife, Cecilia, and two children.

In 1783, under Lord Dorchester, Vankleet was moved to Nova Scotia where he stayed for three years. Eventually, he settled in the Hill area amd, in either 1800 or 1801—it is unfortunate we do not have the precise date—he built a house and purchased equipment to clear the land.

In 1814, urged by his son, Simon, Jr., Vankleet built the first frame building on the Hill, using sewn lumber from the Hawkesbury mills which had started up in 1808 under the Hamilton brothers. Do you not find all this rather interesting, Senator Forrestall?

It was at this house that Simon, Jr., opened a tavern. He ran that tavern until 1822 when he moved to Pointe Fortun and operated an inn there. John Atkinson rented the Vankleet House and ran the first general store there for one year. He was followed by John Glass MacIntosh, who eventually purchased a lot of his own opposite the Windsor Hotel.

It is a very interesting book. It is called, Places in Ontario, and I highly recommend it. Obviously, they do have some printing errors. It is by the Mica Publishing Company in Belleville, Ontario.

Senator Marsden: Honourable Senators, I have another petition of 27 names. Thank you, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: It is a pleasure.

Senator Marsden: These petitioners are mostly from Alexandria, Green Valley and Cornwall, Ontario. I cannot give the kind of catalogue that various other senators do of all the towns in Ontario, but there is a new book written by a Professor David Ray on the subject of growing up in Alexandria that I urge you all to look at. It is quite a fascinating book.

I have a petition from citizens from Morgan Avenue in Kitchener, from Peterborough, Windsor, from Stouffville, Richmond Hill, Downsview, Thornhill, Aurora, Richmond Hill, Concord, Thornhill, Markham, Aurora. These are all small, essentially suburbs, of the City of Toronto. Again, these citizens, all of whom have signed and given their addresses, have been calling on us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

I have yet another petition again containing names from Peterborough, but also from Eganville, Apsley, Dundas, Bancroft, Ottawa, Hampton Pickering, Mississauga, Bethany, Hamilton, Lakefield, Orono, Ontario; Richmond Hill, Mississauga again, Toronto itself, Lakefield, and, again, Peterborough. These are the names of 27 citizens who strongly oppose the goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read)

I have been here since about 11:30 last night and I have not had a chance to get a word in edgewise. I was going to comment on the earliest exchange between Senator Olson and Senator Simard in which Senator Simard urged Senator Olson to accept the amendments of the various petitioners who appeared in front of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Perhaps there are others who would like to comment on what it would do to the tax base if we were to bring in all the amendments and zero ratings that were asked for in the 35 particular cases listed in the report of committee. Perhaps, we can deal with that when we get to that item on the Order Paper. However, I believe that would destroy the tax because the base would narrow so much, the rate would have to go up.

Coming back to these petitions, I have some here from Mississauga, Ontario, from Bromsgrove Road, from George Street in Milton, from Lakeshore Road East in Mississauga, from Golden Orchard Drive in Mississauga, from Milton, from Bowbreach Boulevard, from Bowmar Crescent in Etobicoke, from Bankfield Drive in Rexdale, and from Mill Street in South Brampton. Brampton is now large enough to be divided into South Brampton and North Brampton.

I also have the names of petitions from Milton, Ontario, Cedarbrae Avenue; Moorgate, amd from Southport Street in Toronto. These people have signed this petition urging us not to pass this tax.

I have the names of petitioners who live at, Windwood Drive, Mississauga, Hornby Crescent, Herman Avenue, Monarch Avenue, Toronto, Deveere Gardens, Toronto, Wellington Street West, Toronto, Oxbow Crescent, Mississauga, 30 Fashion Roseway, Willowdale, Prospect Street, Burlington, Carlisle, Ontario, a post office box number in Carlisle, and from two citizens in Burlington, Ontario. These are another 27 petitioners, all of whom are strongly opposed to the goods and services tax. They have gone to the trouble of signing a petition which was prepared by the irate citizens of Peterborough to try to get this government to listen to their plea that this tax, which is going to have such an untoward effect on their lives, be stopped.

There are other petitioners from around that part of the province and specifically from Nelson Crescent, Milton, Woodward Avenue, Milton, and the inevitable Steeles Avenue, Milton.

I had hoped that Senator Gigantès had looked up the origin of "Steeles", because there seems to be a Steeles Avenue wherever you look. Who was Steeles?

Senator Gigantès: I will look it up.

Senator Marsden: Steeles has had a large influence on the street names of all the towns in southern Ontario.

I have names of petitioners from Harvest Drive, Woodward Avenue, Holly Avenue, and George Street, Milton. I also have names of citizens from Burlington, Guelph and Mississauga; and yet others from Milton, specifically, Beaver Crescent, and Beaver Court.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Marsden, I have found something about Steele. There is mention of the township of Steele, which was possibly named after Michael Steele, M.D., and a conservative candidate in the early 1900s. That seems a likely source for the name. It is also possible that it was named after Colonel Steele who was at one time a high official of the RCMP. The Steeles were fairly prominent in that region and in consequence, many streets were named after them. After all, to keep in the good books of the RCMP, and you would name a few streets after the Colonel. If it was named after a Tory M.P., and there were Tory governments in those days, I suppose, you might cotton up to him, too. He was only a candidate, not an elected person.

Senator Marsden: It would give courage and enthusiasm to everyone who wants to be a candidate to have some important streets named after him in all the towns in Ontario.

Senator Gigantès: I have mine on my visiting cards.

Senator Marsden: Yes, this is very impressive, I must say.

Senator Gigantès: I will give you a copy if you want one.

Senator Marsden: If we were to go through the list of all the defeated candidates in the last general election and name streets after them, several subdivisions could spring up across this country.

Senator Gigantès: I apologize, Senator Marsden, I do not have an extra card with me but I will get you one for you.

Senator Marsden: I also have names of citizens from Ontario Street, Milton; Whitelaw Road, Guelph; Harvesty Crescent, Mississauga; Cy Drive, Milton; Laurier Avenue, Milton; Mooregate Crescent Brampton; Elgin Crescent in Oakville; and Rambler Drive in Brampton; and from Battleford Road from Canford Crescent, Mississauga. I also have a name from West Broadway, in Vancouver, B.C. Obviously that is someone who was visiting Mississauga from out west because the subsequent names come from Weston, Ontario; Nixson Street Oakville, Ontario. Mr. Nixson, of course, was elected, so apparently you can be both elected and have a street named after you. I also have a petitioner from Mulberry Drive, Burlington, Ontario. These are another 27 citizens, all of whom want to see this tax stopped before it goes any further.

I have a further petition from 52 Esplanade, and Silver Maple Court. Bramalea as well as the names of citizens from rural routes around Orangeville. I have names of people from Main Street Milton; Armadale Avenue, Toronto; Silver Dew Drive, Mississauga. There is a signature here from Verity Court, Brampton; Morelands Crescent, Milton; and from Floyd Street, Kitchener, Ontario.

All of these petitioners have added their postal codes and made it very clear how much they protest the imposition of this tax. There are signatures from Clark Boulevard, Bramalea, Georgetown, Ontario, and specifically, someone from North Crescent, Georgetown.

• (0630)

I also have the signature of Tom Colton from Georgetown. Then we are back to Dundas Street East in Mississauga. Hornley, Ontario and Will Scarlett Drive in Oakville—and I do not know whether she will or not. I have signatures from Council Ring, and Ogden Avenue, Mississauga; from Stills Lane and Donmount Court, Oakville; and from Wildwood Road, Glenwilliams, Ontario. I have names from Greenbrier Drive, Oakville; Old Carriage Road, Mississauga; Stall Drive, Oakville; Kennedy Road, Brampton; and from Truscott Drive, Mississauga. This amounts to another 27 citizens who are protesting the introduction of this tax.

They are protesting the introduction of this tax, in part, because of its complexity and because of the difficulty of dealing with the paperwork. During this watch I have had the opportunity to read my way through the fiscal report proposals for 1987—extremely interesting documents—in which the government said in 1987 how anxious they were to hear the views of individual Canadians, groups, organizations, and businesses across Canada. It says here that their views on the implementation of the new sales tax are essential. So, I am sure that the government would be very interested in all these petitions, seeking as they are, the views of individual Canadians, groups, organizations and businesses across the country; and seeking to consult and clarify important technical issues regarding the application of the sales tax on individual sectors.

Honourable senators, during the summer, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce heard from a huge number of citizens, businesses and organizations, who, now they have looked at the technicalities, are very anxious to have change. If those changes are made, the basis of the tax, of course, will be completely destroyed.

The staff of the Library of Parliament, who have been good enough to stay open all this time, sent me not only the white paper on tax reform of 1987 but the proposals for tax reform by Mr. Benson in 1969, a tax that, surely, would be easier for citizens to understand, and which had some of the same objectives as the tax proposals of 1987.

We have the proposals for tax reform by Mr. Benson in 1969, and then, in 1971, we have the summary of his tax reform legislation. I am sure honourable senators will remember that that tax reform legislation did not come in in quite the way the minister had intended.

There are a great many documents indicating how many adjustments and changes were made in rates and in rules; and there are long explanations of how to deal with personal income tax and all sorts of issues.

This was the point in 1971 where club fees, convention expenses and entertainment costs were dealt with in some detail. Yachts, lodges and club dues were disallowed. Geographical restrictions were placed on conventions.

Senator Haidasz: Was that in 1971?

Senator Marsden: Yes.

Senator Haidasz: Mr. Benson?

Senator Marsden: Mr. Benson, June 18th, 1971.

Senator Haidasz: Was he lynched on Bay Street?

Senator Marsden: Probably, but that is not in the legislation.

Senator Stewart: Senator Marsden refers to the reform of the income tax law which went into effect, I believe, on January 1st of 1972.

Senator Marsden: It would have been that.

Senator Stewart: Earlier a question was put to me concerning procedure on financial legislation and I mentioned that, in the old days, the Minister of Finance would give his budget and table notices of Ways and Means Motions. These then were taken up in the Committee of Ways and Means and adopted. Subsequently taxation bills emerged from the committee on the basis of the resolutions. When the motion was adopted it became a resolution.

The rules of the House of Commons were changed in December, 1968 so that debate on the Ways and Means motions was given up. Ways and Means motions were still tabled or at least the notices were still tabled so that tax practitioners could examine the scheme.

As I recall, this created a problem in 1971 because the rules of the House of Commons required that a tax bill coincide exactly with the Ways and Means motion, but Mr. Benson's Ways and Means motion was so detailed that, when the bill was before the house, it proved very difficult to move the amendment because the bill, as amended, would not coincide with the Ways and Means motion.

I wonder, honourable senators—and I am talking particularly to Senator Marsden who has the floor—if an effort has been made to ascertain that the goods and service tax bill is in conformity with the Ways and Means motions and, if not, could someone undertake to see that it is in conformity because, if it is not in conformity, then there is a real procedural problem.

Senator Marsden: Senator Stewart, you are raising a very important question and task that, I imagine, will have to be undertaken at a later date. If we are to follow the advice of Senator Simard, it certainly does not conform with the Ways and Means motion because earlier he expressed his enthusiasm for incorporating many of the changes that witnesses had brought forward. I think we still have a major task ahead of us.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Stewart, does this mean that, if amendments are presented for a money bill—a bill asking for supply—the legislators proposing the amendments are constrained by a Ways and Means motion?

Senator Stewart: You are confusing Ways and Means and supply. They are quite different matters.

Senator Gigantès: Would they be constrained in either case?

Senator Stewart: An appropriation bill has to be founded directly on the supply votes set forth in the estimates and adopted.

Senator Gigantès: What about a tax bill?

Senator Stewart: In the case of a tax bill, any clause in the bill has to be in conformity with the Ways and Means motion.

Senator Gigantès: What about amendments?

Senator Stewart: There again, it could run into very serious problems but, as Senator Marsden has said, let's not cross that bridge because we may never come to it.

Senator Marsden: It is interesting to note that, in the 1971-1972 tax changes, the Minister of Finance followed the advice that Professor Bodeway would urge on the current government.

Last night I had the opportunity to read into the record some of the words of Professor Robin Bodeway who is strongly opposed to this tax as are all the other petitioners who appeared before the committee. They are opposed to this tax on the grounds the federal government ought to stick to income tax and leave sales tax to another level of jurisdiction. Of course the tax changes of 1971-1972 largely dealt with income tax, and the kinds of changes that have occurred in the last 18 years. Senator Stewart talked about the charms of the 19th century, well, here are some of the charms of 1971.

There was, of course, provision for a single taxpayer, and a married taxpayer. There was a married exemption for supporting a dependant and there were conditions under which that must occur. There were deductions for children under the age of 16, children over the age of 16, and other dependants.

There was also a special category for unmarried clergymen. I would suppose that such a category no longer exists in the tax law.

Senator Gigantès: Could you clarify why you think that? I mean, what is the point of the entry and why do you feel that entry was made, Senator Marsden?

Senator Marsden: I have no idea why the entry was made but my view would be that you can no longer have a category: "Unmarried clergymen".

Senator Gigantès: Are you suggesting there are no longer any unmarried clergy?

Senator Marsden: I think they would simply be called "clergy", there being clergy of both sexes.

Senator Gigantès: Since your field is sociology, I was wondering if you were making a social commentary about the marital habits of clergymen?

Senator Marsden: In a sense I am because, under the law, as it existed until 1972, an unmarried clergyman could deduct a thousand dollars if a full-time servant was employed in his dwelling but, under the new law, that unmarried clergyman was to have no deduction. Servant or no servant, there was no deduction for an unmarried clergyman. There is now no category for married clergymen, with or without servants. That had gone by 1972.

There is also a category for elderly tax payers, people who nowadays would, unfortunately, be called "seniors".

Senator Gigantès: Why, "unfortunately?"

Senator Marsden: I think "elderly" is a much more pleasant term. Their exemption was increased to $650 and extended to taxpayers aged 65 or over, whereas under the previous law, the exemption was $500 but the taxpayer had to be 70 years of age or over. Age 65 was gaining recognition in the early 1970s. The Guaranteed Income Supplement, which, of course, was already in place, was exempted in 1972.

There was a special deduction which was increased to $650 a year for individuals who were blind or confined to a bed or wheelchair.

There were also child care expenses. Up until this time there had been no deductions for child care expenses. By 1972 they were at last beginning to recognize the child care expense of two-earner families. In this new bill you could deduct up to $500 per child under 14, or over 14 and infirm, up to a limit of $2,000 per family; but the deductions could not exceed two-thirds of the income of the parent claiming the deduction, whichever one that was, and receipts were required. Furthermore it had to be deducted by the mother unless the mother was unable to work. Of course, they meant "work in the paid labour force" because, of course, the mother was working. That is the sort of sloppy distinction they would not be able to get away with now.

Payments to dependants or relatives under 21 did not qualify, so you could not pay your younger sister for looking after the children. A lot of assumptions made in this law have gone by the board.

Then there were deductions for employment expenses and expenses incurred when working away from home. Moving expenses could be deducted from income tax but you had to move 25 miles closer to your job. It is interesting to note that it does not say 25 or more miles closer to your job, it had to be exactly 25 miles.

Senator Gigantès: If your job was six miles you did not get the deduction.

Senator Marsden: Or 25 and a half, I guess. That too would be interesting for scholars and future scholars of fiscal history. There were special tax rules for students.

A whole list of medical expenses could be deducted, including expenses paid to training institutions. Premiums to plans other than government plans were classified medical expenses. There were expenses for which the taxpayer had been reimbursed under a plan not classified as medical expenses. The employer's contributions to all government plans would result in a taxable benefit.

The old law was considerably more complicated. Under this new law you could deduct your contributions to unemployment insurance but benefits were taxable. We then come to club fees which I have already mentioned.

There were also interesting changes respecting charitable donations. Under the old law, donations to registered charitable institutions were limited to 10 per cent of net income, but donations to federal and provincial governments were deductible without limit. I wonder if that meant you could deduct your tax, which, in a sense, is a donation to federal and provincial governments. Under the new law the same provisions existed for donations to governments but these were still unlisted.

There was a new limit on charitable donations of 20 per cent net income. It notes that donations to national amateur athletic associations would now qualify. Probably some of the more enthusiastic athletes in the house had had an influence on this.

Then there were lots of complicated rules respecting pension plans, registered retirement savings plans and deferred profit.

Fellowships, scholarships and bursaries were also dealt with.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Marsden, would please not spare us those complicated rules because later we will be looking at the bizarre complexity of the GST and to have a standard of comparison with the "bizarrerie" of the GST might be useful.

Senator Marsden: If you will forgive me, Senator Gigantes, I will give you the reference. It is page 14 of "The Introduction to Budget Measures and Tax Reformation Legislation, June 18th, 1971".

Senator Gigantès: Thank you.

Senator Marsden: It is interesting, but it is especially complicated at the oral level. It is probably the kind of detail one would want to read.

Whereas fellowships, scholarships and bursaries up until 1972 were not taxable unless they were related to employment, in that year this support became taxable with an annual exemption of $500. It seems to me that that is an extraordinary change. It would be interesting to know why they would start taxing fellowships, scholarships and bursaries. They must have thought students were becoming too rich. Training allowances and research grants became taxable as well—taxable with a deduction for research expenditures.

Senator Gigantès: How much?

Senator Marsden: It does not say.

Senator Gigantès: Does that relate to all expenditures?

Senator Marsden: Yes, except for research expenditures because before they had not been taxable.

Then there was income averaging with five-year-block averaging for farmers and fishermen. That was retained under the new law. There was also provision for general averaging for all taxpayers whose income in the year exceeded a four-year average by 20 per cent and the immediately preceding year by 10 per cent. You all know that income averaging is something that has been highly contentious over the last few years.

Servicemen were a special category.

It is very interesting but, in comparison to GST it is very straightforward.

Perhaps I could just table one more petition. This one lists number of residents from Laurier Avenue, Ringsley Avenue and Morland Court, Milton. There are names from Campbellville, Ontario.

Senator Gigantès: Camel?

Senator Marsden: Campbellville. There are names of people from Acton, Ontario and from Willow Avenue and Wakefield Road, No. 14 Side Road, Wilson Drive, Pine Street, Millside Drive, Frobisher Boulevard, Martin Street, Syer Drive, Ann Boulevard and Broadway Street in Milton. There are also people from Hornby, Ontario and more residents of Milton.

Honourable senators, I would ask to table this next page of petitioners, all of whom are prepared to sign their names and to give their addresses and postal codes in the hope that the government will listen to the fact that they are unhappy about the GST. They are calling upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

Senator Stewart: Well, honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions from persons humbly praying and calling upon the Parliament of Canada to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

The first petition I should like to present is one bearing some 28 names, one has been cut off. I call attention particularly to the name of Mary Smiley of Port Dufferin in Halifax County, Nova Scotia. She and these other persons pray that the proposed goods and services tax will not be passed by the Parliament of Canada.

Further, honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition from 30 persons, apparently all in Nova Scotia, praying that this house will reject the proposed goods and services tax. I would particularly note the name of Barbara M. Marshall, Post Office Box 75, Bickerton West, Nova Scotia. That is in Guysborough County, Nova Scotia.

Bickerton West is a rather famous fishing village. The name Marshall is unusual there. The common names are Kaiser and Hiltz. The important point is that Barbara M. Marshall prays this house for the rejection of the goods and services tax.

I understand that other senators wish to present petitions on behalf of Canadian citizens and I consequently yield the floor.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc (Saurel): Some people sign a little quickly—their signatures look like a doctor's scrawl. It is very hard to read their writing.

Senator Corbin: Where are they from?

Senator Leblanc: They are all from Quebec, from the Saint-Luc area. I think it is on the South shore, near Montreal.

Senator Gigantès: It is a nice part of the country, close to Saint-Jean. I am from Delorimier.

Senator Leblanc: There are some people on this list from Noëlville, Ontario. Does anyone know where Noëlville is? They must be friends of people from Saint-Luc, because their names are with the others from Saint-Luc. But the address they give is: Rural Route 1, Noëlville, Ontario.

Senator Gigantès: They do not have it here, unfortunately. It is close to Sudbury, in the District of Sudbury, at 48 degrees, 9 minutes north, and 80 degrees, 47 minutes west. It was named after either G. Warren, G. Emily Warren, a member of the Ontario legislature in 1920, or Ralph N. Warren, who is a member of the NDP. They must be friends, because they are in the same group. That is interesting.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Gigantès: Are there a lot of Samsons?

Senator Leblanc: No, just one.

Senator Hébert: Are there any people in Saint-Luc who are in favour of the GST?

Senator Leblanc: They told me about those who are against it.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Gigantès: Is it in the Sudbury area?

Senator Leblanc: No, it is in Saint-Luc. I know where Mascouche is because one of my sons lives there. This is not him, however.

Senator David: That is interesting!

Senator Hébert: Those are nice Quebec names, they are nice to hear. It is a real poem!

Senator David: It is comforting in the morning! What is the population of that region?

Senator Hébert: You will know when we are finished; we are going to read the petitions. They are all here.

Senator David: I just wanted to have an idea of how many people lived in that city to know when we would finish.

Senator Leblanc: I have no idea. Saint-Luc is not very big.

Senator David: It is not very big. It is not very big, go ahead, we will be patient, dear Senator!

Senator Leblanc: You can check, you will see. We will cross him off, his name is illegible.

Senator Hébert: We cannot count them but there are millions. So even if one is missing, it does not matter.

Senator Leblanc: Yes, there!

Senator David: Senator Hébert, are you trying to spin it out?

Senator Gigantès: We are thickening it with a little bit of flour!

Senator David: But that will not make a good cake, I can assure you!

Senator Gigantès: That does not matter. You are the ones who always get "les gros gâteaux", which is French for big cakes. That is because you have the money.

Senator David: So you are giving the etymology of French words!

Senator Gigantès: "Gaga, gâteaux". It has the same derivative.

Senator Leblanc: "Gaga, gâteaux", that makes it easier to swallow!

Senator David: Gaga, gâteaux! You could make a poem with that!

Senator Gigantès: They call us the sweet guys. You, over there are the bad guys and we are the sweet guys.

Senator David: We are finally having intelligent discussions. We are making progress!

Senator Gigantès: If you do not like it, do not get involved.

Senator Hébert: If you stop interrupting us, we can finish the list of Saint-Luc residents and go on to another town.

Senator Leblanc: Well, that one is in Longueuil.

Senator Gigantès: I am not in Longueuil!

Senator Leblanc: For the group of 240, it is the last page. So you will be done with that petition forever.

Senator Hébert: There are others!

Senator Leblanc: I have others here but I am going to stop after this petition.

Thank you for being so attentive.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I suppose nobody will be startled in this chamber if I announce that I have a number of petitions to read. The first contains 26 names and reads as follows:

> On the subject of the proposed national goods and services tax—

An Hon. Senator: Are they from Canada or the United States?

Senator Bosa: That is a fair question. If the honourable gentleman will bear with me, I will read the names and addresses of the signatories and give their province and postal code.

Senator Corbin: The postal code says it all.

Senator Bosa: The petition reads as follows:

> The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read)

One of the gentlemen listed here must be Egyptian and he must be writing in the language of his ancestors because his name is absolutely impossible to read, so I will skip it.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Bosa: The next petition I have before me—

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just before Senator Bosa reads the next petition, may I refer to something I put on the record yesterday morning? I do so just to put on the record the concern that I am sure both sides of the house have for some of our staff resulting from this extended sitting. We have spoken of the pages who have problems with their academic careers. Yesterday morning when I arrived here, about 4:00 in the morning, I discovered an envelope which had been slipped under my door. There was a letter in it from Mr. O'Meara of the Senate Debates Office and rather than tell you what the letter is about, I will simply read it.

• (0800)

> Dear Senator Frith. It is now 3:40 A.M. on Saturday, October 13, 1990, or should I say 9940 hours on Tuesday, October 9, 1990, seeing as it is still Tuesday in the Chamber.
> Just like most other employees of the Senate, I have not seen my wife or son for the better part of a week. Without sounding like I am blowing my horn, and I am sure that you feel the same way, the employees deserve a lot of credit for putting in the hours that we are. However, I think that our spouses and our families deserve as much or even more credit for putting up with our schedules and keeping the home fires burning. Perhaps it would be appropriate for you to mention in the Chamber the forgotten spouses and children who have had to cope with the marathon.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: And as I said yesterday morning, "Amen."

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I would continue with my second petition which has five names and it reads as follows:

Subsequent to the proposed national goods and services tax, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

An Hon. Senator: There must be an awful lot of votes —-

Senator Hastings: There are no votes there.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable Senators, yesterday I was reading some petitions from Lethbridge, Alberta. I though you had some petitions?

Senator Cochrane: Well, I do, but they aren't yours, madam.

Senator Frith: In favour of the GST?

Senator Cochrane: No, it's just one I was looking for.

Senator Fairbairn: Yesterday I was reading some petitions from Lethbridge, Alberta. They were sent to me from the book store at the University of Lethbridge from where students, faculty and staff have been sending petitions in fairly regularly. I have probably brought over 500 of them to the Senate, including the ones I have with me now.

They basically focus on the GST as it will apply to books, magazines, newspapers, and other printed material, and they urge the Senate to see that the tax-free status of this material remains in tact.

I will continue from where I left off yesterday.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Forrestall: Is it necessary to read all these names?

Senator Fairbairn: Just on that point, senator, I know that when I was sent these petitions it was requested that if at all possible I should read the names out.

Senator Forrestall: Just as long as you are aware of the dangers—

Senator Fairbairn: Yes. Well, the people signing these petitions were certainly signing them with a view—

Senator Forrestall: But there is no need to publicize their names and addresses.

Senator Fairbairn: Well, I was informed that these people signed with the full understanding these names and addresses should be made public.

Senator Forrestall: Yes, but we don't really need them.

Senator Fairbairn: I certainly do. I know if I were signing a petition, I would believe it should be public.

Senator Forrestall: Yes, but if everybody were as bright and as—

Senator Fairbairn: Oh, that's very kind of you, Senator Forrestall.

Senator Forrestall: There are no votes in that—

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you.

Evidently these students are in the new residences which were opened yesterday at the University of Alberta in a very colourful native ceremony. The new residences are named after the Treaty Seven Tribes in southwestern Alberta.

Senator Cogger might be interested to know that, had I been able to attend I would have been able to wear the ceremonial headdress I received this summer when I became Chief Morning Bird of the Kainai Chieftanship of the Blood Nation. However, other things have kept all of us here in Ottawa.

(Names of signatories read)

J. Boris, Box 303, Picture Butte, Alberta. Yesterday I was explaining to senators that one of the strongpoints of the University of Lethbridge is that it is surrounded by small communities in the agricultural area of our province. Without the proximity of this small university, probably many of the young people would not continue on to post-secondary education, having to move to Edmonton or Calgary.

I suppose that another reason for the names that keep coming in from the university from students is the pressure that area has had on it for the past decade because of the truly disastrous conditions faced by the agricultural industry. This year we have one of the best crops in recent memory but we have had hardly any gain in selling our grain because of low prices.

Picture Butte is a town—

Senator Frith: Picturesque name.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, Senator Frith, and you may remember well that a few years ago Picture Butte was in a lamentable state when the government withdrew its support from the sugar beet industry. There wasn't a sugar beet harvest for a year in southwestern Alberta, which effectively put about 600 farmers on the skids and had a tremendous effect on the economy of that area. Happily, though, by working together, the farmers and political representatives of every political party in the area, were able to pressure the government and we managed to get a ten-year, three-party agreement to keep the industry alive.

Senator Frith: Thanks to you.

Senator Fairbairn: Unfortunately, this year they are having a difficult time harvesting their beets because of the weather conditions. It is very warm in southern Alberta. A cold snap is needed so that the tons and tons of beets that are piling up can be stored, or else the sugar content is at risk. So the sugar campaign, as they call it, is having a great deal of difficulty getting underway in that area.

Senator Frith: The harvest is called a campaign?

Senator Fairbairn: It is called a campaign. It is quite interesting in that, like the Senate these days, the campaign goes on for 24 hours a day. Trucks from all the little communities, loaded with beets, drive night and day, dumping their cargo into literally mountains of beets at the sugar beet factory in Taber, Alberta. I am sure I can say a little bit more about that when I get to the students from Taber.

Senator Frith: They don't hold them in silos in the meantime?

Senator Fairbairn: There are no silos large enough to hold the beet production in southern Alberta. The beets are moved in large trucks from the fields right to the sugar beet factory.

(Names of signatories read)

Here is a student who has come down from the central part of Alberta to attend our university. He comes from a community named after a pioneer priest in Alberta, Father Lacombe, who is very well known in our provincial history.

That concludes this particular petition. I carry on again from the University of Lethbridge, again petitioning the Senate of Canada to take action to ensure that the tax free status of magazines, books and newspapers, will be maintained in spite of the provisions of the GST.

Lee Neville, 59—

Senator Forrestall: There's an interesting name.

Senator Fairbairn: That's right, Senator Forrestall. I wonder if it could be a combination of those two families of the former Bill Lee, Bill Neville Enterprises. At any rate, there it is, Lee Neville.

(Names of signatories read)

I see the name David Collingridge of 3811 15th Avenue, Vernon, British Columbia. He is a student who was attracted to our university. We have a very vigorous President, Dr. Howard Tennant, and Chancellor, Doctor Keith Robin. Rather than just staying within the academic realm of Lethbridge, they make regular recruiting visits throughout southwestern Alberta, parts of Saskatchewan and also nearby parts of British Columbia, including Vernon, of course, which is in the beautiful fruit-growing valley of British Columbia, the Okanagan, I believe. Am I right, Senator van Roggen?

Senator van Roggen: Vernon is in British Columbia. It is a beautiful place. Ever been there?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes. Is it in the Okanagan Valley?

Senator van Roggen: Just north of Kelowna, south of Kamloops.

Senator Fairbairn: And Nelson is in that area?

Senator van Roggen: There is a very, very nice hotel there. We have conventions there quite often.

Senator Fairbairn: I know, I have been to that hotel. It is a beautiful spot and I am very happy that students from that area choose to take their post-secondary education in the University of Lethbridge.

Senator Fairbairn: Incidentally, Terry Whitehead is a student that one takes absolute joy in. He is bright; he is personable, he is aggressive and he has a great sense of public spirit. He is president of the student's union at the University of Lethbridge.

Senator Hastings: Is he a Liberal?

Senator Fairbairn: I have never actually asked Terry his politics, but he certainly is very effective in the politics of the University of Lethbridge, and of course would have been prominent at the convocation yesterday, and the opening of the beautiful new residences which I keep mentioning because I am incredibly sad that I was unable to be present to participate in that opening.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Fairbairn: The next petition I have is also from the University of Lethbridge and, like the last two, the signatures on this petition were also collected at the University of Lethbridge bookstore. It was signed by the students and staff of the faculty, all urging the Senate to take action to ensure that the magazines, books and newspapers of Canada continue to be published, circulated and sold without tax, as has been the case in our country since Confederation.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Fairbairn: The next petition is also from the bookstore of the University of Lethbridge, upon which hundreds of signatures have been affixed urging the Senate to use whatever methods it has to maintain the tax-free status of magazines, books and newspapers.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as I explained a few moments ago, Picture Butte, Alberta, is a small community in southwestern Alberta whose economy is dominated by the sugar beet industry. There are only two places in Canada now which are sugar beet producers. One is in southwestern Alberta and the other one is in southern Manitoba.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators will have noticed that there are a number of names of students who come from parts of southeast Asia and Japan. The University of Lethbridge, from its inception back in the late 1960s, has made a considerable effort to encourage foreign students to come to this small university, and we have a number of exchange programs with, in particular, centres of education in Japan. Also, there has been effort in recent years to bring a number of students from the People's Republic of China who wish to come and study at our university, and they are extremely welcome there.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Fairbairn: Again, the next petition comes from the bookstore of the University of Lethbridge, containing signatures urging the Senate of Canada to assist in maintaining the tax-free status of magazines, books and newspapers in this country.

Honourable senators, yesterday when I was reciting some of these petitions, I may have mentioned that the costs associated with post-secondary education are becoming increasingly prohibitive in our country, on individuals as well as on universities themselves. In our province—and I am sure in other provinces—this necessitates the maintenance of a fairly rigid quota system which is now preventing some students from entering our universities. For example, the University of Lethbridge, for the first time in its history, has totally filled its quota this year and will probably have to turn away students next year. That is very sad.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have yet another petition from the University of Lethbridge bookstore, urging the Senate of Canada to use its powers to maintain the tax-free status of magazines, books and newspapers.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I see there are a number of names on this petition with addresses in Cardston, Alberta. Cardston is a very well-known community in our area. It is historic in that Cardston, as we now know it, was first settled by a group of people who came up from the Salt Lake City area in the State of Utah which was—and still remains—the world centre of the Mormon religion. So the small community of Cardston, Alberta, was settled back in the early days by Mormon settlers, and the temple that was erected in this very tiny community is a magnificent piece of architecture. It is a major tourist attraction in our area and also one of the most important centrepieces for the Mormon Church here in Canada. That church is, of course, known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

Honourable senators, that completes the reading of this particular petition.

Senator van Roggen, would you like to bring us word from British Columbia?

Hon. George van Roggen: Yes, honourable senators. I also have some scintillating petitions that I would like to present to the Senate on behalf of the petitioners. I do not know that I can do the same justice to these petitioners as Senator Fairbairn has done. However, coming as I do from British Columbia, I will start with some British Columbia petitions.

This petition states:

> The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada, who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable House will therefore provide a remedy.

I do not intend to go through the preamble of the petition, other than to say that the first few petitions I have reflect the concerns that many people have with respect to the GST being applied to books. When people complain about the GST being applied to books, it is not just the initial rate of this tax, I am sure, that they are concerned about but the fact that the tax will couple with provincial tax—if provincial harmony is eventually brought into this system and should the bill now before this house pass. We would then see a tax on books of anywhere from 15 to 20 per cent, depending on the province.

This petition is dated September 24, 1990 and contains the following names.

• (0930)

The first petitioner on this next petition is signed September 24, 1990. He has printed this all very neatly, and I am sure that if petitioners realized that their petitions are to be taken seriously and read into the record of the Senate, many more of them would take the trouble to print or write their names legibly and print their addresses legibly.

(Names of signatories read)

I have not heard of this address before, 413 Louis Riel House. Well, that is understandable. They obviously named a residence at Simon Fraser University after Louis Riel.

Senator Marchand: A great man.

Senator van Roggen: Yes, a great man.

(Names of signatories read)

That is the last name on that petition, but the following petition was taken at the same location one day later on September 25, 1990. It is in the usual proper form. It is on the same subject, the application of the tax to magazines, books, and newspapers.

(Names of signatories read)

Well, of course, the students are particularly concerned with this provision of the tax.

An Hon. Senator: Absolutely. It affects them.

Senator van Roggen: It affect them very directly. With the price of books today, I could hardly afford to buy hardbacks myself.

(Names of signatories read)

When I see names like Jarvis Street, it takes me back to my youth. These people are in the west end where I grew up.

An Hon. Senator: I didn't know you had a Jarvis Street in Vancouver.

Senator Van Roggen: Sure. Some people call it Jurvis Street. We always refer to it as Jarvis Street; down by Stanley Park.

(Names of signatories read)

I will hand these petitions to the pages when I am finished with them and not bother them with each page at a time. The next one continues in the same vein on the same subject in the same proper form, dated the next day, September 26. I suppose it is fairly obvious from this that they collected that number of names. They filled one of these out by circulating them each day on consecutive days. This is now the third of those days, September 26. Yes, I see the next one is September 27.

(Names of signatories read)

Quite a few of these students, while out at the university, are living down in the west end. Nicholas Street is where I was born.

(Names of signatories read)

Well, Senator Frith, I know you have been busy here for the last number of weeks, but I didn't know that you had time to get out to Vancouver to sign one of these petitions. Anyway, the next name is not really a signature; it is printed in large, bold type, "Frith".

Senator Frith: A member of the Frith family.

An Hon. Senator: Did you say printed?

Senator van Roggen: Well, it looks more like print than a signature. It must be a family trade of some sort.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, it seems to me—I don't have the reference right here but I think it is in Beauchesne—that they have to be signatures on a petition. I don't believe they can be printed; they certainly can't be typed. On the other hand, I agree that someone might have a signature that looks like a printed word. How can we discover which is which? Would this be a relative? Can you research that?

An Hon. Senator: There is a citation in Erskine May about the origin of petitions. I was reading it here the other night myself. The person can make a mark, or any other sign; as long as it is a mark that has been made by the person, it is acceptable.

An Hon. Senator: Providing that is the normal way that person offers his or her signature. It can't be sort of a random mark. It has to be regularly used for signature identification.

Senator Frith: I can say that my kinsmen tend to be rather proud of their name. It is quite possible that it was a signature, because the person wanted the name to be clearly understood. We might consider, at a later date, referring the question to a committee.

Senator Kelly: I just want to comment briefly. I am surprised that that is the case, given that our colleague, Senator Frith, is anything but extroverted in this chamber. He tends to be retiring and sort of wanting to fade into the background. It pleases me that some of the other members of his family are more aggressive.

• (1000)

Senator van Roggen: I am afraid I must apologize to all honourable senators for misleading the Senate. It may be simply the hour of the day, but looking at this signature more carefully, I see that it is not "Frith". It is "Firth". I am awfully sorry.

An Hon. Senator: Clearly a time-wasting tactic.

Senator Frith: Providing a nice little recess.

Senator van Roggen: In defence of Mr. C. Firth, it is very possible that is the way he writes, because his address, in Burnaby, is also in a printed form of writing. So it may be his style.

(Names of signatories read)

Well, now, she is a long way from home, if she is from Tumbler Ridge, which, of course, is where the coal is mined in the northeast portion of British Columbia.

I move to the next petition, taken from the same area, on the same subject, in the same printed form, which is in the proper form, commencing, as usual, "As in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray," etcetera, dated September 27. That is a subsequent date to the previous one, 1990.

(Names of signatories read)

I think the west end has a lot of rooming houses and apartment houses where students tend to find accommodation. Of course, it is a delightful part of Vancouver to live in because it is very close to Stanley Park and the beaches and downtown.

Senator Frith: What is the street?

Senator van Roggen: Berkeley Street.

(Names of signatories read)

That is one of the steepest hills in Vancouver, Triumph Street. As kids, we used to toboggan on that street. In fact, it was such a good toboggan run that the police, whenever it would snow in Vancouver, which was not that often, would block off Trembley Street so the kids could toboggan safely.

Senator Frith: How civilized.

Senator van Roggen: That is a Vancouver tradition for tobogganing.

(Names of signatories read)

Kelowna is just south of Vernon.

Senator Marchand: It is my own home area. Do you know the origin of the name "Kelowna"?

Senator van Roggen: No.

Senator Marchand: You do not know the origin of the name, "Kelowna"?

Senator van Roggen: I probably should, but I do not.

Senator Marchand: Well, "Kelowna" really is "Keelowna", and it means "grizzly bear" in the Okanagan language.

Senator van Roggen: In the Okanagan language, the Okanagan Indians?

Senator Marchand: Yes.

Senator van Roggen: Isn't that interesting. I have not seen many grizzly bears around there, mostly orchards.

(Names of signatories read)

Those are the last of the petitions I have of that particular group concerning the application of the GST to books and magazines taken, as I understand, at the campus of the Simon Fraser University in Vancouver.

The next petition I have is in the same form:

> The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable Senate will therefor provide a remedy.

This is on a somewhat different subject insofar as the tax is concerned, so I will read the preamble.

> Whereas the new universal 7 per cent federal goods and services tax adopted by the Conservative Government will create serious, unjust, and inhumane difficulties to Canadians; whereas the implementation of this tax will constitute an unprecedented assault on the income of Canadians, not only by forcing them to pay higher taxes but also by confronting them with a rise in inflation, interest rates and unemployment; wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to reject this new goods and services tax. Canadian producers are carrying out their job perfectly by flooding the market with products, but they cannot produce money. The government must, therefore, set up a national credit office to create the money required for the existence of new wealth and abundance.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, I have a number of other petitions. However, since Senator Keon is in the chamber, I would like to compliment his profession by honouring a Vancouver physician who installed in me an artificial knee two or three years ago. The operation was so successful that, as I have just demonstrated, I can stand on it for one hour.

Hon. Peter Stollery: Honourable senators, I have a few names to read. They are the names of people who object to the proposal regarding magazines, books and newspapers.

The petitioners point out that the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word has been a cornerstone of democracy since Confederation. They feel that this taxing of magazines, books and newspapers jeopardizes democracy. Many of these names, at least on the first petition that I propose to read are from the Metropolitan Toronto area.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition which also protests the possible application of a tax on magazines, books and newspapers. This petition asks that the Senate reaffirm the historical principle of not taxing the printed word.

Senator Phillips: I am sorry to interrupt my honourable friend. I know he is going through a remedial reading course, but I wonder if he could bring Senator Gigantès back to spell him for a while.

Senator Stollery: He will be along.

Senator Hastings: And tell him you missed him.

Senator Lefebvre: If you don't watch out, we will bring Colin Kenny back.

Senator Stollery: I thought that Senator van Roggen had taken the Kenny course.

Senator Phillips: I will even take Colin Kenny over this.

Senator Stollery: Here are some more names.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Carney: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Stollery: Certainly.

Senator Carney: I think that senators on this side are finding this presentation extremely parochial. We realize that Senator Stollery has a very narrow interest—

Senator Frith: It is the little people.

Senator Carney: —in view of his discussion of street names in Toronto. Those of us from western Canada or the Maritimes may have a wider vision of the country than Senator Stollery. My question, however, is this: Is Senator Stollery aware that the Rules of the Senate, as outlined at page 57 under the heading "Presentation of Petitions", carries this description?

> Documents are tabled by the Leader of the Government or by a senator on his behalf. No debate is allowed at this stage except with the consent of the Senate, but a brief explanation may be given of any document.

Is Senator Stollery aware that that is the rule regarding Presentation of Petitions in this Chamber?

Senator Stollery: Unfortunately the Honourable Senator Carney was not here a few moments ago to hear her colleague, Senator van Roggen, explaining in an interesting way some of the addresses in Vancouver.

I think that some senators may find a discussion of the Metropolitan Toronto area to be quite interesting. Other senators may not.

Senator Hastings: This is part of of Senator Stollery's brief explanation.

Senator Stollery: I am trying to describe the part of Canada in which these people live. I was interested in hearing from Senator van Roggen about Vancouver. I assume that people from Vancouver would be interested in hearing something about the Metropolitan Toronto area, where I came from.

Senator Davey: Senator Stollery made mention of Ajax. I think it is interesting to note that yesterday, in the sports pages of the Ottawa Citizen, there was a picture of Bob Bond, who was one of the all-time-great Maple Leaf hockey players. On one occasion he scored a goal with his leg broken. That was one of the historical events in Stanley Cup history. He happens to be a close friend of mine. Senators will be interested to know that he is now in the doughnut business and his store, Tim Horton's, is in Ajax.

Senator Carney: Perhaps the senator would permit a question. What do his remarks have to do with the petitions and how does he explain his intervention? It violates the rule on the presentation of petitions.

Senator Davey: As I understood Senator Carney, and perhaps I was wrong, I thought she was seeking that type of information. That is why I brought the matter forward. Senator Stollery made several references to Ajax and I thought that perhaps it would be more interesting for Senator Carney to have that fact as well.

Senator Stollery: Yes. I must say, however, that all of these questions are causing me to lose my place in this petition. I may be obliged to start all over again at the beginning. I am sure that honourable senators would not want to miss any of these names.

Senator Davey: I don't think it is necesary for Senator Stollery to go back to the beginning.

Senator Carney: We agree.

Senator Stollery: I will resume reading the names.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, that concludes this petition. I have another petition, which by some amazing coincidence protests the intention to apply the tax to magazines, books and newspapers. It points out—and I had not realized this—that since Confederation we have never taxed magazines, books and newspapers. Of course, the idea of taxing the printed word is repugnant to the people who signed this petition.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1115)

These petitions have certainly moved around the Metropolitan area. I am impressed by the work that was done to collect the names because a great deal of mileage was put on taking this petition around.

(Names of signatories read)

That finishes that petition, honourable senators, and I have one more for now. I do not want to interfere with any other member who might want to have a word on this matter, so I will try to move along a little more quickly.

Senator Frith: No, no one is asking you to do that.

Senator Carney: You would not want to hold up the Senate.

Senator Stollery: I certainly would not want to hold up the procedure.

The next petition has 25 names protesting the tax on magazines, books and newspapers.

(Names of signatories read)

That is the final name on this petition, honourable senators. Although I have quite a few more petitions, at this moment I would like to sit down and turn the floor over to Senator Lefebvre.

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Honourable senators, I too have petitions I would like to present. For a little change of pace from Metropolitan Toronto, we will go to the province of Nova Scotia.

Senator Phillips: I think it is very unusual for someone from the province of Quebec to read petitions from Nova Scotia. Surely there must be some senator from Nova Scotia on duty today.

Senator Frith: There is. Senator Buchanan.

Senator Phillips: I am thinking of over there, on the empty side, among the juvenile delinquents. Is no senator from Nova Scotia on duty?

Senator Lefebvre: I would like to advise Senator Phillips that I am only complying with a recent request from one of your members that we should not be too parochial. Therefore, although I am from the province of Quebec and read a number of petitions yesterday from my own province, I thought I would move ahead to Nova Scotia for awhile. The former premier is here and he is very anxious to hear me read these names; so I hope you will not interfere.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1145)

Honourable senators, the next petition I have is also from Nova Scotia.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Lefebvre: Honourable senators, I have another petition from residents of Nova Scotia.

(Names of signatories read)

[Translation]

Senator David: Before reading another list of petitions, I would like to know whether you are a senator representing Nova Scotia? Because as far as I know, you represent a Quebec region.

Senator Lefebvre: That is correct.

Senator David: Then I can easily see why you are having trouble locating the names of the streets and even the towns in Nova Scotia, unless you have a cottage in that province. Do you have a cottage in Nova Scotia?

Senator Lefebvre: No, sir.

Senator David: Then, if you do not have a cottage in Nova Scotia and you are reading petitions from that province, that means those petitions were either sent to you or given to you by someone else. Could you explain to me how your constituents or the people you represent or those Nova Scotia residents managed to give to you, Senator Lefebvre, those petitions, which, I presume, you are reading on behalf of those you represent?

Senator Lefebvre: That is very easy to answer, Senator David. The petitions are sent to us in boxes of thousands from one end of the country to the other. As Canadian senators to the federal Parliament, we then take the petitions and we read the names of the Canadian citizens, regardless of whether they are from Quebec, Nova Scotia, British Columbia, the Northwest Territories, Ontario, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland. It does not matter. In our view, each of those Canadians exercised his inherent right to address the Canadian Parliament, to have a senator read the petition and to table it on their behalf. Yesterday and last evening I had petitions from the region of Norton, which we know well, and I will probably have some later this afternoon. Today it is a mixture from Nova Scotia and from Quebec; I might also have a few from Ontario, so I do not see any problem with that.

Senator David: In fact, if I follow you, you are a messenger from Canada Post!

Senator Lefebvre: On the contrary, I am a messenger for the vast majority of Canadians, 82%, I believe, who are opposed to another flawed tax being proposed by the Conservative government. That is all.

Senator Simard: May I ask the senator a question? You say that the tax is flawed; perhaps it is time we started talking about it. We have been messing around here for 125 hours. Perhaps it is time we started talking about the tax, about the federal budget, about the debt that you left us, an incredible debt of $160 billion. Perhaps it is time we started talking about that. How can we get out of it? Not only for ourselves, but for you and for everyone. There is business to discuss here, let us stop messing around. Senator Lefebvre, are you going to stop Canadian citizens, the payers of that flawed tax, from being heard before the Canadian Parliament? Are you trying to stop those people, regardless of whether they are from British Columbia, Quebec or Ontario, from exercising their inherent parliamentary right to be heard? First of all, are you disputing their right, and if you are doing so, why do you not clearly state that you are opposed to the idea of Canadians having the right to being heard in the Canadian Parliament? I am amazed to hear you talk that way; I do not think anyone has ever questioned Canadians' rights to be heard before Parliament through members of the Senate and of the House of Commons. We will talk about the GST and we will talk about it for months because the implementation of another flawed tax that is bad for Canadians must be stopped.

[English]

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators referring to Senator David's point, is it not reasonable to assume that when a senator presents a petition it should be a petition from that senator's region or province?

Senator Frith: Why?

Senator MacDonald: I cannot argue with the right of Senator Lefebvre to read a petition from, for example, residents of British Columbia, if he so wishes, but when was the last time a senator read a petition from a province other than his or her own?

Senator Frith: In the past two or three days, plenty of times.

Senator MacDonald: There is no question about that, but when was the last time before this?

Senator Frith: Suppose I said it was April 3, 1978 what difference would that make?

Senator MacDonald: I would have to take your word.

Senator Frith: But what difference would that make?

Senator MacDonald: Because over the last number of years I have heard petitions read by senators who represent the petitioners.

Senator Frith: Why did you ask when the last time was?

Senator MacDonald: I was thinking that a senator should read a petition from residents of his or her own province.

Senator Frith: Why?

Senator MacDonald: At least, from a decency standpoint, a Nova Scotian senator should read a petition from citizens of Nova Scotia.

Senator Frith: Decency!

Senator MacDonald: Yes. Senators from Nova Scotia might not be on shift now, but perhaps you should wait until they are present before presenting petitions from residents of Nova Scotia. The petitions should be distributed to the appropriate senators.

Would that be asking too much?

Senator Lefebvre: This is the first time I have heard a senator say it was not decent to read out the names of Canadian citizens. It is now on the record that a Conservative senator objects to a senator from Quebec reading petitions from residents of Nova Scotia. He calls it indecent for a senator from Quebec to read petitions from Nova Scotia. The citizens of Nova Scotia are opposed to this nefarious tax. That too is on the record.

Senator MacDonald: I meant "decency" in the sense that citizens should be fairly treated. If it were not for Senator Buchanan and myself correcting Senator Lefebvre on pronunciation of names and places, we would not know where these people come from. The assistance Senator Buchanan and I have given Senator Lefebvre is clear evidence of the point I am making.

Senator Frith: Which is?

Senator MacDonald: That Senator Lefebvre does not know half of the names and places of people in Nova Scotia.

Senator Lefebvre: Thank you for your intervention.

Senator Frith: Senator MacDonald is curious about this procedure. I can tell him one thing; we have not had one complaint from any petitioner regarding who is reading the petitions.

Senator Phillips: Could the Honourable Senator Lefebvre tell me to whom the petition was presented?

Senator Lefebvre: To the Senate of Canada.

Senator Phillips: It must have been presented to one particular senator.

Senator Lefebvre: This petition was sent to Senator Jacques Hébert.

Senator Phillips: I see.

Senator Frith: What is wrong with that?

Senator Phillips: I am intrigued because this shows a strong distrust on the part of the people from Nova Scotia of Liberal senators from Nova Scotia. They would rather send their petitions to Senator Hébert of Quebec.

Senator Lefebvre: I am pleased that this is on the record. I will be using what has transpired in future debates. I thank the honourable senators opposite for putting it on the record that Nova Scotian senators object to Quebec senators reading the names of Nova Scotian citizens who are against the GST.

If you wanted to read a petition from residents of Quebec, I would not object.

I will continue reading the names on this petition.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Lefebvre: I have a petition to present from the citizens of the province of Quebec.

(Names of signatories read)

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I have other petitions to present but there may be some among you who were a bit exasperated by the reading of some of the lists and I will now take my seat for a few moments. I am sure that some of my colleagues are eager, indeed anxious, to have the opportunity to read out other lists of names, perhaps lists of names from another province if, of course, none of you object.

• (1215)

[English]

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I have some petitions which I wish to read. First, I would like to point out that the shift that I am on ends at 2 p.m. I had thought that I would go back to my hotel and watch the football game. The Roughriders are playing Hamilton here today. However, of course, returning briefly to a point I made the other day—there is a blackout on the game.

Senator Frith: Is it an important game?

Senator Davey: Of course it is a key game, and there is a blackout. We will probably all go to our hotel rooms and watch the NFL game. That is exactly what is wrong with the Canadian Football League. I am sorry for bringing it up now; I simply mention it in passing.

I want to also, say for the benefit of Senator Carney, that the petitions that I will be reading are from the Don't Tax Reading Coalition. She might be interested in the groups involved in this coalition. They are: The Antiquarian Booksellers' Association of Canada, The Association of Canadian Publishers, The Canadian Booksellers' Association, Canadian Book Publishers Council, Canadian Community Newspaper Association of Canada, Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association, Canadian Library Association, Canadian Magazine Publishers Association, Periodical Marketers of Canada, the Canadian Teachers' Federation and the Canadian University Press. These organizations are all anxious to maintain a tax rate of zero for books, magazines and newspapers.

We have petitions from all over the country. The petitions that I will be reading are mostly from Toronto.

(Names of signatories read)

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: I rise on a point of order, honourable senators. Rule 25 states:

> A senator desiring to speak in the Senate shall rise in the place where that senator normally sits and address the rest of the senators.

Surely, that rule is in place so that those of us who are new will know who is speaking.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I concede. It is a very bad habit, and I shall attempt to contain my enthusiasm and stay in my place. I am grateful for the direction. If I start to wander off again I would be grateful if you would remind me.

Senator Frith: It comes from his years of experience as a coach walking behind the bench.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I will continue.

(Names of signatories read)

These petitions were sent to me personally by the Don't Tax Reading Coalition. I was asked to draw the attention of honourable senators and the Senate to these petitions. There are many more of them. These organizations want to maintain a tax rate of zero for books, magazines and newspapers, which of course has been the Canadian tradition.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1245)

Senator Davey: I have another petition, honourable senators.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, here are some more petitions from the Don't Tax Reading Coalition.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, I have a further petition.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt the Honourable Senator Davey in his most uninteresting remarks, but I would point out that we on this side have some considerable concern due to the fact that there is no senator from either the Atlantic region or Quebec on the Liberal benches. I think it would be most unfair for the Senate to proceed without representation from Liberal senators of those areas.

Senator Frith: This is what is called reverse quorum, is it?

Senator Phillips: Therefore, honourable senators, I move that the Senate take a break. This will provide those of us on this side—and we have all areas of the country represented—to receive some nutrition. Therefore, I move:

> That the Speaker do leave the Chair until 2 o'clock this afternoon.

Senator Davey: I want to say this to Senator Phillips: I am most grateful. I thought he was rising to complain because I was not reading the postal codes.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate recessed at 12:30 p.m.

At 2:10 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I believe that when the Senate adjourned for lunch at 12:30 Senator Davey was speaking. He has agreed to yield to me at this point. I am delighted to carry on. I am happy, in particular, to see Senator Nurgitz in the Chair.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, how are we to know that Senator Davey agreed to yield? He should be here to tell us that he yields.

Senator Lucier: We could adjourn to ask him.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Did Senator Davey agree to yield?

Senator Molgat: Oh, yes, he agreed to yield. Would the Honourable Senator Phillips like it in writing? I will be happy to get it in writing for him if he so wishes.

Senator Phillips: Senators will recall that we on this side of the house accepted Senator Frith's word. It was promptly broken. That is why I would like to see Senator Davey's word in writing.

Senator Molgat: I do not think that Senator Frith would agree that he broke his word. I think he put on the record the other day how he felt in that regard. I would not want the record to indicate that I acquiesced to Senator Phillips' statement. I do not think Senator Frith would agree with that in the least.

However, I can assure Senator Phillips that Senator Davey did agree, and I have witnesses to back that up.

I repeat that I am particularly pleased to see Senator Nurgitz in the Chair, particularly in light of the petitions I am about to present. Those that I have here are from the area that we in Manitoba know as the "Tory heartland", with which my honourable friend is familiar. In fact, he knows this area so well—and I hope that I am not misquoting him when I say this—that it is alleged by some that, in the last provincial election, he said that they could have run a yellow dog in any of those areas and got it elected. I must say that I was surprised at that statement—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I might say, honourable senators, that I did not say that. This may not be a bad statement, and perhaps it was said in my presence, but I did not say it myself.

I do know that, during the course of the provincial election, Senator Molgat's candidate, who did not have much else to talk about, spent some time talking about that.

Senator Molgat: As I said, my honourable friend was alleged to have made that statement. I did not in any way suggest that he had. We are old friends, after all, and I would not want to put words in his mouth. But the story was that he said that and it was so reported in the press.

This area has been certainly acknowledged over the years to be the "Tory heartland" of Manitoba. I am a little surprised that their petitions should come on pink sheets, but so they do. That is the way it is.

Honourable senators, I have checked these petitions carefully. I think that the wording is absolutely in line with what is required for a petition to the Senate. It has the proper wording of the prayer; for example, they humbly pray and call upon the Senate.

These are general petitions. By that I mean that they are not addressed to any specific item of the tax, such as was the case on my previous intervention when I presented petitions from a group of people objecting particularly to the imposition of the tax on books, periodicals and written material. That was a specific petition. This one merely asks the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

I find it particularly interesting that it should come from that region of Manitoba, the region where one might expect the government to have maximum support. It certainly has had in the past, from an electoral standpoint. Every one of the constituencies in that region is represented by Conservative members. Indeed, two of them are cabinet ministers. The last provincial election reinforced the tradition, as that whole region once again voted Conservative. I think it is particularly important to note that, in the hope that my honourable friends opposite are listening. It is their supporters, people who have staunchly supported the Conservative Party over many years, who are now petitioning the government to change its mind, praying that the government will listen to them. These very people, who have supported the government in an election as recently as the last provincial election in Manitoba, which took place barely a month ago, are sending petitions asking senators opposite to reverse the decision on this tax. I think that senators should listen very carefully to what is being said. They should be putting pressure on the government, on Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Wilson, to reverse the course in which they are now heading.

Honourable senators, these petitioners come from a variety of villages in southern Manitoba and southwestern Manitoba. This region was settled in the late 1800s and early 1900s, largely by immigrants from the province of Ontario and from the old country, England, Scotland and Ireland. In the early years there was very little immigration to this area from other regions. The bulk of the region has a strong Anglo-Saxon basis. These people come by their politics from long-standing family connections.

Therefore, for them to be prepared at this point to voice their opposition in the way in which they have reinforces the need for the government to listen, listen again, review and so on. It seems that at this point they are obstinate in saying that the GST must pass. Their view is that it must pass and that is the end of it. They think that it is essential that that be done. Here are some of the people objecting to this tax.

(Names of signatories read)

I might point out that this particular region of Manitoba, is, from an economic standpoint, closely related to the region of Saskatchewan adjoining it. It is part of the Palliser Triangle. It is the region of Manitoba that is subject to drought. Drought is common in the Palliser Triangle, that area of land which starts just south of Deloraine at the U.S. border, angles northwest towards Regina and southwest again to southern Alberta. In the first phase of exploration in the west, I believe it was Colonel Palliser who was the head of the dominion survey group that surveyed that region and declared it to be a desert. In his view, it should not have been populated. It was a semi-arid region and should not have been put under cultivation. Our recurring droughts in the west have indicated that this might well have been a sound approach. Nevertheless, when the waves of immigration came to the west after the coming of the railway in 1885, the region was settled, as was the adjoining region in southern Saskatchewan.

The experience of that region since then, over a number of years, has been rather disastrous, certainly in the period of the 1930s. When we speak about the Dust Bowl, this region of Deloraine, Waskada and other small villages constituted the one part of Manitoba that was very sadly affected. It was not quite as affected as southern Saskatchewan, however, where many of the settlers simply had to abandon their homes and move out. Here, the bulk of the settlers stayed and suffered through those Depression years and drought years of the 1930s.

The same conditions have been repeated over the last four or five years, where once again the region has been suffering from extreme drought. The precipitation has been down both during summers and winters. There was no snow cover in the spring, which would have provide spring run-off and an opportunity to plant crops. Nevertheless, the bulk of these people stayed. I think it is important to note that. These people who have suffered, particularly in the past, these solid Tory supporters, are simply opposed to what the government is doing. They do not want the government to proceed with the GST.

Senator Carney: Would Senator Molgat permit a question?

Senator Molgat: Certainly.

Senator Carney: Is he discussing the petition or is he moving to debate? Of course, we would like to move to debate. If he is reading the petition, however, I think that he should indeed read it.

Senator Molgat: I certainly will be reading the petition, but I thought it important to give it background. These are not petitioners who are just motivated by partisan considerations. They are basically Tory supporters, the people who have supported your party over the years.

Senator LeBlanc: Not any more.

Senator Molgat: I thought it important to point this out. Simply to read the names without giving some of the background and reasons for the actions of these people would not, in my view, give the petition the meaning that should be given it. If you would like me to go further to debate the GST, I can do so, but that is not what I was doing.

I was trying to point out to senators opposite, who thus far have been refusing to listen to the Canadian people, the fact that the Conservative government has been absolutely obstinate in refusing to listen to the 85 or 90 per cent of the Canadian people who are opposed to the GST. And in spite of recurring reproaches by the Canadian people, the government still refuses to listen.

Therefore, I point out to senators that the petitions I have before me now are those of people who have normally, over the years, been supporters of the Conservative Party, people who, as recently as the provincial election on September 11, reinforced that support by voting again for the Conservative Party. They are, nevertheless, opposed to the GST. I think it is important that senators opposite realize that. Some of them seem to think that these are politically motivated petitions that the Liberal Party somehow or other has gone about seeking them.

Senator Carney: We are delighted to listen to Senator Molgat at any time, but the rules of this chamber state that on presenting petitions no debate is allowed except with the consent of the Senate, which Senator Molgat does not have. A brief explanation may be given of any document, but the rules of the house preclude his making the kind of statement with which he has been entertaining us.

My question is: Could Senator Molgat follow the rules of the Senate as laid out in the rule book? Could he simply proceed with a brief explanation?

Senator Molgat: Yes, I would be delighted to follow the Rules of the Senate, particularly if my honourable friends opposite are prepared to do the same.

POINT OF ORDER

Senator Kelly: On a point of order, honourable senators, if I may, I point out that following the position that was described at page 57 by Senator Carney, I should like to refer to Beauchesne, Fifth Edition, at page 213. I acknowledge the fact that this restriction is not contained in our book of rules, but I call attention to reference 692, which states:

> When a member presents a petition, he may not make a speech nor present argument in support of the petition.

It seems to me that that is what is happening in the case of Senator Molgat's presentation.

Senator Molgat: Thank you, honourable senators. I had understood that others had been given leeway to give these explanatory comments. That is what I was doing. But I certainly can proceed to read the names, which, we have already agreed, is perfectly proper. Therefore, I will read the names and proceed on that basis. There was no problem there.

Senator Cogger: I just want to point out to Senator Molgat that for the last 72 hours senators opposite have been reading names into the record. Several times we have objected. We have never agreed to it, but, as usual, senators opposite keep doing whatever they want to, ignoring the rules.

• (1415)

Senator Molgat: I am sorry, Senator Cogger, but the other morning we had a debate on this matter. A point of order was raised and at the time Senator Nurgitz was in the Chair. We discussed the background of the rules committee. I explained what had gone on when this rule was reviewed by the rules committee not too long ago and that it had been absolutely agreed, as our rules state, that the petition itself will not be read; but specifically nothing was said about the names. The reason is that the members had agreed in the rules committee that if Canadians sent a petition, they had the right to have their names read out. Senator Nurgitz was in the Chair and he agreed with that; and on that basis we proceeded to read the names. I submit that that is what has been going on, and I intend to carry on that way, as has been agreed. I do not think you were in the Senate at the time, Senator Cogger.

Senator Cogger: Maybe the rules will not convince you, or clearly have not convinced you. Maybe the boredom that you have imposed upon all of us will not convince you. Maybe the ridicule of reading thousands and thousands of names for the last few days will not convince you. Let me try another tack.

Senator Simard sent a letter to our colleague, Senator LeBlanc, last week in his capacity as Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee. On this side we have been conducting some estimates. Senator Molgat, if nothing else will convince you, perhaps you will recognize the fact that, according to our premliminary estimations, this little exercise which you have been putting the Senate through for the last two weeks is costing Canadian taxpayers approximately $150,000 a day in overtime and in security costs for those people such as guards and messengers who are working 24 hours a day in the various buildings occupied by senators.

Therefore, Senator Molgat, if the rules are not enough, if ridicule is not enough, if boredom is not enough, would you take into consideration the saving of $150,000 a day by cutting short this silly exercise?

Senator LeBlanc: Senator Cogger must have done some homework, but I would like to have an explanation of how he arrived at the figure of $150,000, which he knows very well is not verifiable by the media, that will repeat it as another one of the canards coming from that side of the house, that they have been repeating.

Senator Cogger: I believe, Senator LeBlanc, you have had a request on your desk for some hours or some days for that very number. In your capacity as Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee you are in a better position than anyone on this side.

Senator Frith: Compared to the billions of dollars you are going to soak the people with.

Senator Cogger: I am not blaming you, because we have not yet had a reply, but we thought we would help you with your work.

Senator Stanbury: Very helpful.

Senator Cogger: It is a very simple matter, senator. For instance, the Victoria Building, where some senators have offices, is normally manned by one person through the night when the Senate does not sit. At the moment there are a number of people there 24 hours a day since senators opposite have had the Senate sitting; so multiply that by the average hourly wage and add overtime. The bus that conveys senators from the door of the Senate to their offices normally does not run. It has been kept running and the chauffeur is being paid overtime. The cafeteria on the fifth floor normally shuts at seven in the evening. We can drink coffee or eat eggs and toast at three o'clock in the morning. Why all these expenses? Because senators opposite have decided it was not enough to say, "Gentlemen, I have a petition signed by 700 people." No, sir, you have to go through the extreme ridicule of naming each and every one of them, complete with the address, plus a whole bunch of irrelevant commentary that accompanies the reading of the names.

As a matter of fact, I believe that the figure of $150,000 per day extra is, if I may say so, a conservative figure. However, by no later than close of business on Monday I will have on your desk a rough estimate of the numbers and expect that it will jive with the numbers that no doubt your committee is preparing for us.

Senator LeBlanc: I do not accept some of the Conservative comments of my friend. For example, he hints that the Victoria Building does not have full security 24 hours a day 7 days a week. The fact is that it does. The buildings where senators have their offices are subject to the same levels of security as other buildings housing members of the other place. It may be that the bus is working a longer number of hours. However, I would remind senators that in many cases the bus is driven by employees of the Senate who are on duty for other functions, such as being a messenger.

I am not quibbling with Senator Cogger's figures except to say that they appear to be a bit high. I will not risk a figure, because I always think it is rather prudent to check with those who really know about the administration of the Senate and the financial services of the Senate to give us the exact figures.

I might say, having taken a look at the propaganda that came through the mail slot in my door this week, that $150,000 a day for presenting the opinions of the people of this country appears to me to be just as valid as spending more than $1 million for garbage mail that is plopped everywhere and widely distributed by the Conservative government. To me, $1.5 million for that appears to be a rather high price.

Senator Grafstein: I think that Senator Cogger has raised an important question. As I came in for my duty watch today there were some people waiting on the other side who were collecting signatures for the GST on Sunday, on the Lord's Day. In the gallery there are people present for perhaps the first time in history except perhaps during wartime.

Senator Cogger: Because the Senate never before sat on a Sunday.

Senator Grafstein: I understand that. However, they are here. If one were to talk to the people in the galleries and to those on the streets leading to Parliament, which is the house of all the people, I can tell you, Senator Cogger, that they are not telling me to close down and save the daily costs. They are saying to do whatever is appropriate in the parliamentary process to convince senators opposite how regressive this tax measure is.

Let us test the thesis. There is a lady outside. Let us call the lady outside, have a committee of the whole and see what she has to say. Let us hear what the people in the galleries have to say. If, in fact, your point is well made, and it is, that it has pursuasiveness and weight, let us listen to what the people have to say. To be fair, all cost of government, not only the cost of this place, has to be put on one side of the scale and balanced against the national interest. I know senators opposite do not like polls. We have heard about that for the last few days. I believe if today we had a poll with one question: "Are you prepared to pay $150,000 a day to stop the GST?", I think the answer would be they were prepared to spend more.

Senator Cogger: All through the week we have heard about the sacred duty of senators to bring to the floor of the Senate the will of the people. I do not question that for one second. I think that is the basis of Parliament. I do not think you are going to convince me or, I believe, anyone out there that you are getting anywhere with this silly exercise of reading names. You may as well take the Ottawa telephone book, for all I care. I think you are dead wrong.

Senator Grafstein: I will have an opportunity later today, although I wish I had the opportunity to reply at the moment. However, I do not wish to interrupt my honourable friend from the province of Manitoba presenting his names. I took some hours off yesterday and I was in Toronto.

Senator Cogger: What do you think we do in our hours off? Do you think that you alone consult the people? What do you think we do? I went home yesterday and do you know what I hear? "What is happening, Michel? Are those guys going to come to their senses? I hear on the radio they are reading lists and lists of names." That is what the people tell me. Why do you drape yourself in the mantle of public opinion and assume that the world is on your side? Come on! Surely you heard that you were being ridiculed all over Canada.

Senator Comeau: "Old farts"!

Senator Grafstein: I do not want to take the valuable time of Senator Molgat to present petitions from the province of Manitoba. However, later this afternoon I hope to address exactly that issue and provide names and substantive comments made by people from the City of Toronto, again in the form of petitions, dealing with exactly Senator Cogger's points.

Senator Cogger: I would like to hear that.

Senator Phillips: When I suggested a brief suspension of the sitting at noon hour, I pointed out that the Senate had operated all morning without a representative on the Liberal side from the Atlantic region or the province of Quebec. We had hoped, by giving the Liberals an hour and a half for lunch, that they would have been able to get some Liberal senators in from the Atlantic region and Quebec. I see two have strayed in from the Atlantic region, and I wonder if senators opposite would like another recess to find some Liberal senators from Quebec.

Senator LeBlanc: I certainly do not accept the description of having "strayed in." I have fulfilled my duties as a member of this institution every time that my name came on the roll. In fact, I have been here for a number of hours when it was not my duty period. I certainly resent any comment that would allow the whip of the government side to impune motive or dereliction of duty.

Senator Molgat: Senator Phillips, I would like to point out that there are two honourable senators present from the Atlantic region. When you mention the province of Quebec, I would like to point out that Senator Watt who is sitting here is a senator from the province of Quebec. I do not know what has happened to your eyesight or to your geography. I do not know which it is that is suffering at this time. I appreciate that the pressure has been going on for a long time, but the province of Quebec is indeed represented.

In answer to Senator Cogger, yes, of course I am concerned at any expenditure. I am concerned at spending $150,000 a day, if that indeed is the figure.

Senator Cogger: I told you that is a conservative figure.

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: Senator Leblanc is not fully convinced that it is $150,000, so we would be happy to have your views on this. You might tell us how you arrived at that figure.

[English]

Be that as it may, let me assure you, Senator Cogger, that the Canadian public would be delighted to have us spend $150,000 a day if they can get away from the GST. They are fully aware that the GST will cost them millions and millions of dollars and they have no illusions in that regard. That is the reason they are going to the trouble of putting their own individual signatures one by one on the petitions.

Senator Carney: Would you permit a question, Senator Molgat?

Senator Molgat: I am always happy to have questions.

Senator Carney: If you feel that way, and you have made a very moving statement on the need to bear this additional cost, why are you so loath to move to debate? Do you not think that the money that is being spent, that you say taxpayers are pleased to spend, should be used for the purpose that brought us all here, which is to debate the bill before us?

Senator Molgat: Yes, Senator Carney; let me assure you that we will use every method in our power to prevent you from putting the GST through, and that is exactly what we are doing. We will fight step by step to stop the GST from being imposed.

Before we get into the battle on the GST itself, we think it is important that you hear from Canadians. Senators opposite are absolutely determined not to hear from Canadians, and they do not like to hear from Canadians. Senators opposite do not like us to read these names and do not want the message. Senators opposite do not like my saying that these petitions are coming from people in my own province who supported the Progressive Conservative Party and who are now sending petitions telling you "for goodness' sake stop". Listen to the people of Canada. You will not listen to anyone. You have made up your minds and you are going to impose this on Canadians willy-nilly, and you do not care.

Senator Carney: Would you listen to me for a moment?

Senator Molgat: I do not have to listen to you. I am quite prepared to have a question, yes.

Senator Carney: I think you are inconsistent in your argument when you accuse us of not listening to Canadians and make the statement that you do not have to listen to me, because our rules suggest that you can extend that courtesy at any time.

Senator Molgat: I said that I would be prepared to have a question from you.

Senator Carney: Are you aware that you can simply table the names of the petitions, which is the custom in this chamber? Are you aware of the fact that that also preserves their right, and then we could move on to debate the bill and use the expenses incurred by keeping this chamber open 24 hours a day in a constructive manner in order that we could do our job of debating the bill and looking for improvements and consensus; or are you simply not prepared to do that at all?

Senator Molgat: Senator Carney, I am delighted to have your question. Before we debate the GST itself, I believe it is important that the Conservative Government of Canada and Conservative senators understand the massive objection of Canadians to what you are attempting to do. We are trying to impress this upon you by reading the petitions. I can perfectly understand that you do not like it. If I were in your shoes, I suppose I would not like it either. If I were in your shoes, I would be putting pressure on Mr. Mulroney, Mr. Wilson, and on the government to listen to Canadians, to change, to pay attention; but you do not seem to be following that course, and what choice have we except to try to keep on impressing that upon you? My opening comments were only meant to do that. However, if you wish me to proceed with some names, as we have agreed is perfectly proper, I will do so.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: The next petition contains several names from Deloraine, Manitoba.

(Names of signatories read)

There are some names from Medora, which is in the same southwest corner of Manitoba, the same Tory heartland of Manitoba. The majority of settlers in this region were Anglo-Saxon, largely from the Province of Ontario. However, in later years there was also immigration from Belgium. More recently there were also some families of Mennonite origin.

(Names of signatories read)

There are also some names from Goodlands, Manitoba. It is a very small village. One of the problems in this region, which is common in much of western Canada, is rural depopulation. The depopulation from a farming standpoint also has a terrible effect on the small villages of the west. This is an issue of which government must be more conscious than it has been in the past. There are tragedies occurring with this depopulation. The small village of Goodlands is certainly an example of that. Once upon a time a small prairie village had a range of services such as an elevator, doctor and stores. Now most of those villages are down virtually to no services at all.

(Names of signatories read)

Those are the names on this particular petition. I would like to point out to honourable senators that, once again, the notion is very clear on the petition that signatures and addresses must be handwritten originals, and these certainly seem to meet that criteria. Each signatory must indicate his or her address, and in my perusal of this petition that has been done. The petition must be free from erasures or interlineations. Again, as far as I can see, that is the case. There is also a warning that the duplication of signatures will result in the petition being ruled unacceptable to the Senate. I see no duplications on this sheet. Therefore it meets the criteria that Senator Kelly pointed out yesterday morning.

Some questions were asked as to the source of these petitions. The originators of the petition itself, as indicated at the bottom, are the IRATE Citizens, Box 1473, Peterborough, Ontario, K9J 7H7. Telephone (705) 741-1565.

Senator Cools: Senator Molgat, this particular group has been mentioned a few times in the chamber, because it seems to be mobilizing many petitioners. IRATE is the acronym for "I Am Rebelling Against Tax Excesses". That is the name of the organization, and I think it is appropriate to put that on the record.

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Senator Cools. I was not aware of that. I thought the name was excellent on its own. If it also means more, that is all the better. However, there is certainly good reason for citizens to be irate, and those who have signed this petition obviously are.

The petition meets all of the requirements. I assume it was printed by the IRATE Citizens in Peterborough, but there are some volunteers in Manitoba who are sufficiently concerned about the tax that they were prepared to circulate it in the Deloraine region. I would like to table this petition.

I have a further petition which I have checked and it appears to me to be perfectly in order. It humbly prays and calls upon the Senate, so the prayer is there. It does ask for a specific relief. It calls upon the government to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax, and I think it is in a proper form. This petition is from a somewhat different region of Manitoba. It is not quite as much of a Tory heartland as the area I mentioned earlier in the Deloraine-Goodlands-Wascana and Medora area, but over the years it has had largely Conservative tendencies and is represented at this time by a Conservative minister in the House of Commons.

The region around Neepawa is in central Manitoba. I have a particular interest in the town of Neepawa since it is now part of my old provincial constituency of Ste. Rose. For those who are interested in literature, they will know that the town of Neepawa is the birthplace of Margaret Laurence. Indeed, in the town of Neepawa the home of Margaret Laurence has been set aside as an historic site. If any of you are visiting Manitoba at anytime, I invite you to stop in at Neepawa which is a delightful little town in the middle of the prairies. It is well-treed, which is not always the case in our prairie villages, and it is particularly attractive. I would think that my colleague Senator Macquarrie, who spent some time in Brandon and Winnipeg in his earlier years when he was more venturesome, would know the town of Neepawa.

Senator Macquarrie: She was my classmate.

Senator Molgat: That is even more interesting. Perhaps you could give us a discourse on that sometime, Senator Macquarrie.

Senator Macquarrie: I cannot do that. Aiding and abetting a filibuster from the other side is not one of my policies. However, I am delighted to hear of Margaret Laurence's birthplace.

Senator Molgat: Perhaps at another time, Senator Macquarrie, you can give us some details on that. I can appreciate your reluctance at the moment and that you do not want to add any fuel to the matter.

The particular petition I have at the moment is from a variety of towns. The first three names are from Neepawa.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1445)

There are some names here of people from Erickson, a small village that was settled by people from Iceland and Norway. The wife of a distinguished member of Parliament came from the Erickson region. I am talking about the wife of Walter Dinsdale who is from Erickson. I am sure a number of my friends opposite will recall her very well. It is a region to which settlers, largely of Icelandic and Norwegian stock, came in the early 1900s, and under very difficult circumstances have made a living there. The people who live in the area are now concerned about the imposition of this tax.

I come to another name from a resident of Neepawa, that of Douglas Wilkinson. Close to Neepawa is another small agricultural region, that of Brookdale, one of the best agricultural regions in Manitoba, a region which has never experienced a crop failure. Nevertheless, the residents there are concerned with what this tax will do to them.

I move on to residents from a region which I know particularly well. I represented the region for some 18 years in the Manitoba Legislature. I refer to the village of Kelwood, which is just north of Neepawa. The people who live there are people I have known for many years.

(Names of signatories read)

There is the name Kakowchyk on the petition. I believe I pointed out to honourable senators, in one of my previous comments discussing the previous petition, largely from the city of Winnipeg, dealing with the tax on books, periodicals, and magazines, that historically Manitoba was the most ethnically diverse province in Canada. Up until the end of the Second World War there was no question that that was the case. Since the advent of new immigrants mostly to Toronto, that has changed. Historically, Manitoba was a microcosm of Canada.

Senator Frith: A multicultural microcosm.

Senator Molgat: Yes, a very multicultural province. One of our very important annual events, a tourist event, is Folkarama, which takes place every summer.

Senator Cools: Senator, would you know of what ethnic origin is that name? It is the strangest name.

Senator Molgat: I would assume that the name is either Polish or Ukrainian. In that region there is a substantial number of Ukrainian immigrants and a smattering of Polish immigrants. Indeed very near Neepawa there is a small village called Polonia which was settled by Polish immigrants and where there is a very large church, an annual retreat, and a major religious celebration of the Polish people.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senator, this is really extremely interesting. I know there will be an opportunity some time in the near future, perhaps even this evening if we have a break, for us all to sit together and listen to this. However, this time is supposed to be for the presentation of petitions. We on this side do have some enthusiasm for moving ahead with the business of the house. I do not think this is helping in any way whatsoever. There is no criticism with respect to the material being discussed, but can we proceed with the presentation of petitions?

Senator Molgat: Senator Kelly, I can understand your frustration. Frankly, I think that in addition to giving you the names on the petition, something which does not convey very much of anything, it would help your understanding of the depth of feeling that the people who have signed these petitions have if I give you a description of who these people are. I cannot give you a description of each individual, but I can give a description of the region from which they come and the background of the region. In this way you can appreciate the petition more fully and it will be more interesting for you than simply to have a dry reading of the names.

If you prefer a dry reading of the names, Senator Kelly, let me assure you that I can do that, and I can do it for a long time, from the small file I have here. I thought it would be helpful to the Senate if I were able to give you a little more meat along with the names. That was my reason for proceeding in this way. I hope you will understand.

Senator Frith: The rule seems to contemplate remarks. It uses the word "remarks."

Senator Molgat: Yes, I think it allows for a brief explanation.

Senator Frith: I think the word is "remarks."

Senator Molgat: The last name I believe I read was the name of Gladys Houston from Neepawa. This is a lady I have known for many years. In fact, her father was a great man. He was a poll captain for me for many years. He was obviously very well-intentioned.

As I pointed out, this petition was probably in some store in the region of Neepawa, because there are names of people from various places across Canada. There is the name of a person from Vancouver.

(Names of signatories read)

I have a few other petitions to read. The note on the petition is that the signatures and addresses must be handwritten originals. I have checked, and they are certainly all handwritten. They all seem different. They do not seem to have the same handwriting. It also states on the petition that each signatory must state his or her address. That is certainly the case. It also states that the petition must be free from erasures or interlineations. I see none whatever. It states that a duplication of signatures will result in the petition being ruled unacceptable to the Senate. "Please sign only once," it states. I see no duplication on the list that I have here.

Once again, the petition was prepared by the IRATE Citizens, Box 1473, Peterborough, Ontario, K9J 7H7, telephone number (705) 741-1565. I note that Senator Cogger is not in the chamber. He was asking specifically the other day as to source, which is the reason I think I should put this on the record. I think the petition is perfectly within the rules and in order. I am pleased to submit it to the Table.

I have a number of other petitions here. I will be prepared to proceed with them at a later time. I realize that Senator Kelly is probably getting tired of hearing my voice and would probably like to hear from a senator from some other part of the country. I will now yield to one of my colleagues.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I also have some petitions which I would like to present to the Senate today. The names on the petitions which I am about to present, as has been the practice, are the names of people who object very strenuously to the goods and services tax, with good reason. They feel it is being imposed on them unfairly. They feel that it is an unfair tax. They feel that it is a regressive tax, a tax which seems to be the end-all and do-all for this government which seems prepared to risk the wrath of all Canadians—

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I am glad that Senator Frith is in the chamber. He has always been my last word regarding the relevance of various rules of procedure that I come across from time to time. I raised this matter before when he was not in the chamber.

Senator Frith: You sweet talker, you.

Senator Kelly: In Beauchesne's Fifth Edition at page 213 the method of presentation of petitions is dealt with. It states, "When a Member presents a petition, he may not make a speech nor present argument in support of the petition." The point of my objection is that Senator Lucier is, in fact, making a speech in support of the petition and is presenting argument.

I do agree that that specific matter is not referred to at page 57 of our rules. I just want to know whether this procedure described in Beauchesne's is nonetheless relevant to this chamber.

Senator Frith: As honourable senators will know, and as Senator Kelly will know, we do resort to Beauchesne's from time to time. In fact, because our rules are not as detailed as they are in the House of Commons, we have occasion to refer to Beauchesne's from time to time. However, I think it is quite clear in our Rule 1 that we should only have to do so when we cannot find the answer between the red covers. Our own rule is not radically different.

Senator Carney: It is on page 57.

Senator Frith: Yes, I have it right here before me. It is set out there. Of course, there is some room for interpretation about what is "brief," but it states that a senator may present any petition entrusted to him. It does not have to be addressed to him, as long as it is entrusted to him. I do not think there is a problem with that. It then goes on to state that the senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement to inform the Senate of the contents of the petition and that the petition itself is not read. That is what Senator Lucier has done. He has said what the petition is about.

It then states that the text of the petition and the names of the petitioners attached thereto are not printed—it does not say "not read", but "not printed"—in the Debates of the Senate.

I think it is reasonable to say that in some cases there may be differences of interpretation as to how brief or not brief the remarks are. If it gets to be beyond a description of the petition, which I think is what Senator Lucier was doing, then

I think the answer for us is here in our rules rather than in Beauchesne's.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I will proceed with the reading of the names on the petitions. From time to time I think that, obviously, I will be commenting on what I think is the main objection to some of these people. Unlike Senator Cogger, I do not think that we are spending too much money to represent the people of Canada who feel that we are obviously their last resort in trying to deal with this government and with the dictatorial Prime Minister that we have. I do not share that view.

