Add these together and divide by five, and you find that the average for the five years was 17·46 per cent. These figures are identical with those given in the trade and navigation returns. For the next five years, the first five under the Liberal tariff, I model the table on the basis I suggest, including the bounties and the tobacco duties, and excluding the corn which was imported and simply passed through this country in transit, and we find this result:

	Per cent.
In 1898, average rate..	18·34
" 1899 "	18·14
" 1900 "	16·96

The average is exactly 17·46, the same as in the last five years of Conservative rule. But the taxation is growing. By the last revision there was an increase, and when we add this to the average of 1906 and 1908 we find that it brings it up to 17·54 per cent, showing conclusively that the hon. gentleman is wrong when he says that the rate of taxation has been reduced and not increased. Some years ago the Finance Minister made an important statement in this House. I can excuse the hon. member for Red Deer for not having referred to it, because he was not here and possibly has never had an opportunity of seeing it. He told us practically that his new tariff was simply a readjustment, and he spoke of it thus:

> It was of the utmost importance that we should maintain a strong financial position, and in view of the uncertainties as to the amount of revenue that might be produced by this lower rate of taxation, it became necessary that we should take some steps to make good any possible loss that might result. It was thought that it might fairly be met by providing for the raising of some additional taxation in order to balance or make good the loss occasioned by the reduction of duties. It was necessary to have an increased revenue in certain directions when we were to lose revenue in other directions.

That was the policy on which the Liberal party framed its tariff. Take a little off here, and put a little on there, but always be careful that the revenue is cared for. The people had no interest, they thought, in this matter, the industries of the country were not to be considered, the sole question was to arrange so that we would get as much revenue as we did before or more. But the Minister of Customs will claim that they made a sweeping reduction in corn. I grant you they did, but when they took the duty off corn, and proclaimed throughout that they had given our farmers free corn, they simply transferred it to sugar. They largely increased the duty on sugar. Then, when a farmer went to a railway depot to get his wagon load of corn, he bought it without paying any duty; but when he went to his grocer to buy sugar he found he had two duties to pay—one the duty on corn and the other the duty on the sugar. If hon. members will analyse that statement, they will find a great deal of truth in it. The duty may not have been exactly double, but no doubt the government were following out their system, and when they took the duty off corn they added it on to the duty on sugar. Our farmers were clamouring for free corn, so they said. 'We must give them free corn, but we can fix that in such a way that they will never know, we will add it to the duty on sugar and they will never think of it. We can then tell them, when the elections are on that we gave them free corn and we need not proclaim that we doubled the duty on sugar. Our tariff is a tariff for revenue and we must have the revenue, so that if we lose our revenue on corn, we shall make it up on sugar.' And that satisfied my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). In the same way they reduced the duty on wines for the benefit of some gentlemen who liked French wines for dinner, they lowered these duties away down, but on tobacco, the poor man's luxury, they put a tax over $2,000,000 in order to make up the loss by the decrease in the duties on wine. They could not reduce the duties on wine without increasing them on something else. They took the tax off the rich man's luxury and charged it on the solace of the poor man. When my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) goes west let him tell his friend out there that he is paying the duty on the rich man's wine as well as on his own tobacco, let him give his friends an accurate understanding of what is done; but if he does, I think he will find that his friends will not vote the next time as they did on the last occasion.

I notice that the readjustment in the tariff in 1897 was for revenue only. The Liberals always say that their policy is a tariff for revenue. But the tariff of 1897, in very many items, remains unchanged. Our hon. friend who just sat down, (Mr. Nesbitt) said that the farmers were not worrying over the tariff. Let me tell him the reason why. It is because the agricultural schedules were not interfered with. They remained practically where they were, leaving out the two items of corn and mutton. The duty on mutton was increased from 35 per cent to 3 cents a pound, but in many other respects the tariff was not interfered with. The policy of the old Conservative party was to let in free any article which we could not produce in this country. That is the national policy. What we cannot produce, do not tax. My hon. friend shakes his head. In his opinion we should tax everything in order to get revenue. He would tax anything he could lay his hands on so long as he could get revenue. But that is not our policy. I say that what we cannot produce we ought to admit free. Under the old regime we admitted tea and coffee free, and the Liberal party dare not change that. No doubt if they thought the country would submit to it they would tax these articles and get all the money they could out of them, but tea and coffee are two things they dare not put their hands on. Raw products, such as hides, largely brought from South America and other parts of the world, the raw material for the manufacturer, were admitted free under the old Conservative policy, also raw cotton and fine wools. I am not going to say that the admission of fine wools free is the best policy at present. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) I think, will agree with me when I say that this country can to-day produce fibre wool, similar to Cape wool and Australia wool, which it could not produce 25 years ago. At present we can produce an excellent class of wool in our western country, and if encouragement were given the woollen industry, no doubt our flocks of sheep would be enormously increased and the production of wool become one of the greatest industries of that great west. Many articles, no doubt, under the revision of the tariff were charged a lower rate, under the British preference, but that produced more revenue.

Some people have the impression that if you want more revenue, you must increase the duties. That is a great mistake. To get more revenue you must reduce the duties. If you put a duty of 2 cents per pound on bacon and hams, a certain amount will come into this country on which you will get a revenue. But if you raise the duty to four cents, the probability is you would exclude bacon and hams altogether and consequently get no revenue from them. The preferential tariff was framed along that line—encourage importation and get all the revenue you can even if the Canadian has to pay more for his goods. I contend that these increased revenues, under the operation of the British preference, are at the cost of the Canadian tax-payer. When that preferential tariff was introduced, it was heralded with delight all over the country. It was heralded as a great boon to Canada. Of course, the people would naturally think that when the duties were lowered by the preference, they would get cheaper goods. But is that the sentiment of the country to-day? I would not like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, because I would not like to make him feel uncomfortable, but if the British preference was to give us cheaper goods, what means this cry from Halifax to Vancouver that the cost of living has increased. Surely the people expected the cost of living to be reduced by that preference. Suddenly, however, it dawned on them, as matters worked out, that goods went up in price instead of coming down. The cost of living was increasing instead of getting cheaper, and that is the position in which we find ourselves to-day. Let me dwell on that for a moment. I am going to refer to the budget speech of the Minister of Finance to demonstrate this matter. He was very free in making the statement, which I think will be read with a great deal of interest, that the British preference, instead of diminishing the cost of goods, has practically increased it. He told us that the planters in the West Indies refused to sell sugar to Canada at the same price as they sell it to the people of Great Britain. Great Britain is a free market; sugar from the West Indies goes in there without duty and so does sugar from Belgium, Russia or any other country where beet sugar is produced. But, he said, the planters in the West Indies discovered that if they were to simply follow out that rule, it would be a Canadian preference instead of a preference for them, and they, with the aid of their agents and brokers in London, made a calculation of how much it would cost the people of Canada to import sugar from foreign countries. Having done that, they enhanced their price on West India sugar for Canadians to a figure above what they charged to the people of England, knowing that the Canadians would have to pay that enhanced price, plus the preferential duty, so that instead of Canadians benefiting by this preference, in the purchase of West India sugar, they are practically losing through being compelled by the West India planters to pay a higher price. The Finance Minister, referring to the refiners of eastern Canada who were making a complaint that this thing was being done, said:

They say that there is a combination amongst the West Indian planters, among the growers of sugar in the West Indies, through their agents and brokers in London whereby the Canadian refiner is not permitted to buy that West Indian sugar upon the same terms as it is purchased by the British refiner. This question of who shall profit by the preference has been much debated. At one time the West India merchants complained that the refiners in Canada managed to take the whole preference to themselves. Now the accusation is the other way. Our Canadian refiners say that this combination so manages that it will only sell West India sugar at a price which makes the thing of really no more advantage to them than if they were to buy the foreign sugar and pay the higher duty. Of course, no matter what they pay for West Indian sugar, they would only pay a lower rate of duty. But it is claimed that though they do not pay any more duty they are obliged to pay a higher price. They say that the growers in the West Indies, through a broker and agent in London, ascertain just at what price sugar can find admission into the Canadian market, and they only sell at that price, with the net result that while the British refiner who competes with the Canadian refiner in the finished product, practically buys in a free market, the Canadian refiner is only allowed to buy on terms which oblige him to pay in addition to the price of the sugar, the amount of the preferential duty.

Mr. HENDERSON.

The price of sugar referred to in the concluding words of that paragraph of the minister's speech is the enhanced price, the price of the Belgian, German, or Russian beet sugar with the full duty added. The West India planters said: 'You cannot get sugar from us unless you give an enhanced price that leaves just a little margin below the price of foreign sugar plus the full duty, which will be sufficient to induce you to purchase from us.' I ask if that is fair treatment? Is that a Canadian preference? It is a preference for the benefit of the people of the West Indies. I was ignorant enough to think, with many others, that when we gave a British preference we would get something out of it, and that when we gave a preference to the West Indian planters, we would derive some little benefit from it, too, but it appears that the West India planters, receive all the benefit and there is nothing in it at all for us.

Let us see how that principle will work out in the case of linens under the British preference. The Minister of Customs practically says: 'You can buy linen in the old country and bring it here under the preferential tariff.' Certainly you can, but when you go to the old country you mingle with as shrewd people as are to be found in the world; the linen manufacturers of Great Britain are able to form their combinations just as the West India planters do. They can get together and say: 'We will not let the Canadians have the benefit of this preference, it must come to us.' They figure out that we cannot import linens from the United States unless we pay a duty of 30 per cent, and so they shade up the price of linen to nearly what it would cost us to import it from the United States, with 30 per cent added. Thus the British linen manufacturer will not sell to the Canadians as cheaply as they will sell to the people of the United States.

I need not carry this argument further; the same principle can be applied to cottons and to many articles coming into Canada. The Minister of Finance demonstrated that fact to us only a few years ago. I shall use an illustration of his own, I shall reverse his illustration because it is a very curious rule that will not work both ways. Here is what the Minister of Finance said on March 23, 1900:

When hon. gentlemen desire to know what the tariff reform has been, they must take up the individual items of the tariff.

——just as I have been doing, and I would advise the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) to do the same thing.

Last year, under our tariff, we added materially to the free list.

Sausage skins, mushroom spawn, mustard seed, and some other things. Of course I am only joking in saying that there were other minor reductions.

There were besides, 148 items on which the duties had been reduced on the general tariff.

I gave you an illustration of some of them, the minor farm implements.

And on every one of these items, in the case of importations from Great Britain, the duty was further reduced to the extent of the preferential rate. I think that will be an indication that there has been some very considerable measure of tariff reform. Then there is another point to be remembered. Even taking your average, you have saved not only 2·2 per cent on your imports,—

He worked out a table and found that the average rate on goods dutiable and free in that particular year was 2·2 per cent lower than it was in 1896. That was the table of the Minister of Customs. Of course it did not include bounties or increased tobacco duties or anything of the kind. I dare say he included the corn that went through the country in transit.

Even taking your average, you have saved not only 2·2 on your imports but you have saved also 2·2 on your purchased goods of home manufacture. We all know that as a rule—there are exceptional cases, of course—the price of the home product is influenced by the duty on the foreign article.

I shall take him at his word. He says that the price of the home product is influenced by the duty on the foreign article. That is to say. if there were 35 per cent on foreign cottons, the Canadian manufacturer would shade up his price in order to bring it very close to the figure at which the consumer in Canada could import foreign cottons and pay the duty. I grant that the principal, in fact the only precaution against that was to so increase the manufacture of cotton goods in this country that home competition would prevent a combination and keep down the price. That was the principle of the National Policy, encourage the industry and make it so strong that home competition would maintain a proper level of prices.

On coloured cotton goods coming from foreign countries the duty was much higher than when coming from Great Britain, and the Canadian manufacturer said to himself: 'Canadian consumers cannot get coloured cottons from the United States unless they pay the 35 per cent, consequently we will level up our prices to that margin.' Do you think for a moment that the British manufacturer was asleep? Do you think he was not watching our tariff? I found, when I talked with men in the old country, that they knew about as much of our tariff as we know ourselves. The manufacturer of linen in the old country can say: 'You cannot get linen from the United States or any other country unless you pay 30 per cent. True, you can get it if you buy in Britain, at a lower rate of duty, but before you can get it from us we are going to level up our prices, we will make you pay more for the goods, and you will find, when you get your linen home, that you might just as well have bought from the United States and paid 30 per cent. 'Do you think that is not possible? I believe it is not only possible but probable. I do not take the British manufacturer to be insane. I do not believe they are doing business for the fun of it, they are doing business to make money, and they are going to make money, no matter who pays the piper. They are going to make money out of Canadians just as well as out of the people of other countries, and if we are simple enough to give away our market to them, give them a preference in our market, they are certainly going to take advantage of it, and I have no doubt in the world that they will do so.

What means all this cry over the country that the cost of living has increased? Go where you will, even on articles that do not come from abroad, you will find the cost of living has increased. Why? Out of sympathy. A railway tie will increase in cost as well as a yard of cotton ; it rises in sympathy with the increase in the cost of labour. There is no question in my mind that this is a solution of the whole question why goods have increased in price in Canada. Look at what we had to do for the Civil Service of Canada during the past year. Hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars had to be paid out to increase their salaries. Why? Because this government had adopted a policy that compelled them to pay more for the requisites of their households, and it was only fair that we should come to their rescue. We had so arranged our tariff as to increase the cost of goods and it was only fair that we should come to their rescue, give them an increased salary in order to enable them to pay their way, to pay for the increased cost of living. I say this is a subject worthy of the consideration of the government. I was foolish enough, in 1897, when this policy was heralded by the government as a boon to Canada, to think it was going to be a boon to Canada. I thought that whilst we called it a British preference, it was going to be a Canadian preference. I have changed my mind. It is not a Canadian preference, it is a British preference pure and simple, and we really have no part or lot in the whole matter. Just as the West India planter says: 'Canadians are not going to get the benefit of this, they appear to have got the benefit for a year or two, but we are going to see to it now that they will not get it any longer.' So the Minister of Finance was compelled the other day to announce a policy by which he would get back for the people of Canada a small modicum of that which they ought to have had under this preference.

I want to deal briefly with another question that has been referred to. I hope that the hon. member for North Oxford will pardon me for not making any extended remarks with regard to what he said. He dealt largely with the borrowing of money, and that question has been so thoroughly discussed in this House that I do not think it would be fair for me to take up any more time of the House in discussing it. It is therefore not out of any lack of courtesy to the hon. gentleman, who I think delivered a very fair speech for his first year in the House. Now let me point out the difference between the policies of the two political parties. I would like if my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) would wait for a few minutes, and I will tell him the difference, in a few words, between the two parties. The policy of the Conservative party in power was a policy of promoting production in the factory and on the farm; that was the leading feature of the Conservative policy. The leading feature of the Liberal policy is to promote the importation of the productions of the farm and of the factory. What was it the Conservative policy aimed at? Production. What is the object of the policy of the Liberal party? To produce a revenue. Now let us see how it has worked out. In 1896 the exports of Canada totalled $121,000,000, and the imports $111,000,000. This, I presume, includes coin and bullion; however that makes no difference so far as the comparison is concerned. These figures show an excess of imports of $10,000,000. Now that was a very nice sum of money to leave in the country. We were able that year to pay for all our imports by our exports, and leave us a surplus of $10,000,000 to be used for business purposes. In 1908 Canada's imports increased to $364,237,864, and our exports only increased to $263,368,952, merchandise only. The excess of imports was $101,000,000. In other words, after sending out of this country all the agricultural products that we had to spare, our fish, our minerals, our lumber, all our butter and cheese, and everything of that kind that we could rake and scrape to pay for our imports, we practically came short by $101,000,000. We bought $101,000,000 more than we had exports to pay for. What would a farmer think if, at the end of his year's operations, he found that he had purchased a thousand dollars more than he was able to sell off his farm? He would feel that he was getting poorer. Very well, how is that to be met? I think some remark was made if I mistake not, by the hon. member for Red Deer; perhaps he was only quoting somebody else. But it has been said that that adverse balance, that debt, must be paid. Not long ago the manager of the Bank of Montreal said that that was an obligation that must be met, an obligation that this country has got to pay. It must be met either in exports or in gold. We had not the exports, we had exported everything we could, we had exhausted our surplus of exports, and we were still $101,000,000 in debt to Great Britain and foreign countries. How are we to meet it? Send gold out of the country? I see no other way for it, and we are obliged to rake and scrape every dollar we can get, to use an extreme expression, in order to pay our balance of trade and maintain the credit of the country. Is it any wonder that a money stringency fell upon this country? Is it any wonder that two years ago there was not enough money in the possession of the banks of this country to move the western crops? The Minister of Finance had to acknowledge it, he had to break into the strong box and take out $5,000,000 of gold that ought to have been held sacred, that was laid away for the redemption of our Dominion notes and for the payment of our post office depositors. He was obliged, without law, without authority, to do this, though I am glad to say that parliament afterwards indemnified him, so that no action could be brought against him for malfeasance of office. He did what he thought was his duty. He could pursue no other course. The people of the west were crying for money to move their crop because if they could not get their crop out they were ruined. The miserable policy of the country had drawn out the money that was necessary to pay for the transportation of their crop and the Minister of Finance was compelled to come to the rescue and provide the money out of the strong box, the reserve which was laid away for future needs, which was sacred against even an emergency.

How do other countries fare? I look at the trade of Mexico, a country not nearly so rich as Canada and I find that in 1906 their exports were $271,000,000 and their imports $221,000,000. They practically paid for all their imports by their exports and they had $50,000,000 to the good. Then let us look at the Argentine republic, a country in many respects, very much like our own. Their exports in 1906 amounted to $292,000,000 and the imports to $270,000,000, an excess of exports over imports of $22,000,000. They paid for all their imports by their exports and had $22,000,000 left to circulate in the country. They did not require to break into the strong box and to take out from the gold that they had laid away sacredly for other purposes, in order to get money to move their crops. There is no stringency of money there. They have an abundance of circulating medium because they adopt the wise policy of production on the farm and in the factory instead of the ruinous policy of the importation of everything. Let us look at our sister country, Australia. In 1908 the exports amounted to £64,000,- 000 and the imports to £49,000,000. I take all these figures from the weekly letter which is sent out by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. These figures show that they had, in 1908, an excess of exports of £15,000,000 or about $75,000,000. Could we not take a leaf out of their book and change our policy so as to give the people of this country something that will enable them to carry on the affairs of the country with profit to themselves even although we do not provide as large an amount of revenue? Here we have a large excess of imports. Is it not time that we had a change? I believe it is time that we had a readjustment. The Minnster of Finance told us a few years ago how he had readjusted, but he had readjusted entirely along the line of tariff for revenue only. I say that the true policy is to readjust the tariff along the line of doing something for the people as well as the treasury. The treasury does not need everything; the people ought to have something. We should revise our policy so as not to take so much money out of the pockets of the people. We should readjust it in a way that it would put something in the pockets of the people. That is my idea of the duty of the government. The government is bound just as much to help men to make money as to force men to pay revenue. The people ought to have some rights. New let us look at a few of the principal items. Look at the enormous amount of breadstuffs that we import. Why should we? Cannot we produce all we want? Of cotton goods we imported $10,745,000 worth in 1906 and $16,559,000 worth in 1908. We import raw cotton free. It costs us nothing. Let us give our own Canadian workmen the labour of making these cotton goods, instead of sending the money out of the country, to buy the manufactured article. Of gloves and mitts, a large quantity of which is manufactured in my own town, we imported last year $2,000,000 worth although we have in this country factories capable of making a large part of these gloves and mitts. Now, take leather. We admit raw hides free of duty. Why then not do something to encourage the manufacture of leather goods in this country instead of importing in 1906 $3,000,000 worth and in 1908 $3,750,000 worth? Of vegetables we imported, in 1906, $936,000 worth. In 1908, under this tariff of ours, which does everything to increase importation instead of production, we imported $1,094,000 worth. Of provisions, cheese, butter, lard, bacon, hams, pork, and beef we imported in 1906, $3,189,000 worth, and in 1908 $3,573,000 worth, as if we could not produce all the provisions that we want. Then we come to wool manufactures. In 1906 we imported $17,892,000 worth and in 1908 $20,962,000 worth. Is it not possible to manufacture more of these articles at home? We find fourteen business men at the head of this government.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. HENDERSON. 'Hear, hear,' an hon. gentleman says. I do not discredit their capacity for business if they would only undertake it. The trouble is that while they are perfectly capable of doing business it does not seem to me that they are willing, because they have tied themselves down to a fixed policy, a fixed course and they do not seem to be able to get out of it. They have tied themselves down to the miserable policy of importation—import everything you want and get all the revenue you can out of it—tariff for revenue only—instead of saying to the people of this country: 'Produce what you can in the factory and on the farm and import less.' Why not readjust the policy along that line and reduce importation ?