I also do not share the view that we are the only ones who may be saying more than would ordinarily be allowed under the rules in certain circumstances. I was here on, I believe, Saturday—however, it may have been Friday, since all the days seem to be blending into one another—when Senator Simard stood in his place and spoke for 15 or 20 minutes without a petition in his hand. At least we have the decency to hold petitions in our hands when we do this, or have them in front of us at least. We are speaking to petitions.

I understand Senator Kelly's frustration. I have no problem with that. I have always found him to be a very decent and pleasant man in this chamber. I respect him very much. I understand his frustrations. I hope that he understands mine in trying to deal with the people I represent in northern Canada who are being told that they will be saddled with what I think even Senator Kelly would have to agree—if we could get him away from this chamber—is an unfair tax as far as the people who live north of the sixtieth parallel are concerned. I am not saying that they are the only ones being affected in an unfair manner; they are not.

Senator Frith: It is just particularly cruel.

Senator Lucier: It is a cruel tax. The strange thing about this tax is that the farther away one gets from central Canada, the more difficult it is to earn a living, the more difficult it is to survive, and the more tax you pay. It is just the weirdest situation that anyone could imagine. You just cannot believe how they feel out there.

Senator Kelly: May I have another brief moment to respond to that?

Senator Lucier: Yes.

Senator Kelly: I must accept the strong likelihood that the point that is being raised is a valid one. I would like to refer to comments I probably made out of order, and I cannot recall either which day or night it was. When the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce dealt with this bill, it identified three or four additional areas that need some examination, some possible negotiation aimed toward improving the bill. I pointed out that the tragedy of our circumstance is that the conclusion coming off the end of the study simply says, "Let's do nothing further."

I think that we have failed in our responsibilities at the committee stage to examine the kind of thing that the honourable senator is talking about, as well as other things. We are sort of in an all-or-nothing state right now, which is a tragedy. I do not believe that all these proceedings really help with that situation at all. I really do believe we have to come closer to grips with Bill C-62 and what appropriate amendments, if there are amendments, need to be made. If there are adjustments, or whatever, to improve the legislation, then they should be made. We are all looking wildly around with one-half of this chamber saying, "Let's throw it out" and the other half saying, "Let's put it in." In the meantime, we are finding ways of doing neither. That is the state we are in now, and it is too bad.

Senator Lucier: Senator Kelly, I accept part of what you say. I agree when you say that the committee through frustration and reality has been told that this provision is going in. In fact, your leader keeps saying that it is going in. He tells the press every day right outside these doors, "Don't you guys worry, we are going to get them. We have the numbers. We are going to get the GST and it will go through. It will go through before January 1."

Sir, let me tell you that the governments of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories have been discussing with the minister, with the Department and with the Conservatives exactly the point you are making, that these are areas that should be looked at. The government has said, "No. This is the bill that we are putting through."

What you are saying makes sense. If we had been able to go up there and hear what they had to say, and if they objected, then you could say, "Well, they have some objections. Let's look at them." The objections were made long before to the government.

Senator Frith: The government is just not listening to you, senator.

Senator Lucier: That is very true. The government is not listening to Senator Kelly either. That brings me to the point I have been trying to make. When I speak on these petitions, Senator Kelly, I continue to bring the point home to those senators who really have a feel for the people who are going to be offended by this measure. I have no problem with Senator Eyton and the senators who are well-heeled and who represent a lot of companies who have come here for one purpose. They have come here to pass the GST. That is what they will do, come hell or high water. That does not bother me. However, that is why I keep appealing to people like yourself, Senator Kelly, and to Senators Marshall and Muir—the people who have to go back to the communities in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, the communities which will be very seriously affected by this bill—to represent those people. They are saying, "Don't do this." How can you ignore them?

Senator Kelly: We are talking about the process of this chamber. In the latter stages of the study by the Banking committee on Bill C-62, the Prime Minister himself clearly indicated that there was room for the examination of items and matters that were being discussed by the committee and by the Senate. The Senate did not respond. The committee report simply states, "There are a lot of things that should be looked at. Let's drop it and do nothing further." That is what we said. Each side is now trying to recover in some fashion.

Senator Frith referred to the Leader of the Government and what he may or may not be saying to me. But what are the media hearing from the other side of the chamber? They are hearing, "We are going to block it. Whatever it takes, it is not going to get through." We have heard Senators Frith, MacEachen, Grafstein and Molgat on this subject. Why are we in this kind of nonsense? The people we are hurting are all the rest of the people of Canada. Do you realize that this exercise is not just holding up Bill C-62 but that it is totally holding up all government action? It is just ridiculous. Let us find a way to proceed. We have a great many petitions. We are in the presentation of petitions at the moment. Let us get them presented, then back to the order paper and back to the basic issue of Bill C-62 to see whether either side is right.

Senator Frith: While we are on this question of delay, I think it is worthwhile recalling that in the not too distant past, namely, a few weeks ago when the report came into the chamber, just in case there is some idea that the Liberals are the only ones who filibuster, the chairman of the committee was trying to present his report and table it. At that time, when the government had a few less supporters than did the opposition, we went through three or four days of filibuster by the government. We do not complain about your filibustering. Of course it was in your interest to filibuster at that time, because the chances were that if you let the matter come to a vote you would have lost that vote. In the interval between now and then we have had the appointment of some senators under an obscure, or at least seldom used, provision of the Constitution, whose qualifications to vote we challenge here and in the courts.

Quite honestly, we are now the ones filibustering to try to prevent this matter from coming to a vote, because we challenge the right of some senators to vote, and because we know that under the present circumstances bringing it to a vote is not in our interest, which interest is to kill the vote. Thus, we are using a device known as a filibuster, which is equally well known to the government because it used it for its purposes until it got its questionable senators seated.

Senator Kelly: I challenge the suggestion that the actions of the government side of this chamber were a filibuster in the same sense when the committee report was presented.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Kelly: Hear me out, please.

Senator Frith: If you are not honest enough to accept that you were filibustering in the committee and in here, then so be it.

Senator Kelly: Senator Frith, you described the circumstances quite accurately.

Senator Frith: You are suggesting you did not use a filibuster.

Senator Kelly: Will you please hear me out and see if perhaps we differ on what a filibuster is? What I heard happening when the report was tabled was senators—and I was not present at the committee, as you well know, during the summer, so I was only hearing for the first time points of privilege—saying that a report was developed under the sole direction of the chairman of the committee. Neither members of the steering committee, the deputy chairman of the committee, nor any member of the committee, saw any part of that report through its development until all of a sudden it was presented with time allocation. They said that that was abuse of their privileges. To me it sounded like it was, unless there was something that was not being said or unless there was some response that I did not hear. If you are suggesting that the purpose was really not to raise the question of privilege but to filibuster, then perhaps it was. What I heard sounded to me like a legitimate abuse of privilege.

Senator Frith: You are a nice man, senator, but you are naive.

Senator Kelly: Perhaps.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. If honourable senators will recall, Senator Lucier talked about Senator Eyton. He made some remarks about Senator Eyton being well-heeled. He is not in the chamber and therefore cannot speak to those remarks. However, he may wish to withdraw his reference. I notice that our rules say that all personal, sharp or taxing speeches are forbidden. Perhaps Senator Lucier wishes to get into the corporate connections or the assets of senators on his side of the house. I am sure that we can read that into the record at the appropriate time. However, I think in the meantime that he may wish to withdraw a personal remark made about a member of this chamber who is absent.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I will first respond to the point of order and then revert to petitions. First, I would like to say that when I was speaking of the position of Senator Eyton, and other senators, the term well-heeled may or may not have been proper. If it was improper, then I apologize for it.

What I was trying to point out was that I do not object to people such as Senators Eyton, Molson and others who hold directorships in large corporations voting for and supporting the GST. I understand that. That is their role. That is a constituency that they represent in the Senate. They do not represent ordinary Canadians who have signed these petitions. They represent the manufacturers and the people who will benefit from this transfer of wealth.

• (1515)

So I have absolutely no problem with Senator Eyton, for whom I have the greatest of respect, doing this. I admire Senator Eyton's successes. I think he has every right to stand in this chamber and support the manufacturers and others who have an interest in seeing the GST passed.

Senator Carney: Honourable senators—

Senator Lucier: Let me finish and then you will have your turn, Senator Carney.

What I am trying to do is appeal to those senators who come from the areas of Canada that will pay more so that Senator Eyton and the people he represents will be better off. I am appealing to those senators.

If I said anything that could be interpreted as being an insult, or if I used the wrong terms in describing Senator Eyton or other senators who hold directorships and so forth, on both sides of this chamber, then I withdraw those remarks unequivocally.

Senator Carney: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Lucier: Yes.

Senator Carney: You mentioned Senator Eyton and other senators who are directors of Canadian corporations and said that they do not represent ordinary Canadians.

As the honourable senator well knows, his own leader, Senator MacEachen, left the country during this filibuster to go to Brussels to serve as Chairman of the International Advisory Committee of the Bank of Montreal. Is the honourable senator suggesting that he does not represent ordinary Canadians? Is the honourable senator saying that because of Senator MacEachen's corporate connections he does not represent ordinary Canadians? That is the point the honourable senator made about other senators.

Senator Lucier: Senator MacEachen was not appointed to the Senate with explicit instructions to vote against the GST. Senator MacEachen has spent his life in Canadian politics defending the people of Nova Scotia. No one has ever questioned whether Senator MacEachen represents the people of Nova Scotia, no matter which House of Parliament he was serving, and he has spent a lot of his life in both. I was referring to those senators who were specifically appointed to vote for the GST. If I have personally offended Senator Eyton, I withdraw my remarks.

Senator Carney: I am delighted to hear the senator say he will withdraw his offensive remarks. However, we do not accept his allegation that Senator Eyton was appointed to the Senate for the sole purpose of voting for the GST. He was properly appointed to this chamber by the Governor General, on the advice of the Prime Minister, as the rest of us were, and I think the senator is on dangerous ground in suggesting that Senator Eyton does not sit in this chamber as the rest of us do. For the honourable senator to say that Senator Eyton has been given a specific mandate to perform is unfair. It is not just unfair to Senator Eyton, but to other senators.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I think Senator Carney has a point. I think it would be more appropriate if Senator Lucier were to make such comments in relation to the additional eight senators that have been appointed. I may be mistaken, but I do not believe Senator Eyton is part of the "British eight." I believe he was appointed prior to those appointments, although I may be mistaken.

I had assumed that the comment was more directed towards the so-called "British eight."

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Senator Carney seems to have assumed the role of Mother Superior regarding the rules of this place.

Senator Carney: Someone should.

Senator LeBlanc: I have listened to Senator Carney for a long time now. She can just be quiet for a minute. If Senator Eyton is well-heeled or down-at-the-heel, I think that is an issue for his shoemaker to examine and not the Senate.

When I look at my shoes I see that I am down-at-the-heels. If somebody said to me, "You are down-at-the-heels", I might take slight offence, but I am not sure I would make it a case of paralysing the Senate.

Since Senator Carney has taken on the duty of defending the rules of this place, I should like to ask her where she was when the rule on page 70 was suspended. Where was she at 5.25 p.m. when the doors were locked and the vote taken by the Speaker? There was a letter sent to a selected few, but the Speaker himself did not even obey his own rule. He said he was going to call the vote for 5.30 p.m., but it actually took place at 5.25 p.m.

Where was Senator Carney? She was here voting. She was not defending the rules of this place then. She was part of the conspiracy. The day she explains how she grossly violated the rules, as she did, will be the day we will pay more attention to some of her points of order.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: I should like to respond to Senator Carney's question.

Senator Carney: I should like to respond to the allegations being made against me.

Senator Frith: Let's have a "responsive afternoon."

Senator Lucier: Senator Carney suggested I may be on dangerous ground in suggesting Senator Eyton or other senators opposite were appointed to the Senate specifically to vote for the GST.

First of all, respecting the eight new senators, they were appointed specifically by the Prime Minister to vote for the GST. The Prime Minister and Harvie Andre told us that they were appointed so that the GST would pass. I have never been on more solid ground.

I have spent half my life on dangerous ground, but I do not think anyone could stretch things so far as to say that the other 16 senators, including Senator Carney, were going to come here and vote against the GST. Had they said that publicly, they would not have been appointed. If anyone believes that, they certainly believe in Santa Claus, and I do not.

Senator LeBlanc: And the tooth fairy.

Senator Lucier: To strengthen my point, Senator Twinn, who is part of the other 16, was specifically brought in to vote for the GST. I say that because when Senator Bielish rose to tell us she was resigning early, she said that that was because the Prime Minister wanted the vacancy so that he could appoint a senator to be here when the vote was taken. Senator Bielish would have stayed a little longer had that not been the case. She retired early so that she could be replaced by somebody who would be here to vote for the GST.

Were anyone, in his wildest dreams, to suggest that the 24 senators who have been put in here in the last month or so—honourable people all—were appointed to the Senate for any other reason than to vote for the GST, he would not be living in the real world.

I know they will do other tasks and carry on their duties as senators, and on that basis I welcome them.

Respecting the additional eight, if and when the courts decide that they were properly appointed to the Senate, I will welcome them. I do not have a problem with that, but I sure have a problem with somebody suggesting to me that the people of Canada are so stupid that they do not realize why these 24 people were appointed to the Senate. You and I know why they were appointed to the Senate. There is no doubt in anyone's mind about that.

I will let you respond to Senator LeBlanc's point now, senator.

Senator Carney: That is kind of you. I should like to note that the senator did withdraw the personal remarks, as I asked him to.

Senator Lucier: You likely do not have the decency to understand that when I make mistakes—and I make them every day—I am only too happy to get up and correct myself. I have done that in the Senate many times before, and I will continue to do so.

The senators who have been here for some time know me well enough to know that I am not as arrogant as some and that if I make a mistake I will correct it. Senator Carney does not have to keep bringing this to the attention of the Senate. Everybody here who knows me knows that I would do that voluntarily.

Senator Carney: I thought it might be overlooked by members of the Senate that I had raised a point and that you had been gracious enough to withdraw your offensive remarks and comply with the rule I noted earlier that one should not make personal remarks.

You then went on to personal remarks about other senators, but I will leave that for them.

Senator Lucier: Are you suggesting I cannot make personal remarks about other senators? I can make all kinds of personal remarks, although I cannot make derogatory remarks. I can make a personal comment about Senator Macquarrie: He is one of the nicest senators ever to go to the Yukon. That is a personal remark, and I am not prepared to withdraw that.

Senator Carney: Then I suggest that in order to establish precedence you should continue to make complimentary remarks about senators on this side of the house. Perhaps that would resolve our problems. Then we would have a new interpretation of this rule.

Senator Lucier: I have been doing that for 15 years. I promise you I will try to do so in the future.

Senator Carney: In respect of Senator LeBlanc's comments to the effect that I am assuming the role of Mother Superior regarding the rules, let me point out that it is only because of the sinners on the opposite side of this chamber. I have been forced to call their transgressions to the Senate's attention.

If senators opposite would obey the rules of the Senate, then I would be allowed to carry out my duties in a manner they would find less offensive.

Senator Thériault: Then the honourable senator should start making complimentary remarks about senators on this side.

Senator LeBlanc: Let me say that it is not senators opposite who have made the rules. The complete Senate makes the rules. Senator Molgat can testify to that. The rules are discussed carefully, seriously and extensively in his committee, and then his committee brings recommendations forward. I know of no objection ever voiced—I have been here for over five years, and I have not missed many sittings—to the rule that the whips should enter the chamber and give the signal to the Speaker before a vote is taken.

I do not think anyone bothered to put a rule in the books to the effect that if the Speaker announces a vote for 5.30 p.m. he should lock the doors at 5.25 p.m. It makes eminent sense that one not put that in the rules.

The honourable senator opposite voted but she did not think she was violating the rules at that time. I suggest that she read page 70. It spells the rule out carefully.

Again, if the honourable senator thinks it is a personal attack on a senator to say that he or she is well-heeled, I should like to see a letter on the subject.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Before Senator Lucier resumes his remarks, let me say that I was intrigued by the amount of time he spent referring to the fact that there are a number of senators on this side who have been appointed in the expectation that they will vote for the GST. On the other hand, he failed to mention that the Leader of the National Liberal Party of Canada, Jean Chrétien, announced before there was a caucus of Senate Liberals that they were going to oppose the GST, that they were going to kill it. He announced well in advance the shameful conduct of honourable senators opposite. He came into the public galleries and cheered on senators opposite when they were acting like a bunch of juvenile delinquents blowing kazoos and banging their desks.

Senator Frith: And stopping senators opposite from ramming this thing through.

Senator Phillips: What they did was completely unparliamentary.

Senator Frith: Locking the doors was parliamentary, was it? How could you disgrace the office of the Opposition whip?

Senator Phillips: Why did the Honourable Senator Lucier not take a few moments to explain why he followed Jean Chrétien's instructions and behaved the way he did the other day?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Speaking of behaviour, this is an appropriate time to examine the behaviour of senators. I will describe the following senator. One of the longest-serving senators in this chamber is the Government Whip. This senator participated in hundreds of votes. This senator has never participated in a vote unless he was in the chamber and the other whip was in the chamber.

Senator Molgat: Scandalous!

Senator Frith: He has never done that. He is one of the best known whips on the Hill. From what I understand, metaphorically speaking, several of his colleagues over there know how stinging his lash can be.

But I am talking about votes. We talked about the fact that never in the history of Commonwealth Parliaments, to our knowledge—and nobody has come up with any defence or any evidence to the contrary—has a Speaker held a vote when the opposition were locked out. Never has a vote been held in the absence of the opposition.

As far as I know, neither at Westminster or Canberra or any other Commonwealth Parliament—perhaps any other Parliament in the world this side of the Iron Curtain—has there ever been a whip who would so disgrace his office as to participate in a vote in the absence of the other whip.

Any honourable senators who know Senator Phillips can imagine what he would have said and what his reaction would have been if, for example, there had been a circumstance where a vote was forced on a short bell on the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce killing the GST. Picture the scene: The circumstances exist for the opposition to win a vote that would kill the GST and the bells are ringing. The whips leave. The vote is to take place when they both return, as is the custom in Commonwealth Parliaments for all time. Why? Because there is to be a vote and the House wants to know that all of those members who want to participate in the vote are present. How does the House know that they are present? Because the whips come in.

Think of what Senator Phillips would have said if we had been able to get in here and Senator Phillips was not able to get in. Let us assume Senator Phillips is afraid he might not win the vote and is afraid to bring his people in. We are in. Phillips is outside. What is he doing outside? He is doing exactly what he should be doing. He is saying, "I am not ready to vote. I am not going in." He is telling his side not to go in because they are not ready.

For over 150 years in this country, and hundreds of years everywhere else, this has been the procedure—that is, that the whips go in to let the house know that both sides are ready to vote.

Continue picturing the scene: Phillips says, "Don't tell me Petten that you are going to go in there and hold a vote without me going in, that is unheard of", but we come in and Petten comes in, but none of the opposition comes in because Phillips has told them not to come in. Then we say to the Speaker: "Lock the doors." Does the Speaker say, "Well, I cannot lock the doors. Where is the other whip?" No, he says, "That is fine. Lock the doors. Let the Grits come in and we will kill the GST."

We would have killed the bill because none of you were here to vote for it.

Then what do we say? We say what Phillips says and what others have been saying, "You wouldn't have come in anyway."

You are damn right we would not have come in. We were not ready. That tradition has been broken. Votes are not held until the whips are in.

Can honourable senators imagine what we would have heard from Phillips? I can tell you it would have made what Petten said seem mild. How could Petten possibly have contained himself at this knavish act his fellow whip pulled on him? If you can imagine what Phillips would have said had Petten pulled it on him—well, can you imagine if all honourable senators opposite had arrived at the door and it was locked and a vote was underway?

I ask honourable senators opposite to think about what I have just said. Think about coming down and not being ready to come in and finding the doors locked and a vote underway. If Conservative senators had come down and found the doors locked and Senator Phillips standing in the anteroom, they would have asked him what was going on. Phillips would have said: "Don't worry; they cannot hold a vote without me being there." Imagine what would have happened if 15 minutes later the doors had been opened and we said: "The GST is dead." Senators opposite would have shouted: "What do you mean the GST is dead? Do you mean to say you held a vote in there that killed the GST without us being there? Do you think we will accept that?" If we responded to them by saying, "Well, you were not going to come in anyway," they would have said: "The point is that our whip, Senator Phillips, told us not to go in because he was not ready for the vote."

Would honourable senators opposite have accepted that? Would they have simply said: "Well, we have lost the GST. The battle is over. Everything is all right. We will not make a fuss. We will not bang our desks. We will not be frustrated. We will not blow any whistles. We will not make any noise. We will not filibuster any privilege motions. That is perfectly okay, although it was not a nice thing to do. We are a little annoyed and quite upset that you have managed to kill the GST by holding a vote in the absence of our whip; however, we must be ladies and gentlemen about this, and it is too bad but there goes the GST, even though Senator Petten directly broke the rules and traditions of hundreds of years."

Would honourable senators opposite have said that?

Senator Phillips: Since my name was mentioned several times, I think I should have an opportunity to reply. The vote was called on a dilatory motion to adjourn the Senate. For about the third time in as many weeks Liberal senators had gone on strike. They were on strike. They were on strike because their leader was in Brussels representing the Bank of Montreal.

Senator Frith: And every time you refused to come in in the past were you on strike?

Senator Phillips: Only one senator has the floor at a time. You should learn some of the rules, Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: Sickening! How would you like it if we changed them in the middle of the game?

Senator Phillips: As the whip on this side, I have respect for the Chair and the decisions of the Chair. I have been here longer than you have, and I have not instituted an appeal of a Speaker's ruling yet, and you have not accepted one yet. That is the difference between us. There was a direction from the Chair to come in and I obeyed it and came in.

Senator Frith: It was your duty, senator, to say, "No, I will not do that."

Senator Phillips: That is not my duty. My duty is to respect the ruling of the Chair.

Senator Frith: Your duty is to observe the rules.

Senator Phillips: The Speaker rules the chamber; that is why he is in the Chair.

Senator Frith: The rules are supposed to run this place.

Senator Phillips: The Speaker is not a creature of the whips. The Speaker is in charge of this chamber. The whips do not direct the Chair; the whips take direction from the Chair.

Senator Molgat: They do not take direction from the Chair!

Senator Phillips: They do.

Senator Frith: They take their direction from the rule book.

Senator Phillips: The whips come into the chamber at 2 o'clock when the bells ring, not when they decide. If the bells are ringing that means the Speaker has summoned us for 2 o'clock. When the Speaker summons us at 5.30 p.m., I go in. I would do the same again.

Senator Frith: You would, would you, even though that would be against the rules?

Senator Phillips: That is the Speaker's decision. That is not my decision and it is not your decision.

Senator Frith: I am glad to have that on the record. You do not consider yourself bound by the rule book but by anything the Speaker says.

Senator Stanbury: Who appoints the Speaker?

Senator Phillips: We are all bound by the rule book.

Senator Frith: That is precisely what Senator Phillips is saying, that he will do what the Speaker says, not what the rules say.

Senator Phillips: I see no reason to throw the rule book out the window and show disrespect for the Speaker because the Leader of the Opposition was in Brussels on business for the Bank of Montreal.

Senator Frith: Why did you throw it out, then?

Senator Phillips: I did not throw it out. I have my book on my desk and you have one in your hand. I would like to see you follow it for a change. You have not followed it for the past three weeks. I would like you to start showing a bit of respect for the chamber. That is an element of parliamentary procedure that has been completely ignored. Never in Westminster did anyone do anything like honourable senators opposite have done.

Senator Frith: Neither has anyone ever been so provoked to do that by someone who so disgracefully did not follow the rules.

Senator Phillips: You cannot find an example of that in any other Parliament.

Senator Frith: No, you cannot find an example of what you did anywhere.

Senator Phillips: I hope that when honourable senators opposite come to their senses and the phases of the moon change and they return to sanity they will stop and think about their actions and apologize to this chamber for the misconduct of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and the other juvenile delinquents on his side. We on this side are entitled to that apology. We have privileges. We have work to do and we want to get on with it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: We now know who runs this whip; the Speaker runs this whip, not the rule book.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: May I remind honourable senators that we are on Reading of Petitions.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Phillips and others opposite have said that Liberal senators were on strike. What evidence does the Honourable Senator Phillips have to indicate I was on strike, never mind anybody else?

Senator Phillips: If the honourable senator was not on strike, he should have been in the chamber. Does the honourable senator need any more evidence than that?

• (1545)

Senator Grafstein: Senator Phillips, I indicated on the face of the record, as best I was able to recount those circumstances, how I received the information about the vote in this place. I then found, to my dismay, when I read Hansard, that even the notice that was sent, which I did not receive—

Senator Phillips: Respect the rules! The Speaker is on his feet.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Senator Lucier.

Senator Grafstein: On the face of Hansard, in the notice I did not receive, the Speaker indicated, apparently, to certain senators—not to all senators—that a vote was being taken at 5:30. Hansard indicates that the vote was taken at 5:25. I assume that part of the anger shared by senators on this side was what we considered to be a total breach of the rules. It is not something being concocted by Senator Frith or other senators; it is on the face of the record. A notice went out to certain senators, and even to those senators the action of the Speaker was incorrect because he called for a vote at 5:30—

Senator Frith: He does not have the authority to do that.

Senator Grafstein: —which he did not have authority to do in any event. But assuming, for the moment—

Senator Frith: I will not assume.

Senator Grafstein: —that notice was received, the vote was then called at 5:25. I assume that Senator Phillips, as the whip, participated in that without checking the clock. Did he check the clock to see when the vote was taken? I would like Senator Phillips to respond, because he has made an allegation about me. He has said that I was on strike. I was at a caucus meeting in a room nearby. I was not on strike. I repeat that I was not on strike.

Senator LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I have listened to this discussion very carefully. I was one of those who was not on strike. There was no strike. I was simply told that there was a vote called for 5:30. I was in my office downstairs getting ready to have dinner with my daughter. I went upstairs and met a couple of Conservative senators who were sneaking into the chamber from the reading room. Then I was told that no, there was no vote. The whip was not ready. I went back to my office.

I turned on the appropriate channel and what did I hear but the reading of the names of all honourable senators on the other side. I was as indignant as I have ever been in my life. My right to vote had been stolen from me. It had been denied me.

I think Senator Phillips's comment will be important and useful when the record of this ugly occasion has been written. He has given the Chair authority that it does not have. Not only that, he has confused the respect we should have for the institution of the Chair—the respect that we cannot have any longer for the holder of that Chair—because its occupant is simply a creature of the Prime Minister by Order in Council, without consultation.

The history of that position is that it is somewhat born in sin and that it earns a level of virtue by being fair. Fairness is a quality which all people in this house will recognize when it is exhibited, but it was not exhibited in this case. I think that the contribution of Senator Phillips, as the key player, along with Senator Murray, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, is important.

I have always suspected that the two or three line letter, with its mysterious phrase, "the breakdown of the political process," was not written by Senator Charbonneau's office. I will tell senators why—because Senator Charbonneau has a better letter writer than that. I think it was concocted by the Leader of the Government and, probably, the whip, who decided that they were going to pull a fast one, a cute trick.

Honourable senators, when you play loose with the rights of the members of this chamber, that is not a cute trick—that is a dirty trick.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, those of us who remember that day are still somewhat puzzled. I think the question we must ask, for purposes of explanation, is: Why did not Senator Petten, the Liberal Whip, put this in another context? Why did he not come to Senator Phillips and ask, "What the devil is going on, Orville? I just received a notice."

Senator Petten was here. We saw him. Why did he not say to Senator Phillips, "Look I need time. I need time to get my troops together." Did he make that request of Senator Phillips?

Senator Stanbury: Yes, he did.

Senator MacDonald: Had he made that request of Senator Phillips, Senator Phillips could not have refused him. There is no way in which Senator Phillips has ever refused him. Why did he not say, "Senator Phillips, you can keep the bells ringing as long as you want. I need another two hours"?

Senator Cools: Senator Phillips just said that he took his orders from the Speaker!

Senator MacDonald: The whips operate either under their own authority or under instructions. Please don't con a conner. Senator Petten waved everyone on the Liberal side away from the chamber when the vote was being taken.

Senator Cools: Not everyone—three or four.

Senator MacDonald: Everyone who was there. He pulled a lu-lu. He set up three days of questions of privilege through that simple exercise of waving away the Liberal senators.

Senator Stanbury: Not so!

Senator MacDonald: Oh, come on!

Senator Thériault: I did not see the letter until nine o'clock at night.

Senator MacDonald: I do not receive letters from Senator Phillips.

Senator Grafstein: I may be wrong about this, honourable senators, but my understanding is that the obligation on each whip is to look at one another to see if they are in concurrence, after which they go into the chamber. That is the limited contact that they have. Each side decides, based on whatever the superstructure is with which we must deal, when to enter the chamber. It is not a question of one whip saying, "By the way, I need an extra 15 minutes." He nods and they go in. That is all. That is parliamentary practice.

That is the practice Senator Frith was talking about. The whips nod and they go in. Once they nod and go in, the vote is taken shortly thereafter. That is the practice—nothing more and nothing less. There is no authority or right or responsibility for a whip to give explanations, as I understand it.

There is another point with which, perhaps, Senator MacDonald could deal. Where was the authority to do what the Speaker did? We do not see it. It is invisible to us. He had no authority. Senator Petten, I assume, confronted with the letter, there being no authority, asked himself, "What should I do?" Nothing—that is what he does.

Senator Murray: Not quite nothing. He was out there shooing Liberal senators away.

Senator LeBlanc: I think Senator MacDonald raised an important point when he asked why the whips did not speak together. I was one of the people who was going to suffer because we did not expect a vote before the end of the afternoon. We thought there would be no vote before dinner. Senator Petten found that he had been given 20 minutes, and the Speaker made that decision outside the rules. Nowhere did I find the Speaker having that authority. It just came out of the loins of Jupiter. He said he had this new authority, this "breakdown of the political process" theory. That's a good one. Senator Petten was probably trying to figure out what was going to be done.

• (1600)

This is where I come to the point Senator Phillips made. Senator Phillips, upon receiving a letter from the Speaker, automatically lost all judgment, clicked his heels and said, "Aye, aye, sir, I obey and I send in the troops". I am sure that anyone who knows this building and the two other buildings we occupy finds it difficult to believe that somehow Senator Charbonneau's letter was received by both Whips and both leaders at the same time. Perhaps Senator Murray received a copy of the letter, but those obedient senators—52 of them if my memory is correct—were all sitting in line, ready to go, before the gun was fired at 5:30, and ready to vote in the absence of their colleagues in this house.

Does Senator Phillips expect us to believe he is so obedient? Those of us who know him have never found him obedient to a lot of institutions. It is difficult to believe that he suspended his judgment, his sense of fair play. He may be a tough Whip for us at times, but we have always thought him to be fair. But to have us believe as sane, adult human beings, the scenario of those good people sitting in their place five minutes before the gun was to be fired for the vote to take place—and I happen to believe in fairy tales and the tooth fairy—is too much to swallow.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Frith has already indicated his impatience with ploughing the same furrows again with regard to who was where and what time it was. We now know where everyone was when these letters arrived. My question may be technical, Senator LeBlanc, but I know and many senators know that the Liberal Whip, Senator Petten, with five minutes' notice could have stopped this from occurring until he, Senator Petten, had collected his little chickens from wherever you were. He did not. They could have come from Montreal. That vote could have occurred at 9 o'clock. You know that.

Senator Cools: No!

Senator MacDonald: Why do you say "No", Senator Cools?

Senator Cools: Because the Speaker's letter was explicit as to its intention. Honestly, senator, we are not children. The Speaker's letter was explicit, and the fact that you were in position in advance of 5.30 tells us something. I have been here for many votes, Senator MacDonald. People straggle in one by one. It is a slow process. Also, senators watch the Whips. So let us not kid ourselves. Everything was in position and ready to go. We were the ones who were taken by surprise.

Senator Molgat: Senator Phillips said himself ten minutes ago that he was coming in because the Speaker said so. His instructions came from the Speaker, and he followed those instructions. He specifically said that ten minutes ago. The record is perfectly clear.

Senator MacDonald: I should like to ask Senator Phillips a question. Senator Phillips, did Senator Petten ask you at any time—

Senator Thériault: On a point of order, Senator MacDonald, would you not think it would be fair to wait to make that point until Senator Petten is here? Are you always trying to go behind a persons's back? That is not our way. Show some sense.

Senator MacDonald: I wish Senator Petten was here, Senator Thériault, but I asked the question of Senator Phillips. Senator Petten can raise a point of order when he returns. I am asking Senator Phillips if he ever refused a request from his counterpart on that side to delay a vote because he,

Senator Petten, your Whip, was not ready? Did he receive a request from Senator Petten that day?

Senator Grafstein: He is not obliged to.

Senator MacDonald: You are not obliged to do anything, but you are claiming you were not give the right to vote. Senator Petton could have had all the time in the world to bring you here.

Senator Wood: I would like to answer Senator MacDonald. If you read page 2399 of Hansard of October 4, you will find the answer to your question in what Senator Petton said:

> Honourable senators, may I have a word. Let me say that I heard there was something taking place in the chamber. I thought I had better go down to the chamber to see what was going on. When I did I ran into my colleague, Senator Phillips. Oh, I am not going to say anything about him, Senator Murray—we just chatted for a moment. I asked what was going on. He asked me if I was going in and I said: "No, I am not going in now".
> Senator Phillips and I have been Whips together for some six years. Many times he said to me: "No, I am not going in now". So I said the same to him. While I was talking to him I was handed a copy of a letter. It was then 20 minutes past 5.

That should answer your question. He went on to say that he was a wonderful fellow but he could not go on to inform 50 people in five minutes that there was to be a vote.

I am tired of hearing this argument. I had just gone to my room—and I leave my television on to this chamber—and I heard the words "Let these doors be closed". So I realized there was something wrong. I ran into the gallery, because my office is on the fourth floor, and I looked down to see the Tories voting. What did you want me to do? My rights were breached that day. I had no idea the vote was taking place until I heard the Speaker say those words on my television set. I assure you that I did not know anything about it.

Senator Grafstein: Ask Senator Phillips. Was he told Senator Petten was not going in? I do not agree with this practice, but you have said, following your practice, that all he had to say was that he was not going in then and you would not have gone in. We now hear from the words of Senator Petton, through Senator Wood, who recounted his statement, that he told his counterpart, Senator Phillips, "I am not going in now." That is part of the fury of Senator Frith, who knows parliamentary practice better than I, that, notwithstanding that, in light of that, and with full knowledge of that, Senator Phillips marched in to the tune of the Speaker. That is part of the outrage of Senator Petton who never, in all my years here—and I have been hear for close to seven years—raised his voice or said a bad word about anyone except in these last few days, nor have you.

Senator MacDonald: I want to get at the root of this. I was here. I don't think that Senator Wood, with all due respect, was.

Senator Wood: I was upstairs.

Senator MacDonald: Everyone was in his or her office. Everyone was here already.

Senator Stanbury: No one told us anything was going on.

Senator MacDonald: How long would it have taken Senator Petton to collect his troops?

Senator Molgat: But Senator Petton told your Whip he was not ready, yet your Whip came in. That is the point.

Senator Grafstein: You have set a model that I do not accept. Your model is: If the Whip says to the other Whip that he needs more time, he would not go in. Did he do that? I do not accept that as a constitutional model. As I understand it, the Whip has no obligation to do anything other than to nod that he is going in. That is all he has to do. He nods and he is ready. There does not have to be any further communication, but Senator Petton went beyond his constitutional responsibilities and said he was not going in for whatever reason. He could not find Senator Wood. He could not find Senator Stanbury. He put Senator Phillips on notice, yet Senator Phillips marched in. You don't think that Senator Frith, Senator Petton, and we who are involved in this process should not be angry, outraged and moved beyond conduct that, in retrospect, we did not feel proud of? Of course we were, as he would be. I know he would be.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, when I came to the front of the chamber, I met Senator Petton who said that he was not going in. There was no nod.

Senator Stanbury: If Senator Petton says there was, then there was.

Senator Phillips: In addition, Senator Corbin, Senator Hébert, Senator Stollery, Senator LeBlanc, and several other Liberal senators were present. They had a defensive line set up that the Ottawa Roughriders could have used today and many other times to ensure that no Liberal senator came through. There was no intention on the part of Liberal senators to come into the chamber until Senator MacEachen had completed his business in Brussels on behalf of the Bank of Montreal.

Senator Grafstein: Not so! No so!

Senator Thériault: That is a lie!

Senator Phillips: You had no intention of coming back, so don't blame it on the Whips.

Senator Molgat: We blame it on you! We blame it on you, Senator Phillips! You had no right to come in.

Senator Phillips: Blame it on Senator MacEachen. If he had not been in Brussels, the motion would not have been moved.

Senator Grafstein: That is not correct.

Senator Molgat: You went totally against the rules.

Senator Phillips: And we would not be in this situation today. If Senator MacEachen gave up his job at $225,000 a year and paid attention to this place, we would not be in the mess we are in today.

Senator Molgat: You should do your job as Whip. If you had followed the rules, along with the Speaker, none of this would have happened.

Senator Lucier: This started as a question to me, Senator MacDonald, and I will yield to you in a few minutes. I don't have a lot to say on the subject, but it seems to me that every time Senator Phillips opens his mouth it is to change feet. Every time you say something it is worse than the last time.

Senator Phillips: I am not taking lessons from you.

Senator Lucier: You started out by asking me a simple question about whether or not I take my orders from Jean Chretien. My answer is no, I do not. I never have. He has never given me any orders to do anything.

Senator Grafstein: Nor any of us on this side.

Senator Lucier: If you cannot accept that, you should ask anyone in this chamber on either side, and particularly on my side, what kind of a response he would get from me if anyone asked me to do anything that I thought was detrimental to the people of the Yukon with respect to any piece of legislation, whether it was Liberal or not. I have been instrumental in stopping Liberal legislation from entering this house because it was not fair to the Yukon, and I will continue to do that regardless of who is the leader.

You said, sir, that you have abandoned your practice of reading the rule book and that you now take your orders from the Speaker. What you have done is to give Brian Mulroney, who appoints our Speaker, direct control of the Senate. Mulroney already has control of the House of Commons. You have now given him control of the Senate by admitting that from now on when our Speaker says you vote, you are going to vote. The Speaker answers directly to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister tells the Speaker when he wants you to vote, and you listen to the Speaker. So the Prime Minister directly controls the Senate.

That may be acceptable to you and all the senators on the government side, but it never has been and it never will be acceptable to this side. If it means that we have to do some things that are just as distasteful to us, and probably more so than it is to the people on the other side, you should not be surprised. Sooner or later, people are going to catch on to what we were fighting against: the destruction of the parliamentary system in Canada.

You have told us that what we were doing was not right because you believe that you now are, and that this chamber is, a direct underling of the Prime Minister of Canada. Eighty-five per cent of the people of Canada are telling you they don't want that to be the case. So for you to have now admitted that that is exactly what you see as being the case, I have a problem with that and I will terminate my remarks. There are other colleagues who want to respond before I return to my petitions, but I would hope that Senator Carney would remain consistent. She asked me to apologize for any personal, derogatory remarks I may have made. I did so unequivocally. Senator Phillips, in the last few minutes, made several disparaging remarks about senators on this side, calling them juvenile delinquents, and making disparaging remarks about Senator MacEachen. I think, Senator Carney, you should stand in your place and ask your colleague to do exactly what I was prepared to do. Thank you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, I too feel an apology coming on. I want to apologize for having a conspiratorial, suspicious frame of mind. It is in inbred. I hope you will forgive me. I find it difficult to believe that 50 some interested Liberal senators, all in this building—

Senator Thériault: No, that is not true.

Senator Stanbury: That is not true. I was not in the building. I never heard of the vote.

Senator MacDonald: You would know best what your forces were, but I got the impression that members on the other side were either here or in their offices reading. The fact is that no one showed up. Should that not bring out of my latent sense a feeling of suspicion or conspiratorial attitude? I apologized for it, but I wanted to bring that up. God forbid that I should ever suggest that Senator Petton was acting on instructions. Perish the day I would do that.

Senator Molgat: We were not prepared to vote. We said that at that time.

Senator MacDonald: You had a lot of opportunities to say that.

Senator Stanbury: We had no opportunity. You know that perfectly well!

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I too would like to put on the record a few names from my province. But I want to deal with the issues that arose this afternoon, especially those raised by Senator MacDonald, Senator Carney, Senator Cogger, and Senator Phillips. Senator Cogger is awfully concerned about the $150,000 a day, according to his figures—I do not know if they are correct—that it costs to keep this operation going to do what we can, not to obey the rule of the Whip or the Speaker, but to obey the request of 80 per cent of the people of Canada. I want to deal with that point because it is frivolous. It does not mean anything. I dealt with it the other night when it was raised by Senator Simard, and I said I had experience that showed that Senator Simard was never frugal when he was a member of government. I cannot comment on Senator Coggers' frugality, but I wanted to deal with it anyway.

Is anyone on that side prepared to tell me and the people of Canada that what we are doing, even if it costs $150,000 a day, will be nearly as expensive in the long run as the appointment of those eight illegitimate senators in order to get this tax through?

Senator Lucier, did you want to continue on with your petitions? I thought you said you were finished.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, I thought he was allowing us to respond to the intervention by Senator Phillips.

Senator Lucier: That is what I thought was happening as well.

Senator Grafstein: I would like to make a few comments for the record, and I hope Senator Phillips will see fit to moderate the remarks he made when he implied—and I think I heard him express the view—that I had been instructed by Mr. Chretien to vote a particular way. I want to say for the record that Mr. Chretien has never instructed me to vote this way or any other way. With respect to the GST, he has given me no instructions whatsoever. By the way, had he given me such instructions I would not have used parliamentary language. I hope Senator Phillips withdraws that statement because that is not the way the Liberal Party operates. Mr. Chretien gave me no such instructions, nor would he dare to.

Senator Molgat: Nor did he give any instructions to the Senate Liberal Caucus.

Senator Lucier: Never did Mr. Chretien give any instructions, while I was in caucus, on how he thought we should vote on the GST. I want to make that clear as well.

Honourable senators, I want to table a petition from people in Nova Scotia. They are from Halifax, Sackville, and other areas of Nova Scotia. These are good people who object to the GST and what is happening here; and, on that basis, I would like to table this petition and ask Senator Thériault to continue with his petition.

Senator Thériault: I apologize for starting my petition before you had completed yours. As I said, I wanted to say that the cost factor is not a serious point when you think of the cost of the eight additional senators and the amount that the government of the day is spending on propaganda, advertising and other ways to sell their GST, which have not been successful. We should disregard those comments completely.

I am surprised that Senator MacDonald made the remark he did. I repeat that I have served a number of years in a provincial legislature and in this house, and I have never heard of a senator or provincial legislator put a colleague's action into question when that person was not in his place to defend himself. I know that Senator MacDonald has been a very active and successful person, and I forgive him. I blame his lack of experience in Parliament, otherwise I don't think he would do that. He is not that kind of person.

When Senator MacDonald or any other senator says that I was given orders by Mr. Chretien, I will tell you that I was not appointed by Mr. Chretien. I was appointed by Mr. Trudeau. Prime Minister Trudeau asked me to serve in the Senate. He never asked me which way I was going to vote or which caucus I was going to be in. He just told me that, based on the recommendation of some people, and on his own, he was prepared to appoint me to the Senate without any conditions. I have never heard any of the eight senators, who were appointed under the so-called Section 26 deny that the present Prime Minister appointed them so that they could support the GST. I don't know if he said anything to them about that, but I have never heard it denied.

I want to put on record an article that I read in the Globe and Mail, which paper, as we all know, does not favour the Senate, the Liberal senators or Liberals, period, in this country. It believes that the power belongs to the rich and the powerful. If it was given its way in the world, it would create industries and create jobs. I understand that philosophy, although I disagree with it. But it seems that those people across the floor have accepted it in the last few months. The article is entitled "Stacking the Senate has a Familiar Ring". It says, "Deft manipulation of Parliament and the Supreme Court allowed South Africa to pass apartheid legislation". I quote:

> Prime Minister Brian Mulroney may be interested to know that his decision to stack the Senate has an interesting precedent. It was one of the methods the South African government used in the 1950s to disenfranchise people of mixed race and legalize the system of apartheid.
> When South Africa became a union, the constitutional framework provided that legislation could not be enacted to disqualify, by reason of race alone, anyone in the Cape province (one of South Africa's four provinces) who at that time was a registered voter, unless the legislation were passed by a two-thirds majority of both Houses of Parliament sitting together.
> All black people had been disenfranchised in 1936, but people of mixed race were still voters in 1948 when the National Party (dominated by Afrikaners and still in power today) formed the government.
> By 1951 the government wanted to create a legal framework for apartheid and introduced a bill to remove mixed-race voters from the electoral role. This statute was passed in the usual manner—by simple majority, instead of the two-thirds method.
> The action was challenged in the courts, and the following year the appellate division of the South African Supreme Court struck down the legislation. It decided that a two-thirds majority of both houses sitting together was required to make the new law valid.
> However, the government didn't command a two-thirds majority, so it introduced a new act (again passed by simple majority) which stated that a decision of the Supreme Court invalidating an act of Parliament had to be reviewed by what it called the "High Court of Parliament".
> The members of this so-called court were, in fact, members of Parliament. The opposition parties boycotted the court, and the mixed-race voter who had launched the successful appeal to the Supreme Court did not appear before it. Instead, he brought the case back to the Supreme Court, which in turn struck down the new act, holding that the "High Court of Parliament" was nothing more than Parliament in disguise.

• (1630)

A general election was held in 1953, and the National Party returned to power, but it again failed to command a two-thirds majority in both houses. Totally frustrated by this point, the government devised a new plan and passed two more acts that allowed it to achieve its goal.

The first act was aimed at making the Supreme Court more co-operative. It required that, in a final appeal in which the validity of a national statute was in question, the case must be heard by 11 judges instead of the usual five.

The second enlarged the Senate and changed the method by which senators were selected. The new senators were elected, all right, but not by the people. They were chosen by an electoral college composed of members of the federal and provincial legislatures.

Of course, this neat legal manoeuvre allowed the National Party to control the vote, and the newly enlarged Senate promptly gave the government its required majority and people of mixed race were disenfranchised.

Perhaps the Conservative government of Mr. Mulroney would have thought twice before packing Canada's Senate to ensure passage of the goods and services tax had it known that a precedent for its actions lay with the only country in the Western World to use such a procedure to disenfranchise a group of its citizens.

But somehow I doubt it.

I think that point is much more important than the cost of $150,000 a day that has been brought up here.

Honourable senators, the Whip of the Conservative Party has been in this House as Whip for the last five or six years. He was not Whip when I first came here, but I know that he and Senator Petten have worked together for at least five or six years. All through those years, Senator Petten was a majority Whip, and that is a point that I would have hoped Senator MacDonald would have remembered when he put his question to Senator Petten. All through those years, Senator Petten was Whip of a majority, a large majority, and Senator Phillips was Whip of a minority. The question I should like to ask is: Since Senator Petten became Whip, has he ever threatened to come in before being told by the opposition Whip that the opposition was ready to vote? That is the question that should be asked.

Honourable senators, as my colleague and seatmate, Senator Grafstein, has said, not one of us is proud of what went on in the Senate the other night. I have had 30 years of parliamentary legislative work, and I can tell you that back in 1965 I was Minister of Municipal Affairs in New Brunswick. At that time, honourable senators, we actually changed the Constitution of the Province of New Brunswick within our powers. We changed the taxation system completely. We thought we were right and we had the support of the people. The opposition thought we were wrong, which was their right. As Minister of Municipal Affairs, I was designated to present the legislation to implement the program we had said we would put into effect on January 1, 1966.

Let me relate what happened. I stood up in my place day after day after day, but we did not amend the rules. We never amended the rules. We had a majority but we never disobeyed the rules. We sat in that house at the time set by the rules, with extensions in the evening, from Tuesdays to Fridays, and for 29 days the government had to wait and listen before the opposition permitted us to introduce the first bill in that legislature. We could have done other things; we had a majority. Not only that, we were announcing a program that was popular. It was a change of taxation. Much discrimination existed in taxation at that point, and the cornerstone of our program was the new Assessment Act, which was my responsibility as Minister of Municipal Affairs under the premiership and leadership of Louis Robichaud. I listened for 29 days while the opposition members read the telephone book and magazines, cover to cover. They felt it was their right. They had been elected, and we took it. The result of that filibustering in the legislature was that the program did not come into force on January 1, 1966, as we had hoped, as we had planned and budgeted for. It was delayed for a year because of the obstruction of the opposition. It was delayed for a year. So what? A year is not the end of the world in the history of a country or a province.

The opposition members were not denied their rights. So how does a person like myself feel about what occurred here in the Senate on October 4? I was in caucus that afternoon, and I tell you that all your suspicions of what took place in that caucus are false. I was not in my office. I went from the caucus to do other things. I did not see any television. I did not learn of what had happened until 7 or 8 o'clock that night, when I appeared in this house and was told by my colleagues that I had been denied my fundamental rights, rights as I have believed them to be from the first day I was elected to a municipal office in my province to this day, especially my right to vote.

Honourable senators, I have worked the best part of my adult life in Parliament, so how do you think I felt? It was tyranny, in my humble opinion, and I have never heard even the Leader of the Government deny it. Instructions were laid down by the government, or the government leader, and I have not heard any senators on the other side say they did not hear about the vote. Had they not heard of the vote, I am sure that some of them would have been on their way to Montreal or Quebec or to their place of business in this city while the bells were ringing. Until that day, in the history of the Parliament of Canada, a Speaker had never ordered the bells to stop ringing.

I am sure that many senators remember the Conservatives in the House of Commons storming the Speaker. They stormed the Chair with clenched fists.

Senator LeBlanc: I was there.

Senator Thériault: They were pretty upset and angry. The minority opposition party, the Conservative Party in the other place, through their bell-ringing episode, forced the majority government of the day to split the energy program bill before they would agree to stop ringing the bells. It was a good thing. It is sometimes a good thing that someone puts the brakes on executive government in this country.

I have been around politics for 35 years. I know a lot of people, and a lot of people know me; but for the first time in my parliamentary career I have been stopped on the street by strangers who say, "Keep it up. This government has not the right to impose this tax." We have never seen in this country the almost unanimous repulsion to a government measure that we see now.

Ask government members, members of the Conservative Party from Alberta and from the Maritimes, how they are received by their constituents because of this tax. We are told day in and day out by the government that we have no right to do what we are doing because this measure has to go into force on January 1, 1991. Well, I have just related in a smaller context—and the facts are there in my province to verify what I have stated—that the opposition delayed a popular major tax reform by a year.

I should like those honourable senators who have been appointed to come here to vote for this tax to tell me: Would the country be paralysed if this tax did not come into force on January 1, 1991? Of course not. The manufacturers' tax that is supposed to be replaced has been in force in this country for many years, and it has been more than doubled by the present government. Can you tell me that the country could not carry on for another year or two until a new tax program is designed, one that may not please everybody but one that would be fundamentally acceptable? People appeared before the committee this summer and said that they were prepared to pay their taxes.

Having made those few points, I would like to go on with the presentations of petitions. While I am on this subject, I think it was agreed when I was on duty last that a letter is a petition. Although it may not be in the proper form of a petition, when a senator or a member of Parliament or legislature receives a letter from a member of the public, it is up to him to decide whether to make that person's point of view known in the legislative body in which he sits. I believe that this was eventually agreed to last night. So, I may read some personal letters that I received from many constituents, and many electors in my province and other provinces, who stated their reasons for their opposition to this tax. However, I should first like to read the following petition. It contains 23 names.

(Names of signatories read)

Many of the names on these petitions, as was stated earlier by my colleague, Senator Molgat, are from areas that have voted Conservative almost since confederation.

(Names of signatories read)

I wish to table this petition from humble taxpayers of New Brunswick.

Senator Kinsella: Senator Thériault, would you permit an observation? It is more by way of a general question. While I support the right of petition ultimately without reservation and without hesitation, I am curious to understand the relationship between the expression of an interest by interest groups, and the legitimate interpreter of public opinion, which I have been led to understand from my reading of political science, rests with the elected government. It is the elected government that is to be the sole legitimate interpreter of the public interest at the end of the day.

Senator Cools: Who said that?

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, that is a good question and I am glad to answer it. As a matter of fact, as one who has worked for most of my life in elected offices, I have no quarrel with what Senator Kinsella has said, and I think we are living proof of that here in this Senate. Since 1984, we have had a majority in the Senate until the famous eight were appointed, and we have passed every single measure, some of which we disliked—

Senator Stanbury: Immensely!

Senator Thériault: Some 300 measures were passed by this Senate, with a majority of Liberals, because we believed to the limit in what you have just said. However, if you have read any political science—and I don't doubt that you have—you must have seen some constitutional studies. In fact, since 1867 this place has had the constitutional right to amend or to reject legislation. This place had that full constitutional power until 1982, when the Constitution was amended and we were given a six-month time limit to consider of constitutional amendments. As I look back on it now, perhaps that was the wrong decision—

Senator Cools: It was a bad decision.

Senator Thériault: —because of what I see happening with the present government. Political scientists will tell you—and we have had proof of that in Eastern Europe over the last couple of years—that when governments, appointed or elected, do exactly the opposite of what people in their jurisdiction expect them to do, the people find a way to stop them. While I am not about to divulge secrets from caucus, I can say that it was not without hesitation and a lot of consideration that we arrived at our decision.

There have been pieces of legislation that have come to this Senate since 1984—not all that many but a few—that I would have stopped if I had had the support of my caucus. I never would have allowed Bill C-22 to be passed into law because, I believed—and I will believe this until I die—that it was a direct result of pressure from the drug companies on the government. Everywhere we went in this country, people told us not to pass it because they knew what would happen. In spite of the report that has been quoted here, you could check with my government of New Brunswick and they will tell you that the cost of their drug program for seniors and hospitals has increased by more than 50 per cent since Bill C-22 became law. We passed it.

Bill C-21 and Bill C-28 are still not passed, and they are major pieces of legislation. I remember the Prime Minister swearing on his mother's head in public meetings that the sacred trust of the universality of social programs would never be touched. There were pieces of legislation that came here that are totally and fundamentally against what I stand for and what I have worked for in my 35 years in public life, including the de-indexation of Family Allowance, the claw-back. I am not against paying taxes, and if it has to be that those people earning $50,000 or more pay a little extra, then fine. That, of course, includes all of us; we cannot deny that much. I am sure that we could afford to pay $500 to $1,000 more per year in order to retain the sacred trust of universality, enabling anyone, regardless of his or her financial position, to receive the old age pension upon reaching the age of 65. I recall how good people felt when the St. Laurent government passed the pension legislation. They suddenly realized that everybody would be getting an old age pension, on reaching 65 years of age, and the poor would not have to be welfare recipients.

We passed many pieces of this government's legislation that were totally against the fundamental philosophy of the Liberal Party. That was not easy for us. We passed that legislation, but there comes a time when you have been trampled upon long enough and you have to say no. I say to you, Senator Kinsella, that after what happened in the New Brunswick legislature, the Conservatives agreed that it was a good program, although they changed it and improved on it. In the meantime, they had delayed it for a year. This time, with the GST, I believe that the federal government has overstepped its legitimate authority from the people of Canada.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Senator Thériault, thank you very kindly for that explanation. At the end of the day, though, in our system of government, who should decide what is in the public interest? We all know that there is a tremendous need for reformation of all our institutions in contemporary society, including this august body, but who decides what is in the public interest?

This may be a false analogy, but it seems to me a comparison can be made with the judicious parent and children in the candy store. The children want to grab all the candy and eat it all at once, and they express great outrage when the judicious parent says, "No. That is not good for you now. We think you should have your dinner first and then have the candy." The children protest and they petition by saying, "Please, please, may I?" Is there not some analogy available to us here, whereby the government can make a decision in its wisdom or lack of wisdom? After all, judicious parents often make a wrong decision, although they make it believing it to be best for the family. Is it not the responsibility and duty of the Government of Canada to interpret the public interest as a collective, just as it is the duty of the judicious parents to make the right decision for that family?

• (1700)

Senator Thériault: The new child psychology is different. The new psychology is that the parents should listen more to the children.

Senator Cools: There is a Child Welfare Act.

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: I would like to ask a question about the famous 1982 amendment. You seem to indicate that in 1982 the government of the day perhaps made an error when it decided that the Senate veto on constitutional amendments would be a six-month suspensive veto. Of course you have a right to your own opinion. Personally, I think we were right in planning for a six-month veto. Your argument seems to go as follows: if we had an absolute veto for all matters, which is not the case for constitutional amendments, when the public wanted a measure to be defeated, we would be able to use our power of absolute veto. Is that your theory?

Senator Thériault: It is not a theory.

Senator Beaudoin: Perhaps that is your viewpoint and I respect that. It is obvious you are opposed to Bill C-62 and that is your right, but I can think of a situation where you yourself would approve an unpopular bill. That could happen in one's lifetime. It could happen that in the course of their parliamentary life, senators or members found themselves backing an unpopular bill. Perhaps at that time they would be sorry if the veto were absolute. In other words, you would be stuck with your own reasoning.

You say: "A measure is unpopular, I am convinced that it has to be voted through, but because most of the population is against it, I am going to vote against the measure." At that time, you would accept that a non-elected House jeopardize a bill that you would have liked passed.

Senator Thériault: Why?

Senator Beaudoin: I want to know why you would accept that if you were convinced the measure was good. Are you not changing your viewpoint? Am I to assume that as soon as a measure is unpopular it has to be defeated in this House, even if it is a good measure? Is that your theory?

Senator Thériault: I am sorry, Senator Beaudoin, it is difficult to think of psychology and constitutional matters at the same time. I am not an constitutional expert, but I do know a little psychology.

Senator Beaudoin: That has nothing to do with it.

Senator Thériault: I said: I wonder. I did not say the government was wrong, I never asked a question about social measures but on constitutionality, and I accept that I am not a constitutional expert, but the Constitution, as I see it, and as I understand it, as it was explained to me, and as I read it, gives me the power as a senator to refuse to vote for one measure or another, if I am fully convinced that it is not good for the country. I generally accept that the elected Chamber has priority. That has been proven and I have just said that. It has been proven, but there comes a time when the wishes of Canadians, the nearly unanimous desire of the public has to be heard, and I do not know if you were here when I told the story of our political agenda, gave the history of the New Brunswick government that was delayed for one year because of the opposition's position. I do not think the country, the Canada I love from one coast to the other, will disintegrate or stop working, that Canadians will be deprived in any way if the Senate, for once, even if it only happens once in its history, refuses to accept a measure that the majority of senators cannot accept.

Let me add something: if your government decided to delve into the 1867 Constitution, probably with your support but I hope not, and did so for the second time in 123 years—the first time the request was refused—it retrieved an obscure clause in the Constitution, unbeknownst to the public, to appoint eight additional senators to pass a measure that 80% of the population does not want, and if the result of our actions in the Senate is to delay the bill until the government goes to the people—and the head of the Liberal Party said so yesterday, if I am not mistaken—if you are convinced of the soundness of your measure, it will not be the first time a government goes to the people two or three years into its mandate. Why do you not go and find out, if you do not believe what people are telling us?

Senator Beaudoin: That is not the question.

Senator Thériault: Come on!

Senator Beaudoin: That is not the question I am asking you.

Senator Thériault: What is the question?

Senator Beaudoin: I know very well that you are against the bill.

Senator Thériault: I told you what I was going to do.

Senator Beaudoin: You are against the bill and you have the absolute right to vote against it. No one is denying you this right, Senator Thériault, but let me put it to you this way: suppose you approve of a measure, but that measure is unpopular. Well. Would you then say to yourself that even though you were firmly convinced that the measure is good, that you would vote against it because it is unpopular? That is my question! I am not stopping you from defending your ideas; I am very pleased to let you do so, and you are perfectly entitled to defend your ideas. You are perfectly entitled to be for or against Bill C-62. No one is denying that. But if you are convinced it is good for the country, are you going to say "No, I cannot, I cannot vote for this measure because it is unpopular at the present time"? That is all I am asking you!

Senator Thériault: Honourable senator, you do not know many politicians who would answer hypothetical questions, but if there were any, it is true, those questions can be asked.

Senator Beaudoin: Take the death penalty. Personnally, I am against the death penalty. But if a poll were taken, I am sure most people would be for the death penalty. At least that is what all the polls indicate; but then would you have said "Because the majority is in favour, I am going to vote for the measure"?

Senator Thériault: Senator Beaudoin, there have been several elections since we discussed the death penalty and that issue never influenced the election results, never. Perhaps you did not follow the issue very closely, perhaps you were more involved in the politics of the Liberal Party until you were appointed to the Senate.

Senator Comeau: At the last election, the Conservative Party spoke of the GST, so it was an election on the GST.

[English]

Senator Grafstein: Could you repeat that last question? We did not hear you.

Senator Comeau: Senator Thériault was saying that we did not have the moral right at this point to contemplate the GST. He was referring to the fact that the GST had not been part of the election platform. In fact, it was part of the platform in the last election.

Senator Thériault: No. The platform was tax reform.

Senator Comeau: Check the record.

Senator Thériault: Senator Comeau, I know your area very well.

Senator Comeau: May I make one more point? I was a candidate in the last election.

Senator LeBlanc: You were defeated!

Senator Comeau: I was defeated, yes. However, a great many of you did not run in the last election and a great many of you will not run in the next election. That is the point we are trying to make with the Canadian people; that you people are unelected and should not be running the country from the Senate. The people of Canada have a choice in the next election as to what they want to do with this government, but they do not have that choice with respect to the Senate.

Senator Cools: That is true. The gentlemen who constituted this country originally intended it to be so. The discussion we are having here is not unique.

However, let me come back to Senator Kinsella. I would like to state definitively before all of you here that I believe that my Senate appointment has equal validity with the appointment of the Prime Minister of Canada. I would just remind Senator Kinsella and Senator Beaudoin that a lot of people in this room and in this country do not realize that the position of Prime Minister of Canada is not a elected position.

Senator Beaudoin: But he is indirectly elected.

Senator Cools: Do not give me that "indirectly" stuff! The honourable senator is too well educated and steeped in this matter to engage in that pretence. You and I know that the position of Prime Minister is an unelected position and that when the Governor General appoints the Prime Minister, the Governor General is not concerned with how the Prime Minister is chosen. You know that very well.

Senator Beaudoin: I do not accept that for one moment.

Senator Cools: You know that very well.

Senator Beaudoin: Under our conventions, which are very clear, the Prime Minister has to be either a member of the Senate or of the House of Commons, within a reasonable time, at least.

Senator Cools: Rubbish!

Senator Beaudoin: If he is a member of the House of Commons, he has been elected. The Prime Minister can be appointed from the Senate, but for nearly a century no senator has ever been appointed Prime Minister. However, that does not mean it is impossible. To say that the Prime Minister is not, in practice, an elected person, is strange thinking.

Senator Cools: The Commission of Appointment for the Prime Minister is not based on being elected. The Prime Minister is the first minister, and the Prime Minister is a member of the House of Commons just like any other member. This country has had Prime Ministers who sat in this very Senate chamber, and the honourable senator knows that.

Senator Stewart: Senator Cools, is it not true that in the history of Canada there have been Prime Ministers who were not a member of either house for a short period?

Senator Cools: John Turner is an example.

Senator Stewart: I am thinking, for example, of Mr. King, who won an election but lost his own seat. He remained Prime Minister, and he went what we would call, "carpetbagging".

Senator Cools: There are other examples. Just in the past few years, Mr. John Turner, Mr. Robert Bourassa and Mr. Don Getty were in that position. We know very well that the position of Prime Minister is an unelected one. The people on the other side have perpetuated the mythology surrounding this viewpoint, and it is so well entrenched that people do not see it for what it is. The Prime Minister is appointed, just like we are.

Senator Beaudoin: I agree.

Senator Cools: You agree?

Senator Beaudoin: Yes. When the Governor General calls a person to be named Prime Minister—as in the case of John Turner, who was neither a senator nor a member of Parliament—that person must become a member of one or other of the two houses within a reasonable time, according to a convention.

You cannot have a Prime Minister for four years who is neither a member of the Senate nor of the House of Commons.

Senator Lucier: Of course you can.

Senator Cools: Not only is that not true, but your own Prime Minister has appointed cabinet ministers before they were elected. Lucien Bouchard was appointed to the cabinet before he had a seat.

Senator LeBlanc: Then he saw the light.

Senator Beaudoin: Yes, of course, but there people must be elected within a reasonable time, or become senators.

Senator Stewart: I do not think there is any controversy there.

Senator Cools: This point is very important, because in the last while we have had discussion after discussion about these powers and have talked about the elected and the unelected. Let us get to the heart of the matter and let us understand that our system is based on a balance of the elected and the appointed. Let us understand that when someone sits in the Speaker's Chair, they are sitting under the guidance of the Queen.

Senator Stewart: Senator Cools, may I take you to another aspect of this constellation? We have heard it said, again and again—and I suspect you have heard it here this afternoon—that under the system of responsible government, the people elect members of the House of Commons and, in turn, the members of the House of Commons sustain, by their confidence, an executive government. I know you have been doing extensive research into the history of our Constitution. Is it not true that the doctrine of responsible government relates primarily to the relationship of the executive government on the one hand and the House of Commons on the other hand, and has relatively little to do with the relationship between the House of Commons and the electorate, except in the minds of some journalists?

It happens again and again, particularly in Canada where we have a very rapid turnover in the membership of the House of Commons, that members do not plan to run again. We have Prime Ministers who do not plan to run again. It is true that the parties persist, but you can hardly say that it is the party that is being held responsible for the acts of a Prime Minister who has retired, who perhaps has gone back to his law office or into business. Is it not true that, before we base an argument for the enactment of the GST on the doctrine of responsible government, we ought to examine that doctrine and discover what indeed it means?

Senator Cools: Absolutely.

Senator Kinsella: May I comment on that point? My question to Senator Thériault related to who is the legitimate interpreter of the public interest. In your scenario of responsible government, would it be the government in the House of Commons?

Senator Stewart: This is a question to which there is no one-line answer. Senator Balfour and I had an exchange earlier in this sitting—I do not remember the exact day—on this very topic. However, you have put the problem more precisely than I did when discussing it earlier.

Let us say that we are going into an election. Sometimes there are election questions that are very clear and are pushed right to the very front of every platform. In the election of 1988, the question of the Free Trade Agreement was pushed right to the front. Insofar as anyone is likely to get a mandate in a country with several parties, I would have to say that there is no question that the present government got a mandate to carry through the Free Trade Agreement in 1988, and this house acted on the basis of that reading of the outcome of the election.

Then there is the situation where a House of Commons is elected supporting a particular executive government, and some new issue arises—perhaps it is entirely new or perhaps it is something that had been out on the fringes at the time of the election. In this case we have now moved away from an election on what they used to call "measures" to an election on what they used to call "men". Senator Marsden is not here now, so I can get away with putting it that way. Then we have the assertion from the Prime Minister that the people of the country elected him as Prime Minister and that, consequently, they gave him a mandate to do whatever he wants to do on these several important questions. I do not think that we ought to confuse that mandate, on the one hand, with the kind of mandate where you have a specific measure pushed to the front in an election, on the other hand.

That brings us to the Senate. As John A. Macdonald said in 1865, it is unthinkable that "... the members of the upper branch of legislature will set themselves deliberately to oppose what they know to be the settled opinions and wishes of the people of the country. Over the years the Senate occasionally dug in when a government attempted to do things on which it had no mandate at all from the previous election, because the matter was simply not to the fore or was out on the fringes at the time of the election, as was the case with regard to the GST. Sure, it was mentioned before the election, but it was not front and centre.

Senator Comeau: It was part of the platform.

Senator Stewart: It is precisely in that situation that the Senate comes to the fore, as it was intended to come to the fore—not to veto the clear will of the people expressed in an election, but to put the brakes on bills dealing with very important questions where the people have not had an opportunity to speak clearly.

As we all know, there are so many issues in most elections that it is seldom that more than one or two occupy the front of the stage. If you look at the attitude of the Conservative party in Great Britain, I think you will find that it is exactly as I say: namely, that if an election has been fought on an issue, such as joining the European Common Market, then, regardless of what that party feels, the Tory peers are willing to go along with it; perhaps reluctantly, but they go along with it. If, on the other hand, a very important issue has not been pushed front and centre in an election, the Conservative party in the House of Lords, according to Lord Salisbury, feels that it is free to dig in to give the people a chance to make their will known.

As I said, this is a complex constellation, and I do not think we will get any precise list of tests as to what is front and centre and so on. I often say—and I believe some honourable senators here today have heard me say it—that if a Prime Minister gets support from, let us say, 43 per cent of the electorate, it is fair to say to someone, for example, when they sign a petition against the GST, "Did you know when you voted for the Mulroney government that you were in fact voting for the GST? Did you know that you were voting for the Meech Lake Accord?" It seems to me that that is a very fair question to ask a Tory petitioner.

Senator LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I have been waiting to get back to Senator Kinsella, who tried to make an argument over the elected versus the non-elected. He called as his witnesses political scientists. First of all, when were political scientists ever subjected to an election by their students? They usually spend the first three years of their appointment scrambling about for tenure which, of course, is usually not voted upon by the students, who are, after all, the users of their merchandise, such as it is. He also appears to put in some doubt the legitimacy of this body by separating those who are elected and those who are not. I assume that the restrictions he has for the non-elected apply also to the appointees to the Supreme Court, who are not, to my knowledge, subjected to a periodic review such as an election every four or five years.

On the question of whether or not there was an election on the issue of the GST, I would like to call as my witness a Member of Parliament from Alberta named Doctor Alex Kindy, who is present here now and who has confirmed what I have always suspected; that if there had been even a hint of GST legislation, very few Tories would have been elected in Alberta. In fact, the level of democracy in his former party is such that as soon as he voted his conscience, he was immediately removed by the Whip.

Senator Molgat: Senator LeBlanc, should I assume from what you are saying that the present government was elected illegitimately and under false pretences, because if its members would not have won in Alberta, that may have been the case in other provinces as well.

Senator LeBlanc: I am sorry, I did not quite hear all that the honourable senator said. In fact, I wish that I could let Mr. Kindy answer the question, but I am one who occasionally tries to live by the rules. The argument we are making is simple: If this supposed mandate was the sort of thing that was whispered about by people in a corner, then we expect it is the same type of people who whispered to the Speaker.

• (1730)

I would like to finish with Senator Kinsella. If he can make such a fuss over the legitimacy achieved by being elected—and he certainly appears to be in his elected transition a fighter for human rights and many other things—how could he allow his name to be recorded in his first vote in this place without asking the question "Where are the others?"

Frankly, Senator Kinsella, do not try to convince me of the virtues of the elected versus the nonelected when you participated in the most serious denial of the right to vote of any group in the history of this Parliament.

Senator Spivak: Honourable Senators, I should like to ask Senator Stewart a question. It seems that Senator Kinsella has raised one of the most important issues before us, which is how and by whom is the public interest to be represented. I do not think that question has been properly answered, although I find Senator Stewart's comments interesting because they get into the essential questions here.

It seems to me that the position of the members opposite is that they are attempting to represent the public interest because they have evaluated a government measure, the GST, and they have found it singularly lacking. They have been supported in that position by hearings across the country and so forth. Then we come to sticky ground. Is the public interest being represented here by the attempt not to have a vote? I understand the position of the checks and balances that are needed against an executive that has a majority in the House of Commons. I understand that checks and balances are needed in the Senate. The system in Australia operates well, but what are the limits? Surely you cannot say that the public interest is being served if this issue never comes to a vote.

I take my duty of representing the public sincerely. I feel I have a duty to represent the public interest, and it is not often enough spoken about in this chamber. What are the limits, and how can you justify delaying a vote indefinitely when that vote, in and of itself, is an indication of how serious the public interest is being taken in this chamber?

I do not know if I am interpretating Senator Kinsella's question properly, but it seems to me that the question of how and by whom the public interest is represented is an essential question. If, out of all this brouhaha, we come closer to some analysis of that situation, we will have accomplished something.

Senator Stewart: I thank the honourable senator for her thoughtful question. I do not think there is any room for doubt but that our legislature was set up on the basis of two different principles. One is the principle of responsible government, and we know the implications of that. We also know that there were those in Canada west—now Ontario—who felt that there should be "rep by pop" and responsible government and that would be it. However, we also know that if they insisted on that alone, rep by pop and responsible government, there would have been no Dominion of Canada. So they had to bring in a second principle, namely, the federal principle.

The federal principle finds its manifestation in the Senate. They did not go for an elected Senate. They had some experience with an elected legislative council in the old province of Canada, which did not include Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, etc. They went for an appointed second chamber. So you have two basic principles thrown together. What we are seeing today is a clash of those two basic principles. I see the senator nodding, so I think she understands my point. However, we do not stop there.

Because the House of Commons is an elected body, the assumption is that, in a sense, it is the motor in the vehicle. The function of the Senate, on the other hand, is rather like that of the brakes. It becomes clear in the case of appropriation and taxation. We cannot make a move here, but we surely can stop. There has been some controversy over our competence to amend, but no one has questioned the competence of the Senate to put the brakes on all the way.

It seems to me that was how these two approaches came together, without which Canada—that is the Dominion of Canada as distinct from the province of Canada—would never have come into existence. Starting from there, you move on to ask, "How far should the Senate carry its putting on of the brakes and how far should what appears to be a minority opposition in the Senate go?" If an opposition in either the House of Commons or the Senate says to the majority that we will have a vote on this matter two weeks from today it has signed the warrant for its own execution. I do not think anyone is prepared to do that. It is a form of suicide.

I think it is fair to say that when a major question is on the public stage, as is the GST now, it is reasonable to expect a prolonged discussion and debate, particularly in a country like Canada. It is different in the United Kingdom where you have a metropolitan press that is on everyone's breakfast table the next morning. This is a big country, and a lot of the electors are distracted by their constant attention to the news from the United States. It seems to me that it is reasonable for a group in the Senate, which appears to be in a minority, to attempt to push this matter into the conscienciousness of the Canadian public.

In this particular case, the situation has been aggravated by Senator Charbonneau. The argument that many of us would make relative to the goods and services tax has been inflamed by the fact that in one instance two weeks ago he closed off the bells on his own, but there was no vote. Then a week later he closes off the bells again on his own and there is a vote.

It seems to me we have two motivations in putting on the brakes in this instance. One is directly related to the GST, and the other is related to a matter which may be more important in the long run; namely, your rights, my rights and the rights of every senator to know when the votes are coming and to be able to be present to vote. I will cease and desist at that point, senator.

Senator Spivak: I do not wish to prolong this, but the question was: Who and what represents the public interest. I do not know if you can say that you are representing the public interest by indefinitely delaying the vote. I do not think there is any evidence for that. Also, just as convincingly you can argue that you are, in effect, exercising a tyranny of the agenda and a lockout of other issues. For example, if I wanted to speak about the Rafferty-Alameda Dam, which is threatening my province, I would not have a chance to get into that debate until this issue is settled. I was asking you to clarify that point more precisely, but perhaps that is not possible at this time.

Senator Stewart: I doubt that there is anyone who is in a position to announce that he has made a decision that is in the public interest. We have a process of government. It involves the House of Commons and the Senate, and that process is supposed to work to produce legislation that is in the public interest. Within the House of Commons they have rules by which they work; in the Senate we have rules by which we work as we perform our role in the constitutional structure.

My burning indignation revolves around the fact that Senator Charbonneau on two occasions stripped me of my right to participate in the formulation of public measures that are supposed to be in the public interest.

Senator Cools: Honourable senators, this matter started because Senator Kinsella raised his question and then Senator Stewart put a question to me. Perhaps for the time being we can leave Senator Stewart's question with respect to the meaning of responsible government by saying that responsible government means that the executive is responsible to the House of Commons, not to the public.

However, with respect to the wider issue that Senator Kinsella raised, which Senator Spivak also raised, I think public interest changes, particularly as it applies to the two questions posed. In the particular scenario of the parents and the children, using the metaphors of social work and social psyschology, one would have to be cognizant of the relationship between the parent and the child and understand the guidelines for the well-being of the child. One would have to be cognizant of things like the Child Welfare Act. With respect to the metaphors the persons who would ensure that the parents are doing a good job with the children would be the grandparents, which would be the Senate in our system. If the system were to keep going using your metaphors, then there would be great grandparents, which would be the Governor General. It is a sad thing in a way. This matter began with Senator Beaudoin's intervention as well. In this century many countries have had to make decisions about what models of government they would use, whether they would be republics, constitutional monarchies or whatever. The histories of countries moving towards responsible government and then to full independence are well documented and available.

Because so many things are so often put before the public, and because those measures were so well entrenched, the public does not see them for what they are. One of the measures that has been put before the public for years, and which the public has been thoroughly "inoculated" against, is the phenomenon of the Crown and the role of the Governor General. We must remember that the Governor General is a member of Parliament. Every time we pass a bill, it says at the top "Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada." One of the shocking things for me, as I have seen these events unfold, was that the Governor General did not summon people from here, mainly Senator MacEachen, to ascertain the facts of the case. It is important in our system that the Governor General walk head and shoulders above all of us.

I do not know if Senator Kinsella and Senator Spivak are aware of it, but they are both sitting under the name of Lord Dufferin. I would like to put on the record what Lord Dufferin had to say with respect to this business of impartiality and the Governor General. He said:

> If there is one obligation whose importance I appreciate more than another, as attaching to the functions of my office, it is the absolute and paramount duty of maintaining not merely an outward attitude of perfect impartiality towards the various parties into which the political world of Canada . . . is divided . . . As the head of a constitutional state, as engaged in the administration of parliamentary government, he has no political friends . . .

I would remind honourable senators that our system has vehicles and means which we must use, as the citizens of this country have used the petition.

I want to leave one other reference with you with respect to the role of the Governor General, because I sincerely believe that this Governor General has a duty to follow in the traditions and the precedents of the Governor Generals of this country. I shall quote precisely:

> A second duty of the Governor General is to offer his services as a mediator and conciliator between the political party leaders when the occasion warrants. Intervention of this kind is usually of an emergency nature and will occur only in time of crisis. Thus the Duke of Devonshire in 1917 summoned Sir Robert Borden, Sir Wilfred Laurier, and four others to a meeting at Government House.

So the precedents are there. So to return to the matter at hand, which was petitions and the question as to who truly represents the people and the public interest in our system, whether you like it or not, it is the Governor General and the Crown. Last week I quoted Charles Vincent Massey. There are many other sources before us. The Prime Minister is the head of the Government of Canada. The Governor General is the head of the people of Canada. Thank you.

Senator Comeau: May I ask a question. I have here a newspaper article from the Ottawa Citizen of two or three days ago. The article is an interview with the Leader of the Opposition in the Commons. I would like to refer to one of the comments he made. I believe he is not yet elected, but he is going to be the leader.

Senator Cools: What are you talking about?

Senator Comeau: Jean Chrétien.

Senator Cools: He is the leader of the party. He was elected at a convention to be the leader of the party.

Senator Comeau: I will quote the article.

> The leader said Mulroney's cavalier attitude and public opinion—

"Public opinion" meaning polls.

> —shifted his initial reluctance to have the Senate kill the GST. He insisted he made the final decision, not the senators.
> "They will not do anything that I don't want them to do."

Do you accept this? If you do, I would like you to say so. If you do not, I would like you to refute that despicable statement.

Senator Cools: Senator, I told this house last night that I do not have much regard for the Ottawa Citizen, and I do not pay attention to the articles in it.

Senator Comeau: Do you deny the quote?

Senator Cools: I am trying to tell you with a little bit of subtlety that I am ignoring you. .

Senator Grafstein: Before 6 o'clock, I would like to return to petitions and perhaps after 8 o'clock we can return to Senator Cools' important issue. I congratulate her for introducing a different perspective that has not been properly aired in the chamber during this most important period when we are dealing with petitions.

Earlier when I was presenting my petitions from Toronto, I made some comments directed toward Senator Di Nino, and he was not here. He is here now, and during the few minutes that are available before six o'clock, I would like to return to petitions and draw his attention to a petition I received yesterday from an area of Toronto that he would know well. The area of Toronto I am addressing his attention to is St. Clair Avenue West. I know that the honourable senator is not only familiar with that area, but has spent much of his life there. This gentleman not only saw me yesterday while I was in Toronto, but repeated his viewpoint with respect to the GST. I must say that some months ago he raised this with me as a passing matter, and has subsequently repeatedly told me to stop the GST. So the form of petition that he makes to me is quite interesting. Before I table it, I would like to tell honourable senators about this man and his family because I think the story represents the great qualities that we so value in Canada, those being hard work, energy, and creativity which not only brings about success to a particular family but to the workers and their families.

This gentlemen's name is Lou Litwin. He is the president of a company called St. Clair Paint and Wallpaper, which is one of Canada's largest paint and wallpaper companies. It was started on St. Clair Avenue, not too far from where Senator Di Nino started his company. The origins of this company are interesting. Mr. Lou Litwin's father was born in an area of Russia that was famous during WWII because it was a war-ravaged area. Mr. Harry Litwin, now deceased, came to Canada in 1919. From 1919 to 1939 he was a painter. He worked hard and finally opened a store on St. Clair Avenue West called the St. Clair Paint and Wallpaper Company. From that modest beginning, Mr. Litwin, with his young son, built up a business from 1939 to the present day which includes over 150 stores across Canada, with manufacturing plants in Ontario. He built a paint factory in Nova Scotia. I believe Senator Buchanan would be familiar with that factory, because it brought jobs to Nova Scotia. He built a paint factory in England.

Senator Buchanan: I opened it.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Buchanan says he opened the plant, so he is familiar with it. This is a hardworking, industrious family encompassing three generations, from the late Harry Litwin, to Lou Litwin, who is the head of the company, to his young sons, Jeffrey and Harry—Harry named after his father. They are now working in the business.

Yesterday, he asked me what I could do to stop the GST. He said he is not involved in politics, but he wants to do the right thing. He wants me to do everything in my power to stop the GST. I was taken aback by this because Mr. Litwin is, as Senator Buchanan knows, a moderate, decent and apolitical man. I asked him if it was proper—and this goes to Senator Kinsella's question —for senators to do this, and he told me to do what I have to do because it is not helpful to the country. I asked him why, and he said because it is difficult, complex, costly, and is going to hurt his customers and contractors. Mr. Litwin said he would have to cut jobs not only in Toronto but across the country. He said he has employees with families across the country who look to him to be the engine of their life's work. He said that he wants to create more franchises, more stores and more jobs, but he said this tax is going to hurt him and the families that work for him and with him. He is a public company and his employees have shares in his company. He told me to go back to Ottawa and tell those senators—particulary the senators from Toronto, Nova Scotia and Ontario—to stop the GST because it is going to stop him from building a company to create more jobs, which is all he wants to do.

I said that perhaps there were other alternatives. He said that there are other taxes and that he would agree to pay more corporate taxes or more personal taxes. He does not feel that this is a fair tax. He said his customers are telling him that, along with the painting contractors and the housing industry. Then he concluded with something that I think is quite telling: He said that what bothers him more than anything else is that it is going to be an invitation for people to cheat. They will not want to do it, but, as a result, the government is not going to collect any more money. The tax will force a lot of people to cheat. That is not the Canadian way. He said that is not what his father said, what he says or what his two sons, who are working in his business, say. They want to build a bigger company than he did and create more jobs, and they do not like it either. So he said, on behalf of the Litwin family and on behalf of the St. Clair Company, stop the GST.

Honourable Senators, it is 6 o'clock.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I now leave the Chair to reconvene at 8 o'clock this evening.

The Senate recessed at 6 p.m.

At 8:00 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I think most of us are aware that, over the last few days, there have been contacts made and discussions at various times and in various places among various people with a view to finding a way to solve at least some of our present problems and return to a more normal regime and agenda here in the Senate. I do not have anything that I can usefully report to honourable senators at the moment except that discussions are continuing and that, after consultation with the leadership on the other side, we have decided that we should give the discussions a fair chance to proceed tonight and tomorrow. Therefore, I am proposing, with their concurrence, that we suspend the present sitting of the Senate until tomorrow afternoon at 2:00 o'clock.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, that is quite acceptable to us. In the meantime, we will take advantage of the time to see whether some of the ideas that are in play might lead us to a solution, as Senator Murray says, to at least some of the problems we are presently facing in the Senate. I should just add that, if we do not succeed in reaching any conclusions, we will, of course, be back tomorrow on the same item, which leaves the situation as it is at the moment. That will occur in the absence of a conclusion which, I hope, will take place on at least some of the points at issue.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until Monday, October 15, at 2 p.m.

[Editor's Note: For continuation of proceedings see Issue No. 97H.]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senator, I move that this House proceed to the reading of Orders of the Day, and that—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No. No. Such a motion may only be moved when a question is under debate. It cannot be moved by—

Some Hon. Senators: Sit down.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please sit down. I cannot make a ruling if I do not hear the argument. Order, please.

Honourable Senators, I cannot make a ruling on any point if I cannot hear the honourable Senators.

Senator Murray: I have good standing power, I can tell you that.

Senator Frith: These motions are moved in the course of debate on questions that they seek to set aside. They may only be moved—only be moved, not put—and they cannot even be moved when a question is under debate, and cannot be moved by a member rising on a point of order. Continue, Senator Perrault.

Senator Roblin: We are entitled to be heard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, order!

Senator Frith: Read the rules. They cannot be raised on a point of order.

An Hon. Senator: Why not?

Senator Frith: Because it says so. It cannot be raised on a point of order. It says so. It cannot be done.

An Hon. Senator: Let the Speaker be heard.

An Hon. Senator: Rules, rules, rules.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Notwithstanding the fact that some 50 per cent of periodicals and books are returned due to non-sales, the periodical marketers called for an exemption from GST at the time of importation.

In response to a request, the Minister of Revenue noted that the periodical marketers would be eligible for an input tax credit at the time of importation and would not have to wait for the items to be sold to claim the credit.

The minister's response ignores the fact that input tax credits, although nominally claimable at the time of import, are actually eligible to be filed no sooner than the end of the month of importation.

Furthermore, Revenue Canada does not begin to pay interest on the claim until a further 21 days after the sale is received by the department.

• (1420)

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. Honourable Senators, my understanding . . . .

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, with all the noise—my understanding was that Senator Doody was getting up on a point of order.

Senator Murray: I am standing on a point of order. Honourable Senators, I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

[Translation]

Honourable Senators, I would like to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

Senator Perrault: Honourable Senators, we are now moving on to another community. This time it is Kelowna, British Columbia, the vacation capital of British Columbia.

Mr. Cropay was visiting from Dryden, Ontario, went to Kelowna for his summer holiday and became so concerned about the GST that he signed this petition in a bookstore in British Columbia. That is the nice feeling we get between British Columbia and Ontario.

His wife Angie also signed—a very firm signature. They are obviously concerned.

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

Senator Perrault: We have a petition from Madge Barry of 1684 Bernard Ave. in Kelowna. She is humbly praying and calling upon us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. This is the position she has taken.

We have a Petten here. There is a Petten who signed this petition in Kelowna. Senator Petten, were you up in the BC interior this summer?

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: I wish to speak on the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

Senator Perrault: Now I want to move on, honourable Senators, to a list of names from that great city Calgary, one of the finest cities in all of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

Senator Perrault: These names were collected at a bookstore in Calgary, where they are very concerned that in the year when we are battling illiteracy, we have decided to tax books. This is the brief explanation for this particular one.

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: Hon. Senators, I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

Senator Perrault: I must observe that my Vancouver Canucks defeated Edmonton in hockey last night. I know it is unparliamentary to say that.

An Hon. Senator: It is absolutely wonderful.

An Hon. Senator: But it is nice.

Senator Perrault: Yes, it is. We have another petition here. This one was also collected at a bookstore by people who are outraged about the anti-intellectual thrust of the GST, that we are now going, for the first time, to attack learning by taxing books.

Senator Murray: Hon. Senators, I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

Senator Perrault: They asked us to report . . . . I know that the honourable Senator there will want to fight that terribly oppressive burden being placed on literacy.

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

Senator Perrault: Mr. Webb is very concerned about the proposal to tax periodicals as well. He really believes it is unfair.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Some of these people have written to say that Canadian publications are barely surviving now and this is going to kill Canadian pubications. This is why they are signing the petition.

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Perrault: We have another group of petitions. I have just been informed that the names are pouring in from my home province of British Columbia. I feel honoured to be [Inaudible—Editor]. All the members of our western caucus are impressed with the number of westerners who are expressing their grievance.

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

Senator Perrault: These petitioners signed these petitions, I presume, at a bookshop. Again, they are very concerned about the proposal during our year in which we are battling illiteracy to make it difficult for people to read. We feel that is inconsistent with what we are trying to do. That is the explanation.

Senator Murray: Hon. Senators, I wish to speak on a point of order. I wish to speak to the point of order.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

Senator Perrault: Kimberly, British Columbia, is a community that has suffered a great deal as a result of the mismanaged economy by the Conservative government. No wonder they are signing petitions there because they suffered so badly.

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: Hon. Senators, I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to argue that Senator Doody's motion is in order.

Senator Perrault: It is very wonderful to get these letters coming from all regions of the west, big towns and small towns. That is up in northeastern British Columbia.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

We hope that others will write in and let them know their views, whether or not they support the GST or whether they oppose it. We want democracy in this House. If honourable Senators want to present their petitions in support of the GST, we will certainly listen to them with respect.

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

Senator Perrault: We will not take away from the time of the Speaker who want to read those names. I want to do that—

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to argue the receivability of Senator Doody's motion.

Senator Perrault: You will be given respectable silence by the opposition.

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to argue that Senator Doody's motion is in order.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to argue that Senator Doody's motion is in order.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: Honourable Senator, you argued against the receivability of Senator Doody's motion. I wish to argue in favour of it.

Senator Perrault: We have a petition from Fernie, British Columbia. Fernie is one of the great coal-mining areas of Canada, contributing to the wealth of this country, suffering under present economic policies, but valiantly striving to maintain a viable base.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

Senator Perrault: We have another petition, which has come in from a university book store. You see, together with millions of other Canadians, she wonders why the Conservatives are attacking universities and knowledge, books and periodicals. It seems so contrary to all of our traditions, so she has signed that petition.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

Senator Perrault: There must be real anger in Cranbrook, because so many have signed with a red pen. They seem to be particularly angry. It is almost as though they signed in blood, or something.

An hon. Senator: Their blood is boiling.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: I wish to wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

• (1510)

I want to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

Senator Perrault: This petition is from Cranbrook, British Columbia. They are very concerned about the employment in Cranbrook. The lumber deal that was signed by the Conservatives is ruining the lumber industry in British Columbia and they are one of the victims of this process. Cranbrook is suffering.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: Hon. Senators, I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

Senator Perrault: There is a gathering storm in Radium. They are very concerned about what this bill is going to do to the tourist industry. Tour operators say it will be ruinous if we in the Senate allow this bill to pass. I assume that is why this petitioner has written to us.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

An Hon. Senator: They are going to charge a 7 percent increase for the price of swimming.

Senator Perrault: Yes, that is right, they are going to charge a 7% increase on the price of swimming.

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

Senator Perrault: These petitions contain the names of people from Toronto. They were visiting western Canada. This is what we should do. More people from the west should visit eastern Canada, the Atlantic provinces and vice versa. Then we would have less misunderstanding.

[Senator Perrault continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

Senator Perrault: The letters are still coming in from Willowdale, Ontario. It is heartwarming to see the way these letters are coming in.

Mr. McDougall McIntosh, who lives on Murray Street in Toronto, is an outraged Scot at the idea of the GST; imagine living on Murray Avenue.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I wish to speak to Senator Frith's motion.

Senator Frith: Hon. Senators, Senator Murray does not seem to understand that he broke his word again. We have a book with rules in it, and we are going to follow it. We are not going to have precedents in points of order beeing set by Senator Murray. That is the problem.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Only a few minutes ago, when Senator Murray stood up, he immediately tried to move a motion. When we had the recess a few minutes ago an appeal we made was that we were going to go back to petitions where we were.

Senator Murray got up and interrupted someone who was doing what he agreed to do in the truce when we had some discussion. As soon as he got on his feet he violated the agreement he made by trying to move a motion.

Hon. Senators, not only that, but we have the petitions right here. They do not seem to be able to understand. I have a number of petitions.

They keep coming in. Every day we get more and more. The people of Canada are trying to express their views to Parliament, which is their ancient and undoubted right.

• (1520)

What members of the government side do not seem to realize is that you can fool us once, you even fooled us twice, but we are not going to have any more rules that change. You can get out the bulldozer. There will be no more bulldozing, thanks, we have had enough of that.

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

Senator Murray: I wish to speak to the point of order read by Senator Frith.

Senator Murray: Senator Frith raised a point of order—

Senator Olson: All these people want the Senate to know what they are talking about. They have a right to carry their message to the Senate and anybody who gets in the way is going to be sorry. The people will never get over this.

Senator Olson: These are all people who wanted us to know. They all want the Senate to know that they are distrubed because . . . . I am not allowed to read the petitions and I never break the rules, but what they are really saying is that we humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of this Goods and Services Tax.

I know they used to support the Conservative party, but I bet you not any more.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators I wish to speak to the point of order raised by Senator Frith.

Senator Olson: That is why they do not want it. They are sick and tired of bulldozers . . . bullying tactics all the time.

They mine a lot of coal at Sunnynook. As a matter of fact, they mine it for several reasons. There is a big power generator there using coal, and of course they ship some out too, but the power now is the main thing. They are terribly concerned about this.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I have some petitions as well. I might add that these petitions are complaining about the fact that this tax will be applied on magazines, books and newspapers, something that has never been done since Confederation.

[Senator Stollery reads names of petitioners]

Whitby is a town to the east of Toronto, a very small community not far from the Pickering nuclear reactor.

[Senator Stollery continues to read names of petitioners]

Mr. Bahr from Toronto is also complaining about the tax. The goods and services tax will be applied to magazine subscriptions. When he goes to a drug store he will have to pay the goods and services tax, and he is definitely not in favour of it.

[Senator Stollery continues to read names of petitioners]

This petitioner from Scarborough's complaint has to do with the magazines, which she gets every week.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Murray.

Senator Murray: I have been recognized.

[Senator Stollery continues to read names of petitioners]

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have the names of several petitioners.

An Hon. Senator: Mr. Speaker, we have a point of order. I suggest you make a ruling and send it around in writing.

The Hon. the Speaker: A point of order has been raised on the floor. The rule book says that when there is a point of order on the floor, we will discuss it. I have a ruling here. There is a point of order.

Senator Buckwold: This is a very important petition.

The Hon. the Speaker: You have a point of order and it takes precedence over petitions. You know that.

Some Hon. Senators: Sit down.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will not sit down—certainly not when you tell me to sit down.

[Senator Buckwold continues to read names of petitioners]

The Hon. the Speaker: Rule 15 says:

> the Speaker shall preserve order and decorum . . . points of order . . . to the Senate—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Frith, Senator Murray brought a point of order. He brought a point of order. It takes precedence over petitions. You know that.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Murray wishes to speak on the point of order, which takes precedence.

You have the floor, Senator Murray.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Buckwold: A lot of these petitions . . . . The town of Fort Erie would be very hurt. The town of Fort Erie would be very hurt if they did not know that this important list of their citizens' names was read at this time, because after all, someone went to a great deal of difficulty to get this list of names together. Certainly I will do the best I can to ensure that people in Fort Erie have their names read publicly and are heard by the Senators, who I know are very interested in hearing their names. In fact, I appreciate the attention everyone here is giving these names, because I think the people here find these names important, and that someone has gone to the trouble to compile a list—to take a Sunday, or one of their days off, and compile a list of names—

Senator Murray: Why can I not speak to your point of order?

Senator Buckwold: —of those opposing this tax on books and other things is a great credit—

Senator Murray: I want to know whether the Speaker has ruled on this point of order.

[Senator Buckwold continues to read names of petitioners]

An Hon. Senator: Has there been a ruling?

[Senator Buckwold continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: I want to know whether he has brought in a ruling on your point of order.

Senator Murray: I want to know whether the Speaker has ruled on your point of order.

[Senator Buckwold continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: If he has not, I want to speak to it. If he has, I would like to know what the ruling is.

Senator Buckwold: The petition has actually followed the Niagara River, and they have joined all those communities in the Niagara peninsula and along the Niagara River, because the next name is . . . .

[Senator Buckwold continues to read names of petitioners]

Senator Murray: Hon. Senators, I wish to speak to Senator Frith's point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: If you agree, hon. Senators, I would like to suspend the sitting and if the two leaders would meet with me in my office, maybe we can find a solution to this.

Some hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The sitting was recessed.

At 5.57 p.m. the sitting was resumed, the Speaker in the Chair.

The Hon. the Speaker: The sitting is resumed. If there is agreement, and there is agreement amongst the leaders, we shall suspend the sitting as of this moment and come back at the call of the bell at 2 p.m. tomorrow. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until approximately 2 p.m., October 16.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 9, 1990

[Editors's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Issue No. 97H.]

At 6 p.m., October 16, the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as the clock says 6 o'clock, I must leave the Chair. We will suspend the sitting now and reassemble at the call of the bell.

An Hon. Senator: Will that be at 8 o'clock or 9 o'clock?

The Hon. the Speaker: I do not know, but it will not be before 8 o'clock.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended.

At 8:50 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, at the risk of sounding like a broken record, I must say again that the sitting is suspended. We will recess now until tomorrow, October 17, at 2 o'clock because negotiations are still going on.

The sitting of the senate was supended until Wednesday, October 17, at 2 p.m.

At 2 p.m., Wednesday, October 17, the sitting was resumed, the Speaker in the Chair.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting is resumed.

RULES OF THE SENATE

POSSIBLE CHANGES—STATUS REPORT

That being the case, I would suggest that we suspend the sitting until 8 o'clock this evening. That will give us time to get the drafting and the final agreement done, and it will also provide some certainty for honourable senators, who will not be required to sit around and a wait the call of the bell. I believe that the consensus is that we should suspend until 8 o'clock this evening.

Senator Frith: Oh?

Senator MacEachen: I guess it is all right.

Senator Murray: At least, the agreement that was reached between the Leader of the Opposition and me in our last discussion was that it would be better to have a fixed time to return to the Senate rather than having to wait. I hope that in the meantime we can bring this matter to a successful conclusion. Therefore, when honourable senators come back at 8 o'clock, they should come back prepared to work.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, what the Leader of the Government has said is agreeable. We have had some meetings and we are making some progress. We will never be sure until we are at the last comma and period, but I am confident that we can resume at 8 o'clock with some definite results that will be an improvement over the situation that existed—when was it, Monday?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the Senate be suspended until 8 p.m?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until 8 p.m.

PROPOSED CHANGES—STATUS REPORT

At 8 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have a brief report to make for those of you who did not have the pleasure of seeing Senator Kirby on CBC Newsworld a few moments ago bringing the nation up to date on our discussions.

First, the leadership of the two parties continue to work on an agreement, the elements of which, as honourable senators know, are changing the rules and the agreement on the business that is now before the Senate. The legal drafting is complex and painstaking. It is excruciatingly slow, but I hope that when we have finished it we will have documents that we can all understand and live with. It also needs to be translated.

Our proposal, therefore—and the proposal that would find support on both sides of the chamber—is that, while we continue to try to put the finishing touches to these documents, the Senate might take up Bill C-28 this evening without prejudice to the positions that we were in on either side.

An. Hon. Senator: What? No Question Period?

Senator Murray: The Leader of the Opposition and our friends and I would continue to work this evening; the rest of you would direct yourselves to Bill C-28 before suspending the sitting this evening. We would then return here tomorrow at two o'clock.

Senator Bosa: What time are you going to suspend the sitting?

Senator Bonnell: Do we adjourn now?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Murray: No. You will proceed with Bill C-28. The adjournment stands in Senator Frith's name. I understand that there are one and possibly two speakers in the opposition who might wish to speak tonight on Bill C-28. There will also be at least one speaker on the government side to address that bill. We will then suspend the sitting and come back here tomorrow at two o'clock, by which time our work will have been completed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I had intended not to be associated with this announcement because to some extent it represents failure of our process. After having given such a strong indication that we might be back with an agreement at eight o'clock, we have to ask for more time. Perhaps it is a helpful sign that we are recommending to begin with the legislation that would be contained in any parliamentary timetable if we have a general agreement. Let us hope that commencement of this will stimulate us all to reach an agreement soon so that we can get some business done and change some of the rules that have created so much difficulty.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, do you agree that we move to Order No. 1 on the Orders of the Day?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED ACTS

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—MOTION FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON CERTAIN SENATE AMENDMENTS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments to the Bill C-28, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act, to which the House of Commons have disagreed; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, before I was so rudely interrupted on June 19 I was saying that I am here to oppose the motion of Senator Doody that the Senate do not insist on its amendments to Bill C-28, An Act to Amend the Income Tax Act and other associated Acts in the legislation.

To those of you who were not here earlier in the year, Bill C-28 is a long, involved and complicated piece of legislation involving a variety of income tax changes—many of them important. The legislation was carefully reviewed by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. We looked over the income tax changes carefully. Some things we did not accept with joy, but they were accepted.

The major controversial point was the so-called clawback legislation, in which over a certain threshold, namely, $50,000 of income, old age pensions would be taxed back along with family allowances. This relatively minor section—that is, in relation to the overall bill—was probably the most contentious aspect of the legislation.

Like other bills presented by the government in this session, it invoked a revulsion on the part of literally millions of Canadians. They resented very deeply the fact that the old age pension—and I refer especially to the old age pension, although there were certainly problems with the family allowances—and the universality of the system were being eroded. The whole concept that we would have a universal pension regardless of income and without a means test for our old age pensioners—something that all of us have looked forward to, for example, people like myself who draw that pension and others who are dependent very much on it for their financial security—was being eroded.

An. Hon. Senator: Bill C-28 made me vomit!

Senator Buckwold: Bill C-28, with regard to those aspects involving the clawback and the removal of the universality of the pension, represented to the Canadian public another attempt of the government's to take away what was considered a basic, fundamental right. There are those of us who to this day absolutely insist that we do not have means tests, that if you are in a wealthier position you still receive your pension and that it will be taxed back at normal rates that represent a good percentage.

• (2010)

That type of representation was made to us time and time again by important organizations whose representatives appeared before the committee. As I have said, this measure is a major change in principle.

Some may ask why the committee did not reject the basic philosophy of a tax on what up until now has been a program of universality. The answer is one in which the importance of money was a very relevant fact. That fact is that the government will gain $500 million by taxing back through the clawback provision old age pensions and family allowances above the ceiling about which I have talked.

Quite frankly, the committee looked at the measure and realized that it would be a highly contentious issue. That issue was whether or not the Senate should involve itself in removing a source of $500 million in revenue from the government so sorely in need of money. Yet, we held our noses. We swallowed whatever objections we had to the basic change of philosophy that the government had placed on the people of Canada against their will. As I say, it has created revulsion among taxpayers across the country.

In doing this we brought in two relatively minor amendments. Basically, we said, "Okay, Minister of Finance, the least you can do is make sure that the threshold amount of $50,000 will maintain its purchasing power and be fully indexed rather than having the first 3 per cent of that amount eroded by inflation." As honourable senators will recall, the government in its lack of concern for those who draw pensions, regardless of income, originally wanted to tax all old age pensions by limiting the indexation level to 3 per cent. The government brought forward a proposal in which it stated that after a certain point in time old age pensions would not be fully indexed, as they are today. There was an outcry from the people of Canada a few years ago when the government said, "Regardless of income the first 3 per cent of inflation will be carried by the pensioner". This would mean that in a relatively few short years the purchasing power of the pension would be eroded.

I remind honourable senators that such a measure could mean the difference between living in semi-comfort as opposed to complete poverty. As you will recall, there was a great protest. Dear ladies marched on Parliament Hill. That is the way Mr. Mulroney was going to deal with his sacred trust. The old age pensioners built this country, and they did so in a decent, equitable and consistent manner. They were told that their pensions would be wiped out. The outcry was very effective.

I can well remember the pictures on television of the dear old ladies—I think they were mostly older ladies—who accosted the Prime Minister and said, "You can't do this to us. This is not the way the government is supposed to operate". The government backed off and changed its direction. To this day, thanks to those wonderful older people who protested vehemently, pensions are fully indexed.

[Senator Buckwold.]

However, the government does not back down that easily. What it does not get through the front door it turns around and takes through the back door. Thus, it does not intend to index the clawback. One of the problems we have with the infamous goods and services tax is that those in lower income brackets will not receive fully indexed credits. I am sure that we will talk about that measure in due course.

I think honourable senators can see what the problem was. The people were asking the government not to take everything away and to at least maintain a $50,000 threshold. That may seem like a lot of money now but, as I will report later from evidence given to us, it will not be long before the purchasing power of that $50,000 with a 3 per cent erosion year by year will not even amount to a modest income. Canadians will then have their old age pensions taxed back. This is what so outraged Canadians from across the country. This is the reason the committee which I have the honour of chairing said, "Mr. Wilson, the least you can do is make sure that we maintain the purchasing power, and if people have $50,000 of income, or the equivalent, in purchasing power in years to come then it must be guaranteed that that purchasing power will not be eroded as the years go by".

The answer is always the same: "The government fully intends to do that. We are not going to hurt pensioners. We are a government with a heart. You can rest assured that in due course the government will raise those levels, as it did with family allowance and other programs. Trust us." Imagine this government saying, "Trust us," and expecting people to swallow it.

I think it was responsible for the committee to say in a very mild way, "Mr. Wilson, please make sure you don't erode that pension and wipe out purchasing power as the years go by. If you are going to do it, then why not put it in the legislation?"

The second part of our amendment involved what is called the old age security fund. Some of our younger senators might not know this but for the period between approximately 1952 and 1972 taxpayers contributed to a fund which was earmarked on their income tax forms as "old age security tax". It was promised by the government, and fully expected by taxpayers, that they were contributing to their pensions. I will read some of the evidence given to the committee in that regard later.

The committee decided that there must be a fair formula to apply to these people who claim that they paid into this fund. They said to our committee that if an insurance company had done what the government is doing now, then its principals would have gone to jail for larceny, fraud or theft. I do not think it would be too much to say to the government that it should at least recognize the fact that people have paid into this fund and feel that at the very least they should get their money back. By the way, the sum of money was not very large, and we worked out an average amount for each contributor. That was the purpose of the second amendment.

After careful study, we took an average of 10 years for those people who had worked and contributed during the period 1952 to 1972 and considered what an average Canadian paid on tax and it worked out to approximately $75 a year. We suggested to Mr. Wilson that, in fairness, those who were paying the clawback should be given back a credit of $75 a year for a period of 10 years amounting to the $750 that they paid. Not the interest, not any more, but an average of $75 a year out of equity and common decency, the same as anyone would do who did not have a gun in his or her hand. There was absolutely no response from the government and it rejected that suggesting.

On September 6, I received a letter from the Honourable Michael Wilson which urged me, as the chairman, to have my colleagues pass the bill because we were holding up the whole Income Tax Act. It has been thrown at us a million times that big corporations are not paying their tax, which they will pay, but do not have to until the bill becomes law. Mr. Wilson stated that we were holding up the whole process, although basically the government is collecting money on all their tax bills, with these few exceptions. Mr. Wilson stated: "In the interest of the country, please get this bill passed." I will read my response to Mr. Wilson, since it is a public document. I said:

> Dear Minister:
> I have your letter of September 6 in which you urge the Senate to pass Bill C-28.
> I suggest that you and your government take another look at the two modest amendments which are delaying this legislation.
> I refer to changes that would ensure full indexation of the $50,000 threshold after which the "clawback" becomes operative and the compensation that should be due to those Canadians who for a period of many years actually made specific payments through income tax for Old Age Security benefits.
> Both these significant concerns were strongly presented to my committee by witnesses who were heard during consideration of the Bill.
> Surely the full indexation of the threshold figure should be acceptable to you, especially when we are told the government would eventually be doing this in any case.
> The same argument that changed your government's mind when Old Age Pension indexation was under consideration should apply in this case.
> The other amendment recognizes the obligation of the government to provide some relief for those taxpayers who have paid in advance a designated tax for their old age pension.
> Witnesses representing millions of taxpayers asked for these changes (along with many more drastic amendments).
> The time has come for your government to listen and respond to the protest of informed citizens who are disturbed with the taxing-back of old age pensions.
> The Senate Committee recognizes the importance of having Bill C-28 become law and fully supports your reference to the Large Corporations Tax, as well as other parts of the legislation which, as you state, "improve the fairness of the tax system." That system certainly needs improvement.
> But it is wrong to put the blame on the Senate for the present situation.
> Accept two relatively minor, but important, amendments and the Bill is yours.

That is as simple as it was. I sent this letter to the Minister and, I am sure, senators can well imagine the response.

Senator Bosa: Two amendments?

Senator Buckwold: Two minor amendments. The response was the usual stonewall. One might as well drive one's car into a brick wall. There was absolutely no give at all.

This has been one of the problems with the government. Government members do not talk to us. I know our people talked about a conference. "Let us meet, talk, and maybe we can come to some conclusion." But somehow the government members have the feeling that whatever they do is absolutely right. There is no reason for them in any way even to acknowledge that this house, in its wisdom and as a result of hearings and listening to people and very considered recommendations, has any contribution to make as a chamber of "sober second thought".

In looking over legislation that is presently in conflict, much of it could have been resolved through an atmosphere of acceptance by the government that in fact we exist and that we should not be ignored. They look down their long noses at us and say, "No, we don't talk to you. You have absolutely no right". No matter how good the amendments are, they have not accepted any.

Other governments have seen fit to accept reasonable amendments. I have to say to members of the government that the two amendments on this iniquitious legislation are reasonable. They are not difficult and they are amendments I would have like to talk to the minister about, but he never talked to me. However, after some months he did write a letter and said, "Come on, you fellows, get it passed. We need the money and you are holding up the income tax rules".

That is how the government operates. I do not think people sitting across the way think those two amendments are so terrible. If they are looked at objectively and not politically, it is not unreasonable at least to keep the purchasing power there, if it is going to be indexed.

I wish to quote some of the evidence given by the witnesses who appeared before the committee. Family Service Canada stated that:

> When the government put forward a discussion paper on family and elderly benefits in 1985, what the government was proposing was a removal of indexation, which, in effect, caused indexation to occur at that greater than 3% rate.

This is a very direct erosion of the base from which the tax is initiated. In other words, the threshold continues to drop as inflation continues to rise, and in this case—this is not my figure, but comes from a statement from the National Council on Welfare, and many of us agree with it—a straight-line projection some nine years from now would indicate that an individual tax filer with an income of between $35,000 and $39,000 a year, in 1988 dollars, would be subjected to the total clawback . . .

In other words, those earning a relatively modest and average income would be subjected to the complete removal of an old age pension in a period of nine years.

Senator Bosa: In nine years?

Senator Buckwold: According to this evidence. I should qualify that, at least part of it. That means that a program which started off with a $50,000 high income clawback becomes, for want of a better term, a moderate-income clawback, and with family incomes in this country averaging $46,000 a year any individual with an income of $39,000 will not be considered a high-income earner, but will lose the old age pension. I do not think that is fair, and I would guess that my colleagues across the way, deep down, feel the same way.

The following is what the Canadian Teachers' Federation stated in its brief:

● (2030)

Failure to index the income threshold to the full increase in the Consumer Price Index ensures that the constant dollar value of the threshold will steadily decline.

They then go on to give some figures, whereupon they say:

. . . those figures indicate that there will be nothing to stop the threshold from continuing to fall until it is equal to the poverty level. Once the threshold falls to the poverty level, the benefit will be completely at the discretion of the government to give or withhold, to increase or decrease, and there will be no directly concerned parties left to take an interest in seeing that the benefit continues. We have seen no evidence to suggest that money gained by ending universality is being redirected to Canada's most impoverished citizens . . .

That is important. If they are saving money by not spending it on universaltiy, then they should redirect it to those who need it, those who are less able to enjoy the good life that many of us enjoy. They go on to say:

. . . nor do there appear to be any plans to bring about any such redistribution. In our view, then, the ending of universality confers no immediate benefit on the poor and in the long run may prove detrimental to their interests.

Let me quote from the testimony of the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation, which represents literally hundreds of thousands of the people who built this country. They said in part:

The legislation provides that the threshold at which the security pension will be clawed back will be indexed only by the rate of inflation minus 3 per cent. Thus, each year, if inflation continues, thousands of additional seniors will be affected. In twenty years' time, the threshold expressed in 1989 dollars will be down to $28,000 and will affect two million Canadians.

I have dozens of such quotations from the evidence we received. Here is one from—and Senator Marshall will be interested in this one—the Armed Forces Annuitants Association of Canada, an organization for which he has done so much work. They said in their brief:

If the primary objective cannot be achieved, then the fallback position must be that the $50,000 ceiling be fully indexed to inflation so that this tax will always apply only to the relatively well-to-do. If this is not done, then at some future date no one will be eligible for OAS because all incomes will rise to that arbitrary ceiling. In time, the OAS will itself reach that "magnificent" sum of $50,000.

I could cite comments by the Canadian Association of University Teachers, the Canadian Labour Congress and all the other groups that appeared before us and said, if you cannot hold the clawback back, at least make sure that the $50,000 level is maintained.

Let me come back to the old age security fund. I mentioned it briefly. It was established between the years 1952 and 1972. Between the years 1952 and 1972 the government earmarked personal income taxes, corporate taxes and sales taxes for contribution to a special fund, called the old age security fund. For individual Canadians, a separate tax, clearly identified on their income tax form, identified the amount of their contribution to the fund. I believe someone brought me a copy of the income tax form.

Senator Bosa: I remember it.

Senator Buckwold: In 1972, the special earmarked tax was discontinued but the fund was credited with the amount of revenue that it would have received had the tax been still in place. The old age security fund had an accumulated deficit of $121 million when it was abolished in 1975.

It is for these reasons that the committee recommended that Bill C-28 be amended to grant a non-refundable credit of $75 to be applied against the tax on old age security benefits. Seniors would have access to this credit for a maximum of 10 years. Those who reached the age of 65 after the year 2015 would not be eligible for this credit. To explain why we did this, let me read two or three excerpts from the testimony. The first one is from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Veterans' Association, and they said in part:

The commitment of the government at that time was clear and taxpayers ever since have had every right to expect they would receive their Old Age Security payments without a "means test." They were for all intents and purposes purchasing an "annuity contract" and the government of the day was to be the "custodians of their funds." Financial and retirement planning since 1952 has > been predicated on the expectation that this "annuity contract" would be honoured. For example, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation plan was integrated with the Canada Pension Plan in 1966 in the expectation that full and indexed benefits would be paid as contracted.

Here is another quotation from the Armed Forces Annuitants Association of Canada, friends of Senator Marshall's. They said:

> During the debate on the 1971 revisions to the funding of the OAS as part of tax reform, the government stated: "Personal income taxes as well as other earmarked taxes have been collected from citizens since 1952 to finance this program, establishing an expectation and a right to the pension."

Here is a brief one from the Public Service Alliance of Canada, and they said:

> Hence, without putting too fine a point on it, it can be concluded that old age security pensions are an obligation to the Canadian people inherited by the current government. As a result,it should, like any other government financial obligation, be paid.

Honourable senators, those quotations give a clear indication of why we did what we did in a very reasonable way. The Minister of Finance could have negotiated with us for the benefit of the senior citizens of this country who presently draw pensions, and perhaps, more importantly, for those millions who will be drawing pensions and who will find that they will not receive as much as they had expected.

I know what the answer would be, and I gather that Senator Simard will speak for the government and will tell us. It will be, "Don't worry about it. Trust us." And I trust him of course." "We'll index it. Whenever it gets down a little low, we'll raise the thresholds. You won't lose your purchasing power. So don't worry about it."

However, old age people are worrying, and that worry is indicated in my mail every day.

The second answer is,"The government has no commitment to those people who paid into this fund. It really was not an annuity and there was never enough to really finance it, and we will not accept the fact that this is an obligation of the Government of Canada."

Yet, the fact is that if you have paid into the fund for 20 years and your contribution is indicated on your income tax, you do have a claim. So those are the arguments of our colleagues across the way, who will try to justify this obnoxious legislation by saying, "You really do not have any commitment from the government. Sure, you paid into the old age pension fund, but you are getting a little bit more in any case, so don't come crying to us."

Honourable senators, for these reasons I cannot accept Senator Doody's motion that we do not insist on those amendments. Speaking for this side of the house and representing millions of Old Age Pensioners, we do insist.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (2040)

Senator Buckwold: We insist to our very core that the rights of Canadians are once again being trampled on, and that we have a government that has no concern for people, obligations or commitments. I cannot in any way encourage people through my committee, through the members on this side and through others, to say, "No, forget these other things. Go along with the government."

Honourable senators, we insist that our amendments be proceeded with and returned to the House of Commons for affirmation.

Senator Doody: Come on. Be reasonable!

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Senator Buckwold, would you mind answering a question? Could you explain to us the effect of the $50,000 threshold on a two-income family?

Senator Buckwold: That was an amendment, and I will not go into detail on it. As you will remember, we made an amendment that was ruled by the Speaker to be unacceptable. Do you remember that? It concerned two-income families. I do not think I should take your time to go into it, but if you want me to I would be glad to do so.

This was the part of the legislation that was objected to, namely, that a single-income family would be seriously prejudiced. In other words, an individual earning $51,000 a year as a sole-income would pay the clawback—for example, a senior citizen drawing the old age pension—but two individuals earning $48,000 each, with a family income of $96,000, would pay no clawback. We brought in a recommendation of an amendment, but that was one amendment that was ruled not acceptable by the Speaker. With some regret we did not accept that but we said, "We have the other two amendments. We will let them go." That was the story.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, Senator Buckwold told us that he was here and he was glad to be here to oppose Senator Doody's motion.

Senator Olson: That's right!

Senator Doody: Shame!

Senator Simard: Well, honourable senators, I was here on September 25; so were my colleagues. We have been here since the 25th. We were here to discuss Bill C-28 and Senator Doody's motion as we were prepared to discuss, debate and vote on Bill C-21 and Bill C-62. We are not too impressed by the opening shot of Senator Buckwold, who says that he is here tonight.

Since September 24 we could have used those days—and nights, if need be—to discuss Bills C-28, C-21 and C-62, because these three bills, among others, are key elements of the government's agenda for economic improvement so that we can build on our social programs. As people have said many times lately, and over the last few years, because of the Liberal heritage we should not be so concerned with beefing up or enriching programs; we should be mainly concerned about keeping the programs that we have, because Canada has to have the means for its political programs and policies.

[Translation]

As an introduction of sorts, honourable senators, I should like to read a few lines from an editorial published in Le Soleil's October 14 issue and signed by Georges Angers. I think it is a fair description of the prevailing economic climate and the difficulties . . . I also believe the editorial I am about to quote briefly adequately explains the reasons why the three bills I have already referred to must be adopted.

I expect to end my remarks in 20 minutes or so, at which time I will urge you to support Senator Doody's motion. Now I get back to the editorial in question because it refers to the actors, the people who are responsible, the creators of Canada's current fiscal situation. As you will see it dates back to the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983, and the leading actor and maestro at the time was none other than Senator MacEachen.

As I listened to Senator Buckwold this evening—and I am among those who believe that the Senate ought to be reformed—I said to myself that he and his cohorts have given us an eloquent demonstration of their irresponsible approach over the past three weeks in particular. They have also proved that their past mistakes did not teach them anything and that they remain as impenitent as ever. Having analyzed the situation and seen the evidence, as many Canadians undoubtedly did, I hope they came to the conclusion that the situation we are in now can be traced back to the policies implemented and upheld at the time by the former régime and to the budgets which were the logical outcome of these policies. No way, for Senator Buckwold made it quite clear that as far as he is concerned, regardless of revenues, the government should go right on spending, which means paying pensions even to people earning $50,000, $100,000 or $200,000. It tells us also that he is reading from a number of testimonies heard during consideration of Bills C-28 and C-62. Clearly he has been rather selective in his choice of testimonies, but no matter. What I have noticed as a result of Senator Buckwold's comments is the fact that neither he nor his colleagues seem to have learned anything from their past mistakes. They seem unwilling to consider new policies specifically designed to get people back to work and to provide those who need it most with enough money to live on. I think that in the current economic and fiscal context, this is what Canadians mostly expect from their government. We shall deal with the universality principle later on.

Getting back to Georges Angers' article which deals with these brave Liberal senators who have been wreaking havoc in the Senate for the past three weeks. Mr. Angers writes and I quote:

> I would be the first to praise them if I did not have any doubts. I especially have some doubts about Senator MacEachen, the Liberal Leader of the Opposition in the Senate who has orchestrated the whole filibuster. The fact is that Mr. MacEachen, before being appointed senator, had been a minister, and a senior one at that, in Mr. Trudeau's Liberal government. In fact, he had been Federal Minister of Finance in 1981 and 1982.
> In November 1981, Mr. MacEachen, the Federal Minister of Finance, had tabled a budget under the guise of a tax reform. The fact is that as a result of his so-called "tax reform", the honourable senator was able to collect $6 billion more from Canadian taxpayers but this is something that most of us have probably forgotten.
> At the time, Mr. MacEachen felt also that the manufacturers' sales tax (which the GST is about to replace) had to be amended because it was not only inefficient but counterproductive. Mr. MacEachen's proposal to replace the said manufacturers' sales tax was abandonned, however, because it was unanimously thought to be at least as stupid.
> Mr. Marc Lalonde, who succeeded him as Minister of Finance, set up a committee who, having looked into alternative solutions to the manufacturers' sales tax, recommended essentially a consumers' tax fairly similar to the GST which Michael Wilson is trying to introduce. Because they were on the eve of a federal election, the Liberals decided to overlook the idea rather than face the people with a project potentially as explosive, because it shattered a great many accepted notions, or even destroyed a great many vested interests.

[Senator Simard.]

● (2050)

It is a well know fact that before an election, the Liberals never introduce any new tax. They complete church basements and make senior citizens all sorts of promises: That is the method which the Liberals use and which brought us to the brink of bankruptcy. I am about finished with Mr. Angers' article which I feel explains the belligerence and arrogance of Liberal senators over the past three weeks, the very people who were first and foremost responsible for the financial mess Canada is in today and from which we are trying to get out. I quote:

> Now, about the good Senator MacEachen. His days at the head of the Department of Finance were not only marked by his inability to find an alternative to the federal tax on manufactured goods, but also by the most remarkable ineptness ever observed in the history of the federal Department of Finance.
> In fact, the 1982-1983 Budget Mr. MacEachen tabled in November of 1981 forecasted a $10.9 billion deficit. Six months later, in June, he tabled a new Budget containing revised estimates for a $19 billion deficit.
> A few months later, after a public confession and 87 amendments to his Budget—as you surely recall; the people do— Mr. MacEachen was replaced as Minister of Finance by Marc Lalonde, Mr. Bogeyman. By then, the budget deficit had reached $23.6 billions.
> For the same Mr. MacEachen to pose today as the champion of the Canadian taxpayers bothers me somewhat. Frankly, that makes me . . .

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: It makes you what?

Senator Simard: "In crisis". The article goes on to say:

> Even though the federal government's overall deficit is disturbing, there is no reason to panic (according to our friends opposite). In fact, Michael Wilson has succeeded in reversing the situation created by Mr. MacEachen and company whereby the federal government was borrowing to cover its current expenditures.

In closing, this is Georges Angers' conclusion:

> This is how the federal government's debt became a structural component of our economic reality. For six years Michael Wilson has been trying to deal with this problem which, unfortunately, can only be corrected in the long term through progressive disengagement by the government or gradual cuts in its current expenditures.
> Anyway, it is history in the making, and Michael Wilson will one day be remembered as a better forecaster than Mr. MacEachen. At least the deficit he predicted did not double.

Let us go back to the motion put forward by my colleague, Senator Doody, that I am asking you to support. I also want to talk to you about Bill C-28 and the state of affairs I referred to a while ago which motivated the government to introduce this bill. It contains major amendments to the Income Tax Act announced in the April 1989 Budget. It is nothing new.

I think this bill will have a major impact on this country's economy and tax system because it will help us achieve the overall objective of the economic policy adopted by the government. As I was saying before, it is part of a series of measures undertaken to deal with one of today's major economic issues: How can we bring our growing debt under control?

[English]

Honourable senators, I am sure that everyone recognizes that the size of the debt makes it the single largest problem facing the federal government's economic policy of today as it faces the economic and social policies of the ten provincial governments. As far as the federal government is concerned, it is the most costly straitjacket any Canadian government has ever had to wear when it proposes public finances. The reality is that the size of the debt leaves us dangerously exposed to external economic forces. As the Minister of Finance warned in Edmonton a few months ago, the level of interest rates, which was difficult enough in itself, added substantially to the cost of paying the charges on the public debt simply because the debt is so large.

[Translation]

Controlling the increase of the debt is not an option, honourable senators, it is a necessity. It is essential to conceive a well-balanced program of measures to cut spending and increase revenue if we want to maintain the social security net about which Senator Buckwold and Senator Hébert talk so often. By bringing a few of those amendments, Bill C-28 is an important legislative measure that we should examine attentively and efficiently.

[English]

A second important point about the measures in Bill C-28 is that they will contribute to greater fairness in the system. As we have to take steps to increase revenue and cut spending, it is important that this be done fairly. We certainly urge Senator Buckwold and other members of the banking committee to remember that Canadians who have presented testimony have insisted, pleaded, begged and prayed for a more fair tax system. I think Bill C-28 is another step in that direction.

The burden of cutting the growth in the debt must not fall on just one group either. In particular, it must not be imposed on those in our society who are the worse off. Therefore, I think it is important to examine the measures set out in Bill C-28 from the point of view of whether or not the package of measures in the budget is a fair one imposed in a fair and appropriate manner.

The most prominent measures in the budget of 1989 with respect to personal income are those relating to the personal surtaxes. The point I believe to be most important about the surtax is the new surtax of 3 per cent imposed on high incomes, those with incomes over $70,000. This ensures that those with large incomes, as of July 1, 1989 will be paying a surtax of 8 per cent. Perhaps some senators on the other side will want me to restrict my comments to those two amendments. However, there are new senators here and we all remember the scenes we have witnessed during the last three weeks, and I think it is important that I remind senators of the 1989 tax measures; obviously those people on the other side choose to ignore the financial situation of our country and the provisions contained in Bill C-28 which will improve it.

• (2100)

We are speaking of fair and progressive taxation. Many groups, and Senator Buckwold will remember, pleaded for fair taxation and called for a more progressive income tax system. The surtax is one element of a fairer income tax system. The first witness who pleaded for more progressive income taxation was Professor Kell Antoft of L'Association Canadienne des Artistes. Brooks & McQuaig, Coalition Against "Free Trade" requested, required and I am told continue to pray for fair taxation. This is what Bill C-28 is all about. You and your colleagues, Senator Buckwold, have been sitting on it and ignoring it for the last seven or eight months. This is what those people told you and told us. You did not want Bill C-28 passed. You did not want big corporations to pay increased income tax. You did not want those large corporations, those with capital in excess of $10 million or more, to pay additional tax.

Senator Buckwold: Why don't you talk some sense.

Senator Simard: Do you know how much you have cost Canadian taxpayers this year alone?

Senator Stanbury: Which you would have taken from the old people.

Senator Simard: In interest alone you have cost over $100 million. That is a lot of money. Senator Buckwold will say that is a lot of money. Maybe he will not say that, but will say rather that it is in the name of democracy that the Liberals fought the clawback provision. We know the clawback provision only triggers when people earn $50,000 or more. The Liberal majority has cost the federal treasury $100 million because the government has had to borrow money. I am told that 90 per cent of companies have refused to pay. They are going to have to pay retroactively, but the government will not be able to charge them interest. This is great "responsibility" from Liberal senators.

I see you have been selective again in your choice of supporters and opponents of Bill C-28. However, I have mentioned four and I will continue with the list of people asking for elements of Bill C-28 to tax the big corporations and for a fairer tax system for individuals.

[Translation]

The Episcopal Commission for Social Affairs; the Canadian Labour Congress; the Canadian Council on Social Development; the Advisory Council on the Status of Women; the United Church of Canada.

[English]

. . . and the Edmonton & District Labour Council. Most of the witnesses were not invited by us. We were glad to see them, but you will remember, Senator Buckwold, all the trouble you went to and all the late phone calls you made to get them there. They were there. You did not like what they said, and tonight you chose to ignore and not report what they stated.

Senator Buckwold: Why do you not talk about the amendments? It is the amendments that we are debating. We have not heard one word about the amendments.

Senator Simard: Senator, you chose to talk about petitions, you read the phone book and you read all those things. We are dealing with the spirit of the amendments and why they should be denied.

Senator Stewart: Are you filibustering this bill?

Senator Simard: No.

You talk about universality. You can choose what you are going to say, but I hope you are going to let me make my speech. You do not have to like it, all you have to do is keep quiet. I will take your questions, if you feel like asking questions, but let me finish here.

Another advocate of fairer taxation—and the clawback means fairer taxation, as does the surtax for bigger corporations—is the Edmonton Inner-City Church Committee.

[English]

Senator Buckwold, you remember you were almost in tears awhile ago when speaking about the plight of seniors.

Senator Stanbury: You should be.

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Simard: I was, too. However, I want the government to have the resources to continue making payments to people whose only income is their senior citizens' pensions. I do not care about retired senators or present senators who would be entitled to a pension. I am worried about those other people. This is also what the seniors told us.

Senator Gigantès: One hundred and sixty-five thousand manufacturing jobs lost.

Senator Simard: Why don't you play with your kazoo, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: We don't have to use it in this chamber. You are a kazoo!

• (2110)

Senator Simard: While no one likes paying a surtax—or any tax, for that matter—it is important that this tax be imposed fairly. I believe that putting this burden on those with high incomes, which is in addition to the burden they share with other taxpayers, is a reasonable and effective move towards fairness.

[Translation]

Another important modification to the personal income tax is the refundable credit for the sales tax. To protect those with lower revenues, the government established this credit in 1986 and has since enlarged it. In this bill, the government has doubled the tax credits for the adults and children. Moreover, the revenue limit to which the complete credit is assured will be increased.

For the tax year 1990, those tax credits will provide $655 million to Canadians with low revenues. This will more than compensate those who receive the full credit for the increase of the sales tax announced in the budget.

Now, let us talk about this security net about which the Liberals talk so often. Canadians have invested, have paid taxes for this security net. Its main purpose, we should never forget it, is to help poor Canadians and not to subsidize the individuals with high revenues. All Canadians over 65 years old can receive old age security payments, whatever their needs or the level of their revenues. All families with children under 18 can receive family allowance. Those programs being offered to all Canadians, without considering their resources, they are considered universal.

[English]

Senator Buckwold says that because they are taxed through the income tax system it is no longer universal. That is not the case, as there is no means test and everyone will be receiving it.

Senator Buckwold: But you are taxing it all back.

Senator Simard: For many years people have thought that "universality" meant that you must give the benefit to everyone, whether it be Mr. Irving, Mr. McCain or other wealthy people. I am glad the government has moved in this new direction. Of course, we will have to explain the system to people, as I am trying to do this evening, but I think that Canadians who are fair minded people will understand that this country can no longer afford to give out $500 or $600 to the Irvings and the McCains of this world.

[Translation]

As I said, the fact that the individuals must fill in a request before receiving payments and that they are subject to the income tax measure was never considered as a limit to their universality.

The measure proposed in the budget and included in this bill respects the universality of these programs. It starts with the principle that they are already subject to the income tax law. I think it will ensure that the benefits will be more efficiently focused on those who need it. On a period of three years, the benefits of these two programs will be refundable at a rate of 15% of the net personal revenue over $50,000.

I think that the government is not taking anybody by surprise. Only 4% of the recipients of old age security will be concerned. And less than half of them will reimburse the totality of the payments that they receive. Even if 14% of the family allowance recipients will be touched, less than 10% will reimburse the totality of the money received.

This is the reason why I am asking the honourable senators to support the motion of Senator Doody.

Other measures concerning the personal income tax, like the new deductions for part-time helpers for handicapped workers and the new income tax carry-over for the stock breeders, who have had to reduce the size of their reproduction cattle because of the drought, by helping those with special needs, continue to enhance the global fairness of the tax system.

It is not in the motion of Senator Doody, but I think it allows us to describe the wisdom and the elements of this tax reform that Mr. Wilson has undertaken a few years ago. I think this should reassure you, Senator Buckwold, and your colleagues also. These benefits, for stock breeders or others, will continue to be paid to the extent that the government will not be crushed even more in the years to come.

So, all these measures illustrate the solemn commitment of the government to ensure that those who need it the most get assistance.

[English]

One important element of a fair tax system is having a fair tax base. Therefore a number of measures are included in this bill to ensure that the tax base is equitable. Changes to the corporate tax system will also improve the fairness of the system as a whole. The new tax on large corporations, for example, ensures that all large companies pay federal tax. It will do this by levying a tax on corporations in Canada having capital in excess of $10 million. It is expected that about 3,600 firms will be subject to the tax. Together with other changes to the corporate surtax, this measure will raise $965 million in its first full year of application.

Let me remind Senator Buckwold and others that while we were travelling across the country and discussing Bill C-62 with witnesses, hand-picked almost daily by the people opposite, sometimes in concert with Senator Kirby but rarely with Senator Poitras, some companies and groups were actually advocating more taxes on corporations. There were, among others, Professors Kell Antoft, Brooks and McQuaig. Other groups include Commission d'action sociale de l'archidiocèse catholique de Saint-Jean, the End Legislated Poverty group, the Fédération du travail de la Colombie-Britanique, Fédération du travail de l'Alberta, Fédération du travail du Manitoba, and look here, Global Economics! that is the firm that the Liberal Party hired last year to look into Bill C-21. They were good enough then to be consultants to the Liberal Party. They too recommended that large companies be taxed. Other groups on this list include the Liberals cousins in politics, the NDP Party of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island. This is what Bill C-28 is all about, Senator Buckwold.

Senator Buckwold: We agree.

Senator Simard: Other groups include the Ontario Coalition for Social Justice, the Syndicat national de la Fonction publique province. All these measures taken together demonstrate that the present income tax system can be flexible, more progressive, and can respond to the demands for increasing equity, if there is a government that has the courage to introduce, defend and vote in the needed new measures.

Senator Buckwold has mentioned that because the system was terminated he would like some pensioners to receive a $75 non-refundanble credit. Perhaps I can best describe this by relating a little anecdote concerning a former politician in New Brunswick who said when he was accused of giving out small bottles on election day, "We never give out small bottles; we always give out big bottles."

• (2120)

This $75 is the Liberal Party's small bottle for people for ten years, because of the reduction in the OAS payments. Essentially that is what this issue is all about. That is essentially what it is. You people, you Liberal senators, will not be believed. We believe that it was not an insurance scheme. The funds had dried up and a new system needed to be implemented.

I will skip some of the points I was going to make, but I will continue to deal with the $75 deduction, and in fact, the second amendment deals with the $75 deduction in the OAS for ten years. The Liberal majority argued that this would recognize the contributions made by Canadians from 1952 to 1972 on the basis that the old age security system was designed as an insurance type of plan. But that is not the case, as should be perfectly clear to those who have studied the matter carefully.

Certainly an old age security fund was established and money from an ear-marked tax went into it, Senator Buckwold. Improvements in OAS payments during the life of the fund far outstripped contributions. When it was wound up in 1976, it was $121 million dollars in deficit. Clearly—and I am repeating myself here—this was not an insurance type of system.

Indeed, the debates at the time the fund was introduced make it clear that the purpose of the ear-marked contributions was to ensure that the cost of the OAS was clear to taxpayers.

Therefore, I conclude that this amendment as well should not be insisted on and we should agree with the other house.

Finally, I wish to point out—as did the Minister of State for Finance when he spoke to this point—that the way our amendments were drafted gives rise to a significant problem. The effect of the Liberals' amendments will be to increase, not decrease, tax on those people who receive both family and OAS payments. This is a problem, of course, for those who are directly affected, although they may be relatively few in number. It also causes an increase in the amount to be recovered by the tax.

Although I do not want to deal with questions of procedures, I must point out that this would also be contrary to the criteria set out by our own Speaker in his ruling of May 31, 1990.

Yes, honourable senators, this bill is important, and it is important that we also support Senator Doody's motion and thus reject the Liberal amendments not only for its contribution to dealing with the deficit but also for the additional fairness it will bring to the tax system. The amendments proposed by the Senate and rejected by the House of Commons will not improve this bill. Indeed, by insisting on them we continue to hamper the ability of the government to take effective action to strengthen the economy and our social programs.

[Translation]

In closing, I think it is important and urgent to recognize the bill as is. It is also important to support the amendment so that we stop costing a lot of money to the Federal Treasury, and in the name of Canadians who are deprived or who will be eventually deprived of programs because of the delay to vote on Bill C-28, the delay to tax the big companies, to tax the Canadian taxpayers with revenue over $50,000.

In interests only, again, the Liberal majority will have cost to the Canadian Treasury between $100 million and $150 million this year.

So I invite you to stop your filibuster, not only on Bill C-28 but also on Bill C-21. We will have a chance to talk about Bill C-21 in the weeks to come.

[Senator Simard.]

Honourable senators, I thank you.

(On the motion of Senator Kirby, the debate is adjourned.)

[English]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that by agreement of all parties the Senate will suspend its sitting until tomorrow at two o'clock. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until Thursday, October 18, at 2 p.m.

At 2 p.m., October 18, the sitting of the Senate was resumed, the Speaker in the Chair.

RULES OF THE SENATE

PROPOSED CHANGES—STATUS REPORT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was not present when the sitting was suspended yesterday. However, I do know that you were engaged in debate on Bill C-28.

Senators MacEachen, Roblin, Murray and I have been meeting. I can tell you that we have narrowed the field of negotiation and have agreed on many things. However, at the moment, we are not ready to offer for your approval a complete document on both the legislative program and the proposed changes to the rules.

Therefore, I recommend that the debate on Bill C-28 be continued. I can certainly report an open-minded and shared hope that we will be able to reach an agreement.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED ACTS

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—MOTION FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON CERTAIN SENATE AMENDMENTS—DEBATE CONTINUED

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on Bill C-28 and, in particular, to urge that senators on this side of the house oppose Senator Doody's motion that the Senate do not insist on its amendments to Bill C-28.

I should like to make comment in reply to some of the outlandish things that Senator Simard said last night and in particular, to some of the comments he made with regard to Bill C-28 in general and how fair the government's taxation measures were to Canadians. First, I should like to deal with the issue of tax fairness.

I am delighted that Senator Simard is with us this afternoon because it is always fun sparring with him. Yesterday, Senator Simard expressed concern and regret that it had taken from September 25 until yesterday to begin debate on government legislation. He expressed the hope that the rest of the government's legislation would be dealt with as soon as possible. To prevent Senator Simard from getting any false hopes, I should like to say that those of us on this side of the house have no regrets about the fact that it has taken from September 25 to yesterday to begin to deal with government legislation, nor will we have any regrets about the fact that it may take a long time before we finally finish consideration of Bill C-62.

Honourable senators, I should like to deal with the basic thrust of our opposition to Bill C-28. The opposition to Bill C-28 on this side of the house is based on the way that bill treats seniors and low-income Canadians.

If honourable senators look at many of the definitions of "social security", which have been introduced in academic literature in various places, they will find that social security is defined in the following way; as the legislative acknowledgment of the state's responsibility for the welfare of its citizens. The benefits of this concern—and I think this is the central point-accrue to citizens as a right; as an obligation of the state, and not merely as a consequence of the contributions made by a particular individual. One of the best examples of that in Canada is the old age pension which, when it began many years ago, was designed to apply universally to all Canadians over a certain age. It was not restricted simply to Canadians who had made a particular contribution.

Indeed, when honourable senators look at the recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce contained in the report presented to this chamber in May of this year, honourable senators will see that the committee said, in effect, that the bill should not go forward without amendment. We really felt there were only two or three areas that needed change. I point out to honourable senators that many of the comments made by Senator Simard yesterday about the Liberal position are not only inaccurate, but totally false. The best example of that is his comments—which he has made repeatedly here and elsewhere—that the Liberal opposition to Bill C-28 means that we are not in favour of increased corporate taxes, for which Bill C-28 provides.

As Senator Buckwold pointed out yesterday in a letter which he read into the record, a letter which he sent to the Minister of Finance last June, the Liberal members of the committee, along with the chairman, were in fact very much in favour of the corporate tax changes contained in Bill C-28, and in fact none of our opposition to Bill C-28 has anything to do with the corporate tax provisions. Our opposition, as we have made clear, and as members opposite, including Senator Simard, know full well, is based essentially on the clawback provisions and the way in which the provisions of C-28 affect seniors and low-income Canadians.

What I should like to do in the next few minutes is deal with two or three specific provisions of Bill C-28, particularly in light of the fact that 24 senators opposite were not here when we considered that bill. I understand one of the conditions for their appointment to the Senate was that they simply rubber-stamp this legislation, and therefore educating them on the bill is not of great interest, but nevertheless it does seem to me to be appropriate that I do that so they have some understanding of what they will be voting on.

If honourable senators go back to the origins of the Old Age Security Act, what they will find is that when it began in 1952 it was to be funded through an earmarked tax. Back in the 1940s and 1950s, earmarked taxes were somewhat common at the federal level and slightly less so at the provincial level. In 1952 when the Old Age Security Act came into force, what the legislation did was impose a special levy—essentially a special tax—which had three components to it, one of which was a tax on the manufacturers' selling price of goods. It was essentially a form of tax which was to be paid on the value of all items covered by federal sales tax. A second component was a personal income tax component. A third component was a corporate income tax component.

● (1410)

In the act of 1952, those taxes were increased. The moneys generated by those taxes were to be paid into a fund and the minister was then to make the old age pension payments, or old age security payments, out of this fund.

Through the sixties and the seventies, the act was changed. Under various Liberal administrations it was made more progressive and, indeed, more responsive to the needs of older Canadians.

I merely provide senators will a couple of illustrations of the changes that were made to increase the progressivity of the fund and to have it better meet the needs of older Canadians. Effective January 1, 1967, the tax rate on personal income was increased from 3 to 4 per cent, again to increase the money available in the fund. A change was also made to begin the reduction of the minimum age at which this pension would be paid. In January 1970 the eligible age was ultimately reduced from its initial age of 70 down to 65. Up until 1972, which was 20 years into the period during which the old age pension was available, the old age security tax appeared as a separate line on the individual income tax form. The change to abolish this particular line in the income tax form was made in January 1972.

Therefore, for 20 years Canadians were making what they thought was a specific contribution on their income tax forms to a fund which would be used to pay their pensions when they got to the age at which they were eligible to collect them. It is precisely the fact that, for a long time, people were making specific contributions, and they thought these funds were being put aside for their benefit.

As a result of this perception, the committee heard from many witnesses representing literally hundreds of thousands of seniors across the country who made the argument that the payment of old age security tax between 1952 and 1972 represented an obligation on the part of the government to deliver old age security benefits. These witnesses before the committee claimed that, in effect, what they thought they had done was to make a contribution that the government would hold in trust for them, and that subsequently, when they had reached the appropriate age, the age of eligibility, these funds would be given back to them.

I simply provide senators with one quote from one of the many seniors' groups which appeared before the committee. This group was the Federal Superannuates National Association, but I am sure similar quotes are available from every seniors' group that appeared before the committee. I think this quote reflects the attitude or belief that seniors had when they were making those contributions in the period from 1952 to 1972, when, as I have said, there was a special deduction on their income tax forms through which the special tax contribution was made.

The Federal Superannuates National Association said to the committee the following:

> People paid for something, and when they reached the age at which they would become eligible they expected to have that paid . . . In effect the government has changed the rules of the game because it extracted a payment . . . This has been a clear breach of that undertaking and I do not think that you gentlemen or the government would allow a similar breach of an undertaking, for example, by an insurance company that had provided an annuity and then turned around and refused to pay it when it was due.

In other words, we had a situation in which seniors, through all of their national organizations, made the argument to us that the funds they had contributed from 1952 to 1972 were funds over which, in their view, the government had a legal obligation. At the very least, they all contended that the government had a moral obligation not to claw back any of the pension which these individuals would receive as a result of contributions they had made in that 20-year period.

It was as a result of trying to understand the position of seniors who have contributed to a trust fund, and believe that funds held in trust should not be absconded with by anybody, even if that "anybody" happens to be the government. It was in trying to meet seniors' firm belief that those trust funds ought to exist, and that the government had a moral, if not a legal, obligation to continue to treat those funds as trust funds. It was in this context that our committee recommended, as one of our amendments, that Bill C-28 recognize the trust nature of these prior contributions to the old age security fund, and that no clawback of this portion of their contributions should be allowed. However much one wants to argue the nice legalism that government has every right to change the rules as they go along, the fact of the matter is that that perception was held among every seniors' group and every witness representing a seniors' association that appeared before the committee. Therefore, one of the three amendments that we proposed was an amendment designed essentially to deal with that issue.

The second issue which came before the committee in some detail was the issue of the relatively unfair way in which, under the Income Tax Act, various types of income held by seniors would be taxed differently because of the form in which they receive the income. If I may, I should like to give honourable senators one illustrative example of this problem. This particular example, or a variant of it, was put before the committee by group after group, not only by seniors' groups but also by other organizations. A pensioner whose retirement income is composed, in part, of dividends may find his or her old age security clawed back, even though his or her real income is less than the $50,000 threshold. The reason for that is that, under the Income Tax Act, "net income" is defined as actual income plus a 25 per cent gross-up due to dividends. So there could easily be a situation in which a pensioner who had no dividend income but had $49,000 in income would suffer no clawback, while another pensioner who had, say, $45,000 in income, half of which happened to be derived from dividends and half of which happened to be derived from pension, would, in fact, be subject to the clawback because, when you gross-up the dividends, the total comes to more than $50,000.

The point that many of these groups were making was that, if there is to be a clawback of any kind of government payment, that clawback ought to recognize the principle that a dollar of seniors' income is a dollar of seniors' income, and the clawback should not be treated differently if part of that income happens to come from dividends or some other source rather than simply as regular pension income.

• (1420)

That particular anomaly in the bill would have been easy to fix. The government, in its usual view that absolutely everything it does is correct and that nothing can be changed—to quote a now famous line, "nothing can be changed, not even a comma"—could have easily corrected the problem. I provide that as a technical amendment that would have been easily handled by the government.

There were a number of other technical issues the committee discussed, such as the way Bill C-28 happened to impact on particular industrial sectors. There were a number of provisions like that which would have required technical amendments, but it became clear the government had no intention of doing anything about them, simply because it did not want to accept any amendments proposed by the Senate.

I have dealt with the first two issues of the trust fund and the technical changes to the bill to illustrate the concerns on this side of the house, but now I want to deal with a major, substantive question; that is, the issue of the clawback itself and the decision to do away with universality without doing away with universality. By continuing to pay funds directly to all Canadians and thereby making the argument—as has been made repeatedly in the other place—that these programs are still universal while simultaneously changing the tax structure in a way which gives with one hand and takes back with the other is typical of this government's stulduggery.

In 1944 the family allowance program was introduced, and the federal government undertook to pay a monthly allowance to every child. This money was normally paid to the mother of the child. These payments began in 1945. Subsequently, in fact, that act was amended. Originally, the allowance was paid to every child under 16 years of age, but the legislation was changed to include children up to the age of 18. Finally, those payments became indexed to cost of living increases as measured by the consumer price index.

Shortly after this government was elected in the summer of 1984, in its budget of 1985 it moved to index family allowance benefits, not to the full level of inflation but only to the level of inflation minus 3 per cent. Also in 1985 there began the first in a long series of steps by this government, designed to dismantle many of the universal aspects of the country's social security system and, indeed, many of those aspects that were particularly important to low income Canadians and senior Canadians.

So in 1985 we had the government moving away from the full indexing of family allowance to the rate of inflation; and now, as you know, family allowance is only indexed to the rate of inflation minus 3 per cent. It does not take much mathematical ability to see what happens if the rate of indexation remains the same over a long period of time. The compounding effect of de-indexing by the rate of inflation minus 3 per cent is that over a period of time—and I will illustrate this in a moment with a specific reference to the social security program—it has a dramatic impact in terms of the money that Canadians will actually receive.

Of particular concern is the nature of the clawback itself, however, and not merely the principle it has violated with respect to universality, but that the clawback—particularly the clawback now proposed, which is being applied to the old age security program—will hit one-income families especially hard. If there is one thing one would have thought in this day and age, it is that one would not introduce programs which were specifically biased against one sector or the other, or against one-income families versus two-income families.

Just to illustrate, particularly for the 24 new senators, let me give them an example. A single-parent family earning $56,000 with two dependent children, according to the current rules, will have 100 per cent of their family allowance clawed back. That is one of the consequences of Bill C-28. A two-income family with one spouse earning $45,000 and the other $35,000 a year, with a gross family income of $80,000, will not have any of its family allowance payments clawed back.

The clawback provision does not depend on the family household income but on the income of individual parents. It leads to the rather ridiculous situation in which a single-parent family can have an income some $20,000 or $30,000 below the income of a two-parent family, yet the government will make the taxes on that single-parent family significantly higher than they are on the twoparent family.

That is a simple example to show that the net effect of this bill is to hurt many of those people in society who most need help. I believe it illustrates very clearly that this bill is patently unjust and equally unfair.

It was interesting to note in his comments last night that Senator Simard spent a considerable amount of time talking about the fairness of the tax system and the fairness of these bills. I know something about the kind of budgets Senator Simard introduced when he was Minister of Finance in New Brunswick. In many respects, they were progressive. He has now come to the Senate to support, among other things, cutbacks to payments to seniors and payments to single-income families in a way which is clearly inequitable. He also supports cutbacks on unemployment insurance payments and increased costs to all low-income Canadians through the GST. It is a remarkable conversion for someone who has come from the Atlantic provinces and who, until he started to mingle with his colleagues on the other side, was quite a progressive Progressive Conservative. As someone who has known him for a long time, I think it is indeed regrettable that Senator Simard has moved to the other wing of the Tory party after such a short time in Ottawa.

I want to comment briefly on the government response to some of these issues. The minister, the Hon. Perrin Beatty was asked why he did not deal with the obvious inequity of the single-parent family versus two-parent family problem. If there is to be a clawback, why not have it based on household income, as child tax credits are, rather than being based on individual income? The reaction of the government was quite amazing. This is a direct quote from the Hon. Perrin Beatty. He said:

● (1430)

> On this issue of whether the repayment should be on a family or individual income, this was carefully examined by the Department of Finance in developing the proposal. It was concluded that using individual income was advantageous in terms of administrative simplicity . . .

When translated, what that means is that the bureaucracy decided it was too complicated to put in a family or household income test with respect to the clawback. Thus, bureaucratic efficiency and administrative simplicity is why we are now having a provision introduced through Bill C-28 which is clearly inequitable with respect to the issue of one-income earner families versus two-income earner families, as I set out in the example I gave a moment ago.

I merely make the observation to senators on both sides of this house that it seems to me absolutely ridiculous that we are making decisions which are inequitable to various groups of Canadians merely in the interests of making life easy for the bureaucrats in the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Finance. When we see that consideration of so-called administrative efficiency for the bureaucracy will take precedence over issues of equity and issues of fairness and, perhaps above all, issues of compassion, I think that reflects the concerns of the government. I say that because, when we consider the example I gave of the single parent family being taxed at a higher rate than the two-income earner family earning considerably more, clearly we on this side of the chamber cannot help but have some compassion for those people who are being subjected to such a blatantly unfair tax regime.

The reason we propose that this kind of a change be made is that a move to a family income test rather than an individual income test strikes us as both fair and reasonable, and not impossible since that is precisely the same kind of test which is now introduced and which now exists with respect to child tax credits, in spite of what Mr. Beatty said.

Finally, I would like to comment on the issue of the clawback itself. I think it is interesting to look at one or two illustrative examples of what the consequences of the clawback will be; that is to say, what will happen to what looks like a very simple proposition five or ten years down the line.

The committee heard from a number of witnesses who had done a series of calculations which showed the impact in terms of income levels at which the clawback would cut in, and the impact as a result of the indexing of the $50,000 to inflation minus 3 per cent. Those calculations showed what would happen in real terms to that level over a relatively short period of time, such as a decade.

To begin with, the clawback in Bill C-28 taxes back family allowance and old age security benefits at the rate of 15 per cent of income in excess of $50,000 up to the total benefits received by the taxpayer. Using the illustrative example I gave a few moments ago, if you were a single income earner with two children as dependents, earning, for example, $56,000, you would lose all of your family allowance benefits.

In the current tax year, 1990, the government estimates that 535,000 families and 128,000 old age security recipients will be subject to this clawback. It claims that as a result of the clawback, the government will raise close to half a billion dollars.

In effect, the government has decided that a major source of new funds will come from parents receiving family allowance and recipients of old age security. Moreover, over time, because of the indexing provisions, the real value of the $50,000 threshold will decline fairly rapidly.

I wish to give merely two examples which come from data presented to the Senate committee from two or three different studies, but in fact all the numbers turn out to be essentially the same. Using the government's projected rates of inflation for the rest of this century—in other words for the next ten years—that $50,000 amount in real income terms will shrink to less than $36,000 by the end of the decade. In real income terms it will have dropped by more than 25 per cent. Indeed, the 100 per cent clawback will kick in, again in real income terms, at under $40,000.

Therefore, over a relatively short period of time, what is now regarded by members opposite as a reasonable level of $50,000 at which the clawback will cut in, in real terms will drop fairly rapidly to less than $36,000 by the end of the decade.

As a result, more and more pensioners will ultimately be subject to the clawback because, as the threshold in real income terms is lowered, more and more people will fall pray to the threshold. One study presented to the committee showed that although 128,000 current old age recipients will be subject to the clawback, in less than 20 years there will be 2 million old age recipients subject to the clawback. Over time, two things will happen simultaneously: The $50,000 threshold will drop because of a lack of indexation, and in real terms the $50,000 threshold will be much lower. The effect of that is to increase at a very rapid rate the number of seniors who will be subjected to the clawback.

[Senator Kirby.]

Since it is clearly the intention of the government to use this clawback provision as a means of ultimately killing the family allowance and old age security programs, one wonders why the government did not have the courage to actually do that outright. The government essentially seems to be operating on the principle that slowly strangling needy Canadians is preferable to doing what it clearly wants to do, namely state its intentions directly and set out to kill those programs.

Members opposite will make the argument that the government has stated that the indexation level and the level at which the clawback cuts in will be reviewed periodically to ensure that it remains at the appropriate level. They then go on to state that Canadians ought to trust them because, after all, look at what the government has done for them thus far.

It was extremely difficult, if not impossible, to persuade the witnesses who appeared before the committee that they should trust the government to take care of this problem and ensure that they would be treated fairly. Witness after witness expressed before the committee a very strong desire and belief that trusting the government was not the thing to do.

• (1440)

The final question we ought to ask ourselves, having made very clear the nature of the impact of the clawback provisions on people receiving family allowances and old age pensions, is: What will the government do with this money? This really gets at the issue Senator Simard raised repeatedly in his comments yesterday on the deficit. The government says that they will save the $500 million under Bill C-28 and that they have absolutely no intention of redistributing the money to low income Canadians, whether they be pensioners or otherwise, and that they have no intention of using the money to help Canadians who are in need. They intend to use the money to reduce the deficit.

Having come that far in his comments yesterday, Senator Simard set out to do what he has been doing and, indeed, what every government spokesman in this place and in the other house has been doing since 1984, namely, to try to effectively say that all the problems of the country at the present moment are due to the previous administration. Before I deal with a couple of specific points raised by Senator Simard, I cannot help but wonder out loud: At what point does this government think that it has any responsibility for anything that is going on in the country, and at what point do they start to take some responsibility for their own administration, which has been in power for some period of time?

Let me deal with two specific points made yesterday by Senator Simard with regard to the question of the deficit. Yesterday he said:

> I am sure that everyone recognizes that the size of the debt makes it the single largest problem facing the government's economic policy today . . .
> The reality is that the size of the debt leaves us dangerously exposed to external economic forces.

In light of Senator Simard's concern about the debt, I would like to point out to him that when his government took office in September 1984, the total debt was $170 billion, and today the total debt stands at $400 billion. In six years his government has managed to raise the country's debt by $230 billion, whereas in the period from 1867 to 1984, the first 117 years of Confederation, the total debt was $170 billion. So it is very hard for me to listen to Senator Simard talk about the enormous, deep, abiding conviction and concern he has about the size of the country's debt when, in six years, his government has managed to increase the debt by a cumulative amount that is substantially higher than the cumulative debt which the country acquired as the result of government expenditures from the time of Confederation.

The second observation I would like to make deals with Senator Simard's repeated comments and apparent concern for the fairness of the tax system. He said, "Bill C-28 . . . will contribute to greater fairness in the system." Canadians who appeared before the committee pleaded, begged and even prayed for a fairer system, and I say that in all truth. The only difficulty we have is that one should understand what Senator Simard believes constitutes fairness. On the basis of the comments he made yesterday about his support for the tax policies of the government, he obviously knows that the average Canadian will pay $3,000 more in taxes in 1991 than they did when the Conservatives came to office in 1984. He obviously thinks that that $3,000 tax increase on the average Canadian family is fair. He also obviously thinks, as he said yesterday, that cutting back on payments to senior citizens is fair. He also believes, as we will hear when he discusses Bill C-21, the unemployment insurance bill, that cutting back on unemployment insurance payments is fair.

In general, in representing the views of the government on this question, what we find in Senator Simard's comments is that fairness basically consists of increasing taxes on low- and middle-income Canadians, increasing taxes on seniors, increasing taxes on single-parent families, but decreasing taxes on corporations and the wealthy. If there is a basic reason why those of us on this side of the house and on the committee disagree with the government on Bill C-28, why we intend to vote against Senator Doody's motion and why we believe that this house should insist on its amendments, it is that fundamentally we disagree with the definition of "fairness" as it is defined by members opposite.

In our view, it is not fair to develop a tax system that is clearly designed to help the rich and the corporate sector. Furthermore, it is not fair to develop and to design a tax system that hits seniors and low-income families particularly hard. It is not fair to design a tax system that is biased against those Canadians who most need help, and it is not fair to devise a tax system that is fundamentally lacking in compassion.

It is basically for that reason that I should like to support the comments of Senator Buckwold and to urge all members on this side of the house to oppose Senator Doody's motion. I would urge all members in the house to insist on the amendments that we proposed last spring when this bill was sent back to the House of Commons. We still believe that those amendments should be adopted by the other place.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, in rising to speak on the amendments proposed to Bill C-28, I have to confess at the outset that I am not in favour of the concept of universality. It has never occurred to me to find favour with the idea that those who can afford their own protection should somehow be covered in the same manner as those who cannot. It seems to me to be an egregious use of taxation revenues by a government.

What we are dealing with here is a narrow situation in which the Senate has proposed two amendments to the bill put forward by the government. The first is that the government proposes to index over the threshold of $50,000 above 3 per cent annual inflation. The second amendment is that indexation take place from zero, so tht there is full indexation of the $50,000 threshold.

• (1450)

In addition, the committee is suggesting that there be a rebate of the contributions to the old age security fund made between 1952 to 1972, and that that rebate be by way of a tax credit of $75 per month for ten years. No one under the age of 41 will be eligible for that rebate.

There was a third amendment which attempted to use family income as the test for the threshold of $50,000. That was ruled out of order because it was, in effect, extending the incidence of a tax. In the committee report and in the Senate's action, we are proposing only these two amendments to the legislation.

There was no particular delay in dealing with this situation. As I understand it, the bill arrived in the Senate on December 21, 1989 and received first reading. On January 24, 1990, the Senate completed second reading and the bill was sent to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. Hearings of quite an extensive nature were undertaken, and on May 16, 1990, the committee reported. There was the Speaker's ruling that I referred to and on June 5 the bill was returned to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. It was reported again to the Senate on June 14 with the two amendments, and passed at third reading. The bill was then sent to the House of Commons, and on June 18 the House of Commons sent back a message refusing the Senate amendments.

Honourable senators, I should like to give you my understanding of the Senate's rights. We have a constitutional authority and duty to review legislation from the other place, just as the other place has a constitutional duty and right to review legislation which starts in this house. The exception to that rule is money bills, which must start in the House of Commons.

I believe there should be a rather restricted definition of money bills. It has been vogue to extend the definition so that it includes almost all legislation, but what it should be confined to is revenue-raising measures that arise out of the budget of the government and global appropriation bills that arise out of the Main Estimates and the Supplementary Estimates. There are other money bills that could be included, but it is the main money bills that we are talking about. They must start in the House of Commons. In the United States, they must start in the House of Representatives. In Britain, they must start in the House of Commons. That goes back to Charles I.

However, there is nothing to say that this place cannot deal with those money bills and at least amend them. The standard of care is a good deal higher in the kind of money bills I have defined than it would be if we were dealing with an ordinary bill.

Indeed, the raising of revenue and the appropriation of funds goes to the very heart of the government's program. It should be only interfered with by this body for extremely good reasons. I would have some difficulty refusing or gutting the budget bill or an appropriation of the bill. I would have some difficulty amending it so that it took out the heart of the government's program.

However, that does not mean that something cannot be done by this body. The kind of amendments we are dealing with here that make good fiscal sense should be recognized by the government as being worthwhile. I have no problem if the government decides to reject the amendments. They have the final say. Sir John A. Macdonald, when he discussed whether there should be an appointed or elected Senate, decided on the appointed Senate. When Upper Canada and Lower Canada were united, there had been an elected Senate, but he decided on an appointed Senate.

Senator Bosa: The Fathers of Confederation decided.

Senator Everett: That is correct; the Fathers of Confederation decided. I was quoting Sir John A. Macdonald, who was asked how the appointed Senate would work. He said that legislation would come from the other place to the Senate. It would be reviewed by that body and could be amended or rejected. If it went back to the other place, and if after due consideration and consultation with the electorate—and in those days of poor transportation and communication, that meant letting it go one session—the House of Commons repassed it in the next session, he could not conceive of the Senate turning it down. That is my view of the role of the Senate.

In the case of money bills, that duty is considerably escalated and is probably confined to amendments that make the legislation work better.

One can accept the fact that with today's communications and transportation, we do not have to wait one session. If we send a bill back to the other place, they can communicate with the electorate in a reasonable length of time. If they repassed it in a reasonable length of time, then it would come back to us and, in my opinion, we should accept the judgment of the other place.

What has happened? Look at the borrowing bill; look at the pharmaceutical bill; look at this bill. The government has said that the Senate has no right to interfere with legislation, especially if it is a money bill. So they close off any consideration, any consultation with the public, and in that they are interfering with the legitimate exercise of the power of the Senate.

• (1500)

In the case of the borrowing bill, as I understand it—and I was the Chairman of the National Finance Committee when this occurred—the previous Finance Minister, Mr. Lalonde, brought forth a borrowing authority bill. He did that before there was a budget, and the committee was very upset and said: "How can we approve a borrowing authority bill when we do not know what the budget is?" Mr. Lalonde said that from that point onward they would bring in the borrowing authority bill after the budget.

When the new government came to power, a borrowing authority bill was brought forward prior to a budget and prior to the Estimates. The National Finance Committee—and by this time I was no longer chairman of that committee—rejected the bill and said that it wanted a budget first. The committee later compromised and said that if the Estimates were tabled instead of a budget they would accept that.

In my judgment, that was a reasonable point of view of the Senate, as expressed by the National Finance Committee. However, the reaction of Mr. Wilson and Ms. McDougall was that the Senate had no right to interfere with the revenue measures of the Government of Canada, and that was that. That was a mistake.

Again, with respect to the pharmaceutical bill, I found myself in an interesting position then because I happened to be in favour of that bill; I wanted to vote in favour of it. However, when amendments to that bill were made here with which I disagreed, they went back to the other place and the other place rejected them without consideration. Harvie Andre, as I understand it, was quoted as saying, "The Senate has no right to interfere with this bill." Because of his attitude, I found myself voting against a measure that I favoured.

So it was many years ago with the wire-tap legislation. The legislation was passed by the other place, came to the Senate and was referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. That committee received representations from the Police Chiefs Association of Canada to the effect that the bill should be amended because, in its then present form, it required the police to notify a person whose wire was being tapped 60 days after discontinuation of the tap, which would seriously interfere with legitimate police investigations.

The committee bought the argument and proposed an amendment to the Senate, and that amendment was endorsed by the then Minister of Justice, Otto Lang. The bill went back to the other place, and Stanley Knowles got up and said: "It is a good amendment, but we cannot accept an amendment from the Senate. We cannot allow the Senate to interfere with our bills."

The result was that that amendment was refused. It came back here and the Senate knuckled under at that time. I am happy to say I was not one of those who did knuckle under.

However, the fact of the matter is that the Senate has a right and a duty to review legislation that comes from the other place, and for that right or duty to be refused by the other place is wrong. The reaction every time will be: Are you telling us we have no function? Are you telling us we have no rights? I cannot understand why the government does not and has not from the beginning said: "The Senate has rights. If they refuse a bill or amend a bill then we will consider that and consult with the electorate and we may then reject the Senate's action." If they reject it on that basis, I certainly would have no quarrel. But when they reject legislation on the basis that the Senate has no rights, then I and every senator should complain.

That, it seems to me, is the situation now. There are two very reasonable amendments being made. As I understand it, neither one of them extends the incidence of taxation. They are amendments that should be considered by the other place, but what occurred? On June 14 the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee was passed, as was third reading of the bill, and on June 18 the House of Commons disagreed with the Senate's amendments and sent back a message to that effect. The members of the House of Commons did not agree to a conference, which I believe was suggested; they just said that the Senate had no right to amend.

We used to have here—and I think Senator Molson referred to this—something called the "Hayden Formula". Under the Hayden Formula we used to pre-study bills like this in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. So a bill of this nature would not have been passed in the other place and then come to the Senate; it would have been pre-studied while in the other place.

Amendments were proposed time and time again under that formula. Senator Hayden would take them to the Finance Minister of the day and say, "We think there are some amendments that can make the bill work better." Time and time again—and you can go back into the history of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee to verify this—those amendments were accepted.

It is my view that if we had operated under the Hayden Formula on this legislation the amendments would have been accepted, but that does not change the issue. The fact of the matter is that the Hayden Formula made it work. The fact of the matter is that the Senate has the right to do the same thing without pre-study.

I think that these are reasonable amendments and I am sure many other senators in this House would agree. If there is a $50,000 threshold it should be fully adjusted for inflation. That only makes sense, otherwise it will erode, and indeed I think even the government itself said it will make adjustments every so often. So I do not think there is a great deal of difference here. If this had been handled by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee under the pre-study formula, I think it would have gone through.

I am not so sure about the $75, but I rather like the idea that if somebody has paid a specific amount for old age security, they are entitled to see that they get their old age security. I think it is reasonable to say, "If you did not get what you contracted for, at least you will have your contributions returned."

This is not the GST. That is a different matter. That is a confrontation of monumental proportion. That is partisanship, which I deplore in an appointed Senate, and which I spoke out against when the Conservatives were in the minority and were using delaying tactics in respect of the GST. I also spoke out against the Liberal's delaying tactics following the appointment of the eight new senators.

• (1510)

However, with respect to this bill, C-28, these are amendments that make sense. They do not harm the fiscal program of the government. They are amendments that the government should carefully consider. If the government wants to do something to dampen down the bad feeling that is abounding, then I think that at the very least it should go through the exercise of taking the amendments, considering them and indicating its willingness to have a conference with the Senate to talk about them.

Then, as far as I am concerned, if the government has consulted with the public and rejected the amendments, then so be it. The elected representatives will have spoken, and that is fine by me. But for goodness' sake, do not just go ahead and say out of hand that the Senate has no right to interfere with legislation or to make reasonable amendments like this.

Honourable senators, that is wrong. I am in favour of an elected Senate and I have spoken out on that many times. But if the Senate has no legislative rights, then for goodness' sake abolish the place.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I appreciate very much the comments of the preceding speakers. I, on my part, am happy to have the opportunity to participate in this debate on Bill C-28. It gives me the opportunity to discuss one of the key elements of the government's economic program, to which this bill makes a significant contribution. By that, I refer to the reduction of the deficit and the national debt.

In this debate we have to face up to the repercussions on our national finances of our actions in respect of Bill C-28. We have to remember that measures taken in the April 1989 budget reflected the reality of the burden placed on the government and on the economy by the size of the deficit and the accumulating national debt. The longer we delay this bill, the greater will be the grave consequences on the national debt and, if you will, the deficit. I must remind honourable senators that every dollar added to the national deficit is a dollar that we must borrow as a government, adding an upward pressure to interest rates and increasing the eventual burden on all taxpayers in Canada.