There is one other point that I want to refer to. We were promised when the Liberal party came into power, and even before they came into power, that they would find us new markets. New markets are what we want. Have they improved the British market for us? We admit that we gave them the British preference. It was not a Canadian preference. We gave them all that was in it. They can charge us higher prices under our tariff schedules for the goods even although they come in at a lower rate of duty. Have we obtained any better entry into their market? I need not ask the question. We were told yesterday, I think, by the hon. member for Red Deer, that when increased imports came in exports started to go out. If they started to go out they stopped short very soon because we were $100,000,000 out in our general trade.

Are we going to get any advantage under this maximum and minimum tariff from France? Are the farmers going to get any benefit by being permitted to send an ox into France and pay a duty of $24 or $28 when they can send the same animal across the channel into Great Britain and pay nothing? I doubt very much the advantages that we are going to get from the French treaty even if it is ratified. We see how particular the French people have been, and that they actually refused to ratify the treaty until it was provided that we must not send fat cattle into France. Who wants to send stockers to that country? We have abundance of food to finish these animals at home, but under this treaty we are not allowed to do what is in our best interest in this respect. Where has the government provided any other new market? They have provided Japan with a market in Canada for a great many things, amongst others, a market for Japanese, a thing which the western people do not seem to approve of. Of course, we have to take the word of the Postmaster General that the Japanese government is going to play the game fair and will not send any more Japanese here than they can help.

Mr. LEMIEUX. They are playing it fair.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, but wait till you see it next year. We have given the Japanese a market for their silk at a low rate of duty, and I do not know if they manufacture wines.

Mr. LEMIEUX. They do not.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then the benefit of the low duty on wine is reserved for the French.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is the best wine.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not so sure that it is any better than our Canadian wine made out of Canadian grapes grown by the farmers of Ontario. I think our Canadian people are perfectly satisfied with our Canadian wines, and even if they don't come so cheap as the low class French wines we have loyalty enough as Canadians to pay for them; that is those who prefer to use the Canadian article. Formerly we could send wheat and barley and cheese and flax and rye and apples to Germany, but when this Liberal government came into power they disturbed the whole trade between Britain and Germany and Canada, and the people of Germany taking umbrage, by way of retaliation they put their duties up against Canada. I do not know the exact duty on Canadian wheat going into the German market but I do know that it is practically prohibitive. In Ontario, in British Columbia, down in the maritime provinces, we have millions of bushels of apples rotting under the trees and much of these we might have shipped to the German market were it not for the German retaliatory policy brought about by the mismanagement of the Canadian government.

Mr. PATERSON. In your judgment were they justified in that?

Mr. HENDERSON. I leave that for the Minister of Customs to answer.

Mr. PATERSON. I would like you to answer it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not making the Canadian tariff and I do not intend to pull the hon. gentleman out of the hole he has got himself into. He will have to crawl out of it as best he may. I perform my duty when I criticise the actions of the hon. gentleman and show that he has acted against the interests of the people of this country; he got into the hole, let him exercise his ingenuity to get out of it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What about loyalty in Germany?

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Loyalty in wine.

Mr. HENDERSON. My impression is that the German surtax affects the German wines, and if the Postmaster General likes German wine he will have to pay for it. It does not make any difference to me personally because I do not know what German wine tastes like. Perhaps there are some people who indulge in that luxury, and if so the Postmaster General has put a stumbling block in the way of their getting their favourite beverage without paying the high surtax. I trust that the government will take the matters to which I have referred into consideration and give us a truly Canadian preference. I am not begging for a British preference. We were loyal to Britain by giving them that preference which they have enjoyed for 11 years. Cannot the government now do something for Canada?

JOLIETTE AND LAKE MANUAN RAILWAY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 126) respecting the Joliette and Lake Manuan Colonization Railway Company.—Mr. Dubeau.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw). Mr. Chairman, before voting for the extension of time for this railway I would ask my hon. friend from Joliette (Mr. Dubeau) to kindly explain.

Mr. J. A. DUBEAU (Joliette). (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, by way of information about this Bill, let me tell this House that the terms of it are not very intricate. The object of the Bill is simply the granting to the Joliette and Lake Manuan Colonization Railway Company an additional extension of time for beginning and finishing the construction of the railway line they were authorized to construct under statute 3, Edward VII, chapter 135. By that statute, this company was empowered to construct a railway from a point in or near the town of Joliette, in the province of Quebec, following a northerly direction as far as Sainte Emelie de l'Energie in the electoral district of Joliette, thence following a north by northwesterly direction as far as St. Michel des Saints in the electoral district of Berthier, and thence to a point near Lake Manuan in the said province.

In 1905, this company asked for an extension of time which was granted by this parliament, but up to the present time, the company has been unable to begin the construction work of its line. Surveys have been made that show that it is possible and even easy to construct a railway from Joliette towards the northern part of the province, as proposed by the Joliette and Lake Manuan Colonization Railway Company.

According to the information given to me by the promoters of the company, I may say that this company is seriously determined to undertake the construction of that railway at an early date. Moreover, Mr. Chairman, I may add in support of this Bill that the construction of this railway answers a necessity as regards transportation and settlement in the vast Mantavesia valley through which the projected line would run.

As regards transportation, the railway in question would gather immediately an important traffic along its route, because at the present time there is no railway running through the northern part of the counties of Joliette, Berthier and Maskinongé, where some parishes are situated at a distance of 25, 50 and even 60 miles from the terminal points, and these parishes could supply a profitable trade to a railway entitled to rely on a traffic all the more considerable because there are in that part of the province of Quebec some powerful companies engaged in pulp wood pursuits while others are working the mines.

Another strong reason that should lead this House to grant the powers asked for by the Joliette and Lake Mannan Colonization Railway Company is that the development and prosperity of our young country depends on colonization. It has almost become a principle that this parliament should encourage by all possible means the construction of railways intended to promote the development of colonization. It is with that object in view that the construction of penetration railways has oftentimes been advocated in this House.

The line the Joliette and Lake Manuan Company wishes to construct would open to colonization that immense Mantavesia valley where there are, according to one of the greatest colonization men in my province, the late lamented Father Labelle, over 500,000 acres of excellent land. That valley, where the soil is most fertile, is equally renowned for its rich mines and forests and its water-powers. As regards the mines of that region, I may be allowed to quote what I read in the prospectus of the Mattawa society and in the pamphlets published in Mantavesia by Mr. Alfred Pelland, the publicist of the Colonization, Mines and Fisheries Department of the province of Quebec:

> We have made research and excavation works and have found indications of mines, especially at La Barrière where two mineral veins have been discovered; at St. Alphonse de Joliette another metallic vein has been discovered; at St. Zénon, there are graphite beds in every part of the parish; at St. Michel des Saints, mica is found in several places, and on the heights there is gold, mercury and coal.
> At a distance of about 50 miles from the St. Félix de Valois station, in the township of Maisonneuve, there is an important white mica mine, the property of a French syndicate, "The Canadian General Mining Company.' This company employs a number of men and has put up steam machineries and several buildings. Besides, these people are getting ready to utilize the water power lying at a distance of about two miles on Milieu river. Surface prospecting work has been made and they have begun the sinking of a shaft, using steam drills for that.

At a banquet given in Montreal, on the 11th December, 1908, the right hon. Prime Minister was quite right when he said: 'behind the mountains of Joliette and Berthier, there are very large rivers emptying into Hudson's Bay and running through countries the richness of which we could not even surmise.'

Before him, in 1864, Surveyor Carolus Laurier, the late lamented father of the right hon. Prime Minister, had made a survey of the region through which the projected railway is going to pass, and had submitted an elaborate report showing the area of lands fit for settlement, the richness and fertility of the soil as regards forest, agricultural and mining pursuits. In 1869, five years later, Hon. Louis Archambault, then Commissioner of Agriculture, visited the Mantavesia region in the northern part of the counties of Joliette and Berthier and made a report bringing into relief the fertility of the soil of that region.

What will become of that vast territory so much renowned for its forest, agricultural and mineral resources if people who are going to settle there and who will find themselves at a distance of 70 or 75 miles from the main line of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, and 100 miles away from the principal commercial centres, have no railway to connect them with the latter? Therefore it is important to open these fertile lands to settlement by means of the construction of a railway. The success of such an undertaking is highly desirable, because the difficulties in the matter of communications have obviously been up to the present time and are still the main impediment to the development of that country.

It only requires a more glance at the map to see that every other colonization centre in the province of Quebec is intersected with railways. In fact, the Nominique valley, in the county of Labelle, is connected with Montreal by the following railways: the Montreal and Western, the Temiscaming, the Temiscaming and Western Ontario, the Gatineau Valley and the Ottawa Northern. We have also the Monford railway which is intended to connect with the Ottawa Northern. All these penetration roads are the very best colonization agents in that part of the country. The Mantavesia Valley is the only one without any railway line. Therefore, it is only just that the Joliette and Lake Manuan should be granted the extension of time asked for together with the power to construct a railway through that fertile Mantavesia valley, if we want to extend to the inhabitants of the northern part of the counties of Joliette, Berthier and Maskinongé the advantages we are endeavouring to confer to those in the other parts of the country, if we do not want to deprive our country of a source of incalculable wealth.

Having offered these few remarks, Mr. Chairman, I ask the House to allow this Bill to pass.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 133) to incorporate the Kootenay and Alberta Railway Company.—Mr. Knowles.

Bill (No. 87) to incorporate the Arnprior and Pontiac Railway Company.—Mr. Hodgins.

Bill (No. 119) respecting the Quinze and Blanche River Railway Company.—Mr. McGiverin.

Bill (No. 120)) respecting the Windsor Essex and Lake Shore Rapid Railway Company.—Mr. A. H. Clarke.

Bill (No. 121) for the relief of John G. Ridout.—Mr. Guthrie.

Bill (No. 130) for the relief of Frank Parsons.—Mr. Tolmie.

THE CABANO RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 122), to incorporate the Cabano Railway Company. —Mr. Gauvreau.

Mr. MICHAUD. Mr. Chairman, this railway is entirely in the county of Temiscouata. It is a feeder of the National Transcontinental Railway. It is 20 miles in length and is to be built as soon as possible.

Bill reported, read the third time and agreed to.

CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION.

House in committee on Bill (No. 134) to incorporate the Canadian Medical Association.

On section 1,

Mr. ROCHE. This is a Dominion Medical Association that has been in existence some years, and is seeking incorporation.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me we are asked to give this association pretty large powers—to make such by-laws and rules, not contrary to law, or to the provisions of this Act, as it may deem necessary for the management of its business affairs, and especially with regard to the qualification, classification, admission and expulsion of members. Now why should an association have any right to set up a standard of qualifications for other men to get in? Suppose they set up a special examination which medical men must undergo before they can join the association, although they may hold degrees. It seems to me this is intended to make a close corporation of a section of the medical profession, and would put in their hands a power which they might use to the detriment of their brother practitioners. Suppose such an association was established in this city, and one-third of the medical men joined it, and they would make onerous laws, and prescribe qualifications which other medical men would be obliged to conform to, otherwise they could not join the society. It might not be inconsistent with the medical law of the country at the present time, but it would give them a power over other members of the profession in their locality which I think no association should be allowed to exercise. There must be something behind this which is not very plain. I do not see the object of it, nor do I see the wisdom of putting into the hands of any medical association such a power.

Mr. ROCHE. I think my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has misconceived the object of this clause. This is an association of medical men of the Dominion of Canada that has been in existence for the last 40 or 50 years. They already have power to make by-laws to prescribe qualifications of membership. It is voluntary whether a man joins or not.

Mr. SPROULE. It does not say what qualification, whether professional or otherwise.

Mr. ROCHE. You do not have to join the association unless you like, and you become a party to the qualifications in joining the association. It is not something you are forced to join, it is quite voluntary on the part of medical men to join or not as they choose. I think they can be trusted; certainly I would not fear that they might abuse any powers entrusted to them. They already have the authority which this clause gives them.

Mr. SPROULE. Under what Act?

Mr. ROCHE. Under no Act whatever. It is voluntary on the part of medical men. They are seeking incorporation in order to enable them for instance to hold property. They have not that power at the present time. They simply desire to come together for mutual advantage, to hold property, and to be able to issue a medical journal under the authority of the entire profession of the Dominion, to cement together the members of the profession of the several provinces. They will have interprovincial registration, which they have not at the present time. I do not think there are any powers here at all that would be detrimental to the outside medical men. No man is compelled to come in, and if he does, he comes in with his eyes open. There are no powers sought here that the association do not exercise at the present time.

Mr. SPROULE. If this is the old medical association, that was provincial in its character.

Mr. ROCHE. No, this is the Canadian Medical Association for the Dominion, they do not interfere with any provincial association.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not aware of any such body holding regular meetings lately.

Mr. ROCHE. It meets this year in the city of Winnipeg, Dr. R. J. Blanchard is president. I am not sure whether it met last year in Winnipeg or Vancouver. It meets in a different province and a different city once a year.

Mr. SPROULE. If this were a medical association to cover the whole Dominion it would be more desirable and less dangerous. But, if it is only some small association, meeting in Ottawa or Toronto, such as was proposed to be incorporated a few years ago and the aim of which was, in my judgment, not of a very high nature, it would be an entirely different thing. I can see a great deal of good in the organization of the Dominion Medical Association to meet and bring together the medical men of the whole Dominion. As to the right to publish a journal, I think it is most desirable because this association would keep in view the bringing together of the medical men of the whole Dominion and would try to assimilate the laws as to the interchange of registration and such things as that. These are all very good objects, but I have not heard of this measure before. We had a Bill of this kind to deal with once before and the fact that this has been—I was going to say—smuggled in from the Senate, makes us all the more suspicious. Very often these Bills, to which they do not want to attract too much attention, get the imprimatur of the Senate by first being put through that House and necessarily we have to look into them more carefully than we otherwise would. If the object is, as I have described, it is probably a good one.

On section 4, existing constitution, by-laws and rules continued till changed.

Mr. SPROULE. We should have a copy of these by-laws for examination. Surely they might have provided them for the medical men of the House. It is treating them with rather scant courtesy to ask them to pass a thing without having seen it.

Mr. ROCHE. This Bill passed the two committees in the Senate and the House of Commons without any question.

Mr. SPROULE. It must be that the medical men were not over zealous in their watchfulness or they would have asked for a little more information with respect to it.

Mr. BARR. I think this is rather a dangerous Bill. Certainly we are going it blind in passing it without further knowledge. There may be some of these by-laws which are very dangerous. I would like more light upon them. These by-laws should be in our hands and we should have time to consider them.

Mr. ROCHE. I can see no objection to permitting the unincorporated society that we are incorporating, continuing their present by-laws, until, of their own volition and by a majority of the votes, they choose to change them. I do not think there is anything unusual in that clause at all. They must go on with some form of by-laws. If you pass the Bill without approving of the present by-laws they could adopt other by-laws if they chose.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, they could make by-laws.

Mr. ROCHE. This is to continue the existing by-laws until they are altered.

Mr. BARR. We are now incorporating a close corporation. We are vesting in them large power and we are doing it simply because the Bill comes from the Senate without probably any member of this House knowing whether these by-laws are wise or not. They say they can change them, but the fact is that we are passing them and that probably they are not in the interest of the public at large.

On section 5, executive council and officers to continue in office.

Mr. SPROULE. I respectfully decline to accept that unless we have a copy of the by-laws before us. That executive council may be in there for ever, or for any length of time, if such a provision is to be found in the by-laws. But, we have not the by-laws before us and we do not know anything about them. I move that the committee rise and report progress so as to allow whoever is in charge to furnish a copy of the by-laws to the medical men of the House and let them see what we are passing.

Mr. ROCHE. The Bill stands in my name, but I did not think that it would meet with any objection, especially from the medical men.

Mr. SPROULE. The medical men do not know anything about it.

Mr. ROCHE. Apparently the opposition comes from gentlemen who have not studied very well the history of the Dominion Medical Association. This is the Dominion Medical Association that meets and elects officers every year. Its next meeting will be held in Winnipeg. The officers are most anxious to have this Bill through as soon as possible. Dr. Blanchard, of Winnipeg, is the presidnt. I think it is in the month of July that it meets in Winnipeg It elects its officers annually.

Mr. SPROULE. Is that the executive or the association?

Mr. ROCHE. The officers of the association, as I understand, are elected annually.

Mr. SPROULE. That is the executive council or is there a difference between the officers annually elected and the executive council?

Mr. ROCHE. No.

Mr. BARR. Are they appointed at the annual meeting?

Mr. ROCHE. At the annual meeting.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, there should be no objection to that.

Mr. ROCHE. No.

Mr. SPROULE. All right.

On section 6, members not personally liable.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will not that clause have the effect of relieving the incorporated body from liability?

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think it would relieve the body.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. This is merely to prevent personal liability on the part of the members.

On section 7, real and personal property.

Mr. SPROULE. I think this last clause should be amended. It says

> Provided however that the annual value of the real estate held by the association shall not exceed the sum of $50,000.

That means the annual rental of the building. A building that would rent for $50,000 would be a very large one. The Medical Association of Ontario had the worst cloud that it could have had over it from the indiscretion of the medical council in committing the association to a large expenditure for the erection of a great hall in Toronto. That was an incubus on it from which it has not yet recovered. It has broken up that unity which ought to exist between the members of the association. If you give power to put up a building of the dimensions and cost provided for in this section, the annual rental value of which would be $50,000 a year, it seems to me that you would be giving entirely too great latitude. For many of these insurance companies we put the annual value at from $10,000 to $15,000 and we think that quite enough. Five per cent on $150,000 would be $7,500. They are likely to be an itinerant body; they meet this year in Winnipeg and next year somewhere else, and if you give them the power to put up a building the annual rental of which would be $50,000 they would have to utilize it in some way to get a return for their money. I think it would be injurious to the profession to pass this clause of the Bill.