Measures in this bill are intended to reduce that burden. To the extent that the lack of final approval adds to this uncertainty and confusion, it impedes deficit reduction and increases the load on our economy.

Surely, as responsible legislators, it is important to remember that during this debate. The Minister of Finance has recently updated the report of the government in respect of the deficit. The information he provided in Edmonton is further evidence of success in dealing with government spending and the deficit. Senators will recall that he indicated that the preliminary financial statements show a deficit for 1989-90 of $28.9 billion, $1.6 billion less than was forecast in the April 1989 budget and confirmed in the February 1990 budget.

The Minister of Finance also pointed out that the spending forecast for 1989-90 came in at just 0.3 per cent higher than his original forecast. That is a remarkable degree of accuracy when dealing with figures of this enormous size.

The government's actions on limiting spending increases have indeed had considerable success. Since 1984, the size of the public service had been reduced by 12,000 person years. In the army, that is the equivalent of one full division. It is now the size it was in 1973-74, and the number of employees in Crown corporations has been reduced by 75,000.

The cost of operating the government is virtually the same today as it was in 1984. Program spending has increased at an average rate of 3.7 per cent per year, which is well below the average rate of inflation.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Would the honourable senator, at a convenient point, allow me a question on these figures?

Senator Barootes: I would prefer that Senator Gigantès not interfere with my thread of deep thought, please.

Senator Gigantès: I said, when it is convenient.

Senator Barootes: Thank you.

I want to point out that the expected rate of program spending for 1990-91 will be less than 3 per cent, again well below the anticipated rate of inflation. This means that in real terms—that is what my friend Senator Kirby was referring to—program spending has been cut. As a proportion of our total Canadian economy, the gross domestic product, it has fallen from 19.5 per cent in 1984-85 to 15.9 per cent in 1989-90, a decline of 20 per cent in program spending. In fact, this is its lowest level in 20 years.

This success in limiting spending has had positive effects for the government far beyond decreasing its proportion of the economy. As well, it represents a significant turnaround in the annual operating balance. Many who are prominent businessmen will recognize what we mean by "operating balance". This means the difference between revenue and program spending. Since 1984-85, that figure has moved from a deficit of $16 billion to a surplus of $10 billion in 1989-90. I might add that in 1991 the operating surplus is expected to reach $14 billion.

Cost-cutting measures have indeed been a major factor in this progress and have provided the largest share of it. But increases in revenue are also necessary to achieve a balanced and reasonable approach to the problem of the deficit. Therefore, the measures proposed in Bill C-28 include some provisions to raise revenue. These provisions are an integral part of the balanced package that places a greater burden on those who are better able to bear it, contrary to some of the observations and selective examples which we have heard to date.

Some of the changes to personal income tax will increase revenue as well as add to the overall fairness of the tax system. The increase in the personal surtax from three to five per cent, and the additional high-income surtax of three per cent on, if I may use the term, the rich, will both increase the government's revenue and help decrease our deficit.

The role of the income tax system in managing the overall spending of government by providing a basis for income-tested assistance, and by providing for taxation at progressive rates on most of the government assistance received by individuals has been a long-standing policy of this government. The measures in Bill C-28 expand this role, but they do not change it.

That these changes provide for the recovery of various types of federal social assistance from those taxpayers who do not need help from the government is obvious. I repeat, these are people who do not need help from the government. We heard of the example of the single-parent family earning $56,000 as being an area of need. I myself would not have used that example but, rather I would consider the responsibility we have to those single-parent families with annual incomes in the range of $25,000 or $30,000. They are the ones who will benefit from this program. Maintenance of our social safety net for those who need it most is most important and is not infringed by the measures in this bill. The purpose of that safety net is to assist those who need help, and not to subsidize those with high incomes, as we are doing at the present time.

Benefits from the old age security and family allowance systems will become repayable at the rate of 15 per cent of an individual's net income—I repeat: "net income"—over $50,000 in terms of 1989 dollars. The expenditure saving, once these measures are fully in place, is, as Senator Kirby announced, expected to yield about $500 million—and every cent of that saving, in my opinion, will be coming from those who are high-income earners. It is important to note that only 4.8 per cent of the recipients of the old age security, the richest recipients of the old age security, will be affected, along with about 14 per cent of those receiving family allowance.

I should like to respond to some of Senator Kirby's observations, which I noted very carefully. I was pleased to hear him pointing out the history of the development of the old age security system from 1952 to 1972, when we all contributed a small amount of money on one line of our income tax. However, it was in 1972 that the Liberal government incorporated that into general revenues at a time when the fund was found to be already $125 million in deficit.

Senator Kirby spoke of thresholds for tax-back of benefits from the old age security and family allowance systems. To make his points, he presumed that these thresholds would be cast in stone and would never change in the future. That was the basis of the examples that he gave us, not accepting that necessary changes will occur as incomes lose their real buying power through inflation.

Senator Kirby's example of this single-parent family earning $56,000 was, to me, a bit of an exaggeration, and I would be far more interested in the lower-income, single-parent families than I would be in those whose net income is $56,000 per year.

Senator Kirby spoke of our responsibility for debt. He told us that this government came into office with a debt of around $140 billion. By the time this government was able to review the situation, let us perhaps accept that the debt was $160 billion to $175 billion and that it is, indeed, now $360 billion and rising. I am surprised that an economist and mathematician of Senator Kirby's ability would somehow or other fail to take into consideration the effect of the compounding interest rates which would occur on $160 billion or $175 billion at today's rates. Let me tell you, honourable senators, that that accounts for virtually the entire increase in the national debt that we have in this country today.

Senator Simard: Eighty per cent!

Senator Barootes: It represents the original debt plus the compounding.

This bill, honourable senators, also includes provisions that will increase corporation taxes. Those provisions will ensure that all large corporations contribute to debt control and to deficit reduction. The large corporations tax will ensure that all large corporations in Canada pay federal taxes. Some 3,600 of our largest corporations are included. Those 3,600 corporations represent 75 per cent of the capital in Canadian corporations. This tax will probably add to revenues close to $1 billion in this coming year. This tax can be applied to corporate income tax. So it comes to pass that this large corporations tax is designed to tax those large corporations that have been avoiding paying any income tax, or very little income tax, in the past. They will be subjected to this tax with no way of escaping through the loopholes established by Liberal administration.

As an example, we keep hearing about the banks that escape paying tax. The major Canadian chartered banks, in this coming year, under this provision, will be paying $1 billion in income tax.

Senator Buckwold: It's about time!

Senator Barootes: Coming from an ex-director of the Bank of Montreal, I find that somewhat ironic.

Senator Buckwold: Not at all. It just shows how fair we are.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, this provision relating to the income tax, and the provisions for taxing back old age security and family allowance from the very rich, instead of subsidizing them, is designed to follow the words of Karl Marx and the words you see pasted on billboards and on telegraph poles: "Make the rich pay". That is exactly what these measures will do. They will tax the rich.

Senator Simard: I wonder why the Liberals did not talk about that!

Senator Barootes: This tax proposal provides an excellent example for the need to proceed quickly with approval for legislation, because already some of the large corporations are withholding tax that should have been paid under the large corporations tax. There have been many reports of these companies not complying fully with the provisions of this legislation. The result, apparently, has been lower revenues for the Government of Canada.

There is undoubtedly, with the delay in this legislation, considerable confusion in the system. May I remind honourable senators that this bill came to this chamber for first reading on December 21, 1989. Were it to pass this week, it will be 10 months since we first received this bill, which is, as Senator Everett so clearly outlined, a taxation or revenue-raising bill. It is time to fish or cut bait.

• (1530)

This is an undesirable situation. Therefore, I believe it is important that we proceed as quickly as possible to approve this bill, which would ensure an end to this confusion and help reduce the deficit of Canada. Thank you, honourable senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Senator Barootes, would you allow me a question?

Senator Barootes: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: I have in my hands the Canadian Economic Observer, which is published by Statistics Canada every month. This issue is entitled Historical Statistical Supplement 1989/90, and it includes figures to 1990. On page 6, table 1.3, government current expenditures is given at 1986 prices—in other words, inflation is factored out. It is speaking of government current expenditures on goods and services. If you take five years of Tory rule until December 1989, and five years of Liberal rule immediately preceding that, you will find that the annual rate of increase in the expenditure of goods and services, which excludes interest on the debt, was twice as much under the Tories than it was under the Liberals. If you provide this figure to your aides, they will do the calculation for you. How do you reconcile that with what you said earlier?

Senator Barootes: I did not understand Senator Gigantès' selective quotation from that tome. You are saying that the rise in expenditures—

Senator Gigantès: The rate of increase in expenditures, year over year, is 4.4 for the Tories as compared to 2.2 for the Liberals. Inflation has been factored out. This is not a debatable point.

Senator Barootes: I am sorry. I have not looked at all of the tables, but you have picked out a line.

Senator Corbin: Is that a government publication?

Senator Gigantès: Of course. It comes from Statistics Canada. What I am suggesting, senator, is that you tell your speech writers to do their arithmetic first.

Senator Barootes: The arithmetic that I know of, which has been repeated across this country, is that the annual rate of program expenditures in the five years preceding this party in government had been around 10 plus per cent per year. In this particular instance you surely cannot disagree with the 3.7 per cent figure with respect to program expenditures. Next year it will be below 3 per cent. I can use those figures and you can use yours.

Senator Gigantès: We must be speaking about the same figures. You include transfers to provinces and people in this figure.

Senator Barootes: Are those not programs? Those are statutory programs.

Senator Gigantès: They cannot be cut because of statutory agreements. But government current expenditures on goods and services are the public service and what the public service buys. Those are the things that a "frugal" government should be able to cut, but which this government has not. In fact, the government has increased its expenditure under this item, which is the one item that is totally under its control; whereas transfers to the provinces for medicare and education are not under the government's control or the control of the Liberals because of the agreements that are in place.

Senator Barootes: There is no need to quarrel about this, my dear friend. You and I can look at those statistics together. The disparity arises, honourable senators, because Senator Gigantès has selected goods and services but excluded all statutory spending. When I give you these statistics, I am speaking of the spending of the federal government excluding interest on the inherited debt. We are using total figures, not your finely selected figures.

Senator Gigantès: Statutory spending is spending that cannot be helped. The federal government has to pay a certain amount toward medicare, post-secondary education, social assistance and so on by agreement. Those things are out of the control of the government, and I have endless statements by Mr. Wilson to that effect.

Senator Kinsella: What is your question?

Senator Barootes: Let me outline what has happened with transfers and provincial payments, because I participated in the extended program funding when a previous government, under that sacred Minister of Health Marc Lalonde, decided that the government would reduce expenditures on Established Programs Financing on education and everything else. Those transfers to the provinces were reduced—I do not say entirely, though to a great extent, and I think my friend Senator Castonguay can confirm that—by another administration between 1977 to 1984. That is where those major reductions were made; not by this organization.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Senator Corbin.]

Senator Gigantès: I was not speaking of the reductions you made. You introduced the subject. Are you suggesting, sir, that there should not have been reductions? I thought you were frugal.

Senator Simard: Oh, oh!

Senator Gigantès: I know you do not want to look facts in the face, Senator Simard, probably because you would not recognize them.

Senator Barootes: Use all of the facts, not just your selected facts.

Senator Gigantès: I was talking to Senator Simard who interjected, but one never knows why.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, it is always interesting to hear a good discussion among us. I was particularly interested in noting that since I am standing to speak on Senator Doody's motion, which deals with the amendments that are being proposed by the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, neither Senator Simard nor Senator Barootes mentioned those amendments at all. They talked about great macro-economic theories, but said nothing about the amendments, which Senator Everett pointed out are perfectly reasonable. They talked about the supposed cost of the holdup in the Senate because of those amendments. What they do not seem to be willing to admit is that because those were reasonable amendments in the first place, there was no need for them to be held up here. If the government had acceded to any kind of negotiation or discussion, those matters would have been cleaned up months ago. The intransigence of this government caused the delay.

Bill C-28 is another of the Mulroney government's attacks on the most important social programs in Canada. There has been a long and, indeed, an important history associated with social programs which have developed over the years in this great country. Successive governments have tried to deal with those particular programs and, where they could, they embellished upon them and, in doing so they have brought many benefits to Canadians, Canadians in every region, Canadians in every community, rich and poor, young and old alike.

The social programs such as old age security and family allowance are an integral part of Canadian life. To suggest that they are merely social programs providing a benefit to a select few is really missing the point in its entirety. A policy of good social programs such as I have referred to is also good economic policy. There are countless Canadians who have young families and there are countless senior citizens who look forward on a regular basis to receiving the generosity of the people of Canada.

That is where the Conservative and Republican governments in Canada and in the U.S. went wrong in the depression of the 1930s. They thought that by squeezing the economy and the people into greater and greater stoicism and denial, they could somehow produce a growing economy and a prosperous society. They were painfully wrong!

Now, as we face another recession, which is looking more and more each day like a depression, both governments are doing the same thing again.

The social programs underpinning the ability of consumers to buy are also the basis upon which our economy is able to grow. They are the foundation of business prosperity. This government, in slashing program after program benefitting ordinary people, insists that it is doing us all a favour. But the spending does not come down. The benefits in tax costs flow to those who profit from the horrendous tax structure we have created.

What we need is a straightforward progressive tax system; not one which discriminates against the old and the children as this bill does, or loads more of the burden on the ordinary consumer, the small business person and the professional person as does the GST.

For many senior citizens, their old age security cheques provide the only sense of dignity they have. There are women, men and couples who have relatively limited income, but the old age security in itself allows them to exercise their wishes and to live in dignity.

What is dignity? Dignity to a woman of 67 years of age may in point of fact mean receiving her old age security cheque and thereafter purchasing items for family members. It may mean a trip to another part of the country to see a loved one. It may also mean paying for a telephone call to someone somewhere else in Canada. That is the significance of that program which touches many Canadians.

But this particular bill proposes that income taxpayers will repay old age security and family allowance benefits through the tax system. The universal nature of these programs with respect to access has supposedly been maintained as high income earners will continue to receive old age security and family allowance cheques. However, universality of these benefits with respect to quality of benefit has been destroyed. The level of benefits received by families and individuals will no longer be equal, but will be dependent upon the level of income above the established threshold.

The explanatory notes of the committee's report state at page 6:

> Most witnesses that appeared before this Committee disagreed with the Government's assertion that Bill C-28 maintains the universal nature of Canadian social programs. As Family Service Canada noted, "Although we have heard in other discussions that there is no abandonment of the universal nature of the program, to provide someone with a benefit and to withdraw it totally, undermines the basic principles of the purpose of the family allowance program."

At page 7 of the committee's report under the heading "Universality", it states:

> Under this definition, the clawback does not violate the universality principle because the test is applied after the receipt of benefits. However, most witnesses disagreed with such a narrow definition of universality arguing that the concept should not include the targeting of benefits by a special tax, even if this is applied on a post-receipt basis. They contended that OAS and FA payments should be taxed at the same rate as other sources of income; that income from these benefits should not be discriminated against.

These measures violate a long-held principle in tax policy known as horizontal equity. This principle dictates that individuals are treated equally by the tax system. Individuals at the same level of income should pay the same amount of tax, provided that all other circumstances are equal.

This bill will treat old age security pension differently than other forms of income, and tax it back from high income taxpayers at a higher marginal rate than applies to other forms of income. For example, a senior citizen earning $75,000 a year will pay more taxes than an individual at 64 at the same income level because the former old age security benefits will be subject to a higher tax rate. At this level of income, that portion of the senior citizen's income comprised of old age security will be subject to a marginal tax of about 100 per cent, while the income of a non-senior will be taxed at the top rate of 29 per cent.

Where is the fairness? Where is the equity? My view of universality has traditionally supported the concept of equal access to equal benefits across income levels. This concept of universality was integrated with that of a progressive tax system. Successive Liberal governments strove to increase the level of progressivity in the tax system. The tax system was a corrective, progressive mechanism to assist in a fair distribution of benefits. Every individual within a defined client group received the same benefit, regardless of income.

At the same time, the tax system introduced the element of fairness by ensuring that high income Canadians paid higher marginal tax rates. Granted, a perfect degree of progressivity was not attained. Yet the tax system under Liberal governments provided a more equitable and fair range of marginal tax rates. Prior to tax reform, the upper marginal tax rate was 34 per cent, exclusive of surtaxes. The Conservatives have now reduced this rate to 29 per cent, exclusive of surtaxes. This move has resulted in lower overall tax rates for upper income Canadians.

The Conservative assault on the old age security and family allowance programs has three distinct components, all of which represent regressive departures from traditional equitable policies. For the first time, in this bill the tax-back rate of universal programs is linked directly to the benefit received. The tax-back rate was previously determined by utilizing progressive marginal tax rates which are impartial as to the sources of income. On its own, this linkage between benefit and tax-back rate renders universality a sham.

The measure is doubly insidious coupled with the regressive tax measures instituted by this government. As noted above, tax reform has benefitted the rich, and further changes to the child benefits package has significantly eroded the principle of horizontal tax equity. The poor and middle class are paying a substantially higher rate of tax today than they were in 1984. The committee report, at page 7 of the explanatory notes, deals with indexation:

● (1550)

> Bill C-28 provides for indexation of the $50,000 clawback threshold at the same rate as other income tax measures which amounts to the rate of inflation that is in excess of 3%. Barring periodic adjustments by the government, the real value of the threshold would decline substantially over time. For example, an inflation rate of 4.5% per year would result in the nominal value of the threshold increasing to slightly more than $58,000.00 after ten years. However, the purchasing power at the threshold would have declined to less than $37,000.00 over this period. If nominal incomes rose at a faster rate than the threshold, the number of taxpayers affected by the clawback would increase over time. Even pensions that just keep pace with inflation would increase in relation to the clawback threshold so that individuals with indexed pensions would increasingly be subject to the clawback.
> This aspect of the clawback was mentioned by virtually every witness that appeared before the Committee on Bill C-28. Many of the briefs included projections of the number of taxpayers likely to be affected by the clawback. As Mr. Herbert Hanmer of the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation stated, "Thus, each year, if inflation continues, thousands of additional seniors will be affected. In twenty years' time the threshold expressed in 1989 dollars will be down to $28,000 and will affect two million Canadians."

It goes on to state at page 8:

> This view was reiterated by Mr. Gaston Garceau, Dominion President, Royal Canadian Legion. "With the reduction of the real income level at which the tax kicks in, more seniors will have to pay more money. Perhaps not coincidentally, the number of seniors will be increasing as Canada's population ages collectively. In a little more than a decade, a very large number of seniors will be caught in the net and will be required to return their Old Age Security, at ever decreasing thresholds."

Representatives from the Public Service Alliance and the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada expressed concern that a change in government or in financial circumstances could, in a later period, affect the commitment to adjust the threshold.

The government has embarked on a slippery slope. By varying the level of benefit from universal programs relative to income, the thresholds for the reduction of benefits under both the old age security and family allowance is to be $50,000 of net individual income. However, this threshold is only partially indexed. The government has indicated that the threshold will be reviewed periodically and adjusted as appropriate. This is a signal they are sending to Canadians that next year, six months or eighteen months from now, the threshold could very well be reduced if they wish to take additional forms of income from poor and middle-income Canadians.

We know the track record of this government. We all know what we have seen in the willingness of the government to take money from the poor and middle-income people. This means that as the government looks for additional income or additional savings next year, the threshold could be dropped to $40,000 of net individual income, thereby capturing the family allowance benefits of an additional 530,000 families. Once the precedent is set, I suggest that the desire to achieve greater savings may prove irresistible to a hungry government looking for new cash.

Under this provision, if the old age pension can be taken away at an income level of $70,000 today, it can be taken away at $60,000 tomorrow and $50,000 the week after. The government will not stop at family allowances or old age pensions. It will get into medicare and into every social program in this country.

We come now to the old age security fund. The government will simply forget that, for 20 years, people were taxed specifically for the old age security fund. The whole purpose of the surcharge was to be up front with the people of Canada about the cost of old age security, so that every Canadian who paid that tax knew that he or she was contributing to his or her own dignified retirement.

Witnesses made it clear that the government has an obligation to deliver old age security benefits to contributors to that fund, and I do not blame them.

The Federal Superannuates National Association said:

> People paid for something, and when they reached the age at which they would become eligible they expected to have that paid . . . In effect the government has changed the rules of the game because it extracted a payment . . . This has been a clear breach of that undertaking and I do not think that you gentlemen or the government would allow a similar breach of an undertaking, for example, by an insurance company that had provided an annuity and then turned around and refused to pay it when it was due.

The committee recommended a reasonable gesture of acknowledgement to those who have paid their contribution for 20 years; a refundable credit of $75 a year. However, the government would not listen and would not even discuss it. "It is our way or no way." That has been a constant refrain throughout the last six years. Once again, ignore the obligations to ordinary Canadians and ride roughshod over their rights.

The following paragraph appears at the conclusion of the committee's report:

> In January 1985, the Government released the Consultation Paper on Child and Elderly Benefits, which concluded that a special surtax on Old Age Security payments "would seriously disrupt our retirement income system" and "would unduly penalize those most affected by reason of retirement income resulting from private savings in earlier years". Thus, the provision for clawing back OAS benefits in Bill C-28 represents not only a change from the policies of previous governments but also a direct repudiation of this Government's earlier position.

Many Canadians have a deep concern about the direction in which this country is going with respect to social programs. We have seen the demise a number of government programs and an attempt to de-index benefits which the Prime Minister said he regarded as a "sacred trust."

There is a great deal of concern not only by provincial governments but by individual Canadians and organizations about the erosion of universality which began as recently as 1984 and has been coupled with successive tax measures brought in by the government and the most recent budget of the Minister of Finance. When you take the cumulative effect, in essence one must conclude that there has been a major assault against the principle of universality which will cause havoc, concern and a great deal of anguish to many Canadians who are presently receiving benefits and hope to receive benefits in the years to come.

This bill is wrong-headed and should not pass without the amendments proposed by the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have been requested to suspend the sitting until 5 o'clock, or to the call of the bell.

At 6.20 p.m., the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker in the Chair.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I suggest that we not see the clock?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE SENATE

PROVISIONAL RULES, OCTOBER 18, 1990

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, permit me to read the document on the provisional rules so that it will be presented in the Debates of the Senate in both official languages for the perusal of all honourable senators at their leisure. Perhaps at the conclusion of the reading, I will be permitted to make a number of comments as to my understanding of the effects of the Provisional Rules of the Senate, October 18, 1990.

ORDERED THAT the following be Provisional Rules of the Senate.

P-1 (a) Notwithstanding any other rule or practice of the Senate, when, after 5:45 o'clock p.m. on a Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday, any Senator moves pursuant to these Provisional Rules "That the Senate do now adjourn", "That the debate be now adjourned", or "That strangers be ordered to withdraw", the sitting shall be suspended forthwith until 2:00 o'clock p.m. the following day, at which time the Senator then in the Chair shall order the bells to call in the Senators to be sounded. If any time before the Senator then in the Chair calls for the yeas, nays and abstentions pursuant to rule 49, the Senator who proposed the motion asks leave to withdraw the said motion the same shall be deemed to have been withdrawn; otherwise, the said bells shall be sounded until the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Senator then in the Chair that they are ready to proceed with the vote, but in any case the division shall proceed not later than 2:45 o'clock p.m.

(b) A motion proposed pursuant to Provisional Rule 1(a) shall not be received more than once during any calendar week.

(c) When a sitting has been suspended pursuant to Provisional Rule 1(a) or (b) the Speaker shall leave the Chair and order that the bells to call in the members be silenced until 2:00 o'clock p.m. on the day on which the division, if required, is to take place.

P-2 Notwithstanding any other Rule or practice of the Senate, when, after 5:00 o'clock p.m., on a Friday, any Senator proposes, pursuant to these Provisional Rules "That the Senate do now adjourn", the sitting shall be suspended until 2:00 o'clock p.m. the following Monday, at which time the Senator then in the Chair shall order the bells to call in the Senators to be sounded. If at any time prior to the calling of the yeas, nays and abstentions pursuant to Rule 49 the Senator who proposed the motion asks leave to withdraw the said motion the same shall be deemed to have been withdrawn; otherwise, the bells to call in the Senators shall be sounded until the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Senator then in the Chair that they are ready to proceed to the taking of the vote, but in any case the division shall proceed not later than 2:45 o'clock p.m.

P-3 (a) Notwithstanding any other Rule or practice of the Senate, when, at any sitting, a division is requested pursuant to Rule 49(3), on any motion that forms an essential part of the legislative process on a Bill (i.e., the Second and Third Reading Motions and amendments thereto, motions to send a Bill to a Committee and amendments thereto, all motions at the report stage and any amendments thereto, the previous question on any motion which forms part of the legislative process and any motion to adjourn the debate on any of the above motions) the taking of the division may, at the request of either Party Whip, be deferred until 5:45 o'clock p.m. on the next sitting day, whereupon the bells to call in the Senators shall be sounded until the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Senator then in the Chair that they are ready to proceed to the taking of the vote; but, in any case, the said bells shall be sounded for not more than 30 minutes, whereupon the vote shall be taken. Orders of the Day shall then be called.

(b) When, after debate, a division has been requested pursuant to Rule 49(3) in relation to:

(i) a motion for reading the Orders of the Day;

OR

(ii) a motion That a particular Senator be now heard" or "do now speak", the bells to call in the Senators shall be sounded for not more than 60 minutes whereupon the vote shall be taken.

(c) When a division is requested pursuant to Rule 49(3) in relation to a motion that the Speaker's ruling be sustained, the said division shall be deferred for a period not to exceed 12 hours whereupon the bells to call in the Senators shall be sounded for not more than 30 minutes, whereupon the vote shall be taken.

(d) When any division has been deferred pursuant to Provisional Rule 3(a), the Senate shall proceed to consider other regular business.

When any division has been deferred pursuant to Provisional Rule 3(e), the Senate may proceed to consider other regular business if deemed appropriate by the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition.

(e) In cases not provided for in these Provisional Rules any division requested pursuant to Rule 49(3) may be deferred for a period not to exceed 24 hours whereupon the Senator then in the Chair shall order the bells to call in the Senators to be sounded and the same shall continue until the Government and Opposition Whips have entered the Chamber and indicated to the Senator then in the Chair that they are ready to proceed to the taking of the vote, but in any case the said bells shall be sounded for not more than 30 minutes, whereupon the vote shall be taken.

P-4 Unless otherwise ordered, these Provisional Rules shall expire upon the prorogation of the Second Session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament.

Honourable senators, that reads like a parliamentary rule and perhaps on first reading it is not perfectly clear in its intent. I should say that Provisional Rule 1(a) provides that any one of the three motions, for example, "That the Senate do now adjourn", can be moved on any day of the week except Friday. When such a motion is put, the bells will begin to ring and the division will take place the following day at 2 o'clock. It is a means of ensuring that the Senate will not have to sit all night, every night of the week, and it will be possible to move such a motion once in each calendar week. So if we were under the around-the- clock system of sitting to which we have become accustomed in the past week, it would be possible to break that cycle one night by moving this motion, whereupon the vote would take place the next day, if a vote were necessary. In the meantime, we could all go home. That is the effect of P-1(a).

P-2 permits a similar motion to be moved on Friday, the division on which would take place at 2 o'clock the following Monday. The effect of that motion would be to suspend the sitting of the Senate until 2 o'clock the following Monday, if that is what we wanted. If an actual division were requested, we would have it; if not, the motion could be withdrawn. The purpose of that motion, of course, is to break the around-the-clock, around-the-week sitting in order to give senators an opportunity to be free on Friday night, Saturday and Sunday. These are called "exit from the tunnel" rules' because some of us feel that we have been living in a tunnel. In this case, however, the tunnel is at the end of the light.

• (1830)

P-3 provides a methodology by which divisions are held on motions arising on regular legislation. There are a variety of motions that are described in the rule. If a division is to be held on such a motion, the division is deferred until the next sitting day at quarter to six. The business then under consideration is put aside—although other business could be considered—and the division is held the next sitting day at quarter to six, presumably with a regular sitting at 2 o'clock, and regular proceedings would continue after the vote, as is provided for. The Orders of the Day shall then be called.

As you notice, there are then rules governing the votes, the ringing of the bells, and the time for various other motions, including the Speaker's ruling—12 hours; a motion for the reading of the Orders of the Day, which is set at one hour; a motion to hear a particular senator—one hour.

There is then a final category entitled "unprovided for motions"—some of which we could think of; others which we may not have thought of. In those cases not specifically mentioned, any division can be deferred for a 24-hour period.

The effect of these rules put together is to provide clarity and certainty, as far as those of us who worked on it are concerned, with respect to the length of bells and the calling of votes. It removes discretion entirely from the presiding officer or the Speaker.

We have been impressed by the difficulties that arose from the rulings of October 4 and the subsequent debate. In these provisional rules we have provided that certainty and clarity exist in that the rule of the Speaker in the length of the bells and the calling of the vote is now removed. Hopefully, that will remove a big source of difficulty in our proceedings.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: When we began it was our objective—at least on this side of the house—to ensure the ruling was erased, expunged, diminished, atrophied, or whatever the appropriate word is. That has been accomplished in these rules. There is no motion that is not provided for in this rule, and in that provision there is clarity and certainty as to the length of the bells and the timing of the vote.

The role of the Whips is preserved in the final rule encased in rule P-3 (e), where it states:

(e) In cases not provided for in these Provisional Rules any division requested pursuant to Rule 49(3) may be deferred for a period not to exceed 24 hours . . .

The Whips can decide by mutual agreement to reduce the length of the period, and the division or the vote could be held at an earlier time.

I want to thank the Leader of the Government and Senator Roblin for their assiduous work in accomplishing these results, as well as my deskmate, Senator Frith. I hope that it will provide us with the basis for continuing our work and dealing with the legislation before us, which is contentious and difficult. It will not be an easy passage in any event, but we hope that the rules here will help us along the way.

This is what is agreed; there is much unagreed. Certainly, by reaching this agreement, on this side we have not taken any pledge to reduce our intention of creating trouble for the government in getting the GST through the Senate.

Senator Frith: No final vote for the GST in sight!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I intend first to second the motion for the provisional rules that has just been made by the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition. Shortly, I intend to propose, seconded by him, the order of the house for dealing with the legislative agenda that is now before the Senate.

First, I should note that it was Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I believe, who convened these meetings. While there have been times over the past three days when I would not have done so, I do now want to thank him and acknowledge the fact that these meetings were held under his auspices.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: I have been—and the Senate has been—enormously assisted in these discussions, which have been held in a positive atmosphere, by the presence and participation of my old chief and present colleague, that most diligent and respected of parliamentarians, the Honourable Duff Roblin.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

• (1840)

Senator Murray: I should like to thank all senators for their patience and forbearance over the past few days while those of us who were working on this agreement did our work. It is, as I have said on a couple of occasions, a very painstaking and complex exercise to devise rules and work on legislation at a time of considerable tension in the Senate.

With regard to the rules that the Leader of the Opposition has referred to and the motion he has placed before us, I do note that the provisional rules that we have agreed upon are to be with us until the prorogation of the present session. We will all have an opportunity to work with them and see whether or not they stand the test of time in parliamentary practice. At some point during this session, and certainly before we begin a new session, I would expect that the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders would look at these provisional rules in the light of our experience and bring in a report suggesting that we either make them permanent or we change them in various respects.

As Senator MacEachen has pointed out in a statement that is fair and accurate as to implications of the rule changes—a statement which I endorse—the ruling of Mr. Speaker last October 4 is put behind us. We no longer need any precedent of that kind because we have brought into this place a practice that exists in almost all parliamentary assemblies that any of us know of. We have imposed limitations on bell ringing. There are provisions, the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, for the deferral of certain votes. There are provisions that protect the right of the minority to employ the legitimate parliamentary tactic of delay, but no bell can ring indefinitely from now on if we pass this order. We have made the holding of votes quite a predictable exercise, and that is certainly in the interest of this place and in the interest of all senators.

I shall propose the house order on legislation in a moment. Let me say that, in terms of the legislative timetable, the government has achieved its objective. This agreement restores order to the Senate and it allows important government legislation to proceed, and to proceed to a vote. We break the logjam that had existed here in some cases for a year. Bill C-28 will be voted on tonight, if this order passes. Bill C-21 will be voted on Monday next, if this order passes. Bill C-62 will be voted at the report stage a week from today, on October 25. Then there is Bill C-44, the Hibernia legislation. That will have its final vote on Monday, October 29.

Honourable senators, beyond October 29, beyond the report stage of Bill C-62, we now have an agreement to limit the number of amendments at third reading and the time of debate on these amendments, and to regulate the times of the deferred votes on these amendments. With regard to Bill C-62, this is what we call the light-at-the-end-of-the-tunnel rule. These arrangements in respect of Bill C-62, which is the most controversial bill before us, do not mean that we will have a short debate. They do permit an orderly debate. They provide for a substantive debate. They permit senators to vote at the report stage and to vote on each of the amendments that will be proposed. As a result of this agreement, we have an orderly legislative process on this and other government legislation, which I believe is in the interests of Parliament and the country. On behalf of the government, I have no hesitation in commending it to all honourable senators.

Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacEachen:

> Upon adoption of this Order, notwithstanding any Provisional or other Rule of the Senate, the following provisions shall apply:
> That in relation to Bill C-28, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act, unless previously disposed of, at not later than 5:45 o'clock p.m., on Thursday, October 18, 1990, the Senator then in the Chair shall, if required, interrupt any proceedings then before the Senate and proceed to put forthwith and successively, without any further debate or amendment, all questions necessary to dispose of the said Bill; and

That, in relation to Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, unless previously disposed of, at not later than 8.00 o'clock p.m., on Monday, October 22, 1990, the Senator then in the Chair shall, if required, interrupt any proceedings then before the Senate and proceed to put forthwith and successively, without any further debate or amendment, all questions necessary to dispose of the said Bill; and

That, in relation to Bill C-62, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, unless previously disposed of, at not later than 5:45 o'clock p.m., on Thursday, October 25, 1990, the Senator then in the Chair shall, if required, interrupt any proceedings then before the Senate and shall proceed to put forthwith and successively, without any further debate or amendment, all questions necessary to dispose of the report stage of the said Bill; and

That in relation to Bill C-44, An Act respecting Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, unless previously disposed of, at not later than 8.00 o'clock p.m., on Monday, October 29, 1990, the Senator then in the Chair shall, if required, interrupt any proceedings then before the Senate and shall proceed to put forthwith and successively, without any further debate or amendment, all questions necessary to dispose of all remaining stages of the said Bill, and the Senate shall then adjourn forthwith.

● (1850)

That in relation to Bill C-62, notwithstanding any other rule or practice of the Senate, when the motion that the Bill be now read a third time is being debated, no motion for the previous question shall be received before eight amendments to the Bill moved by the Leader of the Opposition or by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition have been disposed of, but the question on each of those amendments shall be put to the Senate after six hours of debate and the first such amendment shall be moved no later than six hours after the Third Reading debate has begun; subsequent amendments shall be introduced not more than six hours after the vote on the previous amendment has been completed.

In relation to any division requested pursuant to the provisions of Rule 49(3), with respect to any of the above-mentioned Bills, the Senator then in the Chair shall order the bells to call the Senators to be sounded for not more than 30 minutes whereupon the Senate shall proceed to the taking of the vote.

[Senator Murray.]

Honourable senators now know why it took so long to get this down. The reason I was reading it slowly is that I did not want to impose unduly on our translators who have to simultaneously interpret what I have just read in English. Of course, copies will be available for honourable senators.

As I said, I commend both of these orders to all honourable senators so that we can get back to transacting the business of the country.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I suggest that the two Senate orders be voted on together as one consolidated motion?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Frith, do you mean the Legislative Program Agreement and the Provisional Rules Agreement?

[English]

Senator Frith: I suggest that one motion be put for the adoption of the two Senate orders which have just been laid on the Table.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C. that the documents entitled Provisional Rules of the Senate and Senate Order (Legislation), just now laid on the Table be now adopted.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED ACTS

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—MOTION FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON CERTAIN SENATE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments to the Bill C-28, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act, to which the House of Commons have disagreed; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "Yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

QUESTION PERIOD

ENERGY

SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT—INCENTIVES TO PROCEED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to return to a question which I put to the Leader of the Government in the Senate several times, but the urgency of which is becoming more important as time goes on. I am referring to the Synfuels Project.

The leader will recall that an application was submitted to the relevant department more than a year ago for the Cape Breton Tax Incentive Credits and the Atlantic Enterprise Program Incentives. I have asked several times whether the government has reached a decision on this project but have not received a definite answer.

It has become all the more important in light of the decisions which have been made with respect to Hibernia, which is to be debated in this chamber shortly.

I hope the leader is able to tell us the government has now reached a favourable decision on these tax proposals, which will have the effect of creating a very important new energy project in the province of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I regret I am not able to tell the honourable senator that a decision has been made. As a matter of fact, my colleague, the Deputy Leader of the Government, was to have tabled a delayed reply today to the previous questions put forward by the Leader of the Opposition. Perhaps I will anticipate that simply by reading the reply, which indicates that a decision has not been made but that we are close to that point. The reply is as follows:

> . . . the proposed Scotia Synfuels project is a very large project with capital costs of about $500 million. The tax credit for the project under the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit Program would exceed $200 million. While the benefit of this program is delivered through the tax system, the credit is only available for projects that have been approved by the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Consequently, officials from that department and of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency have worked very closely with Scotia Synfuels to evaluate this project carefully. The review process is close to completion and a decision by the Minister of DIST on Scotia Synfuels' application for the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit is expected in the near future.

That is all I have by way of a report on this matter. While it is not quite what the honourable senator was looking for, I trust that he will be reassured to know that a decision seems to be imminent on that matter.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, a number of senators in this place, including Senator Buchanan, are solidly behind this project and have a lot of local information that could be of value in ensuring that all relevant factors are taken into account in making the decision. What method can we use to make sure that these views and information are fed into the bureaucratic process at this stage? We will be debating the Hibernia project. I think there is a strong comparison to be drawn between the two projects with respect to costs to the taxpayer and the ultimate benefits.

It is clear to me that the Synfuels project is a very strong candidate for the kind of support that has been advanced to Hibernia, without in any way—I notice Senator Doody looking at me—withdrawing my enthusiastic support for Hibernia.

I believe this has to be dealt with as a major project. I would hope that somehow the views of people like Senator Buchanan, Senator Graham, Senator MacDonald (Halifax) and Senator Muir will be heard. I would hope that we will not let this be swept through the bureaucratic process invisibly, without giving this group a chance to be heard before the decision is made on it.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that these honourable senators and my honourable friend have been heard and that their representations have been drawn to the attention of the Department of Industry, Science and Technology as well as the Department of Finance. In addition to that, as long ago as 1988 we began hearing on a regular basis from the promoters of this project, one of whom, as my friend knows, is his former colleague, the Honourable Alastair Gillespie. From time to time I have had calls from Nova Scotia from various interested and responsible people in that province who are following this matter with great interest and agree with the honourable senator, and Senator Buchanan and others that it is a good candidate for this kind of tax treatment.

Various aspects have been looked at. One is the technical aspect of the proposal, which has been examined by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Then there is the economic feasibility, a key consideration, which has been studied by the Department of Finance and by the Department of Industry, Science and Technology.

I cannot guarantee a favourable result or a favourable announcement, but I think that, on the basis of the report that I have given, I can guarantee a decision and an announcement within a short period of time.

• (1010)

Senator MacEachen: Just on the economic feasibility or the economic spin-off, I am informed that the permanent employment generated over the lifetime of the Synfuels project would be 72,000 person-years, three times that of Hibernia, according to the figures supplied by the Minister of Energy, who has ascribed 20,000 person-years to Hibernia. There are also projections that the capital costs would be approximately one-twentieth of the Hibernia capital costs and that during the construction of the Synfuels first unit there would be 2,500 new jobs. So this is enormous, from our point of view. It may be picayune to those who work in massive numbers in the Department of Finance, but these are big numbers for those of us who are in support of this project.

In any event, I am glad that the views of other political people from Nova Scotia have been heard. I know that Senator Buchanan, in his former emanation, has been a solid supporter of this project and that the merits of the project are very strong indeed. I want to tell the Leader of the Government that he would have the support, certainly, of all of the Nova Scotia senators at—least on this side and I am sure on the other—if this would be approved.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, may I ask a question concerning ACOA? I am sorry, Senator Muir, did you have a question on the same topic?

Hon. Robert Muir: Yes, I have a supplementary. Thank you very much, Senator Stewart.

My question is to the Leader of the Government. In view of the fact that our former colleague, Alastair Gillespie, former minister in the previous government, has met on quite a few occasions with the Nova Scotia caucus, the Atlantic caucus and other senators, including Senator Finlay MacDonald, who has involved himself, as many of us have, in putting forth our efforts, I wonder how much more information the departments concerned require? I would hope that this project would be moving forward quickly. I agree very strongly with Senator MacEachen on this. The only point I want to make is that under the valiant efforts of Senator MacEachen in the previous administration many things were done to establish industry on Cape Breton Island, some successful, some not, unfortunately. We are now having the same thing happen with all that is being tried by the present administration. It is like déjà vu.

Can the government leader assure us that every possible effort will be made to assure those who may be working there that they will not be working for perhaps six months or a year and then, suddenly, it will be over? That is what I worry about. I give full credit to the former minister from Nova Scotia, to the present administration, to the present Leader of the Government and the present Nova Scotia minister, but I am concerned about what the future may bring. These efforts are made and millions go into them, under the previous government and under this government, and what happens?

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: That is exactly the kind of consideration that is going into the analysis that is now being made by officials of the government with regard to this project. If the project cannot get going without this tax credit involving, it appears, $200 million, will it be sustainable thereafter? That is the question that the honourable senator raises. In light of the experience to which he referred, and about, which we all know, it is a question that requires serious attention by the government before a decision is made.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable Senators, on the point raised by Senator Muir and replied to by the Leader of the Government, I am told that the financial advisors of the project, Wood Gundy, have stated that, if these tax credits that are provided for under the law—they are not special arrangements—were forthcoming, the rest of the financing could be arranged on the market, and the market would judge the viability of the project, along with the people in the Department of Finance. I make this point as one I am sure the minister will want to consider in supporting the cause, which I know he will, if he ever wishes to get a visit in Waterford again.

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I appreciate the point made by the Leader of the Opposition, but Senator Muir's point is well taken. The Cape Breton investment tax credit was set up five or six years ago. Fences were built around it. There was a time limit put on that program. The idea was—in light of the closure of the heavy water plants, the destruction of the fish plant and other adverse economic circumstances in Cape Breton—to try to kick start some major investments in the economy down there.

We have not done a complete analysis of the success or otherwise of the tax credit program during the period it has been in place, but I would have to confess, as Senator Muir indicates, that the results have been mixed.

Hon. John M. Buchanan: I have a follow-up question.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buchanan: I should like to pose a question on the Synfuels Project because I have been, as Senator MacEachen and Senator Muir know, an ardent supporter of the project since 1980 when Senator MacEachen, myself and others were in Port Hawkesbury and announced the first consortium to begin the coal liquefaction. There is no doubt in my mind—and I have read almost every possible document on the project—that it is feasible. I have been to Trenton, New Jersey to look at the results of the group that did most of the analysis on Cape Breton coals and particularly on the Donkin seam. They found that the Donkin coal was the best coal in North America for coal liquefaction. Over the years one of the problems that arose was the number of barrels of oil that could be taken from each tonne of coal. It started at two and a half, went to three, four, and now, with the process they have developed in Trenton, New Jersey, it is up to five barrels of oil per tonne of coal in Cape Breton. That is phenomenal. With the present situation in the Middle East the project is even more viable now that it was many years ago or even last year.

As Senator Muir and Senator MacEachen said, the amount of money required from the open market is substantial. We would be speaking of hundreds of millions of dollars. If private entrepreneurs and investors would be willing to put hundreds of millions of dollars into a project, other than what is required from the Government of Canada by way of tax credits and up-front capital, moneys would be very small in comparison to the total. So I would also urge the Leader of the Government to press these points with the Government of Canada. I have been doing that for a number of years, and I believe that we are getting very close to having the project approved; at least I hope so.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

INVESTIGATION OF FUNDING PRACTICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: I am glad Senator Buchanan intervened as he did, otherwise those in the galleries might begin to think that this was a Senate in which only Cape Bretoners were allowed to speak.

Senator Doody: He is one, too.

Senator Stewart: I also wanted to ask a question concerning Cape Breton. Cape Bretoners may not be the only ones who are allowed to speak, but Cape Breton topics are big on the agenda of the Senate of Canada.

I refer to ACOA and particularly to an article written by Jim Meek which appeared in The Chronicle-Herald, a Halifax, Nova Scotia newspaper. For the benefit of new senators, let me quote from Mr. Meek's article, in which states:

> ACOA was formed by an act of Parliament tabled in December, 1986, and given $1.05 billion in funding for a five year period. Then the Mulroney government blew about 33 per cent of that budget in the eight months before the November 21, 1988 election.

Mr. Meek goes on to state that the Mulroney Tories subscribed to that old electoral maxim: "Subsidize everything that moves, and pave the rest."

Senator Muir: That was done by the Liberals in Nova Scotia for many years. It caught on.

Senator Stewart: Mr. Meek then proceeds to say:

> "As a result of these boondoggles, the government has helped turn the very idea of regional industrial development into a laughing stock in Canada."

In The Globe and Mail there is an article written by Deborah Jones from Halifax which states:

> "This week the RCMP announced a criminal investigation into Technitread of Glace Bay, N.S. The company's Glace Bay plant operated for just four months this year and stopped production in August.
> The commercial crime branch of the RCMP said in a news release that it had been asked to investigate the company as "a result of a recent audit conducted by Enterprise Cape Breton on the Glace Bay plant."

The article further states:

> "Three days before the 1988 federal election campaign, Mr. MacKay . . .

and that would be the Hon. Elmer MacKay.

> . . . announced Enterprise Cape Breton would provide Technitread with financing, including grants of more than $2 million, to set up a tire retreading plant in Glace Bay.

Glace Bay is very close to New Waterford, a town dear to the heart of Senator Murray. I am sure he has been following these developments intently.

Could he tell us why and on whose motion that criminal investigation was initiated by the RCMP? Also, would he tell us, if he can, the present state of the investigation, and what will be the likely implications for the future of the ACOA program of a finding that money in this case was used properly.

With regard to the comments made by the journalist quoted by Senator Stewart, I regard those comments as grossly unfair. ACOA was announced in the first week of June, 1987. I remember it well, as I was the minister of that agency for the first 15 or 16 months of its existence. At that time, the agency was involved in taking under its wing a number of the existing regional incentive programs and developing new programs of our own consistent with the philosophy of the agency. So the amendments to existing programs and the creation of new programs under ACOA were not ready to go until about February 1988.

There was an enormous amount of interest in Atlantic Canada, and there still is, in that agency and in the programs of assistance, not just in incentive assistance but in other programs dedicated to economic growth in the area. An enormous amount of assistance was available to the private sector, and, of course, the applications were coming forward thick and fast in the early days of 1988. Whether or not there had been an election in the fall of 1988, one could have expected that there would be a pronounced level of activity on the part of an agency that had been set up the previous June.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I do not ask Senator Murray to comment on the police investigation. I asked who had initiated the investigation. I believe the language I used was, "on whose motion was the investigation started?" I do not think that an answer to that question would constitute interference into the police investigation.

Senator Murray has reminded us of the origins of ACOA. He has intimated that one of the characteristics of the program carried on by ACOA was to assist individual entrepreneurs. This story by Mr. Meek mentions that one of the projects was the provision of a private bath in one of the rooms in Mabel Redden's Sou'Wester Inn in Mahone Bay. I am referring to that, because I have seen other references to bathrooms in other homes. For example, there was one in Bickerton West, Guysborough County, Nova Scotia. Is this the kind of subsidization that Senator Murray had in mind when he sought Senate support for his new ACOA agency?

• (1030)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not familiar with that particular project, although as a frequent if not daily reader of The Chronicle Herald in Halifax, I think I should state for the record that Mr. Meek apologized in a later column for that reference.

Senator Muir: Right on!

NOVA SCOTIA

EFFECT OF FREE TRADE AGREEMENT ON TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Hon. John B. Stewart: I have question for Senator Murray on a different topic.

I am again looking at The Chronicle Herald, in this case. The Chronicle Herald of Thursday, Oct. 18, 1990, where we see the big blue headline: "Yarmouth Textile Mill to Close. Townspeople lose 330 jobs to Quebec factory". The story, datelined Yarmouth, says:

> Southwestern Nova Scotia is reeling after hearing the region's biggest employer, Dominion Textiles, is leaving the province and taking all 330 jobs with it.

The story goes on, and at a certain point says:

> Plant management says the closure has nothing to do with the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Tom Stanfield of Stanfields textile mill in Truro says free trade won't affect Nova Scotia's textile industry for another few years.

My question is: Is Mr. Stanfield correct when he says that free trade will not affect Nova Scotia's textile industry for another few years? If that is true, what is meant? Is it three years, four years, or five years before Nova Scotia's textile industry will be adversely afffected.

While Senator Murray is dealing with that question, will he assure the Senate that there is no connection whatsoever between the announced closing of the Yarmouth factory and the Free Trade Agreement?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, as I understand it, that factory specialized in what are called industrial textiles destined, for example, for the automotive industry. Not only was the unfortunate decision to close the place not related to the Free Trade Agreement, but the company would have faced much less favourable prospects were it not for the secure access to the American market of its industrial textiles provided for under the Free Trade Agreement.

As for Tom Stanfield's speculations on when and how the Free Trade Agreement might affect the Nova Scotia textile industry, I am not in a position to join issue on that matter today on the basis of a press report read into the record by my honourable friend.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, when the Free Trade Agreement bill was being examined in the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, Senator Murray, in response to a question from myself concerning the possible impact of the Free Trade Agreement on Truro, on the activities, for example, of the carpet mill and the Stanfield plant in Truro, Nova Scotia, gave assurances that the town had nothing to worry about. The statement by Mr. Stanfield implies that in another few years Truro will have something to worry about as a result of the Free Trade Agreement. Who is right: Mr. Stanfield who, after all, is on the front line of the industry, or Senator Murray?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator quotes a general statement made by Mr. Tom Stanfield to the effect that the impact of the Free Trade Agreement has not yet been felt by the Nova Scotia textile industry, but that this will happen some years down the road. The quotation does not go beyond that. Therefore, Senator Stewart infers that the town of Truro will have something to worry about some years down the road. I am not sure that the inference is justified, certainly not by the statement made by Mr. Stanfield that he has placed on the record.

To return to the Yarmouth situation, the problem with that plant is that it is quite old and has antiquated equipment. By increasing employment by approximately 100 people and injecting $5 million into the Magog plant, it will absorb Yarmouth's production. The problem with the plant has nothing to do with the Free Trade Agreement or with import policy. It is a problem relating to that particular plant and that particular company.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

INVESTIGATION OF FUNDING PRACTICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. Jim Meek is the staff comedian for the Halifax Chronicle Herald and was also the comedian on the Hill. He is a dear old friend of mine. He was the one who mentioned the lady referred to by Senator Stewart. I do not know the individual, but I am shocked that Senator Stewart would raise that question, because that is a personal matter.

There was expansion of facilities, establishment of hotels and bed-and-breakfast places with the previous government through the Cape Breton Development Corporation. This was done at great loss to the taxpayers.

This is déjà-vu. This government is having problems also. Is the minister aware that ACOA has done a tremendous job in many areas? Senator Stewart has selective amnesia. I can recall the Hustler products at the former Point Edward Naval Base. I can mention six or seven people who went back to California with hundreds of millions of dollars. But an effort was made to try to do something, just as an effort is being made now.

● (1040)

Since the honourable senator has used The Chronicle-Herald for his text today, might I suggest he read Psalm 105, verse 22, the King James version, which says something about teaching senators wisdom.

Hon. John B. Stewart: May I say that we have heard the present government and its supporters, again and again, seek to excuse its failures by referring back to what went on before 1984. Surely the time has come for this government to defend its own programs or to admit their defects and stop trying to excuse all their shortcomings by saying: "We are no different from the Grits."

ENERGY

SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT—INCENTIVES TO PROCEED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I wish to pursue the matter introduced by Senator MacEachen, Senator Muir and Senator Buchanan.

The Scotia Synfuels Project has been around long enough that we might expect some kind of a decision from this government. The leader will know that this has been considered now for at least a year and a half, the key point being the investment tax credit for private investors who are prepared to go ahead. There have been conflicting reports from the bureaucrats and those who have advised the investors.

Can the leader determine whether or not a meeting can be arranged to bring this to a head? There are more benefits and less risks in this venture than there have been in other megaprojects over the past couple of years. It is not excuse enough for the bureaucrats to say that they are not particularly in favour of megaprojects. There must be some way the leader, with his background and his knowledge of what this might do, can hasten some kind of discussion that might bring this matter to a head. I think this has gone on long enough.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I appreciate that point. I want to tell my honourable friend that his representation on this matter, and the representations of other honourable senators interested, are always welcome.

THE ECONOMY

HIGH INTEREST RATES—RELATION TO INFLATION—EFFECT ON WESTERN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I appreciate that the leader is having some difficulties because we have not had more than one Question Period since June. I am sure the Leader of the Government realizes that there are a number of matters affecting Canadians, including Cape Bretoners. We have now reached the stage, as Senator MacDonald has pointed out, where we have to clear up some of these matters, and some of them are of direct concern to western Canadians.

I have three areas of questioning today. I am sure the leader does not have to take my questions as notice, because I am sure he has been ready for days, perhaps weeks, with full and complete answers to the matters that are troubling many people in the part of Canada I come from. If he is not prepared to answer these questions today, perhaps he could have some answers prepared.

The leader should give us a clear statement on behalf of the government with respect to the government's handling of the economy. Have we had enough of this cooling out of the economy? Can we have an explanation respecting the $8.8 billion the Minister of Trade claims is being paid to subsidize agriculture? No one with any knowledge of these figures has come forward with any kind of list that would justify that statement. Canadians are curious about such statements.

We have also had two severe reductions in the initial price of grain being paid by the Canadian Wheat Board. These prices, of course, are set by the cabinet from time to time. We have not had a clear explanation of what the future holds in that area, which is extremely important.

First, can the leader tell us—and I am sure he is ready to—whether or not the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada have now cooled the economy enough, or whether we can expect more cooling?

I am not sure whether we are in a recession or a slowdown. I suppose we are in a slowdown, which has taken us into a recession, which in turn has taken us into a depression. People in the southeast area of Alberta and a large part of Saskatchewan believe that we are now in a severe depression because of grain prices and high interest rates, yet the Governor of the Bank of Canada ordered a number of small declines in the bank rate. Subsequently the bank rate came down by approximately 1 per cent. However, last week he ordered it back up a few bases points. Does that mean the Governor of the Bank of Canada believes that the depression we are experiencing in much of Canada has now turned around and that we are going to cool the economy down further, so that we can have a higher increase in bankruptcies? There was a 35 to 42 per cent increase in bankruptcies this month over the same month last year. Is that not enough for the government, or will it cool the economy down further so that more people will be in severe distress?

While answering those questions, I am sure he will be able to tell us now that this government has been considering for some time—the leader told us this before—some policies that do not require people 2,000 or 3,000 miles away to pay the price for what the Bank of Canada and Minister of Finance decide is good for central Canada. They seem to have their eyes focused on one area of Canada and are making the rest of the country pay the price for cooling inflation there.

Perhaps he could also explain to us whether we have reached the stage where the government will cool the economy in Toronto particularly, and in southwestern Ontario generally, to the point where people there will think they are in a recession.

All I am asking is what we might expect in the future, because the government may not have a complete answer as to how it is going to correct this situation. People would like to know what they can expect now that the government has frankly and blatantly admitted that this is a "made-in-Canada" recession deliberately brought on by the Minister of Finance. In fact, he claims he is less than three-tenths of 1 per cent away from the target he set some time ago.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I do not know what target my honourable friend is talking about.

Senator Olson: Government spending.

Senator Murray: Well, if the Minister of Finance is three-tenths of 1 per cent away from his target, he is doing very well, tremendously better than any of his predecessors.

Senator Olson: Better than his own record!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, in the budget of 1989, and again in the budget of 1990, Mr. Wilson stated that a slower rate of growth in the economy was expected, and indeed was necessary because it would be impossible to sustain the rate of economic growth that we have known in this country over the past five or six years without having a very serious inflation problem.

• (1050)

The policies of the government and of the bank have succeeded in bringing inflation down considerably to the point where, according to the latest statistics, the Consumer Price Index is at about 4.2 per cent. When my honourable friends were in office with a rate of inflation of 13 per cent, they were ready to chant a Te Deum when they got to 6 per cent.

Having said that, the government expects that while there will be little or no economic growth in the rest of this calendar year, economic growth will rebound in 1991. Indeed, if my friend has examined the recent comments of the Economic Council of Canada, he will see that it is predicting a rate of economic growth of more than 3 per cent over the medium term, which is far from the gloom and doom that is being purveyed by my honourable friend and his friends.

With regard to the honourable senator's accusations that we are fighting an inflation problem in southwestern Ontario on the backs of people elsewhere in Canada, I have to tell him that the highest rate of inflation in September, 5.3 per cent, was in his own province of Alberta. It was not in southwestern Ontario, which had an inflation rate of 4.3 per cent in September. He has that wrong.

Honourable senators, I may say that I do deplore the gloom and doom that is predicted, especially in my honourable friend's part of the country. In my own not infrequent visits to Medicine Hat, I have found the people there in a positive spirit, and not at all in the kind of psychological state that the honourable senator suggested exists there.

Finally, with regard to the price reductions in the Canadian Wheat Board, I will have to obtain information on those from Mr. Mayer, the Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds). Mr. Crosby's figure of $8.8 billion as representing agricultural subsidies has been put on the record by Senator Olson. I do not have an accounting of that. I simply say that a statement was made in the context of discussion of the positive proposals that Canada put forward at the GATT with regard to agriculture, which I am sure have the warm support of Senator Olson and others who are interested in the prosperity of the agricultural industry in this country.

Senator Olson: I take it from the minister's reply that he believes there is a great success story in cooling the economy down to this position. What is confusing about this great success story, however, is that the Governor of the Bank of Canada does not seem to agree that he has cooled the economy enough. The bank rate has been coming down for 12 successive weeks, I believe, but last week it went back up from 12.59 to 12.66. I do not have the numbers in front of me, so I could be out somewhat. I reiterate that that is why the success story is confusing. Are we on the way back up now? Is the level of inflation in Canada today high enough that the government believes it should raise interest rates again to cool the economy some more? That is obviously what the Governor is doing.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is being quite unfair about this.

Senator Frith: He is sometimes unfair, but never to you.

Senator Murray: The bank rate has declined for 13 weeks in a row. Yesterday it took a little blip, but these things are going to happen. Just as the inflation rate is in a downward trend, one could expect that the bank rate would follow, as it has been doing. This statement was made by the Minister of Finance as recently as yesterday.

Senator Olson: Well, why did the minister not say that in the first instance? We are asking for some clarification. Some people believe that interest rates ought to be 500 basic points lower than they are today. They were moving down slowly, but the Minister of Finance has always said that these things cannot be done too suddenly. I know that is probably a fair statement. They were moving down, but why the glitch when the objective is something like 500 points lower? The Governor of the bank did turn things around, and that is the confusing part of it. Perhaps the Leader of the Government could explain that.

Senator Murray: I do not have the figures in front of me, but I think the gap has narrowed between Canada and the United States. Further to that, as we win the war against inflation, the bank rate comes down. That is not to say that from time to time there will not be what I have called a "blip" in the inflation rate, or a temporary reversal, whether it is caused by the implementation of the GST, which we all know about, by oil prices, or whatever. The Bank of Canada will have to be sensitive to those developments.

The inflation rate in the country is going down. It was 4.3 per cent in September and the trend line has been downwards. Therefore, I think we can expect that, as the battle on inflation is won, interest rates will come down.

PERSIAN GULF

POLITICAL AND MILITARY SITUATION—IMPACT ON CANADIAN ECONOMY—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT STATEMENT

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, on another topic, we know that Canadian armed forces have been sent to the Gulf. Would the Leader of the Government make in the Senate a statement on the political and military situation in the Persian Gulf? Would he, in that statement, describe the extent and nature of Canadian participation in the efforts to roll back the invasion of Kuwait and to prevent additional aggression by Iraq?

The statement would be much more valuable if, in addition, it contained an analysis of the impact which the Gulf situation, if prolonged, is likely to have on the Canadian economy, on inflation in Canada, and particularly on the cost of fuels.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I should first note that our friend, Senator Macquarrie, has a Notice of Motion on the order paper dealing with Canadian policy and Canadian participation in the Gulf. This participation, as Senator Stewart has noted, is with a view to supporting an international effort to prevent further Iraqi aggression and to sustain and support the economic sanctions that were agreed upon by the United Nations.

I will certainly consider the suggestion of the honourable senator. If something along those lines could be prepared, I would be glad to place it on the record in the course of the debate on Senator Macquarrie's motion.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, Senator Murray may only be teasing us. Who knows when we will get to that particular item of business?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do know that Senator Macquarrie is anxious to make his speech. I should say, in fairness to him and to us, that the Department of External Affairs has not written Senator Macquarrie's speech. He will be writing his own speech. He is not, obviously, bound by cabinet solidarity on any of those considerations, although I am sure it will be an interesting speech from one who knows a lot about the area.

● (1100)

However, he is anxious to get on with it. I am fairly confident that there will be an opportunity for him to do so between now and the 30th of the month.

Senator Stewart: That is a helpful comment. If it appears that Senator Macquarrie is not likely to be able to go ahead with his inquiry before the end of the month, will Senator Murray lay on the Table a statement of the kind that I have outlined?

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, in that case, I would obtain one from my colleagues, particularly Mr. Clark and Mr. McKnight.

Senator Stewart: And you will lay it on the Table?

Senator Murray: Yes.

THE HONOURABLE PAT CARNEY

REQUEST FOR APOLOGY FOR ALLEGED INSULT TO ITALIAN COMMUNITY—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is with regret that I raise a question that I already put to him on September 25, which is to be found in the second column on page 2250 of Senate Debates. It relates to a CTV news reporter who had asked Senator Carney at her Vancouver home why she did not attend the swearing-in ceremony of newly appointed Tory senators in Ottawa. She reportedly responded:

> (I) wasn't going to drop everything to stand around with people from the Italian community while they learn where the Parliamentary bathroom is.

On the next page, she says:

> the allegation is completely unfounded, without truth, and should not have been raised in this house in this manner without any basis of support.

Honourable senators, the Italian community has been finessed out of this. An insult has been inflicted on the Italian community. The subject is still very much alive. In fact, as late as last Tuesday, this subject was discussed on an open-line radio show on CHIN, during which I was interviewed. While I accept Senator Carney's word, I should like to ask the honourable gentleman if he would ask Senator Carney whether such an interview took place, in what context she mentioned the Italian community and in what context she mentioned Parliamentary bathrooms. This is important to us to know, because if it is not true that the interview took place, then I will pursue the matter with Mark Shneider, the reporter who is supposed to have interviewed Senator Carney. So, would the honourable gentleman please ask Senator Carney the question?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I must insist, with great respect, that this is not a matter which comes under my ministerial responsibility. There is no answer I can give except to say that Senator Carney has made a statement on her responsibility as a member of this place on this matter. We have all heard it. My friend says that he accepts it, and that is fine.

So far as these additional questions are concerned, they have now been placed on the record by Senator Bosa. Senator Carney will see them and I am sure that if she feels that a further statement required, she will make it here in the house when she gets back.

AGRICULTURE

GATT NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF GOVERNMENT LIST OF FARM SUBSIDIES

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he will obtain from the Minister of Trade a detailed list, adding up to $8.8 billion, of farm subsidies. I read several lists that have been published here and there, but people want to know. They have asked me to find out what it is that the government categorizes as farm subsidies.

For example, to show honourable senators why I am asking this question, there is one report saying that food inspection carried out by the Department of Health and Welfare is classified as a farm subsidy. I would like to have from the government a list of what adds up to $8.8 billion so that we know what the government has accepted and categorizes as farm subsidies. Apparently, this is the list they are using when they go to the GATT negotiations. If there are matters regarding protection of the health of Canadian citizens that are classified by this government as farm subsidies, then we would like to know what they are. That is the reason for the question. I hope that he can do that.

Apparently he said a few minutes ago that this list was available. I wonder if he could give an undertaking that he will come forward with that list fairly soon. I would think that something less than ten days should be plenty of time. That way, we could know what it is the government classifies as a farm subsidy.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with regard to the latter comment by the honourable senator, I have been here for 11 years, and, if I may modestly say so, the record of this government in replying to questions put by honourable senators has been nothing short of exemplary. I recall only too well the backlog of delayed answers that existed when my friend was answering questions. Questions sometimes stayed on the record for years without a reply. Having said that, let me point out that Mr. Crosbie's statement in the House of Commons on October 15 was to the effect that Canada had had to file at Geneva, together with other countries involved in the MTN, an estimate of the costs of various programs in effect in Canada to assist agriculture. The total was $8.8 billion. That, of course, would include programs to assist agriculture not only at the federal level but also at the provincial level. However, I will see what documentation I can provide on this matter.

On the first point, my records indicate that prior to today replies to only two questions were still pending. Show me a time in the life of the previous government when the decks had been cleared to that extent and when answers had been given so promptly in the Senate to questions raised by honourable senators.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is a great lecture, but I do not really care today what happened to questions previously. I remember that I used to carry a little black book, and almost every question that Senator Murray asked I answered right away. There was not any great delay in answering questions. However, never mind that for now. I want to know the answer to this question, and the reason I ask is because the minister said there was list. All he needs to do is obtain it. He is now admitting again that that list is there. That is all I am asking for. We do not want this to take too long, since you have already published and used the list. That is all we want.

While you are doing that, perhaps you could find out from the people who filed this report whether or not the so-called Crow benefits of $720 million or so are included in it, and then find out whether the cost that the United States' Army Engineers bear to maintain the river system in the United States to haul grain to export positions is also included. If it is not, then we have the figures rigged against us. That is what we want to know. Again, I plead with the minister to bring in an answer in a few days, because, apparently, the list is already in existence.

Senator Murray: For goodness' sake, the important point here is that Canada made a very progressive and far-reaching proposal to the GATT with regard to subsidies. What we proposed was that export subsidies be eliminated altogether. We also proposed that internal trade-distorting subsidies be reduced very considerably.

• (1110)

We proposed a 20 per cent reduction in import fees and a number of other measures of that kind toward achieving a more market-oriented approach, which would demonstrably be in the interest of Canada. We put that proposal on the table with a view to receiving at least the same concessions from other agricultural nations. This is great progress in an important negotiation for our farmers and for the economy of this country. We all know that.

My friend is complaining about the way in which we may have arrived at the statistic of $8.8 billion without having seen the list, and he is speculating about what may or may not be in the United States list. I will do my best to get him the Canadian calculations, and I will put them on the Table as soon as I receive them.

Senator Olson: What does "as soon as I receive them" mean? People who are knowledgeable about agriculture and subsidies were shocked to hear the figure of $8.8 billion for the period of 1989 to 1990. It seems that you are letting the other countries rig the books against you. We think this may be bordering on incompetence.

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, whether we are talking about agricultural subsidies, foreign aid, money spent on research and development or science and technology, whatever it is, I am sure that every country puts forward its statistics in a way that will put the best face on its situation. But organizations like the GATT, which have highly trained and experienced secretariats, will put them on equal footing. So we are not comparing apples and oranges, but apples and apples.

Senator Olson: We shall see, but can you give us an undertaking that we can have the list in a week or ten days?

Senator Murray: I will obtain whatever information I properly can from my colleague, the Minister of International Trade, and I shall convey that information to my honourable friend.

NEW BRUNSWICK

PROPOSED LAKE GEORGE PROJECT—ENVIRONMENTAL PROTEST—REQUEST FOR STATUS REPORT

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable Senators, it has been brought to my attention that in New Brunswick there is a situation where a group of people near the Lake George area are opposing the establishment of an industry there.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Near where, senator?

Senator Thériault: Lake George. Do you know where it is?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Thériault: There is quite a protest ongoing there at the present time. I am told that the people in the area have signed a petition containing 600 names. As you are aware, there are no members of the opposition in the Legislature of New Brunswick. I do not know why some members of the legislature, regardless of their political stripe, did not sign that petition. It is probably because it is in the riding of a minister, and anyone who has been in politics for any period of time knows that back benchers do not want to offend ministers.

It is my understanding that the federal Department of the Environment is going to look into the situation or was going to conduct an environmental study. I do not expect Senator Murray to answer this question today, but I would like to have him provide us with an updated report on that situation. When he does that, he may also report on how the Prime Minister of Canada was received in New Brunswick with respect to the GST.

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I have no information from the government on the matter of the proposed Lake George project. My friend may be interested in hearing the information that was passed on to me informally from Senator Hatfield, which was to the effect that both the federal and provincial Department of the Environment turned down the protest.

Hon. Richard Hatfield: They said an environmental review is not necessary.

Senator Murray: They have decided that an environmental review of the project is not necessary. With regard to the Prime Minister's visit to New Brunswick during the last day or two, I was assured that it was a tremendous success. While the media took a great deal of interest in the 100 protesters screaming epithets, the Prime Minister returned satisfied, as always, with the warmth of the welcome he received and the positive attitude of the people of New Brunswick toward the economic prospects and the policies of this government in general.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I heard the advice received by the Leader of the Government from the former Premier of New Brunswick. I still would like him to give me a final answer, because I do not know if he has the latest information.

Senator Murray: I will do that.

Senator Thériault: If the Prime Minister came back happy with the reception he received there, I am glad for him. It does not take too much to make him happy.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to questions. I ask that the answers be printed as part of today's proceedings.

GULF CRISIS

EMBARGO ON SHIPMENT TO IRAQ—EFFECT ON CANADIAN WHEAT SALES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on September 25 last by the Honourable Senator Molgat regarding Embargo on Shipment to Iraq—Effect on Canadian Wheat Sales—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

> Hon. Senators, on August 7, 1990 in response to a resolution of the United Nations Security Council, which was co-sponsored by Canada, the Government announced a total trade embargo against Iraq. The Canadian government is reluctant to put embargoes on food exports, but in this case, it was necessary to comply with the United Nations Security Council resolution in the hope that it would help to expedite a satisfactory solution to the current crisis in the Middle East.

Canadian exports to Iraq consist almost entirely of wheat and barley by the Canadian Wheat Board. Most of the Canadian Wheat Board's shipments for 1990 has been completed by August 7th. Two shipments of Western Canadian wheat to Iraq were directly affected by the embargo. About 110,00 tonnes of Ontario wheat to Iraq were also directly affected by the embargo.

Although it is too early to determine the effect of the sanctions, the Government is monitoring the situation closely and will be considering all possible options to offset harm caused to Canadian grain producers.

GULF CRISIS

FAILURE TO RECALL PARLIAMENT FOR DEPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN TROOPS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on September 26 last by the Honourable Senator Grafstein regarding Failure to Recall Parliament for Deployment of Canadian Troops.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, the Government believes that it is important to respect the long-standing parliamentary tradition of affording Parliament an opportunity to discuss decisions to send Canadian Forces abroad for peacekeeping and similar operations when the number of members involved is significant and there exists significant risk.

In keeping with that tradition, when the decision to deploy the CTG was announced, the Prime Minister also announced his intention to pass an Order-in-Council and discuss it in Parliament. Since the deployment of elements of the Canadian Forces to the Persian Gulf represents a very serious commitment by this Government, members of this House may welcome an opportunity to speak to this issue.

As honourable senators know, the Order-in-Council was passed on September 15, well within the 10 days statutory requirement to recall Parliament, pursuant to the National Defence Act.

1990 PERSONS AWARDS

FELICITATIONS TO RECIPIENTS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable Senators, with leave, I would like to draw your attention to the 61st anniversary of the Person's Case, which we celebrated yesterday but, due to other circumstances, were not able to recognize.

Honourable senators may remember that on October 18, 1929, Canadian women achieved "Persons" status, enabling them to be considered for appointment to the Senate. This victory was won through the efforts of the "famous five" Alberta women who fought a lengthly legal and political battle in Canada and who finally went to Westminster in Great Britain to successfully have women considered as persons under the British North America Act. We remember with pride those famous five: Emily Murphy, Louise McKinney, Nellie McClung, Irene Parlby, and Henrietta Muir Edwards.

Since 1979 deserving Canadian women have been recognized each year on the anniversary of the "Persons" case. This year those honoured were: Geraldine Bailey of Westerose, Alberta; Thérèse Dallaire-Laplante of Boucherville, Québec; Jean Scott of Chilliwack, British Columbia; Délie Gallien-Chiasson of Shippagan, New Brunswick; Helen Hnatyshyn of Saskatoon, the mother of the Governor General; and Irene Grant of Winnipeg, Manitoba. All of these women have made outstanding contributions throughout their lives to the equality, education, support and protection of women and their rights in our society. I am sure all senators would wish to join me in extending congratulations and appreciation to the recipients of the 1990 Persons Awards.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE HONOURABLE JOYCE FAIRBAIRN

SPECIAL RECOGNITION BY BLOOD INDIAN TRIBE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may also recognize that, on July 21, 1990 members of the Blood Indian Tribe in southern Alberta recognized Senator Joyce Fairbairn as Morning Bird during a special chieftainship ceremony.

Senator Fairbairn was recognized for her outstanding contributions to the Blood Indian Tribe, and indeed to all Canadian natives. She said during the ceremony that she was conscious of the lifetime commitment she is making to Indians across the country resulting from her chieftainship. She also stated she is aware of the powerful symbol it represents. She went a step further and pledged to try to understand and support Canadian natives and to try to bind together natives and whites through co-operation and friendship.

Senators may be interested to know that chieftainship in this organization is bestowed on up to 40 living people at one time. She is joining a club of a total of 103 inductees since its inception, Edward, former Prince of Wales, being the first. Among others who belong to this chieftainship society are Prince Charles, Pope John Paul II, Ernest Manning and Pierre Berton.

May I wish Senator Fairbairn—indeed Chief Morning Bird—my very sincere congratulations.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION DEPARTMENT AND COMMISSION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN CERTAIN COMMONS AMENDMENTS AND FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON CERTAIN SENATE AMENDMENTS—MOTION IN AMENDMENT TO REFER CONCURRENCE MOTION TO CONFERENCE OF TWO HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to its amendments 4(c) and (d) and 8 to Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act;

That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 2(a), (b) and (c), 3(a) and (b), 5(a), 6, 7, and 9, to which the Commons have disagreed; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly,

And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that, all the words after the word "That" be struck out and replaced by the following:

Whereas

On March 20, 1990, the Senate informed the House of Commons by message that it insisted upon its amendments to Bill C-21;

And Whereas

Beauchesne, 5th edition, citation 814, p. 241, provides that in such circumstances, where the Senate insists upon their amendments, "the House (of Commons) either accepts the amendments or adopts a motion requesting a conference to which each House appoints Members";

And Whereas

When the Senate insisted upon its amendments to An Act to authorize the government to acquire by lease lines of railway connecting with the government railways in 1910;

and to An Act to confirm the Order in Council of the twenty-fourth day of February, 1919, prohibiting the importation, manufacture and transportation of intoxicating liquors and the Order in Council of the twelfth day of April, 1919, in amendment thereof in 1919;

and to An Act to amend the Judges Act in 1921;

and to An Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act in 1922;

and to An Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act in 1924;

and to An Act for the relief of the Depositors of the Home Bank of Canada in 1925;

and to An Act to amend the Criminal Code in 1933;

and to An Act to amend and consolidate the Excise Act in 1934;

and to An Act to amend the Farmer's Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934 in 1938;

and to An Act to amend the Criminal Code in 1947, the House of Commons requested that a conference be held;

And Whereas

When the Senate insisted upon its amendments to An Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act in 1936; and to An Act to amend the Customs Tariff Act in 1961, the House of Commons chose not to proceed further with the legislation;

And Whereas

When the Senate has by message insisted upon its amendments without offering any alternative proposal, it has never received a subsequent message from the House of Commons repeating that it disagreed with the said amendments;

And Whereas

The message received from the House of Commons on May 10, 1990, is without precedent, and does not conform to the convention and practice, unbroken since Confederation of settling disagreements between the House of Commons and Senate by a conference,

The motion be referred to a conference between the two Houses of Parliament.—(Honourable Senator Ottenheimer).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Ottenheimer yields to anyone who wishes to speak at this point.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, since the last time I rose in this House to speak on Bill C-21, on May 16, 1990, the government made no reasonnable effort to settle our differences.

Instead of using the democratic process provided for in case of conflict between the two Houses and calling a conference to find an honourable compromize, as it happened a number of times since 1867, Prime Minister Mulroney preferred to innovate and use strong-arm methods.

The government claimed this was an outdated provision of the Constitution. It did not stop him from making use a little while later of another provision of the Constitution, section 26, which is not only outdated but was never used in the history of this country.

Thus, Mr. Mulroney graced us with eight new so-called senators pursuant to section 26 of the Constitution by calling upon our Queen for assistance, which she granted willingly. Long live democracy! . . . These eight "senators" would ensure the dismal domination of the Conservatives in the Senate. We were already tyrannized by the majority in the House of Commons. Now, tyranny had reached the Upper House with the help of the "gang of eight" who, from now on, will vote blindly for Mulroney bills, appalling and backward bills like the Unemployment Insurance and GST bills, as well as any other piece of legislation, even worse ones, that Prime Minister Mulroney and his government have in store.

By appointing the eight so-called regional senators, the Prime Minister showed how much he despised our parliamentary traditions. Early in his first mandate, he was already acting more like a "President" than a Prime Minister in the British parliamentary tradition. The American influence is not only felt in the economic sector, it is also pervading our parliamentary system.

The same Prime Minister never misses a chance to put down the Senate and call, in his syrupy voice, for reform of the Upper House. He never mentions it in Quebec, hardly ever in Ontario, but Senate reform is somehow inspiring when he is in Western Canada or in the Atlantic provinces.

Now that he has shown his true colours by appointing eight senators, he will hopefully not even mention Senate reform.

This brings to mind an editorial published in The Edmonton Journal on May 3, which stated, and I quote:

> Nothing would be worse that resorting to the oft-decried favouritism and appointing new senators. It would be proof that the Conservatives in Ottawa never took Senate reform seriously. And that would mean the end of the Triple E Senate.

They are a rare breed but some editorialists are gifted prophets.

Truth to tell, they have little merit because in the case of Brian Mulroney you can always imagine the worst scenario and still never be far from reality.

As a result of his government's procrastination Bill C-21 is still in limbo, which is not without some impact on a good many Canadians.

Not to mention the fact that in the current economic recession context—a reality Mr. Wilson has just admitted after long hesitations—we can expect yet more plant closures and thousands of jobless people swelling the ranks of the unemployed who fell victim to the bad Free Trade Agreement with the Americans. How can the unemployed have faith in this government which kept saying that free trade would create thousands and thousands of jobs? Where are the better days we had been told to expect?

Bill C-21 points to more of the same for unemployed Canadians. Indeed the government was dishonest when it introduced this bill after formally promising that it would not tamper with the unemployment insurance program.

I have often quoted these words uttered by Mr. Crosbie during the last electoral campaign. This is one of the documents I always carried with me in a small address book because people I would talk to could not quite believe that the government, through Mr. Crosbie, had put it quite so clerly. Then I would reach for that little piece of paper and read the remarks made with such emphasis by Mr. Crosbie during the campaign.

[English]

"We will be looking at UI in a couple of years, presumably to see what improvements can be made or whatever, but there are no changes planned for UI". The article continued that Crosbie said the Prime Minister had assured him personally that "absolutely" no change would be made.

[Senator Hébert.]

[Translation]

Then again, why did the government decide to tie some long-awaited measures to a bad bill if not to make it easier for us to swallow the bad medicine?

Some of these measures could have been the subject of separate bills which would have been unanimously passed by both houses a long time ago, like two years ago in some cases.

How can we not believe that it was as a result of a simple political manoeuvre that the government packaged Bill C-21 with other benefit measures which it had to introduce and could not defer because they sometimes flow from court rulings?

When the court tells the government 'You have to do such and such', the government should act immediately. Shrewd as ever the government chose to put these good measures in Bill C-21. In this respect I might mention, for example, parents benefits, the obligation to meet the requirements of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms by granting UI benefits to unemployed workers over 65, and maternity benefits. How come the government stubbornly refused to vote on that routine and unimportant bill, which was passed twice in the Senate and rejected each time in the House of Commons, a bill that would have restored the variable entrance requirement of the unemployment insurance program?

Then again, for over a year now, as I have noted in my pocket agenda, I have met some sceptical people who were saying: What is this all about? That bill we are talking about could have spared a lot of anxiety in many disadvantaged areas of the country, well, that bill is only this big and is about the variable entrance requirement of the unemployment insurance program. Both opposition parties agreed not to debate the issue and to proceed with this bill without debate, as we would have done. In other words, it would have taken less than an hour of the House's time to prevent thousands of people from getting hurt.

But no, the government would rather have the affected workers put pressure on the senators and the Senate blamed for any inconvenience caused by the delay of Bill C-21.

But things did not turn out that way, which must have disappointed the honourable senator Simard. Canadians were not fooled by the Conservatives; they knew the Senate could not expeditiously pass such an important and controversial bill as Bill C-21. Their little plan was thwarted by the huge majority of Canadian workers who showed a sense of civic responsibility. Those who were directly affected by the government plan I just mentioned, those citizens who were deprived of benefits, which in some cases had been recognized by the courts, those people stuck together, knowing that even if they were suffering, a lot more workers would be hurt if this bill was passed.

I must have received about ten letters from citizens asking us to speed up the process. But I got thousands of letters and thousands of petitions, and God knows how many I tabled here in this house, urging the Senate to block Bill C-21 or at least to propose some major amendments in order to improve it just a little bit, and even then it would remain a pretty bad piece of legislation.

● (1130)

[English]

As I said during my first speech on this subject, the most pernicious provision of Bill C-21 is, without doubt, the government's complete withdrawal from the Unemployment Insurance Fund. This flatly repudiates the spirit of the 1940 act and the 1971 amendments. It also repudiates the Prime Minster's solemn promise, which was confirmed during the last election campaign by John Crosbie, as it was stated in my quotation of a moment ago, that the Mulroney Government would not touch social programs. The Prime Minister himself called them a "sacred trust." From there it is only a short step to conclude that the government has no mandate to tamper with the Unemployment Insurance program. According to several of the most important witnesses we heard, the lack of mandate and the broken promise would justify the Senate's blocking the bill. Nevertheless, your committee chose a more reasonable route and has proposed compromise amendments that a responsible government should welcome, recognizing that a good way to reduce the deficit is to create jobs, not to starve the jobless.

[Translation]

The few defenders of Bill C-21 were quick to suggest that the jobless were abusing the system whereas Employment and Immigration Canada admitted that fraud cases amounted to a mere 2 per cent of the claimants. The truth is Canadians want to work and where there are jobs, in southern Ontario for example, they do work. In Toronto, for example, according to the most recent statistics I just received, the unemployment rate is only 5.4 per cent, whereas it is now 11.3 per cent in St. John's, Newfoundland. Would you dare suggest that people in Toronto are better citizens than people in St. John's? The truth is there are more jobs available in one city than in the other. One of the underlying ideas of Bill C-21 is that the jobless in Newfoundland should simply move to Toronto!

To allow the government to cease contributing to the Unemployment Insurance Fund is in fact supporting its laissez-faire policy in the crucial area of job creation. As one witness, Mr. Mitchell Kosny of the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Totonto, told us, and I quote:

> By ending the Government's contribution to the Unemployment Insurance Fund, Bill C-21 eliminates a major incentive for the Government, which will feel less bound by its full employment policies for the have-not regions where the unemployment rate is very high and for the workers which are caught in this catch-22 situation of poor quality low paying jobs.

Moreover, what assurance do we have that the corporations which will be called upon to contribute more to a reduced unemployment insurance fund will not demand new cuts in unemployment benefits, something we heard from business representatives during our hearings? What authority will the Governement have to object to these cuts, or even to the privatization of the unemployment insurance scheme? He who pays the piper calls the tune.

To saveguard this program, it is imperative that the principle of financial participation from the Government should be maintained. The amendment proposed by your committee does not go as far as insisting that its contribution remained the same, but that it should at least be maintain in such a way as to cover half of the costs of the excess benefits necessary to compensate in part regional inequalities.

The Government would have us believe that Bill C-21 was supported by a great many Canadians. It had said the same thing about the GST. Those in favour of Bill C-21, the GST or the clawback are always the same: The big bosses, the affluent, the multinationals, all those who have everything to gain from exploiting still more the unemployed and the low income earners. For instance, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, this highly deserving body which is always the first to come to the rescue of the poor.

Of course, the Tory Party always feels that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce is always right. It is widely representated across the floor.

This side of the Senate would rather hear the opinion of workers which was expressed loud and clear by the major trade unions which represent 4 million members, the Churches of Canada, several Provincial Governments and all the voluntary organizations which have come to understand the unemployment reality. That is a lot of people—

I should like to quote some of the testimonies which are much more expressive than speeches, so that Hon. Senators may judge for themselves, especially the new ones, including the former Liberals who suddenly saw the light following a phone call from Mr. Brian Mulroney.

First of all, here is the testimony of Mr. Fernand Daoust, the Secretary General of the Quebec Federation of Labour which, as you know, represents a great many Quebec workers.

> It was in April 1989 that Minister Barbara McDougall tabled her new policy paper entitled: Success in the Works.

A very nice title, if only there had been nothing in this document.

> The document presented the elements of a new labour force development strategy the purpose of which was to redirect $1.3 billion from the Unemployment Insurance Fund.
> To achieve its goals and finance certain measures, the document proposed to raise the minimum entrance requirements, cut the duration of benefits, and increse the penalties for voluntary quitters without just cause.
> We must also mention Mr. Wilson's last budget in which he stated that the government will withdraw from direct funding of unemployment insurance beginning in 1990.

Thanks to the Senate, Mr. Wilson was one year out!

He predicted that the unemployment rate would rise to 8.5 percent in 1990, which means that there will be no less than 100,000 new jobless across Canada.

This was predicted by Mr. Wilson. He was going to amputate our unemployment insurance program but there would be more unemployed workers who would enjoy the benefits of this initiative.

Funding from the government was used primarily——to cover the cost of extended benefits when the regional unemployment rate exceeds 4 percent in one of Canada's 48 regions; the underlying principle is that the Government ought to take action after this critical threshold.

These are the origins of Bill C-21 in the government.

As the Forget report pointed out in 1985, changes in unemployment insurance are important; at that time one in four Canadians faced unemployment. In 1989—

According to Fernand D'Aoust:

—the economic recovery still had not affected all workers in Quebec, since the unemployment rate for the last six months of the year was 9.4 percent, i.e., 315,000 jobless.

He is of course referring to Quebec!

● (1140)

At the time, Mr. D'Aoust had no idea we were about to enter a new recession. A year ago he was talking about economic recovery. Obviously, that is not what he would say today—the government's provisions being equal—faced with a new and distressing economic situation because of this new recession.

Bill C-21, which will oblige. U.I. claimants to have a greater number of weeks of insurable employment before they are eligible, and which also reduces the duration of benefits so that the savings achieved at the expense of the unemployed can be redistributed to finance objectives that are, on their own merits worthwhile, is utterly repugnant.

The Q.F.L. believes that it is outrageous to ask the unemployed to finance training, parental leave and various other improvements to the unemployment insurance system by a reduction in their benefits.

The Q.F.L. believes that the issue is not merely the switching of funds from one account to another, but a deliberate policy to reduce the meagre financial resurces of the unemployed.

We cannot ignore the socio-economic and political context in which Bill C-21 is presented.

The Bill attacks part-time workers, those with insecure jobs and all those with few weeks of insurable earnings i.e.—

You guessed it, honourable senators!

—young people, women, old people and native people.

They will suffer most under this new legislation.

This is a re-hashing of the Minister of Finance's 1984 attack against the retired.

In spite of electoral promises that the Free-Trade Agreement would not threaten our social programs,—

You do remember how often we were told that our social programs were not threatened, that they were our sacred trust!

This is a first step towards downgrading our system to bring it into line with American unemployment insurance schemes.

That's where we are heading, no doubt about it.

This brief description would be incomplete if we did not say that these cuts seem to be a surreptitious adjustment to the negative impact of free-trade that will of necessity, according to conservative philosophy, be borne by the victims of free-trade.

The government has applied one of the ideas contained in the De Granpré report—

We all remember.

—which concluded that special programs were not necessary to adjust to free-trade, and that Canada had the necessary programs to do so. Bill C-21 shows on the contrary, that the government recognizes that it must have programs, but what hurts is that it will be done at the expense of those receiving benefits, and Q.F.L. cannot tolerate this.

It is unacceptable not only for unions, but anyone who has the least compassion. I am quite certain that that applies to many senators sitting across the way.

Ironically, one of the De Grandpré report's only worthwhile recommendations has not been adopted; it was to have companies pay for training.

We cannot go as far as asking a Conservative government to call upon business to contribute to the training of their future employees! They prefer forcing the unemployed themselves to pay for their training.

Bill C-21 does not take into account the realities of the labour market: the current employment situation, changes on the international scene, nor the fact that foreign competition has clearly had a negative impact on Canada and Quebec since the easing of the recession of the 80s. There has certainly been a decrease in the number of jobless and the unemployment rate since 1985;

That was a year ago, but now the situation is going to change!

. . . this has resulted from a disturbing change in the employment structure.

Keep in mind that there is a lot of tal about employment creation while we seldom hear about the sort of jobs created.

The fact is, the very nature of the employment structure has changed: there is more and more part-time work and jobs are more often temporary. Workers face increased instability and insecurity in employment.

We see workers in that situation every day. Along with everybody else, I heard on the TV yesterday that the famous canadian manufacturing business in which we take so much pride, Massey-Ferguson, was moving its operations to the United States. That means as significant loss of jobs for Canada. That kind of business move is so common nowadays that it can no longer be called news.

> The end of the recession is far from having eliminated unemployment.

That was what Mr. Daoust told us a year ago. What would he say now that we are entering into a new recession?

> Employment creation has taken place mainly in the tertiary sector. The jobs are often part-time, which means that a greater part of the population is unable to find full-time work; this part consists primarily of women and young people.

Part-time employment is a last resort for people looking for a full-time job. But since there is none available, they accept part-time employment in order to survive. And those part-time jobs make Government's statistics look good!

> In concluding, we ask the government not to proceed with this Bill C-21, since, as we showed in this submission, it will only add to the number of victims, and Canada does not need that.
> Instead, we ask that the government improve the Unemployment Insurance Act in ways that reflect social and economic realities in Canada.
> All Canadians must get the assurance that changes and adjustments caused to our society by the free trade agreement would not affect income security and would create real opportunities for adjustment.

Through Mr. Fernand D'Aoust, Quebec workers were not asking us to suggest amendments to Bill C-21, but instead, to squarely block it.

I may add—and those in the committee do recall—that many of the major and most representative witnesses who appeared before the committee were not asking for amendments. They were asking us to squarely block the Bill.

As you know, your committee resigned itself to recommend some very reasonable amendments, that the government has indeed rejected, without even accepting to discuss them at a conference provided for in the Constitution and asked for in an amendment put forward by Senator MacEachen.

● (1150)

[English]

I should like to recall some of the testimony of Mr. John Clarke, the President of the London Union of Unemployed Workers, a man who understands the situation of the unemployed more than Minister Barbara McDougall and her whole staff. His testimony impressed me very much. He said:

> I would like to stress to the committee that I am not speaking from the standpoint of an agency representative who deals with the individual problems of people on unemployment insurance but, rather, from the standpoint of the organized unemployed workers in our community as we go on about the job of trying to defend ourselves. On that basis I should like to point out that we see Bill C-21 as a retrogressive step of enormous proportions, indeed of unprecedented proportions. We would like to make clear that as we look at the UI program as it exists today we do not consider it to be some sort of gift; on the contrary, it is something that people had to struggle for very hard in order to win.
> I recall in 1930—although I was not a party to it—that a meeting took place with the Prime Minister of the day and a deputation from the National Unemployed Workers Association during which R.B. Bennett commented, with regard to the proposals for unemployment insurance, that neither he nor any government he would be part of would put a premium on idleness.

That is typically Tory.

> I do not believe that unemployment insurance is a premium on idleness, but it certainly was introduced. Whatever the weaknesses of the unemployment insurance system in this country . . .

and everyone admits that there are weaknesses in this legislation—

> . . . it has played a pivotal role in lessening the depths of poverty in which unemployed people find themselves. It has, in fact, ended a situation where unemployment is automatically synonymous with poverty, if not destitution, which was the case very much before unemployment insurance was introduced.
> I want to point out that after unemployment insurance, all that exists—before you are, if I may say, flushed down the sewer—is, in fact, the provincial social assistance systems which, in no way, shape or form, provide anything that might be considered an adequate income under anything that might be considered humane conditions for the unemployed workers of this country.
> In our view, the program has also been extremely important in placing some significant limitations on the capacity of the most exploitive employers to dictate to the unemployed conditions of work and wage scales. That has been an extremely important function of unemployment insurance in this country.

[Translation]

This notion has always impressed me, because in fact with the unemployment insurance Act in 1940 as well as with the amendments in 1971, we were taking a step toward civilization, toward a more civilized society. Bill C-21 does the opposite. We are regressing, we are going back to the law of the jungle.

[English]

> The drive to low wages is one aspect of the matter. The other is the question of forcing people on to social assistance. In our view, that move will be enormous if this bill is passed.

[Translation]

It is interesting to have some examples among us.

[English]

> I see that the municipality of Ottawa-Carleton projects an increase in the general welfare assistance case load of approximately 55 per cent as a result of the passage of Bill C-21.

● (1200)

> People will be denied a system of maintaining their income and forced onto an alternative system that is totally inhumane, that is totally inadequate, and that constitutes, in our view, a patchwork of social retrogression from one coast of this country to the other. Things are so arbitrary and are so inconsistent with regards to social assistance in this country that three provinces hand over the provision of social assistance to their municipalities. Two of those, Nova Scotia and Manitoba, actually allow municipalities to set the rates that welfare recipients will receive. In the Province of Manitoba there are municipalities that are paying people at rates that were established in the 1960s. That is precisely the edifice of social assistance on which this bill is incontrovertibly going to throw people, although possibly Barbara McDougall is not aware of that. Possibly she does not care. However, I believe that Bill C-21 constitutes an enormous, vicious and deep attack and I would urge this committee to join us in condemning it.

I also want to quote Mrs. Shirley Carr, President of the Canadian Labour Congress. That organization represents millions of Canadian workers. I think it is not only important that we listen to each other in the Senate, but that we listen to the people of Canada who have given us their views.

Mrs. Carr states:

> The committee must hear how mothers and fathers who are without a job will feed, house and clothe their families with no UI or with several weeks less benefits. It is important for the committee to also hear how communities, which will lose millions of payroll dollars through plant closures, will cope with even less unemployment benefits for their jobless.
> This committee should meet the thousands of seasonal workers who will not even qualify for unemployment insurance if this bill is passed. It is vital for this committee to discuss the reduced duration of benefits with workers who suffer permanent job loss because of plant closures.
> More than 70,000 workers have lost their jobs because of the Free Trade Agreement—

That was a year ago. Just imagine what the figure is now. Mrs. Carr goes on to state:

> —and many more plant closures are scheduled. These workers and those who will be the victims of this bill should be asked about the benefit cuts.
> As you know, the Prime Minister promised workers before, during and after last year's election that workers displaced by free trade would have the finest adjustment program in the world. Far from creating the generous and innovative labour adjustment program that was promised, this bill will undermine the most essential program to help workers adjust to industrial and economic change—the unemployment insurance program.

Mrs. Carr goes on to say:

> This is no ordinary bill. First, it proposes to take several thousand dollars from each of nearly a million unemployed Canadians in 1990.

Thank God that was not true in the 1970s; unfortunately, it may well be in 1991, if we do not see the light in the next few days. She continues:

> Second, it proposes to use $2 billion of UI premiums to finance programs now funded from general government revenue such as the purchase of training courses, resettlement, cash advances for business start-up, job creation projects, etcetera. Third, it removes $3 billion of government funds which now finance extended UI benefits resulting from high local unemployment and the shortfall between fishermen premiums and fishermen UI benefits. We are opposed to many other things in the bill but it bears repeating that the Canadian Labour Congress is fundamentally opposed to these three key changes in the bill: The massive cuts in UI benefits, the use of UI premiums to finance a whole array of non-income insurance programs, and the withdrawal of the federal government's direct financial contribution to UI.
> The cuts in UI regular benefits from higher entrance requirements and shorter duration are massive and much higher than the $800 million projected by the government.
> The government has done everything possible to keep Canadians in the dark about the depth and distribution of these cuts. The government has refused to provide information which would allow Canadians to examine the impact. The information they have provided has been self-serving and very misleading.

Further on, Mrs. Carr states:

> We believe the government is also trying to fool Canadians with its proposal to use up to 15 per cent of UI premium revenues to finance non-insurance programs. I am referring to the so-called training programs. This bill will give authority to the government to use UI funds for business start-up, cash bonuses to accept a job quickly, travel, the purchase of training courses, accommodation away from home and resettlement. The training wrapper on this package is clearly intended to legitimize the scheme.

[Translation]

Everyone will recall that the government kept talking about this fine training program that was proposed and that we were delaying with our procrastination. Of course, the government had cut the program's budget a year earlier and is now announcing it as though it were a new scheme, except that instead of financing it with its own revenues, the government is taking the money from the UI fund.

Some of our colleagues were moaning and whining because we were delaying the government's training package. How can you take them seriously? If the government believes so much in training, why did they cut $800 million before they even brought forward Bill C-21?

[English]

> Finally, I would like to express our deep concern about the provision in this bill which would allow the government to pull out its $3 billion contribution to the UI fund.
> The withdrawal of the government contribution, the massive cuts in benefits and the financing of non-insurance programs from UI premiums effectively shifts the bulk of the burden of adjustment to workers, and it is absolutely unacceptable that so much of that burden is borne by the unemployed. Parliament must reject Bill C-21.

[Translation]

It is interesting to see that such important labour abolition of the Senate or in other cases some drastic reforms we also wish for—that those organizations would come to us, unelected senators,and tell us: «In this instance you have the moral duty to exerciseyour rights as provided for in the Constitution. Even though we are against the Senate, we are asking you clearly in the name of our membership, because you are our last resort and the government is not listening to us, to block this legislation." I never thought I would see anything like this in my life.

It has been argued that Quebec's response to Bill C-21, since I quoted first a union leader from Quebec, was not as strong as in other provinces. Quite the contrary. All things considered, we have received, I have received as many petitions from Quebec as I did from other provinces, as evidenced by the thousands I tabled here in this chamber.

We received the support of a large number of citizens and volunteer groups including Action Chômage, which was constantly in touch with the committee and its former chairman, and of course the QFL, as I mentioned earlier, and the Confederation of National Trade Unions. These two organizations represent the vast majority of unionized workers. The Confederation of National Trade Unions has never been particularly fond of the Senate. It has never shown much sympathy for senators, but it came and asked us to block Bill C-21.

For instance, here is what the vice-president of the CNTU, Mrs. Céline Lamontagne, had to say, and I quote:

> The CNTU has 235,000 members. It is obvious that some of these members are more concerned, more aware, than others, because they are in a position to receive benefits. We have had considerable debate on this matter within our democratically elected assemblies. There was unanimous disagreement with Bill C-21.
> In that sense, our position is that of our members, more specifically that of the forestry workers, of construction workers, of fisheries workers, and even of some hospital workers whose jobs are precarious and seasonal, of restaurant and hotel workers who have been hit hard by this bill which will alter their working conditions and quality of life—

As you may recall, the Conservative members of the Special Committee of the Senate on Bill C-21 at first objected strenuously to the committee holding public hearings. I remember the cries of protest from Senator Tremblay, Senator Simard, Senator Robertson and many others who objected to those hearings. They said it was a waste of money and figured out how much it would cost to go and listen to Canadians.

I would say they were long on arithmetic but short on democracy, a little like Senator Castonguay, who said in a press conference, I believe, that he had figured out what it cost the Senate to sit around the clock. If defending the people of Canada means we must sit around the clock, I hardly think people are going to criticize us for what it costs in overtime for the guards, pages, and so forth.

Then the Conservative committee members wanted to botch the public hearings, as had been done by the House of Commons committee controlled by Conservatives who had refused to listen to God knows how many important witnesses. And our Conservative colleagues were particularly vociferous in opposing the suggestion that the committee ought to travel outside of Ottawa to listen to Canadians in their own provinces. We finally convinced them that we simply had to hold public hearings. They said yes, but in Ottawa because that would prevent less affluent groups from coming here. True enough, we did pay in a few cases but some people are unaware of the hearings, whereas when we go to Edmonton to hear evidence the people there are told in advance, they know we are coming and even the smallest organizations can arrange to appear before the committee. But when the hearings are held here in Ottawa a lot of information is required which most of the volonteer groups do not have.

Still the committee did manage to organize a quick trip to the small town of Canso in Nova Scotia and to St. John's in Newfoundland. I still remember the sarcastic remarks we had to endure from the Conservative senators about these hearings which they thought were a useless and needless exercise even though we held them over a long weekend to save them some time.

• (1210)

[English]

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Senator Hébert, that was a wild expedition. That is what Senator Simard said we were going on when we went down east—a wild expedition.

Senator Hébert: I had forgotten that. Thank you, senator.

[Translation]

Nevertheless, it was necessary for the committee to go and see how things really were in two municipalities among several that would be horribly affected by Bill C-21. And you know it.

We did not hear only from labour unions or from volunteer support groups for the unemployed. We heard ahd tried to hear from ordinary citizens in those two towns, from fishermen, workers, the unemployed and women.

I think I can say that we were all deeply moved by what we heard. Our resolve to improve as much as possible this bad legislation arose in Canso and Newfoundland.

I recall that even Senator Simard, who is absentmindedly listening to me, was moved too and that, in an awakening of his conscience, he even publicly promised that his government would bring amendments to Bill C-21. I hope, Senator Simard, you remember that you publicly promised during those travels that your government would bring amendments to Bill C-21. This is on the public record.

Senator Murray: He forgot, Senator Hébert.

Senator Hébert: He forgot, his memory failed him! Needless to say, we will all watch him, honourable senators, when comes the time to vote. Meanwhile, I am sure Senator Simard will appreciate that I remind him of the straightforward and strikingly true comments made by a humble parish priest in Canso. It was not a major union leader, it was the Reverend James W. Oliver, a humble parish priest in Canso. I want to quote what he said because it was one of the most moving testimonies we heard. Maybe it was the one that prompted that awakening of Senator Simard's conscience. I quote:

[English]

> I am pastor of the Star of the Sea parish here in Canso, St. Agnes, Little Dover, and St. Vincent de Paul in Queensport. Many of my people are fishermen involved in the fishery directly, and many more depend on this industry for employment. When the fishery is in trouble, the whole economic base is in trouble and everyone in the community and surrounding communities is desperately affected. At the present time the people of Canso and area, as you have heard, are involved in a life and death struggle to save their community and their livelihood.
> It is inconceivable to me that at this time of economic turmoil in Canada, and particularly in the Atlantic region, the federal government would seek to destroy the safety net we have come to know in this country as Unemployment Insurance. They do this in the guise of cutting the deficit. What they must realize is that this sort of deficit cutting is destroying the lives of the very people they were elected to protect. It is indeed small comfort to a fisherman in Canso to know that the country is deficit free when he is unemployed and unable to pay for his home, put food on his table, or clothe and care for his wife and five children because the federal government has cut Unemployment Insurance. What about the dignity of the human person?

this humble priest asked.

> As the Canadian bishops have repeatedly alluded to in their presentations to government, most people in our country want to work. People take pride, and rightly so, in being able to provide for themselves and their families the necessities of life. People take pride in building for themselves and their families and investing in a future, but sometimes, through no fault of their own, they are unable to do so because the work is simply not there. How are these people to maintain their dignity through these periods of economic turn-down?
> We in Canada have, for the past half century, said that we believe in the dignity of the worker and have provided help in the form of Unemployment Insurance when work is not available. This is one of those sacred trusts that Prime Minister Brian Mulroney said would be protected by his government.
> Now, it seems to me, in the interests of saving his famous free trade deal, and in the interests of keeping big business and the Americans happy, he seems to be ready to hang the Canadian worker and his family out to dry. This type of action is simply immoral and unjust.

"Immoral and unjust." Senator Murray, that seems to make you smile.

Senator Murray: Since my friend has dragged me into it, let me just say that what is happening—

Senator Cools: Can't resist, can you?

Senator Murray: —with Bill C-21 is that the whole regime is being vastly improved. Surely, the honourable senator did not take the Prime Minister to mean that we would never change a jot or a tittle or a line of any legislation or policy in the field of social affairs. The advantages of Bill C-21 are obvious to most people, including the premier of my honourable friend's province.

Senator Hébert: I am sure that that remark of Senator Murray's will greatly help the debate.

Senator Murray: Well, it will put a light of realism on the crazy remarks that you are making.

Senator Hébert: Yes, it will help us, but I prefer to listen to this humble parish priest from Canso. I trust him a little more than some of the people on the other side.

An Hon. Senator: A little more?

Senator Hébert: Well, I want to be polite.

Senator Gigantès: Don't sacrifice the truth for the sake of courtesy.

Senator Hébert:

> This type of action is simply immoral and unjust. Governments have a moral obligation to protect the ordinary citizen. Unemployment Insurance is one of the ways that the government fulfils this obligation.
> Another disturbing feature of this bill is that the federal government is seeking to remove its financial input into the UI system.

It sounds repetitive but it should be repeated so that we can be sure of what is happening to the system. The government is pulling out not just partially but completely. Then the parish priest from Canso continues:

> In my opinion, this will cause the death of the system as we have come to know it. The taxpayers of Canada have always prided themselves on being a generous people. They want to have their tax dollars spent securing the dignity of their fellow Canadians, helping the unemployed in their midst put a roof over their heads, clothes on their backs and food on their table. This government has a moral obligation, in justice, to continue on behalf of all taxpayers of Canada to fund UI and thus continue to provide a social safety net for workers caught in the vice of unemployment.
> Mr. Chairman, if the Americans call Unemployment Insurance an unfair subsidy, then we should tear up the free trade deal, not the lives of unemployed workers who built and continue to build this country. It is time that the Canadian government paid attention to the ordinary Canadian.

My, how we need some people like this parish priest in this house!

> The Canadian bishops have stated time and time again that the government has an obligation to look after the interests of the poor and the oppressed in our midst. The poor and the oppressed do not live only in the third world. They are to be found here in our midst. The farmer who has a crop failure, the fisherman or the plant worker who is unemployed because it is economically expedient for a company to close a plant—or to move to the U.S.—

> —deserve the right to know that the Canadian government will look after them.
> The net effect of this bill . . . will be to destroy people. When they need the help most in their lives just to survive, it will not be there.

Senator Bosa: Send them to the food banks!

● (1230)

Senator Hébert: Yes.

> One of the good things about Canada is that we do not let profit get in the way of our social responsibilities. We have fed the world for years. We cannot let this government destroy our social programs and call it progress.
> I ask that the Senate exercise its duty as the chamber of sober second thought and send a message to the government on behalf of the working poor, the poor and the disenfranchised in our midst. Strengthen our social programs, protect the poor and the weak in our society, use moral courage to destroy poverty and want in our midst.

I am not too sure, but I think it was just after this testimony that Senator Simard finally melted, understood that he was doing a rotten job, and stood up and publicly said, "Yes, there will be some amendments to this bill." Do you remember that, Senator Cools?

Senator Cools: Yes, very clearly.

Senator Hébert: I will never forget it. I never thought it would happen. He got a lot of publicity on it. He was even cheered. He was cheered in Canso.

Senator Murray: There is no point in trying to provoke Senator Simard when he is not here.

Senator Hébert: That is not my fault.

Senator Frith: I am not too sure about that. I am sure he is being provoked somewhere in this building.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard Corbin: May I ask a question, Senator Hébert?

Senator Hébert: Of course, Senator Corbin.

Senator Corbin: Who was the government's spokesman on this committee in Canso?

Senator Hébert: If you mean who was speaking the most, it was certainly Senator Simard. He would talk all the time and interrupt any testimony that was not to his liking.

Senator Robertson was also there with him. Both senators will gladly recall Mr. Frank Taylor's testimony.

[English]

the Secretary Treasurer of the Newfoundland and Labrador Federation of Labour. Again, that was very important testimony that shook us all. Do you remember, Senator Cools?

Senator Cools: Very clearly.

Senator Hébert: He said:

> When the Commons committee was here—

This is that famous Commons committee that was supposed to have done such a great job, according to the Conservatives, who said that we should not use taxpayers' money to listen to people in Canso or to invite them to testify in Ottawa. Let us look at the transcript to see the difference between the Commons committee and the Senate committee. Here is what Mr. Taylor told us about the Commons committee:

> When the Commons committee was here, I guess the only thing that outdid their arrogance was the shortness of their visit.

As we have learned in this place as well on these mixed committees, the Conservatives take most of their time destabilizing the witnesses who do not agree with government theory. Very often, they insult and interrupt them. Not only has that been done by the Commons committee but I can testify that that has been happening increasingly in our Senate committees. You see how the people in Newfoundland reacted to that type of attitude. It may even be better not to send any committee at all than to send a committee and then to be insulting by letting people speak for only a few minutes and interrupting them all the time.

He continued:

> I believe that the Senate is taking the right approach.

● (1240)

> I believe if you had merely rubberstamped this bill, then I think you would have been looked upon by the citizens of our nation as a group of very incompetent people, and I do not believe that is the case. I am sure it is not.

It must be fundamental that, when there is a piece of legislation that is so major and will affect so many citizens of our land, as many people as possible be heard from all parts of society. I firmly believe that, when the Commons committee held their hearings, they did not carry out the mandate that I would suspect they should.

I find it very disturbing that, in 1990, we would have to be coming before any committee and hoping to keep intact that which has been in place for so many years. As representatives of workers, we are deeply concerned that the entire fabric of our society has been torn apart by the vagaries of unemployment, and we seek economic equality for all workers regardless of age, gender, affiliation or disability.

Senators, we have been betrayed. We have been betrayed by a group of men and women who were elected to the Parliament of Canada, and that is unfortunate. In 1984, when the Prime Minister of this country was seeking election, he stated quite unequivocally that social programs, for one thing, would not be touched. He had not yet had his shoes off on Sussex Drive, or wherever he lives, when he set out to tamper with Old Age Security. The senior citizens of this country came together like never before, and the Prime Minister got a hell of a fright. When the Conservatives were out to be re-elected, they walked across this land of ours, led by the Prime Minister, and said that, because of free trade, our social programs would not be tampered with, and they even brought out one of the most respected persons that this country has ever known, Emmett Hall, to tell Canadians of that. Lo and behold, what happened again? We were betrayed; we were lied to. What have they done now? They have tampered again with Old Age Security and Family Allowance. The bill that we are talking about here today will bring nothing but hardship on individuals and devastation to communities. I submit to you this afternoon that they——should never ever be trusted again. If they tell you it is raining, don't run and buy an umbrella!

"they" meaning the Tories

Senator Simard enjoyed that one.

Now, what will happen if this bill is passed? First of all, premiums will rise by 15 per cent. The entrance requirements will be tightened. The length of time you can be on UI will be cut. Penalties will be increased up to 12 weeks, and benefits cut by 50 per cent for those who supposedly leave their jobs without just cause.

I have many quotes of so many people, but I will not succumb to the temptation to read them to you but will arrive at my conclusion.

[Senator Hébert.]

[Translation]

All those men and women we heard during our hearings in Ottawa especially, but also in Canso and St. John's Newfoundland, and who begged us to kill Bill C-21 could not be all wrong. I am trying to remember just how many witnesses told us that the Government's Bill was valid? I remember that Senator Tremblay was constantly trying to push the names of organizations which could have testified in favour of the Government. We never refused any of the names he suggested. In all (I do not remember the figures) I do not think we heard three or four testimonies which supported the Government concerning Bill C-21. I would be quite surprised if they were more than that. On the other hand, over a 100 witnesses asked us to change it from beginning to end or, otherwise, to kill it outright.

As demonstrated by the many testimonies I have just mentioned, this Bill will hit our unemployed very hard. By adopting Bill C-21, Canada would become the first nation in the Western world where the Government does not contribute to an employment insurance fund, beside of course the United States which are well-known for their understanding for the plight of the poor and the unemployed, the United States which are an inexhaustible source of inspiration for Prime Minister Mulroney.

Moreover, in 1992, two years from now, which is not very far, the deficit in the Unemployment Insurance Fund will reach approximately $3 billion, according to the Deputy Minister of Employment and Immigration. This is not a figure that we are getting out of the blue. If Bill C-21 becomes law, the Government will no longer contribute to the fund and, consequently, will have no longer much say about it. The major contributors of course will be the employers and the employees. How will the employers deal with this deficit? You found the right answer, Hon. Senators: They will insist that workers pay increased premiums and collect reduced benefits. They will insist on higher entrance requirements and will undoubtedly challenge the special status of fishermen. That is what we have to expect.

This will mark the beginning of the end of the Unemployment Insurance plan as we know it and which, despite its flaws, is one of the best in the world.

Of course, when the Canadian people elect, two years down the road, a more human government, that will be more concerned with helping the poor, among which the unemployed, than pleasing boards of trade—that is to say a Liberal government—the situation could be rectified. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians will have suffered because of Bill C-21. One thing is sure: it will be much easier to repeal Bill C-21 than to abolish the GST. This is no reason to allow a despicable bill to pass without at least considering the minor amendments put forward and, above all, demanding that the government authorizes a conference to be held to discuss these amendments, as provided for in the Constitution and requested by the Senate through Senator MacEachen.

I therefore call upon the Conservative senators' common sense and sense of equity. I urge them not to let themselves be guided by partisanship, but to vote according to their conscience, to give a voice to the helpless unemployed men and women of our country.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable Senators, I rise to speak in favour of the motion to ask the House of Commons to enter into a conference with us with respect to the proposed amendments to Bill C-21. I congratulate Senator Hébert for his speech and for the leadership he gave us in the committee during its difficult period of hearings.

Honourable senators, because of the hour, I am not going to speak for as long as I had intended. I will try to reduce my remarks, but I think it is important to look at the history of this legislation. In his budget speech of May 23, 1985, the Minister of Finance announced the need to conduct a major review of unemployment insurance programs. A commission of inquiry on unemployment insurance was subsequently created in 1985, and its report was tabled in 1986. The Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration examined the report and issued its own report in 1987. Up to that point, things had progressed as they usually do, except that the government obviously got cold feet. On May 15, 1987, the government responded to the committee's report by stating that in view of the general lack of consensus in the country regarding the proposed reforms, it had decided to stick to the status quo. The government, it appears, may have learned something from the tremendous uproar it created with its very first financial initiative, the remarkable deindexing of old age pensions.

● (1250)

While many of us may have breathed a little easier at that time, that period of damage control was short-lived. In a rather dramatic reversal of stated policy, for which this government has now become notorious, its true mean-spiritedness was once again exposed when in April, 1989, the government released a white paper entitled "A Labour Force Development Strategy for Canada". In this document the government sowed the seeds for the bill which we are currently reviewing, by making several astounding proposals including the major announcement that the government would no longer contribute financially to the unemployment insurance program.

During the debate on the bill in the House of Commons the responsible minister actually said that the bill would help "ensure that Canada is poised to take advantage of the future of unprecedented opportunity and to meet . . . the objectives of competition, confidence, strength, compassion and sovereignty".

Honourable senators, I do not think Canadians believe that for one moment. Rather than making this great nation stronger and displaying an element of compassion, this bill in fact reflects a true assault on one of the major social safety nets that helped to make this country as strong as it was before the Tories came to power and created the unprecedented "Made in Canada" Recession.

Besides completely withdrawing government contributions to the fund of approximately $3 billion and leaving the contributions to be replaced by employer-employee premiums, the government would also like to do a number of other things.

Honourable senators, I am afraid that the government will only realize just how truly uncompassionate this legislation is after the next election when they will find themselves out of work as well.

In all honesty, never in my adult years did I believe that the basic social programs and safety nets which the Liberal party developed and implemented over the years would be so severely threatened. I am proud that the Liberal party helped create a truly caring and compassionate Canada because it put people first. It is a terrible thing not to have a job, but the Tories seem to believe that unemployment is the fault of those without work. If there is one thing that the Great Depression, the recession of 1982 and the current recession should teach us, it is that "no man is an island unto himself" and that he or she is subject to many market forces over which one has little or no control. But this does not mean that society as a whole cannot take the steps to help the unfortunate through the tough times. On the contrary, we can and we should, because civilized societies are compelled to.

The Tories' claim that they have compassion is a joke, and they should be ashamed of themselves for even suggesting that. The fact is that this government has a very clear and obvious corporate agenda which does not treat employees as the valuable resources they are, but rather as disposable assets who are not worthy of civilized treatment.

I am afraid that if the amendments proposed by the special committee of the Senate on Bill C-21 are not adopted, this bill will mark a further step in the degeneration of this country, pursuant to this government's philosophy, into one in which the poor pay the heaviest price, the rich get all kinds of benefits without paying their fair share, and the government either turns a blind eye to the social injustice or finds excuses to justify unprecedented insensitivity.

In my judgment, Earl McCurdy of the Fishermen, Food and Allied Workers Union is exactly right when he says that "Bill C-21 is an attack on the working people in this country; it is an attack on small communities; it is an attack on undeveloped areas; and it is an attack on the basic, decent foundations of our country".

Of the various components of this bill I believe that the most startling is the idea that the government would discontinue funding the unemployment insurance program. Since the inception of the program in 1940, the federal government has been a financial contributor to it. At present, the government is responsible for covering the cost of regionally extended benefits, all extended benefits paid to claimants participating in job creation and training programs, and net benefits paid to self-employed fishermen. Throughout the past decade the annual federal contributions to the program averaged 23 per cent of the total program costs. Now the government expects this to be financed entirely by employer and employee premiums alone.

In an ideal situation, almost everybody would be employed and little or no contribution would be necessary from the government. Certainly, I hope, like everybody else, that government contributions will not be as necessary in the future as they are today. Besides the fact that the economy should always improve, the fact is that the government is facing severe problems in managing its finances. However, the complete elimination of government financial participation could have several dire consequences for the less fortunate in this country which we should simply not tolerate.

First, the premiums of employees will increase. The fact is that Canadians are already among the most heavily taxed people in the world and at some time or other I think they have the right to expect to get their money's worth out of government services. In addition, there comes a time when enough money is taken away at the source that the continued rise in the deductions will have a negative effect. The government is simultaneously proposing a new and unprecedented tax on goods and services. I think the overwhelming widespread opposition is confirmation enough that people have simply had enough of seeing the disposable income portion of their pay cheques diminished to the point where they are almost non-existent.

In case the government has not yet noticed, high interest rates are forcing people to avoid buying homes because they can no longer afford to pay the mortgage. The combined effect of all of these economic developments is not at all positive.

Secondly, there is an effect on the employer. Currently, their premiums are 1.4 per cent of those of the employee and would also have to rise. Do entrepreneurs, who constitute the driving force behind the creation of wealth in this country, not have enough problems and costs to deal with, without such a premium increase? The government should be making the creation and sustaining of businesses easier, not more costly and more difficult. During the recession, which is expected to last until the middle of next year, many companies will be on the brink of bankruptcy. Such increased costs will, in some cases, tip the balance.

The greatest threat of government surrender is the fact that it will be less able to influence the operation of the program. By relinquishing its responsibilities the government will lose its ability to control the use of the program and its administration. This is precisely the difference between the philosophy of a Tory and that of a Liberal. We believe that the government can and should do something to help those in trouble, especially if it is through no fault of their own. On the other hand, the Tories believe that the purpose of government is to help their friends.

I share the fear that many other people have of government withdrawal from the fund, and that is that there would likely follow more pressure from the business community to whittle away at the program. Pressure for further cutbacks would be advocated by employers under the guise of "economizing."

[Senator Stanbury.]

This is another example of the transition of this country into some sort of mere reflection of the United States. The reduction of government contributions will undoubtedly move this country closer to the American model, and if our unemployment insurance program was superior in the past, we should keep it so. In addition, the current underlying philosophy is that the federal government has a responsibility, through its general revenues, to address regional disparities and to help bear the cost of increases in unemployment. With the current high rate of unemployment in some regions, and the expected rise in the immediate future, now is not the time to shy away from one's responsibilities. I agree wholeheartedly with the special committee on this issue. The government must continue to contribute to the fund. It is as simple as that.

The next thing that I disagree with concerns the government's proposals with respect to fishermen's benefits. Part VIII of the Unemployment Insurance Act provides that the government is responsible for making up the difference between premiums collected and benefits paid to self-employed fishermen. We all know just how necessary this is. In 1988, fishermen paid approximately $18 million into the fund and received $269 million in benefits. The difference of $251 million was paid by the government.

Subsection 130(3) of the Unemployment Insurance Act would be repealed by Bill C-21 and would place the full cost of fishermen's benefits on to the UI fund, which is to be financed by employer-employee contributions alone. The government has declared many times that it would not take away benefits from self-employed fishermen and that these benefits are safe. However, by withdrawing its contribution, the government would be placing the future viability of these benefits at great risk. This could simply be the first step toward the elimination of the application of this program to self-employed fishermen. Business groups may feel that the government is not playing fair, and argue that if the government got out of the business they might wish to as well.

At the moment the lives of those involved in the fishery are very difficult. For the past year we have heard reports from both the west and the east coast that, as a result of a number of different factors, including the Free Trade Agreement, stock overfishing by domestic and foreign fleets, as well as the terribly low prices in markets today, numerous companies have had to lay off workers and shut down operations. We know that there is a crisis in the fishery. Earlier this year Canadians found out that the closure of some plants, such as the one in Canso, Nova Scotia, can cause towns to die if they are the major employer. By taking away the subsidy and making it harder to get benefits, as well as shortening the duration of these benefits, the government is directly contributing to the death of one-industry towns in this country. The Tory vision of a healthy Canada is one where the countryside is littered with ghost towns!

Clearly, the government's proposal is deplorable. Support for the program, and not abdication, is needed now more than ever. The Special Committee of the Senate on Bill C-21 has made a recommendation in this area to ensure that concrete steps would be taken to protect the benefits now provided to self-employed fishermen and to provide assurance that the government is, in fact, committed to the maintenance of this vital program.

Another area where the bill needs to be amended is that of benefits and entrance requirements. In 1977 the then Liberal Government introduced a variable entrance requirement so as to link to regional unemployment conditions the number of weeks of insurable employment required to qualify for benefits. Individuals who resided in regions with 6 per cent unemployment or less were required to work for at least 14 weeks before becoming eligible for the program. In areas where unemployment was above 9 per cent, the individual had to work a minimum of 10 weeks. This system and those figures are fair. Every year prior to 1989 the government had passed legislation to extend the variable entrance requirement prior to its lapse. This government has consistently refused to pass a one-line bill to extend it again. The Tories have manipulated things in such a way that on January 6, 1990, a uniform 14-week entrance requirement for all regions of the country, regardless of the unemployment rate, came into effect. Once again, the Tory mean spiritedness and lack of tolerance to those not as well off showed through.

Senator Frith: Heartless!

Senator Stanbury: Bill C-21 now proposes to introduce a modified version of the variable entrance requirement. Instead of a 10- to 14-week scale of insurable employment, a 10 to 20 week scale will be required. Regions with unemployment rates of 6 per cent or less will require as many as 20 weeks of insurable employment, while those regions with an unemployment rate of more than 15 per cent will retain a minimum entrance requirement of 10 weeks. Under this scheme, the government proposes that there be a 62-region system, in which, it turns out, only eight regions will meet the 10 week entrance requirement. While the government may be hoping that the regions with difficulty may be currently negligible, the fact is that during the recession the numbers will obviously increase.

Concerning benefits, the maximum number of weeks of benefits a claimant may receive is currently determined by the applicant's number of weeks of insurable employment and the regional rate of unemployment; and, as we know, the benefit structure actually has three phases. The government now proposes to collapse the current three-phase benefit structure to a single phase, found in Table 2 of the bill. Although the fundamental features of the current structure would be retained, the regional benefits under the proposed benefit structure would not commence until the unemployment rate in the region was above 6 per cent, rather than the present 4 per cent. The proposed change would therefore reduce the maximum duration of benefit entitlement in most instances, save for individuals who had acquired a large number of weeks of insurable employment and resided in very high unemployment areas of the country.

I come now to the area of penalties. Another area where this bill absolutely needs to be amended is that of penalties. Currently claimants can be disqualified to up to six weeks from receiving benefits if they refuse to accept suitable employment or leave their jobs voluntarily "without just cause." The bill, on the other hand, proposes some changes which the special committee deemed too excessive. I agree with that observation and I cannot see how any reasonable person—and I know that Senator Murray believes in reasonable persons—would fail to do so either. Bill C21 proposes to increase the minimum penalty to seven weeks and to make it as long as 12 weeks—double the current maximum. Can you imagine suddenly losing your job and income and, after paying into the insurance program for years, being told that you have to wait 12 weeks before you get your first cheque? The message to Canadians here is that they had better save because the government insurance programs do not care and for three months people may have to go without a cheque.

I had intended to deal with the portion of the bill dealing with developmental uses, restrictions to developmental uses, the plan and expenditure limits and contracting out, but I know that there are other honourable senators who wish to speak. Therefore, I will not take up the time of honourable senators to develop those points.

• (1310)

In conclusion, I should like to make some general remarks. I spoke yesterday to try to persuade honourable senators to accept the amendments proposed by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill C-28, the clawback bill. You rejected my advice then, as a Tory majority. Again, in line with Conservative philosophy, I suspect you will ignore my advice today.

In this case again, the committee has done an excellent job of proposing amendments that would go a long way towards humanizing this brutal legislation. The government rejected most of those amendments and we are simply asking for an opportunity to confer with the government to try to find a sensible solution. But it is against Tory policy to take a human approach to any problem. Only dollars and cents, apparently, have souls.

Senator Murray: Who is writing this stuff?

Senator Stanbury: It is against Tory policy to accept any amendments, no matter how good or how sensible, from the Senate.

Senator Cools: Senator Murray has a question for you, senator Stanbury.

Senator Murray: I wanted to know who was writing this stuff.

Senator Stanbury: Again, it is "our way or no way", according to the Mulroney government.

Senator Frith: That is typical!

Senator Stanbury: They will brook no interference from anyone in their single-minded destruction of the network of social programs that have been constructed with such loving care over the years by Liberal governments for the benefit of the people of Canada.

Senator Frith: Typical Tory patterns!

Senator Stanbury: In any event, I should like you to know that Bill C-21, the bill by which the Government of Canada abandons the unemployed of Canada, should not pass without a proper conference being held between our two Houses of Parliament to try to resolve our differences to the benefit of the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Doody and I discussed the possibility of changing the consensus of yesterday, which was to break at 12:30 and then to resume in the afternoon after 2 o'clock.

I believe that all senators who intend to speak on this order wish to speak next week, and, more particularly, on Monday. I trust that the people of Canada will take into account the rather long hours that we have put in—all of us on both sides—during the preceding weeks, certainly during last week and last weekend, and will not think us slackers for taking the half day on Friday and the weekend until Monday. Therefore, if Senator Doody so moves, we will certainly support the motion for adjournment until Monday.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): We will certainly support the motion for adjournment until Monday.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, October 22, 1990, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, October 22, 1990

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-37, an Act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on next Wednesday, October 24, 1990.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, Tuesday, October 23, 1990, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Honourable senators, I would be happy to explain the proposed motion if honourable senators grant me leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, two distinguished senators from Mexico are to be in Canada tomorrow. We have been told that they are anxious to make themselves available to meet with the committee to discuss the ongoing conversations concerning a free trade arrangement which might involve Canada. That would be the purpose of the meeting tomorrow.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION DEPARTMENT AND COMMISSION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN CERTAIN COMMONS AMENDMENTS AND FOR NON-INSISTENCE UPON CERTAIN SENATE AMENDMENTS—MOTION IN AMENDMENT TO REFER CONCURRENCE MOTION TO CONFERENCE OF TWO HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

> That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to its amendments 4(c) and (d) and 8 to Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act;
> That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 2(a), (b) and (c), 3(a) and (b), 5(a), 6, 7 and 9, to which the Commons have disagreed; and
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly,

And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that, all the words after the word "That" be struck out and replaced by the following:

> Whereas
> On March 20, 1990, the Senate informed the House of Commons by message that it insisted upon its amendments to Bill C-21;
> And Whereas
> Beauchesne, 5th edition, citation 814, p. 241, provides that in such circumstances, where the Senate insists upon their amendments, "the House (of Commons) either accepts the amendments or adopts a motion requesting a conference to which each House appoints Members";
>
> And Whereas
> When the Senate insisted upon its amendments to An Act to authorize the government to acquire by lease lines of railway connecting with the government railways in 1910;
> and to An Act to confirm the Order in Council of the twenty-fourth day of February, 1919, prohibiting the importation, manufacture and transportation of intox- icating liquors and the Order in Council of the twelfth day of April, 1919, in amendment thereof in 1919;

and to An Act to amend the Judges Act in 1921;

and to An Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act in 1922;

and to An Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act in 1924;

and to An Act for the relief of the Depositors of the Home Bank of Canada in 1925;

and to An Act to amend the Criminal Code in 1933;

and to An Act to amend and consolidate the Excise Act in 1934;

and to An Act to amend the Farmer's Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934 in 1938;

and to An Act to amend the Criminal Code in 1947, the House of Commons requested that a conference be held;

And Whereas

When the Senate insisted upon its amendments to An Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act in 1936; and to An Act to amend the Customs Tariff Act in 1961, the House of Commons chose not to proceed further with the legislation;

And Whereas

When the Senate has by message insisted upon its amendments without offering any alternative proposal, it has never received a subsequent message from the House of Commons repeating that it disagreed with the said amendments;

And Whereas

The message received from the House of Commons on May 10, 1990, is without precedent, and does not conform to the convention and practice, unbroken since Confederation of settling disagreements between the House of Commons and Senate by a conference,

The motion be referred to a conference between the two Houses of Parliament.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Kirby.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on Bill C-21 and to support the position that this house ought to insist upon the amendments it has proposed to Bill C-21. I not only want to comment specifically on the issue of unemployment insurance but also to set the government's changes to unemployment insurance in the much larger context of the government's overall social agenda and of its fairly systematic attempt since 1984 to erode the social safety net in Canada step by step and piece by piece.

Before commenting specifically on unemployment insurance, let me remind honourable senators that as early as 1985 the Mulroney administration began the attack on the ability of Canadians to get adequate social services by cutting back on funding the provinces were to receive for medical care programs and for post-secondary education under Established Programs Financing. In effect, the changes were begun in 1985 and included in Bill C-69. Things were then made substantially worse with the advent of two other disastrous budgets, which have further cut back on funding to the provinces.

The impact of the federal government's reducing its role in both health care and post-secondary education is that the overall quality of Canadian health care programs is declining. From testimony before the Senate Social Affairs Committee earlier this year, and when speaking to members of the medical profession across the country, it is clear the decline in health care has been in part due to the cutbacks in federal transfers to the provinces.

Those cutbacks began in the 1985 budget with cuts to federal transfers to provinces and continued in the budgets of 1989 and 1990. In fact, this is only one example of the way in which the government has allowed its philosophy to come to the fore; a philosophy concern for higher-income Canadians and the corporate sector, and not for lower- and middle-income Canadians.

Last week this house passed Bill C-28 over the objections of members on this side of the house. The clawback provision of Bill C-28 is one more example of erosion of our social safety net. Effectively, under Bill C-28, the universality of both family allowance and old age pensions was eliminated by virtue of the fact that Canadians with incomes beyond a certain level will have the benefits clawed back under the new Tory tax system. If that were not bad enough, as a result of Bill C-28 the threshold level at which the clawback will cut in will only be partially indexed to the rate of inflation. Over the next decade, the number of people affected by the clawback on Old Age Pensions will increase to 2 million from the current 500,000. This will occur precisely because the threshold levels will not be indexed and therefore more and more people will be hurt. Under Bill C-28 we see one more example of this government's attempt to systematically undermine the social safety net which it inherited when it came into power in 1984. In the eyes of Canadians and, frankly, in the eyes of many other people in the western world, that safety net provided one of the best sets of social programs in existence.

It is precisely because of the long term implications of Bill C-28 that members on this side of the house and Liberal members of the committee chaired by Senator Hébert insisted on two types of amendments. The first of the amendments essentially states that it is important for the federal government to continue to make contributions to regional benefits under Bill C-21. Since there are a number of new members on the opposite side, most of whom are not familiar with the unemployment insurance program, and in particular regional implications, I will explain that one of the things that was done under unemployment insurance was that in areas of high unemployment, higher than the national average, there was a significant contribution made by the federal government to unemployment insurance benefits in those regions. In a sense, regional benefits were made in large measure from tax dollars and not from dollars contributed to the unemployment insurance fund by employees and employers. The rationale for that was very simple. If we return to when UI benefits with a regional flavour began, we see that the rationale was that the federal government had a responsibility to ensure that people living in those regions of the country with the highest levels of unemployment were not adversely affected by that fact, since that it is much harder to obtain 20 weeks of work in Cape Breton, Newfoundland or northern Manitoba, for example, than it is to obtain 20 weeks of work in a large city in central Canada.

Therefore, the government said that it would be unfair to put the additional cost of the regional benefits on to the shoulders of employees and employers who believe legitimately that what they are doing is contributing to an insurance fund. As such, that insurance fund should deal with genuine insurance type problems and situations in which an individual finds himself or herself unemployed for a short period of time. It was the view that the insurance fund should not be asked to contribute to situations in which chronic unemployment takes place on an ongoing basis because of the state of economic development in the region.

Back in the 1970s a decision was made that regional benefits over and above the national average would be contributed to and paid for by all taxpayers through the Consolidated Revenue Fund. For those of us on this side of the house, that seems to be the most reasonable and logical way for regional benefits to be paid. To do otherwise—that is, to do what this government is proposing to do under Bill C-21—is to say this to employees and employers across the country. "You should not only be responsible for paying unemployment insurance for those situations in which you are temporarily laid off—in a sense contributing to the unemployment insurance pool—but you should also be responsible for dealing with the broader social problem caused in part by the fact that, unfortunately, certain regions of the country such as Atlantic Canada have significantly higher rates of unemployment than the national average and that the cost of those programs ought to be paid for out of the insurance fund." Clearly and effectively, they are not part of an insurance program. People from regions of the country—whether they be in the east or in northern Canada—who have benefited most from unemployment insurance regional benefits need to understand clearly what the long-term and relatively short-term impact of Bill C-21 will be.

● (1410)

Unemployment insurance premiums need to be raised because the UI fund will start to run a deficit. I should point out that when the minister appeared before our committee, he indicated that the UI fund would start to be in the red in 1992. So we are not talking about a long time down the road; we are talking about roughly one year, or 18 months at the outside.

The situation is such that when those premiums are raised, employer and employee groups in this country will take the position—not unreasonably, in my view—that they should not be having their premiums raised in order to pay for regional benefits, because regional benefits, by their very nature, are much more of an income redistribution program and an equalization program. They are not a legitimate insurance program. I predict that by 1992 there will be tremendous pressure placed on the government by employees and employers who say that they do not want their premiums raised in order to continue to pay for regional benefits. They will state that alternatively regional benefits should be phased out or decreased over time, thereby removing the necessity to increase UI premiums.

Next fall, because the rates for 1992 have to be set roughly one year from now, we will see a serious debate in this country. Given the position and regional philosophy of the Conservative government, we will see a situation in which, by 1992 the regional benefits that go to parts of the country suffering from high unemployment will begin to disappear.

It is for that reason that the committee chaired by Senator Hébert recommended an amendment to Bill C-21, which states that there should continue to be an element of government contribution to regionally extended benefits because we on this side of the house believe that those benefits are more of a social program and not an insurance program, are more like an equalization program and not an insurance program, and therefore should be paid for out of tax dollars rather than insurance premiums.

When this point was put to the minister and to several spokespersons on this issue for the government, their standard reply was essentially that they could not do this because it would result in significant increases to the federal deficit. When one examines that argument in detail, it turns out to be totally, absolutely, and utterly false. I will explain why.

If we go back to the origins of unemployment insurance, it is absolutely correct to say there was a Consolidated Revenue Fund into which all tax dollars were put. There was also an unemployment insurance fund, into which unemployment insurance premiums went. When additional dollars had to be put into the unemployment insurance fund, they were originally taken out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and put into the unemployment insurance fund. To that extent it is absolutely correct to say that under those circumstances the Consolidated Revenue Fund lost money.

Since this government came into power, it has combined the UI fund and the Consolidated Revenue Fund into a single fund. If one looks at the books of the federal government, in a sense there is consolidated accounting. The net effect is that it does not matter if an expenditure comes out of the unemployment insurance fund or the Consolidated Revenue Fund. If $1 million is spent out of either of those two funds, the government's deficit position does not change because the government includes the UI account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Therefore, if the government accepts our recommendation, which would require it to put approximately $1.7 billion into the UI fund, at the end of the year the government's fiscal position would be identical. There would be an additional $1.7 billion left in the UI fund that would not be there under Bill C-21.

The defence that the government has used most strongly in relation to our proposed amendments to Bill C-21 has been a totally spurious argument. Our proposed changes will have absolutely no impact on the deficit for two years' time because during that period of time the UI fund, as the minister has admitted, will continue to operate with a surplus. The argument is that on this side of the house we are attempting to ruin the government's fiscal position. I must add parenthetically that the government has done an unbelievable job of ruining its own fiscal position. It certainly needs no help from us. The notion that our amendments will hurt the government's fiscal position is simply not true.

Therefore, with respect to the regional benefits under UI, it is extremely important for members opposite—particularly those who want to vote against our amendments and vote for the government's position—to realize that, down the road, they will be left with the problem of explaining to low-income regions of the country, such as the Atlantic provinces, northern Manitoba and various high-unemployment regions, why they don't have a say in how the unemployment insurance is run.

Liberals happen to believe that a major role of the national government is its role as a redistributor of income and wealth, both to individuals and regions of the country that are most in need. It is precisely for that reason that I intend to vote against the motion before the house. I deeply believe that we ought to continue to have government involvement in regional benefits.

Let me turn to the second major issue covered under our proposed amendments, which is an amendment to retain full government contributions for fishermen's unemployment insurance. Senators on this side of the house have argued quite correctly that if we look at the history of fishermen's unemployment insurance, it was never intended to be merely an unemployment insurance program. It was always intended to be an income support program which was delivered through the unemployment insurance system.

If you look at the history of fishermen's benefits, you will see that the actual contributions to the U.I. fund by fishermen is only roughly 10 per cent of contributions, that the remaining 90 per cent of benefits are paid by tax dollars. The government makes a contribution that, in effect, pays the excess amount of money beyond fishermen's contributions to the fund.

● (1420)

The Liberal Government did that because it recognized that, as in the case of regional benefits, an unemployed fisherman is not unemployed in the normal sense in which one defines unemployment under unemployment insurance program. It is not an insurance issue. It is a seasonal and regional issue. In fact, it is a fundamentally important regional issue for some of the poorest regions of the country. Therefore, it is really—to come back to the point I raised a moment ago—the federal government using its redistributive power to run an income support program for people who need it.

During the decade of the 1970's benefits under fishermen's UI were significantly increased. In 1976 the period of time during which unemployment insurance benefits were paid was extended. Originally benefits were paid to fishermen beginning on December 1. The starting date was moved backwards to November 1, 1970, and the period of benefits was extended in the spring by several weeks to May 15. That change was made in 1976 to recognize the fact that, particularly in areas such as Newfoundland, Gaspé and other parts of Atlantic Canada, the fishing season was sufficiently short that the period during which people were legitimately unemployed, and, therefore, in need of some income support program, had to be extended.

In 1980, shortly after the election, another change was made to the program to make it possible for both the fishermen and their wives to collect unemployment insurance. That change was made because it was recognized that it was discriminatory to treat fishermen and their wives as a single unit for purposes of unemployment insurance when no other government program anywhere else in the country treated fishermen and their spouses that way. For example, it was felt that a woman who was working in a fish plant and whose husband was a fisherman should not be discriminated against. Prior to 1980 if that woman's husband was not a fisherman she was eligible to collect unemployment insurance. However, if her husband was a fisherman she was not eligible because the unemployment insurance went to her husband. So, in 1980, for reasons of fairness, equity and to improve the redistributive role of the federal government, that change was made.

Under Bill C-21, the federal contribution to the income support program known as unemployment insurance will be eliminated. The federal government intends to say to employees and employers across Canada, "It is now your responsibility to pay benefits to fishermen, to pay the extra benefit that people involved in the fishing industry receive under UI." By this time next year, when it comes time to consider what UI premiums should be for 1992, I am sure that we will inevitably find employees and employers across the country saying, "Wait a minute. The only reason our premiums are going up is because of benefits we are paying to people in the fishing industry, and those are not really unemployment insurance benefits, they are not really insurance benefits." What people will say that next year is that they are, in fact, income support payments and they will be right. They will then say, since they are income support payments, they should be paid out of tax dollars, not out of the unemployment insurance fund.

We might then find members opposite left in the position where they may have to spend the money they are now trying to avoid spending by introducing a brand new program which, to many of us on this side of the house, will be acceptable, except that we are trying to avoid that problem now. More likely, though, given the complete lack of compassion which members opposite have shown, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, on bill after bill, budget after budget, they will say to the fishermen of Atlantic Canada, "That is tough. We know you have a problem but we are out of money so we are not prepared to help." It is precisely because people such as myself do not want to put the fate of fishermen and their families in hundreds of communities across Atlantic Canada in the hands of this government, knowing how callous and unfeeling and uncompassionate it is, that we proposed an amendment that said, in effect, the government must continue to pay the full cost of fishermen's unemployment insurance precisely the way it does now.

In closing my remarks on Bill C-21, I should like to go back to a point which I made with respect to Bill C-28 which underlines the difference between members on this side of the house and those opposite. It applies not only to Bill C-28, but also to Bill C-21 and, down the road, to Bill C-62. The fundamental issue is really a philosophical or ideological issue with respect to the role of government in helping those individuals or regions of the country that are most in need of help, in recognizing that there is a significant role for government in redistributing income from people in regions that have it to people in regions that are extremely poor and are in need of various kinds of assistance. We on this side have a fundamental belief—and I say this as an Atlantic Canadian, particularly with respect to the regional benefits and fishermen's benefits under unemployment insurance—and a very deep and abiding conviction that the retraction of the government from the U.I. Fund is an abandonment of the fundamental redistributive role which has characterized Canadian governments for a very long time. The philosophy of this government instead is to redistribute wealth to higher-income Canadians and larger corporations by virtue of its adjustments to the tax system, that policy is fundamentally wrong and unfair, and has been since it was implemented in the 1984 election.

In my view, if one speaks to Canadians across the country—and particularly in Atlantic Canada, where a number of us were this this weekeend—one would find that the depth of passion and the real opposition to the philosophy and policies of the current government stems from the belief that those policies are inherently unfair, inherently discriminatory, and inherently lacking in compassion for poor regions and poor people in this country. If there is any group in society for whom one should have compassion rather than lack of compassion, it is the people living in the small communities in Atlantic Canada. It is precisely those people who will be hurt over the next 24 months by the proposals in this bill, and it is precisely because I am so strongly opposed to that consequence that I intend to oppose the government's motion. I believe that the Senate ought to insist on its amendments to Bill C-21.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, later on in my speech I will get back to the points made by Senator Kirby which are fundamental, since they concern the entire philosophy underlying Bill C-21.

First, however, I would like to recall what Senator Hébert said in this Chamber last Friday. Since we do not have last week's Hansard, I will quote from the text he asked his staff to give me the text of the speech he made last Friday, and I want to thank him, of course, for his kindness in letting me have the text.

• (1430)

Here is the first quote from the beginning of his speech:

> Since the last time I had a chance to speak in this Chamber on Bill C-21, on May 16 1990, no reasonable effort has been made by the government to resolve our differences.

However, on the particular occasion to which he referred, on May 16, 1990, Senator Hébert admitted that the government had accepted a number of the amendments proposed by the Senate. The following is taken from his speech as printed in Hansard, and I quote:

Although it continued its harsh criticism of the Senate and its senators, the government has nevertheless accepted a number of our amendments, not necessarily the most important ones, although the amendment dealing with the security of fishermen is certainly not negligible.

Although this was said grudgingly, the amendments accepted by the House of Commons were nevertheless significant enough for the senator to congratulate the special committee which he himself chaired for having proposed them. Here is another quote:

If the Special Committee had not done its job, these amendments would never have been included in Bill C-21. It is not enough, but it proves that the Senate has played a useful role.

I may add that the government has been equally understanding. However, Senator Hébert and his colleagues were not going to be satisfied with the amendments accepted by the Commons, even if some of those amendments, as I said before, were certainly not negligible, as Senator Hébert said. In their view, the Senate should continue to play its obstructionist role, and do so—and I quote:

> —to the very end, by insisting on amendments the government has yet to accept.

Faced with the government's decision to make no further concessions, we finally had the situation reflected in the wording of the item that has been on the Orders of the Day since May 23 and which we started debating last Friday.

I refer to Senator Doody's motion:

> That the Senate not insist on its amendments—

Followed by 2(a), (b), and so forth.

> —to which the Commons have disagreed;

We also have Senator MacEachen's motion in amendment:

> That the motion be referred to a conference between the two Houses of Parliament.

Senator Hébert stated last Friday that nothing had been done since these two contradictory motions were placed on the agenda of this Chamber. He did not bother to ask why this was so. I think the reasons are quite obvious.

If we talk about substance, the government had already done quite a bit that was reasonable. The amendments on which the Senate continued to insist contradicted the fundamental orientation of Bill C-21. The message received from the House of Commons on May 10 was quite clear in that respect. I quote:

> Ordered, that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House continues to disagree with—the amendments listed.

> —because this House believes that they contradict the principles of the bill and undermine the objectives of the policy.

In other words, there is a fundamental disagreement on substance.

As for the MacEachen proposal for a conference between the two Chambers, Senator Roblin argued, and rightly so, in his comments on May 23, that such a conference was meaningless, considering the irreconcilable nature of the positions taken on either side. This is what he said:

[English]

> I ask myself: "To what end is this free conference, apart from being another stage of the tactics of my friends opposite to keep this issue before the public . . . ?" If the conference is to consider whether they should insist on their financial amendment, it is not likely that they will get an affirmative response from the other side . . . If my honourable friend tells me that he is prepared to not insist on his financial amendment, then I would tell him that he does not need a conference to do that. He can do it right now in this house. However, I suspect that that is not what he intends to do. He intends to go to this conference and hold his ground. He has given us the reasons . . . why he thinks he is entitled to hold his ground. The effect of that, of course, is a nullity, the effect of that is another standoff. The effect of that is that it gets us nowhere, but it gets my honourable friend on what he considers to be more comfortable grounds than the one he is on right now.

[Translation]

Now the time has come for us to decide the ultimate fate of Bill C-21. I feel it may be appropriate at this point in the decision making process to adopt a positive approach and to point out the main reasons for which, in my opinion, Bill C-21 should be passed.

The first aspect and the most decisive in my opinion relates to the financing of the Unemployment Insurance and the benefits of the new system. The shift is obviously major. It is also the aspect the hon. senators on the other side most radically oppose, as senator Kirby just showed us in his speech.

As senator Hébert is concerned, in his usual style—he relishes immoderate language—he was telling us again Friday, and I quote:

● (1440)

[English]

> The most pernicious provision of Bill C-21 is, without any doubt, the government's complete withdrawal from the Unemployment Fund.

[Senator Tremblay.]

[Translation]

To put it more precisely and more positively, the major change stemming from Bill C-21 is this: henceforth, all benefits whatsoever will be financed directly through employer-employee contributions, not by means of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

That, however, does not mean, as Senator Hébert claimed, that the government will quite simply stop contributing to unemployment insurance funding. It means that from here on in it will do so exclusively in its capacity as employer. In other words the government will no longer collect money from Canadian taxpayers to finance the unemployment insurance program and the various benefits prescribed in the law. It will contribute as employer, period. The government as employer and its employees are part and parcel of the system.

The result of this new approach is that employer-employee contributions will be big enough to ensure that the system is self-sustaining.

This is where I should like to comment on the approach taken earlier by Senator Kirby.

If I understood him correctly, employers and employees in economically strong regions—or where the unemployment rate is low—should not be expected to contribute to financing the benefits paid out in economically weaker regions. As I recall, standards would be based on a reference to national averages.

In other words, low-risk regions should not have to contribute to finance high-risk regions. The difference between what might be described as average conditions and marginal conditions in high-risk regions ought to be made up through the consolidated fund and general public revenues, while all along maintaining the concept of insurance.

The way I see it, however, insurance implies that lower risks compensate for higher risks.

I really do not understand on the basis of what rationale such an approach could be taken towards a wage loss replacement plan. If, for that matter the burden of the income loss is to be compensated out of the General Revenue Fund, we must wonder under these circumstances who are the people represented by the State? They are everybody, including our senior citizens, those who have a very low taxable income under the current tax system and who must pay income tax.

This is a denial in its very principle of any wage loss replacement plan, which should not be assuming the income support role of the State for workers who have to deal with unemployment insurance in their regions, the differences between the regions being an integral part of the scheme.

Unfortunately, Senator Kirby is not here. I do not exclude the possibility that I may have missed some of the things he said but what I have retained of it is what I have just stated. If I have misrepresented what he said, I do not object to having him correcting me.

There was a time when unemployment insurance premiums were established on the basis of the risk of becoming unemployed so much so that certain groups of workers, including civil servants, were not part of the plan because their risk being quite limited, there was no reason to cover them. For that reason, they were not part of the scheme. This changed several years ago based on the principle which I have just mentioned, namely that this category of employees which represented a low risk had to contribute to the scheme to compensate for the other categories which represented a higher risk.

That is my first point. The second point I want to deal with is that of the entrance requirements. On what basis will legitimate claimants be identified? For a good many years, it has been recognized that the entrance requirements for unemployment benefits would be unfair if they were the same for all and did not take into account the various unemployment rates and employment opportunities from one area to the next. The government therefore decided to take into account this quite obvious and unquestionable reality.

Unfortunately, it did so before introducing Bill C-21, so that Parliament had to deal every year with a new legislation establishing new variable entrance requirements, without knowing whether the minimum number of weeks would be 14, as provided for in this bill or ten weeks as provided in the current legislation.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: There is a good reason for that.

Senator Tremblay: I think I have summarized quite objectively that Bill C-21 will establish permanently a situation which was only temporary and therefore uncertain in high unemployment regions. This bill states specifically that claimants will be paid allowances after ten weeks of employment if they are located in a high unemployment region.

● (1450)

Senator Thériault: Sixteen per cent.

Senator Tremblay: On the other hand the number of work week will be higher if the rate of unemployment is lower. The table on page 36 of the bill clearly shows that the number of weeks required varies according to the unemployment rate.

To a certain extent the third point flows from the second: it seems obvious to me that unemployment benefits ought to be paid only to people who are really or legitimately unemployed, if I can put it that way, namely men and women who, against their will, find themselves without a job.

In this respect Bill C-21 contains provisions aimed at correcting situations about which the least that can be said is that they smack of abuse. Past experiences attest to the fact that they do exist. However I am prepared to admit that from a statistician's perspective these are marginal cases. Still the fact remains that to the extent possible and in all fairness for other "legitimate" UI recipients the system ought to eliminate unjustified claimants.

The fourth point has to do with recycling and training, and in that respect Canada lags far behind the other industrialized countries against which we have to compete on world markets. One of the major characteristics of Bill C-21 is that it takes an uncontestably sound approach. How many productive jobs remain vacant because the employer simply cannot find the skilled labour to fill them?

Of course the first responsibility of our school systems is to make young people and adult Canadians anxious to complete their education fully qualified to land these productive jobs so as to meet the requirements of an ever changing labour market.

However, we should realize that a satisfactory unemployment insurance system can in fact help its own target population fill such gaps by giving it an opportunity to do so.

How can this be done? This is exactly where Bill C-21 will make an outstanding contribution. It does so by providing substantial additional funding for training and retraining UI recipients.

In this way, many recipients will see better chances of re-employment when they acquire skills more in line with today's needs, thanks to the opportunities they are given under Bill C-21 with the co-operation of industry and educational institutions.

My fifth point is this: in a similar perspective, Bill C-21 also contains measures designed to encourage recipients to accelerate their return to productive employment. They will be given incentives for accepting employment quickly, either in the form of bonuses or temporary income supplements. The bill also provides assistance for recipients who create businesses or become self-employed.

In concluding, I wish to mention two other measures. The first one, and I will be brief, concerns parental and maternity benefits which have been improved. These, combined with sickness benefits, can add up to 30 weeks of benefits. Furthermore, at the present time, persons who are 65 and over and remain employed are not entitled to pay unemployment insurance premiums, so that if they become unemployed, they cannot claim benefits. Bill C-21 corrects this gap in our legislation.

Honourable senators, I realize that these few comments in support of Bill C-21 are far from exhaustive. Other aspects will, I am sure, be mentioned by other colleagues who will take part in this final debate on the bill.

Personally, I see no justification for a conference, as it says in the item on the Orders of the Day, since the chances of reconciling the views of the Senate and the House of Commons are practically nil, as was pointed out quite vigorously by Senator Roblin, whom I quoted earlier.

Furthermore, the bill before us today contains, as I hope I was able to demonstrate, enough positive aspects that make me most anxious to support the motion of Senator Doody that a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate no longer insists on its amendments to Bill C-21.

[English]

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on Bill C-21 and I do not know whether I should start by crying or cursing. However, as it is not proper to do either in this house, I will try to explain briefly my feelings on the decision of this ruthless, neo-Conservative government determined as ever to attack the weak, the old, the poor and the unemployed and give free rein to the rich and powerful.

● (1500)

[Translation]

Having listened attentively to my learned colleague Senator Tremblay, honourable senators, I must say he succeeded very poorly in his efforts to defend this government's policy as reflected in Bill C-21.

When he was about to complete his remarks, Senator Tremblay invented somewhat some items which are exempted from Bill C-21, including such motherhood items as the benefits paid to parents, mothers and senior people over 65 years of age. Honourable senators, Senator Tremblay forgot to mention that it was not out of the government's generosity that these amendments were made to Bill C-21, but thank goodness for the decision of a Canadian tribunal who ruled that the people over 65 years of age could qualify for unemployment insurance benefits, and that people who adopted or had adopted children were entitled to unemployment insurance benefits as is now the case under Bill C-21.

Senator Tremblay tried to defend the philosophy reflected in Bill C-21, which is the opposite of the philosophy which inspired the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party which, together, represent the vast majority of voters in this country. Because it appears impossible to block Bill C-21, I personally find some comfort in the expectation that within a couple of years, this neo-conservative majority which currently exists in the House of Commons will have disappeared and we will rediscover the philosophy and responsibility of a government anxious to care for the weak, the old, the poor, the unemployed.

To achieve its goal, what has this Government done since 1988 with Bill C-21? It has taken advantage of fishermen, of seasonal workers, especially those working in the fishing and forest industries in the Atlantic provinces by refusing to maintain the provisions which had been passed every year since 1977 and which provided coverage for these people in high unemployment regions.

[English]

Honourable senators, what is happening in this country? We have a government and a Prime Minister determined to destroy the social security net which has existed in this country since the last war. They are determined to destroy and to attack the weak and to give free rein to the rich and the powerful.

I wonder today, as I did when I last addressed this house on Bill C-21, how people whom I have known all my life, people with a social conscience, can sleep at night knowing that they will be depriving the poorest of the poor, including the people in my area, as well as natives in northern areas. At the same time, they know that all the legislation which we have passed in this house since 1984 has made it easier for the wealthy who are paying fewer taxes.

[Senator Thériault.]

I have before me a prepared text on which I worked for a long time, but I cannot find the peace of mind to refer to it. When I look up I see in front of me senators from Atlantic Canada. I ask them to ask themselves these questions before they vote on this bill. Why are you here? Did you come here simply to pass the GST, or did you come here, and do you sit here, with a free conscience to help your fellow citizens?

Honourable senators, I ask you to ask yourselves this question. Why is it that the rich and the powerful never have anything to say against medicare? It would be easier and cheaper for the big corporations and for the people with millions of dollars in bank accounts to pay for their own medicare coverage than to contribute to it as they do now through the taxation system. Thank goodness that the government has not dared to touch that philosophy concerning medicare. It is the only thing that it has not touched. Yet, it is that type of philosophy which is responsible for unemployment insurance in Canada as well as for the universality of old age pensions. I point out that we all know that when programs are designed for poor people and for poor people alone they become poor programs.

What we now in England is the result of what I hope is the last of this neo-Conservative philosophy. We have seen revolution in the streets. It is amazing to think that in 1990 there still is, in our so-called civilized world, a government prepared to impose a poll tax on its people. Ppeople have to pay a tax just for the right to breathe and to live in that country. We used to have such a measure in New Brunswick until Louis Robichaud was elected premier. Thank God we did away with it then. It is incredible to think that now, some 30 years later, we see a similar type of thing happening in England. As well, we see our own Government of Canada copying that type of conservatism without regard for the needs of the poor.

Honourable senators, the province of New Brunswick will pay a dear price as a result of this legislation. The government talks about 10 weeks of employment knowing that that is the way to blackmail the fishermen and the plant workers. They know that they can qualify with 10 weeks but that there must be an unemployment rate of 16 per cent in order to qualify. Who wants 15 per cent or 16 per cent unemployment? That is the level of unemployment that we will be seeing in my province. Yes, it is true that some people will qualify in some areas. There are still areas in my province where there is 16 per cent unemployment. I had hoped that the federal government and the provincial government would put their heads together to come up with some programs to reduce unemployment. That should be the main concern of government, not to cut and save money on unemployment insurance benefits affecting the poor.

● (1510)

The government has taken a great many steps in Bill C-21 to penalize people if they are deemed to leave a job. Where in the world does it happen that immediately upon being charged with a criminal offence one is found guilty? No one would want that. But in Bill C-21 that is exactly what you are doing. You are telling people who leave their jobs—without knowing the conditions at their workplaces—that they are guilty. They are then penalized for 12 weeks and for 2 years down the road. This is happening in 1990.

When I came here in 1979 I never believed for a moment that I would be faced with legislation this cruel. Yes, there are two or three good things contained in the bill, such as, for example, maternal leave, parental leave, and provisions for benefits for people over the age of 65 years. I wish I could say that those things are included in the bill because of the generosity of the government; but they are included only because the courts decided, in a case heard approximately three years ago, that the law had to be changed to cover those people.

Honourable senators, over the years the people in my province will pay the price of Bill C-210. Senator opposite will get their way because they now have the numbers, but the people will pay the price.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Thériault: Over the years you will regret it. I am convinced that every senator here from the Atlantic provinces will live to regret the vote they will take today if they vote with the government.

Senator Simard: Doom and gloom!

Senator Thériault: I recall the days when I was in the Legislature of New Brunswick and the government of the day in Ottawa tried to amend the unemployment insurance program so that it would have reduced some benefits. The Premier of New Brunswick, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Health and Welfare stood up in unison against that type of approach. They cared for people then. What happens to people when they become senators?

Honourable senators, the reduction of weekly benefits to which that people will be entitled is based on the unemployment rate of 1988. Can you imagine the difference now, when we are heading for a recession?

Senator Buckwold: We are in a recession!

Senator Thériault: Yes; we are in a recession. Now it is not only the people from Atlantic Canada who will be affected but also the people from Ontario—that is, the unemployed. In my province alone the number of weeks that people will lose, even if they qualify in the first year of this program, will represent over $16 million. When you take those kinds of dollars out of the economy of New Brunswick, my friends, it is not only the poor and the unemployed who will feel it, but also every business—that is, the corner store, the garage, and every store service industry in the area. I was going to say that the only thing left in some small communities would be the post office; but, by God, with this government that will not even be there. They will take that away, too!

Senator Buckwold: They are! There will not be enough money for postage stamps!

Senator Thériault: What are we coming to? Do senators opposite not realize that there is a fundamental reason why this government is at 15 per cent in the polls? In my province it is 11 per cent and in Beauséjour 4 per cent. This just should not happen. To those senators I say, you should see that it does not happen, because this country—and my province, especially—needs the Conservative Party; but not the kind of conservatives you seem to represent in this house. Not only are you destroying the poor, the sick and the old, but you are also destroying your own party. You should be ashamed of it.

Do you wonder why you are at 15 per cent in the polls in some areas, at 14 per cent in others, and 11 per cent in New Brunswick? I will tell you one of the reasons. We have been talking about unemployment insurance. During the election campaign in 1988 John Crosbie had this to say about the unemployment insurance program:

> No one is planning any changes in the unemployment insurance program. There hasn't been any change proposed to us since we dealt with the Forget commission. We're not contemplating any changes.

That statement was from John Crosbie.

Senator Buckwold: He is a reliable source.

Senator Thériault: That statement was cited in The Evening Telegram, Saint John, Newfoundland on October 14, 1988. Time after time statements like that one were made by ministers. Time after time you have gone to the extreme right wing of the old Conservative Party.

The people in this country are a generous people. It is true that in 1981-82 we faced a tough recession in this country, but, by God, we were able to survive because of the social safety net that had been put in place by the Liberal government, including the unemployment insurance program. But in this recession the food banks will have to multiply. Those of us who have a spare dollar in our pockets had better be ready to contribute to the food banks or there will be problems in the streets of this country as there are in England.

Senator Simard: Doom and gloom!

Senator Thériault: You have gone too far, honourable senators. Your government has gone too far to the right. I plead with you: For once stand up and vote according to your conscience.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I will not spend much time commenting on Senator Thériault's remarks.

An Hon. Senator: Why not?

Senator Robertson: They are not at all unexpected and they are exaggerated, as usual.

However, I should like to say to Senator Thériault that I take great offence in his suggesting that I and others on this side of the chamber have no concern for the poor, the sick, the unemployed and the elderly. Who does he think he is? We have shown compassion and shall continue to show compassion for the have-not people.

● (1520)

Senator Thériault: Prove it by your vote.

Senator Robertson: Another statement Senator Thériault made was that any Liberal legislation must not be touched, otherwise it is a step backwards. That is totally ridiculous, and he knows it. Surely the honourable senator must know that unless we get this Canadian financial house in order, all of these programs will be in great jeopardy.

Senator Stanbury: All on the back of the poor.

Senator Robertson: All of them will be in jeopardy whether the Conservatives or the Liberals are in power, or the NDP is in power; it will not matter.

Senator Thériault, I would recommend that you read a commentary that is in today's Globe and Mail. I should like to quote one paragraph.

> During the Pierre Trudeau years, Ottawa believed that a big, interventionist central government was the only thing that could hold Canada together. Instead, the debts incurred to pay for the big, interventionist central government are splitting Canada apart. There's a lesson here, if there's any time left to learn it.

However, I shall not tire you with further comments about Senator Thériault. We have been on opposite sides of debates for some time.

I should like to speak about some of the more important issues in Bill C-21 that I believe senators in this chamber should be reminded of. Bill C-21, which is a bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, is part of a larger plan called the Labour Force Development Strategy. Honourable senators, this is a strategy designed to help unemployed Canadians get back into the workforce where they can build careers that promise better pay and better futures.

As honourable senators know, the legislation we are considering has touched off much debate. Fears have been expressed that the government is attempting to bring the unemployment insurance program in line with that of the United States. During our committee hearings I heard many senators suggest to witnesses that perhaps this was what was going on, which I found to be a strange way to hear witnesses. Other senators have stated that particular groups, including women, older workers and the poor, will suffer because of changes to the UI program. We have heard another diatribe in this regard from Senator Thériault. He has been making that speech forever.

I should like to address some of these concerns, because I believe they are important concerns and we have to look at them realistically. First, let me respond to the fallacious argument that the government is attempting to harmonize our UI program with that of the United States.

Canada's social security system, including our program of assistance to the unemployed, is one of the most generous in the world. With the introduction of this legislation, the Canadian UI program continues to be one of the most generous in the world. We continue to offer benefits far superior to those available to those in the United States. In most American states, people may receive benefits for as little as eight weeks and for no more than 30 weeks. Under Bill C-21, unemployed Canadians can receive benefits for up to 50 weeks.

Even where the unemployment rate is low, as it is in Toronto, for instance, the length of benefit entitlement will not be less than 17 weeks, which is more than four months of UI benefits. That seems rather generous.

The differences do not end there. In Canada, a person can receive as much as $384 per week in UI benefits, whereas the majority of Americans are able to receive between $150 and $250 U.S. at the maximum.

Canada has income protection for maternity and sickness. the American programs do not include maternity and sickness benefits. We protect our seasonal workers, and not all American states do that.

Our programs make greater use of the developmental approach than do the American programs. The generosity of our program is recognized in the industrialized world. A brief comparison with similar programs in other countries will illustrate this generosity.

Under the proposed legislation, Canadians would need between 10 and 20 weeks of work to qualify for benefits. Compare that to France, for instance, where 26 weeks of work are required, or West Germany, where a person not only needs to work 30 weeks in the last year, but 52 weeks in the previous three years.

Senator Thériault: Why not deal with Canada? Forget about the Americans.

Senator Robertson: Senator Thériault, we live in a small international community. Try to get that through your head.

Honourable senators, our UI system has always concentrated—and will continue to concentrate—on income support. However, it is time to augment that safety net with another strategy that will lead to the development of an adaptable workforce. This means skills training and lots of it.

The Labour Force Development Strategy, of which Bill C-21 is a part, will help Canadians rely less on income support and more on developing and maintaining skills that lead to productive, well-paying jobs. This is an important step, because training has assumed a critical role in today's high-technology era. A skilled workforce is essential for our businesses to compete successfully in the global marketplace of the 1990s.

Countries around the world are now emphasizing training and re-employment over passive support programs. In Sweden, for example, the government has adopted an activist approach towards labour force adjustment. A full 70 per cent of Sweden's resources for labour market programming is directed to training the unemployed and re-employment assistance. Only 30 per cent is directed towards the passive income support.

In Canada, without Bill C-21, our labour market programs would continue to direct only 25 per cent of their resources towards training and re-employment policies. The greatest share of labour market expenditure will continue to be eaten up by passive income support measures.

Canada's Labour Force Development Strategy's mission is, therefore, a challenging one. However, I am confident its measures will set up a ripple effect that will benefit many different layers of the economy. For example, the program will provide more active support to unemployment insurance recipients through counselling and other employment services at an earlier stage in their unemployment. The longer someone is on UI, the harder it is to get off it. To complement this, there will be more opportunities for recipients to train and upgrade their skills. That is why an additional $350 million has been allocated under section 26 of the act to allow claimants to gain work experience and upgrade their academic qualifications without losing their benefits.

In addition, the program is doing more to promote entrepreneurship by allocating an additional $20 million under the Community Futures' Self-Employment Incentive Program. This will allow unemployed workers to draw UI benefits while they establish new enterprises. Alternatively, they can take this money in a lump sum if they wish to defray start-up costs of a new business. The province that has been using this program most efficiently and effectively is Newfoundland, as those of you from that province know. Port Aux Basque and Gander have some successful programs.

It is evident that women, older workers and the employment disadvantaged will benefit from the measures I have just described.

One of the strategy's most exciting features is the special initiatives it contains that are geared to meet each group's specific circumstances. For example, the strategy is providing a financial boost to a training program for social assistance recipients who have been unable, or have found it difficult, to get off social assistance roles. This program has a proven track record in helping such people become economically self-reliant.

Over the weekend I reconfirmed the statistics that I had in my mind that I had been getting from newspapers and other sources in that province. I can say that this program is very successful in New Brunswick. We have been trying to get such a program off the ground for the past eight to ten years. Finally it got off the ground and is doing very well. In the last fiscal year, over 2,000 people, who were formally on assistance, became employed. That is a significant figure for the province of New Brunswick. Of those who enrolled in the program since it began two years ago, one-third have stayed off social assistance. So the program is really breaking the back of that trend in our province, and ministers and their staffs are very enthusiastic about it.