Mr. ROCHE. The hon. gentleman has in mind what took place in Ontario when the medical council expended a large sum of money for a building. The difference is however, that all the medical men of Ontario are compelled to pay their fees in order to keep in good standing in the council and in the opinion of a good many of the profession their representatives unwisely spent too much money in one building. I do not think it is desired by the Canadian Medical Council to put up an expensive building. You will see in the second clause that they get power to publish a medical journal and they will want a printing plant to get out bulletins, for instance, to educate the people in hygiene, and the idea is that all the property they may acquire for any purpose shall not exceed the sum mentioned in the clause.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not what the Bill says. I think it would be unwise for the association to erect a very expensive building. When we incorporate religious or educational or fraternal institutions we generally allow $10,000 as the annual value for a building, and that is considered ample.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. Is not the membership in the Medical Association entirely voluntary.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, but this enables them to hold too much real estate.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. What difference does that make? The general Act respecting companies in Ontario fixes no limitation, and if they choose to put up an expensive building it is their own business.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know what any other law may provide, but when we are passing similar Bills in this parliament we generally limit the sum to $10,000 or $15,000. The fact that the Medical Association of Ontario put up such a large building has ruined the association for years past.

Mr. BARR. The danger is that if such a large sum of money is invested in a building it may prevent medical men who are not very wealthy from joining the association because after they have joined they would be liable for whatever tax was fixed.

Mr. ROCHE. I would rather let the Bill stand until we get information than accept the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Sproule).

Mr. GRAHAM. There is a difference of opinion and perhaps we should let the Bill stand so that in the meantime these gentlemen can get together and agree.

Mr. SPROULE. I would accept that suggestion.

Progress reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding: 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.'

Mr. H. H. MILLER (South Grey). Mr. Speaker, it was with a great deal of pleasure that I listened, and I am sure that the House listened with the same pleasure, to the bright, snappy, pleasing and capable speech of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). I always listen to that gentleman with a great deal of pleasure, no matter on what subject he may speak; and my admiration for him is always increased by the consciousness that he could make an equally excellent speech on either side of the argument. The hon. gentleman has for many years been an honoured member of the Conservative party, and naturally is inclined to claim for his party all the credit to which they are entitled. He claims for them the credit of having purchased the great northwestern country. His party is, I believe, entitled to that credit. When questioned, he admitted very frankly that while the Conservative government of that day purchased the country, they did not pay for it. They purchased the rights of the Hudson Bay Company for £300,000; they added the purchase money to the public debt of the country, and it remains as yet unpaid. Nevertheless credit is due to them for their foresight and for the bargain they made, which I do not hesitate to say was a good bargain. But while the Conservative party are entitled to the credit of having purchased, on credit it is true, the vacant land, the Liberal party deserves the credit, and I believe the country gives them the credit, of having improved the land, laid it out, cultivated it, built upon it and attracted to it the people who are living on it to-day. The hon. gentleman also claimed credit for his party for having built the first transcontinental railway, and he says that is one of the reasons for the increase of the public debt under their regime. I do not know that the Conservative party can claim the credit of having built the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is true, they aided in the construction of the railway, they paid a large part of the price of the railway, but it is hardly true that they built the railway. If they did, then surely they would own the railway. There is one circumstance which might perhaps lead us to believe that it was a government-owned railway, and that is the fact that it does not pay taxes, that it is not possible for any municipality, under the bargain the Conservative government made, to collect taxes from it. That is the only reason one could have for supposing it a government owned railway. When the company sells a $100 share for $170, the proceeds of the sale go not into the public treasury, but into the treasury of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. When we travel on the railway or send freight over it, the money that we pay for a ticket or for freight charges goes into the treasury not of the country, but of the company. I would like to spend a few moments in the company of that good old gentleman and lady living in the constituency of Red Deer with whom my hon. friend from Halton, had some pleasant conversation. My hon. friend pictured the old gentleman coming in from his day's work and sitting in the kitchen. In the old Conservative days the old man did have to sit in the kitchen. In fact, he lived in a little shack of only one room, which had to be parlour, kitchen, bedroom and everything else. But if my hon. friend goes into that western country to-day, he will find the old gentleman living in a fine two-story house, and sitting, not in the kitchen, but in the parlour, in which is a cabinet-organ or an upright piano. My hon. friend has pictured the old gentleman sitting beside the kitchen stove, smoking his pipe, and talking with his good wife. He has voted for the hon. member for Red Deer, and the good wife says to him: 'How can you vote for the candidate of a Liberal government who tax the very tobacco you are smoking?' The old man answers: 'Do they?' The Minister of Agriculture has brought a man from Europe, and is paying him a salary to instruct the people of British Columbia, of Ontario, and of Quebec, and under these instructions the people of Canada in these three provinces are growing their own tobacco, and we shall very soon have, if we have not now, an excellent brand of Canadian tobacco and will not have to buy the foreign article at all.' As the old gentleman uses sugar in his coffee on the following morning, his good wife says to him: They surely tax you on the sugar.' He says to her: 'Good wife, do you not know that the Canadian government is encouraging the growing of sugar beets, and in this province of Alberta we have as good a country for growing them as lies beneath the sun?' 'But,' she says, 'the government tax your light—the very putty in your window.' 'Why, good wife,' says he, 'all the putty that we used in the shack which we lived in when the Conservative government was in power did not cost 25 cents, and all the putty that we have in this fine house of ours did not cost over 75 cents, and what does the duty on that amount to? But talking of light, you know that the Liberal government has taken almost entirely away the duty on the coal oil that gives us light as we sit here comfortably by the fire 365 nights a year? 'Oh, then,' she says at the breakfast table, the Liberal government have taxed the oatmeal from which your porridge is made.' He replies, 'It is true, but on the very day the Liberal government increased that tax, a Liberal member of parliament, then representing North Wellington in the Dominion House, and who was an oatmeal miller by trade, wired to his partner in the firm and told him to increase the price paid the farmers for their oats. Does that not apply, not only to North Wellington, but to every other oat growing district in Canada? And out here in Northern Alberta we grow oats with perhaps better success than in any other part of the Dominion. If we lose 5 cents, he said, in the summer by the increased duty on oatmeal, how many additional dollars do we not make in the increased price of the splendid oat crop I have to take to market.' 'But,' she says, 'we shall have to buy a few barrels of cement, with which to cement our cellar, and we shall have to pay an increased duty on that cement imposed by a Liberal government.' 'Yes, Jean' he says' 'some Tories did get the better of the government and induced it to increase the duty on cement, but what has been the result? The usual result followed, which always follows the imposition of an unreasonable duty. It increased the home production so much, that the cement industry has become nearly ruined, no manufacturer can make money out of it, but we are buying our cement at less than half we had to pay under the Tory government. 'Ah, but,' she says, 'Mr. Henderson, a friend of mine, who represents the county of Halton a way down in Ontario rather makes fun of the government. He says they have let scythes and sickles in free. Her husband replies: 'Bother Mr. Henderson, why did he not tell you the whole truth that the Liberal government let in reapers, hay tedders, mowers, hay rakes, and all these things at 17½ per cent duty, or 2½ per cent less than the Tory government charged? And the binder twine which we use in large quantities we get in entirely free of duty. And our fence wire which we require to fence these broad acres, we buy, under the Liberal government, entirely free of duty. My good wife,' he says, 'you wanted me last summer to buy a cream separator.'

Mr. MEIGHEN. Does the hon. gentleman argue that this government has adopted the principle of protection in these industries?

Mr. MILLER. I shall allow my hon. friend to gather from the facts whatever inferences and conclusions he desires. The farmer said to his good wife, 'did you not last summer want me to buy a cream separator? I did buy one and paid $80 for it. Now, if the Liberal government at Ottawa had imposed a duty on cream separators, as many Conservatives tried to get them to do, that separator would have cost me $100 or $110.' 'Do you know,' he added, 'I have been an old Tory all my days but I have come to believe it is true that the present government at Ottawa is imposing a tariff for revenue only.' His good wife retorted: 'What difference does it make what you call the tariff, it is there just the same, and they collect a large amount of duty under it.' He said: 'Perfectly true, Jean, but do you not know that Mr. Borden has been going all over the country, except in the prairie provinces, advocating adequate protection. Now, if that means anything, it means to the manufacturers in Ontario and Quebec that if his party were in power, they would increase the tariff and give them greater protection, and where then would you be'? 'After all,' he continued, 'I have been doing some thinking. The old Conservatives used to laud themselves as being the loyal party, and they were never tired shouting for 'the old man, the old policy, and the old flag.' Now, the old man is dead and has left no successor. The old policy, I used to think was a pretty good policy, but after I found the new policy of the Liberal party working in this country for thirteen years, I concluded that I had been entirely mistaken. You have to judge a policy as a man, by what it does; and looking at the policy of the Liberal government sanely, as a sane man should, I cannot help but conclude that the new policy is better than the old one. Then, as to the old flag, they used to wave the old flag and boast of their loyalty, but, Jean, you and I are from old Scotland, we are loyal to Britain; and the Liberal party, which used to be called the party of rebels, have introduced the British preference. And there goes your friend Henderson, representing the county of Halton, saying that if he had 50 of a majority in the Dominion House, he would repeal the British preference.' 'Why,' Jean, 'your friend says that the British preference does not give any preference at all to Canada but to Britain, and he would abolish it because it gives benefit to Britain without giving any to us.' He says: 'Jean, can you just consider the philosophy of that man Henderson and say where he is at, anyhow? He says that if you increase the duty on meal and putty you have to pay more for it, but if you reduce the duties by giving a lower tariff to Britain you do not get your goods any cheaper. Is it not a poor rule that does not work both ways? Let me tell you, Jean, he said, another thing. If the Tory party get into power, just as sure as fate, the Hon. Geo. E. Foster will be Finance Minister again, and you know what that means. The old lady says: 'Well, Jock, my father was a Tory, my grandfather was a Tory and I have been a Tory all my days, and you and your people have always been Tories, but I believe after all you are right, and I will never ask you to give a Tory vote again especially when you have as capable a candidate on the Liberal side as Dr. Clark, of Red Deer. More than that,' she says, 'I want you to vote Grit and will try to get the boys to vote the same way.'

This budget debate has dragged along for some days and has ceased perhaps to be very interesting. Figures and facts are dry things. The government has been attacked, as it always has been, on many lines. It has been attacked because of the increased cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental Railway. Hon. gentlemen opposite say, and say truly, that the railway has cost this country a great deal more than was anticipated. The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) pointed out, as others also have done, that the cost greatly exceeded the estimate. That is perfectly true. But it is not the first time any great public undertaking or a great private undertaking or even that a small private undertaking has cost a great deal more than the estimate. No one, however, has undertaken to point out that the increased cost has been due to any mismanagement, lack of integrity, or fault on the part of the government. I ask my hon. friends opposite to argue fairly. The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley), following the example of other hon. members, mixes up the cash paid by the government for the construction of the railway with the guarantees they have given.

I contend that it is not fair, I contend that when you bulk together the cash that this country pays for the building of a railway and add to that the amount guaranteed by the government for other people, it is not a fair way to state the case to the Canadian public. If I pay for a certain undertaking, for a certain property, or for the doing of certain work, which when completed is to be mine that is one thing; if I guarantee the cost of the doing by some other party of another piece of work that is to be directly to his benefit and directly and indirectly to my benefit, and I guarantee his paper for the amount, taking what I believe to be adequate security, that is quite another thing.

The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) is usually broad-minded. He is a business man with business ideas and he is usually fair. I do not think that he did himself justice nor that another hon. gentleman who spoke this afternoon did himself justice in stating that the Liberal party or the leader of the Liberal party said to the people of Canada that that undertaking would not cost the country more than $13,000,000. I have read from beginning to end the speech of the hon. the Prime Minister, and while I will admit that if you take out one single sentence from that speech it does appear to say that the cost of the road to the people of Canada will not exceed $13,000,000, yet no intelligent man, no man with half a mind, can read that speech of the Prime Minister and make it say anything of that kind.

The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), speaking of the government undertaking the building of the railway, endeavoured—I will not say that but his words were calculated to mislead the people of this country who might listen to or read that speech. He spoke of the government going into the building of this railway

> On estimates made by themselves or by some others for them.

He said the members of the government were not experienced, not engineers and had gone into this thing carelessly and without proper information. Then he said they had gone into it on estimates made by themselves or by others for them. The words are perfectly true, the idea sought to be conveyed is entirely incorrect. No man who proposes to build a house or other building, unless he be an expert architect, will do it upon his own estimates, he will secure estimates by an expert architect. No railway company will undertake to build a railway line without first obtaining the estimates of a capable engineer, and that capable engineer will be the 'other person' to whom the hon. gentleman refers. When the government made up their minds to build a government transcontinental railway, they did so on estimates made for them by another person and that other person was Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, the government engineer, who had also been the government engineer under the Conservative party. I shall not further discuss the National Transcontinental Railway now as it will form the subject of further debate on the loan of $10,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

The government are also assailed because of the increase of the public debt. Here again I wish to refer to words spoken by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and in this I differ from the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) who said he would not take the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) as his text. I will take him for my text for a little while and if I make a bad speech I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will attribute it to the choosing of a bad text. The hon. member for North Toronto admitted that the Conservative party in ten years from 1886 to 1896 had increased the public debt by $35,000,000. But then he argued that while they had increased the public debt by $35,000,000, for $10,000,000 of that they had received 7,500,000 acres of land, and he said if that 7,500,000 acres be worth $3 an acre, it makes a total of $22,000,000 to be deducted from the $35,000,000 by which they had increased the debt. But he maintained that the land was worth more than $3 an acre, he said: 'If you calculate its value at $6 an acre, it makes $45,000,000 which will exceed the whole addition to the public debt. I am perfectly willing that the hon. member should make that argument, I am perfectly willing to accept his figures and his statement, but I would ask him, were he here, where the lands came from that they purchased for $10,000,000. He would state that the 7,500,000 acres was part of 25,000,000 acres that the Conservative government had given to the Canadian Pacific Railway for nothing at all. I would say to him: I am perfectly willing that you should give your party credit at $6 an acre for the 7,500,000 acres you thus obtained, but if I do you must be willing to be charged at the same rate with the 46,000,000 acres that your government gave away while in power to persons other than actual settlers, and so while I credit you with $42,000,000, I charge you with $276,000,000, and I do not think the hon. member would make the account look any better for his party. The hon. member for North Toronto sought again to make it appear to the people of Canada that we had increased the public debt to a greater extent than we had any right to increase it, and in order to drive home that idea and to make out his case he made a comparison with the public debt of the United States and said: If you will go to the United States with its 80,000,000 or 90,000,000 of people you will find its public debt per capita is very much less of a burden. I wish to show the House that in 1889, when the hon. member for North Toronto was making his first budget speech as Finance Minister of Canada, he entertained a different opinion as to the fairness of a comparison of the public debt of Canada with the public debt of the United States. I would ask the patience of the House while I read the hon. gentleman's words, because as you will see from the words I read, it was at that time a matter of very great importance. He said:

It is a common error to take the debt of Canada and compare it with the federal debt of the United States in order to make a point as against Canada and in favour of the United States, or, to speak more truly, to make a point against the government which is now in power on account of its alleged extravagance in increasing the public debt.

Listen now to his words:

I do not know that a more unfair comparison could be instituted than a comparison between the federal debt of the United States and the federal debt of the Dominion of Canada.

Then he proceeds to give his reasons which I shall read. What I want to point out is that an argument which the hon. gentleman considers to be a fair and proper argument to advance in 1909, with his party in opposition, is the very argument which he said he thought was the worst possible argument when he was the Finance Minister and a member of the government in power. It is this very habit which the hon. gentleman has of arguing one way at one time under one set of circumstances and arguing another way at another time when the circumstances are entirely different, that robs him of the confidence which the people might otherwise have in him, which makes him a political impossibility, and robs him entirely of the influence with the country that a man of his educational advantages, his oratorical powers and long parliamentary experience would otherwise be entitled to enjoy. Proceeding with his argument to show why this is a wrong argument to advance he says:

I do not know that a more unfair comparison could be instituted than a comparison between the federal debt of the United States and the federal debt of the Dominion of Canada. Broadly stated the comparer says: Look at the United States; to-day it has a debt of $20.42 per head of its population. Look at the Dominion of Canada; to-day it has a debt of $47.16 per head of its population. And the comparison always tends, as these financial comparisons must, to prejudice the minds of those who do not see through it in favour of the country which, seemingly, has a lighter debt and against the country which, seemingly, has a heavier debt.

That is exactly the position the hon. gentleman puts himself in during this present debate.

Now, if by a simple statement to-day, I can set, to a certain extent, at rest and dispose of this comparison of two things so dissimilar, I shall feel that I have performed a duty, not only to the party in power, but to this House and to the country as well.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. gentleman was performing a public duty in stating that argument to the House in 1889, I am surely performing a like duty when I repeat his language in 1909:

The constitution of the United States and the constitution of Canada are very different, so far as financial matters are concerned which lead to public debts and to public expenditures.

Then the hon. gentleman proceeds to show the difference between the constitution of Canada and that of the United States. He points out:

The United States, in the first place, assumes no debts of its different states. The Dominion of Canada has assumed the debts of its provinces to the amount of $109,430,148.69. The United States pays no subsidies to its different states. The Dominion of Canada has paid in subsidies to its different provinces, since confederation, $72,306,029.95.

Then he points out that the federal government in the United States does not pay any large part of the cost of the administration of justice, but that in the Dominion of Canada the federal government pays a very large part of the cost of that administration. He says:

In regard to immigration and quarantine, we find that we have paid $5,571,631.81 since confederation. The United States government paid little or nothing for immigration and quarantine. For militia and defence, this government has paid $21,851,635.50 since confederation. In the United States they keep up West Point Academy and a small standing army, but the militia throughout that vast country is kept up at the expense of the different states, so that if Canada had been in the same position as to these matters as the United States, it would have saved at least one-half of that sum. For penitentiaries, we have expended since confederation, $5,611,696.54. The penitentiaries in the United States are supported, not at the charge of the federal power, but at the charge of the different states. Then we have expended for the salaries of governors, $2,250,643.01. In the country to the south of us the salaries of the governors are paid by the states and not by the federal power.

Then the hon. gentleman concludes in this way:

If Canada had set out on the same basis as the United States, she would have saved the assumed debts of the provinces, the subsidies paid to the provinces, the interest paid on the debt assumed from the provinces, the amount paid out for penitentiaries, the amount paid for the salaries of governors, at least half the amount she has paid for militia and defence, at least half the amount paid for the administration of justice, and the whole amount paid for immigration and quarantine, amounting in all to no less a sum than $309,860,987.40. The net debt of Canada to-day is $234,531,358; so that if Canada had set out from the first on the same basis as the United States, and had made no payments that the federal government in that country does not make, she not only would have had no debt at present, but would have had a surplus of $75,329,629.40.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen may treat this as a good joke, but from their point of view it is no joke, for, as soon as this gets before the people and into the minds of the people, a stock argument of the hon. gentlemen opposite will be for ever taken from them, which is their comparison on an unfair basis of the debt of the United States with ours, and always to the advantage of the United States and to our disadvantage.

Now I say again, Mr. Speaker, that if that was good argument away back in 1889, it is a fair argument to-day; and it is a very strange thing that the hon. member for North Toronto should have so completely changed his mind according as circumstances have happened to change.

Our friends on the opposite side of the House have questioned the expenditure of the government in building the Grand Trunk Pacific. I was reading lately in one of the financial journals of Canada that there would probably be opposition in this House to the Grand Trunk Pacific, but there would not be any opposition outside the House. Our friends object to the Quebec bridge, not to the cost of the bridge nor as to its necessity, but because the bridge fell down. Any fair-minded gentleman in this House who has followed the history of the Quebec bridge, and knows anything of its construction or of the disaster which happened to it, will know that the very best bridge engineers on the continent of America were employed to design and to superintend the construction of that bridge, and that when the bridge fell it was considered to be a mystery by all the bridge building engineers of the continent, who could not understand why it should have fallen and where there was any fault in its construction.