When the committee was travelling and listening to witnesses—which is a very important exercise—and when we heard witnesses here in Ottawa, a couple of senators opposite would always laugh at the training program. They would ask such questions as, "Why train? How many hairdressers can you have in one community? How many carpenters can you have in one community?" That was a standard question. I found this type of question to be very insulting to those who were appearing before us. As the records will show, those in New Brunswick on social assistance are generally considered to be at the bottom level of the support system, below unemployment insurance. When honourable senators see what this one program can do in a small province like New Brunswick, they will find it difficult to laugh at it. So please do not laugh at the training program by saying, "Training for what?" or "Literacy for what?" When we step over that threshold between illiteracy and literacy, a bomb goes off in our minds because suddenly there is a whole world in front of us that we did not understand and know before. It is the same with other training programs.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Thériault: If you had not insisted, there would not be that coverage, and you know it!

Senator Robertson: Please, Norbert, sit down, be quiet and relax, please! You really exaggerate. Please listen to some of the positive things and try to understand how the human mind of a disadvantaged person works. You have to go forward.

Senator Gigantès: The power of positive thinking strikes again!

Senator Robertson: Senator Gigantès does not know anything about living in underprivileged circumstances. So I would ask that he be quiet.

Through this program, the federal government works in tandem with the provincial governments to help social assistance recipients acquire the skills and work experience they need to find work. The federal government is ready to commit an additional $50 million under the strategy. That, combined with the $50 million spent through the Canada Assistance Plan and matching funds from other provinces, promises an extra $200 million to prepare an estimated 20,000 additional social assistance recipients for productive employment.

Senator Simard: That is the other side of the coin.

Senator Robertson: Yes. The strategy also addresses the needs of older workers for whom the job search is often a long an frustrating process. The strategy will inject an extra $40 million into the continuing employment option, which provides financial support for up to three years for employers who hire and retrain displaced workers. Very often these displaced workers are 45 years of age and over. In addition, the budget of the Industrial Adjustment Service has been doubled. This service deals with the problems of obsolete skills, the challenges of changing technologies and finding alternative employment for laid off workers. Its total budget will now be $30 million.

As well, the number of job-finding clubs for older workers has been increased. These clubs have an outstanding record in assisting older people to find jobs. The strategy also opens the door of opportunity for more women. For example, an additional $65 million has been allocated for promoting human resource planning programs in the private sector. These plans will include employment equity components, which will broaden employment prospects for women.

Private sector consultations under the auspices of the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre have enabled the government to improve the apprenticeship government training program, and to train more women in non-traditional occupations. In conjunction with the private sector, these reforms will facilitate the development of an entry-level training program for jobs in growing industries, particularly in areas in which women already have a large stage.

Bill C-21 also proposes changes in special unemployment insurance benefits that will help women and make the program more relevant to today's workforce. These changes include, as Senator Tremblay has mentioned, in addition to the current 15 weeks of maternity benefits during the period surrounding the birth of a child, ten weeks of parental benefits for natural and adoptive parents, shared between the mother and father as they deem fit; and more flexibility in access to 15 weeks of sickness benefits.

I am pleased to say that Bill C-21 has also taken into account the concerns of women's groups in another matter; the question of what exactly constitutes "just cause" for quitting one's employment, which Senator Thériault seemed to find highly unsuitable. Under Bill C-21, people who quit their jobs without just cause face a penalty of seven to twelve weeks benefits. In response to appeals from women's organizations, the Minister of Employment and Immigration added an amendment to Bill C-21 which provides for legislative expression of "just cause" to include sexual harassment, hazardous working conditions, and quitting to follow a spouse to another area. These provisions were not mentioned in the previous bill.

Bill C-21 provides the opportunity to put in place a series of training and adjustment programs we very much need, together with increased fairness in the UI system. That is the intent and will be the effect of Bill C-21 which will help provide Canadians with one of the best labour market adjustment programs in the world.

Honourable senators, I urge you to support Senator Doody's motion.

Senator Thériault: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Robertson: Yes.

Senator Thériault: The Honourable senator has talked about training and has said that during the committee hearings some of my colleagues or I would ask the question, "Training for what?" We did not say that. We were asked by people in, for example, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia the question "Training for what?" when they were told that training would be offered. My question is: Is the honourable senator aware that in 1984, when the Conservatives took office, the federal government was spending $2.2 billion for training and that now, in 1989-90, it is spending $1.5 billion?

Senator Robertson: You have to look at the quality of the training.

Senator Buckwold: Is it a two-for-one sale?

Senator Robertson: You do not simply train a nine-to-five hairdresser in a small community; you diversify and look at the labour market.

Senator Gigantès: They could do one another's hair.

[Senator Robertson.]

Senator Robertson: You might find some improvement, if you volunteered, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: I do not have any hair.

Senator Robertson: It is surprising what they can do with a little.

Senator Gigantès: I do not want to appear young by dyeing my hair.

• (1540)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators—

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I understand we are dealing with Senator MacEachen's amendments. We are all anxiously waiting to hear his speech, but I would hope that our allowing him to speak will not have the effect of closing the debate, because I intend to participate in this debate. With that understanding, the opposition leader may certainly go ahead.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I do not intend to close the debate, but what happens if I speak until 6 o'clock?

Senator Simard: Well, we may not see the clock.

Senator Barootes: We expect it!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the time really has arrived, because of the logic of our own reasoning and because of the practical circumstances that we now face, to call an end to our battle to ameliorate, if not remove, some of the worst features of this wretched and regressive legislation. We intend to vote against this bill, but its passage will represent a failure for all of the social groups in Canada, the churches, the trade unions, the municipalities and the provinces, and a victory for the misuse of the parliamentary process—

Senator Cools: Yes!

Senator MacEachen: —as evidenced in the refusal of the government to listen to the people, to listen to the opposition in the House of Commons, and, certainly, to listen to the opposition in the Senate. It is a victory for the misuse of our constitutional system—

Senator Cools: Yes!

Senator MacEachen: —that, in order to adjudicate this most important social question, it was necessary for the Prime Minister to call to the Senate eight additional senators, not representatives of the working class who are most adversely affected by the enactment of this legislation, but representatives of the elites of our society, corporate and otherwise, all of whom presumably have a prior commitment with the government to cooperate with it in reducing the standard of living of the unemployed from whom is being removed substantial economic benefits.

In its travels throughout Canada, the committee could only find a handful of groups or citizens who would stand up in support of Bill C-21—only a handful!—the government itself, one tourist association in Newfoundland, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, and one private economic consulting group. Every other group—all the churches, all the trade unions, all the social groups and all the provinces—came in with one voice and said, "Please do something to change or stop the passage of Bill C-21."

Indeed, here in the Senate, we could find only a few senators on the other side who would identify and support the merit of this bill. I can think of only three who found in their conscience that they could get up in the Senate and say, "This is good for Canada, this is good for the working people, this is good for the unemployed." However, even though we did not find very many people throughout the country to stand up for Bill C-21, the Prime Minister found eight additional senators ready to stand up for Bill C-21 and make sure that it would become the law of Canada without any change because, in their absence, this bill would not be passing in its present form tonight.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: In the words of a fisherman, Earle McCurdy:

> Bill C-21 is an attack on working people in this country; it is an attack on small communities; it is an attack on underdeveloped areas; and it is an attack on the basic, decent foundations of our country.

We have battled against Bill C-21 for almost a year. We decided at the beginning that we would not defeat Bill C-21. Perhaps we made a mistake; maybe it should have been defeated.

Senator Robichaud: You're right!

Senator MacEachen: However, we did not take that decision. We struggled to have it improved—and improved it ought to have been.

Just the other day the Minister of Finance acknowledged that Canada is in a recession. Today, when we vote on this legislation, and if it is passed, it will hurt the unemployed in every region of Canada. The most recent statistics provided by Statistics Canada on unemployment rates for each of the UI regions paint a dismal picture for the unemployed in Atlantic Canada. The bill is coming into effect as unemployment is increasing and as the recession is taking hold. Of the 13 UI regions in Atlantic Canada, only three will have entrance requirements of ten weeks: Fortune Bay-Gander, Corner Brook and Cape Breton. If the existing legislation were in place, 12 unemployment regions in Canada would escape the draconian provisions of this bill.

Senator Buchanan, if he were in his seat, might be interested to know that if this legislation is passed today, unemployed workers in Halifax will need 17 weeks of insurable earnings to qualify for UI benefits. That is a decided increase. In Yarmouth, 15 weeks will be needed, and that is a decided increase.

If Senator Hatfield had examined and considered this particular legislation, he would have found that under the old rules UI benefits would have been available for unemployed workers after ten weeks of insurable earnings in each of New Brunswick's four UI regions. All workers in his province would have qualified with ten weeks of work. Under Bill C-21, coming into effect at the onset of a recession, ten weeks will not be enough for a single unemployed worker. The unemployed in Moncton will need 15 weeks, 16 weeks in St. John, and 16 weeks in Fredericton. In Madawaska-Restigouche, where the unemployment rate is 14.8 per cent, 11 weeks of earnings will be required. Little wonder that Bill C-21 is so despised in Atlantic Canada—little wonder!

What about Quebec?

● (1550)

In every single region of Quebec it will be more difficult to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. In Quebec City, 18 weeks of insurable employment will be required instead of 12 weeks, and three regions will require 17 weeks. Trois-Rivières will require 15 weeks, and northern Quebec 13 weeks. The Gaspé, where unemployment is running at 13.7 per cent, will be saddled with a 12-week entrance requirement.

The entrance requirement for every region but one in Ontario will increase by six weeks, as it will for every region in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, with the exception of the northern regions of those provinces, where the increases will be limited to two weeks.

In British Columbia, where, under the old rules, five of the six regions would have had a ten-week entrance requirement, 12 to 19 weeks will now be required.

The duration of benefits generally will be reduced by up to 13 weeks, and this in a new piece of legislation that is being put forward as we enter into a recession and after a year of struggle by every social group in the country against it.

Perhaps we ought to recall a few of the comments that were made during the hearings for those new 23 senators who now have the fate, presumably, of the unemployed in their hands, and particularly for the benefit of the eight new senators who may not be aware that the Minister of Employment and Labour in Newfoundland said:

> Bill C-21, along with the decrease in the fish stocks, is probably the most devastating thing to come our way in Newfoundland and Labrador for a long time . . . this bill will have an incredible impact.

She further stated:

> Under the new entrance requirements, the federal government says the impact will be $1.5 million. Our study says the impact will be $77 million. Under reduced benefit duration, the federal study says the impact will be $20 million, whereas our study says that it will be $30 million.

We know what New Brunswick has said. That government produced a study commissioned by the New Brunswick Department of Labour. This study is headed "UI Changes and New Brunswick, Final Version, February, 1990." I will not read all of the conclusions, but perhaps I should put on the record a few of the summary of major findings and conclusions contained in the summary. They state:

> Proposed increases in qualifying weeks could cut off as many as 22,000 workers from access to the UI Program and result in a loss of $150 million in income benefits.
> Proposed reductions in the duration of UI benefit weeks could affect as many as 7,700 workers, resulting in a loss of an additional $16 million or more.
> The total financial loss, therefore, could be over $166 million from these two proposed revisions alone.

Those are three of the major findings and explain why this bill is so despised in the province of New Brunswick and in Atlantic Canada.

If the former Premier of Nova Scotia were in his seat today—and I am sure he is occupied productively elsewhere—he would be able to listen to the testimony that was put before the committee on behalf of his minister, the Honourable Joel Matheson. Perhaps I will put one or two appropriate paragraphs on the record now that we are summing up our debate on this bill. He stated:

> The proposed changes . . . to the minimum entrance requirements will mean an additional three to six weeks of insurable employment, on average, for Nova Scotian workers to qualify for UI . . . We have estimated that 5,000 to 6,000 people in Nova Scotia will be affected by the increase in entrance requirements . . . This may be even higher, given the situation in the fishery . . .

Based on the historical study of UI claimants who exhausted their claims, they have estimated that 20 per cent, or about 17,000 claimants, will receive fewer weeks of benefits than they were formerly entitled to receive.

I could go on and read from all of the testimony that has been given indicating that this is a bad bill; that it is now being introduced at the wrong time, and that its impact will be even more serious as the economic recession deepens.

We tried, honourable senators, to seek improvements to this bill. We did seek a number of improvements, though we did not achieve the fundamental objectives of our amendments, which were to ensure that the Government of Canada would remain fully responsible for financing the benefits to self-employed fishermen in Canada and would remain, at least partly, responsible for financing the regional extended benefits in those areas in Canada where unemployment rises above a particular level. We have failed totally in achieving either of those important objectives.

That is the seed of destruction of the UI system, particularly for the self-employed fishermen of Canada.

The government did agree to a Senate amendment that the bill make specific reference to workers entitled to UI be eligible for literacy training under section 26 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Senator Fairbairn was responsible for putting forward that amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: The government also accepted the Senate's amendment to include, in the annual plan dealing with developmental UI expenditures to be tabled in Parliament each year, actual or estimated expenditures on developmental uses in each province for each of the three years preceding the year to which the plan applies.

The government also accepted a modified version of the Senate amendment to include in the plan estimates of supplementary training allowances to be spent in each province. The government did not accept the part of the amendment relating to the economic regions of the country.

• (1600)

What we had in mind was to obligate the government to tell us, on a comparative basis, how much it now intended to spend in each province under the so-called developmental rubric in comparison with the loss the province would have suffered as a result of a reduction in benefit payments, either through the increased insurable period of required earnings or the reduction in the duration of benefits. That was the purpose of our proposal, which was only partially achieved.

In amendment 4(d) we proposed that the 1990 plan be laid before Parliament no later than June 30, 1990, and that this plan and others be debated in Parliament. But we also wanted further provisions in the amendment that would permit Parliament to have some say in whether or not that plan was acceptable. The Province of Newfoundland, having lost the tens of millions of dollars which its government estimates it will lose, will receive one-third or one-tenth of what it previously received under the developmental system. All the government will have to do is tell the world, and Parliament will have no voice in saying whether or not that ought to be accepted.

I now turn to the UI program for fishermen. Here we made some progress. Under section 130(4) of the current act the government is entitled to repeal the UI program for fishermen by proclamation. In amendment 8 the Senate proposed that changes to the UI regulations pertaining to fishermen be subject to parliamentary scrutiny. The government agreed to remove subsection 130(4) from the current act and the House of Commons can, in the future, reject—if a vote were held—a change to the fishermen's regulation, bearing in mind that the regulations could have been abolished by proclamation were itt not for our amendment. That could now be put before Parliament and a vote could be held.

All of you new senators, who came here thinking that you were going to flex your legislative muscles, should note that the Senate was totally excluded from any possibility of participating in the review of fishermen's regulations. Harvie Andre decided that these Atlantic senators, who are interested in the fisheries, should not be given a chance to participate in the debate. Nevertheless, at least we gained that much on the matter of fishermen's regulations; and, in the acceptance of amendment 5(b), we gained the two-year carry forward provision for penalties rather than the much longer six-year carry forward provision which had been called for in Bill C-21.

Honourable senators, we attempted to restrict the developmental uses to which the fund could be put because we thought that the principal purpose of the fund was to provide income support. We did not succeed in removing the infamous

Henry VIII clause, which is referred to at page 29 in the report of the special committee, and which is one of the most atrocious pieces of legislative draftsmanship that has ever appeared.

One of the witnesses, Graham Eglington, stated as follows:

> Parliament only gave Henry VIII the power to make laws on subjects where there were no other laws, but here Parliament is saying that the commission may make regulations which are different from provisions of an act already passed by Parliament. That is a very remarkable power.

Senator Forsey, who is frequently quoted, said to the committee:

> It seems to me that the Commission, with the approval of the Governor-in-Council, can do things that are contrary to the requirements generally set out in the Act.

That is provided for in the Henry VIII clause, and it still stands as evidence of the intransigence of the government and its refusal to acknowledge that it can make a mistake.

We did not completely achieve our amendments on the disqualification penalties, which remain as a particularly harsh provision of this bill, and which were vigorously fought against by Senator Thériault, who referred to them today. That provision still remains in the bill. We failed to delete the contracting out provision. The Senate proposed to include in the 15 per cent monetary limit third-party expenses associated with the referrals pursuant to section 26 of the act and the establishment and operation of a scheme under the new developmental uses proposed in the bill. The Senate amendment was intended to close a loophole that it felt would further reduce the amount of UI funds available for income support, which is the primary objective of the UI program. Of course that was rejected by the government.

Finally, I turn to the most fundamental of all of the amendments, which has to do with the government contributions. Amendments 7 and 9 attempt to ensure that the government does not abdicate its financial responsibilities in assisting unemployed individuals. In doing so, the Senate proposed that the government continue to pay for half of the cost of benefits paid to claimants residing in high unemployment areas of the country and the net cost of benefits to self-employed fishermen. Those two amendments were totally rejected by the government. In doing so, the government persisted in its determination to remove entirely its financial support from the general revenues to the unemployed of Canada, including the self-employed fishermen. It is to that theme that I wish to turn for a moment, because it raises the alleged fiscal impact that these two amendments had on the government accounts.

On the financial side, the Senate proposed two major amendments: First, amendment 7, which would retain government contributions for regionally extended benefits at 50 per cent of current levels; and, second, amendment 9, which would retain full government contributions for net self-employed fishermen's benefits. In its most recent message from the House of Commons to the Senate the government claims that "amendments 7 and 9 . . . would cause an increase in the budgetary deficit in the order of $1.75 billion annually." The Prime Minister, in his summoning of the eight new senators, returned to this theme in his press conference and referred to a sum of $3 billion. This assertion of an addition of $1.75 billion to the budgetary deficit, the assertion contained in the message from the House of Commons, is entirely false. Our amendments 7 and 9 would not increase the budgetary deficit by a single dollar, let alone by $1.75 billion. Though the Senate amendments would require the government to contribute approximately $1.7 billion to the UI account, in comparison to the $3 billion now being provided, these amendments would have absolutely no effect on the deficit. That is true because of the simple fact that since 1986 the UI account has been fully consolidated into the budgetary account.

● (1610)

In 1989-90 the entire UI program of $11.9 billion was a budgetary expenditure, not merely the $3 billion portion that was funded by the government from general revenues. Consequently, so long as total UI expenditures do not increase, it makes no difference what proportion of the total expenditures are funded from general revenues as opposed to UI premiums.

The Senate amendments do not affect total expenditures. Indeed, the changes proposed by the government itself do not change in any way the total expenditures to be made under this program.

The honourable senator who took her seat a few moments ago talked about putting the financial house in order. Well, these proposals do not reduce at all government expenditure. If it is her belief that they do and, as a result, that the financial house is put in order, then she is mistaken. With permission, I propose to table an extract from the 1989 budget showing that this is indeed the case. At page 42 of the Fiscal Plan there is a table entitled "Budgetary Expenditures by Type of Payment". The second line of this table reads: "Payments Under the Unemployment Insurance Program." The entire program, not merely the government's direct contribution, is a budgetary expenditure.

In contrast, I call to the Senate's attention the 1985 budget, where, at page 27 of the Fiscal Plan, is a table entitled "Budgetary Expenditure Projections". Under the entry "Unemployment Insurance Contributions" are figures in the neighbourhood of $3 billion. This table shows that prior to the full consolidation of the unemployment insurance account, only the government's direct contribution to the account was a budgetary expenditure. In contrast, today and since 1986 the entire UI program is a budgetary expenditure.

Neither Bill C-21 nor our Senate amendments affect total budgetary expenditures on UI. The dispute centres on what proportion of these expenditures should be funded out of general revenue. At page 44 of the Fiscal Plan for 1989 is a table entitled "Budgetary Revenue Projections". Line three reads: "Unemployment Insurance Contributions". For 1989-90 the amount is $10.6 billion; for 1990-91, it is projected at $12.3 billion.

Why this sudden increase of approximately $1.7 billion? Of course, the answer is found in Bill C-21. First, it must be remembered that UI premiums paid by workers and employers are budgetary revenues, just as are sales taxes and income taxes. Any increase in UI premiums is an increase in budgetary revenues and thus a positive development as far as the deficit is concerned.

Bill C-21 in itself does not reduce UI expenditures. It increases UI premiums and thus increases the budgetary revenues. Section 30 of Bill C-21 increases the UI premium rate from 1.95 per cent to 2.25 per cent. What Bill C-21 has principally achieved is a substantial tax increase in the form of increased premiums rather than any change in the expenditure outlays of the government. Workers and employers will pay more in UI premiums under Bill C-21. In fact, this increase in premiums will be retroactive to January 1, 1990.

At page 35 of the 1989 Fiscal Plan the government projects that in the 1989-90 fiscal year the increase in premiums provided for Bill C-21 will bring in an additional $425 million. In 1990-91 it will bring in an additional $1.9 billion.

Before 1986, any increase in UI premiums and UI revenues would have had no impact on the deficit because UI premiums were not part of budgetary revenue. At page 31 of the 1985 Fiscal Plan is a table entitled "Budgetary Revenue Projections". There is no entry for unemployment insurance. UI premiums, prior to 1986, were not budgetary revenues. Today they are.

Had the Senate proposed to reduce the premium rate provided in Bill C-21, the government could legitimately have claimed that our amendments would have had the effect of increasing the budgetary deficit. But the Senate's amendments did not touch the premium rate. Therefore, they did not affect the budgetary deficit. Therefore, the message from the House of Commons is false. The frequent statements made by the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons are false; and the statement of the Prime Minister that our amendments to Bill C-21 were adding to the budgetary deficit is also false.

Honourable senators, I have taken some pains to make this point in a rather tedious way because it is fundamental to exposing the con job that has been going on for months now on the part of the government as to the impact of the Senate's amendments.

Now, honourable senators, we are debating basically a proposal made by myself that the message and the subsequent motion moved by Senator Doody, in which the government again refused our amendments, be sent to a conference. It is a fact of parliamentary history that any time the Senate has insisted on its amendments—and it has rarely done so—the government of the day has either given up the bill or has had a conference with the Senate. The government, when we insisted upon our amendments, gave us the back of its hand and sent us a message, upon which Senator Doody moved a motion that we back off. I moved that the message and the motion be sent to a conference between the two houses to see whether we could iron out our differences.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Roblin also said, "if it were possible." He said, "it is a long time ago since we had the last conference in 1947, and I would vote against such a conference because I think the positions of both sides are fixed." Well, the positions of both sides were not fixed—at least, they were not fixed on this side. That was made clear not only to Senator Roblin privately, but also made clear elsewhere.

After I moved the motion to have a conference, Senator Ottenheimer moved the adjournment of the debate. That was on May 22, and it stood adjourned until today, October 22. Why?

Senator Thériault: Waiting for the eight.

Senator MacEachen: I think I have to lay on the Table a few facts—

Senator Simard: All the facts.

Senator MacEachen: —all the facts that pertain to this particular incident of the conference and the subsequent negotiations that took place. Shortly after Senator Ottenheimer adjourned the debate, he approached Senator Stewart on this side of the house, very quietly, asking whether it was possible to have a meeting between members of the government and myself with respect to resolving our difficulties on Bill C-21.

A short time later, on June 4, Minister MacDougall's chief of staff called my office to arrange for a meeting with the minister the following day. The meeting took place in my office on June 5, 1990. We did not publicize it because we thought it would be premature and that it might prejudice the prospects of a successful negotiation.

The minister and I had two exchanges. One brief one on the telephone, and one longer one in my office. We discussed principally the financial impact of our amendments, but certainly we did not reach a common understanding of the fiscal impact of the Senate amendments made in the area of government contributions. It was decided that the minister would return to the Department of Finance and report our exchanges; and it was also agreed that further consultation would be carried out between my office and the Deputy Minister for Employment and Immigration, Mr. Arthur Kroeger, to ensure that we proceeded from a common understanding of the financial aspects of unemployment insurance. It is a very complicated area, and it was deemed necessary to ensure that we had a common understanding; and for that reason the meeting was arranged with Mr. Kroeger.

I also expressed a wish and the expectation to the minister that if we built on this common understanding, I was confident that Bill C-21 could be passed before the end of June. Certainly the common understanding exploded totally the claim of the government that the Senate amendments had a fiscal impact. At a meeting in my office in June, Mr. Kroeger confirmed that as long as Bill C-21 provisions concerning premium rates were not amended, which I underlined were not part of the Senate amendments, its other provisions and the Senate amendments were fiscally neutral and had no effect on the budget deficit. Premium collections had to be seen as a tax and Bill C-21 raised the level of that tax. Revenue from that increased tax would finance the payment of unemployment benefits through the Consolidated Revenue Fund and the unemployment insurance bookkeeping account. How the flow was managed between the Consoldiated Revenue Fund and the unemployment insurance account was simply a matter of accounting and had no effect on government revenue and expenditure. In fact, Mr. Kroeger made it very clear that a government contribution from the point of view of the operation of the accounts was a debit which, when paid in, was registered as a credit and each cancelled the other out. I think those were his words.

However, according to Mr. Kroeger, if Bill C-21 had been in effect at the beginning of this year the unemployment insurance account deficit at the end of 1992 would be about $3.3 billion. If Bill C-21 were passed with our amendment, the cumulative surplus in the unemployment insurance account would be $2.7 billion. The fact of the matter is that the principal effect of the amendment which we made to maintain 50 per cent of the government contribution was not to add to the budgetary deficit, was not to add to government expenditures, was not to decrease revenues, but it was to reduce the amount of the deficit that would occur at the end of 1992 in that bookkeeping UI account. At 50 per cent, I believe the cumulative surplus in the UI account would be $2.7 billion.

I thought this was an extremely valuable understanding, because it allowed us the opportunity to reach a level of government contribution, if we could agree, that would not affect the deficit or total expenditures, and would, at the end of 1992, leave to the government of the day any options as to how it would deal with the UI account. If the surplus were substantial, the government could reduce premiums or increase benefits; or, indeed, if the Conservative government then had a majority in the Senate it could go back to its original proposal. But the proposal which I made seemed to be a very workable one and could carry us through easily until 1992 and the bill would be easily passed before the end of June. With respect to the non-government contribution aspects of the amendments, I assured Mr. Kroeger that we could settle those if we could settle on the government contributions. By the way, after our meeting with Mr. Kroeger it was understood that he would check further into the facts. We expected him to get back to us on them. I will return to that point later.

• (1630)

I do not want to burden honourable senators with a lot of additional combinations and permutations. However, on August 27, I received a letter from Mr. Hockin, which I will table if honourable senators so wish, asking the fast passage of Bill C-21 because he needed the money for a financial package to assist the people who were affected by mine closures in Elliot Lake. I thought that this might be an opening to get the attention of the government.

I wrote back on August 28 stating:

> I share with you a desire to achieve the passage of Bill C-21, and I believe such can be achieved with give and take on each side.
> The debate on the bill was adjourned by the government in the Senate on May 23, last, and was not called again by the time the Senate adjourned on June 27. Had intensive consultations taken place in the interval in a spirit of compromise, between the government and the opposition in the Senate, Bill C-21 could have cleared the Senate by the end of June, a view which I communicated to the Deputy Minister of Employment and Immigration.
> As you may be aware, the amendments we have proposed do not touch upon the revenue-raising objectives of the bill. Accordingly, a resolution of the difficulties could be found without effecting seriously the fiscal position of the government.
> It goes without saying that we are quite prepared to resume discussions on the matter.

That letter was dated August 28. I did not receive an answer to it.

Having had the meeting with Mr. Kroeger in June, and having heard nothing from him in the interim, I instructed Mr. Dupuy of my office to inquire of Mr. Kroeger whether any progress was being made in the government's consideration of my proposals. I am pleased to table the text of Mr. Dupuy's letter of August 10, 1990, to Arthur Kroeger. Failing a reply, Mr. Dupuy inquired again of Mr. Kroeger in a telephone conversation on August 24, 1990. Mr. Kroeger said that a response would be handled at the political level. Of course, it came in the form of a recourse by the government to section 26 of the Constitution.

It is important to read this letter addressed to Mr. Kroeger because it summarizes the discussion as we understood it, that is, the common base of understanding. It states:

> Dear Arthur,
> You will recall our meeting of June 19, 1990 with Senator MacEachen, which served to clarify our understanding of how the UI financial systems works, including the implications of the current situation relating to Bill C-21.
> In particular, we noted your point that the effect of the Bill C-21 hold-up is fiscally neutral, which we understand to mean that continuing the Government Cost of Benefits has no effect on the budget deficit because it amounts to a bookkeeping entry on both sides of the ledger, the CRF and the UIA, which cancel out each other.

Furthermore, the delay is not affecting total UI expenditures, since they were not being varied under C-21 in any event. On the revenue side, the postponement of the enactment of Bill C-21 does not increase the deficit because the increased premiums are being collected at the new rate established by the legislation, retroactive to January 1, 1990, regardless of when the bill is passed. The postponement only changes the balance of the UIA at the end of three years at which time premium rates have to be set again.

You also confirmed that, failing the enactment of Bill C-21, a problem would arise at the end of 1990, since no authority would exist for the new premiums collected since January 1, 1990.

You will recall that Senator MacEachen made some suggestions for moving Bill C-21 forward. He was confident that, if we could build on our understanding of the situation, Bill C-21 could be passed by the end of June. I can assure you there has been no change in Senator MacEachen's mind. If we build on the better understanding we now have as a result of our meeting, Bill C-21 could be moved forward expeditiously.

You said that you would do some more checking on your side and be in touch with us. Have you made any progress?

We were then told it had been shifted to the political level.

Honourable senators, there are two conclusions to be drawn. One is a financial one, and one is a political one. The financial conclusion is that it was a false assertion to say that in view of the consolidation of the UI and CRF into one account that our amendment on government contributions added to the deficit. Mr. Kroeger made that clear. Subsequent conversations between financial officers and my office also made that clear.

There is, of course, an impact, but it is not on the deficit. With no government contribution into the so called UI account at the end of 1992 we would have a deficit, as is projected, of approximately $3 billion. If we did have some contributions, then that deficit would be changed into a surplus.

The second conclusion is that the government adjourned the debate on May 23 and did not enter into serious negotiations because it wanted to establish a fraudulent foundation for a recourse to section 26 of the Constitution. If the government were serious about this adjournment, then it would have conducted serious negotiations. It would have responded to the proposals which I made and it would have made some counter-proposals. But I think that we were misled by that adjournment. We acted in good faith, but the government did not. I am satisfied, as I said in June and in August, that this bill could have been cleared by negotiation. It was quite unnecessary for this bill to have resorted to a never used section 26 of the Constitution. However, that is not the main point.

The main point is that this bill is bad for the workers of Canada, as well as for the unemployed, who have been entitled to believe that the government would continue to protect their insurance system through annual contributions. That protection has been removed. The self-employed fishermen have been entitled to expect, against so many attacks, that the government would provide them with their benefits through unemployment insurance.

• (1640)

I know from my years in the government that that system has always been under attack, even when the government was paying the shot. When the government paid every dime for the fishermen, people said, "This is wrong. It should not even be sheltered in the UI system." The attack will now be reinvigorated with greater reason, because the government cannot say, "After all, we are paying for this." I believe that the unemployed are taking a soaking insofar as the future of this system is concerned. They are taking an immediate soaking in increased qualifying periods and reduced duration of benefits.

You may remember, honourable senators, that we did make a number of amendments here that would have affected the duration of benefits and the qualifying periods. These amendments were struck down by the Speaker as being out of order on the grounds that they exceeded the Royal recommendation which had preceded the initial unemployment insurance bill. We accepted the withdrawal of amendments, and the only remaining major financial amendments in contention—at least from my point of view—were those which, first, provided for 50 per cent of the contribution of the payments of regionally extended benefits; and, secondly, the payments for fishermen's benefits.

We are coming to the vote. We will vote against the bill and, presumably, we will lose.

Senator Murray: Oh!

Senator Thériault: No, some of them will vote for it!

Senator MacEachen: Because we are outnumbered greatly.

Senator Cools: Senator Simard will vote for it!

Senator MacEachen: We are outnumbered by recent recruits who have come at a last minute under false pretences because there was no deadlock.

Senator Murray: No?

Senator MacEachen: There was no deadlock. There was a reluctance on the part of government to negotiate seriously because it wanted to establish a fraudulent basis for the regrettable action that it took very recently.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I rise on a brief point of privilege. Earlier I made a tasteless remark for which I apologize. It was not addressed to you, Senator Robertson—it was not addressed to anyone in particular. It was tasteless and I apologize.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, it is with pleasure that I rise today to speak on Bill C-21 and more particularly to urge all my colleagues—liberals and conservatives as well as the only Reform Party representative, senator Walters—to support senator Doody's motion, now that senator MacEachen's amendment was rejected.

A lot has been said about Bill C-21. I can remember speaking at least twice already in this House to try and explain some provisions of this bill and suggest possible amendments that could be acceptable to the government.

The last time I rose to speak in this House was in May. Since then, certain political events have taken place. The Liberal Party gave itself a new leader. Its new leader sought refuge in New Brunswick and this timely move allowed us to recall certain offending words he had for the people of New Brunswick in 1978 when, carried away by partisanship no doubt, he has told us that, should Quebecers vote for independence, Quebec would become "big New Brunswick".

He is also criticized for saying something to the effect that New Brunswick was a huge outhouse. Now, I do not remember hearing those very words and I believe him when he affirms he said no such thing. Many other things happened since May. There was the Oka crisis and the death of the Meech Lake Accord, which we owe to its true gravediggers: the Chrétiens, Wells and company.

Let us now come back to Bill C-21 and to comments made in this House today by senator MacEachen as well as by senators Kirby and Thériault.

So, the Liberal Party of Canada has a new leader who might get elected in New Brunswick. As a matter of fact, judging from the comments heard and the suggestions made today, Allan MacEachen is obviously the leader in the Senate, irrespective of who is at the head of the Liberal Party, be it Pierre Elliott Trudeau, John Turner or Jean Chrétien.

Senator MacEachen told us earlier—

• (1650)

[English]

Senator MacEachen quoted Premier Wells. He quoted several reports. He divulged to us today, officially, in greater detail than he did last week—as Senator Gigantès stated and was reported as saying in La Presse last week—elements of discussions and meetings with Barbara McDougall, Arthur Krueger and others back at the end of May. My understanding is that these meetings were unofficial and the contents thereof would not be divulged.

An Hon. Senator: Confidential.

Senator Simard: But that is all right. I make a commitment here today to tell the whole story eventually, in the next few weeks, concerning what those figures were, what the proposal was and whether, as Senator MacEachen has told us, these projected costs were fiscally neutral, because the Department of Finance tells us otherwise.

I want to remind Senator MacEachen that I am not very impressed by the tabling of letters from Arthur Krueger.

Senator MacEachen: I did not table any letters.

Senator Simard: You will, though, I am told. I thought you were to make them public?

Senator MacEachen: I did not table any, no.

Senator Simard: Did you not say that you would make them public and that they were available?

Senator MacEachen: No. I did not, and I will not.

Senator Simard: Fine.

Senator Barootes: But he said that he had tabled them!

Senator Simard: I appreciate the fact that you are not going to table them unless you get permission from the government. However, I should like to remind Senator MacEachen that, regardless of the figures prepared and exchanged between civil servants, deputy ministers and their offices, it is the political master ultimately who makes the decisions. These people account to the people of Canada.

Senator MacEachen has mentioned a system that could have been used to improve the bill and determine the costs. He is telling us that he would favour "cooking up" the books. He would have delayed the increase in the deficit. For deficit purposes, he would have delayed the cost of his amendments.

It is fine for him to accuse the Prime Minister of laying a fraudulent foundation to the recourse of section 26, but he is telling us that, according to his proposal, by some magic wand, he could spend more money in providing the same services and the same training, and yet the deficit would be lower.

Senator Frith: No, it is neutral.

Senator Simard: That does not make sense. Canadians will not be fooled by that. Senator MacEachen presided over the finances of Canada for a few years. This is the same senator who, while he had ministerial status, predicted a deficit of $10 billion for 1982-83. Six months later that figure had risen to $16 billion. We know what happened in the following months. Marc Lalonde took over and he had to recognize that the deficit had reached $26 billion.

Senator Frith: Wrong again.

Senator MacEachen: Your history is bad.

Senator Simard: Canadians in general—and we on this side in particular—take with a grain of salt these miraculous formulae.

Senator Frith: You may be a good publisher, but you are a lousy historian. I am not sure about the publisher, either.

Senator Simard: I know it hurts, Senator MacEachen, because you want Canadians to forget these things. Canadians across the country have not forgotten those great golden Liberal years.

Let us get back to something more serious. I have Senator MacEachen at the end of my fishing rod; he has caught the bait.

Senator MacEachen presided over those Liberal golden years when we had double-digit inflation.

Senator MacEachen: We had better interest rates than you have now.

Senator Simard: Those were the great golden Liberal years that we should be happy about, but people will not forget those years.

Senator Kirby and Senator Thériault have told us that their party has a different philosophy than ours. Obviously they are right on that count, and I take no objection to that. At the same time—

[Translation]

I think that the means to achieve our goals meet with the approval of all elected and non-elected parliamentarians. At the federal level as well as the provincial level, we all want a better life for our fellow citizens. I wish to echo what senator Robertson said a moment ago and tell senator MacEachen and his colleagues that compassion, the desire to improve, to insure fairness, our desire to continue providing increasingly beneficial and numerous social programs—eventually, when the deficit is out of the way, we will all agree on that—constitute the general goal.

We obviously disagree on the means to achieve this goal. I believe that Bill C-21 shows that the means and measures advocated by this government differ substantially from those the Opposition advocated for years.

Of course we view things differently. This is a more realistic and more confident vision of the future, which results from measures that have been giving spectacular results since 1984.

Also, the early signs of a recession have indicated for a few months that the situation is worrying. In terms of job creation, increased benefits and regional development in New Brunswick and elsewhere, the government succeeded magnificently in achieving several goals and managed to control the current account deficit or surplus.

● (1700)

[English]

Honourable senators, regardless of the means that we choose to employ to clean up the financial mess and protect our social programs for Canadians, I should like to tell Liberal senators that compassion is not their lot. We, on this side, have compassion, but we have to have the means of our policies and our politics.

Senator Kirby told us that the role of the UI system also included that of distributing income. I agree with him. However, the government has decided to turn the system into a true unemployment system by making employers and employees pay. It feels that the time has come to relieve people who pay taxes, such as old age pensioners, students and so on, from paying on the insurance component of this program. I believe in that approach.

[Translation]

Along the same line I must add that I am not one of those who believe we should let the laws of the market look after older people, and give those laws free rein without any government interference.

I am not a doctrinaire Conservative.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Simard: I think that over seventeen years, with my colleagues Senators Robertson, Teed and others, we have shown that a responsible government willing to keep the deficit to a minimum could find ways to enrich existing programs whenever necessary, but most of all protect them.

[English]

Senator MacEachen has told us that we were insensitive to opposition amendments. Before I come to that point, I want to say that Senator MacEachen's comments were breathtaking in their selectivity. He quoted Premier Wells—

Senator MacEachen: I did not.

Senator Simard: You referred to Premier Wells.

Senator MacEachen: I didn't.

Senator Simard: You talked about Newfoundland—

Senator MacEachen: I didn't mention his name.

Senator Simard: Maybe you did not; maybe I am getting carried away here. Essentially, the honourable senator said that this was a bad bill introduced at the worst time. Then he went on to supply figures on the Newfoundland situation. I think I am correct now.

Senator Hébert: We'll see.

Senator Simard: Premier Wells had something to say about the bill, and particularly the labour force development strategy provisions. Premier Wells in a statement he made in April 1989—which indicates that Bill C-21 has been under discussion for two years now—said that he thought that the federal government was going in the right direction, and that those provisions were just what he had asked for. The Minister of Social Services, the Honourable John Efford, said on August 28, 1990 with regard to the insurance requirement provisions that he would like to see 10 weeks around the province and that he had no problem with going with the 14 weeks in an area like St. John's. There is no need to remind honourable senators that—

[Translation]

You will recall that when Mrs. Aldea Landry, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs for New-Brunswick, appeared before the committee last spring, she said the bill could be improved by doing this or that but she also said that time had come to go ahead with that bill.

[English]

Of course, after a few months—no doubt at the urging of the Liberal Senators and, in particular, their leader in the senate, Senator MacEachen—they commissioned a study, which Senator MacEachen quoted from earlier today.

Senator MacEachen: No, sir.

Senator Simard: You quoted figures.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, but I certainly did not urge that it be commissioned.

Senator Simard: Maybe Senator Thériault did the job for you, but that is neither here nor there.

Senator MacEachen: That is not true at all.

Senator Simard: It is funny that the honourable senator should quote from that report, and he chose not to quote the person responsible for the Global Economics report which was commissioned by the Liberal Party of Canada.

Senator Perrault: Get off it!

Senator Simard: Essentially, the Global Economics report and Patrick Grady, the person responsible for the study, said that Bill C-21 was a good bill and should be passed by the Senate. That is the conclusion in that report. The Liberals said that that was no good, that they would have to get another report. How can anyone put up with such hypocricy.

Senator MacEachen: Who is Patrick Grady?

Senator Simard: He went on to say that the study was based on the belief that not one single person would get any of the additional weeks of work to qualify for U.I., this despite our experience with the changes under Bill C-14 in 1978 and in spite of which people were able to find the additional weeks to qualify. That report was not good enough for Senator MacEachen. He said, "No, we now have to ask Fred McKenna", the new political organizer for Jean Chrétien in Beauséjour, but let us leave that for another day.

I just referred to amendments by the previous government, of which Senator MacEachen was a member, in 1977-78. Here is what happened then. Bill C-27 was passed by the Liberal Government in 1977, by those same people who say we are hard, against conciliation, show bad will and so on. Here is what they did in their 1977-78 amendments. Let us start with Bill C-27 which was presented by the Honourable Bud Cullen. First, he dealt with the steps of reform to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

• (1710)

In that bill, there was a change from a flat entrance requirement to variable entrance requirements. There was also a reduction in benefit duration for some claimants. There was also a change to a three-phase benefit structure, which gave authorization for developmental uses of the UI funds.

Senator Stewart: May I ask a question, senator?

Senator Simard: No. Later on, senator, I will take your questions.

Senator Phillips: Take the heat for a while!

Senator Simard: That bill, Bill C-27, was passed by the Liberal government during those great, golden, Liberal years.

Senator Cools: Great years!

Senator Perrault: You are living in the past, Senator Simard!

Senator Simard: Bill C-27 in 1977 provided authorization for developmental uses of UI funds, including using the funds as income maintenance for claimants on approved training courses, job creation projects and work-sharing arrangements. It also provided for variable entrance requirements, and that was hotly disputed at the House of Commons committee stage.

We on this side have been accused of imposing the guillotine. My colleagues in the House of Commons are also accused of the same thing.

An Hon. Senator: With good reason!

Senator Simard: We are accused of using the guillotine by way of time allocation. Well, what happened in 1977? Mr. Trudeau, Mr. MacEachen, Mr. LeBlanc, Mr. Perrault and all those people who in their previous lives, were presiding over the affairs of Canada—

Senator Perrault: This is 1990!

Senator Simard: —invoked time allocation in order to speed passage of the bill through the House of Commons.

I will now discuss what happened in the Senate. There was a Liberal majority in the Senate then. The Senate committee got Bill C-27 on August 2, 1978, and reported the bill without amendment the following day, August 3, 1978.

Senator Phillips: What, no travelling committee?

Senator Simard: No travelling committee. No million dollar circus. No. They passed it, rubber-stamped it.

Senator Doody: And got Royal Assent the same day!

Senator Simard: These are the people, Senator Thériault, Senator Robichaud, Senator Gigantès, Senator Hébert—

Senator Robertson: And Senator MacEachen.

Senator Simard: —who say that we are not democratic.

Senator Cools: You are mean and cruel!

Senator Simard: They say that we are not showing compassion.

Senator Cools: No!

Senator Simard: They say that we are not being flexible, and they are now seeking amendments.

Senator Hébert: All true!

Senator Simard: Senator Hébert, you were the one who headed up that trip to Canso.

Senator Cools: The wild expedition!

Senator Murray: Tell us more! Tell us more!

Senator Simard: There you were, crying over the shoulders of the unemployed—and I am for that. I can cry, too.

Senator Gigantès: You did!

Senator Simard: But where were you in 1978? Where were you in 1977?

Senator Gigantès: I will check my calendar.

Senator Simard: Perhaps you were not here in those years.

An Hon. Senator: He was blowing a whistle somewhere.

Senator Simard: You should have been in the street, fasting.

An Hon. Senator: Or ringing bells!

Senator Simard: You should have called your future Liberal colleagues. No, I do not think that is very serious.

Senator Hébert: What you are saying is not serious.

Senator Simard: You passed it all in one day! Now, that was 1977. I hope you are not being disturbed by my reminding you of all of those great Liberal years.

Senator Perrault: Oh, yes, we are really worried about it!

Senator Cools: Great years!

Senator Simard: I now come to Bill C-14 in 1978, again presented by the same minister, Bud Cullen.

Senator Perrault: He is not here to defend himself.

Senator Simard: At the time, Prime Minister Trudeau wanted restraint measures. Higher entrance requirements for repeaters—that was part of that bill, too! That is essentially what we are trying to do with Bill C-21.

Senator Gigantès: What is he quoting?

Senator Simard: They passed that. They provided higher entrance requirements for new entrants and re-entrants. They reduced the benefit rate from two-thirds to 60 per cent of insurable earnings, and they made sure that there was recovery through the income tax system of a portion of the benefits from higher-income claimants.

Now, what happened in the Senate? Well, they had three weeks prestudy. I wish we had had prestudy of Bill C-21. We would not have kept the people of New Brunswick, among others, waiting and starving and pleading and going on the welfare rolls in New Brunswick, as we saw all summer. No. That is one thing that Senator MacEachen made sure would not happen here any more under his direction. There was to be no more prestudy. However, it was good enough during those Liberal years. What hypocrisy! They had three weeks prestudy and then rushed the bill through all stages in the Senate, with no amendments, on the same day as passage in the House of Commons. What a Christmas gift for the people on December 22, 1978! Royal Assent the same day!

I do not know where the present senators were in 1978, whether they were in this house or the House of Commons, but we do know that a number of them came from the other place. That is why you people are not going to be believed when you go back to your provinces and try to put the blame on this government and present us as being without compassion. We will tell them. We will remind them of what happened in 1977 and 1978.

What is much more interesting for me is to talk about the bill itself, but I thought it was important that we answer Senator MacEachen.

Senator Cools: Tell us how kind you are! Tell us!

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Simard: Senator Robertson and Senator Tremblay in their speeches did a pretty good job in unmasking the Liberal hypocrisy that we saw today.

[Translation]

I therefore believe that this bill and its new approach to unemployment insurance will be beneficial to all Canadians, including the people of the Maritimes. I hope hon. members will not take offence at the fact that a substantial part of my speech will contain references to the Maritimes.

I support this bill because I feel it prepares this country for the twenty-first century by dealing with unemployment head on. The proposed legislation, honourable senators, is intended to provide occupational training for Canadian unemployed workers, welfare recipients and older workers; to help upgrade the basic skills of our young people; to allow communities across the country to benefit from adjustment measures and programs; to reduce the qualifying period in high unemployment areas in the Atlantic provinces from 14 to 10 weeks; to extend eligibility for unemployment insurance to older Canadians 65 years and over; and to increase parental benefits for families.

As we have said repeatedly, the $350 million earmarked for occupational training for 60,000 workers and $450 million for parental and maternity benefits are major components of the bill before us today.

A total of 150,000 Canadian men and women are bieng deprived of the benefits provided under Bill C-21. Premier McKenna, no less, put pressure on Liberal senators, either on the telephone or during meetings in New Brunswick. On August 20, when I met the Premier, he told us: it is going to cost New Brunswick from twenty to twenty-five million dollars per year more because the Liberal senators refuse to adopt this bill. In addition, this puts considerable pressure on families that do not have enough weeks to qualify for benefits.

Honourable senators, as far as we are concerned, we do not intend to move the clock back and propose, as the Liberal senators in this Chamber would have us do, a system that would pay people to stay home. That is not what Canadians want and certainly not what the people in the Maritimes want.

What our people want is a chance to have a full-time worthwhile job that will not only maintain their way of life but also give them some personal satisfaction.

That is what Bill C-21 intends to do, and the government wants to maintain the UI program's income support role while getting rid of elements that might be an incentive to inactivity.

Above all, we have realized that Canada is falling behind in training its workers and that there is a flagrant imbalance between our active and passive means of intervention.

Our country is losing ground compared with other industrialized powers in the area of manpower training and re-training. In an increasingly competitive and international market, in the medium-term this could mean an economic disaster.

So far, criticism I have heard about Bill C-21 has been limited generalities and to prophecies of doom.

Senator Thériault, for instance, once again served up the same tired old speech he has been using since 1970, since his party lost in New Brunswick, with the same apocalyptic terms.

However, I would rather talk about the benefits this legislation brings to the people of the Maritimes.

I believe that the Maritimes and in fact all Canadians will benefit under Bill C-21 which is only one of many initiatives by this government to boost our economy.

● (1720)

[English]

Honourable senators, I am one of many from the Maritimes who are insulted to hear every time the unemployment insurance regime is mentioned that it is only for fishermen from the Maritimes. That is insulting, because people in the Maritimes want to work, yet the message they get in western Canada, Toronto and elsewhere is that the UI program is for the fishermen, and that somehow they have both hands in the till. I like to think there is a better way of helping the fishermen. I am glad we have taken this first step in the reform of the UI system. It is a good first step, because eventually fishermen and all other workers will not be identified with this system and be labelled "freeloaders".

I find it very insulting to be put in the same bag and be identified with a system that, according to many, only benefits the fishermen.

[Translation]

Since we are talking about government measures in addition to Bill C-21, allow me to mention the program of adjustment to the current context whose cost is expected to reach $130 million.

The federal government will implement a new adjustment plan designed for plant workers. This program, for which the government has earmarked up to $120 million over five years, is intended for plant workers and trawlermen who will lose their job and it will provide special assistance to older workers ineligible for alternate adjustment programs.

Senateur Thériault told us a moment ago how important it is for governments to make concerted efforts. The provisions of the adjustment program I am talking about now will make it easier for us to work with the provincial governments; companies and unions will have to take part in the preparation of this program based on the use of a common resource and to make a financial contribution so that the program meets the immediate and future needs of fish plant workers.

The government will also encourage consultations with the provinces and the industry with a view to solving the problem of excess fishery and processing capacity, just as it will discuss with fishermen the issue of gradual implementation of individual quotas transferable to certain fisheries.

Honourable senators, another program has to do with economic diversification and it is expected to cost $146 million, even though it may not go over too well with the Liberal senators who are bent on defending the unacceptable status quo rather than accept changes to the fishery sector which is trying to get a handle on problems created by the fish stocks. This program will have mid- and long-term benefits in our maritime region.

Indeed this program will enable the government to take steps to diversify the economy of communities inside and outside the fishery sector, with particular emphasis of those which depend on fishery operations which are hard hit by lower quotas and fish stock depletion.

The government will also provide employment opportunities based on the Atlantic Provinces natural advantages for instance, the ocean, tourism and resource industries.

Honourable senators, this program which was announced a few months ago by my member of Parliament and our Minister of Fisheries, Bernard Valcourt, and whose details should be made public shortly, will encourage the marketing and development of underutilized fish stocks and give a new direction to fish plants which otherwise would have to close.

Again under this program, the federal government will launch a sectorial marketing campaign on fish products, a campaign which will emphasize the marketing possibilities of more expensive products, for underutilized stock and top quality commodities.

A pilot project is currently being implemented in New Brunswick, thanks to the efforts of Bernard Valcourt, and M. Lauzier, his New Brunswick counterpart.

Honourable senators, I should like to situate the debate on Bill C-21, and possibly explain the distant and immediate election motives behind the three-week circus which the Liberal senators conducted here recently. Since 1984, and especially since 1988, the Liberal senators have systematically fought against all the legislative and budgetary measures introduced by this government in an effort to reduce the deficit for the purpose of maintaining our social programs.

The GST, Bill C-28 which we adopted last week and the Bill amending the unemployment insurance we are dealing with today are major elements in the government's program. As Progressive Conservative senators, we sincerely believe that Canada must have the means to support its social and economic policies.

We must therefore have the courage of our convictions and the firm intention to denounce those of the Federal Liberal Party and the Reform Party of Canada.

Because the Liberal Party is running the risk of being overtaken by the New Democratic Party in an election, these Liberal senators would like Canadians to believe that our country's financial resources are unlimited, that the magnitude of our deficit is insignificant and that social programs will always be there anyway. As to the Reform Party, its remedy is also simplistic: as a government, they would reduce all social programs by 15 per cent, including family allowances to the have-nots, transfers to provinces for education, health and welfare etc. Honourable senators, I look forward to Senator Waters' return from Alberta, so that we may have an opportunity to debate the solution proposed by his Party. If we cannot do it in the Senate, we will do it elsewhere.

The new Liberal leader is visiting Beauséjour these days, and I would ask Mr. Chrétien, whom several Liberals from Quebec, the Maritimes and Western Canada already call "Yesterday's man", to take this opportunity to tell us and to tell all Canadians what a Liberal government under his leadership would have to suggest as far as UI reform is concerned.

Under his leadership, would the UI program continue to be a kind of welfare program costing dearly to all Canadian taxpayers, including our elderly, instead of a real unemployment-insurance program benefiting both employers and employees who would also be the insured contributors? Now that I am on this subject, may I digress for a moment. As Senator Kirby mentioned earlier, for years the UI account has paid benefits to fishermen. I, myself, said that the fishermen, from New Brunswick for instance, were always thought of as abusing the system.

Rest assured, honourable Liberal senators, as Michael Wilson and Ms. MacDougall said, the Mulroney government will not leave the Maritime fishermen or the Maritimes unemployed all by themselves, in their boat, without an oar.

As far as I am concerned, in difficult times, people from New Brunswick are as entitled to major assistance programs and injection of funds as are farmers from Western Canada and other areas when they are in trouble. Mr. Michael Wilson told us that, during a lengthy crisis, money will be made available to supplement the UI account so that the premiums paid by the employers and the employees are not unduly high.

• (1730)

Honourable senators, I asked and still ask the new leader of the Liberal Party to take the opportunity of the by-election in Beauséjour to explain the kind of reform he would present as head of a Liberal government.

Over the weekend, he refused to clarify his position on the GST. He refused to promise to eliminate the GST. Journalists and people in Beauséjour asked him what a Liberal government would do. His answer was that he would set up a commisison or a task force. He repeated what he had told three weeks before, that he would improve the system. When you let a Liberal government improve a system, it usually means more taxes or more reductions of the kind I mentioned concerning certain bills in 1977 and 1978.

Honourable senators, I hope he will give answers that are more precise, but I am afraid his refusal to explain his position on the GST is a good indication of his lack of courage or honesty. Canadians will have to wait a long time, I am afraid, before he gives my question a real answer.

Maybe he will want to take the advice of his Toronto Liberal senators and of his new recuit, Mrs. Chavia Hosek, a former minister and a former star in the Peterson government. She is a new member of the task force on research and policies.

Honourable senators, Maritimers like myself cannot expect much from this new Toronto-Shawinigan-Beauséjour partnership for the future of their region. These people have not shown the sensitivity or the knowledge of our community that would enable them to promote long term solutions to help us become full-fledged Canadian citizens brimming with hope for the future.

Senator Kirby may want to reassure us. His colleagues, Liberal senators and others, say that Senator Kirby, along with senators Grafstein, Davey and a few more, would be part of that "fresh', team, that "Hosek-Shawinigan-Beauséjour" team, charged with preparing policies for a future Liberal government.

As you will notice in Debates of the Senate, the word "fresh" is in quotation marks.

[English]

As far as I am concerned, I would pick Brenda Robertson, Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, Arthur Tremblay, Bernard Valcourt and Brian Mulroney any day of the week to be on my team to protect the Maritimes.

Senator Robichaud: And you will have 15 per cent in the polls!

Senator Perrault: You are singing for your supper!

Senator Simard: We will develop policies that will fit the Maritimes. I would not leave this matter in the hands of Senator Grafstein, Senator Davey or even to Senator Kirby, who at one time was an expert—and maybe he still is an expert, but he would be outnumbered on the committee. I should think about concluding my speech, unless we want to forget about the clock.

[Translation]

It is a shame, honourable senators, that senator Kirby did not take avantage of the opportunity afforded him today to comment on his new responsibilities and this new partnership. He will no doubt get a chance to do it later.

Coming back to senator Hébert, he and almost all his Liberal colleagues told us repeatedly in this debate that the government took a hard line when it rejected the amendments they had proposed and some that I had hoped to have approved.

That statement, honourable senators, is totally false and gratuitous.

I suggest the comments senator MacEachen made in this House an hour ago go to prove my point. He told us:

• (1740)

[English]

There was some progress, yes, and he reminded us that the period of six years, I believe changed to two years, as far as the—

[Translation]

—not the cheaters, but those who received too much unemployment and also others. I would like to mention again the figures. He talked also about section 5(b). Senator MacEachen talked about the changes accepted by governments concerning the settlement of possible claims affecting fishermen's rights.

Of course, senator MacEachen did not have his conference! Nor has there been a conference in 1977 and 1978, when bill C-27 and bill C-14 were passed.

Senator Hébert: Did you ask for one?

Senator Simard: No, it was a liberal majority at the time. Not only has there not been a conference, but there has not been a single amendment presented by the Senate. The bills were steamrolled!

Yes, progress has been made. One can argue that these amendments were brought about following court decisions. But, what really counts, in my opinion, is that they are improvements in the form of the new, higher, more generous benefits, that can be found in bill C-21.

The governement did not accept all amendements. There is one in particular that governement refused, and I would have been disappointed, like many Canadians, if the governement had accepted the main amendment proposed by the opposition, that is—

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Senator Simard—

Senator Simard: Later, please, Senator Stewart.

Senator Stewart: Later? I understand all too well.

Senator Simard: I am sorry if you are on edge.

Senator Stewart: I wanted to ask you about the message of May 9 from the House of Commons. It was false.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: As I was saying before being interrupted, I would have been disappointed—and so would have been most Canadians, I suggest—if the government had deleted the essential point of this bill, and that is making taxpayers, employees and employers pay for the insurance component of the program.

In fact the present system which Liberal senators would have liked to perpetuate was financed from general revenues, which means by everybody, elderly Canadians, students and so on.

[English]

Senator Stewart: I can help Senator Simard fill up the time to 6 o'clock.

Senator Murray: No, we have another speaker.

• (1750)

[Translation]

Senator Simard: If it is on that basis that Liberal senators label us intransigent and inflexible, well I guess we are intransigent and inflexible!

We will not yield on that point. I urge you all, Liberal, Conservative and other senators, to support Senator Doody's motion.

Honourable senators, I conclude on this note. Senator Hébert . . . I get back to him, he is my favorite!

Senator Hébert: I cannot say the same thing!

Senator Simard: Senator Hébert continues to rehash the old argument he put forth in Canso and elsewhere, leftovers from the theory of the paper Vers Demain, or the Social Credit, or the White Berets—

Senator Hébert: We listened in Canso, we did not speak!

Senator Simard: .. the old refrain that funds are inexhaustible and the deficit is not important . . .

Senator Hébert: I never said that!

Senator Simard: . . . . and that no changes were made.

I think I made myself clear. Senator Hébert, this is an invitation. We had a great trip to Canso, and now we'll go to the other provinces. We'll even go on television. If you let me speak for five minutes out of fifteen, that will be plenty. Five minutes out of fifteen, and the rest of you can have ten!

I think we will have a chance to explain that Bill C-21, like Bill C-28 and Bill C-62, is vital to economic recovery. In fact, these are essential components of a program that is aimed at putting our finances on a sound footing while protecting our social programs.

And don't tell me not a single amendment was accepted! On both occasions when this bill was sent back to the House, amendments were accepted.

The passage of Bill C-21 today is not the end of the world either. I am sure that after several months, of monitoring implementation, if any weaknesses and deficiencies show up, the Mulroney government, acting with its usual sense of realism, generosity and compassion will make the necessary changes.

In concluding, I urge senators on both sides of this Chamber to support Senator Doody's motion and reject Senator MacEachen's amendment to Bill C-21. Thank you, honourable senators.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[English]

Senator Stewart: I hope Senator Simard will deal with my question. I am holding the message from the House of Commons dated May 9, 1990. That message is referred to in Senator Doody's motion. Senator MacEachen established earlier today, as a result of conversations with the Deputy Minister, that the following statement in the message is false. It is not correct that:

> . . . amendments 7 and 9, which would cause an increase to the budgetary deficit in the order of $1.75 billion annually and thus confound the balance of Ways and Means as approved by this House, to be for that reason in violation of the principle embodied in Sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and constitutional practice . . .

In view of the fact that the assertion in the message from the House of Commons is inaccurate and misleading, and in view of the fact that Senator Buchanan will wish to vote in favour of Senator MacEachen's motion, a motion beneficial to the people of Nova Scotia, will Senator Simard, during the dinner recess, talk with Senator Buchanan to assure him that the message that underlies Senator Doody's motion is inaccurate and ought not to be relied on by Senator Buchanan?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, could we agree not to see the clock? Senator Cochrane has an intervention which she assures me is very brief. I think it might be appropriate if we were to hear it before we suspend the sitting until 8 o'clock.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Simard: To answer Senator Stewart's question, I will sit with Senator Buchanan. I will also sit with Senator Stewart—

Senator Hébert: Why don't you sit down?

Senator Simard: —if that is his wish, so that we can clarify his own mind.

Senator Stewart: I know how the people of Nova Scotia want me to vote, but I think Senator Buchanan may have been misled by this message from the House of Commons, this false message.

Senator Simard: I gather this is another frivolous comment and suggestion, and I have made note of it.

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I intend to make my remarks on this issue very brief, because I certainly would not want to contribute to any further delay of this legislation.

I do feel, as a representative of the province with the highest rate of unemployment in Canada, that I should relate some of the concerns of the people back home.

The labour force statistics for August, 1990 report an unemployment rate of 15.6 per cent for Newfoundland, and as high as 21 per cent for the south coast of my province. That compares rather unfavourably to the 6.3 per cent unemployment rate in Ontario, and rates ranging from 6.5 per cent to 10.9 per cent in other provinces.

It will not be news to honourable senators that the four provinces of Atlantic Canada have the four highest rates of unemployment.

The people in my area of Canada want this bill passed, honorable senators, just as they wanted to see it passed almost one year ago when it went through the House of Commons.

Senator Cools: No, that is not what Patricia Loewen told us.

Senator Cochrane: Last Thursday, October 18, the Globe and Mail reported an interview with the chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on Bill C-21 in which he said that this UI bill could easily be reversed by a future Liberal government. He said to the Globe and Mail, and I quote, "We can correct UI very quickly, so we will let it through for now and fix it later."

If that statement reflects the view of the opposition caucus, then why has this legislation been held up for 11 months? Why have my people back home had to wait a year for training programs, for parental leave benefits, and for eligibility for senior citizens? Why have they had to face the same 14 week UI qualifying period as workers in Toronto when, for so many of them, there simply were not that many weeks of work available? The provisions of Bill C-21 will ensure a 10-week qualifying period for the workers of my province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Speaking for my constituents, I am very pleased to see that the people of my province of Newfoundland and Labrador will finally have the benefits of the provisions that are in Bill C-21.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it being six o'clock, I shall now leave the Chair and return at eight o'clock. The house has ordered that I put the question to a vote at eight o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

At 8:09 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT TO REFER CONCURRENCE MOTION TO CONFERENCE OF TWO HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT NEGATIVED ON DIVISION

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved, by the honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the honourable Senator Tremblay:

> That the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to its amendments 4(c) and (d) and 8 to Bill C-21, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act;
> That the Senate do not insist on its amendments 2(a), (b) and (c), 3(a) and (b), 5(a), 6, 7 and 9, to which the Commons have disagreed; and
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly,

And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that, all the words after the word "That" be struck out and replaced by the following:

> Whereas
> On March 20, 1990, the Senate informed the House of Commons by message that it insisted upon its amendments to Bill C-21;
> And Whereas
> Beauchesne, 5th edition, citation 814, p. 241, provides that in such circumstances, where the Senate insists upon their amendments, "the House (of Commons) either accepts the amendments or adopts a motion requesting a conference to which each House appoints Members";
>
> And Whereas
> When the Senate insisted upon its amendments to An Act to authorize the government to acquire by lease lines of railway connecting with the government railways in 1910;

and to An Act to confirm the Order in Council of the twenty-fourth day of February, 1919, prohibiting the importation, manufacture and transportation of intoxicating liquors and the Order in Council of the twelfth day of April, 1919, in amendment thereof in 1919;

and to An Act to amend the Judges Act in 1921;

and to An Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act in 1922;

and to An Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act in 1924;

and to An Act for the relief of the Depositors of the Home Bank of Canada in 1925;

and to An Act to amend the Criminal Code in 1933;

and to An Act to amend and consolidate the Excise Act in 1934;

and to An Act to amend the Farmer's Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934 in 1938;

and to An Act to amend the Criminal Code in 1947, the House of Commons requested that a conference be held;

And Whereas

When the Senate insisted upon its amendments to An Act to amend the Combines Investigation Act in 1936; and to An Act to amend the Customs Tariff Act in 1961, the House of Commons chose not to proceed further with the legislation;

And Whereas

When the Senate has by message insisted upon its amendments without offering any alternative proposal, it has never received a subsequent message from the House of Commons repeating that it disagreed with the said amendments;

And Whereas

The message received from the House of Commons on May 10, 1990, is without precedent, and does not conform to the convention and practice, unbroken since Confederation of settling disagreements between the House of Commons and Senate by a conference,

The motion be referred to a conference between the two Houses of Parliament.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Let the doors be opened.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, I should like to have it noted and drawn to the attention of the Speaker that he did not follow properly the procedure that we had hoped was now thoroughly understood by him and by all honourable senators as follows from the appendix in the Rules of the Senate. My criticism relates to the main motion. The procedure was followed on the motion in amendment:

> At the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question. If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the "yeas" and the "nays"...

which he did not do on the main motion,

> ... and then expresses his opinion as to the result. If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising, the Speaker calls for a standing vote.

N° two senators rose on the main motion because the Speaker had not followed the previous stage.

> The division bells are rung ...

which was not done,

> ... and when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked". The doors will then be locked by the pages and the Speaker will call for the vote.

I hope in the future we will follow these proceedings strictly and in accordance with the rule book.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, Senator Frith is correct. I thought mistakenly that it had been arranged beforehand that the votes would take place together and that the whips did not wish to leave the chamber. If I have made a mistake, I apologize.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, October 23, 1990

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
THE SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

23 October 1990

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Beverley M. McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 23rd day of October, 1990, at 5:30 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,

Judith A. LaRocque
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

QUESTION PERIOD

THE HONOURABLE J. MICHAEL FORRESTALL

PROPERTY QUALIFICATIONS FOR MEMBERSHIP IN SENATE—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, some questions have been raised in the press about the qualifications of the Honourable Senator Forrestall. Senators will remember that the Constitution of Canada provides, in section 33, that:

> If any Question arises respecting the Qualification of a Senator or a Vacancy in the Senate the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate.

I am asking the government leader if he will let us have any information that he or the Clerk has on the questions raised as to the property qualifications of Senator Forrestall. Obviously, we should do nothing until there is some information before us.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I take it that Senator Forrestall is not present at the moment. In view of the media reports, there might be something he would want to tell the Senate as soon as he arrives. In the meantime, all I can tell senators is what I have learned second hand, which is that at the time he made his affirmation he consulted with the Clerk, that he advised the Clerk that the property in question was jointly held, and that the Clerk, after taking counsel, advised him that jointly held property met the requirements of the Constitution Act.

Senator Frith: Quite. The procedures that have apparently been followed—and I base this on an article by MacGregor Dawson, written, I believe, in the late 1970s—is that the practice followed by the Senate in the past is first to ask for the relevant information. Most of the precedents deal with absences, not with property qualifications. The problem for the Senate, if the question of qualifications is raised, is how it gets the information upon which to act. I believe that in all cases, as I recall from the article I read, the information was provided by the Clerk. If the Senate then felt that it wanted to pursue the matter, it would refer it to the Committee on Privileges, which is the Senate sitting as Committee of the Whole. I am quite prepared to leave it at that. If the Clerk will give us some report at first hand to inform us, as he has informed the Leader of the Government, then I am prepared to leave it at that.

Senator Murray: Perhaps we should hear from Senator Forrestall in person before we hear from anyone else. I assume he will be in his place later today or tomorrow and that he will advise us.

Senator Frith: I agree. As I believe has happened in the past, if the Clerk can give us a report on it, I would think that Senator Forrestall should be the first one to speak to it.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENDED MATERNITY BENEFITS—DATE OF AVAILABILITY TO WORKING WOMEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have received several representations from working men and pregnant women who have paid increased premiums into the unemployment insurance fund since January 1, 1990, and who have asked me to make representations on their behalf that extended maternity benefits be paid to them. Some have delivered their babies, and some will deliver before November 18 of this year.

Will the government consider taking this matter under consideration to be fair to all pregnant working women, not only to those who will deliver their babies after November 18?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable Senators, Bill C-21 was voted on last night and will receive Royal Assent tonight. My honourable friend is asking that certain of its provisions be made retroactive. I am not sure that is possible, but, in any case, I will see that the Minister of Employment and Immigration is acquainted with the representations that Senator Haidasz has received and has conveyed to us.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

ALLEGED FLAWS—AMENDMENT PROCESS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday in Vancouver, at a public meeting with high school students, the Prime Minister stated that the GST was a very bad tax insofar as it taxes educational materials and that he was prepared to consider changes in the springtime—I presume of 1991.

This morning, at a meeting of the Finance Committee in the other place, the Minister of Finance said that a number of amendments would be introduced once Bill C-62 became law.

It appears, honourable senators, that the government is finally admitting that the bill has many flaws.

Is the government leader in a position to tell us now that the government is prepared to introduce its own amendments to Bill C-62 during the course of the next several days and take responsibility for repairing serious flaws and omissions in this legislation which now both the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister are acknowledging? It would certainly be a welcome and positive contribution to a very difficult situation for the government and for this chamber.

Is the government leader now in a position to tell us that the government will take itself into an amendment process to expedite repairing the flaws and to avoid what seems now to be suggested, although perhaps not intended, that the Canadian people will have a tax catastrophe visited upon them which will only be repaired well after the catastrophe has been delivered?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my honourable friend is putting quite a spin on the comments made by the Prime Minister and apparently by the Minister of Finance. I am not familiar with the statements made by the Minister of Finance, but I too saw a television clip of the Prime Minister's question and answer period with the students in Vancouver yesterday.

[Senator Haidasz.]

• (1410)

What the Prime Minister was saying, and the commitment the government makes, is that we will, of course, make any changes or improvements in that tax as dictated by experience. But we will need the experience—

Senator Perrault: You do not need the experience now!

Senator Murray: —of at least one year or so with the tax in effect before we come to any decision as to the changes that should be made.

Senator Perrault: The patient will be dead by the time you get the cure!

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I had the opportunity to watch the Minister of Finance on television this morning. He went further than—

Senator Perrault: He certainly did!

Senator Austin: —the government leader now says in indicating that there are now difficulties with the tax. I am not suggesting that he said he would introduce amendments at this stage; I am saying to the government leader that this would be a good idea.

As to the Prime Minister's statement with respect to books and other educational materials, there is no reason why his views could not be implemented quickly in the Senate. It is a simple enough amendment for the government to introduce.

Senator Perrault: It is easy!

Senator Austin: I suggest that the Prime Minister's word should be his bond.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to the GST I can only repeat what I have said. The Prime Minister's comments, in answer to a question about books, was made in the context of expected revenues from the tax and whether they would be higher or lower than had been anticipated and experienced with the tax over a period of time. He committed, as I think was prudent and sensible to do, to make those changes that are desirable in the light of experience of a year or so.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

KAON PROJECT—CONSTRUCTION OF SCIENCE FACILITY—AVAILABILITY OF FEDERAL FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question with respect to the Kaon Project, a major science project in British Columbia.

Is the Prime Minister discussing this matter with the Government of British Columbia during his visit to British Columbia? Can you tell us whether the opportunity to build this science facility, which is supported in the amount of more than $200 million by the provincial government and more than $200 million by foreign governments and universities, will have its financing completed by the Prime Minister's presence in British Columbia and his desire to bring good news to British Columbia?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with regard to the Kaon Project, I am not aware of any meetings planned during this trip between the Prime Minister and members of the government of British Columbia. Members of that government and others in British Columbia have made representations to the Government of Canada concerning that project. Feasibility studies have already been funded by the Government of Canada and the project has been studied by the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology, which the Prime Minister chairs, and by other government boards and commissions concerned with science policy. I do not expect that an announcement will be made on the matter in the course of the Prime Minister's present trip.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, there is a concern in British Columbia with respect to this project, but particularly with respect to a statement made by the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Kim Campbell, which is quoted in the Vancouver Sun on October 1, 1990, to the effect that the government of British Columbia can hardly expect to be assisted when it is so unhelpful with respect to the GST.

This was something I mentioned in debate a few days ago as raising a serious question of whether or not the government will hold provincial governments to ransom if they are not supportive of various policies of the federal government. This is not, I am sure, a practice of public policy of which Senator Murray would approve. It is a very bad beginning.

During the course of the debate Senator Doody said that it was a deplorable thing for the Minister of Justice to do. I believe I am quoting his words exactly. He said, "Is that not deplorable?"

Senator Doody: At what hour of the morning was that?

Senator Austin: It was at about one in the morning.

I would appreciate the intervention of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations to ensure that an objective assessment of the Kaon project is carried out.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, an objective assessment is being carried out. The problem is not the GST; the problem has to do with the amount of money that would be involved relative to the overall resources that are available in the science field. I certainly do not want to prejudge the case. It is a major undertaking. There is international interest, as the honourable senator has pointed out.

There is also the question of whether the Government of British Columbia might be willing to sweeten its offer.

Senator Austin: It has done so.

Senator Murray: Senator Austin has indicated that it is willing to do so.

There are also the assessments that are done by qualified people in the field of science policy.

All I can tell the honourable senator for the moment is that it is receiving serious consideration. We do understand the importance attached to it by many people in British Columbia. However, a decision has not been reached. I doubt very much that one would be announced in the course of the Prime Minister's present visit to British Columbia.

THE SENATE

DESCRIPTION OF MEMBERSHIP—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, over the years the Prime Minister, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Andre and Mr. Jelinek have described members of this honourable house as political hacks, has-beens and bagmen. He has also used all sorts of other unflattering adjectives to describe honourable senators.

I should like to know whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate feels embarrassed to have his own Prime Minister and some of his colleagues in cabinet describe him in that way. Would he let the members of this house know how the back-benchers of his caucus feel when such a description is given of the membership of this place?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, without betraying any confidences, I want to assure the Senate that I am the first to leap to the defence of honourable senators opposite when they are attacked. I always put forward the case of Senator Bosa as one who is conscientious and dedicated to the public good, and one who uses the Senate for the highest purposes.

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

REFUSAL OF PRIME MINISTER TO MEET WITH DALAI LAMA

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise the Senate why the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs refused several weeks ago to meet with the Dalai Lama, who was visiting Ottawa, since Canada has never recognized China's occupation of Tibet?

• (1420)

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

EFFECT OF GST ON EMPLOYMENT IN SUMMERSIDE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, there is a possibility that the Conservative-dominated Senate will pass the GST by January 1, 1991, over the wishes of the Canadian people. What will happen to jobs in Summerside, Prince Edward Island, if other provinces such as Quebec collect the tax and turn the money over to the federal government? Will the jobs still come to Summerside regardless of how the provinces react?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Yes, honourable senators.

Senator Bonnell: Will it be the same number of jobs as was promised by the Prime Minister?

Senator Murray: Yes, honourable senators.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DECISION TO DISCONTINUE SATURDAY RURAL SERVICE IN P.E.I.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question. For a considerable number of years Prince Edward Island has had rural delivery of mail on Saturdays. Our people have had contracts with Canada Post to deliver the mail on Saturdays.

I understand that Canada Post is discontinuing rural mail delivery on Saturdays. Can the Leader of the Government ask the minister responsible for Canada Post whether or not Canada Post will continue mail delivery on Saturdays to the rural people of Prince Edward Island, as has been done for almost one hundred years.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall bring Senator Bonnell's question to the attention of the Honourable Harvie Andre, who is the minister responsible for Canada Post. I shall endeavour to obtain a reply as soon as possible.

TRANSPORT

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT—FURTHER STUDY ON ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT OF PROPOSED FIXED CROSSING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to ask another question of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. We have heard many times the proposal for a fixed link between the mainland and Prince Edward Island. At every provincial and federal election a promise is made. Then, for reasons unknown, the promise seems to die or be forgotten between elections.

An environmental review panel has studied the proposals which were put forward. That panel tells us that those proposals are not environmentally safe.

Is the Government of Canada, therefore, willing to put forth new proposals which might be environmentally safe so that the province of Prince Edward Island can expect further development and look forward to the prospect of a fixed link with Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the issue is by no means dead. We have the report of the environmental panel before us indicating in what respects the proposal which the panel studied would not be environmentally acceptable. We are examining the report with a view to developing proposals that would be environmentally sound. That should give my honourable friend an opportunity to make up his mind on where he stands on the issue of a fixed link, because we have been waiting a long time to get his opinion on the matter.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, when I get to be Prime Minister of Canada, I will make those decisions very quickly.

Senator Grafstein: Soon, I hope!

Senator Bonnell: But at the present time, I do not have the power to make those decisions and to carry out those wishes. When I get that opportunity, I will certainly make those decisions without delay.

Is the Government of Canada considering the possibility of a tunnel, which certainly would not interfere with the fisheries or be subject to the other environmental objections to a fixed link?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I regret that I cannot be more precise than I have been. We accept the conclusions of the environmental panel regarding the proposal that was before them. We are examining the panel report and the proposal to see if there is a proposal that would be environmentally sound and, of course, economically feasible.

Senator Bonnell: When can we expect a copy of the report the government is considering with regard to a fixed link?

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, I cannot put a date on it. These deliberations do take time.

Senator Bonnell: Could you indicate whether it will be short, long or intermediate?

Senator Murray: In between, honourable senators.

NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE

PROPOSED LOCATIONS OF EXPANSION TEAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I am sure that each and every morning the government leader studies in painstaking detail the column by Jeffrey Simpson in the Globe and Mail. I am sure he has read today's column which is about, of all things, professional hockey. The National Hockey League is about to expand and it has seemed highly likely that the expansion teams would all be from the United States, although teams have applied from Hamilton and, in particular, Ottawa. Mr. Simpson writes in his column this morning that the prospect of an NHL team coming to Ottawa is much brighter than it has been.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Davey: I, personally, happen to believe that professional hockey would be extremely popular in Ottawa. I am wondering what steps your government is prepared to take to assist this to happen. What are you prepared to do to help to bring professional hockey to Ottawa?

Senator Bosa: Are you going to play ball?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, that is a question I will take as notice and I shall inquire elsewhere in the government whether there is a reply that would satisfy my honourable friend.

An Hon. Senator: Perhaps you could move the Canucks here.

Senator Perrault: Don't you move the Canucks!

Senator Phillips: But they are at the bottom. Wouldn't you like to move up?

Senator Murray: It is not a matter that has been given a great deal of consideration by the federal government. We are aware of what is going on because the promoters have been in touch with all of us to let us know of their efforts, and occasionally to ask us to add our representations to theirs. However, no formal consideration has been given by the government to any participation on our part in facilitating this application. It is, as the honourable senator has pointed out, one of several applications from Canada, and there is some question whether it would be appropriate for the federal government to favour one Canadian city over another.

Senator Perrault: You're just skating around the issue!

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, it is highly unlikely that there will be a professional hockey team in any other Canadian city other than Ottawa. Hamilton has had an interesting bid but it appears it will not be getting a team. It will not happen in Saskatoon either. If it is to happen in Canada, it will happen in Ottawa and I think it is something which is in the national interest. As I have said many times and in many places, we have too few national institutions in this country, and I think that bringing professional hockey to Ottawa would be in the interests of Canadians nation-wide. I happen to know, as the government leader knows, that there are a lot of ardent hockey fans on that side of the house and over in the other place, and I think this is an issue you should really seize and do something about.

Senator Perrault: Toronto needs a professional team first!

Senator Murray: I hope that all honourable senators, and the Hansard reporter, heard that.

An Hon. Senator: What?

• (1430)

Senator Murray: Senator Perrault interjected to say Toronto needed a professional team, too.

HOCKEY—PROPOSED NATIONAL SPORT

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, since we are talking about hockey, and since the Leader of the Government in the Senate agrees that Toronto needs a professional hockey team—and I know that is now on the record—is the Government of Canada going to make hockey Canada's national sport?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, officially lacrosse is the national sport of Canada. I do not know whether some action by the government would be required to designate hockey as the national sport, but, in terms of the interest of the vast majority of Canadians, I suppose there is hardly any doubt about the predominant place of hockey in their affections.

Senator Bonnell: Could the leader tell us if the Government of Canada is considering bringing legislation before Parliament to make hockey Canada's national sport?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators.

Senator Simard: You can do that when you are Prime Minister.

Senator Bonnell: I will.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRTEENTH REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, for the adoption of the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Bill C-62, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act), presented in the Senate on 26th September, 1990.—(Honourable Senator Buckwold).

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators—-

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: —I feel like the guest speaker at a lengthy banquet waiting breathlessly ready to rise at any moment to deliver the address while the head table greetings go on and on hour after hour, followed by an interminable introduction; but I very much appreciate the round of applause given to me by both sides of the house.

The actions of the Senate this past month have focused on procedures, and little attention has been paid to the committee report on Bill C-62, respecting the goods and services tax. I am pleased that we are finally ready to debate this report.

Honourable senators, I will be using the word "committee" extensively as I deliver my remarks, because, in fact, I am speaking on behalf of the committee. In using the word "committee" I want to be clear that I am speaking for the majority of the committee, and there are many things that I will say that were not unanimously approved, to say the least. So I want honourable senators to know that in talking about "the committee" I am referring to those of us who represent this side of the house.

Honourable senators, the Senate has performed its constitutional responsibility. It has studied the impact of this legislation in-depth on regions, income groups and the general economy. It heard from citizens, organizations and businesses across the country. It learned of the unfair and inequitable impact the goods and services tax will have on lower income groups. It has been impressed with the multitude of unsolved problems—which have still not been resolved—and the unreadiness of the government. It has been perplexed at the complexity of the legislation, and the difficulties that will be faced by the providers of goods and services as well as consumers.

The committee was alarmed about the inflationary aspect of Bill C-62, and the possible increase in interest rates with the resultant hardship on the economy. It was sympathetic to the hardships that will be created in the high cost of living areas of Canada, and how little compensation will be provided for those who suffer. The committee has felt compassion for the poor, the aged and the uneducated, who will be adversely affected by the regressive nature of further taxing so many of life's necessities and the lack of full indexation to protect them from even further erosion.

It has felt revulsion at the misrepresentation that has been expressed by government propaganda—no tax on health, no tax on rent, no tax on housing, no tax on food, no tax on education, a visible tax, a fair tax, revenue neutral, yet essential for deficit reduction. It is little wonder, honourable senators, that the country questions the ethical standards of the government.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: The committee was disturbed by the apparent tunnel vision of the Minister of Finance, who has not sufficiently studied less regressive alternative tax sources, which would put the tax burden on those who can better afford to pay. The committee was frightened at the prospect of higher GST tax rates, which will be forthcoming, adding to an already impossible tax load on average Canadians. Honourable senators, the committee worried about the opposition of provincial governments in many areas of the country to the GST and the stacking of two consumer taxes on almost everything we buy or use—a situation that does not exist in any other country in the world.

The committee, day by day and month by month, was more and more impressed with the inopportune timing of the legislation. No government should move into such a major inflationary change in the direction of taxation from the ability to pay to consumer spending at the very period when the whole economy is in trouble. A recession is a fact—a fact even admitted by the Minister of Finance.

● (1440)

Honourable senators, a depression is a real possibility. The goods and services tax will only add to the disaster. The Senate committee was startled by the passion of the opposition to this bill expressed by citizens across the country and the obvious lack of any sympathetic response from the Tory government. The committee was appalled at the propaganda of the government in advertising the goods and services tax as a replacement tax when, in fact, services which were never taxed, representing 60 per cent of personal expenditures, will now be under taxation through this bill.

Honourable senators, this is new taxation, not replacement taxation, and the government is still talking about a tax that is just replacing a manufacturers' sales tax.

The committee concluded that it was just not possible to patch up such flawed legislation by amendments. It felt it absolutely necessary to reject Bill C-62 to respond to the feelings of Canadians across this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: In mid-May, when the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce began its hearings on Bill C-62, I believe that most committee members embarked upon the exercise with an open mind. However, as the proceedings unfolded, the problems of this tax became more evident. Some of the technical flaws that arose might have been addressed through amendments to the bill. Other questions which go right to the heart of the bill could not have been dealt with by amendment.

The committee was also impressed by the depth and breadth of the public opposition to this tax. Of the 370 witnesses we heard from coast to coast—and I think I am right when I say that no other parliamentary committee in history has heard 370 witnesses—209 expressed outright opposition to the GST. Although the committee was aware that a majority of Canadians opposed the GST, it was startled at the breadth and depth of the opposition. In every city across Canada in which the committee held hearings, groups, organizations, labour unions and concerned citizens appeared and expressed their fierce opposition to the GST.

An indication of the depth of that opposition to the GST was the fact that 130 witnesses asked the Senate to overrule the House of Commons and reject Bill C-62 completely. At meeting after meeting witnesses were asked: "Do you support the Senate in doing what it constitutionally can do but historically has not done in rejecting this legislation?" And invariably the answer was: "Yes. This is the time the Senate should prove itself."

If senators wish to take the opportunity to read the evidence as printed in the reports of the committee meetings, they will find that that occurred day after day in every meeting that we attended. So, with this in mind, honourable senators, the committee has tabled its thirteenth report dealing with Bill C-62. It is the recommendation of the committee that this bill should not be proceeded with further in the Senate of Canada.

Honourable senators, to reject this bill would be an unprecedented step on the part of the Senate. Indeed, the committee report is itself a dramatic departure from the conventions of the Senate. But this bill is so unacceptable to the people of Canada that drastic action is not only acceptable, it is called for. It is demanded. It is requested by the people of this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, we recognize that the present manufacturers' sales tax is in need of reform, but by "reform" we mean "improvement." The manufacturers' sales tax is good enough that Canada has lived and prospered with it for 60 years, and the Tory government has seen fit to raise it from 9 to 13.5 per cent—an increase of 50 per cent—in six years, taking advantage of the billions of dollars extra that it brought in. They seemed to live with that.

I can say to honourable senators that Bill C-62 removes a tax that has flaws, we agree, but it substitutes for it a tax which, in the opinion of many, indeed most, is even worse than the tax that it is "improving." It is not a reform upon which we should waste our time and resources.

Honourable senators, we considered a number of factors in coming to our conclusion. First, the tax is unfair and regressive. Even more important than the technical flaws in the bill is the matter of fairness. Any tax that is going to raise $18.5 billion per year and constitutes a major part of the federal tax arsenal must meet some basic elements of fairness. The GST and other VAT-type taxes are not generally viewed as meeting those basic requirements.

It is a regressive tax. Lower income individuals spend a greater share of income on consumption and are therefore obliged to pay a greater proportion of their income in sales taxes. To make it more acceptable, the federal government is including a system of enhanced refundable tax credits as part of the GST package. If the basic structure of the tax is going to be determined by the tax credits, then they must continue to be effective. Instead, the provisions of the bill ensure that only temporarily would they do the job which they are meant to do, and, indeed, honourable senators, in the opinion of many, the tax credits are inadequate.

This evidence was given to us time and time again. The credits and the income threshold, after which they decline, are only indexed to take account of inflation in excess of 3 per cent—the same argument that we made on the famous Bill C-28, respecting old age pensions. Again the government, in allowing a gradual erosion of tax credits, is moving in a direction in which the poor get poorer. Thus the real value of the credits would decline over time and an increasing number of individuals and families would have their benefits reduced. Eventually even the very poor would not be protected from the extra costs imposed by the GST.

Indeed, after only five years, some families could lose up to $300 of the real value of their credits, which amounts to one-half the maximum value of credits for which they are going to be eligible.

There is also erosion by inflation, which is not protected by the government. This is that inhuman direction which has been taken through not fully indexing assistance programs to those who need it, with the exception, under pressure, of the old age pension; and, honourable senators, to make matters even worse, an important credit is denied to some individuals who are most in need—amazingly, the single-person credit.

If someone is single, he is granted an extra credit, but this credit is not available to individuals with incomes below $6,000 per year—and, believe me, there are people with incomes of less than $6,000 per year. But they do not get a single-person credit. The reason given is that this will be an incentive to people to work. Honourable senators, these are the people most in need. The full amount of this credit is not available until a person earns $11,000 per year. To those of us who have some feeling of compassion, it would seem that a credit should be highest at the lowest income level and lower as we move up the ladder. But no, under this legislation a person receives nothing if his income is below $6,000, and not until his income is $11,000 will he receive the maximum benefit.

Therefore, honourable senators, we believe that the tax is regressive right from the start. Even if this were not the case, it would be regressive after only a few years because of the inflation factor. We also believe that the goods and services tax rate, presently 7 per cent, will increase in the future with an ever greater reliance being placed upon this tax by the government.

New Zealand is often referred to as a country in which a goods and services tax seems to have worked, although we heard evidence in committee that this was not the case. New Zealand, the good example, in six years since the inception or introduction of this tax has increased its rate by 25 per cent. Any tax that is going to play an important part of fiscal strategy should be a fair tax. The goods and services tax, as presently included in this legislation, is not a fair tax.

● (1450)

The tax is also unfair to those who live in remote regions of Canada. The system of tax credits does not take into account the higher cost of living faced by residents in those areas. Thus, families in the north with standards of living similar to those in the south will enjoy less protection against the adverse consequences of the tax. Very high prices there will mean even higher taxes for people, most of whom have lower incomes.

Senator Lucier was present when we heard about the cost of living of people in the far north. Sometimes the cost of goods are double or even higher and then the tax will be applied to the price of the purchases. It will be an unfair burden on those with lower incomes for example, the native people we heard from who will have to suffer the consequences of this even higher rate in their areas. Imagine what it will cost on transportation, which is already high. The 7 per cent added to the price of air fares will add to the cost of travel in the far north.

Honourable senators, I want to talk about what probably is one of the most important aspects, and that is the inflationary pressure of Bill C-62. The government has stated that there will be a 1.25 per cent inflation rate, and that is based on two assumptions. First, that the present manufacturers' sales tax will be completely removed immediately and the savings will be passed on to consumers; that prices will come down, the goods and services tax will be added, and there will be a slight increase overall of 1.25 per cent.

I am a businessman and I know exactly what will happen. There will be some reductions on big ticket items. Certainly, automobiles will come down in price, but not nearly as much as the Prime Minister says they will come down. Not long ago in the Maritimes he used figures that were almost double, which again is part of the misinformation that goes on. Certainly some prices will come down and people always use the example of new cars. However, how about the price of used cars or a trade-in car? I am not sure that the savings will be nearly as much as the government would like to advertise.

Another significant impact on prices is the government ruling that those who have paid the present 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax will not receive a rebate on that 13.5 per cent already paid, but will receive 8.1 per cent. I am involved in a business with much merchandise on our floor on which 13.5 per cent has been paid. The government is going to give us a cheque for the manufacturers' sales tax of 8.1 per cent and they want us to take a loss of 5 per cent on the cost of goods and therefore just reduce the prices.

The Canadian Importers Association represents people with inventories of tens of millions of dollars. They stated to the committee that they could prove that they had paid 13.5 per cent and asked why will the government refund only 8.1 per cent and expect us to pass on a 13.5 per cent saving as the tax is dropped? They told us that they were not going to do it, that they were not stupid. If you have a $5 million inventory, you are not going to lose $250,000 like that.

Some prices will come down, but because of the way the government has organized the whole procedure of tax rebates through the manufacturers' sales tax, it is not going to achieve a 1.25 per cent inflation rate. Not at all.

Many in business will know that there will have to be a bigger markup. I have talked to representatives of major companies who say quietly that they are going to pass on whatever savings they can, but because of the cost of administration and the fact that sales will be lower without the tax added to the bottom, gross profits will drop because the gross profit is based on a selling price before tax. Therefore, markup has to be increased. Honourable senators who have any relationship with how businesses operate know that a gross markup has to be maintained. I may be making a lengthy point of this, but I am attempting to show how, in fact, the 1.25 per cent inflation factor is not realistic. It is the type of dream world one gets from members of bureaucracy who put it into the computer and the result is that they think the full manufacturers' tax will be rebated. It will not happen, and most of us know that.

The second point is that the government assumes that labour will not ask for any additional funds or increases in wages to protect them against the GST. Dozens of labour organizations appeared before the committee and the first point made was that they will get full protection for the GST in every contract they possible can. I can only tell you, honourable senators, that they already have. I was going to bring the headline in The Financial Post of September 21, which stated, "Ford Deal Reflects Unions' GST Worry." They negotiated a very good deal. It provided not only for a cost of living increase, but had built into it protection against the goods and services tax, the increase in the cost of living and the inflationary factor.

Added to that is the fact that services will now be taxed. Clothing and footwear has never been taxed, and all those items will go up immediately very extensively.

The assumptions of the government and the think tanks, such as the Economic Council and some of those others which use those criteria as they feed the program into their computers, is based on erroneous information. Others who do those projections have stated that the inflation rate can go up to 3 per cent as a result of the goods and services tax, keeping in mind that the service end of the expenditures of an average family represent a cost greater than the cost of goods. The committee was amazed to hear from the Department of Statistics that 60 per cent of the expenditure of an average family goes toward services which are presently untaxed, such as haircuts, taxis, funeral expenses, plumbing expenses, tax on transportation, and postage stamps which will go up to 43 cents from 40 cents at the beginning of the year.

When the inflationary factor is built in to 60 per cent of peoples' expenditures, let us keep in mind that the load will be placed on lower income people who will be paying tax on a good part of their expenditures. Basic groceries are exempt, but most services will bear the impact of the goods and services tax. If anyone believes there is not a significant inflationary factor much higher than the government is anticipating, at a time when we could do nothing worse than add to the inflationary pressure in the economy, then I suppose that they would support the goods and services tax. It just does not work that way.

• (1500)

impact of the GST, in spite of what the government tells you. All it does is hide the tax. Eventually, the rent has to go up.

Long term residential rents are to be tax exempt under the GST, but contrary to the fact that the supporters of the GST cite this as evidence that housing affordability will not be adversely affected, the committee evidence shows quite the opposite. In Montreal we were told that rents could increase by as much as $40 to $60 per month. In Vancouver we were told that the increase could be as high as $57 a month. In Ontario, the increase in newly constructed units of rent is expected to be about $50 per month. In Ontario, one-half of all tenants with incomes below $25,000 already spend at least 30 per cent of their incomes on rent. The introduction of the GST would worsen this situation.

Some people are looking quizzical and are asking, "Why will rents go up?" The fact is, yes, there is no GST on rent, but the landlord, the owner of the property, has to pay GST with no rebate. So he will pay on his electricity costs, repair costs, janitorial services and heating costs et cetera. Who will bear the brunt of this? Most people indicate that the minimum raise in rent as a result of the GST will be 2 per cent. Add that to other inflationary factors and you will see what will happen to rental costs. Again, let us think about those people who are spending 30 per cent and 35 per cent of their income just to have a roof over their heads. Some of us have some compassion for those people.

Nor does exempt status protect patients of health care services from higher taxes. It merely hides those increased taxes. Added to that, only prescription drugs are exempt. Canadians will pay tax on aspirin tablets—although health is not being taxed—because they do not have to have a prescription for them. Interestingly enough, some of the medical witnesses said to us that they are worried about this, because patients will come to them and demand a prescription for aspirin,—a highly utilized drug—because if they do so they will not have to pay the tax. These are the little complications the committee heard about. But, in the meantime, the doctor has no way of passing on his increase.

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Buckwold: He will pay a tax on his office and on everything he buys—in other words, on his equipment and all the services provided. Granted he will get a bit back because some prices might come down, but he has to pay it on his rent. Nevertheless, he cannot charge his patients more because he receives his payment from a health plan.

Senator Haidasz: Most unfair!

Senator Buckwold: It was told to us by the medical associations that this will cost $100 million a year, spread across the whole country. Unless medical doctors can get an increase from their provincial health plans, this cost will have to be borne out of their pocket. Some people say that they can afford it, but where is this business of no increase in health costs to the consumer? On the other hand, a dentist who is paid by his patients, will just raise his rates and cover his extra costs in that way.

Honourable senators, Canadians should not be misled into thinking that food is not being taxed. Spending on basic groceries constitutes only a fraction of their food dollar. It is only basic groceries that are tax free. We have also heard that the GST imposes high compliance costs on a wide range of producers, and those higher costs will be passed on to consumers. In other words, again you have to have a bigger markup. Thus the cost of food will rise.

Let me tell you one of the amazing things that came up. This is a statistic that most of us found almost unbelievable. The Canadian Restaurant Association told us that although food is not being taxed, 40 per cent of the food dollar is spent in restaurants. People are eating out.

An Hon. Senator: They go to McDonald's!

Senator Buckwold: We have working families where both husband and wife work and they go to McDonald's. They take the kids out two or three times a week. We all know that; it happens in our own families. It is stated that 40 per cent of the food dollar is being spent in restaurants and outside eating places. These meals will be fully taxed. That is a burden that should not be passed on to those who can least afford it.

Senator Haidasz: That is right.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, the tax is too complex. As presented in Bill C-62, the tax is not the GST outlined in the 1987 White Paper on Tax Reform. It is a more complicated tax. It is much more akin to a European-style invoice VAT. More importantly, the federal government is proposing to bring in a tax at the retail level when retail sales taxes are also imposed by the provinces. Such a dual tax regime exists nowhere else in the world. Its introduction in Canada would make even the best designed GST a compliance nightmare. No other country in the world is imposing a value-added tax added to a provincial, state, or other kind of tax, as we will do under this legislation.

Because the government has chosen to use three categories of tax status under the GST—that is, fully taxable, tax-free and tax-exempt—great difficulties are imposed on those who provide goods and services in more than one class. Many small retailers sell both taxable and tax-free food products. An examination of the bill's definition of "basic groceries" would make it clear just how difficult it is to distinguish between the two.

Just as bad is the situation in which many non-profit organizations find themselves. Their services are both taxable and tax exempt. These organizations must be able to distinguish between the two in order to charge tax only on the appropriate services or goods.

What is more complicated, honourable senators, however, is the needed apportionment of input costs between the two types of output in order to claim input tax credits. I am sure you all follow that in every detail. However, most of our witnesses could not understand that, and little wonder!

Senator Frith: Could you repeat what you said about input and output.

Senator Buckwold: Concerning input and output, small businesses normally bear a compliance burden many times higher than that borne by larger firms. That is why most of the opposition comes from small business, the basic business of the whole country. By volume and numbers, small- and medium-sized businesses are the backbone of the country.

Senator Stanbury: And by employment, also.

Senator Buckwold: Yes, especially by employment. But we will come to that later.

Furthermore, the complications that exist in Bill C-62 weigh most heavily on the small business sector. This compliance burden is not only bad for the economy, but it also represents another element of the unfairness of the GST.

Honourable senators, it is bad for the economy. It is ironic that the sector of the economy with the greatest future potential is the one that we harm most by the GST. I am, of course, speaking of the tourism sector. The GST is the worst tax that could be imposed on this sector. It will discourage non-residents from vacationing in Canada and will encourage Canadians to vacation abroad. A recent poll showed that with the GST in place—and this figure will astound honourable senators—47 per cent of Canadians will vacation in the United States instead of in Canada. This will not occur just because of the implementation of the GST but because our prices are so much higher than are those the American. This is just the last straw. Instead of someone in Toronto taking a trip to Vancouver or to Halifax they might as well go to California or Florida.

● (1510)

More generally, the effects of the GST will be exceptionally serious for our border areas. Centres of population close to the U.S. border already suffer very severe competition from people going across do their shopping because of lower prices that will be exaggerated and greatly increased. Everyone living in border cities who appeared before us indicated that this was a very major problem.

I further say that the economy is into a recession. Even Mr. Wilson has finally admitted it. Some say that it will be not just a recession but that it is the beginning of a serious depression, which is a much better description of the situation. Growth is slowing. Unemployment is increasing to dangerous levels.

Except for the Department of Finance most analysts of the GST expect that it will harm economic growth when introduced. Bill C-62 in its present form will likely exaggerate the current economic downturn very significantly. Quite frankly, this is one of the major problems that Mr. Wilson will have to face.

He has not been a very lucky Minister of Finance, although he made some of his own bed to sleep in. He had good times. But right now it is not a great time to introduce a tax such as the goods and services tax.

Senator Frith: Can you think of a Minister of Finance who ended up with the nickname Lucky?

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Buckwold: I can think of one, but I will not mention his name.

Honourable senators, let us face reality. If I had been the Minister of Finance or Mr. Mulroney I would have hoped that the committee would say, "Postpone this bill. Come in with a recommendation and change the date to January 1, 1992. That would give us time to let this thing work through and solve some of our problems. Basically, let's get over what likely will be a serious economic downturn with heavy unemployment exacerbated by the impact of the GST". Quite frankly, as chairman of the committee I felt at one time that is what we should do. But even then it would have accepted the principle of the proposal, which I do not find acceptable.

Senator Murray: Even though you voted for it at second reading?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, Oh!

Senator Buckwold: We voted for it at the second reading stage only so we could get it to the committee.

Senator Murray: It was approval in principle.

Senator Perrault: It was just to get it to committee, and you know it.

Senator Buckwold: It was so that we could start to deal with it as soon as possible. We were doing the best we could to manage to get it to committee and bring it in on time.

Senator Frith: I think that it went on division, did it not?

Senator Buckwold: Yes, it went on division.

Senator Murray: In any case, it was approval in principle.

Senator Buckwold: We were very happy to be able to get it to committee. We wanted to make sure that we had a proper study of the bill.

Honourable senators, it is also useful to view the goods and services tax in the context of current monetary policy. The Bank of Canada is pursuing a policy of tight money to lower the rate of inflation. The result of this policy is high interest rates. Now the GST will cause a rise in prices immediately, which might set off a wage-price spiral.

Senator Murray is looking at me quizzically. All I know is that the Governor of the Bank of Canada assured the committee that he will accommodate a 1.25 per cent one-time increase in prices, but not a higher increase. I have indicated to honourable senators that in the opinion of many that increase will be significantly higher.

Since the estimated price increase is based on the most favourable of circumstances, it is possible that the introduction of the GST will lead to higher interest rates. Higher interest rates are the last thing that the economy now needs. Added to that the war in the Gulf has brought inflationary pressure to a new high in recent times. This is without a doubt the worst time to introduce a tax such as the GST.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: If the government had any sense it would announce to the Canadian public that it would like another year to work on this legislation in order to get over these problems. We know that will not happen. The government has never admitted to a mistake thus far.

The government has also failed to take into account large sectors of the economy which are uncompetitive and regulated. This includes taxes on telephones, electric power and transportation. What provision has the government made to ensure that all of these sectors lower their prices sufficiently when the GST is introduced? Some $19 million was the cost of the GST Consumer Information Office, which is completely ineffective. Everyone knows that. I suggest that a further waste of taxpayers' money, along with the tens of millions spent on propaganda advertising, is the price of all the various programs that are being instigated by the government at a tremendous cost to the Canadian people.

Finally, and most important, the government assumes that organized labour will turn a blind eye to any increase in prices. Believe me, this is definitely not the story we heard from labour people time after time. These groups fully intend to address any reduction in their purchasing power through higher wages. Furthermore, these groups expect the inflationary effect of the GST to be substantially higher than the government's estimate.

Honourable senators, the bill is flawed. On a technical level, Bill C-62 is riddled with flaws that alone are more than enough reason to kill this bill.

Chapter 26 of the committee's report details the various recommendations for change and indicates the inordinate number of problems that exist. Let me give honourable senators some idea of the extent of the inadequacies.

One of the government's prime arguments for introducing the tax was to correct relative price distortions generated by the existing sales tax. According to the 1987 White Paper on Sales Tax Reform, "widely different effective tax rates are harmful to the economy" because these distort consumer choices. Yet the GST would abolish one set of price distortions only to introduce a new set of price distortions.

For example, food and beverages would face differential taxation based on their classification and the size of the package. Soft drinks would be taxed, while mineral water and coffee would not. Chocolate bars would be taxed, but chocolate-covered cookies would not be taxed. Yogurt served in single servings would be taxed, while yogurt contained in packages of multiple servings would not be taxed. Food served in restaurants would be taxable, yet prepared frozen food supplies in supermarkets would not be taxed. On the other hand, if you buy from a supermarket a roast chicken which is kept in a warming oven you would pay the tax on it.

Can you imagine the difficulties facing a small retailer in trying to explain these distinctions to an irate customer?

Honourable senators, the GST will have a harmful effect on charities and the non-profit sector. There was hardly an hour went by in our hearings that we did not have one of these groups in front of us indicating the problems that will be created for the non-profit sector and charities. Its application to sales by workshops employing handicapped persons and on Remembrance Day wreaths are but two examples. Imagine taxing Remembrance Day wreaths!

The application of the tax to the amateur sports community is completely without justification. National sports organizations will be entitled to a 50 per cent rebate of GST paid on purchases, while provincial organizations will not receive the rebate unless they are at least 40 per cent funded by the government.

Senator Stewart: What about religious goods?

Senator Buckwold: I will come to that. In the past, government has continually tried to wean organizations away from public funding. Yet, you do not get a rebate unless you are 40 per cent government funded. It is inconsistent and arbitrary to simultaneously urge non-profit organizations to reduce their reliance on government funding, then to penalize these bodies for achieving that goal. There were dozens of recreation firms and sports groups—people who try to raise money by selling cookies door-to-door and do other things to keep these sports organizations going—saying that they no longer relied on government funding and, because of that, they will not receive a 50 per cent tax rebate.

The harmful effect of the GST on charities and non-profit organizations does not stop there. The GST will also impose a significant compliance burden on these organizations. They will need to apportion costs between taxable and non-taxable goods they sell in order to receive the 50 per cent rebate and claim input tax credits. They must also collect and remit the tax. This will represent a formidable task for business. For charities and non-profit organizations that must rely on volunteers, we were told that it is oppressive.

Honourable senators, the compliance burden for municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals—the so-called MUSH sector—will also be onerous. The Federation of Prince Edward Island Municipalities told the committee that small municipalities simply cannot cope with the GST. Larger municipalities, such as Toronto, are facing higher labour costs as a result of the GST. I should like to read a letter addressed to the Senate of Canada from the Mayor of Toronto. Toronto is the largest city and the economic heartland of the country. The mayor should be considered by the government as a reliable witness.

Senator Barootes: Is the mayor a Grit?

Senator Hastings: You asked him; we did not.

Senator Buckwold: This letter is dated October 11. The mayor said:

> I am writing on behalf of the people of Toronto to urge you to defeat the proposed Federal Goods and Services Tax.
> It is not without some trepidation that I ask you to overturn the decision of an elected house. However, the Senate has the constitutional right and the moral obligation to reject such ill-conceived measures as the GST, > which threatens disastrous consequences upon Canadians and our already battered economy in general.

> The brief of the City of Toronto to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on July 18, 1990, which was unanimously supported by the Toronto City Council . . .

And I would guess that there are even some Tories on that council,

> . . . outlined our deep concerns regarding the GST: it will damage, to name a few, our valuable services, fashion, film, publishing and tourism industries; it will hit hard those most vulnerable in our community, for example, those who live in weekly rent rooming houses will be compelled to pay a GST . . .

If you pay by the week, you have to pay a GST right at the top.

> . . . and it will act as a serious damper on our economy, one that threatens to turn an economic downturn into a veritable tailspin. For these reasons, I urge you to take decisive action and defeat the GST.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: It is signed by Art Eggleton, Mayor of Toronto.

Senator Perrault: It is the same in B.C.

Senator Buckwold: A representative from the City of Edmonton appeared before the committee. Keep in mind that Edmonton operates many commercial activities. They have their own power plant and electrical system and their own telephone system. Their representative told the committee that the tax bill for the City of Edmonton will rise by $20 million a year because of the taxation of city-operated commercial services.

The GST will hurt those companies carrying on business with municipalities because of the bias of municipalities towards non-taxable work done in-house, as opposed to taxable work that is contracted out. There is an advantage for cities and municipalities to do their own work with their own workforce rather than contract it out, which is generally the best way to do it.

Although the proposed GST rebate system is supposed to ensure that the MUSH—that is, municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals—sector pays no more sales tax under the GST than under the existing federal sales tax, the system is flawed.

Firstly, the rebates offered are based on the average amount of sales tax paid by each of the MUSH sectors, not on the actual amount of tax paid by each individual organization. Again, this is a generalization that has very serious consequences for many of the people who are involved. As a result, the tax bill of some organizations will rise under the new regime.

Secondly, the rebate system, which involves paying out sales taxes and claiming it back later, will impose a substantial cashflow penalty on participating organizations. The Canadian Hospital Association calculated that the sector's cashflow burden will have to be borne by hospitals; that is, the money they pay out that they will get back from the government will constitute a cashflow burden to the hospitals in the amount of $95 million per year. I am sure that many of you, as prominent citizens of your communities, have been involved with hospitals. You know the financial problems they have.

The GST will impose an unfair tax burden on cooperatives. That is one aspect that really hits home, and it was pointed out to us right across the country, especially in the maritimes and western Canada where cooperatives are such a major factor in economic life. The share capital that people put in to join a co-op will be treated as a membership. In other words, if someone wants to belong to a co-op and puts in $2,000 or $3,000, they will pay a 7 per cent tax on what otherwise would be common shares.

Senator Barootes: They pay $5 to join. Come on!

Senator Buckwold: Read some of the evidence that was given to us, if you can read, Senator Barootes.

Senator Cools: We know he is a slow reader.

Senator Buckwold: The co-ops complain that taxing direct charges that are paid by customers in lieu of higher shelf markups and forcing them to account for the GST at several levels of their organization will be an added expense and burden.

The committee believes that this application of the GST to cooperatives is unacceptable. They have appealed time after time to the Minister of Finance but with no results. They represent millions of consumers across the country. Surely, they should receive some response from the government about the problem that they face. These organizations provide a valuable service to this country, and they should be encouraged rather than discriminated against.

● (1530)

Honourable senators, contrary to the impression given by the government, as I said earlier, health care services will bear the GST. Although public health care facilities would receive a tax rebate based on that sector's current FST burden, non-profit, long-term-care facilities would receive a lesser rebate of 50 per cent of sales tax. It gets more and more complicated as you go along, and I do not expect everyone to understand all the things I am discussing because it took me a long time to understand them. Those long-term facilities operated for profit, such as private nursing chains, will not be eligible for any rebate on the tax paid on their purchases. So that has to represent an increase in the cost of staying in those homes and, therefore, the cost of most long-term-care facilities must go up.

The committee also heard that a number of important health care practitioner services would be taxable under the GST. The list includes psychoanalytic psychotherapists for children, massage therapists, dieticians, social workers, veterinarians and Christian Scientists. The Christian Science delegation was interesting. Their health care practitioners are presently eligible for provincial payment for services rendered for health. Under the federal goods and services tax, they will be charging their patients, by law, a tax of seven per cent.

Senator Hastings: It's a tax on religion!

Senator Buckwold: Yes, a tax on health and religion. We have had many representations—and I am sure many senators received correspondence—from those who feel that this is a very discriminatory action.

As I indicated, if all of those services that I outlined, such as dieticians and social workers, are performed in a hospital, there is no tax. If they are performed in private consultation, then there will be tax payable. I do not blame them for coming to the committee and appealing for relief so that they would not have to add that burden onto those who come to them.

I have said that physicians' services would be exempt under the GST, but they would not be permitted to raise their fees to compensate for the increased costs of their inputs. Thus, physicians are being asked to bear the cost of the GST in the form of lower incomes.

Funerals will be taxed. We heard a lot about the funeral tax, and if Senator Barootes does not mind me using my old line, this whole business of funeral taxes reminds me of the midwife who married the undertaker so that they could get people coming and going! This is exactly what the government has done: It has got them coming and going—the midwife married to the undertaker—because you will pay a tax for the midwife and you will pay a tax on your funeral. What I once thought was just a funny line has become a reality in Canada. That is what the government is doing.

The government has also suggested that education will not be taxed under the GST, yet the evidence shows that many non-credit courses will be taxable, as will books; and this is where we come to our bibles and other educational materials purchased by students.

The Alberta Association for Continuing Education, in particular, objected strongly to the government's assertion that education would not be taxed:

> We have seen one advertisement that has been running which suggests that the GST will have no impact whatsoever on education. That is a blatantly false statement from our perspective. We would certainly appreciate if the advertising in support of the GST being purchased by the federal government was more accurate.

Senator Hastings: Lies! Lies!

Senator Buckwold: It is worth noting that this is yet another instance of the government producing misleading advertising on the GST.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Senators: Lies! Lies!

Senator Buckwold: Please allow me to clarify the issue of education costs. The law says you do not have to pay the tax on a diploma-granting course that you take at a registered university or college.

Senator Fairbairn: A credit course.

Senator Buckwold: Yes, a credit course. However, if you want to take an upgrading course and pay for it, such as a stenographic, computer course, language course or literacy course, you will have to pay the GST.

Senator Barootes: Bill C-21 will look after that!

Senator Hastings: You look after nobody!

Senator Buckwold: The government is attempting to make some minor changes through regulations, but what I am really getting at is that anybody who tells you that education is not being taxed is not being truthful, because education is being taxed.

Senator Perrault: They would still have to believe in the tooth fairy!

Senator Buckwold: The taxation of reading materials is another aspect that I find very objectionable. Not only will this measure affect the quality of education by limiting the number of books placed on post-secondary curricula, it represents a giant step backward in the promotion of literacy.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: Taxing newspapers, magazines and books has never been done in Canada, and is unacceptable to Canadians.

Senator Perrault: Unbelievable! Shame!

Senator Haidasz: Even Maclean's?

Senator Buckwold: Yes, even Maclean's. Yesterday in Vancouver the Prime Minister seemed absolutely startled when asked a question about this issue by a student. I saw it on television. The student asked, "Why are you taxing bibles?" and the Prime Minister seemed almost, as I say, startled by the question.

Senator Hastings: Stunned!

Senator Buckwold: Perhaps "stunned" is the better word. He mumbled that he was not quite sure about it, but obviously, he really knew nothing about it, which is, I think, the general state of his knowledge about the whole impact of this legislation.

Senator Cools: That is his actual state.

Senator Haidasz: Tell us about beer!

Senator Buckwold: We had representation from the Canadian Brewers Association in which they complained bitterly that the cost of beer will go up, in spite of what the government has said in its propaganda.

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Buckwold: When it is served outside of a liquor store, in a tavern or a restaurant, the price of beer will go up quite considerably. That evidence is available, if anyone wants to read it, in the transcripts of the committee hearings.

Now, honourable senators, it gets worse as we go along. I am sorry to be taking so much time.

Senator Perrault: No, no! Carry on!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Senators: More, more!

Senator Buckwold: I think that, if you had listened to the litany of problems, you would understand how the opinions of members of the committee changed as we moved across the country from a position where we thought we might make some amendments, to one of more serious consideration, and eventually, almost involuntarily, to one where every member of the committee on our side came to the conclusion that this legislation had to be rejected, as a result of all of the evidence that we heard across the country.

Senator Barootes: Would you entertain a question?

Senator Buckwold: No, not at the moment, not even an entertaining question.

Senator Cools: There are lots of taxes on entertainment!

Senator Buckwold: The property and casualty insurance companies, for those of you who are in that business, would also be hit hard by this tax in a very unfair manner. Although the industry is exempt under the GST, it should not be construed as a benefit. Indeed, the property and casualty insurers have repeatedly asked that they be subject to the GST in order to be able to claim input tax credits. They want to be taxed, but they are not. Instead, the industry would have to pay GST on claims settled after December 31, 1990, but would not be able to claim this tax as an input tax credit. In other words, those claims, which run into hundreds of millions of dollars, for things like accidents and fires, will have to have a tax put on them because of the service provided. The companies will have to bear that loss. The insurers stated to the committee that they will be required to settle claims after December 31, 1990, but those claims will be funded by lower premiums collected prior to the GST implementation date.

● (1540)

They said it has been calculated that the GST will reduce capital and reserves in that industry by about $350 million, with the decrease, in at least one company, exceeding the combined profits of the past two years.

This is a little difficult to follow sometimes, but it soon becomes very understandable that a liability sitting out there has to be accounted for on the balance sheets. Representatives of the property and casualty insurers appeared before the committee pleading their case in most of the cities we visited.

Honourable senators, in defence of the GST it has been suggested that its invoicing requirements to claim input tax credits might bring some of the underground economy out into the open. That is the story we have heard. That is true to a degree, in that the only way one can get the input tax credit is to claim back the output tax credit, and vice versa. We have been told that this will make people honest.

We were told that the introduction of the GST would drive an even larger segment of the economy underground, and let me explain that. Under the GST, purchases by businesses would require an invoice in order to qualify for an input tax credit. That would encourage the issue of invoices on business-to-business sales. However, there would be no incentive to issue an invoice when the sale is made to the final consumer who, by definition, is not eligible to claim the input tax credit. In fact, the incentive to account for sales to final consumers is substantially reduced with the application of a new 7 per cent sales tax, since firms that do not charge a tax on their sales have an obvious advantage. In other words, the underground economy develops.

Furthermore, the quick method of GST accounting reduces the incentive to account for sales on business-to-business sales. Under the quick method, a business making taxable sales may simply pay a flat rate of tax based on sales without accounting for tax paid on inputs. The quick method would apply only to smaller operations, and the applicable rate would vary according to the types of sales made. For instance, firms involved in manufacturing or services would pay a flat rate of 5 per cent on sales but would not be able to claim input credits for the tax paid on their purchases. Because businesses using this method of GST accounting cannot also claim input tax credits, they have no incentive to obtain invoices from their suppliers.

Does this sound complicated? It is. I can tell you that there will develop a substantial underground economy, not just to avoid the GST, but to avoid the provincial sales tax and income taxes. Already the growing underground economy is taking billions of dollars of revenue from the Government of Canada.

Another problem with the tax lies in its application to native people. Although Bill C-62 is silent on the issue of taxation of Indians, the government is interpreting section 87 of the Indian Act to mean that the GST will not apply to purchases made by Indians on reserves or purchases made off the reserves that are delivered to the reserves. In other words, a registered Indian would not pay the GST if he or she lived on a reserve or had the goods purchased delivered to the reserve, but all other purchases made by Indians would be taxable.

Native witnesses objected strenuously that under Treaties Indians should not be subject to this tax. This fundamental disagreement between the native peoples and the government has not been resolved. I predicted that this will lead to serious disruption, and those honourable senators who attended the committee meetings at which representatives from a variety of tribes appeared—and that was in several cities across the country—can understand my concern, and that is the militancy that was expressed by these people who feel that they are protected by law but are not being listened to by the Government of Canada.

Honourable senators, in contrast to the existing federal sales tax that lies buried in the price of many goods, the GST was promoted by the government as being a visible tax. Honourable senators will recall that this was going to be a "visible" tax. However, based on the evidence the committee heard it seems that the GST will also be invisible in many cases. Most cash registers simply are not equipped to handle separately the application of the provincial sales tax on top of the proposed goods and services tax. Some retailers, such as Sears, have indicated they would show GST exclusive prices, in other words, the price plus the GST. Woolworths and others have stated that they will include the GST in the posted price. If the price is $9.95 for an item, the GST would be included in that $9.95 price. So there are two types of merchandising philosophies.

It now appears that visibility has been sacrificed, and the best the government can do is require vendors to have a sign stating that the retail price is GST included. There is no guarantee of visibility at all. The government knew that that was not possible, yet the original concept was a "visible tax" and we are still being told in propaganda materials being sent to homes across the country that it is visible.

The exemption of a number of services to the GST has also diminished the visibility of the tax. Exemption under the GST does not remove the tax, it only hides it. To the extent that landlords pay GST on their costs, monthly rents will rise. To the extent the dentist has to pay GST on purchases, that will show up in higher dental fees. The same applies to day care services. The amount of tax contained in the final price for any of these services would be invisible to the purchaser. This is another example of a tax that is supposed to be visible but is buried in the price.

Honourable senators, these are a small number of the many technical problems that the committee heard about, and I certainly have not exhausted the list. I can give honourable senators a list of other problems that were pointed out to the committee. There are problems respecting prepaid funerals, used goods, works of art, customs brokers, exporters, periodical marketers, telecommunications carriers, flower wire service operators, brewers, jewellers, investment advisory services, with some burden being imposed on agriculture.

Honourable senators, this is a tax grab not a tax reform. The government claims that it will raise approximately the same amount of revenues from the GST as it would get from the existing FST. However, the GST would also impose a significant administrative burden. Originally estimated at $200 million, the cost of administering this tax is now almost double that. The current estimate is approximately $380 million. That extra money must come from somewhere. It will come from the taxpayers. It will also impose a higher compliance burden on businesses, especially small businesses. These costs must be paid by someone. As I have said, they are likely to be paid by the consumers.

Witnesses told the committee that the government is going through the exercise of introducing the GST in order to put in place a tax which would significantly raise future revenues.

● (1550)

The government did not say that; the witnesses said that. For example, the Minister of Finance for British Columbia said:

> It is no secret that the federal government sees the GST as a solution to stem the red ink and slow the growth of the mountain of debt . . . I am frustrated by the federal mindset that sees a tax grab as the only solution to our fiscal dilemma.

Yesterday the Prime Minister, while in Vancouver, said that the GST is revenue neutral, but went on to finally say that if it should produce extra money the government will find a place for it. What a farce!

Senator Perrault: I bet they will!

Senator Buckwold: He did not say it would be used to reduce the deficit. I will digress at this moment to discuss a major concern in this country: the deficit. I think the government should have been frank, honest and forthcoming in discussing the problem of the deficit. This country is going through a crisis. If we do not look out, we will end up being a South American republic as far as our finances are concerned.

The government said it is going to appeal to the citizens of this country to do something about the deficit. It is going to do something that it does not like to do because this is not a fair tax, but a sacrifice is going to have to be made. Those of you who have my coloured hair will remember that during the war years we had to make a sacrifice. A 100 per cent excess profit tax was charged to businesses. If a business made more money than it did before the war, it had to pay 100 per cent of that profit to the government, although I believe that 20 per cent was later returned. We were happy to do that because it was a war effort. Now we are in a fiscal war.

If the government had told Canadians in a frank and honest way that it needed this money to do something about the deficit, that it could raise $10 billion more than it could with the manufacturers' sales tax, and had committed itself to reducing the deficit, Canadians would have responded. They would have recognized the major problem facing this country and that the government had to do something extraordinary and commit every extra penny that was raised to lowering the deficit.

As a matter of fact, when we were in Vancouver this summer, the Fraser Institute representative, Mr. Walker, who supported the tax in principle, voiced his opposition because there was no commitment that the money raised would reduce the deficit. We do not know exactly what will be done with that money.

Eventually this tax will increase, as it has in every other country in the world that has this tax, to bring in billions of dollars. The government denies that, but Mr. Wilson would not go through the kind of punishment he is enduring today if he did not have something in mind that would pay off in the end. It would be ridiculous for him to be hissed at and booed everywhere he goes if he did not have something in mind. But he did not make a commitment that that money would reduce the deficit. If he had, perhaps Canadians would have responded differently, and perhaps our committee would have made a different recommendation in its report.

So we have the government saying in Vancouver yesterday, through the Prime Minister, that this tax is revenue neutral, and if there is extra money it has ways to use it. We know what those ways will be. The government will advance a series of giveaway programs to the voters for the next election—a nice bunch of "gimme" items that will ensure the re-election of a government that is presently unpopular. That is where the money will go. We need the commitment that every penny of this extra tax will be used to reduce the deficit. In its first year the tax will be revenue neutral, but watch what will happen after that. I hope somewhere along the line that commitment will be made. So far it has not been forthcoming. This is part of the propaganda we have heard.

The Canadian Advertising Foundation agrees that this tax is not simply a replacement tax. The standards division of the Canadian Advertising Foundation ruled that the government radio advertising stating that the GST will be applied on a broader basis that the FST, including such services as restaurant meals and haircuts, is not a replacement tax, but it is a new tax. The Better Business Bureaus of Vancouver and Toronto have labelled the government GST advertising as offensive and misleading.

Then we go to the problem of the provinces—and I am not going to mention any names of former premiers who were involved in the statement I am going to read now; but nine of the ten provinces opposed this move by the federal government in a tax field which they regard as their own. Let me quote from the final communique of the 31st Annual Premiers' Conference held in Winnipeg, on August 13, 1990. That was two months ago.

> The Premiers continue to believe that the imposition of the federal GST is unacceptable and should not proceed. They agreed that the GST, which represents a federal intrusion into traditional provincial tax fields, will > fuel inflation in Canada hence increasing upward pressure on interest rates and the Canadian dollar. This will hurt the competitiveness of export industries; add to tax complexity, especially for small and medium-sized businesses, farmers and fishermen; damage key economic sectors, including tourism; increase government spending because of the high administrative costs of the GST . . .

—and this is what the Premiers unanimously said—Quebec was not present—

They asked the Government of Canada to withdraw the tax. Now three major provinces—British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario—are taking the government to court for those very reasons.

All I am saying is that you people across the way may look at a committee, moved by political concerns, trying to embarrass the government with its committee report. Believe me, that was not the case. This was a committee impressed by what it was told, which is confirmed by the premiers' of all the provinces except Quebec, which was not represented at that conference. But in the premiers meeting of two months ago they told the government not to do this and to withdraw the tax.

Further, the Minister of Finance for New Brunswick told the committee:

> The goods and services tax represents a massive federal invasion of the sales tax field, which until recently was exclusively a provincial domain. If the federal government decides to use the goods and services tax to reduce its deficit, it will do so on the backs of the provinces by raising its initial 7 per cent rate and crowding the provinces out of this very important revenue source.

Provincial governments have traditionally managed the consumer direct sales tax. The excise tax is federal, but the direct consumer tax was a provincial field; and now the federal government, in its grasping way, is horning itself in and trying to squeeze the provinces out of this important provincial revenue source.

• (1600)

Senator Haidasz: Unconstitutional!

Senator Buckwold: This could result, said the Minister of Finance of New Brunswick, in a reduced ability to deliver provincial services or an increased reliance on other taxes such as higher personal or corporate income taxes.

Honourable senators, in British Columbia the Minister of Finance told the committee that the provinces are being put in a vice. He said that they are being squeezed on the revenue side by the GST's intrusion into their tax field and on the expenditure side by the offloading of program costs. As I have said, the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and B.C. are in the process of court actions against the federal government and opposition to the GST.

Honourable senators, I believe, and a majority of the committee members agrees, that the GST represents an unwarranted intrusion into what has traditionally been a tax field occupied by the provinces. Over the long term, such a move is likely to impair the ability of provinces to raise revenue by means of their own retail sales taxes. Those senators who have been involved with provincial administrations—premiers, deputy premiers and members—will recognize the importance of the retail sales tax to the overall financial wellbeing of provinces.

Honourable senators, the supporters of the goods and services tax made much of the fact that many countries have adopted this form of taxation. I wish to point out that some countries have studied and rejected the tax. In Australia, for example, a value-added tax was rejected a couple of years ago because of unacceptably high administrative and compliance costs as well as a belief that such a tax would not solve tax evasion problems. More importantly, it was felt that the tax would be regressive and would have a significant impact on inflation. Australia rejected this kind of tax not that long ago.

Senator Haidasz: Yes, they are smart!

Senator Buckwold: One striking feature of the testimony we heard across Canada is the extent to which Canadians are unhappy with our tax system as it exists at the present time. This discontent should not be dismissed lightly. The government response that no one likes to pay taxes does an injustice to the sentiments of Canadians. Many feel that they pay too much tax and that the way in which the burden is distributed amongst citizens is unfair.

Honourable senators, the GST would exacerbate both of these flaws in the existing system.

The memory of the Carter Commission is alive and well. I was surprised at the number of Canadians who cite the principles espoused in the report of that commission. I was also surprised at the number of tax alternatives that were presented in testimony before the committee. Serious tax reform, honourable senators, is too important to be left to the Department of Finance. Offering one or two alternatives to Canadians and maintaining that the rest have been studied and dismissed is simply inadequate.

The flaw in the federal government's approach to tax reform is its tendency to involve the public at the end of the process. I think a much more fruitful approach would be to involve the public right from the start. I think it is time to engage the people of Canada directly in the tax reform process. Let them present their alternatives. Let them evaluate those alternatives.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: The people have to have an input. We have to listen to them. But we have a government that does not listen. We have a government that just ignores public opinion. Little wonder that a recent Gallup poll, asking a question on the confidence people have in various institutions of the country, indicated that most people, out of a list of various organizations, have four times as much confidence and place four times as much credibility in the chartered banks of this country as they do in the federal government.

Senator Cools: Small wonder.

Senator Buckwold: Can you believe that? We do not love banks, generally.

Senator Kelly: Is that in your report, senator?

Senator Buckwold: No, that is not in my report.

Senator Kelly: You are outside your report now, I gather.

Senator Cools: But he is not reading his report, he is making a speech.

Senator Buckwold: I made a comment about what I saw in a recent Gallup poll.

All I am saying is this: I think it is reasonable to ask the government to reestablish something like the Carter Commission, to have an in-depth study done not only by bureaucrats from the Department of Finance but by representatives of the Canadian public, by representatives of provincial governments as well as representatives of industry. Let us talk about how we are going to reform our tax system rather than unilaterally maintaining that we have the answer in a goods and services tax.

Many talk about alternatives. I am sure that Senator Kelly may say, "Well, what are your alternatives?" When the committee started out, it was saying that it was going to ask for alternatives. Believe me, we got lots of alternatives in committee. Many of our witnesses made interesting presentations. Some of our witnesses were ordinary people; others were qualified experts like Professor Neil Brooks, Professors Jack Mintz and Thomas Wilson, Mr. Mel Hurtig, Mr. Dennis Mills and many others. Their suggestions included: higher personal income tax; higher corporate income tax; vacating the sales tax field, leaving it to the provinces in exchange for lower transfer payments, as proposed by the Carter Commission; moving the manufacturers' sales tax to the wholesale level; a retail sales tax similar to the present provincial tax without the complications of the proposed GST; a personal expenditure tax; a turn-over tax; a business transfer tax, and a single tax as proposed by Dennis Mills. I might say that that is a proposal which might be more worthy of serious study than many people can accept. It is an idea whose time may have come. Others have asked for a United States style minimum corporate tax.

Honourable senators, all of these proposals are discussed in the report of the committee. Within the capabilities of committee researchers, we did the best we could in trying to analyze them. Senators will notice that in the proposals we see some good and some bad points, some problems, but we did not have the expertise among our researchers to be able to put forward a definitive response on what we should do. Within the capabilities of the committee researchers we did the best we could.

More in-depth study is needed by professionals of the Department of Finance and more detailed investigation of the alternatives has just been issued—and this was since the report, Senator Kelly—by the Canadian Tax Foundation. It is probably the most respected independent tax authority in this country. This research was done by Mr. John Whalley and Deborah Fretz in a book entitled The Economics of the Goods and Services Tax. I think senators will find this interesting reading. I wish we had had this reference while our committee was still meeting and before the report was written.

I shall quote from the study of the Canadian Tax Foundation as presented by these people just last week.

> Assuming that we accept the argument that the manufacturers' sales tax is so badly flawed that it must be replaced, what is the best replacement tax?

By the way, this is an in-depth study, not a superficial sort of look at things.

> Is it the goods and services tax as proposed, or is it some other tax? This is perhaps the area where the debate on the GST thus far has been the weakest.

Neither the government nor the committee, in the sense of being able to suggest definitively what we should do, has looked at the alternatives.

> Options outside the GST have not been fully considered and, within the value-added tax approach, the merits of the GST as proposed relative to other forms of VAT have not been fully debated.
> Most government documents on sales tax reform over the last four or five years have implicitly assumed that replacing the MST by some form of alternative sales tax > on a broader base is the only way to proceed, and that, inevitably, the replacement sales tax has to be a value-added tax. The case made for this position seems to rest as much on arguments of political feasibility as on economic desirability.

● (1610)

That is well said. In other words, it is a political decision rather than an economic decision.

The Canadian Tax Foundation further states:

> Evaluating the alternatives to the GST essentially involves two separate questions. The first is whether it makes sense to abolish the sales tax. If a major, though unstated, objective of reform is to put in place a tax system with more capability to raise additional revenues in the long run, is it better to leave the existing tax in place and raise revenues through additional tax measures? Introducing a new tax first to replace the existing tax, and only subsequently to raise revenues, would seem to be an indirect way of proceeding.
> The second question is what alternative replacements to the MST are available beyond the GST. One alternative, for instance, would be to increase personal income tax rates and simultaneously try to broaden the income tax base to offset the revenue lost through the elimination of the present sales tax. Because the personal income tax was changed in the 1987 tax reform exercise, however, this option might seem an unlikely choice, but it is, nonetheless, one which could have been looked at.
> Another alternative is to consider replacing the MST with a payroll tax, a tax widely used in Europe. While there are many obvious political difficulties with such a change, it is nonetheless a tax option which has not been looked at in the present debate.
> Yet another alternative is to evaluate the feasibility of eliminating the MST and, at the same time, reducing transfers from the federal to the provincial governments. This was the option proposed in 1966 in the Carter commission report.
> Finally, there is the option of making good the loss in revenue from the elimination of the sales tax through a combination of other revenue-enhancing devices available to the federal government. These options include broadening the base in the income tax, full taxation of capital gains, and a possible reintroduction of the federal gift and inheritance taxes which were abolished in 1971.

Those statements are from the in-depth study of the Canadian Tax Foundation. It further states:

> These problems with the MST are well known. The base of the tax is relatively narrow and it has a number of biases—in favour of imports and against exports and investment.

That is true.

[Senator Buckwold.]

> There is extensive use of notional values because of inequities in the tax created among similar firms in the same industry, and there is also cascading in the tax.
> Despite this litany of woes with the tax, which has been well known since the 1950's, the quantitative dimensions of the problems have not been investigated.

That startled me when I read it, keeping in mind that those people who wrote this know what they are talking about, although they are not necessarily chairmen of committees. The report further states:

> Neither in government documents nor in results from the research community is there extensive support for the argument that these problems are serious enough to demand the kind of actions implied by implementing the GST.

I would recommend to supporters of the government that they read the book published last week by the Tax Foundation which covers these various alternatives in detail, which looks at the pros and cons, but emphasizes that there has not been enough study by the Department of Finance before moving helter-skelter into the GST.Honourable senators, you will be glad to know that I am nearing the end.

Hon. Senators: No. More!

Senator Buckwold: In spite of all the protests, all the problems, and all the risks expressed by Canadians—80 per cent of them—and sending millions of objections to ministers, senators andb members of the House of Commons, the government blindly rushes on, disregarding once again the views of the people.

The time has come for all governments, not only the federal government but provincial and local governments, to start having some relationship with the people who support them and who are paying the costs. All of us are too arrogant and we think we have the answers.

I mentioned the Gallup poll and I now have the actual percentages. In August 1990 the question was asked: "How much respect and confidence do you have for the following: Sixty-one percent of respondents expressed respect and a lot of confidence in, of all things, banks; 17 percent of respondents expressed confidence and respect for the federal government." I made a little note here which stated that Rodney Dangerfield should be a cabinet minister because he admits he gets no respect.

Yet when opposition senators respond to the views of Canadian citizens, the Honourable Otto Jelinik states publicly: "51 unelected, unaccountable, old farts are highjacking democracy." All I can say is that we don't smell as bad as the legislation we are asked to approve.

Honourable senators, I want to read a letter from someone I believe is an average Canadian. I invite senators to my office to see the boxes of mail I have received, but this is one that I picked at random. It is dated September 1, 1990, and was addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It states:

Dear Senator Buchwold,

I am writing to tell you that the GST is not good for my business. My service is to paint houses for people and hang wallpaper. My clients have never had to pay a tax on my service and now if they do, this will reduce the deficit! I do not believe it! Look to the corporations, Sir. It's rumoured that they don't pay much to begin with. And cut government spending.

The economy is going through such a contraction now that I have been forced to lay off 6 painters! They were all fine men. All immigrants and all well paid. Now the government can look after these six and their families because I can no longer do it. I view the GST as unfair and excessively greedy. And too complicated. The government will have to hire an army of paper pushers in an effort to keep track—it never works. It's just another expenditure.

Remember, Sir, the American revolution and the French revolution were ignited over excessive taxation.

But then what do I know, I am just a painter.

Honourable senators, this painter represents the great majority of employers in this country. They represent the small businesses, the small contractors and the self-employed who are providing most of the jobs. As far as employment is concerned, it is not provided by the big industries and the great manufacturers. These are the people who are supporting the economy. But he says in the letter, "What do I know? I am just a painter." Believe me, he knows more than some of the representatives of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and some of the representatives of the Business Council on National Issues.

● (1620)

Senator Perrault: You bet he does!

Senator Buckwold: He knows more than the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, because he has a payroll of six that he is trying to meet, and he is trying to provide a decent living for new immigrants who come to this country to give their services.

Senator Haidasz: He knows more than Wilson does!

Senator Cools: Could you tell us his name? Also, Senator Buckwold, I observe that the letter is handwritten.

Senator Buckwold: Yes. He does not have a secretary. His name is Eugene McDonald, from Don Mills, Ontario.

Honourable senators, this represents a decent, hardworking, average Canadian who is struggling to make a living and knows full well that what the government is saying is baloney.

Senator Cools: Absolutely!

Senator Buckwold: He knows that what the government is promising is bunk, and that what it is doing will be ruinous to his business when one recognizes the fact that there is now a recession and that he will have to lay off his six painters and let the government look after them.

Senator Haidasz: That is immoral!

Senator Buckwold: That is what will happen.

Senator Cools: That is sacrilegious!

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I appeal to Tory senators to at least look seriously at the implications of this tax. There were two of your colleagues in the House of Commons who were sitting on the government benches and had sufficient courage, honesty, conscience and feeling for the people of the country that they voted against their party. They paid a price though; they were kicked out of their caucuses.

Senator Lucier: They kept their own!

Senator Buckwold: I refer to Mr. Kilgour and Mr. Kindy, both from Alberta. Both of them will be re-elected. In fact, they will be the only Tories who will be re-elected in that province. They did it because they knew that this was not a tax for Canadians. They were honest enough to admit it. They were not blind followers. They had the integrity and personal conscience to be able to say, "This is not a good tax for Canada;" or, as Premier Rae of Ontario said, "It is the wrong tax at the wrong time for the wrong people."

Surely there must be a few senators on the government side who are impressed by the fact that millions of Canadians have not only an aversion to the tax but also a deep-felt concern that this tax does not come into effect, that there could be, as we were told in committee, a tax revolt, because people have reached just about the end of their tether. It is not just the goods and services tax; it is the whole spectrum of government inability to recognize what the people want. It is a response on the part of the public in recognition of their frustration with government. The GST is only adding to a feeling across the country, which, I warn you, will eventually create problems which I do not know how we will handle.

Again I appeal to senators opposite—even some of the new senators who have recently arrived—to take a look at this tax to see how it affects the country and to see how people respond to it. As my friend, Senator Steuart, said the other day, "Surely, some Tory senators with a heart—

Senator Haidasz: And a conscience!

Senator Buckwold: —will review their position, keeping in mind that you have a no-cut contract. You can still remain members of this honourable body."

Honourable senators, in conclusion, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has not taken this decision lightly; nor has it failed to consider the possible consequences of its action. However, Bill C-62 is a bad piece of legislation that calls for drastic action on the part of the Senate.

Senator Haidasz: It is immoral.

Senator Buckwold: To reject this bill would be an unprecedented step on the part of the Senate. We know that. Indeed, the committee report is itself a dramatic departure from the conventions of the Senate. This bill is so unacceptable to the people of Canada that this action is necessary, because there is just no other choice for us.

Honourable senators, the tax is ill-conceived, the government is ill-prepared, and the implementation is ill-timed. The country is not only ill but it is also sick about it.

With that in mind, it is the recommendation of the committee that this bill should not be proceeded with further in the Senate of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senator, will you accept a question now?

An Hon. Senator: Ask your question.

Senator Barootes: I congratulate you on a herculean task with this speech, which was beautifully delivered, Senator Buckwold. You always have my admiration in that respect.

An Hon. Senator: Let us have the sword!

Senator Barootes: Twice, however—at the beginning and in the middle of your speech—and here I hope I am paraphrasing it correctly, I think you said that "It is not possible to patch up this mess by amendments." Later on, toward the end of your speech, you again pointed out that this bill was so ill-conceived and ill-thought that there was no way it could be amended.

My question, Senator Buckwold, is this: If it is such that the bill is unamendable, should we expect any amendments from you in the future? You tell us that the bill cannot be amended and cannot be fixed. Therefore, I presume that we will not hear any amendments from you or from the other side at any time.

An Hon. Senator: Wait and see!

Senator Frith: Would you mind sitting there and holding your breath for the next little while? We would love that!

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I welcome the question from the distinguished senator from Saskatchewan.

Senator Haidasz: You mean the surgeon!

Senator Buckwold: As we looked at the bill I indicated that the first reaction and the first choice was that the bill was unamendable, because there was just so much that was wrong with it. But if that fails, believe me, we will not go for the best—we will go for the second best! Are there amendments that would improve the bill? Sure there are.

Senator Barootes: No!

Senator Fairbairn: The Prime Minister says so; yes!

Senator Buckwold: But it will not make the bill more generally acceptable. Certainly there are amendments!

Senator Denis: Hundreds of them!

Senator Buckwold: Do you want me to give them to you? I can give you 100 amendments. The fact is that we can have an amendment for every one of the complaints, objections and criticisms that were given to the committee. I think that you asked me a kind of stupid question.

Senator Denis: Of course it is!

[Senator Buckwold.]

Senator Buckwold: You thought that we would fall into a trap where we would not have amendments. Sure, we will have amendments. We will have more amendments than you can handle. Believe me, we are working very hard on them.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, would the honourable gentlemen permit a question? This is a matter that has puzzled me for some time. When the goods and services tax was first proposed by this government it was speaking in terms of 9 per cent. It was supposed to be revenue neutral and was to replace the federal sales tax, presently at 13.5 per cent on manufactured goods. From 9 per cent it was reduced to 7 per cent. I understand that the total revenue from the federal sales tax amounts to between $18 billion and $19 billion.

If the 9 per cent had prevailed, would that amount have been exceeded, or is the 7 per cent below the revenue neutral proposition that was presented to us?

Senator Buckwold: When the Commons committee came in with a recommendation, it was well expected by the government. It was well prepared for it—in fact, I think it was a bargaining chip. They compensated for the loss of revenue by a series of other tax changes that brought in the additional revenue. That is available to you, if you would like to find it.

• (1630)

Senator Bosa: I have a second question to ask the honourable senator. He stated that with the threshold in place a person with an income of less than $6,000 will not qualify for a tax credit, yet a person who earns $11,000 is eligible for the maximum credit. Does this mean that a person who has reached the age of 65 and who draws the full old age security pension and the Canada pension, which amounts to something in the order of $9,000 per year, would not qualify for the tax credit?

Senator Buckwold: One has to differentiate between the general tax credit and an additional tax credit for a single person. It is expected that a single person living alone requires more assistance. The figure I gave concerning the amount of $6,000, being the income required, was for a single person, before taking into account the single supplement which is in addition to the basic credit being given to everyone regardless of income up to a ceiling of about $30,000.

What we are saying is that if you are a single person who does not earn $6,000, and for some reason you do not have anything but your old age pension, then you are not eligible to receive the $100 credit. That seems to be an anomaly and just another expression of the hard-heartedness and lack of concern on the part of the government to those who need it most.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, first, I too want to comment on the excellence of the performance of Senator Buckwold, who is a friend of mine. I want to depart from my normal practice to take the odd shot simply because I feel compelled to do so.

Senator Buckwold referred repeatedly to the committee and the opinion of the committee throughout his discussion. I would like to suggest that the objective of that committee, at least in the mind of Senator Buckwold from the outset, to use his expression, was to "axe the tax." In fairness to him, I believe that he was probably moved by the letters he received. We all received letters and, admittedly, it is not a popular tax.

My main objection is that he decided to use the banking committee of the Senate as a vehicle to axe the tax, something which is not in the tradition of that committee. Never before in my experience over the past eight years, and from reading past reports of that committee, has it been used for that purpose.

The advertisement that went out when the committee started its caravan trip across the country invited people to make submissions outlining their objections to the tax, suggesting that they might bring forward alternatives to the tax—which hardly comes through as being an open-minded approach.

The committee report is an excellent one. There is no question in my mind that it is very well written. It was prepared under the direction of the chairman. None of the committee members had any opportunity to look at it until a few hours before the report in its present form was tabled in this chamber. In all my experience—and I have had a good deal of experience of committee work of various kinds, as have others—I have never known of a committee to function in that way.

Senator Buckwold talked about the tyrannical approach, about barging ahead—

Senator Frith: It was a response to a filibuster in the committee.

Senator Kelly: He talked about not listening. It seems to me that listening to members of the committee is rather a normal thing to do under the dictates of good manners.

Senator Frith: The committee was filibustering waiting for the eight. That is quite clear.

Senator Kelly: I am sorry, Senator Frith, do you have a question?

Senator Frith: No. You said that you had never seen it happen before. I was explaining why it happened. It was for your edification.

Senator Kelly: I would be surprised if Senator Frith has not seen it before; but I have not seen it before.

Senator Frith: Had you seen a filibuster before, you would have.

Senator Kelly: I do not intend to get into a debate on premises, on assumptions, and then predict results with Senator Buckwold. We all know how difficult that can be. Two sides can be right when we talk hypothetically. It reminds me a little of my father when I think about scaring people. When interest rates went from 3 per cent to 5 per cent my father said, "Son, this will absolutely destroy the business community as we know it." I was reminded of that when I heard Senator Buckwold speak.

Honourable senators, I want to talk about some of the issues which I think are broader issues, and which do apply here very seriously. We have gone through a difficult period in Canada. Canadians' view of the future appears equally uncertain, if not grim. Our confidence in the future of our institutions, even our ability to stay together as a nation, has taken a very severe pummelling. The debate over the GST has doubtless been a contributing factor.

The government is not without blame in this regard. The government is reaping the whirlwind of what I consider to be its initial less-than-effective attempts to communicate and to explain the GST. In my view it is misinformation and misunderstanding about the GST that are at the root of much of the opposition, the concern and general bewilderment; but there is enough blame to be apportioned to everybody.

The GST has become a lightning-rod. It has become a manifestation of public discontent with government, with politics and politicians and for concerns about our economic future. I have been distressed to see that some have taken advantage of this situation for short-term political gain. It is especially repugnant to me when criticism of the GST comes from those who offer no alternatives and who are in part responsible for the fiscal malaise in which we currently find ourselves.

The committee report recommends that the Senate refuse to pass this bill; or, as Senator Buckwold has said almost from the beginning of the committee study, and he placed it before the media early on, "axe the tax." The essential reason given is that there should be further study of the various options presented to the committee as alternatives to the GST. In many ways this is a typical Canadian compromise. I might add that it could easily result in our ending up with a GST anyway.

I believe that over the past years there has been enough study and enough experience to draw on to demonstrate that a broadly based value-added consumption tax is what is required for the circumstances in which Canada now finds itself. Over the past many years the federal sales tax has been the subject of six major studies and reports, including two royal commissions. The consensus has been that the FST should be scrapped and replaced by some form of retail sales tax.

In 1983, the Goodman committee recommended a broadly based value-added tax to replace the FST. In its white paper of 1987, which was the subject of extensive public consultation and review, the government announced its intention to implement a multi-level sales tax. That became more formal and defined in the April 1989 budget address.

The technical details of the GST were laid out in the technical paper published in August of 1989, which was reviewed in detail in the House of Commons and was the focus of untold numbers of seminars, conferences and consultations across the country. However, I doubt if in those cases they were focused specifically on what was wrong or what was right. Hopefully, they were broadly based and open-minded approaches. I believe they were.

Bill C-62 was studied extensively by the House of Commons Finance Committee through a process of public hearings. Honourable colleagues, does anyone seriously believe that more study, the consideration of more options, is really required?

I do not pretend to advise my friends opposite on their strategy. If I may say so, I think they have done both themselves and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce a disservice. By deciding on the apocalyptic approach to axe the tax in this place, the public and the government have been diverted from some of the observations and recommendations in the committee report which, in my humble and personal view, were worthy of considered attention and debate.

I would like to give honourable senators a few examples of that. It has been argued that the GST in and of itself is regressive. The government's response was to put in a system of tax credits indexed to the rate of inflation over 3 per cent a year. Of course, the 3 per cent base erodes the real value of the tax credits over time. It may have been possible to convince the government and the other place to index fully the credits. This would have enhanced the progressivity of the tax. Unfortunately, confronted by an "axe the tax" strategy, we never availed ourselves of the opportunity.

Social welfare groups expressed concerns that some provinces might treat GST credits as income for tax purposes. Surely the federal government could have been convinced to reach agreement with the provinces or look for other ways to ensure this did not happen. Unfortunately, confronted with an "axe the tax" strategy, we never had the opportunity.

There are other examples. I could go on, but I think you get my point. These are matters that are not fundamental to the GST, but, if addressed and resolved, could have improved it significantly or at least could have removed misunderstandings. I suspect it was such matters that the Prime Minister had in mind when he said the government would be prepared to look at amendments proposed by the Senate. He did not present us with an "all or nothing" scenario. That has been our doing here.

If we had not painted ourselves into the "axe the tax" or "nothing at all" corner, but had proposed amendments to address some of the legitimate issues identified by the standing committee, we would have performed a valuable, proper and constructive role that would do credit to the Senate and to all senators.

I believe, however, we are at the point where the proper thing to do and the responsible thing to do is to get ahead with Bill C-62 in its present form. Enough time has been spent and far too much delay, for all the wrong reasons, has taken place.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to design a perfect piece of legislation the first time round, particularly a comprehensive tax bill such as Bill C-62. Over time, of course, there will be adjustments either through regulation or amendment, but now is the time to press ahead and eliminate the massive uncertainties that the delays have caused.

If the committee report is adopted by this chamber, do we recognize what message the committee's recommendation to "axe the tax" sends to Canadians, to the world's capital markets and to investors at home and worldwide?

[Senator Kelly.]

We seem determined to present to the world the image of a country in stalemate: political paralysis, constitutional paralysis, institutional paralysis leading to economic decay.

Some of us may not like the GST, but the international financial community does. It understands broadly-based, value-added consumption taxes and works with them in some 45 countries around the world. The international community also likes what the GST will do for our deficit and economic performance generally.

Honourable senators, there is no point in mincing words. The international community would interpret our killing the GST as putting short-term political interests ahead of the long-term economic interests of this country.

I ask you in all sincerity: Are we really prepared to send that message? Are we prepared to establish that precedent? I certainly hope not.

I also believe it would be the height of irresponsibility and political cynicism to invite a constitutional crisis over the GST, especially at this time. That would only further damage our image in the world's capital markets, our prospects of economic recovery and growth, heighten the level of cynicism and rancour and erode our ability to face the challenges that confront us.

Canada is facing a number of challenges on the economic front. According to the Conference Board of Canada, after almost seven years of sustained and impressive economic growth, the Canadian economy is entering a very difficult period of sluggish growth and potential recession. I think it is clear that we are now in a recession. The only question is its length and severity. Meech Lake and recent political events in Ontario have eroded investor confidence.

However, the single most important drag on economic prosperity is our deficit and our apparent inability to get our deficit house in order. The borrowing required to finance the deficit scoops scarce resources from the capital markets, which in turn retards growth and a return to economic prosperity. Our deficit is inflationary and is a contributing factor to the tight-money monetary policy being followed by the Bank of Canada. The deficit erodes our ability as a federal government to respond to new or changing circumstances and requirements and gives credence to those who argue that Ottawa has become fiscally weak and ineffective. In the challenges that face our federation, the federal government has to demonstrate the ability and the resolve to get its fiscal house in order; in fact, to get our entire house in order.

The GST will, in the longer term, assist in deficit reduction. On the revenue side, in my opinion, it will doubtless prove to be the largest single contributor to deficit reduction.

Aside from its impact on deficit reduction, the GST will help in overall economic growth by replacing the manufacturers' sales tax. Once again, the Conference Board of Canada forecasts an export-led recovery in the manufacturing sector in 1991 due to stronger export markets and the benefits of the GST.

Honourable senators, there is little point in rehashing the various economic arguments in favour of the GST. Those arguments, both pro and con, have been presented ad nauseam over the past several years. That is why I find a recommendation for further study to be particularly galling.

I assure you that I am not being partisan when I say this, but I am absolutely convinced in my own mind that this chamber has neither the constitutional nor the moral right to block this bill.

Senator Frith: On what basis do you make that constitutional judgment?

Senator Kelly: I will explain. Over the years, the Senate has progressively retreated from the full exercise of its powers as written in the Constitution, to the point where, I believe, the convention has been clearly established that this chamber would not oppose the government on fundamental issues that had been approved by the lower house. There is no question that the GST is a fundamental issue central to this government's economic, fiscal, structural and trade policies. In fact, I find it difficult to imagine a matter that impacts so directly and to such an extent on such a wide number of policy sectors. Not only do I believe that the convention of not blocking fundamental government policies has been firmly established; I believe it was and is right and proper.

The cabinet, by convention, is chosen largely from members of the lower house and depends on the ability to retain the confidence of a majority in that house. Governments do not and should not rise or fall because of what happens here. This is not a popular house in both respects. We have no constitutional or practical right to obstruct the will of the lower house.

Sooner or later this government will face an election—the most effective accountability mechanism designed for governments by mortal man. The electorate will decide whether it wishes this government to continue or not, based on the government's overall performance. No one in this place has the luxury or discipline of facing an electorate.

I cannot help, at this point, quoting from President Kennedy's address to both houses of Parliament in May 1961. Referring to the distinguished senators before him, he noted:

> . . . the lofty appearance of statesmanship on the faces of the members of the Senate who realize they will never have to place their case before the public again.

As senators, we have no right to superimpose our views on a government and legislature that does face the electorate on a regular basis. The government may, in fact, be defeated in the next election. The new government, with a clear popular mandate, can then do what it likes, including removing the GST. I would expect the Senate, regardless of its composition at that time, to allow it to do so.

I have read with interest the reflections of Eugene Forsey on the constitutionality of the Senate blocking the GST by whatever procedural means are available. As I understand it, he argues that because of the evolution of party discipline in the House of Commons and the "excessive"—and I put excessive in quotes—use of time allocation, the Senate has a duty to defy the will of the lower house on issues of fundamental principle.

● (1650)

With all possible respect to the esteemed Senator Forsey, I think he is wrong. In the first place, as the House Leader in the House of Commons has demonstrated, "excessive" use of time allocation is a phenomenon that is neither new nor unique to this government. In the second place, the Senate has no possible right to judge the efficacy or rectitude of the review process in the House of Commons, as long as that house acts within the constitution and constitutional conventions.

I have heard it said—by Senator Buckwold recently—that because the public opinion polls show wide disenchantment with the GST the Senate has a moral obligation to block it. Surely, honourable senators, that is a red herring. This place does not represent the ebbs and flows of popular opinion. We are not equipped to do so. That is the role of the lower house, where governments stand or fall on their abilities to lead and interpret public opinion.

To have a bicameral legislature, both parts of which purport to represent the popular will, is to invite stalemate and indecision. I think it is ridiculous. To say that the Senate must block the GST in deference to opinion polls, is, in my opinion, to try to find a democratic rationale for an undemocratic action.

In any event, I would have been amazed if a majority of Canadians had not been opposed to the GST—or to any new tax measure, for that matter.

If the Senate represents anything other than being a place of "sober second thought," it represents the regions of Canada, and I would like to note, therefore, that one major region, Quebec, has already joined forces with the federal government on the GST, and four other provinces, Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and New Brunswick, have indicated a willingness to come on board. Another province, Alberta, while opposed to the GST, does not agree that the Senate is the appropriate forum to stop it.

In other words, by "axing to tax", the Senate would be acting contrary to the wishes of popularly-elected governments in six provinces.

In addition, Senator Forsey argues that the rise of party discipline in the House of Commons places a burden on this place to ensure adequate review and debate of legislation. Research, which I had the Library of Parliament do for me, indicates that the Senate's record in passing, rejecting or amending bills approved by the House of Commons reflects a clear increase in party discipline, which evidently spilled over from the House into this chamber, and perhaps that is leading us to where we find ourselves these days. Rather than acting as a counter-balance to party discipline in the House, we are progressively following the same course.

This progression, in my view, is quite at odds with the intention of the Fathers of Confederation who wanted to move the Senate from the centre of the broader political process to foster a chamber that was essentially non-partisan and acted truly as a chamber of "sober second thought."

Honourable senators, finally, I want to move on to another matter which has affected me deeply.

Since I accepted the honour of an appointment to the Senate, I have made a deliberate, concerted effort to rise above, if you like, purely partisan considerations because I believed that was my proper role as a senator and the role in which I would be most effective. I have therefore been distressed to see this house divide so resolutely along partisan lines, in deference to instructions from the leader of a political party who currently serves in neither house and who has not faced an election since 1984.

Senator Frith: I tell you what: if you get some people over there to vote in favour of the report, we will see if we can get some here to vote against it. Then you can sleep well because we will not be divided on partisan lines.

Senator Doody: We want to see yours first!

Senator Frith: Senator Kelly is always depressed about partisan lines but I have never seen him vote other than in a partisan way.

Senator Kelly: I might respond to Senator Frith's comment with something I noted while Senator Buckwold was speaking. If I understood him correctly, he said that, if there was a categorical commitment on the part of the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister that the GST would be used to assist in reducing the deficit, then he would change his mind completely on the bill that we are discussing now. That is what I understood him to say.

Senator Buckwold: That is not quite right.

Senator Kelly: I may have misunderstood.

Senator Murray: It was hedged, was it?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, just to complete my plea, since 1982, I have also been impressed by the mutual respect and trust demonstrated among senators, regardless of background, seniority or previous political or other affiliations. Nothing has distressed me more than to witness the total abandonment of the decorum and mutual respect that has always characterized proceedings in this place.

In the spotlight that has been focused on us over the past few weeks we have not done credit to ourselves, to this institution or to the principles we purport to represent.

Senator Frith: Pity Senator Charbonneau is not here to hear you say that.

Senator Kelly: There is no doubt in my mind that, for good or ill, we have set in motion a chain of events that will have profound implications for this place.

In Imperial China, emperors ruled by divine right. The only check against their authority was if they began to act in their own selfish interests contrary to the interests of the empire.

Senator Frith: Exactly. You've got it! That's it!

Senator Kelly: In such cases, the emperor was deemed to have lost the "mandate of heaven" and it was then proper to violently overthrow the regime.

[Senator Kelly.]

Senator Frith: Send a copy of that, underlined, to Senator Charbonneau!

Senator Kelly: I am not suggesting any revolution. What I am suggesting is that, by our recent actions, we may well have lost the "mandate of heaven". We may well have lost the moral authority to influence the constitutional future of parliament and this place.

Senator Frith: Perhaps that is where he got his precedent from: China!

Senator Kelly: Senator Frith is demonstrating one of the very points I am trying to describe here.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear! You bet I am!

Senator Kelly: How many of us remember, as very little boys or little girls, our parents saying, "Don't interrupt." Do you remember? I remember. Senator Frith has apparently forgotten.

Senator Barootes: We certainly did not do that to Senator Buckwold.

Senator Stanbury: We are just thanking you for making our case.

Senator Kelly: I sincerely hope that we can now acknowledge our constitutional, moral and practical duties. I would also hope that we will all make a concerted attempt to return to the civility that has, in my experience, characterized the proceedings in this place.

Whatever we do, I implore us all to ensure that it is done with dignity and mutual respect.

I am very close to being finished, honourable senators. I just have one more barb to shoot.

Senator Barootes: We have lots of time!

Senator Kelly: In conclusion, as I noted earlier, the Prime Minister signalled a willingness to be accommodating with this house on proposed amendments to Bill C-62. I had hoped that we would have used that opportunity when it was available to us and not use our time doing many other things that were simply obstructionist.

I think we have a fundamental choice facing us. We can allow this house to be used as a tool in a wider but short-term political strategy, or we can send a message to Canadians and to the world that this house rose above short-term partisan considerations to do what was best for the economy and the country, and that, rather than contributing to political deadlock and uncertainty, this house, in spite of the misgivings of some of its members, was prepared to act with honour and independence and to allow the democratically elected government of the day to have its way with an essential element of its strategy.

There is no question, honourable senators, that those who oppose the GST in this place have made their point. God knows, Senator Buckwold made it today! Your fight has been valiant. Your opposition has been noted. You could, if you choose, retire from the field with grace and dignity and in deference to the conventions of our parliamentary system.

If the government's economic strategy fails, or if it has so badly misjudged popular opinion, it will bear the brunt at the next election.

That, honourable senators, is what I think is the right thing to do—right for this house and right for the country we serve.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Will Senator Kelly answer a question? I want to be sure I got his remarks down right. When I asked Senator Kelly on what basis he came to his conviction that the Senate had neither the moral nor, particularly, the constitutional right to defeat this legislation, he said that it was because he felt that there was now a convention of the constitution that had arisen on the basis of the fact that the Senate had not, for many years, probably decades, defeated such legislation. In other words, by the Senate's not exercising its constitutional right, the convention had grown up that it could not do so. Do I understand that correctly?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, with one major change. I do not believe that the convention developed simply through lack of use of that power. I think it was a conscious decision as the country matured. I think it became a conscious decision that, while it may have been appropriate in very early years, as parliament matured, it became less and less appropriate. I think it was a conscious decision, not just simply through lack of use.

Senator Frith: And who made the conscious decision: succeeding senators?

• (1700)

Would the Kelly doctrine not apply with special force to section 26, which not only was not used recently, but had never been used? Would the doctrine not apply that a succeeding Prime Minister had never used section 26 to stack the Senate and, therefore, a convention would have grown up having four or five times the force of the one Senator Kelly is applying to the Senate, since it is approximately four or five times as long, namely, that it had never been used?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, in addition to the fact that that particular position will be tested in the courts, I have not studied the history to determine if situations such as we faced recently, occurred in the past. I have to believe that no such situation existed before.

I think the need for that was very clear to anyone looking closely at what was happening. We were in a constitutional crisis. I think something of that sort had to take place.

Senator Frith: Now it is a matter of need. Could the honourable senator not argue there is a need now for the Senate to defeat the GST?

If the criterion is need, as the honourable senator has said, respecting the use of section 26, although it had never been used before, and therefore no convention would apply, would the same "need" doctrine not apply?

It seems to me that the honourable senator's position is very inconsistent.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I see a vast difference between the two situations. The need I felt required recognition was the situation when we had—and I find it difficult talking about one side versus the other—one side of this house deciding to hold Parliament hostage. All that was missing were the armoured cars, the tanks and somebody occupying Government House and padlocking the House of Commons.

Senator Frith: Locking senators out and not allowing them to vote.

I thank the honourable senator for those comments.

Senator Kelly: In most strikes I have been involved in—

Senator Muir: You did not make any yards, Senator Frith.

Senator Barootes: You don't believe the courts either!

Senator Buckwold: I have a question for Senator Kelly, but before putting it, allow me to thank him for the kindness and courtesy he extended to me. I reciprocate that kindness and courtesy.

I am a little concerned with Senator Kelly's emphasis on amendments. It is true that the Prime Minister indicated yesterday, and even before yesterday, that he would accept amendments, but honourable senators will note he was careful to say that those amendments would come in only after the bill was dealt with in this place.

Does the honourable senator really believe that the government would welcome amendments and accept them—through the majority the government apparently now has in the Senate, with some question mark—knowing full well that the bill would go back to the House of Commons and face the impact of—

Senator Barootes: Amendments if necessary, but not necessarily amendments.

Senator Frith: That's about it!

Senator Buckwold: I am putting my question to Senator Kelly, not Senator Barootes. I am trying to visualize what would have happened had we brought in amendments and asked the government to accept them—

Senator Simard: Politicians do not answer those types of questions.

Senator Buckwold: —knowing full well the government would not allow the bill to go back to the House of Commons. In fact, the so-called amendments promised by the government through the Prime Minister will come after the bill has been dealt with, and at that time some amendments can be put forward in order to correct what are some obvious defects.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I fully accept the suggestion Senator Buckwold is making. I am saying that in the normal traditional pattern of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, it would have prestudied the bill. That was precluded by the decision made on that side of the chamber a very unfortunate decision.

During the course of the examination, had it been an open-minded, normal practice, amendments could have been passed on and discussed with officials from the Department of Finance, or others, but that is not what took place. That is not what happened this time. I am saying that is unfortunate.

I am also saying that the minute the bill receives Royal Assent a minister will think of something he or she would like to have put into the bill. When you have a complex piece of legislation such as this, one never gets everything included that one wants.

That is part of the problem. Over time that has led to patching and correcting inequities to the point where we reach the stage and say: "This is too complex. Let us reform the tax system. Out it goes. We will start all over again."

Had the decision been mine, I would have proposed an across-the-board value-added tax, then adjusted for inequities as time went on and as they were discovered.

That is not the route that was followed in this case, and I do not fault anyone for that. I am not trying to suggest that now is the time to come in with an eleventh-hour deathbed repentance, saying, "By the way, we should have talked to you about this last June, but now we will talk to you about it."

I am confident many of the matters the Honourable Senator Buckwold and I would agree need attending to will be attended to.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I listened from the Senate Reading Room—

Senator Corbin: That does not count!

Senator Simard: I intend to read Senator Buckwold's speech. I took note of the answer Senator Buckwold gave to Senator Kelly.

Senator Frith: Are you embarking on a debate?

Senator Simard: I am asking questions. You were allowed to ask questions.

Senator Frith: Are you asking a question?

Senator Simard: Yes. I am getting to it.

Keeping in mind the answer Senator Buckwold gave to Senator Kelly, is he trying to convey a message that—

Senator Frith: Who are you putting the question to, Senator Buckwold?

Senator Simard: I am asking Senator Buckwold if he is now tempted to suggest to his colleagues in this place that the report be withdrawn. He seems to be having second thoughts about the strategy on the other side of axing the tax. After all, that is what the report calls for.

Is the honourable senator now telling us that he is prepared to withdraw the report of the committee recommending that the legislation be killed? If that is the case we may be getting somewhere in this place.

That being the case, we likely would be sending a message to the government that the exercise was worthwhile and we have heard some interesting amendments.

The honourable senator had better make up his mind. He cannot have it both ways. He cannot say on Thursday next "axe the tax" and then come back the following week and ask that amendments be made to it.

Honourable senators opposite should level with the people.

Senator Frith: To whom are you putting the question?

Senator Simard: The honourable senator is old enough to admit that he has made an honest mistake. If the conclusion is that the report is a mistake, please tell us and we will all support the honourable senator in withdrawing the report.

Senator Frith: This "Happy Hour" has been brought to you by Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators opposite cannot have it both ways.

Senator Frith: Senator Simard must be asking Senator Kelly that question.

Senator Simard: I am asking Senator Buckwold the question.

Senator Frith: While you were out of the chamber at "Happy Hour" Senator Kelly spoke.

Senator Simard: Is Senator Frith now Senator Buckwold?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

Senator Simard: Oh, Senator Frith is Senator Buckwold's master. Obviously, he was his master on September 25. I am sure Senator Frith will yield to Senator Buckwold, if Senator Buckwold has an answer.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is now seven minutes past five. I understand the judge will be here at 5.20 p.m.

• (1710)

Senator Stanbury was going to speak, but he would have liked to have a longer period of time in which to do so and would now prefer to speak tomorrow. Since we have had a speaker on both sides, I move the adjournment of the debate and we can come back at the call of the bell in 10 minutes.

Senator Simard: I would like an answer to my question!

Senator Frith: The problem with that, senator, is, while you were out, things were going on in here that you were unaware of. Your colleague Senator Kelly entered the debate. Senator Buckwold had finished. So I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Barootes: Are you adjourning the debate in Senator Stanbury's name or in your own name?

Senator Frith: Is that important to you?

Senator Simard: Let the record show that Senator Frith is still speaking for Senator Buckwold.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

• (1720)

At 5:30 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Beverley Marion McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Honourable Beverley Marion McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by a Clerk at the Table.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act (Bill C-28, Chapter 39, 1990)

An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act (Bill C-21, Chapter 40, 1990)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 24th, 1990

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE J. MICHAEL FORRESTALL

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP IN SENATE

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable Senators, you will be aware of the exchange that took place yesterday following certain media observation with respect to my qualification to be seated.