Our friends on the other side of the House are very fond of making jeering and sneering references to the Newmarket canal, which they have chosen to dub the Aylesworth ditch. One hon. gentleman on the other side of the House challenged the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) last night because he had not censured the government in his speech yesterday for building the Newmarket canal. I venture to say that the member of this House who challenged the hon. member for Red Deer, had never seen the Newmarket canal, that he had no knowledge of the geography of the country through which it is being built; and I venture to say that he knows nothing whatever about the necessities of the country, or the possibilities of the canal. I, Mr. Speaker, did not vote against the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the completion of that canal. From personal knowledge I do not know whether it is a wise or an unwise expenditure. But I reasoned with myself in this way: It has been stated in this House that a number of gentlemen belonging to both sides of politics came down from the neighbourhood in which the Newmarket canal was being constructed, and asked that the work be undertaken. Now what object could these gentlemen have had in asking for a great public work if it were not needed? If it were not to be a benefit to the locality, it would be a monument of the folly, not only of the government that built it, but of the folly of the people who asked for it.

Mr. WALLACE. Did the delegation that came down here from North York ask for the building of a canal from Lake Simcoe to Newmarket, or did they ask for the deepening of the Holland river from Lake Simcoe to Holland Landing?

Mr. MILLER. That is a question that I frankly admit I am not able to answer. It has been stated in the House that gentlemen came down from the neighbourhood in which this canal was to be built and asked for its construction; whether there is any difference in detail I am not aware. But I reasoned with myself in this way: If intelligent and sane business men, one of them a Conservative member of the Ontario legislature, came down and asked for a work of this kind, what could have been their object? If it had been for some great public building, I might have thought: Now this building will not be of any particular use, but these gentlemen would like to point it out as an ornament to the locality in which they lived.

Mr. WALLACE. Did the hon. gentleman say a member of the local legislature came down here?

Mr. MILLER. I trust I am not mistaken. I understood Mr. Lennox came down, or had signed a petition.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think he was a member of the local legislature at that time.

Mr. MILLER. Possibly not at that time, but it is the same gentleman. I reasoned with myself in this way: These gentlemen might have asked for the construction of a large public building which might not be necessary, but would be an ornament to the locality in which they lived. But a canal would be an entirely different thing. A canal, if it was not to be a useful thing, would be an eyesore rather than anything that would beautify the country through which it passed. I will say further that within two weeks before the vote was taken in the House, I met on the train a resident of the riding that my hon. friend from South York represents.

The gentleman whom I met was an honourable man; he was an intelligent man; he was a man with no personal interest, and I said to him: Tell me now confidentially what is your opinion as to the building of the Newmarket canal. That gentleman stated: Well, while I do not look with any particular degree of favour upon the building of any part of the Trent Valley canal, the Newmarket section of the canal will be just as useful as any other part of the system. I know that, as to that question, men may differ in opinion. The hon. member for Centre York may believe it to be a useless expenditure, but other men of good judgment believe it as useful as any other part of the Trent canal which was undertaken by our Conservative friends.

If fault is found with the expenditure under the present government, if we are told that our public debt has increased more quickly and to a greater extent than it ought to have increased, let me ask my hon. friends on the opposite side of the House and let me ask the people of Canada what they think would have been the state of affairs if our good Conservative friends had been returned to power? Turn to the Halifax platform, and we have the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) advocating—did he not?—the government ownership of railways. Perhaps he did not exactly do so in definite terms, but he did advocate the government ownership of telegraph and telephone lines, and I leave the people to judge what it would have cost the government to have purchased the telegraph and telephone lines from one end of the Dominion to the other. The hon. leader of the opposition told the people of British Columbia that if he had been returned to power he would have given an increased subsidy to British Columbia, and I contend that if he had done that he would before long have been obliged to have given an increased subsidy to every province in the Dominion. It is a part of the Halifax platform that rural free mail delivery should be extended and made general throughout Canada. Then the leader of the opposition, at the time that this government were planning to build the Transcontinental Railway, said that if he were in power he would not build the Transcontinental Railway as they proposed to build it, but he did not say that he would not expend any money at all. Far from it. He said he would extend the Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to a point on the Georgian bay; from a point on the Georgian bay to the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway; that he would buy the Canadian Pacific Railway main line from North Bay to Fort William; that he would assist the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern, or at least one of these lines, to improve their grades from Fort William to Winnipeg; that he would help the Grand Trunk Pacific to build their road from Winnipeg to the mountains; that he would build as a government railway a road through the mountains, and that, if it proved to be necessary and in the interest of the people, he would, as a government undertaking, extend the Intercolonial Railway from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast. Then we had the hon. and gallant member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes) advocating at that time not the cutting out of the Newmarket canal, but the spending of $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 additional in improving and enlarging the Trent Valley canal. He advocated the building of the Georgian Bay canal and the spending of large sums of money for improving the navigation of the Saskatchewan and Assiniboine rivers. Then the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), at that time while not in favour of building the Transcontinental Railway as the government proposed to build it, was in favour of building the Hudson Bay Railway. Then the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), though not in favour of building the Transcontinental Railway as it was then proposed to build it, was in favour of building the Georgian Bay canal that would have cost $125,000,000. The hon. member for North Toronto, speaking at Prince Edward Island, said that if his party were returned to power they would undertake, at the cost of many millions, the building of the Prince Edward Island tunnel. So, I say that if all these promises, which are only some of the promises made by our friends in the opposition prior to the election, had been fulfilled, and if they had been returned to power our national debt would have increased, not as it has increased, but by many millions more and if our plight to-day be a bad plight, it would have been a very much worse plight.

The hon. member for North Toronto does not to-day favour the system of bookkeeping that is in vogue under the party in power, and that has been practised not only by this government since 1896, but by the preceding government and by all governments since confederation. My hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Sutherland), in a very able speech in this debate, pointed out that while the hon. member for North Toronto, who formerly himself practised the very same system of bookkeeping which is now practised by our government to-day, condemns that system, Mr. Cortelyou, the ex-Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, is advocating that the people of the United States shall cease to maintain their system of bookkeeping and adopt the system that is in vogue to-day in the Dominion of Canada. But, Sir, I not only put the opinion of Mr. Cortelyou against the opinion of the hon. member for North Toronto, but I put against the present opinion of the hon. member for North Toronto the opinion of the hon. gentleman who was Minister of Finance, the Hon. Geo. E. Foster, in the old Tory days. If you will look at 'Hansard' for 1894, when the hon. gentleman who now represents North Toronto was Minister of Finance, you will find his statement of the surplus that he claimed to have at the end of that financial year. The hon. gentleman, speaking in this House on the 27th March, 1894, said:

> I stated about a year ago, or a little more, that my estimate of expenditure for the year 1892-3 was $36,500,000, whereas the actual expenditure was $36,814,052. The income was $38,168,608, so that the total expenditures on consolidated fund account taken from the total revenue on consolidated fund account, leaves, what has been a pleasant and recurring experience in the administration of the present government, a tidy surplus of $1,354,556.

While the Minister of Finance of that day estimated $1,300,000 to be, as he said, a tidy surplus, and he had that surplus by the very same system of bookkeeping that is in vogue to-day, he stood up in this House last week and despised a surplus of $1,500,000, a couple of hundred thousand dollars more than his, and arrived at in the very same way. In the year 1894, when the then Minister of Finance claimed a surplus of $1,300,000, the net increase in the public debt was $549,605. The year before the actual increase in the debt of the country had been $3,332,000, and for the year following—1895—it was a still larger sum. The hon. member for North Toronto has rather ridiculed the Finance Minister because of what the hon. member for North Toronto claims to be the late date at which he asks hon. members on both sides of the House to assist him in bringing about economy. I want to show to the House that in 1894 the position of the then Minister of Finance, now the hon. member for North Toronto, was identically the same. Speaking in the same debate the hon. gentleman said:

> Though this country stood remarkably well the stress of the hard times and the commercial disturbances which the world experienced in 1892 and 1893, and seemed to have passed through them without visible effect upon our trade or revenue, we are now feeling the reflex or dying influences of that world-wide depression and period of low prices, and it has had and is having the effect in Canada—for a period short as yet, and which I believe will not be of long duration—of making people prudent in expenditure and careful and conservative in their purchases.

These reasons lead me to think that the revenues will be considerably less during the year 1893-94 than the revenue which accrued in 1892-93, and from present appearances I do not anticipate more than thirty-six and a half or thirty-six and three-quarter million of dollars. If the expenditure from the 10th of March to the end of the year should be normal, that would leave us with a deficit; but this government has come to the conclusion—a wise conclusion, which I think will be echoed by this House, and in which the government will have the co-operation and cordial help of the House—to endeavour to live during this year within our income, and, if our income is less, to resolutely keep down the expenditure.

Here we have the hon. member arguing in 1894 that the country was suffering because of business depression in 1892 and 1893, and he said that the revenues of the country had fallen off, that he was faced with a deficit, and as the present Minister of Finance has done, he appealed to both sides of the House to assist him in retrenchment and economy so as to lower the expenditure.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) seeks to make capital out of the fact that we are now paying a higher interest on our loans than we were a few years ago and he endeavours to argue that the credit of Canada in the money market of England is not as good as it formerly was. Well, the price of wheat is higher in Canada now than it has been for many years, and he might just as well blame the government, or praise the government as you will, for the high price of wheat as for the high price of money. The price of wheat is governed by the wheat markets of the world; the price of money is governed by the money markets of the world. We all know that during the last few years if a private person wants to borrow money he has had to pay a higher rate of interest than before that period, and so it is with the government, because money is scarcer and its value greater. Let me make a comparison of the borrowings of Canada from the British money lenders. In 1908 the Dominion government and the several provincial governments of Canada issued bonds to the amount of $77,598,500; municipal bonds were issued in Canada that year to the extent of $47,433,911 and bonds of Canadian financial and industrial concerns were issued to the extent of $71,325,000; the combined loans of municipalities and industrial corporations totalling $118,758,000 as against $77,598,000 total borrowings of the Dominion and provincial governments. The grand total of Canadian bonds issued in 1908, was $196,357,411. Now, in the year 1907 the total borrowings on Dominion and provincial and municipal and industrial corporation bonds, in place of being $196,000,000 was only $82,635,741, and if in 1908 we were able to borrow in the markets of Britain a good deal more than twice what we borrowed in the preceding year it certainly is not any evidence that the credit of Canada is getting worse. Of our total borrowings in 1908, governmental, municipal, and otherwise, Canada took 12½ per cent of the amount, the United States took 3¼ per cent and Great Britain took 84¼ per cent.

Let me say a few words here about the rate of interest on post office savings bank deposits. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) referring to the action of the present Minister of Finance in this connection said:

Why, Sir, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance also takes some rank as scalping the thrifty depositors of this country of a part of their interest on their deposits in order to swell that vaunted surplus of his which he must have. If he cannot get it by changing two millions from current account to capital account he can take two or three million dollars by docking the depositors in the savings banks of one-half of one per cent.

Well, if it was a crime for the Liberal government to reduce the rate of interest on savings bank deposits by one-half per cent, was it any less a crime when the savings bank deposit rate was cut down in former years by a Conservative government. On the 12th of May, 1888, Sir Charles Tupper being Finance Minister, chapter 8 of 51 Vic., was passed, providing that the then Conservative government might by order in council fix the interest on deposits in the government savings bank at such rate not exceeding four per cent as might be declared by the Governor in Council. The interests on deposits had been four per cent and no change was made in 1888, but in 1889 when the Hon. Mr. Foster was Minister of Finance the rate was reduced from four per cent to three and one-half. If it was a vice and a crime to reduce the rate of interest one-half per cent on savings bank deposits when the Liberals did it, was it a virtue when the Hon. George E. Foster reduced the rate in 1889?

Then, the hon. gentleman from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) as well, referred to the payment by the present government of bounties upon iron and steel and upon sugar, and these hon. gentlemen referred to this matter in order to try to make the people of Canada believe that the paying of bounties by the government is wasteful and extravagant, and wrong. When Mr. Foster was Minister of Finance in 1894 he delivered a speech in this House on the question of iron bounties, and I quote his words from 'Hansard':

On the one hand the duties on iron have been and are relatively high, on the other hand there is the patent fact that unless there be a sufficient inducement in the way of protection or bounty given for the manufacture of iron, it will be impossible in this country, as it has been found impossible in all other countries, ever to rise from the production of raw ores which abound in this country to an independent and self-contained manufacture of the larger portion of the iron needed for the consumption of the country.

Again, he says:

We must bear in mind that although the national policy dates from 1878 there was nothing but a revenue tariff upon iron from 1878 to 1887. It was at that period, and only six year sago that parliament assented to a scheme which had for its object the development of the iron industry by a system of protection and bounty.

So that we see that bounties were first paid on iron and steel, not by a Liberal government, but by a Conservative government. Now, the payment of bounties on iron and steel is right or it is wrong. If it is right, it is not necessary for us to say any more about it. If it is wrong, it surely is not more wrong to-day than it was when it was instituted by our hon. friends on the other side in 1894. It is true, this government is paying a bounty on the production of beet root sugar, and this bounty was established by a Conservative government in 1891, by chapter 31 of the Dominion statutes of that year. That bounty was renewed by a Conservative government in 1895, by chapter 6 of the statutes of that year, in a Bill introduced into the House by the hon. member for North Toronto himself; and with regard to that I say, as with regard to bounties on iron and steel, if it was right to pay that bounty in 1891 and right that the hon. member for North Toronto should renew that bounty in 1895, it is right that this government should continue it in 1909.

The hon. member for North Toronto, in his budget speech in 1895, the last he delivered as Finance Minister in this House, endeavoured to prove that this was a prosperous country because our bank deposits were increasing. Speaking of the increase of deposits in the government savings banks and in the chartered banks, the hon. gentleman said:

Another evidence of the condition of Canada is to be found in its savings.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Bothwell says 'hear, hear.' He does not believe that such is the case—he treats the idea with contempt. But when his colleague was Minister of Finance from 1874-78 he did not treat an argument like that with contempt; he put it forward as a very strong point in favour of a better condition of affairs than some of his opponents argued as existing. The hon. gentleman thinks a great deal of Liberal traditions, of Liberal precedents and Liberal principles as they are exemplified by the present government in Great Britain, and he has only to read the telegraphic despatches of the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday to find that he went into an elaborate argument to show that the position of Great Britain was not so bad as had been stated, and the argument on which he relied was the increase in the savings of the people. Without doubt it is an argument which has weight.

If the increase in the deposits of the people in the chartered banks and the government savings banks be a strong evidence of the prosperity of the country, let us compare the figures. The hon. gentleman stated that in the five years preceding his statement, that is, previous to 1895, the total deposits had increased to the extent of $41,271,908. If the argument was a good argument then, it is a good argument now, and what are the facts? In the five years ending with 1908 the increase in the savings of the people in the banks amounted to $239,826,679. If the hon. gentleman's statement proved that the people of Canada at that time were a prosperous people, then, on the same kind of evidence, the Canada of to-day is six times as prosperous as was the Canada of that day.

But the hon. gentleman had another argument in 1895. He said that he would prove that the country was in a prosperous condition because of the increase of the railway mileage, which had increased in the preceding five years from 12,628 miles to 15,620 miles, an increase of 2,992 miles. But in the last five years, from 1903 to 1908 the railway mileage has increased from 18,988 to 22,966, or a total increase of 3,978 miles. The Wall Street 'Journal' in a recent article, says that 'the farmer's work and harvest have had the benefit of more varied knowledge and more effective intelligence, his life and living have undergone transformations which increasingly make the farm preferable to the town.' These words were uttered with reference to the United States; but if they are true and applicable as to the United States, they are equally true and applicable as to the Dominion of Canada. The prosperity of Canada must ever depend very largely on the prosperity of the Canadian farmer, and if his work and harvest have had the benefit of more varied knowledge and more effective intelligence, this means great things for the future of this country. The varied knowledge and more effective intelligence of the Canadian farmer have increased because of various things—the general advance of the people, the advance in education, better mail facilities, cheaper and better literature, especially literature pertaining to the farm, and also largely because of the help and assistance of governments, Dominion and provincial, under both political parties; and, Sir, I believe that the condition of the Canadian farmer has been vastly improved during the last thirteen years, by the very great assistance rendered by the present Dominion Minister of Agriculture. I believe that the home and foreign trade of the Dominion of Canada will develop in the years to come, as it has been doing in the years that are past, and especially so, if the people of Canada continue to entrust, as I am sure they will, the government of this country to the party that is now in power.

Speaking of the development of our foreign trade, which is a matter of great importance my attention has been drawn to the question of Canadian trade with the British West Indies. In the Canadian 'Trade Review' of last week, I read an account of the return to this country of Mr. W. F. Thompson, the vice-president and managing director of the Ogilvie Milling Company, of Montreal. Mr. Thompson had been paying a visit of some months to the British West Indies, and while there was struck with the importance of obtaining for Canada the British West India trade. In urging the importance of securing that trade, one means he suggested was the establishment of better transportation facilities between the British West Indies and the St. Lawrence ports. Turning to the Colonial Office 'Journal' of October, 1907, I find an article written by Mr. Eyre Hutson, and editorially vouched for by the editor of the magazine, in which Mr. Hutson pointed out that:

The purchase by Canada of the exports of the British West Indies, particularly of coffee, cotton, fruit, rice, hide and skins, salts, sugar, molasses, tobacco, manufactured and unmanufactured—the purchase by Canada of such articles as these, exported by the British West Indies, had increased from 1898 to 1905 from £3,121,769 to £6,134,923. And he said:

The total value of all exports from the British West Indies to all countries, including bullion and specie, for the year 1905 was £9,969,722. In this amount is included the value of exports from British Guiana, British Honduras and Bermuda. The value of the total exports during that year to the United Kingdom was £2,905,573, that to other countries was £7,064,149, and comparing this latter figure with £6,134,923, the total importations into Canada of what may be described as West Indian products, there is a balance of £929,226, which may be taken as representing the value of West Indian exports which in 1905 could be purchased by Canada.

Mr. Hutson argued then that it was possible for Canada in 1908 to have purchased nearly all the exports of the British West India islands. In the same magazine, published in April, 1908, I find another article by Mr. G. B. Mason, written from the West India islands, in which he says :

The question of a common tariff for the West Indies, will, no doubt, be considered at the approaching conference to discuss trade relations with Canada, which it is proposed to hold in the near future, on the initiative of the Imperial Commission of Agriculture for the West Indies. It is to be hoped that one result of this conference will be a common revenue regulations, with free trade between the islands, a preference to British and colonial goods and reciprocity to those countries which give the West Indies reciprocity.

Again he says:

The best policy for the West Indies is the closest possible union with Canada, while keeping on the best terms with the United States. A government commissioner, travelling in Canada for the West Indies, and one travelling in the West Indies, for Canada, would be of the greatest help in promoting trade between the two countries. With the Canadian market, and with good management, the future of the West Indies is well assured. especially if good fruit steamers are built to run between the islands and Canada, and a West Indian sugar refinery is put up in Halifax or Montreal, owned by the planters themselves and their friends, in connection with the central factories in each island. There is no German bounty-fed beet sugar in Canada, and no free imports.

I believe that the recently rearranged tariff of the United States shuts out from that country the fruits produced in the British West India islands, and this should make it more important for them to secure the Canadian market. Therefore, I hope that at the conference to be held this coming summer, some arrangement will be arrived at to better the conditions of trade between the two countries. And I hope for this result, not altogether because of selfish national reasons, not altogether for the benefit to be derived by Canada, but for abstract reasons, I would like to see Canada do, in whatever degree she can prudently do so, improve our relations with the West India colonies which follow the same flag and owe allegance to the same sovereign.

We have had some discussion regarding imperial defence, and on that point I wish to say a word or two. There is not, I believe, any man in the House to-day, on either side, there is not, I believe, a citizen of Canada, whatever may be the language he speaks, whatever may be his creed or the race from which he springs, who will object to the Canadian government giving Great Britain in her time of need, should that time arise, such help in money or men as we can give and in such a way as will be of the greatest advantage to the old land. I do not believe that the time will ever come when we shall not be willing to help Britain in her need in proportion to our means. I do not believe we shall ever see the day when our people will not be willing, so far as may be necessary, to aid in upholding the British flag. But while this will be our attitude, it is the part of wisdom that the people of Canada should not do what others have done simply because others have done it. We should keep a cool head and act prudently, wisely and cautiously in unison with the mother country. And while speaking of imperial defence, let me say a word regarding our own militia expenditure. I listened yesterday to the eloquent and forcible speech of my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith). I heard his words concerning the large expenditure we are making on our Canadian militia. I believe in getting a hundred cents of value for every dollar spent by any department of the government. I do not believe in spending $7,000,000 on the Canadian militia, if it be an unnecessary expenditure; but I do not know that I can conclude that $7,000,000 wisely expended or expended to obtain a dollar's value for every dollar spent, is too great for this growing Dominion. That is a matter I am not capable of judging. I am not a militia expert. But whether that be a proper amount to spend or not, I do not agree with my hon. friend from Nanaimo in his argument. He asks: Where is the enemy we need to fear? I say that the enemies of Canada, if there be any, or if there ever shall be any, are not obliged, and it is not the custom of enemies, to advertise a year ahead their intention of invading our soil. I see no danger at present. I hope there will be none in the future and I believe we can profit much more by peace than by war; but I say it is not possible to train soldiers and officers, it is not possible to procure the necessary militia equipment in a month or three months or a year. If we are to maintain our self-respect and dignity, and are not to depend on any strength but our own, so long as our own can accomplish what we ought to accomplish in maintaining our position as a Canadian people, we ought not to be unprepared for any emergency.

In conclusion let me quote what the 'Chronicle,' a Finance paper published in Montreal, said in its issue of the 16th of April, 1899:

> While no sudden expansion is to be looked for or desired, it cannot be doubted that Canadian business development during the next few years will be of far greater magnitude than ever in the past.

Every Canadian citizen will echo that opinion. However pessimistically men may sometimes, on the other side of the House, express their views, after all, down in our hearts, we all believe that our country has such vast natural resources that we can look forward with confidence to our expansion and growth into a great nation. And in my opinion, and I believe in the opinion of the people of Canada, it would be wise to leave the control of our affairs in the hands of those by whom they have been so successfully managed during the last 13 years. We are sometimes asked what great work has the government undertaken or accomplished? Well, it has erected great works, such as the Grand Trunk Pacific, the extension of the Intercolonial Railway, the improvement of our canals, the lighting of our harbours; but I glory not so much in these vast undertakings as in the smaller ones, the works done by this government for the ordinary citizens, we have made it possible for the ordinary citizens the man who works in the depths of the mines to bring out of the earth the riches we are only beginning to discover and realize, the man who reaps the harvest from our fertile acres, the man who, in his fishing boat, reaps the harvest of the seas, the man who by the sweat of his brow and with calloused hands, hews the lumber out of our forests, the man who whether he works by his muscle or his brain, to accomplish that work to the greatest advantage to himself and his country. Canada has never known, notwithstanding the temporary depression of the last year or two, such an area of prosperity on the whole as she has experienced during the last 13 years. I congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Finance on the fact that during the present year, when, in common with the rest of the world, we have been suffering from a temporary commercial depression he has been able to present to the country such a splendid budget speech and exhibit a surplus of $1,500,000—not as large as other surplusses, but still, especially under the circumstances, a very considerable sum.

Mr. GLEN CAMPBELL (Dauphin). Mr. Speaker, the debate on the budget has been so comprehensive that at this stage little remains for me to add. There are still, however, a few subjects that may be of some little interest which I would like to bring to the attention of the House. One thing that has struck me very forcibly, and possibly it has struck other new members, is the bouquets that have made their appearance at different times in the House. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald) and the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. W. McIntyre) on their return to the House from little political trips into their several provinces were presented with bouquets. I wondered at the time the meaning of those bouquets. It struck me at first that they were marks of appreciation on the part of their fellow members who were of their peculiar persuasion in politics; marks of especial esteem and regard; tributes to some good work accomplished by these gentlemen. But that could not have been the reason as these gentlemn had broken the rule laid down by Liberals in my own province and in the province of Ontario. Instructions were given in these provinces to election speakers at the time of provincial elections to say to the elctors : Do not vote for a Liberal candidate because he is a Liberal, but vote for a Liberal candidate so as to strengthen the opposition against this Conseravtive government which is so strongly entrenched in power in order to secure good government. We heard that motto on every platform in Manitoba; that was their method of trying to wiggle in another member against the government. That policy is followed also in Ontario, but evidently when members of this federal House go to Nova Scotia and Alberta, they return here with laurels after having broken that rule laid down by the Liberals, having further strengthened the governments already too strong in those provinces. That was evidently looked upon by Liberals in this House as a reason for congratulating these members. I think it a most invidious thing that bouquets are handed out to some gentlemen and not to others. We saw an hon. gentleman who had wended his weary way from British Columbia come here weary and sad and worn from the efforts that he had put forward to obtain a seat by acclamation. No bouquet was handed to him. The seat he now occupies had been won in a manly way by a gentleman of the name of Sloan, but for reasons, which I fancy will appear a little later, Mr. Sloan retired in favour of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue and Mines (Mr. Templeman). I myself feel like handing that hon. minister a bouquet and I would suggest a bouquet of roses as the most suitable. Roses in their beauty and fragrance would remind him of the city of Victoria which had turned him down in favour of an untried warrior on the Conservative side, even with all his prestige as minister. I would further suggest roses because with every rose go a few thorns, and these thorns in the bouquet I would give him would remind him of his feelings on the evening of the 26th of October last. The thorns might also remind the First Minister of his feelings when he heard the sorry tidings from British Columbia on that evening. The thorns also ought to have a little prick for the man from Nanaimo (Mr. R. Smith) when he remembers that he went out, fought and won his fight, and came here the accredited representative of the people, but was not thought good enough to take a portfolio as a representative in the cabinet for British Columbia. When I look at the hon. gentleman who represents British Columbia in the cabinet and think of him and his position in the government. I am reminded of a story of Richard Croker, the Tammany leader. When American horses were first run on the race courses in England Mr. Croker was very much interested. If you remember the Americans took with them to the old country their own jockey, Todd Sloan. Sloan rode the first horse that won a race in England. The race was won by a neck, and Richard Croker was heard to exclaim: Thank God for Sloan. Those few words of thanks to the great Being, I feel sure, are reiterated most heartily by the hon. gentleman who now represents Comox-Atlin.

With the permission of the House I would like to refer to some extent to some previous debates. On the evening of March 23, the First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made a solmen statement which I would like to read to this House. I must say I regret exceedingly that that right hon. gentleman is not here, because it is to him personally, perhaps, more than to the House that I would like to address my remarks. While discussing a matter that was in debate the First Minister said:

> I am sorry to say that is another evidence that we are not to trust Conservatives when they pledge themselves to us as members of the House or as a delegation.

In other words, he stated from his place in the House that Conservatives were not worthy of credit. Now, Sir, I am a kind of a Conservative myself, and I felt at that time, as I feel now, that it was a harsh remark for the First Minister to make with regard to any loyal gentleman in this House, even though they differ with him politically. I could assure the right hon. gentleman, if he were here, that he can always trust me most implicitly, trust me to fight him as long as I have breath, as long as he follows his present methods of conducting the affairs of this country, as long as he prostitutes the great and heaven-born gifts that he possesses, a flowery language and a silver tongue, to whip, as he did on that occasion, his most unwilling followers into voting a grant of the people's hard earned money to a most useless work called the Aylesworth ditch, down which to float, or to wheel, as events will show, the Minister of Justice into his seat in this House. He can always trust me to oppose him in such projects as that, and I think I am safe in making the same promise on behalf of other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House as long as he carries on a policy of wanton waste of the public moneys that we have seen him pursuing in this House, despite all that the members of the opposition can say in the way of protest. I refer, for instance, to the buildings that were put up at Kingston for some servants of the officers there—$112,000 for 16 houses for under-strappers of some kind of officers. Why, Sir, I want to tell you that we have some 9,000 farmers in my own riding, and they are living in houses costing from $150 to perhaps $500 or $600; and the minister who is in charge of that department asks the people's representatives, who are here taking care of the people's interests, to vote their hard earned money to build some palaces for flunkeys, and bung-starters, and I know not what. Those are some of the expenditures that I take objection to. Another thing I take objection to is the enormous waste of public money that we see voted from time to time in this House, for instance, for towers for public buildings. In one breath, the minister in charge of the department says, Canada is hard up, and we are retrenching; the next moment he asks us to vote $2,000 $3,000 or $4,000 for a tower to make a public building in Glencoe, or somewhere else, look a little better. No sooner do we vote that tower, but he asks us to vote a clock for the tower costing several thousands of dollars of the people's money; and no sooner have we voted the clock than he asks us to vote $300 or $400 to pay some fellow to wind the clock. I want to say that in matters of that kind the First Minister can absolutely and always count upon me to oppose him. He can trust me to vote against him as long as he follows his present policy of expediency instead of trying to fulfil some of his pledges.

The right hon. gentleman is credited with having a very short memory. I would like to remind him of some of the pledges he got from Conservatives, which were fulfilled, and the fulfilment of which resulted in his attaining to the position he now holds as leader of this government;

I refer to the pledges that Conservatives made to him in 1896. I am much mistaken if some of the erstwhile Conservatives who at that time made him those promises do not sit behind him now, and form part of his majority. I would ask the right hon. gentleman, if he were here, to look to his own honesty in the matter of his promises. Let him carry his memory back to 1894, I think it was, when he came to Winnipeg as leader of the great Liberal party of Canada. He told them that he came with a message to the people of the west, a message that had great bearing on the approaching election that we were all looking forward to. He made them a certain promise, a promise that I feel sure my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) would have appreciated had he been there. He got up on a public platform in Winnipeg and said to the people: I come to the west bearing you a message, I come to you preaching a gospel, a new gospel, a gospel of free trade as they have it in England. Where is it? It is gone with the breath he used in uttering these words. And still owing his position of Premier of Canada to the pledges he received from Conservatives, which were fulfilled, and to pledges he gave himself, which were unfortunately not fulfilled, he had his nerve with him, when he dared to get up and accuse Conservatives of want of credibility.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He did not say it. You had better read the whole article.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. gentleman can read it for himself, it is here in the 'Hansard', I will give the page. The whole article absolutely bears out what I said.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He didn't say it at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I heard, on a previous occasion in this House, a gentleman who went even further than my hon. friend who now speaks; he refused to allow the House to credit the words that were marked in his own name. I heard the Minister of Finance, in his speech the other day, refer to the grand old policy we hear so much of, the land for the settler, as being the policy of the Liberal party. He spoke of the fact that the Conservatives had given land grants to railways, and that his government had ceased to do so. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten that there is a railroad built up through Manitoba and the Northwest Territories called the Canadian Northern? Has he forgotten that, from time to time since this government has been in power, that railway company has come here for an extension of time for its charters, and other extensions of rights which those charters gave it? Has he forgotten that some million acres of land have been given to the Canadian Northern by this government, because that is an absolute fact, and he cannot deny it, nor can any one deny it with truth. Has he forgotten, Sir, with regard to his policy of the land for the settler, a fact which is fairly well known and has been fairly well advertised that his government gave 250,000 acres of land to a company principally of Americans for $1 an acre? When that deal was consummated the poor settler, the man who gives the land value, had to pay from $5 to $15 an acre for the same land and the quality of which had not changed in any way although the land had changed from the ownership of the people to the ownership of a band of American speculators. He has perhaps forgotten all that was said at that time with respect to the politicians who took an active part in putting through the deal. It was stated and it is believed in the west that a certain politician who still has a seat in this House received from the Saskatchewan Valley and Manitoba Land Company a certificate of stock to the amount of $50,000 signed in blank and handed to him for his share in putting the deal through.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not think that a charge of that kind can be made against a member of this House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would have very much preferred to have made the remark in the presence of the gentleman I specially refer to.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman would not be at liberty to make it in the absence of the gentleman referred to. He can make an accusation against a gentleman and have it tried out, but he cannot make such a remark in the way he suggests.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the language which he has used is quite permissible. He says that it has been said. We often hear what is current rumour quoted in this House.

Mr. FIELDING. No, I dissent from that

Mr. SPROULE. I think he is quite within the rules in using the language he has used.

Mr. FIELDING. I must dissent from the view of my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) that we can justify a statement by the remark 'it is said.' There is no justification for anything of the kind.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, rumour is quoted very often in the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Perhaps it would meet the views of the hon. Minister of Finance if I would say that it is common report among the people.

Mr. SPEAKER. A charge of that kind cannot be made against a member of the House. It will have to be withdrawn. Unless it is made in the regular course prescribed by parliament.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I suppose it is possible for me to withdraw the words without withdrawing the meaning?

Mr. SPEAKER. No, the hon. member must withdraw entirely because a charge of that kind is unparliamentary.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I bow to the ruling of the chair. However, that only applies to a gentleman who has the honour of having a seat in this House?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. At the same time that these charges were current in regard to the hon. gentleman I spoke of there were other charges made, they were made so late as last summer on the public platform in Saskatchewan and they were made by one of the late directors of the company to the effect that the man I now speak of, whose name I have no object in concealing—his name is Walter Scott—when he was a member of this House, accepted, for his efforts on behalf of putting that Bill through, a certificate of stock of the Saskatchewan Valley and Manitoba Land Company signed in blank to the extent of $10,000. That is common report. It was said on every public platform in Saskatchewan that I had the felicity to be on. It was denied, it is true by the Hon. Walter Scott, but he took very good care never to deny that accusation when made by the man that I have mentioned. I repeat, it was common report. I think that possibly every minister in this House knew the report. But, I can say more than that. I know the man who handed the stock to Walter Scott, and I saw all the evidence in the matter. This government, through its Finance Minister, says that is good business. The Finance Minister says it is good business to give land belonging to the people to American speculators for $1 an acre, and whatever perquisites can be got from them on the side. He says it is good business to let these American speculators come into Canada, exploit the country and sell to the poor farmer, for from $5 to $15 an acre, land which they are able to get for $1 an acre. Then, this hon. gentleman goes around the country saying: the land for the people, not the speculators, is our motto. I would point out further to hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, and I would bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance, that for years and years the Manitoba government had a claim upon what is called the Manitoba and North Western Railway lands lying between Lake Manitoba and Lake Winnipeg. They were to get every odd numbered section in every odd numbered township in every odd numbered range until they got the full complement of 250,000 acres. For years and years the Manitoba government applied to get that land so that they could do something with it, so that it would be an available asset, but they could not get one acre of it surveyed and they could not get any right to it until it was surveyed. Finally, the Canadian Northern people—I do not know whether they called themselves the Canadian Northern Railway Company or Mackenzie & Mann, or under what name they operated—came to the Manitoba government and said: We will give you $400,000 cash for your claim to that land which you cannot get. They simply had to sell their equity to Mackenzie & Mann. Mackenzie & Mann came down to this government, and within a few months this government handed over to them, in lieu of the land which is very poor, for the most part, being covered with water, scrub and stone though there are some townships of first class land admixed through it, the best land that Mackenzie & Mann could select out in Saskatchewan. Yet, my hon. friend says : The land for the people. Who are the people ? In that case the people were Mann & Mackenzie. The hon. gentleman says that their policy is not to give land to the railway companies, that their policy is to keep the land for the settler. Is he not aware that his own government gave 20 square miles for every mile of road constructed by the Canadian Northern Railway Company from Erwood to the Pas Mission amounting to over a million acres? Instead of giving them wild land there of comparatively little value, they gave Mann & Mackenzie the same right in that case as they did in the other to pick out their land in Saskatchewan. Yet the hon. gentleman says: 'The land for the settler.'

Frequent reference has been made to the land grant given to the Canadian Pacific Railway by the Conservative government, and at this late hour I shall not enter into a lengthy discussion of that question. There has been a great deal said about the fact that the Conservative government did a great deal for the Canadian Pacific Railway and no one can deny that it gave that railway company a tremendous land grant. But in those days the land was worth comparatively nothing and had not the Canadian Pacific Railway built into that western country the land never would have been worth anything. A few years before the Canadian Pacific Railway went into Winnipeg you could have bought the whole town site for $5,000, but to-day it is worth millions and millions. It was the advent of the Canadian Pacific Railway into that country that made the land worth anything whatever. And, Sir, speaking of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I am reminded of the question brought up by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) in connection with the permission given that company by the government recently to increase their borrowing powers. In that regard let me say that the opinion voiced by the hon. member (Mr. Maclean) and by the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. McIntyre) and by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turiff) is the opinion held by 99 per cent of the people of the west. The Minister of Justice told us that the contract made between the government and the Canadian Pacific Railway was vastly in favour of the railway company and against the people, but he said: 'I hold that a contract is a sacred thing and so long as its true intent and meaning is lived up to it cannot be infringed upon. 'Well, I believe that no sane man who was in this House in 1881 when that contract was made, believed anything else than that the exemption clause was to expire in twenty years from the date of the contract and 'Hansard' shows that every member of parliament at that date believed that such was the true intent and meaning of the contract, outside perhaps of lawyers' quibbles. That being so, this government was remiss in its duty to the people when on the various occasions that the Canadian Pacific Railway came asking for favours it did not say to the Canadian Pacific Railway : 'This is the true intent and meaning of your contract; we want you to abrogate that exemption even though you have perhaps a legal right to it; you are asking something from us now and we will not give it to you unless you show the people of the west that their interest is your interest, and that you will not shelter yourselves behind a legal quibble with regard to this contract.' The government did not do that, and the government was remiss in its duty. As my hon. friend from Strathcona well said: 'How would any man in the east like if he were compelled not only to pay his own taxes, but to pay the taxes of his neighbour,' and that is absolutely the condition in every settlement in the west where Canadian Pacific Railway lands are located in any quantity. The Canadian Pacific Railway refuses to pay taxes, it refuses to do any road work, its land grows in value from day to day through the toil of the poor farmers in the neighbourhood, and as guardians of the public interest the government was more than remiss in its duty to those people that it did not insist on a quid pro quo from the Canadian Pacific Railway when it came seeking favours. Now. Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to another matter, and I am going to refer to it largely because, like every Scotchman, I hate to be dared to do or not to do anything. The hon. gentleman from Regina (Mr. Martin) speaking with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific loan, said there was no member from the west who dare oppose it. Well, were he here to-night I would let him know that I dare oppose it and I will tell him why. The primary reason is that the Grand Trunk Pacific has not lived up to its contract with the government, and to prove that I will quote from the remarks of the supporters of the government when the contract was under discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the question is still on the Order Paper for the second reading of the Bill to authorize a loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. There is great latitude allowed in the budget debate, but it is not permitted to discuss a question which is still on the Order Paper.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I bow to your decision, Sir, but I had to tell your deputy on one occasion that what was flesh for one ought to be flesh for another; and so far, other members who have taken part in this debate have been allowed to refer to this subject. However, I do not wish to insist against your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would not like the hon. member to think that I am unjust to him.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not think that at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FIELDING. There have been various reference to the Grand Trunk project during the debate, but I do not think any hon. gentleman has discussed the loan.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is clearly in order that my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) should point out in this debate that the Grand Trunk Pacific have not carried out their contract, which is a different thing altogether from discussing the loan.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will have much pleasure in leaving the loan alone for the present, and I only wish that you would rule that the government also should leave it alone. I was going to point out that the hon. member for Brandon said :

> We make a clear-cut proposition embodied in a contract signed and sealed with a reputable corporation of great resources which is going ahead with this work as rapidly as possible.