I wish only to assure honourable senators that I have every confidence that I am properly seated. Senators will want to know that I sought advice both here in Ottawa and in Nova Scotia. On the basis of all advice and counsel, I am satisfied that I have met, and still meet, the requirements of Section 23 of the Constitution Act, 1867; and, more specifically, honourable senators, that I am legally or equitably seized as freehold for my own use and benefit of lands or tenements held in free and common socage, or seized or possessed for my own use and benefit of lands or tenements held in franc-alleu or in roture, within the province of Nova Scotia, of the value of four thousand dollars, over and above all rents, dues, debts, charges, mortgages and incumbrances due or payable out of or charged on or affecting the same.

REQUEST FOR CLASSIFICATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am glad to have Senator Forrestall follow up the question that was raised yesterday during Question Period. Senator Forrestall says that he is satisfied that he qualifies and has read the words of Section 23(3) to indicate what it is that he is satisfied about.

It seems to me that we are still left with a question, because we have not been given any detail as to the nature of his holding. The nature of his holding only becomes an issue because of the information that is publicly available, and that is not as clear as it ought to be. I would like it to be. I had hoped that we would have had a clearer picture.

I want also to put on the record the contents of a copy of a letter addressed to the Speaker, signed by the Clerk, with copies sent to Senators Murray, MacEachen, Doody and myself. I received a copy of this letter at noon today, and it states:

> Honourable Senator Charbonneau:
> A question was raised during the Oral Question Period yesterday concerning the validity of the Declaration with respect to Property of the Honourable John Michael Forrestall, made by him pursuant to section 128 and the Fifth Schedule of the Constitution Act, 1987.
> The Clerk of the Senate was asked to file a report on the circumstances surrounding Senator Forrestall's Declaration. With the Senator's consent to divulge our conversations, I am making this report.
> On September 27, 1990, Senator Forrestall presented himself before me, a person authorized for the purpose by the Governor General, in order to take and subscribe the Declaration of Qualification. At that time, Senator Forrestall asked me if "joint ownership" met the requirements for the Declaration. No further details of ownership were given.
> I advised Senator Forrestall that an interest in land held in joint ownership was acceptable as long as it met the other requirements of the Constitution such as being in the area for which he was appointed, and having a value to him of $ 4,000.00 over and above all debts and encumbrances.
> Senator Forrestall then declared to me that he met the property qualification and executed the Declaration of Qualification before me.
> Section 128 of the Constitution Act, 1867 does not require the person authorized by the Governor General to take the Declaration of Qualification to ask for a deed or title from the senator making it. Nor does it require a senator who is taking and subscribing the Declaration to identify the property upon which the Declaration is based. I have never asked for a deed or title from a senator taking the Declaration of Qualification and I did not ask for one from Senator Forrestall. Nor was one tendered. My role was limited to taking the Declaration at face value without a title search or an evaluation of the property.
> On October 17, 1990, I telephoned Mr. Mark Audcent, Assistant Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel, to confirm the advice that I had given to Senator Forrestall and to ask him to speak to the Senator. Later that day, Mr. Audcent advised me that he had reached the Senator by telephone and that, based upon the Senator's description of the facts, the Senator did not seem to have a problem with respect to his property qualification.
> Trusting that the above is of help and to your satisfaction . . .

Dealing with the first part, I agree with the Clerk that it is not his job to ask for the production of a deed, nor is it his job to go behind a statement made by the senator at that stage. The Clerk has given us the information that he promised to give. However, that does not answer the question raised, and that is what is contained in the Constitution. It does not answer the question raised by the public information that gave rise to the issue in the first place. On the basis of that information, the senator says that he has a gift over or an interest in a property that he shares with his brothers and sisters. He states, "I own my share of the family home in the Annapolis Valley."

Incidentally, I accept that Mr. Forrestall believes he is qualified, and I also agree with the Clerk that joint ownership would qualify. I have no question about that. However, the information states that the home was willed to the family by a relative who stipulated that it could not pass on to Mr. Forrestall and his brothers and sisters until both his parents had died. His parents both still live in the house.

The will also states that should Mr. Forrestall die, he cannot bequeath his interest in the property to his own children. His share must go to his brothers and sisters.

As a lawyer, that raises certain questions. It may be that there is a simple answer to them, but I have been unable to get any. In order to get that information from Mr. Audcent, I telephoned him and asked him, "What was the information that Mr. Forrestall gave you?" He refused to tell me. He stated that that would be solicitor and client privilege. I asked him who his client was, and he replied that his client was Senator Forrestall.

The specific question still remains—and I am sure it could easily be answered. Reading that information, any lawyer would ask: Does that mean that the property was given by will, a life interest to two persons with a gift over, a remainder gift, to Senator Forrestall and his relatives? If it were left at that, then on some interpretation that would mean that it could be argued that the title had vested. However, if the will provides that the only persons who will take possession after the death of the mother and father are those who have survived the death of the mother and father, then it is not vested and will not vest until the two conditions are met; namely, the death of the mother and father and the survivor, or whoever wishes to take an interest.

I am sure there is a simple answer to that question. If we can find that out, and if it is the survivor only, then there is a real question as to whether or not the title is vested and, therefore, a real question as to whether there is property qualification on that basis. If it is clear doubt that survivorship is not necessary, then it is probably vested and is a proper qualification.

● (1410)

That leaves us with the provision in the Constitution that it makes it the Senate's responsibility, if a question is raised about qualification, to decide whether or not there is qualification. I do not see how we can do that until we find out more about the title and the will purporting to confer it. Thus far, all we have is what the Clerk did, which I think was quite proper. We have the fact that Mr. Audcent, on the basis of what Mr. Forrestall told him, is satisfied; but we do not know what Mr. Forrestall told him. We have Mr. Forrestall's statement that he is satisfied that he is qualified.

I believe that still leaves an important question before us, and a responsibility for the Senate to find an answer to it.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that all I can do is consult, and I will do that. I will then decide whether I wish to make a motion to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. However, I do not mind leaving the matter dangling, as it is, because I do not want to make that motion until everyone has had an opportunity to give me the information I want.

[Senator Frith.]

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

REPRESENTATIVES OF POLISH PARLIAMENT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have pleasure in bringing to your attention the presence in the visitors' gallery of Mr. Czeslaw Kurzajewski, a member of the Polish Parliament and Vice-Chairman of the Committee for Youth and Physical Culture, and his assistant Jerzy Kaczmarek.

Both are attending the UNESCO Conference on Sports for All taking place in Ottawa. We wish them successful deliberations and a happy and interesting visit to Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

QUESTION PERIOD

PERSIAN GULF

DEPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN GROUND FORCES—
ESTABLISHMENT OF CRITERIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, can if the Leader of the Government tell us whether there have been any discussions between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States, or with any other government, about the possible deployment of Canadian ground forces in the Persian Gulf.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I would have to consult with my colleagues on that matter and report to the Senate tomorrow.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government could go a bit further in his inquiries and find out whether, in the event that the matter has been raised or is under discussion, the Government of Canada has established any criteria under which it would agree to such a proposal, or whether it is a matter which is not under consideration or will not be under consideration by the government?

Senator Murray: I shall do so, honourable senators.

I think the house is aware that the ships that were dispatched to the Gulf area were dispatched with a view to discouraging further Iraqi aggression and with a view to supporting the multi-national sanctions against Iraq. Since that time, as the honourable senator knows, aircraft have been sent for the purpose of providing air cover for our ships.

So far as I am aware, no request has been made for the deployment of ground troops; but I shall confirm that with my colleagues and report back to this house tomorrow.

EFFECTIVENESS OF SANCTIONS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): The honourable senator's answer has stimulated a further question. Is there any assessment by the Government of Canada as to the effectiveness of the sanctions which have been applied to Iraq? Is it the view that at this stage the sanctions are working effectively and that further military action is unnecessary?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall see what my colleagues, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence, have to say about that. There is a general impression among the countries that are most directly concerned that the international sanctions against Iraq are working. Whether this means that there will be no further military engagement is another question.

The objective of the whole exercise is to have Iraqi forces withdraw unconditionally from the territory they have occupied in Kuwait.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, will the Leader of the Government assure the Senate that before Canadian ground troops are sent to Iraq, or to any other country in the world, to participate in a war, Parliament will first be asked for its approval rather than that a minister will decide in the middle of the night what the Canadian government should do?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is a law in this matter, and the law will be respected.

Senator Bonnell: Was the law respected when the navy and air fleet were sent to Iraq?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the short answer to that question is yes. I invite my honourable friend to consider the chronology of events.

The Iraqi forces invaded Kuwait on August 2. That same day a resolution was passed by the United Nations Security Council calling upon Iraq to withdraw. When, four days later, it was clear that Iraq was not going to withdraw, a second resolution was passed by the United Nations Security Council imposing international sanctions on Iraq. It was fours days after that, on August 10, that the decision was made and announced to dispatch ships to the gulf.

The honourable senator knows that once an order in council is passed, ten days are provided for during which Parliament must be brought into session. The order in council was indeed passed on September 15. Parliament returned from its summer recess on September 24.

• (1420)

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, that is all chronologically factual, but these Canadian ships were running around the Mediterranean Sea for about a week looking for something to do. Apparently, the order in council did not get passed until some time after that, waiting for Parliament to be resumed in the latter part of September. I am suggesting to the Leader of the Government that these decisions should have been made by Parliament, not by a minister, or by executive council, with the ships running around the Mediterranean for a week. Parliament should have been recalled.

Senator Murray: They were not running around the Mediterranean for a week, as the honourable senator suggests.

Senator Bonnell: Where were they?

Senator Murray: They entered the Strait of Hormuz on September 25, the day after the House of Commons returned from its summer recess. The law was complied with. The order in council was passed, as I said, on September 15, and Parliament returned eight or nine days later. The honourable senator is simply wrong in suggesting that what the government did was illegal or improper. We announced our intention to dispatch the ships on August 10, after two Security Council resolutions had called on Iraq, without success, to withdraw from Kuwait. The honourable senator suggests that we should have waited longer or called Parliament into session sooner, but there was no call to do anything except what we did. There was no reason for taking any other course than the course we took, which was to dispatch the ships and then, in good time, to pass an order in council and to have Parliament discuss it when Parliament returned.

COMMAND OF CANADIAN NAVAL FORCES

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I did not think the United Nations was the Government of Canada or the Parliament of Canada. I was not too sure who was in control of our ships. Were they under American control, Canadian control or United Nations' control? My understanding is that these are not United Nation troops over there now. The United Nations passed those resolutions, as you say, but I would like to know if the forces in the Gulf are under United Nations charge, under the charge of the Americans or under the charge of Canadians? Under whose command are our ships?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Our ships are under the command of Canadian officers. They are under Canadian command. They are in the same situation as the ships and the forces of a large number of other countries who have responded in an unprecedented international effort to try to deter the aggression and to support the international sanctions that have been agreed to. I should have thought that the honourable senator would be applauding (a), the international effort and (b), Canada's participation in it.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, we seem to have three Canadian ships running around in the Gulf and no one in charge of the whole fleet. I do not know what is going on over there, but I would say that somebody must be in command of all of those ships running around in the Gulf. Are the Americans taking charge and telling our Canadian captains what they should do with their ships? Are the United Nations telling them what they should do? Who is in charge of the Canadian fleet in the Gulf? Is there anyone coordinating those ships or are they all running around on their own.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there are rules of engagement that have been given to the officers in charge of those ships. There is, of course, as in any multinational effort of this kind, a great deal of coordination taking place between Canada's military and the military of the other countries that are involved. As a result of that coordination, Canadian military forces have had certain jobs to do in that area. They have done them. They have intercepted and boarded the ships of various other countries, all in support of international sanctions and the unprecedented multinational effort that is going forward and that is supported by the United Nations to deter further aggression.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government tell us who is in charge? Who is the CO of the multinational force in the Gulf? What country, captain, or admiral, is in charge of the fleet?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Canadian forces are under the control and direction of Canadian officers. The United States military forces are, I believe it is safe to say, under the control and direction of American officers; and the same can be said for the Germans, the Saudi Arabians, and so on. There is, of course, a high level of coordination taking place, but it is not a multinational force in the sense that there is one officer or one command structure.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I want to know who is coordinating the fleet. The leader says that they have a coordinator. They cannot all be running around at sea over there with no one in charge. There must be someone who says what ships go where and at what time.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is like the Senate used to be: it operates by consensus.

INDEPENDENCE OF FRENCH FORCES—RULES OF ENGAGEMENT—UNITED NATIONS SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may, I have a question on that point. I understand that apart from what system prevails among Canadians, Germans and other forces in the Persian Gulf, the French operation has a degree of independence that no other operation has. Can the Leader of the Government explain to us in what way it has been possible for the French government to secure a degree of independence not available to the other forces? I am seeking clarification. I think Senator Bonnell has a good point in asking whether there is a coordinator, or whether they are all coordinating together with no central clearing house and, by accident, pooling together. I think it is somewhat more complicated than the minister has indicated. I invite him to table at some point the rules of engagement and any other directives that are in effect which explain how the Canadian forces relate to the other forces. I am also interested in seeing the resolutions of the Security Council, if they could be tabled. Perhaps Senator Doody has tabled them already, but, if not, it would be interesting to have them.

Senator Doody: I may have.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): There are the two Security Council resolutions, to which I have referred, and that at least one after that on, I believe, September 25, in which they affirm that their previous resolution on sanctions applies to all means of transport, including aircraft, and that it established an air embargo against Iraq and occupied Kuwait. If we have not tabled those resolutions, I shall obtain copies and see that they are tabled.

As for the rules of engagement, I shall ask the Minister of National Defence whether or not they are available and, if they are, I shall have them tabled in the Senate.

On the honourable senator's other point, I am not aware that the French have, as he has stated, a greater degree of independence—independence from what, from whom—than the others.

• (1430)

But if there is anything that my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, can report on the matter, I will certainly bring that report to the Senate.

Senator Bonnell: Can the minister assure us that before Canadian ground troops are sent over to the Persian Gulf area in the event of war that Parliament will be consulted immediately?

If a decision to send ground troops to that area is taken, I hope the government will make arrangements to provide base facilities and appropriate accommodation for our troops, and avoid the situation in which our CF-18 pilots and support personnel were placed, in that no base was arranged for them until approximately one week after they were sent.

Surely the government will not send our troops to the area and leave them on the ships because no arrangements for bases have been made.

I might also say that the three ships we sent over there had to sail around the Mediterranean for about a week because the government had not passed the appropriate order in council. We need better leadership, especially when it comes to the lives of Canadian troops.

Senator Murray: I do not know from where the honourable senator is getting his information.

Senator Bonnell: From the press.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator should not place on the record every tattered clipping, as Senator Perrault used to say, or every report the honourable senator reads in the press, no matter what the source of the reports might be.

If there was a question in the statement made by the honourable senator, I undertake to answer it.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROTOCOL OF VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a few questions with respect to his duties as Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations.

I am referring to the rather awkward situation that arose during the Prime Minister's visit to British Columbia over the past three days. That awkward situation arose as a result of rather unseemly statements made by each of the First Ministers, Prime Minister Mulroney and Premier Vander Zalm, that "the other did not seek a meeting. I would have gladly gone to a meeting if the other had sought a meeting." That was a poor demonstration of public responsibility on the part of both of them.

The problem comes to the door of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations because he is supposed to brief the Prime Minister on what should be done before he goes to a province, and repair any damage done after the Prime Minister returns.

The question is: Did the minister suggest to the Prime Minister that he should arrange a meeting with Premier Vander Zalm, given that there are a number of outstanding issues between the federal government and the province of British Columbia? Was it the Prime Minister's wish that the minister play that role rather than himself, because the minister is so good at talking to Premier Vander Zalm? Did Premier Vander Zalm in fact say there was no purpose in meeting with the Prime Minister? What actually happened that gave rise to this messy situation?

There are a number of things they could have talked about. There is the Kaon project and the GST, which British Columbia rejects. There are the law suits which British Columbia commenced with respect to transfer payments, to the GST and the appointment of the eight senators under section 26. There are the postponed forestry agreements and the Polar 8 project. I could go on at length. In any event, I earnestly seek a positive response from the minister.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I do not know to what issue the honourable senator is seeking a positive response. He has just enumerated a number of outstanding issues between the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia, all of which at various stages of discussion form part of the ongoing discussions between the federal and provincial ministries.

That is the first thing that should be said.

Second, there is no obligation on the part of the Prime Minister, nor has it ever been the practice for the Prime Minister of Canada, when visiting a province, to meet with the premier of that province. Third, I should point out that the present Prime Minister has been more accessible to provincial premiers than any prime minister in the history of this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: That is a fact. He has met with Premier Vander Zalm many times and with other premiers on a bilateral basis. They have, in my presence, had telephone conversations on a variety of subjects. All premiers know that the Prime Minister is eminently accessible for this purpose.

Frankly, I am unaware of the controversy that the honourable senator alleges has taken place during the course of the Prime Minster's visit to British Columbia this week. From the information I have received, that visit to British Columbia was tremendously successful, during the course of which the Prime Minister had an opportunity to do what he wanted to do; namely, to meet with British Columbians and discuss the policies of the government with them. There was plenty of opportunity for meeting on a government-to-government basis, and if Premier Vander Zalm needs to talk to the Prime Minister, all he need do is pick up the telephone.

Senator Austin: That is exactly the answer the Prime Minister gave to press inquiries as to why he had not had a meeting with Premier Vander Zalm. What I am suggesting to the Minister—and it may not be helpful to him—is that the image of the Prime Minister in British Columbia; contrary to what he just alleges, is not one of high esteem.

Senator Murray: I am sure you are doing your part to improve that.

Senator Austin: I will show you numbers to corroborate that in Decima polls. The question of the Prime Minister reaching out to show accommodation in British Columbia would have been very much to his advantage and in the interest of the province. I would be happy to bring the Minister's attention to press reports, which I am sure his staff must have in hand now.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am happy to have received Senator Austin's political advice. I know he gave Prime Minister Trudeau advice on his standing in British Columbia. Given the results of that exercise, I will study his advice carefully.

THE ENVIRONMENT

POINT ACONI PROJECT—NECESSITY OF FURTHER REVIEWS AND STUDIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question relating to a question posed in the other place yesterday by Mr. Paul Martin, who was involved in the shipping business and in transferring ships to Panamanian registry so that he could pay cheaper wages. However, now he is a new-found environmentalist, and he has been raising questions in the other place regarding the coal-fired power generation plant at Point Aconi on Cape Breton Island and demanding that further studies and reviews be conducted. He raised this point with the Honourable Bernard Valcourt, the Minister of Fisheries, who responded:

> . . . if the hon. member is referring to the Point Aconi project, he should know that we initiated an assessment of this project. We considered all the points raised by the public throughout Nova Scotia with respect to the Point Aconi project. According to the experts, all the questions that were raised could be dealt with through action that was taken and in fact requested by the company concerned. Once the criteria had been met, there was no need to request a public panel on a matter that, according to the experts, could be dealt with satisfactorily.

However, the members from LaSalle-Émard was not happy with that response. He continued on the subject with the Honourable Robert de Cotret and demanded that studies be undertaken, but still he is told that it has been proven that everything is all right.

● (1440)

I want the minister to reassert in Cabinet that this project means so much to Cape Breton and so much to Nova Scotia in regard to employment for hundreds of coal miners and the future sale of millions of tons of coal in the coming years.

It's all very well and good for people like Mr. Martin and others within the Liberal party to be in one part of Canada and say one thing and then when they are in Cape Breton, say another thing; such as: "We are for it, but we must have it checked; we must do this; we must do that."

Then we have another character in Nova Scotia by the name of McDonough—the NDP Madonna. She is doing the same thing, and her cohorts in the other place are doing the same thing. They are damning Point Aconi in the other chamber, but when they go to Cape Breton, they say, "We want it. We are all for it. We cry with the coal miners."

I tell you, sir, if you do not work on this for us, we will have hundreds of coal miners on the streets with nothing to do, if this project is stopped. I demand that it not be stopped. It must go ahead.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am sure my friend takes some reassurance from the statements of my colleague, Mr. Valcourt, to the effect, first of all, that it was this government and his department that initiated the assessment; Mr. Valcourt's further statement that all the points raised by the public throughout Nova Scotia were considered and that all those questions could be dealt with through the action that had been taken and, in fact, requested by the company concerned. Mr. Valcourt has stated that once the criteria had been met, there was no need to request a public panel on a matter that all the experts said could be dealt with satisfactorily. There the matter now rests.

It appears that Mr. Martin and others mentioned by the honourable senator are proceeding on the basis of a misunderstanding or of misinformation as to what has occurred and the federal government's role in it.

[Senator Muir.]

Senator Muir: Misunderstanding be damned! They want to play ball with Greenpeace and all the other cretins and idiots that come on to the Island. They want to be on everybody's side. That is not what we want. I will bring hundreds of coal miners to talk to them, if necessary. Don't allow them to change your mind. I say go ahead with the project as planned.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STUDIES OF PROPOSED FIXED CROSSING

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable Senators, since we are dealing with environmental studies, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he will lay on the table the findings of the environmental impact studies that were conducted into the fixed link between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of Canada. Will he also make a statement as to where that matter now rests?

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, if that material is available, I shall certainly be happy to lay it on the table. Will I make a statement? I indicated the other day, in answer to questions from Senator Bonnell, that we continue to study that report with a view to finding a proposal that would be environmentally acceptable while also being economical feasible.

THE ENVIRONMENT

RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA DAMS PROJECT—ABILITY OF GOVERNMENT TO ALTER CANADA-U.S. AGREEMENT ON FLOOD CONTROL IN SOURIS BASIN

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, my question is to the leader of the government and it is with regard to the Rafferty-Alameda dams project.

Manitobans are concerned that the refusal by the Saskatchewan government to halt construction on the Rafferty-Alameda dams project will not permit sufficient time for a future review panel to determine what downstream effects the two dams will have on the Souris river which flows into Manitoba. At issue is the possible downstream environmental damage, including quality and quantity of water, an issue that was not addressed in the Saskatchewan Government's previous reviews.

Manitobans are also concerned that the Federal Environmental Review Process be respected so that the principle of "build now, review later" does not become a precedent for other provinces to follow.

These concerns may be academic if, as reported in The Globe and Mail on October 19, Saskatchewan is legally bound to build the Rafferty-Alameda dams exactly as detailed in an October, 1989 U.S.-Canadian agreement, regardless of whether or not an environmental review finds the diversion to be environmentally sound.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: What is the Government's view of its ability to alter the Canada-U.S. agreement with respect to water supply and flood control in the Souris river basin? Can Canada stop or alter the Rafferty-Alameda project if an environmental review panel finds it is necessary, given the environmental consequences?

I suspect that the honourable government leader may not have the answer at hand, and I would be most grateful if he would take up the question with his colleagues in cabinet.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, all I can tell the honourable senator today is that, as she knows, there is an agreement between Canada and the United States to provide flood storage to the United States by constructing the Rafferty-Alameda dams. However, our obligations under that agreement are further subject to Canadian laws, including environmental laws.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—STATUS OF PLANS FOR NEW FERRY AND TERMINAL

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Since we are talking about ships and fixed links to Prince Edward Island, perhaps I could ask the minister what progress has been made in the construction of a ferry between Wood Island and Caribou, Nova Scotia. This was promised by the Minister of Transport a year before the last election. The election came and went, and the fixed link went down the drain with the environmental review panel. The plans for the ferry are not yet drawn.

Can the Government Leader tell me what plans have been made for the construction of the new wharves and terminal for the Wood Island-Caribou link: what progress the department has made in drawing up the plans for said terminal; what the plans specifically contain, and when we can expect a new ferry on that run?

Senator Murray: Honourable Senators, I shall make enquiries with the department as to the status of that project. As I told the honourable senator the other day, I should also add that the fixed link has not, as he put it, gone down the drain. The report of the environmental assessment group is being studied with a view to seeing whether there are alternatives which are both environmentally and economically feasible. Meanwhile, we await a definitive statement from Senator Bonnell as to his position on the matter. Is he for the fixed link, or is he against it?

Senator Steuart: Is that all that is holding it up?

ENERGY

PRICE OF GASOLINE IN LONDON, ONTARIO AND ENVIRONS

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable Senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Crude oil is moved from Alberta to Sarnia, Ontario where it is manufactured into gasoline and transported to London, Ontario by pipeline. Then, I am told, the dealers receive gasoline by truck, delivered from the large plants.

Last Sunday in London, I bought gas for 59.5 cents a litre. I went through Woodstock and the price there was 55.5 cents a litre. That is a distance of 30 miles. A person has to be paid to haul the gasoline from London to Woodstock and points east, north, south, west, and all over the area. Can you tell me why gasoline is cheaper outside of the City of London, Ontario?

Many years ago I contacted the oil companies by writing them all letters. Only one answered my letter, and that happened to be Imperial Oil. They sent a salesman up to my office and he gave me a "snow job". The reason I know it was a "snow job" is that he went back to his office and told the girl that he just gave Charlie Turner a big "snow job", and so she called me on the phone.

• (1450)

Do not tell, therefore me it is that the oil companies are honest. Why is gasoline cheaper outside of London than it is in London?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I do not know, honourable senators. If I can find out, I will let my friend know.

THE SENATE

DELAY IN PRODUCTION OF DEBATES

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows why we are so far behind in receiving our Senate debate records. There is nothing from yesterday, and there are several days missing from last week. It is very hard for a house to operate without having a contemporary record of its proceedings.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I appreciate the point raised by the honourable senator. I made the same inquiry myself the day before yesterday. I received a note from one of the officials advising that the marathon sessions that we engaged in recently have caused quite a backlog of printing, translation, pagination, and so on, and that it will still be several days before the Senate Debates people are completely up to date with our verbatim report.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

JOINT CANADA-EEC DECLARATION OF SHARED PRINCIPLES—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF PROPOSED DRAFT

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In today's Globe and Mail there is an article datelined Washington that states that Canada and the European Economic Community will sign a joint declaration of shared principles next month that seeks to formalize trans atlantic relations. Later on, the article goes on to say that, for Canada, the plan is an extension of former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's 1974 effort to forge "a contractual link" with the EEC.

Would it be possible for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to table the proposed draft so that it could be shared by members on all sides prior to its execution in Europe some time next month?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall obtain whatever documentation is available from my colleague, Mr. Clark, on that matter.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRTEENTH REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADOPTION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Buckwold, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, for the adoption of the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Bill C-62, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act), presented in the Senate on 26th September, 1990.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Stanbury.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I see that the first two people I intended to address are not in the house. In any event, I wish to congratulate Senator Buckwold on a magnificent speech.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Stanbury: It was an exposition of the work of the committee and the report of the committee which should, and will, be a classic for many, many years.

I also want to congratulate Senator Kelly, because I have always had a great respect and affection for him. I must say that my respect grew yesterday as I found that he had the ability to rationalize an absolutely impossible situation. Senator Kelly, when he returns will receive my congratulations for that great ability to rationalize the impossible.

Honourable senators, since coming to power six years ago the reform of Canada's taxation system has been a major preoccupation of the government. As we all know, stage one of tax reform was in place by the summer of 1988. Stage two has had a pretty rocky road so far this year, so far and it will not get any smoother.

[Senator Grafstein.]

In August of 1989 the government issued a technical paper that outlined many details of the goods and services tax. The House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance studied the technical paper and issued a report in November of 1989. Even the Tory majority on the committee recognized that there were problems with the proposal and recommended the lowering of the tax rate. The federal government responded in December 1989 with revised proposals.

Bill C-62 was given first reading in January of this year and was studied and amended by the House of Commons before being passed by the government and the House in April of this year—after multiple applications for closure and even though two Alberta Tories had the courage to vote with their conscience and according to the wishes of their constituents. They voted against the bill at the cost of expulsion from the Tory party.

Although the previous studies were extensive, as more time goes by and Canadians discuss tax reform among themselves, people generate a greater understanding of the tax and how it will affect them and the economy. The Senate committee's report is, thus, the most accurate and reliable measure of the Canadian public's attitude toward this component of tax reform. Let no one say that this report is faulty because the evidence was heard in a biased manner or was an inaccurate reflection of public opinion, like so many polls may be said to be.

The committee heard approximately 380 presentations during 200 hours of public hearings in all ten provinces and both territories. Of these, a mere 32 expressed unqualified support for the bill; another 32 were prepared to support the bill with changes. But 209 witnesses expressed outright opposition to the GST. These figures are significant, because they help demonstrate just how extensive is the opposition to the GST. These were thoughtful people who were not partisan. They opposed the GST as the government proposed it, because it is bad.

The committee's work has clearly been a tremendous effort. I should like to congratulate Senator Buckwold and the members of the committee on the production of what I consider to be an excellent, eye-opening report.

A total of 43 headings are used in the report to summarize recommendations for changes made by witnesses. What is startling, honourable senators, is that it appears as though every single sector of society, ranging from exporters, to natives, to providers of health care, have urged amendments. Had they believed that the Senate might be willing to defeat the bill, more would have urged us to do so during the hearings.

Clearly the overwhelming majority of Canadians are opposed to the GST. It is about time the government started to act in accordance with the will of the people. While most people agree that the current federal sales tax is a bad tax, the overwhelming evidence presented to the committee and summarized in the report leads one to the inescapable conclusion that this tax is more a problem than a solution.

In too many industries and sectors of the economy the GST concept has been exposed as containing too many flaws. The tax is unfair; it is too complex. It will harm the economy at a time when the economy most needs help and will result in a tax grab rather than legitimate legislative tax reform.

The government did not choose the GST concept for reform out of necessity. As the report indicates, there are at least ten alternatives that could be considered. Therefore, I support the committee's recommendation that the bill be rejected and not approved by honourable senators.

● (1500)

Honourable senators, the government has for years made the war on inflation a cornerstone of its monetary policy. While it tells us, on the one hand, that it is doing everything it can to wring inflation out of the Canadian economy, it simultaneously plans to adopt new inflationary measures. Is it any wonder that Canadians are extremely cynical about politics, and that this government has set new unpopularity records?

At the beginning of a new recession it is hard to escape the conclusion that this is the wrong tax at the wrong time. The government has made numerous claims about the affect of the GST on inflation and prices, with which it has tried to persuade the public that the impact will be minimal. According to the government, for example, the GST would result in a one-time Consumer Price Index increase of about 1.25 per cent.

The evidence before the committee has seriously questioned and challenged the government's estimate, meaning that the GST could be much more devastating than the government is willing to recognize or admit. The government has assumed that the savings from the removal of the federal sales tax would be passed on to consumers. But that assumption fails to take into account a number of special circumstances, including inadequate inventory rebates and regulated uncompetitive markets. The government's assumption is therefore unrealistic and unreliable.

Inflation will likely rise by more than the government is willing to admit. This will likely be used as an excuse to maintain interest rates at current levels or even to raise them, thus ensuring the depth and duration of the recession.

In addition, it appears that the government's assumption that organized labour is powerless to address a reduction in the purchasing power of wages has also been undermined. New labour contracts contain GST protection clauses which will further wage hikes and result in increased costs to firms, thus resulting in higher prices and higher taxes.

The report gives a thorough account of numerous technical flaws and inequities of which the bill is full. It would take too long for me to address the intricacies of each case. However, a few astounding examples to which the report refers are worthy of note.

The committee heard numerous examples of differential treatment under the GST for food and beverage products. The GST was supposed to eliminate relative price distortions, but instead it introduces a whole new set of distortions. The fact that the government would set some key requirements for a new tax and then fail to meet them but persist in supporting the GST is truly perplexing. It was to be visible, fiscally neutral, fair and equitable, broadly based and integrated with provincial taxes. This bill fails on every one of those government prescribed criteria.

The committee report notes that the GST will adversely affect the non-profit sector in many ways. Should a non-profit business employing handicapped people have its sales reduced because of a new tax? Should the Royal Canadian Legion be taxed for Remembrance Day wreaths? Should amateur sports associations be unfairly penalized by not being eligible for the 50 per cent rebate on GST paid on inputs because they do not receive 40 per cent of their funding from government and are therefore not national in scope?

Charities and non-profit organizations are especially vulnerable to the increased administrative burden that the GST will require. Rather than making life more difficult for them, the government should be thinking of ways to make things easier.

The municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals sectors—which some people refer to as the MUSH sector—also has a number of complaints about the GST about which we should be very concerned. For one thing, the GST system will have a serious impact on cash flow. As we have all heard over the past few years, hospitals and universities are already feeling incredible financial squeezes which make it impossible to provide health care and education of top quality in a reasonable time. This further complication is unconscionable.

In addition, the sheer administrative complexity of the tax will increase labour costs for municipalities which will either have to cut services or raise their own taxes.

One of the most cherished social programs in the country is the universal provision of health care. While health care facilities and recognized health care practitioners are supposed to be exempt from the GST, they will be affected in a very adverse way. Purchases made by health care providers are taxable and their costs will thus rise, even though some health care facilities will receive a rebate for the added tax.

Not surprisingly, therefore, the committee found that Bill C62 would discriminate among health care institutions and between practitioners.

It appears that public sector long-term care facilities would receive a rebate of 83 per cent while others operating on a non-profit basis would receive only 50 per cent. In addition, long term care facilities operated for profit would not be eligible for any rebate on the tax paid on their purchases.

Most alarming is the fact that psychotherapists for children, massage therapists, dieticians and social workers, among other groups, would not be included in the list of exempt health care services. This clearly contradicts the government's claim that health care will not be taxed by the GST.

Concerning physicians and their apparent exemption under the GST, they will have to pay the GST on their own purchases but would not be permitted to charge tax on their sales. In other words, physicians are expected by the government to bear the cost of the GST and accept lower incomes. The provinces have indicated that they will not permit doctors to raise their fees to include the GST.

In the field of education, a reccurring criticism was that courses which do not directly lead to a diploma or a degree would be taxable. Education should be considered an investment worthy of being promoted, not hindered by increased costs. Students will also have to pay additionally for education materials. Clearly, the younger generation will have a harder time making ends meet during their student years than those of us who were lucky enough to graduate before 1991.

Believe it or not, the GST is actually supposed to apply to funerals. Benjamin Franklin was quoted as having said that there are only two things that are certain in life, death and taxes. Michael Wilson now thinks that they should be combined. It is surely the ultimate insult to the family of the person who passed away to make them pay tax for it. Should the dead person be the breadwinner of a young family in a lower-income bracket, taxing the funeral displays a terrible lack of compassion for people who can least afford it. Perhaps the Tories will become more sensitive to this issue and realize how offensive it is when they have to buy a coffin for their own political party after the next election.

One of the most disturbing things about this tax is the fact that it is simply so unfair. It is a regressive tax. Lower-income individuals spend a greater share of income on consumption and are therefore obliged to pay a greater proportion of their income on sales tax.

● (1510)

As we know, the federal government is trying to make this more acceptable by including a system of tax credits in the GST package. However, the credits and the income threshold are only indexed to take account of inflation in excess of 3 per cent. Thus, the real value of the credits will decline over time and benefits to families and individuals will be reduced. In the long run, the very poor would not be protected from the extra cost of the GST. The legislation does not provide for full indexation, and having the government say that it intends to adjust the tax credits over time does not create confidence.

After all, this was the government that began its financial reforms by attempting to de-index old age pensions. When Mr. Wilson suggests that he will review tax credits, the possibility that he will reduce them rather than increase them is to be expected as his government proceeds to destroy the social programs of Canada.

Other problems exist with the credits that are rather frightening. Could it really be possible that in order to qualify for a credit one must make more than $11,169? Do not the people who make less than that amount need it the most? And what about the high cost of living in Canada's remote regions? Transportation costs of goods are expected to rise, thus lowering the purchasing power of families in remote regions even more than in central areas. Why should these people be made to suffer disproportionately to the rest of us?

[Senator Stanbury.]

Surely the government should consider that in a country with a climate such as Canada's, taking care of society's shelter needs should be considered a priority. The government has attempted to assure Canadians that the GST will not affect housing. Not surprisingly, the evidence presented to the committee contained in the report is contrary to what the government has said. It is most alarming.

Land will now be taxed, and in the golden horseshoe area of southern Ontario this will increase costs significantly. In Toronto, for example, homes will cost, on average, $10,000 more. Is it not enough that the government has maintained interest rates at such a high level that fewer people can now afford to pay mortgage interest?

The committee also found that the price of exempt items such as residential rents would go up in price as a result of the GST, and it is expected to be a substantial increase in the case of new accommodations.

Besides being unfair, the GST is too complex. Most unfortunate is the fact that it is also regressive in terms of compliance by business. Cost of compliance is much greater for a small business than a large business. Once again, the government should be trying to help entrepreneurs establish going concerns that thrive, grow and employ people, rather than unnecessarily complicating matters for them and getting them bogged down with paperwork.

The complexity, paradoxically, increases rather than decreases when one considers the zero-rated and tax-exempt items that are added to the system. This will be especially evident in the case of small retailers selling food products, who do not have computerized checkout scanners to distinguish taxable and tax-free products.

It is no wonder that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has stated:

> What this government is proposing is the absolute worst sales tax in the world. It is the worst system that man could possibly devise.

Another business group stated that the GST will create an administrative nightmare for small business.

If the Tories will not listen to the Opposition, then the least they could do is pay attention to their former allies. Traditionally, one expects that when business groups speak, the Conservatives listen. Clearly, that is no longer the case and it leads one to ask: With whom did the government consult when it came up with this idea? Obviously it was not labour, nor was it business or consumers. The lack of consultation is clearly one of the major problems with this scheme.

The complexity of the GST is also harmful to the economy. One area which is particularly disturbing is the additional bureaucratic costs. An additional 4,000 people will be hired to raise the same amount of money that is now collected. This makes no sense at all.

Besides the rise in prices, which I have already mentioned, the economy will suffer from this tax, because it is likely to lead to higher wage demands, unemployment and potential labour strife. The committee report is modest when it says,

"Exacerbating an economic downturn is not usually considered good economic policy." The fact is that exacerbating an economic downturn is so ridiculous that only this ridiculous government could even contemplate it.

The federal sales tax would be expected to raise $18.5 billion in 1991 if it were left in place. The goods and services tax is expected to raise a similar amount, but at an additional cost of some $200 million which will have to be paid for through more taxes. Many people, including the committee members, agree that this tax constitutes a tax grab instead of tax reform, and I agree. The threat of future escalating rates while the government does not use the revenues for their stated purpose is also of great concern. Senator Kelly's whole speech talked about the need for deficit reduction, but the government refuses to commit itself to use any surplus for that purpose.

A few supporters of the GST, including Senator Kelly, have stated that the opponents of the tax have not proposed any alternatives. I thought that myth had long since been laid to rest. The committee report outlines ten alternatives to the tax which should be considered. We have heard of other proposals from very important institutions in this country. The committee did not provide a complete evaluation of the various alternatives as it did with the GST, for obvious reasons, including lack of time and resources. However, rather than insisting on the GST, as if it were a sacred cow, the government should take advantage of the feedback it has received to scrap this terrible proposal and seriously consider the other alternatives which are bound to be more fair and efficient and less costly, complex and disruptive.

● (1520)

In conclusion, I am more than satisfied with the committee's evaluation of the material presented to it and the contents of its report. I fully support the concluding recommendation that the bill be rejected, and I think, again to use Senator Murray's words, that any sensible person looking at the evidence objectively is bound to come to the same conclusion. We are discussing a question of great significance to the financial wellbeing and future of this country. Never before have I felt so justified in opposing a policy of the government. Not only is it not in the interests of Canada, but Canadians in massive numbers simply do not want it. After all, this is supposed to be a democracy. If we do not reflect the will of the people, or, at least, respond to it, we will be in even deeper trouble than we are now.

The goods and services tax is an extremely complex matter, and it takes a great deal of time to understand its implications. This report goes a long way toward making it easier for all Canadians to understand just what is at stake here, and the more they learn about it, the more they demand that it not be implemented.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the honourable senator?

Senator Stanbury: Certainly.

Senator Denis: The honourable senator has talked about the government and he has said that its publicity does not support the truth. Can he explain the difference between the actual costs of the manufacturers' sales tax at the retail level and the actual costs of the GST at the retail level? Does he know how many times higher the 7 per cent GST will raise retail goods as opposed to the 13 per cent manufacturers' sales tax? Every book, paper and document of government publicity on the tax talks about the savings as a result of discontinuing the 13 per cent manufacturers' sales tax. You would swear from the advertising that the government is giving consumers a real deal with a cheaper GST. Has the honourable senator any figures to show how much the GST and the MST raise goods at the retail level?

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Denis for his question. However, I am not sure that I am the right person to answer it. I am sure that Senator Buckwold has a better technical command of that situation. We do know that the present FST produces, according the government, the same amount of money as the GST will produce in its first year, less the cost of administration, which is about $200 million. We also know that some manufacturers will receive an exemption from the GST and some will not. Honourable senators may recall a question between two soap manufacturers that came before the Senate, one of whom will receive an exemption and one of whom will not. Of course, they both want the exemption. Also, the manufacturers who do not have exemptions support the GST because it means that they will get rid of the MST and that the cost of the tax can be passed on to the consumer.

The actual percentage of increase varies. I cannot recall the exact figures, but I can remember that there is a saving on a $750 refrigerator of $1.32 under the GST. Other items face substantial increases of several hundreds of dollars. It is difficult to answer the honourable senator's question without having before me the study that was done by the committee.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, all this means that there has been no real comparison done of the different prices between manufacturers and retailers. Therefore, the comparisons used in the publicity are unfair to the consumer. It is like comparing a horse with a rabbit. Do you think that there is a great difference between the two taxes?

Senator Stanbury: Of course. We all know that the price of a product at the retail level is different than the price of that product at the manufacturing level. So if you apply 13.5 per cent to $100 at the manufacturer's level and there is a markup on the item of 50 per cent at the retail level—and here I defer to merchants—the rate and the amount in absolute dollars will be far higher.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: The Canadian government has referred Bill C-62 to the Senate for consideration. This is a tax measure through which it proposes ways and means to finance its programs and its administration.

There can be no doubt that this bill reflects a new approach to taxation and that it raises a number of questions. But is that enough to justify the antics we have witnessed recently in this chamber over the adoption of the bill?

When it comes to public finances, spending is indeed easier than taxing. As long as public servants dream up new spending programs, as long as special interest groups within society keep asking for an ever larger share of government hand-outs, and as long as politicians take credit for it all, government and political circles as well as pressure groups trade good procedures, smile with satisfaction and pat each other on the back.

When time comes to pay up, we always want our fellow citizen to pick up the tab, or else we defer payment further still. We will readily point our finger at a guilty party, a spendthrift, an egotist, or a lousy accountant. Intent on absolving our own conscience or on ignoring our own inconsistencies, our own blunders or even our own good or bad choices, we are quite prepared to denounce one and all, shoot the messenger, or hide our heads in the sand.

There is no economic context that will turn a bitter tax medicine into sweet honey. It will always be difficult to make people agree to pay more taxes. Human nature being what it is, the line of least resistance, the concept of reaping without sowing, or the had-I-known excuse become the ever handy way out for irresponsible people.

Fortunately public finances are governed by public ethics and simple logic: the elected representatives of the people are responsible for collecting and administering public funds. And those same elected representatives are responsible and accountable for the choices they make. Their stewardship is subject to the judgment of the electorate. Our institutions are rooted in respect for the democratic process. In fact, it is the people who judge those in whom they placed their trust. The purpose of the system is to improve society's opportunities for progress and to prevent specific groups from controlling, compromising or subverting the interests of the community.

As senators, we are proud of the fact that we have served our country as individuals, but we must acknowledge that our legitimacy as members of this "Upper" Chamber is not vested in us directly by the will of the people but by those who were elected by the people, in other words, the Prime Ministers who appointed us or the elected governments that ratified the Constitution by which we are governed.

In fact, the Constitution gives us certain powers and and also certain duties that are further clarified by British or Canadian parliamentary tradition. I doubt any senator could claim that the Constitution or our parliamentary tradition includes the right to compromise the exercise of the legislative authority of the elected Chamber.

Why this determination to highjack democracy, the people's right to choose those by whom they are governed? Why this determination to assume the right to veto the decisions of elected representatives and to usurp those social values without which we would not be here today? Can we honestly say we are serving the cause of democracy and the people?

Yes, we have the right and we are free to exercise certain powers within a specific framework. Yes, we may and we must intervene for the purpose of improving legislation and government measures. We even have the right to act like politicians and to be partisan.

Howeve, by abusing our rights, we choose to degrade our position, and in the process, our parties, our leaders, our elected representatives, our supporters and our fellow citizens. In the final instance, they will have to conclude that we have lost our legitimacy.

[Senator Poitras.]

● (1530)

Our conduct with respect to the present bill is particularly irresponsible because it takes advantage of the fact that the tax burden of Canadians is already very substantial. Where were our rebel senators when the budget deficit, which is about to bankrupt this country, was piling up?

This legislation is one of many. It is important, not only because of the present economic situation but because it is to become an integral part of our tax legislation.

What moral justification exists for this kind of obstruction? The bill's lack of popularity? A desire on the part of some people to destabilize the government? To encourage an early election call? Is it your inability to accept the ways and means chosen by the government? Is it spite, because you lost your majority in the Senate? If any of these assumptions proved to be true, I would call that political partisanship of the lowest order.

I find it hard to believe that your irresponsible behaviour was due to frustration or that you acted at the behest of a few frustrated, well-meaning senators, cocksure with the arrogance of former power brokers on desillusioned because the sun rises whether they like it or not.

Honourable senators, I have tried in vain to find some justification for the behaviour of those among us who are still reluctant to let their sense of judgment, discipline and courtesy prevail, all of which they seem to have lost when they let themselves get carried away by the childish antics of one particular group.

I find all this very depressing, especially when you consider that those who take their responsibilities as senators seriously have a valuable contribution to make towards improving our legislation.

With all the disturbances we have had in this Chamber, it is a fact that more than ever before, the eyes of Canada are upon us. I would have preferred Canadians to see leaders who are respectful of the Constitution, of our institutions and of authority. I would have preferred them to be able to admire the strength of character of people tested by experience, who respect the views of others. And at a time when the provinces would like to see changes in the role of the Senate, to make us better represent the interests of those provinces, I would have preferred our attitude to be one that create a climate of trust.

At a time when our country is going through one of the worst constitutional crises in its history, I would have liked to see us, as senators, agree to help consolidate and update our institutions, instead of discrediting them through our behaviour.

Senator Cools: It's a grand institution. It's too bad you don't liek it.

Senator Poitras: Time is running out. For the sake of Canada's future, we must take a more positive and constructive approach to the exercise of our responsibilities. The bill before us today deserves careful analysis that has been lacking so far.

Speaking of bills, perhaps I may address the report before us today. I think a little background would be useful. During the few years I have been in this Chamber, I have known two kinds of chairmen of the Banking Committee. First, ewe had Senator Buckwold, who was familiar with the customs, procedures and ways of the Senate. He was a President with a long experience of life, a President who respected the opinions of others and had a team spirit. It is under this President that we have prepared, presented and approved in this House a report on financial institutions. It really was the work of a committee, a twelve-member committee which had a steering committe and met regularly.

At that time, the steering committee's study group provided direction and, together, we would achieve a consensus, even if it meant for the staff, the researchers and the Clerk to come up with the projects we needed.

I recall that this particular report required at least five drafts. Working together, we were able to achieve a consensus which took our individual contribution into account and met with the approval of this House.

For the study of Bill C-62, we met and worked with a totally different President, a President who undertook, when the hearings were set, to write himself a report he claimed to be that of the Committee.

More precisely, one day in the middle of August, this President, acting on his own authority—surely he had a skill or knowledge no one else had—, with only our researchers as witnesses, took upon himself to amend the report, have it translated, proofread it himself and decide on his own that the translation was accurate. He also decided, as witness, juge and jury, that the summary of testimonies accurately represented what the witnesses wanted to say.

He did so even after strictly forbidding all researchers and one of his own colleagues, Senator Kirby, access to this study.

● (1540)

[English]

> No member of the committee or any other senator, including Senator Kirby, has seen the report in its present form. The report is being drafted by our researchers under the supervision of the Chairman.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

[Traslation]

Senator Poitras: This was confirmed by a number of letters from our researchers and the Senate committee clerk who had been expressely instructed not to show this document to anybody, even his own colleague whom, I consider as one of the most brilliant senators opposite.

Therefore at noon on September 24, was handed down a report he had prepared, scrutinized, translated with the assistance of his researchers—with the help of an outsider, one of these leaders who, together with him, empressed I should say rather freely the ideas to put forward and the action to take. We were told that before 6 o'clock we would have to had read this report, checked the validity of the comments on the testimonies, and verified the translation.

By the way, translating was fairly easy. For instance, on the front page of the English document which you have, you can read "Eleventh report" and in French we have "Treizième rapport". As you can see, there is nothing to it! This job is very easy!

So it is under duress that we had to read this report, without the opportunity to contribute any valuable input, a report which today is called "the Committee Report", but which in fact is the "Buckwold Report".

If I may, I should also like to tell you also how these hearings were set up. Of course, the Committee heard 379 witnesses, but it should be emphasized that there were several repeat performances. For instance, these 379 witnesses included the representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress who presented between 18 and 20 reports. In other words, twenty times the same report. As you can see, a hundred per cent of the witnesses were against!

Many funeral parlor directors appeared in turn to present the same testimony and often we had the very copies of previous testimonies. This certainly helped to get 100 per cent of the people against this document!

Finally, when a testimony did not seem representative of one side of the hall, the chairman's side, he had the opportunity—very astutely (I recognize his cunning ability and intelligence) to quote a text from the outside to simplify or contredict in someway the testimony we had just heard.

At this juncture most senators arrived here on September 25. But it was not on September 25 that the Liberal Senators showed their hand but rather when our Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce heard the testimonies and held its hearings. At that point, the ethics went by the board. That was the end of the rules of "fairplay".

If I may, I should like now to deal more specifically with Bill C-62. I can understand that additional reviews are called for!

Just the same, Honourable Senators, I should like to remind you that since 1940, there were a series of reviews and commissions. I should like especially to remind you that in November 1982, a certain Minister of Finance by the name of MacEachen introduced in the House of Commons a Federal tax bill to replace this bad sales tax which was no longer acceptable.

● (1550)

I shall, if I may, quote a few passages from Senator MacEachen's proposal. I quote:

> The federal sales tax which is imposed—

This was in 1981.

> —at the manufacturer's level suffers from a number of structural defects. These have been the subject of extensive review and comment. The most serious consequence of these defects is that they place domestic manufacturers at a substantial competitive disadvantage in relation to importers.

And they want more studies! Further on . . . and I quote:

> After an extensive review of a range of options, the government has concluded that the imposition of the tax at the last trade level prior to the retail level, that is the wholesale level, would be the most direct method of correcting the defects of the present system.

He goes on to say:

> The necessary legislation to affect this change will be introduced early in 1982.

And today, they would have us wait another three, four or five years, at the public's expense! Further on, I would like to quote another passage from the same speech:

> A move to the wholesale level will permit a lowering of the general tax rate, while yielding the same revenues. The general rate will be reduced—

At the time it was 9 per cent. He decided to reduce it to 8 per cent. He couldn't bring it down to 7 per cent, but today we can!

> The reduction will, however, be delayed by six months, until January 1, 1983, in order to offset a one-time revenue loss resulting from refunds of tax on wholesalers' inventories.

Attached to these documents are a number of tables indicating the benefits of the new tax in terms of domestic products and imports, and the difference in price to the public. There is a reference to household products, toys and sporting goods, for instance. In all cases, differences range between 3 and 4 per cent.

That is still the case today. In just a moment, I will give you some new data to explain how this tax, in addition to making goods cheaper, will give a boost to our gross national product that will benefit the entire country.

These were a few quotes from a document by Senator MacEachen, who had already ordered extensive studies prior to coming up with the kind of tax we will have as of January 1, 1991.

People conveniently forget that this tax is a replacement tax. Of course, someone is going to pay for this new tax. Of course it is a tax. It will cost about $18 billion. However, I challenge anyone here in this Chamber to tell me how much federal sales tax he or she pays at the present time. The tax we have is a regressive tax, and it is a hidden tax. That is the kind of tax we want to replace.

I have here figures for our two largest provinces. We could get them for all the provinces, if you like. Out of $18.5 billion, the province of Quebec pays $4.5 billion annually. Every Canadian, including children and the elderly, pays an average of $660 each. It's a tax. It's money. They would rather not talk about that. They only want to talk about what the new tax will cost.

[Senator Poitras.]

Ontario, this country's largest province, pays $7.6 billion annually in federal sales tax. It averages out to $780 per person, again including children. But they prefer to forget these figures. Let's not talk about them. Let's talk about this bad new tax. To find out how this tax will increase the gross national product, all you have to do is look at the official chart issued in April 89 which shows how each province will benefit. The average for the whole sector is 1.4 per cent, which translates into $9 billion in the next few years.

Do you know which provinces will benefit the most from the increase in the gross national product? Together, the western provinces will see their economies grow by twice the national average or 2.5 per cent. But you never hear about these figures!

What is important is not the taxes we have to pay but how our country will develop, how our companies will grow and compete with the rest of the world.

I am quoting these figures, honourable senators, to clearly show how this tax will, in the medium term . . . Of course, we will have to live through the first day, the first six months and the first year.

I think a short-term policy is irresponsible. To build an economy, one has to think of the short and medium terms. Trade is no longer national, sectoral or provincial. It is international.

To compete with the Europe of 1992, we will need this legislation. We must remain competitive at the international level or else the companies that do business only in Canada will also suffer and this, in turn, will lead to insurmountable difficulties.

Having said that, honourable senators, I would like to close by quoting some comments made by the hundreds of groups and the thousands of individuals who have signed petitions against the GST.

We have to take the people into account. All trades are equal in value. But when comes the time to take care of a specific need, we go to a specialist. When we are sick, we go to a doctor, not to a lawyer, however bright he is. And when we need financing, we don't go to a doctor, but to our banker or broker. The qualifications of those who agree or disagree with a project must be taken into account. To me, to forget that is to forget completely the soundness and the value of whatever testimonies we have.

I have here the summaries of a few testimonies and I want to quote first the Economic Council of Canada:

> The GST would improve productivity, thence competitiveness and, over the long term, would give the federal government a stronger fiscal structure. With a wider tax base and a relatively low rate, the GST would help lighten the tax burden, create less distortions than the existing manufacturers' sales tax and encourage people to save for their retirement. Moreover, it would give a boost to exports, to investments in equipment and machinery and therefore to employment and production.

I now quote another witness, the Conference Board:

The GST brings long term economic benefits because it:

1. improves efficiency through a better distribution of resources;

2. makes our exports more competitive;

3. reduces the capital cost of investments in Canada.

According to the Conference Board, the challenge will be the management of the transition from the MST to the GST from 1991 to 1993.

By making tax evasion more difficult, the GST would be a stable tax that would allow the capture of much of the underground economy.

We had as witnesses several university professors, those who teach economics, who have the expertise and who thoroughly examined these questions. I quote from Mr. Irwin Gillespie, who is a professor at Carleton University. He thinks that, by and large, the introduction of the GST would be a good reform, would make the tax system more equitable, taking in account both the treatment of the equal elements and the progressiveness of all of the tax system. With a more efficient tax system, the economy will also be more efficient, and this change would have the net effect of increasing per capita income. Finally, he believes that the GST would be a more stable source of predictable revenue.

Another professor at the same Carleton University, Mr. Maslove, thinks that the GST would have four advantages:

1. It would be more efficient given its neutrality for exports and imports; presently, our system favours imports over exports.

This is one of the critical issues. I quote again:

2. It would be more equitable, because it would simply replace the FST, given that the GST would apply to a wider range of goods and services, which are not taxed at the moment.

One point that should be noted in our tax system, which is outdated, is that we tax to the limits those who produce the goods while the numerous services purchased by the well-to-do are not taxed. Thus, the present system works at the expense of those who produce the goods. The system which is used by some fifty countries insures that both groups will carry equally the burden of developing the country.

This is another basic point about the GST. Finally, there is a fourth professor, I believe, from the University of Quebec in Montreal, Mr. Pierre Fortin. He says that the GST is the first step towards a simpler and fairer tax system which will be better able to foster our competitiveness at the international level. I do not know very many senators from the other side of the Chamber, or from this side, who would be more knowledgeable than these experts. He continues:

1. It would favour economic growth by stimulating business investment.

2. It would create a better tax balance between the goods sector and the services sector.

These are only a few testimonies, there are many more, by those who have the expertise, who are familiar with the subject, which show clearly the way we should follow.

I would like to conclude with another quote, to share with you part of the testimony from one of the most important and better qualified groups in this country to judge the validity of this tax. I am referring to the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, the very same people for whom an honourable senator from the other side introduced a private bill. He proved to us that they were one of the most important and most reliable groups in the country, and told us that all financial statements should be certified by a member of this Institute. I would like to quote first what Senator Buckwold had to say about this group.

● (1600)

[English]

I would now like to call on the representatives of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. I have the name of Irene David who is the Chairman of the Commodity Taxation Committee of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. I would like to say, in welcoming you, that the committee has been looking forward to the representations of the Institute of Chartered Accountants; that you are a very important part of the whole economic life of our country.

That was stated by Senator Buckwold.

[Translation]

I now continue. Here is what the president of that committee, Miss David, was saying.

[English]

Ms. David stated, and I quote:

I have just a few points to make at the outset. As some of you may be aware, the CICA committee represents 48,000 chartered accountants both in public and private practice throughout Canada. The committee itself includes members working with public accounting firms and members who work in business with extensive experience in industry such as telecommunications, oil and gas, manufacturing and import-export.

Over the years our committee has participated in special task forces and advisory groups with both the Department of Finance and Revenue Canada on a number of federal commodity tax issues. Our committee has also reviewed and provided input at each stage of the development of the GST. We appeared before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance and indicated at that time that the proposed régime is preferred over the seriously flawed federal sales tax system which currently exists. As a result we support the implementation of the reform measures introduced by the government.

We are here today, however, to stress to you that it is imperative that the business and professional community have certainty that the GST will become law on a specific date.

• (1610)

They cannot get up to speed at the eleventh hour. Thus, we encourage you to proceed with your review as expeditiously as possible so that the bill can receive Royal Assent.

[Translation]

I will continue for your information. I will quote another very interesting except. You will see any way that all that is happening today could have been premeditated. I am referring to the question senator Kirby asked Miss David and I quote:

[English]

He states:

If the bill is not passed, assuming it passes at all, until November 15,—

And perhaps that will be the date. He goes on to state:

—to pick an arbitrary date, would your advice then be that the government still ought to try to implement the tax on January 1? Or given your statement that it would take two to three months or more in order for business to be ready, would you suggest at that point that the launch date ought to be delayed?

[Translation]

Here again, we have a very clear answer given without any hesitation.

[English]

Ms. David said—and I quote:

Assuming that there are no changes, that the bill is—

Senator Kirby: That is a big assumption.

Ms. David: If there are no changes, I would say that the bill should take effect on January 1, 1991.

Senator Kirby then asks other questions. I will read them to you, because it is important to hear them. Senator Kirby goes on to state:

That is somewhat illogical. Can you explain to me why you say that? Accountants, of all the professionals in the world—and I say this as an ex-mathematician—understand the importance of accuracy and rigour. Why would you suggest that businesses would succeed with something that, by your own submission, they would not be ready to do?

Ms. David replies:

Some would. I think it would force them to get ready for the tax in that shorter period of time. If they had some assurance that the bill was going to receive Royal Assent in the fall, say in November, then they would get on with it and proceed.

Senator Kirby pushes again. He states:

Obviously, that assurance cannot be given. One of the purposes of this committee is precisely to deal with that issue.

[Senator Poitras.]

Ms. David: I think that is what our purpose here today is. It is to urge you to expedite your review so that that certainty is there, and so that the decision is not deferred.

This is very clear, honourable senators. This is what we should do, and this is what we intend to do.

• (1620)

[Translation]

In conclusion, I have explained to you this bill was discussed in the worst possible circumstances, and that something has to be done about this. You realize also that this report is the work of only one man who had the ability and the skills to lead a team, and if this had been a team report, it would have been far superior. Finally, you can see that the best experts in this field do not hesitate to recommend to the government to go ahead with this project?

That is why, honourable senators, I join with my colleagues in recommending that this report be not approved but instead be rejected, since it is not even the report of a committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Therefore, I suggest, when the time comes, that we should reject this report and pass this bill, as fast as we can, just like the Canadian people expect us to do. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Would the honourable senator entertain a question?

Senator Poitras: Yes, senator Denis.

Senator Denis: Let's come back to one effect of the goods and services tax. Does the honourable senator not recognize the fact that someone earning, let's say, $25,000 a year and a millionnaire would both pay the same tax on clothing, home heating, housing, et cetera, if the GST is passed.

Senator Poitras: Honourable senators, this is a very easy question to answer. First of all, your premise is all wrong. I have children, as you do and as many of us here do. I know some poor people. They do not live in the same kind of appartments, but their lodgings are tax-free, so they will not be treated the same way under the GST.

Secondly, the people who only have one source of income, who hold a job or run their own business do not need so many services, such as legal services, accounting, and so on. They do not need researchers for this and for that. They do not need all the services bit business people or the well-off require.

Thirdly, the less fortunate are all entitled to a credit even if they do not pay taxes. If you are interested, I have here some data which show that, compared to our present system, the poor people will benefit, not suffer, from the GST. For example, a family with two children and a net income of $20,000 will receive the GST credit of $580. Under the present tax system, the same family receives $320, but will not pay the present sales tax when purchasing a table, chairs, furniture, a TV set, a refrigerator, and so on.

So, lower income people will be better off and the rich will pay the biggest bundle. I can go on if you want me to. I can explain how the least fortunate will be better off tomorrow in each and every income bracket. We will see also a more rapid growth of the GNP which will create new jobs on the middle and the longer term. The economics of the GNP growth do not revolve around one single tax. By economics, we mean the mutual interaction of laws and circumstances. I will be pleased to answer any further question, honourable senators.

Senator Denis: I have a supplementary question. I am not talking about the poorest, or those who are tax free. I am talking about the vast majority of Canadian citizens. I mentionned those earning $25,000. That is the income bracket I was concerned with. I did not want to know what would happen to those in the $3,000 or the $4,000 income bracket. I wanted to know if families whose income is in the range of $25,000 or less, let us say $20,000 or $15,000, would pay the same tax as a millionnaire? We know that a millionnaire will likely buy more expensive cuts of meat, but the price of bread, milk, housing and heating is the same for everyone. The cost of staples is basically the same. What is the difference? Is it two, three per cent?

We know that some people managed to get rich by being thrifty and not spending too much as is the case of people who buy products that cost as much or more than those bought by millionnaires, even though they cannot afford them. Therefore, let us stay with the $25,000 income bracket. Let us put aside for now those who make $3,000. I do not want to know the answer for people in that income range. I want to know if those two people with different incomes will pay the same amount of tax?

Senator Simard: It is clear that they will be better off under the GST, Senator Denis.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I prefer Senator Poitras' answer because it is certainly more intelligent than the Senator Simard's answer.

Senator Poitras: First, I would like to remind honourable senators that 8.7 million families and individuals across the country will receive tax credits for the TPS. Some 8.7 million people! There must be a few poor in the lot.

Senator Denis: Let's keep to the question, Senator Poitras.

Senator Poitras: I will keep to yiour question. Would you be satisfied if I take the $30,000 income bracket? The figures here say that the Government made sure that individuals with income under $30,000 a year will be better off than they are now. For instance, a couple with two children living on a single income would gain $245. That is one case where people will receive more than they do now. They will be in a better financial position. This is my answer to your question. That is exactly what will happen.

But to accept those figures is to recognize that we might be right. That is one of the problems I noted earlier.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Senator Poitras, I have two questions for you. First, by what role did you play on the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce?

Secondly, when did you first see a copy of the report on Bill C-62?

Senator Poitras: Listen, Senator Buckwold has indeed made life easier for me. The steering committee did not meet after August 27. That was our last meeting. According to the chairman, though I am vice-chairman of the committee, I could not present our documents, talk about the witnesses we heard or analyse their testimonies because the researchers and the clerk had received orders from the one we call "Our Father in Heaven". Therefore, we were not able to analyse any of the testimony before September 24, at 11:45 in the morning. That is when I received my French copy, even though we had been promised the two versions at the same time, good or bad. Does that answer your question, senator?

Senator Kinsella: Yes, Senator Poitras.

[English]

Senator Sparrow: Senator, you said that people earning less than $30,000 will be better off after the GST is implemented than they are now. I believe that is what I heard you say, is it not?

Senator Poitras: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: I suppose in that statement you have to take into consideration the taxes they are paying now and what they would pay after the GST is implemented. I have figures from the Department of Finance which show that someone earning $28,050 per year will be entitled to a rebate of $5. What are you telling me? Are you saying that with the GST they will be paying only $4.50 in tax?

I have also read in media reports some comments that people will be better off after the tax is implemented. Would you comment on that, please?

Senator Barootes: Is that for a single parent with two children?

Senator Sparrow: Yes, that is right. It is for a single income earner. Those are the figures about which we are talking.

Senator Poitras: I do not have the figures to which you refer in front of me at the moment. I would be pleased to look at them and give you a response tomorrow at the very latest.

What you and others forget is that today everybody is paying the federal sales tax. Could you tell me how much you pay in federal sales tax? No one seems to know.

Senator Sparrow: Would the senator permit another question? If you are making a statement of that kind, then please bring me the figures which show what we presently pay in terms of the federal sales tax and make the comparison on that basis. Remember that this individual who will receive the $5 rebate will be paying the tax on all services which are not taxed at the present time.

You have just had delivered to your desk the figures to which I referred from the Department of Finance. Please review them very rapidly.

Senator Poitras: I would like to examine the figures and tomorrow I will give the honourable senator an answer. I do not like to talk about figures when I am not sure exactly what I have.

[Translation]

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: May I ask Senator Poitras a question?

Senator Poitras: Yes, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: Let us take the case of a student who just learned from the government that she will get a $65 GST tax credit every three months.

Her total income is $8,700, including scholarships, and her tax credit will be $260.70 annually.

Let us assume that she uses half of her income for food and clothing. Most of the time, students just eat sandwiches and yogurt that are taxable. This is a law student. She does not have the time to stay home and cook her own meals and make her own clothing.

So, that student is going to pay at least $300 in tax and her credit will be $260.70, which means that she will pay more taxes than she does now.

Now, that student is fairly well-off. Some students do not even have scholarships and their income is less than $8,700. They will nonetheless have to pay just as much tax.

Senator Poitras: Senator Gigantès, you are overlooking an important fact. Among those who are paying $18 billion right now, you are assuming that some taxpayers do not pay a cent.

That is not true. The tax we pay now cannot be figured out. Nobody can estimate its cost for any taxpayer.

How much tax do we pay right now? Anybody can pretend that he does not pay a cent. But if that were true, the new tax would be an extra burden. But if somebody pays $300 and gets a $280 tax credit, he will be better off if, at the present time, he pays more that $20 in sales tax. Students buy radios and pay tax. They have small TV sets in their rooms. They buy cars. Students have cars, nowadays, or motorcycles.

Any way you cut it, the student in your example will be better off with the new tax.

In other words, the situation is not as cruel and as complicated as you say it is. These are just scare tactics.

• (1630)

People in other countries were able to manage. We heard French witnesses. They have a VAT in France. Other countries will have a competitive advantage if we do not change our system.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Poitras, you told us that it is impossible to figure out the cost of the tax we have now.

Senator Poitras: How much do you pay?

Senator Gigantès: You just said it is impossible to figure it out. Could you tell me how much I pay?

Senator Poitras: In Quebec, the average is $660. In Ontario, it is $780. You must be paying more than that.

Senator Gigantès: How come?

Senator Poitras: Yes, for food and other important items.

[Senator Poitras.]

Senator Gigantès: What about the things poor people buy, like clothing, shoes and food? Can you calculate how much tax they presently pay?

Senator Poitras: This is the problem.

Senator Gigantès: Then, how can you say that they will pay less under the new tax, if you cannot calculate it? Why less? You just don't know.

Senator Poitras: We know that the tax paid in Ontario is $7.5 billion. This is paid by men and women like you and me, by human beings, by Canadians. We know it. We know the average. This is the tax that the Hon. Allan MacEachen wanted to replace.

The problem is that you need a lot of courage. This is true. Eventually you have to go ahead and make a transition. In Ontario, electricity was converted from 25 to 60 Hertz. It was an extraordinary feat that cost a huge amount of money. Everybody was against it.

Today, who would want to go back to the old system? We also converted from Imperial to metric and nobody would revert back. In this case, too, we have to make a change. So let us make it and in a few years, you will be the first one to say that it had to be made.

Senator Gigantès: Senator, you just said that in the case of a person who is poor and spends most of his money on food, clothes, shoes and transportation, you cannot calculate just how much tax is being paid.

So, if you don't know it, how can you say that this person will receive more money from the government than he presently pays? You simply cannot say it.

So why od you keep saying it if you don't know?

Senator Poitras: Honourable senators, all our researchers and scientists make deductions. It is a proven fact that when people who are intelligent and have the proper training and instruments proceed by deduction, the results of their calculations are very accurate and allow them or others to make further discoveries.

[English]

Senator Frith: The scientific method is by induction, not deduction.

Hon. Peter Stollery: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words about the report that has been tabled by my distinguished colleague, Senator Buckwold.

However, before doing so, I should like to take up the point that was brought to our attention at the beginning of Senator Poitras' remarks. I must say that I had not thought of the term "vanity senators" before, but I suppose it is like vanity press. When people write a book and cannot get it published, they publish it themselves. They are called vanity presses.

[Translation]

I never thought that Senator Poitras was so vain! It never occurred to him that his coming here, to the Senate, meant that he was coming to the Parliament of Canada, which is not exactly the place for a holiday.

[English]

This is not a holiday. When we come to Parliament, we do not come to be a "vanity senator" and to have a licence plate beginning with SEN if we live in the province of Ontario.

I have news for Senator Poitras. When he came to Parliament, you came here to be a parliamentarian. When those people like himself were asked if they would like to be senators and they agreed, they said, "Yes, I am going to be a parliamentarian. I am going to participate in a democratic exercise in which some people propose projects and other people oppose them and try to defeat them."

Senator Poitras' idea of the Senate is a chamber that is made up of vain senators who come here but do not actually do anything. He has some concept of the second chamber in which members go to receptions. I guess he thought when he came here that he would be going to receptions with other senators.

● (1640)

I do not mean to pick on Senator Poitras, but he brought the subject up. I know that he is a gentleman. However, he has just shown us by his speech that he is capable of being partisan.

Senator Stewart: Senator Molson will have to speak to him because he does not want that sort of thing in this "old folks' club."

Senator Stollery: Senator Stewart has just pointed out that Senator Molson will have to have a talk with Senator Poitras about the partisan nature of his speech.

Senator Frith: Senator Kelly was so disappointed that this debate had divided along partisan lines, although I have never known him to vote in any way except along partisan lines.

Senator Stollery: The idea that we might have differences of opinion seems to be striking some of the more newly-appointed senators as a terrible shock.

On a more serious note, I would like to take up the challenge laid before us by Senator Poitras. He has suggested that the second chamber should acquiesce to legislation; that it does not have a role to play in legislation that affects the lives of Canadians. Though that idea may be fashionable, it is extremely wrong-headed.

Senator Cools: Extremely.

Senator Stollery: It is particularly wrong-headed in a country like ours, with its large geography and its people spread throughout.

Senator Stewart: Do you realize that you are giving the Quebec viewpoint in contrast to Senator Poitras' viewpoint, which is the old Toronto viewpoint?

Senator Stollery: I am sure that the people of Alberta, British Columbia and other parts of Canada will find it a little offensive when they read Senator Poitras' view of the Senate of Canada. They will know that what he is saying is that Canada, from the Pacific Ocean to Newfoundland, should be run on the basis of representation by population, which would mean that southern Ontario and southern Quebec could dictate to the rest of the country.

Senator David: No, no.

Senator Stollery: That is exactly what he is saying.

Senator Cools: Of course.

Senator Frith: That is the consequence of what he is saying.

Senator Stollery: That is why, in every country with a large geography like Canada's—and I do not think there is an exception—there is a second chamber. Of course, when these countries wrote their constitutions, they knew that the people who lived away from the more populated areas—in the case of Canada, thousands of miles away from the more populated areas—would not join the federation because they would realize that it would be run by the people who lived two or three thousand miles away from where they lived. They simply would not join the federation under those circumstances, and they insisted on a second chamber so that their voice could be heard, and so that there could be an element of equity in the way their Parliament operated.

I am sure that when the phone call was made to Senator Poitras asking him to become a member of the Senate of Canada, it was indicated that he would be participating in a chamber that protects the interests and rights of people who live away from southern Ontario and southern Quebec. At least, that is how I understood it when I decided to come to the Senate. So I reject out of hand that small-town-Toronto or -Montreal view of the way Canada functions. I know that it will never be successful.

Honourable senators, I would like to make a few remarks about the GST and the report. I did not have the assistance of the Department of Finance.

Senator Buckwold: They wouldn't help.

Senator Stollery: I spent a couple of weeks travelling with the committee, and it did not take me very long to get the picture of what was being proposed and how the proposal was being received by the people of Canada. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has reported that the bill is regressive, is inflationary, is not revenue neutral, is unfair in its application, is not visible as a tax and is inefficient.

I do not wish to get into an argument over the manufacturers' sales tax because I do not think that it is relevant. I believe the manufacturers' sales tax has been around since just after the Great War, and it has never been considered a good tax. I do not think that anyone is trying to make the case that the manufacturers' sales tax is a great tax. Of course, this government, in opposing it, has increased the rate from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent in six years, an increase of almost 50 per cent. However, I do not think that the MST is the issue, although the government has tried to make it so by saying that it is being replaced by a revenue-neutral, improved version. We know that that is not true.

First, I would like to address myself to the regressive nature of this consumption tax. I think that its regressiveness is what offends me the most. I have always been a believer in the principle of progressive taxation. I may be old fashioned, but I have always thought that it was fairer to base taxes on the more you earn the more you pay, in order to have the kind of orderly society we hope we can maintain in Canada.

I know that the Conference Board "mossbacks" referred to by Senator Poitras are not interested in progressive taxation. They love sales taxes because progressive taxation means that they are the ones who will pay more tax, whereas regressive taxation, such as the GST, means that Mr. and Mrs. Smith who live down the street and who earn $35,000 per year in total income will pay, to a great extent, the same as the gentleman who lives in Forest Hill who has an income of $500,000 per year and who lives in a house costing $2 million. That essentially is what it means when you start getting into this sales tax business.

● (1650)

Now, I also understand that provinces have sales taxes, and they are regressive taxes. They are, without any question, regressive forms of taxation and they have been resorted to by the provinces of Canada. Ontario brought in the sales tax. I think it was under Premier Frost, because at the time we called it "Frost-bite" and I think it was three per cent. At the time I was on the cash register in our business. I have done quite a few things, but I am retail merchant by profession and I spent many years at it. I remember the day they brought in the three per cent "Frost-bite" because I had to ring up the sales and calculate it on the cash register. I do not think anybody thought it was a great idea.

Senator Murray: They won six or seven elections after that, Senator Stollery.

Senator Frith: Why don't you try it on this?

Senator Stollery: As Senator Murray says they won quite a few elections after that.

Senator Cools: He wants to imitate Frost.

An Hon. Senator: Is that why they're doing it?

Senator Frith: Call the election! You can have it done by December. Have an election and we will see.

Senator Stollery: I think the late Premier Frost may have been more successful in his attempts at re-election than this government will be. At any rate, I found it interesting to learn, from the report by the committee, that 60 per cent of family expenditures go toward untaxed services. I think of my own neighbours in Toronto, and that makes sense. House repairs are large expenditures for the home-owner, for such things as getting the roof fixed, putting an extension on the back of the house, doing things to the driveway, and all of the various maintenance projects that one does around the house. They all add up to a great deal of money by the time a year or two go by. In my part of Toronto, every spring, around the first of April, out come the ladders, and so on, and the people get to work maintaining their homes and spending a lot of time and money doing it.

As Senator Buckwold mentioned, of course, food services are also untaxed. I am not certain that in my neighbourhood that is a big item, because the people where I live are mostly immigrants and they do not go to restaurants very much. They generally save their money and own their own homes and are quite successful.

However, transportation is a pretty big item in their annual budgets. I think we now have to pay $8 for seven subway tokens. Most people, although not everyone own cars and pick-up trucks. I know that Senator Poitras says that the price is going to drop on the pick-up truck and the car, but frankly I do not believe that. I think the price may not go up for a few months. For six months we may not see an increase, but any saving will be absorbed because of inventory costs, which are so difficult to calculate and which the officials at the Department of Finance, who thought up this unwieldy scheme, have never understood.

At any rate, that deals with house repairs and transportation, but we have so many other things.

Senator Buckwold: There is heating and electricity.

Senator Stollery: There are so many other elements in keeping up one's house. One of the results of this tax will be that people earning $500,000 per year will be paying the same amount of taxes for services—at this point untaxed services such as heat for their houses—as people who are earning $25,000 or $35,000 per year. They will all be paying the same taxes! Well, I reject that. I do not agree with that.

We hear about the Europeans and their value-added tax. Personally, I have always wondered why the Europeans so readily stood still for the value-added tax and allowed it to become fashionable. Possibly it is European in nature. Europe has always had a class structure that we have not had in the Americas and perhaps their class structure makes it easier to tax the poor at the same rate as the rich. However, it is a concept that we in Canada have always tried to avoid, although we have not always been successful.

Senator Frith: Especially under Conservative administrations!

Senator Stollery: As Senator Frith says, and I agree with him, especially under this Conservative administration!

My next point concerns the inflationary aspect of this tax. That is important, although it is not as important as the regressive nature of the tax. What will happen is that the government will increasingly depend on this regressive tax by raising it—and it will go up! The second thing that will go from this tax program will be the tax credit, once the seven per cent has gone. After the seven per cent has gone to ten or 12 per cent, they will then get rid of the tax credit.

Senator Buckwold: No indexation!

Senator Stollery: No, there is no indexation.

Senator Murray: Not true!

Senator Stollery: It will be the next thing to go. I want to get away from the regressive element, but should explain to honourable senators that that is the part I reject the most. I believe it is becoming fashionable not to believe in progressive taxation, but I am afraid I have not changed my mind; I think it is the only fair way to raise money.

I now go to the inflationary aspect. The inflationary element of this bill is, in the short term, the most damaging to its credibility. I was at a meeting when the Governor of the Bank of Canada discussed this. Now, he may very well have been at more meetings than I attended, but I was at the one when he discussed this with the committee.

Senator Cools: One is enough!

Senator Stollery: We discussed the fact that the Department of Finance says that the GST will add 1.25 per cent to inflation in the first year. I was impressed by the scepticism of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. He did not really seem to me to want to be drawn into a discussion of any kind, but, in particular, of whether or not it was really going to cause only 1.25 per cent inflation in the first year. It almost became an embarrassment to question him, when everyone knows that he is under a lot of pressure and he is trying to maintain high interest rates. He keeps saying, "I have to do that because we have to fight inflation," and it seemed just too easy to say, "Well, then, you must not be very happy about the fact that, next year, you will have to fight a minimum of 1.25 per cent more inflation than you have to fight this year." If the government is wrong in its forecasts—as it usually is—inflation next year may be 2.5 or even three per cent higher as a result of the GST. We do not want to embarrass the man and ask him these questions, though they go through our minds.

• (1700)

The rate today is in the area of 5 per cent, and next year the rate is forecast to be 6.25 per cent. If the forecasters are wrong, as they usually are, the inflation rate next year may well be 7 or 8 per cent. This is taking place at a time when everyone would like the Governor of the Bank of Canada to reduce interest rates because we are in a recession.

The fact is that we do not want to embarrass the Governor of the Bank of Canada, because we know he is not going to be able to lower interest rates, and we know that the chances are that that will emphasize the recession, which, as Chairman Buckwold pointed out yesterday, may well become a depression. We all know that this recession has become very serious, and the government, in its usual clever manner, has contrived a way, with the introduction of the GST, so that it cannot possibly lower interest rates for the next 12 months or longer.

So with this clever manipulation of policy, the government has guaranteed that we cannot get out of the recession. It has guaranteed that, because the government itself has said that the inflation rate will increase by 1.25 per cent next year over this year, and that it has to keep interest rates high this year to fight inflation this year and the increased inflation rate next year.

In the 1970s we all talked about the expectations element of inflation. That was a common expression in government circles back then. This government has gone from expectations to an almost lead-pipe cinch that we are going to have increased inflation next year. That will have a terrible effect on the economy.

During the week we heard the Governor of the Bank of Canada tell us—and we also read it in the newspapers—that the union settlements were taking into consideration the increased inflation caused by the GST. I think the first union to negotiate protection against the GST was the Steel Workers.

Senator Cools: And Air Canada.

Senator Stollery: And Air Canada. So that guarantees that this tax will be inflationary.

A third negative—and it is a big negative, because it affects the whole nature of government in Canada—revolves around the untruths that have been spoken, the principal one being that this is revenue neutral.

We have been hearing conflicting stories—with the Prime Minister saying one thing and the Minister of Finance saying another—for so long that the credibility of the government is at an all-time low in western democracies. How long has this government been at 15 per cent in the polls? How long has it been since this government reached 20 per cent in the polls? Quite some time. When, at the same time, we have a statement made that the tax is revenue neutral and that we have to reduce the deficit, how can we expect the public to believe that? They cannot possibly believe that. One man says that the tax is revenue neutral, and the next man says that we have to reduce the deficit. One man says that we are going to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, and the next man says that this country's deficit, at $30 billion, has to be reduced.

With the mismanagement we have experienced over the past few years, and with increased interest rates, I would not be surprised if the deficit hits $40 billion. I will be surprised if it is not over $35 billion because of the high interest rate policy of this government and its need to pay interest on bonds at those high rates.

Senator Barootes: You may have to eat those words.

Senator Stollery: I would be happy to eat my words. They may not taste very good, but I would not mind doing that. However, I will only eat my words when I see the Prime Minister eat his words when he says, in the same breath, that this tax is revenue neutral and that we have to reduce the deficit.

I am sure I am not the only senator who found it strange to hear the Prime Minister say, on his own behalf, in the Atlantic provinces that this scheme was tried on Jean Chrétien and Allan MacEachen when they were in the finance portfolio, but that they refused to go along with it, and it took the courage of Minister Wilson to undertake this. I immediately substituted the word "stupidity", because basically the Prime Minister acknowledged that none of Mr. Wilson's predecessors would have touched this crackpot plan with a ten-foot barge pole.

This really reminds one of the government of R. B. Bennett. I think his Finance Minister was Gordon, if I am not mistaken.

Senator Murray: He was his own Finance Minister, just as was Pierre Trudeau.

Senator Stollery: Well, we all know what happened to the R. B. Bennett government.

As I said, the untruths are what cause resistance in the country to this bill. If the government had been straightforward in the first place, I think that many of the problems would not have arisen. I think the reason this bill will probably not come into effect on January 1—-

Senator Barootes: You will have to eat those words, too.

Senator Stollery: —will be, more than anything, the result of the untruths that were spoken at the outset.

I think Canadians understand that the deficit is high; I think they understand the need to get it under control. I do not think anyone objects to that. What Canadians object to are the untruths. They object to people picking their pockets while telling them they are not picking their pockets.

They do not like that.

● (1710)

My fourth item of concern about the tax is its unfairness. I have already said that I did not like its regressive nature; but there is another aspect of unfairness to it. It is interesting that this tax comes from a Conservative government that sees its strength in the outlying areas of this country. There will be an incredible tax on transportation. It was only through listening to witnesses who appeared before of the committee, and my colleagues, that I realized that we in southern Ontario and Quebec will prosper with this tax because we will pay less tax than the voters of Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Newfoundland or any of the other outlying areas of Canada. When I buy something in Toronto, the chances are that the item was made in Ontario, New York State or Ohio, and it takes the trucks only six hours to bring the product here, and therefore the transportation costs are minimal. On Monday I bought a pneumatic nailer from one of my hardware suppliers that cost me $485. I am sure that had I bought that same item in Edmonton, it would have cost me $600, because of the transportation costs and because there is less competition in Edmonton. I am sure that the people in Senator Barootes' constituency would pay over $600 for that same item—

Senator Barootes: Come on! It would have cost $5 to transport that thing out west!