In his opinion the Grand Trunk Pacific Company was a reputable corporation of great resources. The hon. Minister of Finance, if I may quote him, referring to the Grand Trunk corporation, said:

> We have not been content that they should stand behind it. We have required, and they have readily consented, that they shall be in it and of it and form the whole thing.

I want to point out that they are very much in it—that they need $5,000,000 in their own business to pay themselves. That is why they are in it. They are looked upon as a company of great resources, and because they are in it and of it and form the whole thing, therefore Canada should respond to their call when they do call. I would point out to those gentlemen who think so highly of the resources of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, this fact, that these people, who are in it and of it and the whole thing, owe Canada, and have owed Canada for years, $50,000,000, with interest, and Canada cannot get a cent; and still we are asked to bank for these people. I think perhaps the fact that they owe that $50,000,000, with interest, has something to do with their trouble in financing for themselves. My opinion of the trouble with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and their failure to carry out their contract with the people of this country, is this. It was pointed out by the First Minister, by his aides and his general help, that this was a colonization road—that when it got into the western country it was going to open up new country. What has it done in that respect? In the province of Manitoba you can stand anywhere on the Grand Trunk Pacific and throw a stone on to either of the old roads, the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Canadian Northern. Is that carrying out the promise made to the people by the government on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific? That to my mind is breaking the contract; and many hundreds of farmers, all through that western country are in need of railways to open up the particular districts in which they live. I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) make the remark that in his riding the Grand Trunk Pacific paralleled another road for over eighty miles. Is that making a colonization road to open up a new country and benefit the farmers ?

Mr. KNOWLES. Will the hon. gentleman kindly give us the date when the hon. member for Assiniboia made that statement?—because the Grand Trunk Pacific does not go into his riding at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was perhaps wrong in quoting the hon. member for Assiniboia just in the way I did. To correct myself and to put myself absolutely in the right, I may say that his argument was this, that it ought to have come through his riding, and instead of doing so it had paralleled another road within a stone's throw. My own opinion with regard to this Grand Trunk Pacific project is this, that the construction company behind it, call it what you will, has made up its mind that it is going to make its rake-off now out of Canada. Everything it sells to Canada, from town sites down to ties, is sold at from ten down to three prices over proper values. They are going to make all they can out of Canada, and when they have built a road which will have cost so much that it will be almost impossible to operate it at a profit, they will hand it back to Canada and say: 'Here is your road, run it yourself.' For example, I will instance the little matter of ties, millions of which are used. In the season before last ties were made and laid down on the right of way of the Transcontinental Railway by the contractors, who made money doing it, at from 21 to 28 cents each, and Canada pays for those same ties in the neighbourhood of 60 cents each. Nobody in this House can refute that. Perhaps in a few isolated cases, when some party heeler required a long price, a little more was paid; but the great bulk of the ties on the Transcontinental Railway were laid down on the right of way at the prices I have stated.

Mr. FIELDING. On what section of the road ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. On the section eastward from Fort William—the eastern division.

Another matter of policy of the government that I would like to take a little cognizance of is the matter of deferred elections. I have had some personal knowledge of this matter, both on one side and the other, and if any man in this House is an authority on the subject I think I am. I had a deferred election in 1892 over practically the same territory that I now represent in this House. In 1896 I had the same experience. In 1899 I did not happen to be there, and a friend of the same stripe of politics as myself had the experience. In 1904 I had the same experience over the same territory, but for the federal house. On that occasion there was more time between the date of the issue of the writ and the date of the election than there was in the last election, when we did not have a deferred election. The reason why we did not have a deferred election this time was perhaps this, that the best thinking Liberals in Dauphin constituency had got tired of deferred elections; they had got tired of being disfranchised, and they told the gentleman who was representing the Liberal interest that if he held a deferred election he could not count on their support.

That was perhaps one reason. Another was that I had the pleasure of travelling with the returning officer a few days before, when he had to make known whether there was to be a deferred election or not. The conversation turned on that possibility, and I advised him, as a friend, having heard the rumour, that if he did not want to take a prominent part in a hanging bee, he had better not have a deferred election. I mention this to show the feeling of the people in that country on that point. Neither Conservatives or Liberals out there want deferred elections. We want the use of our franchise and are prepared to use it in the proper way. In 1899, another gentleman had the pleasure of contesting a deferred election. On that occasion it was a provincial election and this man, who was a prominent worker for the Liberals in Winnipeg, went out on a specia train. I hope my hon. friend from Rainy River, (Mr. Conmee) will not get angry with me for speaking of special trains. On that train he had 50 or 60 men to whom he paid $2 a day and provided them with all the whisky they wanted besides what they required to eat. He took them up—I had the story from himself—into a district where there were no actual settlers, and voted them time and again until he piled up 400 of a majority for the government candidate. His employers were gentlemen known to both sides, and if any one is anxious for the names I shall be pleased to whisper them to him. I can assure you that if the Liberal candidate at that time were here, he would not want to hear the names. That is the great danger in deferred elections. The government have the leverage by running all the party heelers into the particular districts, even if there be an election held and it does not go by acclamation, and in this way they can smother the voice of the people. I would be in favour of this House setting the example of legislation in such a way as to prevent the holding of deferred elections, which they could easily do. In Manitoba there are certain districts in which it has become the fashion to hold deferred elections. That happened in my own case in the last provincial election. Although I tried personally in every way possible to obviate the necessity, still for certain reasons, owing to the state of the law on elections, it was not possible to get time enough to hold the contest on the same day as the others. Perhaps while that was not an unmixed benefit to my opponent, because I believe it saved him expenses and his deposit of $200 as the seat was given to me by acclamation, this government should set an example in that particular matter to the provinces, and I feel sure that if it did, the provinces would have no reason in the world for not following suit.

Another matter to which I wish to bring your attention is something which occurs on account of deferred elections. That is explained in a letter, of which I shall give a paraphrase to the House. I do not wish to read the letter itself, because I do not intend to lay it on the table, but I shall give the exact meaning. The letter was to the following effect:

> I write to ask if you will not come down and use your influence to call Glen off. He is very stubborn, and no one here can do anything with him.

This was written in 1904, before the election, and it was written to a gentleman who had been actively concerned in political interests with the writer or his close friend. The writer went on to say:

> In any case, I think we can beat him, but you know you never can tell what these damned Grits will do.

This was written by a Liberal candidate, and it will not surprise you to learn that I have no wish to endorse his language, having been brought up in the Presbyterian church myself. But I often wonder who were the gentlemen who were stigmatised by that unhappy epithet. Did he have in his mind, I wonder, the right hon. the Prime Minister or any of his cabinet, or the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton)? Or did he just mean the honest and decent Liberal electors? I think perhaps that is really what he meant. Being a turncoat Tory himself, having been a Tory for years, so long as the flesh-pots were in charge of the Conservative party, and having changed his politics in 1896 because the flesh-pots still had attractions for him, possibly I am right when I say it was the honest Liberal electorate he was referring to. But if there were no deferred elections, a letter such as that would be impossible.

I just want to say a word with regard to my hon. friend who is asleep here, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). Knowing him as I do, I know that anything I say will not be offensive to him. When he spoke yesterday I listened to him attentively, and do you know the thought that flashed across my mind was this : 'Here is another maverick.' Perhaps you do not know what a maverick is. It is an unbranded steer running on the range, owned by nobody and subject to be caught at any time and branded, and the ownership would then be in the proprietor of the brand. My hon. friend was wandering around talking free trade and imagining he was talking for those gentlemen over there. His speech was all right if he had only brought it to a logical conclusion. He talked free trade, and then he talked of what the government had done for free trade, and admitted that the Conservatives had done more to reduce the tariff really than had those so-called free traders. And he went on to speak of inconsistency in politics. When he considers those two facts, and the conclusion he came to in regard to the lowering of the tariff being greater on this side than on that, there is only one thing for him to do, and that is to rub off the hair-brand he got since he came down here and fall in line with the people he knows are honest. He knows that on that side they are not honest because on one particular occasion they were so dishonest that he went out and would not vote for them. He felt, as I say, lost. He is a free trader; there is no free trade in Canada.

Mr. M. CLARK. Can the hon. member recall a single phrase in which I mentioned free trade?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not referring to what he specifically mentioned in the way of free trade because I realize that since he came down to this House there are some things which he must not mention in a Liberal camp. But the hon. gentleman cannot deny that he is one of the most ardent free traders in Canada. On this side of the House, Sir, we call a spade a spade, we believe in protection and call it protection. The other people believe in protection but they call it by any name under the sun that they think will hood-wink the people. I believe in protection and I believe in this party because they enunciate clearly and honestly what their policy is in that regard and they are willing always to stand and fall by it.

I listened to the splendid logical argument laid before this House on the matter of imperial defence or aid to imperial defence delivered by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). It was found fault with by the hon. gentleman who leads the House. Why? Because it was not concrete. That is the fault he found with it and what did he give us? He gave us verbiage, which means nothing. Why, Sir, it is time for this House to realize that the whole world is looking to Canada in this particular matter. I say the whole world and I mean it. Why these little Japanese with their civilization 4,000 years older than ours in some matters of esthetics and the arts, have come to realize in the last few years that painting and ornamental work of that kind does not bring them anything, they have become ambitious to take a position in the world and have taken a position by defeating great Russia. The fact that they defeated Russia has stimulated them to further aspirations, there is no doubt about that, they are looking around for fresh worlds to conquer, they are watching to see what Canada is going to do, when the motherland is calling. Then there is Russia, she is watching as we all know, to see if anything will befall the navy of Great Britain. If anything occurs to the navy of Great Britain, I am of the opinion that the next day Russia will be marching across the borders into northern India. Germany is watching to see what Canada will do. Why? Because she has an idea that if she can only beat England on the sea she has the supremacy of the world. She is watching to see if Great Britain has her colonies at her back, she is watching to see whether the Germans, who have come out here by thousands, are ready to support loyally the country of their choice and their adoption. France is watching for the same reason that all the minor powers in Europe are watching, watching on account of her commerce for one reason, because she knows that the naval power of Great Britain has stood for the safe commerce of the world, has stood for the safe commerce of all the smaller countries, knows that the navy of Great Britain has not been maintained and brought to its present standard because Great Britain desired to go out to conquer new worlds, but simply because Great Britain believed that as long as she held the supremacy of the seas, the commerce of all kinds from the smallest nation to the greatest nation was safe. France is looking to this colony to see what it will do. France does not forget that on this side of the Atlantic are the descendants of Frenchmen in their thousands, she looks to them to see whether the old French chivalry, the loyalty to the flag which protects them, is dead in the descendants of the men who came over from beauteous France. She is looking to see if chivalry died in this country when fell Montcalm.

I think further that we ought to remember that in Great Britain there are hundreds of thousands, nay millions of people who for all those decades have been paying ' with a smile ' for the protection of Canada as well as other colonies, they have been paying their taxes, and it has been hard to pay them, with a smile, because they knew it was Great Britain's colony, it was the daughter of the great mother, whom they were helping to protect. Those people are looking to us to see whether we are going to respond to the call, if we are not going to show that we were ready to help our brothers across the sea in bearing the burden they have to bear on our account. All through Canada the people have been looking to see if anything definite is going to be done. Every board of trade from the Atlantic to the Pacific has been passing resolutions to that end, to have Canada show herself, show her hand, show her willingness to come out in the open and say: We are with the mother country. Send the message to Great Britain. 'You can call on us for what you want and we are behind you.'

I was more than surprised to hear the hon. gentleman from Nanaimo (Mr. R. Smith) speak in such a cold-blooded way about gathering up gear and getting rich. No matter how rich we got, if anything should happen to the navy of Great Britain, where are we at with all our richness? The hon. gentleman who represents in this House the hardy men of the Yukon came here and made a cold-blooded speech on this subject. Knowing the people of the north country as I do, I declare that his sentiments as expressed in this House are not the sentiments of the men who have gone into that north country and taken their lives in their hands from day to day. I hope the First Minister will reconsider his reply of two or three days ago with regard to aid in the matter of Dreadnoughts. I hope he will consider that even although he cannot trust me to back him up in many of the things he does, there is one thing in which I and every Conservative would support him, loyally and enthusiastically, that is, if he would come to this House and give us a part in saying what we will do for the mother country and for the empire. Had he been here I would have taken pleasure in telling him that it is my opinion that this is the hour and he is the man, and all Canada is looking to him.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I suppose we continue this debate on Monday?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, April 26, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

YUKON ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 156) to amend the Yukon Act, Revised Statutes, 1906, chapter 63. He said: The object of this Bill is simply to permit a member of the bar of the Yukon territory to be appointed as a judge in the territorial court, in case there may be any vacancy.

Motion agreed, and Bill read the first time.

HECATE STRAIT.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I desire to ask the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) whether his attention has been directed to a statement in the press, that the government of the United States have repeatedly applied to this government for a statement of its position with regard to Hecate strait, British Columbia. I have observed it in several journals lately. If the right hon. gentleman will refer to the Toronto 'Globe' for April 23, he will see that to which I allude. I will read only a portion which is material to my inquiry.

It was said by the department——

That is, the State Department of the United States.

—at that time that this government had on three occasions within the last few years asked the British ambassador at Washington to obtain from his government a definition of the status of Hecate Strait. No reply was ever received by the State Department.

Within the past three or four weeks, that statement has appeared in the press of the country on several occasions—that is, that the United States government have asked for a reply on at least three occasions from the British ambassador—and I assume that the British ambassador would consult with this government—and has been unable up to the present time to obtain any reply whatever. The matter is of some interest to British Columbia, as I understand from members from that province, therefore I thought it well to bring it to the attention of the Prime Minister.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). There is some correspondence going on at this moment on this subject, but what is the nature of it I am unable to state now.

DISALLOWANCE OF ACT OF THE ONTARIO LEGISLATURE.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Saturday's issue of the Canada 'Gazette,' contains a statement, I understand, of disallowance of an Act of the Ontario legislature. Would the premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) have any objection to bring down the order in council?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Not at all.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY. PUSHER GRADES.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). May I ask the Minister of Railways and Canals, (Mr. Graham) whether he would be good enough, when the debate comes up on the Grand Trunk Pacific Loan Bill, to give me information with regard to the pusher grades on the National Transcontinental Railway between Quebec and Moncton? In speaking on this subject, as the hon. gentleman will remember, I allowed to the National Transcontinental Railway a saving, I think, of twenty-nine miles over the Intercolonial Railway between these two points. It has been represented to me that I rather understated the case from my point of view, that although there had been this saving in distance, it is accomplished only by means of heavier grades, and that for heavy traffic, certain portions of the road will have to be operated by what are called 'pushers.' It is in connection with that that I would like the hon. gentleman to give the information when the subject comes up again.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals). I will get it.

LETTERS PATENT OF F. M. GREY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 132) respecting certain letters patent of Franklin Montgomery Grey.—Mr. Rankin.

On section 1,

Mr. LENNOX. What has the Minister of Agriculture to say with reference to this Bill?

Mr. FISHER. This seems to be one of the ordinary Bills for the extension of a patent which has lapsed through negligence.

Mr. LENNOX. How long is the lapse?

Mr. FISHER. I cannot say. The gentleman in charge of the Bill or the chairman of the Private Bills Committee may be able to.

Mr. LENNOX. We should know something about it. The other night we had a Bill where the lapse has extended three years and a satisfactory explanation was forthcoming. There may be a satisfactory explanation of this Bill or there may not.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand that this patent lapsed through a misapprehension on the part of the patentee. After getting his patent some six years ago he had a reissue, there having been some changes or improvements; and thinking his six years dated from the reissue he did not apply for the patent in time. The patent thus lapsed through a misunderstanding.

Mr. FISHER. I have no objection to it going through.

Mr. LENNOX. Is that a sufficient excuse in the estimation of the minister?

Mr. FISHER. I have only to say, as I have said before to the committee, that I accept the report of the Private Bills Committee. The Private Bills Committee look into the details of the reasons for each of these Bills. I have not myself examined them and consequently I can only accept the report of the Private Bills Committee.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do think that when Bills involving the renewal of a patent that has lapsed come before the attention of the Private Bills Committee, they should be submitted to the department which has charge of such matters, and that the department should have some supervision over these applications. Otherwise we may eventually drift into this position that whenever negligence of the slightest character can be alleged the person whose patent has lapsed can come to parliament and have it renewed. I have urged before when these matters have come to the attention of the Committee of the Whole House that some fixed principle should be adopted according to which these patents should be renewed or not renewed as the case may be. I do not think it will do to continue the system of letting any negligence, however slight, or any circumstance, however trivial, be regarded as sufficient. It seems to me that if no principle has yet been laid down (and I am not aware of any), it is about time that some principle should be adopted so that persons who obtain patents and permit them to lapse will know exactly what they will have to face when they come here asking for legislation.

Mr. FISHER. The other night, when I presume the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) was not present, we had a case of this kind, and I then said that I have personally always objected to the renewal of these patents. At the same time the Private Bills Committee and parliament for ten years back have been accepting this principle of the renewal of patents which have lapsed in this way. The Private Bills Committee is charged with the examination of details in each particular case. The deputy commissioner of patents always attends that committee and looks into the matter on the part of the department. I am not a member of the committee and so am not in the habit of attending its meetings. The deputy commissioner always reports to me if there is anything in connection with a Bill contrary to the workings of the department. When he has not so reported I have taken it for granted that the Private Bills Committee have acted in accordance with these principles, and have satisfied themselves with regard to the details. If the deputy commissioner reports to me that there is anything in connection with the Bill contrary to the practice of the department, I inform myself in regard to the Bill and am prepared to discuss it when the report of the Private Bills Committee comes before the House.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. I had occasion lately to look into this question as to the practice and the law with regard to patents in Canada, more particularly in reference to this question of the renewal of patents where through some inadvertence on the part of their owners the conditions of the Patent Act have not been complied with, and I submit to the minister that the present position of the law in this respect is very unsatisfactory. I do not think a committee of this House is a proper tribunal to inquire into these questions. I think the practice adopted in England under the Act of 1907 is much better. By that Act, under carefully drawn legislation, powers are conferred on the commissioner of patents to make full inquiries as to the circumstances of alleged inadvertence after due notice not only to those who might be affected directly or might have filed caveats, but also to the public generally through advertisements. As it is, quite frequently, we find, in reference to these Bills, that the patentees who have not complied with the provisions of the law with regard to the manufacture of their articles within the time provided by the statute are also in default with regard to the rules and, upon some specious plea as to the carelessness of their clerk, or counsel, or something of that kind, they impose upon the good nature of the committee, or perhaps the committee has not had its attention fully called by the private interests that are affected, as to the full effect of the Bill submitted, and the renewal goes through. We are reaching a stage in Canada where we should have more attention paid to the matter of our patents. The course adopted by the imperial parliament of stringently enforcing the law with regard to the manufacturing clause is one which has created a great deal of satisfaction in that country and has obtained the approval of business men in this country as well. I think that the minister ought to take the power which has been given to the commissioner of patents in England to make an inquiry into all the circumstances to ascertain whether there has been any inadvertence or overlooking of the conditions in reference to the payment of the fees or otherwise. That power is one which should be exercised by the commissioner after full investigation and not one which should be left to a committee of this House.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not know that I can quite agree with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Macdonald) as to increasing the quantity of machinery. I think is is more a matter of getting the machinery we have at work.

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not propose to increase the machinery, but I suppose that the provisions of the law which exist in England should be applied in this country.

Mr. LENNOX. I understand that the hon. gentleman proposed that the people who had charge of this matter should be given a power they do not possess at the present time. I submit to the minister that there is a duty cast upon him, not merely of bringing this kind of negative evidence before the committee from time to time that he has not heard of any objection, but as the Minister cannot probably attend the meetings of the committee and has to send a deputy or subordinate to watch the interests of the public, it is absolutely necessary for the minister to see to it that from time to time he has a report of the actual circumstances attending the proposed renewal and that he should inquire into these circumstances and see if they are such as commend themselves to his judgement, so that he can come before this committee and tell it that his opinion is that the renewal should or should not be sanctioned by this committee. It is not sufficient to my mind, for the minister to come before us and plead that he has heard no objection, non constat, the deputy may have forgotten all about it, or he may have very little judgment in regard to the matter. But, we are getting away from the principle of responsible government when the Minister does not take this matter in hand and gradually formulate a rule which shall guide him in all cases, so that, as each case arises, he will have precedents to go by or analogies to consult and be able to say that it is right that this should be granted or that it should not be granted. The minister has said that he is opposed to this indiscriminate renewal, but it goes on all the same. We have no knowledge of whether this patent has been put into actual use or not, whether the parties have been exercising their rights or not, and we have just this mistake of law put forward as a reason why the renewal was not obtained at the proper time. Does the minister think that a mistake of law is a proper ground upon which a renewal should be granted? It is very doubtful whether such a reason should be accepted. I do not think a private Bills committee is the best possible tribunal to decide a question of that kind. I think the minister should have a policy upon the matter. He has legal officers in his department and he should be prepared to say that he has come to the conclusion that he should or should not consent to a renewal of the patent on the mere excuse that the patentee has misunderstood the law. Generally speaking, courts of justice have found that there is a no more dangerous kind of excuse than the excuse of misunderstanding the law. Every man is bound to know the law. It is pretty hard to know it sometimes, I admit, but that is the principle we adopt in the courts of justice. In this case the minister does not take any responsibility in regard to it, and on the ground of misunderstanding what the law was the plea is put forward that the party allowed his time to lapse. I do not want to advance any unnecessary criticism of the minister, but I think from this time on, at all events, assuming that this government is going to control the affairs of Canada for a little while longer, we ought to have the minister take the responsibility of his position in connection with these matters and see that in each case he has some knowledge of the circumstances attending it before it comes before the committee and be able to advise the committee as to what is the proper course to pursue.

Mr. ETHIER. I may say as chairman of the Private Bills Committee, in answer to the question asked by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), that the committee, for nearly ten years has pursued its present policy in regard to the revival of expired patents. Where good grounds were presented a failure to comply with the law for one year has not been regarded as a bar to the renewal of the patent. This principle has been applied to the special case now before us. This company had their patent for six years ; less than one year has been allowed to elapse since the time at which the patent should be renewed. Good grounds have been advanced for the neglect to renew the patent. They gave good reasons why the licensee did not renew his patent in time and they showed that the right which had been acquired by other parties had in the meantime been protected. Three applications came before the committee this year in regard to which it was obvious that there had been negligence on the part of the patentee in failing to renew his patent and they were refused. But in the case of Montgomery Grey, the first six year period during which the license was in force expired on October 28, 1908. The patent is granted for eighteen years and it is necessary for the licensee to renew his patent every six years. By an inadvertence the lawyer of this patentee Montgomery Grey, overlooked the 28th of October which was the last day for renewing the patent for the next six years. These parties have taken steps to protect the acquired rights of other parties. The commissioner of patents has always attended the meetings of the Private Bills Committee when Bills relating to patents have come before that committee. But, in answer to the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), I would say that I think the law should be amended. As it is now, the only way to protect the licensee who may have good grounds to ask for a renewal of his patent is to come before the House and obtain it by means of a private Bill. I think the general law with regard to patents should be amended giving the necessary powers to the commissioner to inquire into these cases. This would save a great deal of trouble, and the department and the government could attend to these cases in a more careful and satisfactory manner than is at present possible.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). There are two matters of general interest, apart from this Bill, which have been brought up, and I would like to say a word or two upon them. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has suggested that the power of renewing expired or lapsed patents should be vested in the commissioner of patents and that private Bills should not necessarily be brought before parliament for that purpose. I may say to my hon. friend—I am not sure whether he was in the House at the time or not—that some years ago, when I was making several amendments to the Patent Act, that point was thoroughly discussed, and parliament objected to divesting itself of the power to deal with these lapsed patents and objected to giving that power to the commissioner of patents. I am not anxious to have that power. I would be willing to assume it if parliament desired to impose it upon the department, but I do not desire it at all and I would much prefer that it should not be imposed upon me, because it would involve the exercise of judicial functions of the greatest importance and in some cases it would involve millions of dollars of value in the reinstatement of patents. If that had been the intention of parliament when it amended the Patent Act I would have accepted the responsibility, but parliament decided that should not be done.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. Two years ago that principle was adopted in England.

Mr. FISHER. When this parliament disposed of the matter in 1900 that regulation had not been passed by the English parliament. It is possible that if it had been the parliament of Canada might have come to a different decision from that which it did. As to a rule in dealing with the renewal of these patents, shortly after I became Minister of Agriculture I discussed the question before the Private Bills Committee and the committee then laid down the rule that where the omission of the payment of fees appeared to be due to inadvertence or negligence on the part of the attorney rather than on the part of the owner of the patent, the patent might be renewed, provided always that the term during which the patent had lapsed was not too long. I do not think any definite rule as to the length of time was laid down, but the practice has been one year. In this case the patent was taken out on the 28th of October, 1902, and the fees were paid for six years which lapsed on the 28th of October, 1908, only a few months ago. That date passed probably through the inadvertence of the attorney, and the Private Bills Committee having examined the matter reported to this House in favour of the Bill. There does not seem to be anything contrary to the practice of parliament in that, and under the curcumstances I feel justified in supporting the recommendation of the Private Bills Committee. In most cases the recommendation of the Private Bills Committee has been accepted by parliament, but a good many cases no doubt have occurred in which the committee have rejected applications of this kind. The rights which have accrued during the lapsed period of the patent have always been protected by a clause similar to that which appears at the end of this Bill. I give this explanation because the impression has been conveyed that the department has been negligent of its duty in dealing with these patent bills. That is not a fair imputation on the department. I do not think it is necessary, as suggested by the hon. member for Simcoe, that a special report should be presented to parliament from the Deputy Commissioner of Patents in connection with each of these Bills; but I am quite ready to follow any expression of opinion by the House in that matter.

Mr. CARVELL. Notwithstanding the clear statement of the case made by the minister, I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend (Mr. E. M. Macdonald) that such matters as this should be dealt with by the commissioner of patents rather than by parliament. I am not a member of the Private Bills Committee, and therefore do not know what evidence may have been given as to whether this patent as a matter of law did or did not expire on the 28th of October, 1908, but from a cursory reading of this Bill it would appear that the latter part of section 2 actually cures any defects which may have existed in this patent down to 1908. Under the Patent Act if a man fails to commence manufacture within two years from the granting of the patent his patent is void or if he has imported the patented article after one year after the granting of the patent it is also void or if he has refused the right to any person to manufacture under certain conditions prescribed by the Act, his patent is also void. I suspect that many of the Bills brought before this parliament for renewal of patents are brought because the patent has become void under the law and so that they may be renewed by a special Act, rather than because of any neglect to pay the fees. There is something very suspicious in this very Bill we are now considering. Section 2 provides that any person who has commenced the manufacture of this article since October, 1908, may continue to do so, but that exemption is not to extend to any person who, without the consent of the holder of the patent, has commenced to use, construct, or manufacture such invention before the expiry of the letters patent. It seems to me that this Bill would rehabilitate the patent and override certain provisions in the General Patent Act with regard to the rights of others. If a person commenced to manufacture before October 28, 1908, he would have a perfect right to do so under the Patent Act, but it seems to me that the latter part of this clause takes away from him the protection which the law gave him and under it the patentee would have a right to bring an action for infringement. I do not know enough of the particular conditions connected with this Bill to vote against it, but it seems to me there is a great deal in what the hon. member (Mr. Macdonald) says, that this matter should be dealt with by the department, and that the department should have positive proof that the patent has been kept alive, and that the patentee has complied with all the conditions of the Patent Act. I believe that the Commissioner of Patents and not a committee of this House should be the judge in such a case. I suggest that the minister take this matter into serious consideration and before another session introduce legislation making the law more clear than it is at present regarding these extensions of patents. I suspect that in this very case there is something wrong with the patent, and that we are curing the defect by the legislation we are passing to-day.

Mr. FISHER. I would say to my hon. friend who has drawn attention to the last clause of the last section, that these words have not generally appeared in the clause to which I referred as being usual in the Patent Acts, and I do not think they are necessary here to safeguard any person who has commenced the manufacture or the use of the article during the lapsed period, unless there is some such object in view as my hon. friend suggests. Although the deputy minister has not reported to me that there is anything objectionable in the Bill, I think perhaps it would be as well to let it stand until we look into this matter.

PORT HOOD BREAKWATER.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR asked:

1. Has the government spent any moneys during the last year, or are they now spending any moneys, on a breakwater at Port Hood, county of Inverness, Cape Breton?

2. If so, how much money has been spent in the last six years, respectively, on said breakwater?

3. What is the purpose of said breakwater?

4. What is the government engineer's original estimate for the full completion of this work?

5. What is the completion of the work now estimated to cost?

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes.

2. In 1903-4 . . . . . $ 2,968 85
1904-5 . . . . . 19,942 43
1905-6 . . . . . 9,999 91
1906-7 . . . . . 14,885 13
1907-8 . . . . . 14,999 37
1908-9 . . . . . 15,000 98

Total $77,796 67

3. To increase the area of safe anchorage in Port Hood harbour at present inadequate and to render the east or mainland side safe for landing and for the shipment of coal. The breakwater will also prevent the further movement of sand to the southward and westward and the consequent shoaling of the harbour.

4 and 5. Several estimates were given, varying from $165,000 to $482,000, and depending upon character and height of work. These plans, however, were not adopted, and the chief engineer recommended loose brush and stone work, the total estimated cost of which is $215,000.

36TH REGIMENT BAND.

Mr. BARR asked:

1. Has the band of the 36th Regiment been paid the $75 band allowance for 1908? If not, why not?

2. If paid, to whom, and when?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia):

1. Yes.

2. Cheque issued in favour of Captain G. F. Gabriel on 22nd January, 1909, forwarded to officer commanding the regiment, Lt.-Col. Wallace, under registered cover on same date.

Mr. BARR. When this question was put on the Order Paper the money was not paid. How is it payment was held back so long?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I am sorry I was not here to give the answer before.

CAPTAIN GABRIEL, 36TH REGIMENT.

Mr. BARR asked:

1. Has Captain Gabriel, commanding No. 7 Company of the 36th Regiment, been paid for recruiting in the year 1908? If so, how much was he paid?

2. If not paid for this service, why not?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia):

1. The allowance referred to is command pay and drill instruction which was paid to Captain Gabriel on April 14, 1909, the amount of same being $39.

2. Answered by reply to No. 1.

ST. POLYCARPE POST OFFICE.

Mr. LORTIE asked:

1. What are the names of the persons who laid complaints against the administration and officials of the post office in the village of St. Polycarpe?

2. In what year were the complaints first made; and by whom?

3. Is it the present intention of the Postmaster General to have that post office changed to other quarters?

4. If so, who has been recommended for the postmastership of the village of St. Polycarpe; and by whom has he been recommended?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). Recently representations were made to the Postmaster General as to unsatisfactory management of the St. Polycarpe post office, with the result that an inspector was instructed to make a report, but his report has not yet reached the department, and in the absence of which it is not possible to state what action the department may require to take.

36th REGIMENT—STORAGE OF ARMS.

Mr. BARR asked:

1. Has the rent for storage of the arms of Company No. 7 of the 36th Regiment been paid for the years 1907 and 1908? If not, why not?

2. If paid, how much, when paid, and to whom?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia):

1. The Militia Department does not pay the rent for storage of arms, but the allowances authorized by regulations for care of arms, &c., have been paid as follows :

Period.	Amount.	Less deficiencies.	Net payment.	Date of payment.	Paid to.
Nine months ending March 31, 1907	37 50	3 30	34 20	Feb. 16, '08	Capt. G. F. Gabriel.
Two years from April 1, 1907 to to March 31, 1909	100 00	2 25	97 75	April 14, '09	" "

2. Answered by reply to No. 1.

INLAND REVENUE—BELLEVILLE AND CORBYVILLE.

Mr. PORTER asked:

1. Have any changes, retirements, removals or superannuations been made in the officials of Inland Revenue Department at Belleville and Corbyville? If so, what, and for what reasons?

2. Who is deputy collector at these ports? When was he appointed and at what salary?

3. What were the qualifications of the present deputy collector, so far as concerns previous service in the department, and was he required to pass any qualifying examination for his present or former position? If so, what?

4. Were there any officials of the department at those ports who were eligible to the position of deputy collector at those ports at the time of appointment or promotion of the present deputy collector? If so, whom? What is the length of their service, respectively, what is their respective salaries, and why was not some one of these promoted?

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN (Minister of Inland Revenue):

1. Yes. C. W. Pole, deputy collector of inland revenue (Class 'A') Belleville, was superannuated—age and failing health.

2. W. J. Cook—1st February, 1909—$1,500. Length of service, two years and one month.

3. Passed Civil Service qualifying examination in 1907 and under the provisions of the Civil Service Act no examination is necessary for the position of deputy collector of inland revenue.

4. Yes. Wm. McCoy, special class exciseman, $1,400. Length of service 24 years and 9 months A. F. McCuaig, deputy collector of inland revenue (Class 'B') $1,000. Length of service 22 years and 6 months. A. C. McFee, 1st class excise officer, $1,200. Length of service 12 years and 8 months. W. J. Brown, 1st class excise officer, $1,200. Length of service 8 years and 8 months. H. R. Wilson, 2nd class excise officer $935. Length of service 4 years. F. W. Sprague, 3rd class excise officer, $600. Length of service 2 years and 29 days. J. E. Lally, 3rd class excise officer, $600. Length of service 2 years and 1 month.

SS. 'SCOTIA.'

Mr. CROSBY asked:

1. What are the existing terms of the contract with the ss. 'Scotia' plying between Halifax and ports east of Halifax?
2. What subsidy does she receive?
3. Has she been receiving her full yearly subsidy?
4. Did she receive the full proportional part for calling at Moshers river last year?
5. Did she call there every trip? If not, how many calls did she make?
6. If the terms of the contract call for her calling there every trip, why has she not fulfilled that part?

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. The terms of the contract are of very considerable length and can hardly be given in the form of a reply to a question.
2. $4.000 per annum.
3. Yes.
4. Yes.
5. No. 13 calls.
6. Terms of contract require calls at Moshers river in January and February only, only three calls were missed by reason of the boat being off route undergoing repairs. This is permitted under the contract.

SPRY BAY GOVERNMENT WHARF.

Mr. CROSBY asked:

1. What amount of money was spent on the government wharf at Spry bay in 1908?
2. How was it spent; and if by day's work, what number of men were employed, at what pay, and what time were they employed during the year 1908?

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works):

1. There was no work done during the calendar year of 1908; work was done, however, from 10th August to 26th September, 1907, and charged to account of fiscal year 1907-1908, to the amount of $269.42.
2. (a) Compensation for shore privileges, $100, and day's labour. (b) Five men. (c) Foreman, $2.50 per day; others $1.50 per day. (d) 10th August to 26th September as above.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN.

POST OFFICE DEPOSITS AND INTEREST.

Mr. MACDONELL asked:

Is the government crediting up in the pass-books of the depositors in the Post Office Savings Banks, the interest on their accounts, and to which they are entitled? If not, why not?

Hon. R. LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). Interest to 31st March, 1909, has been calculated on all depositors' accounts and has been made principal. This interest is being entered in depositors' pass-books as they are received for examination in accordance with the regulations.

FRENCH TREATY.

Mr. MACDONELL asked:

What is the present condition of affairs with regard to the commercial treaty with France, and what is the cause of the delay in reference to the matter?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). The treaty of 1907 was approved in due course by the parliament of Canada and also by the Chamber of Deputies of France, but when it reached the French Senate there was very considerable delay owing to the strong opposition among the French senators who claimed that the treaty was too favourable to Canada. After considerable delay and negotiation, a supplementary treaty was entered into, which has been laid before this House. That, as well as the original treaty, has been approved by the French Senate, but it requires yet to be approved by the Chamber of Deputies. We have delayed bringing forward a resolution to confirm the supplementary treaty because we desire to await the action of the French Chamber of Deputies. That body adjourned for several weeks, but I anticipate that at an early date the treaty will receive its approval, and at the same time steps will be taken to present to this parliament a measure for the approval of the new treaty.

POSTMASTER AT BLACK LAKE, QUEBEC.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR asked:

1. Have any complaints been made against the postmaster at Black Lake post office, in the province of Quebec?
2. Was an inquiry held by Mr. Larue, post office inspector? If so, has he made a report?
3. If a report has been made, will the Postmaster General lay the same on the table of the House?
4. Did the postmaster at said post office, Mr. Ouellette, present a petition to the Postmaster General since the inquiry by the post office inspector, praying that no change be made in the postmaster at Black Lake?

Hon. R. LEMIEUX (Postmaster General):

1. Yes.
2. Yes.

3. Yes, if papers are moved for in the ordinary way.
4. Yes.

POST OFFICE AND DOMINION GOVERNMENT SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. S. SHARPE asked:

1. Is the post office savings bank distinct from the Dominion government savings bank?
2. Wherein do they differ, and why are the accounts kept separate?
3. What are the total deposits in both accounts at the present time?
4. In regard to the expense connected with the management of the post office savings bank deposits, which was given in the return brought down March 23, 1909, as amounting to $72,885.57 for the year ending March 31, 1908, does this mean merely the cost of the officials at headquarters who have charge of the management of the fund, or is there included in that item a proportion of the expenses from all outlying points of collecting and transmitting the deposits to headquarters?

Hon. R. LEMIEUX (Postmaster General):

1. Yes.
2. There is no substantial difference. What are known as Dominion Government Savings Banks are the remains of an old system which began in some provinces prior to confederation. This system is being gradually abolished. Whenever vacancies occur in the management of Dominion Government Savings Banks through death, resignation or other cause, the business is transferred to the Post Office Department, it being the policy of the government that the whole savings system be managed by that department. Since the 1st June, 1888, thirty-two agencies of the Dominion Government Savings Bank have been abolished and the business transferred to the Post Office Department.
3. Post Office Savings Bank—28th February, 1909, $44,447,567.21. Dominion Government Savings Bank—31st March, 1909, $14,748,436.12.
4. The figures referred to include all salaries at head office, commissions to postmasters, and cost of printing and stationery.

WESTMORELAND COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

Mr. McALLISTER asked :

1. When was W. W. Wells appointed judge of the Westmoreland county court?
2. On what occasions, for what reasons and for what length of time has leave of absence been granted by the Department of Justice to W. W. Wells?
3. Has the government or the Department of Justice knowledge of W. W. Wells, judge of Westmoreland county court, being absent from the province without leave? If so, when?
4. What judges have acted for W. W. Wells, judge of the Westmoreland county court, when on leave of absence or when absent without leave?
5. Is there an application for leave of absence on file in the Department of Justice from W. W. Wells, judge of Westmoreland county court, at the present time? If so, for what length of time, and on what grounds is the application made?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice):

1. 21st October, 1893.
2. In 1894 for six months, ill health; in 1902, for 3 months, ill health; in 1903, for three weeks, ill health; in 1907, for six months, ill health; in 1908, one month, ill health; in 1909, for 5 weeks, ill health.
3. The department is aware that in 1906 the judge was, for a few weeks, absent without leave.
4. Judge Wedderburn of Hampton and Judge Forbes, of St. John.
5. No.

INTEREST ON TEMPORARY LOANS.

Mr. AMES—by Mr. Perley—asked:

1. What was the total amount paid by way of interest upon the temporary loans, amounting to $101,000,000, made during the last twelve and three-quarter years?
2. What was the total amount paid for the same on the amount of $136,500,000 for the previous corresponding period? (See unrevised 'Hansard,' 4786).

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance):

1. $1,698,006.91.
2. $1,717,648.08.

The periods for which the loans are made vary from time to time.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC—LABOURERS FROM SIBERIA.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR asked:

1. Has the government taken any steps to investigate the report that labourers from Siberia are being brought into Canada under contract to work on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway?
2. If so, by whom is the investigation being conducted, and have precautions been taken to prevent the entry of further consignments of these labourers?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Minister of Labour.) The Department of Labour has received no report as described by the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. D. Taylor) in this question. The only notice we have had of the matter is the mention that was made of it in the House.

CONVICT BILL MINER.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR asked:

1. Was a sum of money received by mail at the New Westminster penitentiary for the convict Bill Miner shortly before his escape?
2. If so, what was the nature and amount of the remittance, by whom was it sent, and in whose care was it addressed?

3. Was there already money on deposit to Miner's credit? If so, how much, and how was it received?

4. Is the possession of money supposed to be of any advantage to a life prisoner, in the way of providing him with luxuries or otherwise?

5. Was the receipt of any money reported to the department in connection with the investigation into the circumstances surrounding Miner's escape?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice):

1. Yes, on 28th March, 1907.

2. Postal order, for $100. Sent by J. C. Budd of Princeton, B.C. Received by Deputy Warden Bourke. Deposited in Bank of Montreal, New Westminster, in Savings Bank Account.

3. Yes, $49.10, and interest from the time it was deposited. From Miner when received into the penitentiary.

4. No.

5. Yes.

The following memo. appears on page 36 of the return made in compliance with an order of the House of Commons dated February 17, 1909.

New Westminster, September 6, 1907.

Memo for inspector Stewart, re convict Edwards (Bill Miner).

His effects consist of cash $149.10, a gold watch, chain and charm. The statement that he had $500 here is incorrect.

(Sgd.) G. W. DAWSON.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—QUESTION OF CLASSIFICATION.

Mr. LENNOX asked:

1. Has the government contemplated or decided that a reference should be had to determine differences as to classification and other matters between the Grand Trunk Pacific and the railway commission, which would probably be proceeded with the 1st of April instant? If so, has the reference been proceeded with, has it been concluded or what progress has been made, and what is the result?

2. If not, when will it be proceeded with, and what is the cause of delay ?

3. What are the terms of the reference, if any?

4. What matters were referred?

5. Will the minister bring down the formal instrument of reference?

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. The government has decided on a reference. The reference has not been proceeded with.

2. It will be proceeded with as soon as the chief engineer of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway is able to give the matter attention. The causes of delay are, that early in April the conditions were not favourable to an intelligent investigation on the ground, and latterly the chief engineer of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company has been absent in British Columbia and the Northwest on other business.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR.

3. The matters in dispute are left to the award of the chief engineer of the Transcontinental Railway Commission and of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and a third arbitrator to be chosen by them, Mr. Schreiber having been agreed upon by them and he having accepted the duty under the clause of the schedule attached to the Act of 1903, chapter 71.

4. No statement of the matters has been drawn up at present and placed before the arbitrators.

5. The minister has no objection to bring down the instrument of reference. It is as follows:

Ottawa, March 16, 1909.

Collingwood Schreiber, Esq.,
General consulting engineer to the government, Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—By clause 7 of the agreement between the government of Canada and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, dated July 29, 1903, being schedule to 3 Edward VII., chapter 71, in regard to the construction of the eastern division, it is provided that the work shall be done according to the specifications approved of by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and shall be subject to the joint supervision, inspection and acceptance of the chief engineeer appointed by the government and the chief engineer of the railway company, and in the event of differences as to the specifications, or in case the said engineers shall differ as to the work, the questions in dispute shall be determined by the said engineers and a third arbitrator to be chosen by them.

Some such differences having arisen as a result of objections filed by the company, we hereby beg to choose you as third arbitrator for the determination of the questions now in dispute, and on which we have failed to agree after visiting the work, and shall be pleased if you are agreeable to accept the office. In the event of your acceptance, a formal submission will be prepared and handed to you later.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) HUGH D. LUMSDEN,
Chief Engineer, Trancontinental Railway.

(Sgd.) B. B. KELLIHER,
Chief Engineer, Grand Trunk Pacific Railway.

I hereby accept the above appointment.

(Sgd.) COLLINGWOOD SCHREIBER.
Ottawa, March 22, 1909.

PATENTS FOR LANDS.

Mr. STAPLES asked:

1. In respect of sections 16, 20, 22, the west half section 28, and the northern quarter section 21, in township 28, range 31, west 1st meridian, have patents been issued for these lands? If so, to whom?

2. If patents are not issued, by whom are they occupied, and under what title?

3. Who is responsible for payment of municipal school taxes on these lands?

4. If taxes are not paid, can the lands be seized by the proper authorities for such nonpayment?

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (for the Minister of the Interior) :

1. No, except the north east ¼ of section 21, which was patented to the Winnipeg Western Land Corporation, Limited, on the 4th November, 1902.

2. Reserved during the pleasure of the government for Doukhobor communities, village of Wozsiennie, by order in council of the 7th December, 1907.

3. The title to these lands being vested in the Crown they are not liable to taxation.

4. Answered by No. 3.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding, that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN (South Huron). In resuming this debate, I find that the discussion has been tolerably exhaustive on both sides. Consequently, it may be somewhat difficult for me to find anything novel or new to say. However, I think it is an accepted fact that no two individuals deduce exactly the same conclusions on any question, and I presume that that rule will hold good in the present instance, and that I may be enabled to say something that has not already been said. Before referring to any of the arguments or statements of our friends opposite, I wish to congratulate the Finance Minister on the very admirable and satisfactory budget deliverance which we heard on Tuesday last. I know that, in view of the falling revenue, and in view of the financial and commercial depression which has existed for some time, it was the general impression in the country that the Finance Minister would have to announce a very considerable deficit. It was also feared that he might have to announce an increase in the taxation. But we find that, instead of a deficit, there is a very substantial surplus, and that there is no increase in the taxation to be made, but, on the contrary, the government have wisely, I think, decided to decrease the expenditures and to practice the most rigid economy in order that the revenues may be sufficient to meet the requirements. It is probable that some of us may be a little disappointed because appropriations were not made for some improvements that we might consider were desirable and necessary in our several constituencies. It is probable also, that the people may be somewhat disappointed in this respect, but I am sure that, when they understand the circumstances, they will give the government credit for their good intentions. I am also sure that the country will endorse the course taken by the government in reducing the expenditure with a view to keeping it within the revenue. I must also congratulate the Minister of Finance on his determination to continue to the manufacturers of beet-root sugar the advantages that they have enjoyed for the last few years. This is an infant industry which promises to be of very great importance and value to the people of this country and this is a species of protection, if I may use that expression, which is advantageous to both consumer and producer. It is advantageous to the consumer because it supplies additional competition in the finished product and consequently enables him to purchase that product more cheaply than he otherwise could. It is of advantage to the producer or the farmer because it creates a ready market for a new and what promises to be a profitable farm product, for it has been established beyond peradventure that the sugar beet can be grown in Canada to very great perfection and at a very considerable profit. It has been established by experience thus far that it is a profitable crop for the farmer to grow. Not only that but it works in very well with other crops, and its cultivation and harvesting can be carried on at seasons of the year when other work on the farm is comparatively slack and labour is more plentiful; and as a result the root can be produced at a comparatively trifling cost. Being a profitable crop it adds in this way to the net return of the farmer and the return from the beet crop is in fact practically found money to the farmer, going to enrich him and to add to the wealth of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not discuss the broad question of protection, but let me say that the claim that the farming interests of the country are benefited by imposing a high protection upon their products, more particularly upon products of which they have a surplus for export, is simply a sham and a delusion, because we all know it is an established fact, and I do not think any person will dispute it, that in the case of any product of which we have a surplus for export, the price in the local market is entirely regulated and fixed by the demand and the price at the point of consumption.

Mr. SPROULE. Then how does the hon. member account for the fact that year before last the price of wheat was higher in Canada than it was in England—

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. It was not due to any protection on wheat.

Mr. SPROULE. —if the export price regulated the price here?

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. There are many ways in which the government can and do benefit the farming industry, but I shall simply give one or two instances. In the first place the farming interest can be greatly benefited by the introduction and perfection of cold storage. It can also be benefited by improving the waterways and the railways of our country and the facilities for shipping. Such assistance as this enables the surplus products of the farmers to be laid down in the markets of consumption in the very best possible condition, in the least possible time and at the least possible cost, bringing the farmers the greatest possible profit. The government can also assist the farmer by encouraging and enabling him to cultivate new products, such as the sugar beet, which will add to his resources and to the wealth of the country. Another way of aiding the farmers which occurs to me at the moment is by the eradication of noxious weeds. I think I am safe in saying that through this cause the farmer loses one hundredfold more every year than he could possibly gain were the protective tariff made as high as it could be placed. If the government by education, by example, or in any other way can induce or aid the farmers to eradicate these noxious weeds they will render the farmers the greatest service that could be rendered. The Department of Agriculture have issued a book of immense value in which the various noxious weeds prevalent in Canada are graphically shown so that the farmers can distinguish at a glance the various weeds which are of injury to this land. The book also gives instruction as to the best method of eradicating this evil and freeing the land from weeds. I am glad to see that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is in his place. I think it would be advisable to have one of these books placed in the hands of every farmer in this country. I do not know of any way in which money could be more advantageously or beneficially expended than by educating the farmer along these lines, and I am sure there is not a member on either side of this House who would not willingly send a copy of this valuable little book to each of his farmer constituents.

I am sure my hon. friend for Dauphin (Mr. Glen Campbell) will excuse me if I do not attempt to follow him in the devious wanderings of the speech which he delivered here on Friday evening last. I do not think I could do so if I would, and I would not do so if I could. But I desire to say to my hon. friend, and I say it in a spirit of the greatest kindness, that such deliverances certainly do not add to the dignity of any deliberative body, particularly to that of the parliament of this great Canada of ours. I was extremely sorry to hear that hon. gentleman make such a fierce personal attack upon the premier of Saskatchewan. I have no brief to defend that hon. gentleman; I have not the pleasure of his acquaintance. I do not know if I have ever seen him, and I am very sure that I would not know him were I to see him, but I do know that the people in the constituency where that hon. gentleman lived for a number of years elected him as a representative to this parliament in preference to a gentleman who was in many respects one of the ablest public men in Canada. I also know that the people of the province of Saskatchewan on two different occasions conferred upon Mr. Scott the greatest political honour in their power. I think that in view of these facts it does not become any member of this House to make any accusations against this gentleman. I think the practice which is too commonly indulged in of making charges of this kind against our leading public men should not be encouraged and should certainly be deprecated.

Our friends opposite complain of the increased expenditure in this country. They say that the expenditure has been abnormally increased, that it has been nearly doubled under this present government. That is a fact, but we ought to remember this other fact, that the country has nearly doubled in that time. The Canada of to-day is an entirely different Canada from that of 12 or 15 years ago. In those days there were thousands and thousands of acres that were practically a barren waste, that were inhabited only by the Indian, the buffalo and the coyote, which, to-day, are thickly populated with industrious settlers, and these lands are pouring out their millions of bushels of golden grain each year to enrich this country of ours. Not only that, but in the country to which I have referred, hundreds and thousands of prosperous and populous towns and villages have sprung up within the last thirteen years, while thirteen years ago there was nothing to be seen on these plains for hundreds and hundreds of miles except perhaps Indian tepees. It is also a fact to be remembered that we have opened up the great Yukon territory which is represented so creditably and so well by my hon. friend Mr. Congdon. Within the last thirteen or fourteen years, probably less, an immense section of country, which then we really scarcely knew, has been brought in and has been pouring forth its millions of dollars of wealth in the shape of gold, silver, lead, &c., and in that country also hundreds of prosperous towns and villages have sprung up where before there was nothing but rock, lake, and barren wilderness. The expenditures have only kept pace with the progress and prosperity of the country. You must expect that when the country is expanding so greatly the calls upon the government will be in proportion. You have to establish postal facilities and many other things. This cannot be done without money and without price. But, the increase in the expenditure is not a criminal offence providing we have the revenue to meet that expenditure and providing the expenditure has been fairly economical and honest. As to whether this expenditure has been honest or economical we can perhaps judge better by a comparison than in any other way. We have a government in Ontario which our good friends opposite say is honest and economical. I am not going to dispute that point because I believe it is honest and possibly fairly economical. But the expenditure under that government during the past five years has nearly doubled. I am not going to say that it has been dishonest or that the government has been recklessly extravagant because the province has enlarged. If the province has increased we must expect an additional expenditure there the same as here in the Dominion. But there is another province which I might mention and some of our friends swear by the government of that province. I refer to the government of Manitoba. They say that it is honest and economical and possibly they are right I have no figures for the province of Manitoba but I think I am correct in saying that the expenditure has a good deal more than doubled since the present government came into power. If that is the case in connection with these other governments why should this government be blamed for an increase in the expenditure. It should not be forgotten that the expenditure has increased by $1,000,000 for the purpose of assisting the provinces of the Dominion in the form of an increased indemnity. The statement has been made and repeated several times during this discussion by our friends opposite that the taxation of the people has been doubled; or possibly that is not just the way to put it, but they say that the people have been required to pay double the taxation under the present government that they did under the late government. I am quite willing to admit that is the case. But, Sir, the rate of taxation has not been increased. The rate of taxation has been very considerably lowered. If the people, by reason of their increased prosperity, are enabled to buy double the amount of taxable goods under the present government that they were able to buy under the late government, surely no person will say that it is a cause of complaint against the present government. If, by reason of the increased prosperity of the country, due to the policy of the government, to take as an example what, I dare say, has been given many times before, I am enabled, owing to the increased wages which I receive, owing to increased prosperity in my business, or in my affairs, to purchase two suits of clothes in a year and add to my other luxuries and comforts in life, instead of one suit a year, as I formerly did under the late government, surely I have reason for thankfulness and have no reason for complaint against the present government. If anything, I should have reason for complaint against those who preceded the present government and who kept me in such a position that I was only able to buy one suit of clothes.

Another complaint is that the public debt has been largely increased. We all know that that is the case but before I go on to discuss that point I want to dissent entirely from the principle which was laid down the other day by the hon. member for Argentueuil (Mr. Perley) that every generation should pay the liabilities of that particular generation and should present a clean slate to the succeeding generation. Most of this money which has caused the public debt has been expended in permanent improvements—improvements that are not only good for the present day but will be advantageous to the people of many generations after this. That being the case, why should the people of the present day be burdened in order to provide comforts and conveniences and necessities for the next two generations? If that principle were adopted and carried out it would be the means of blocking many useful and profitable enterpises. But let us see in what manner the public debt has been increased and I will just give you one instance. I could give you many. In 1896, which was the last year of the government of our friends opposite, there was an expenditure made on railways and canals of 2,699,669. In 1908 the present government expended $28,363,758. In view of these facts is it any wonder that the debt has been increased, and will any person deny that we have received value for that increase in the public debt. Why, Sir, as a result of the improvement of our water highways this country has already become the envy of our great neighbours to the south because we are carrying the trade from their doors and, to-day, trade which was formerly done through American channels is being done through Canadian channels. My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) in the course of his very able address stated that one of the great reasons for the increase of the debt under the Conservative government was that they purchased the Northwest Territories, that the purchase price had been added to the public debt, and that it was not all yet paid for. That is quite true, but my hon. friend might have gone a little bit further and he might have told this House and the people of the country that of that territory which was purchased and paid for by the money of the people no less than 25,000,000 acres of the very best land in it was given away. And not only that, but an agreement was entered into by the government with the recipients that that land should be free from municipal taxation for a long period of years.

Mr. BRADBURY. When the hon. gentleman states that 25,000,000 acres was given away he does not mean that there was no return obtained for that land? What was that land worth at the time the contract was made with the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. There certainly was a return but I think I am safe in saying that a good many multi-millionaires have been made out of that land. And I wish to say further, that if the hon. gentleman who interrupted me, or if any others of his friends on that side of the House consider that this giving away of that land was an evidence of superior foresight or superior statesmanship, then, most people will disagree with them as to the meaning of these terms. Our friends on the other side admit that we have had very prosperous times during the regime of the present government, but they claim that all this prosperity is due to the policy which they inaugurated. Well, they had 18 long years in which to work out this great policy of theirs and year after year under their policy the country became worse and worse and the condition of the people poorer and poorer. Especially during the last three or four years of the Conservative government we had scarcity of employment, low wages, and soup kitchens in every city; we had depression in its worst form and the movement of population was from this country to the United States instead of the reverse of that as at present. In these days of the Conservative government we were losing the best blood of our country, our promising young men were leaving for the United States and we were building up the wealth and the population of a foreign nation.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell us what legislation the present government has placed upon the Statute-books which has brought about this prosperity he speaks of?

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. Yes, I will tell the hon. gentleman that this government has used the legislation that is on the Statute-books to such better advantage than the Conservative government as to bring about these results. And further, there have been many changes made in the tariff which have tended to the better and more progressive conditions which obtain to-day. Now, during the last nine or ten years work has been abundant, wages have been high, business has been prosperous, the country has been booming. I think, and I believe the people of this country think, that if that policy can be carried out so much more to the interests of the people by the present government than by the previous government they would be foolish indeed to make any change in their rulers. In view of these facts which I have related and many more that I could relate, is it surprising that the people of Canada have expressed their entire satisfaction with the government and with the manner in which they have administered public affairs, not only once but twice—and they will do it a third time I believe when they have the opportunity.

I want to turn aside a little from the beaten path to say a few words on a subject which was not referred to in the admirable address of the Minister of Finance, and which I should have liked to have heard mentioned by him. I believe it is the duty of this parliament and of the government to do everything legitimately within their power to suppress, or to smash if you will, all trade combines and trusts in this country. I know of no more expeditious or more efficient way of doing this than by hewing a good big gap out of the tariff wall which surrounds them so as to permit of a liberal influx of outside or foreign competition. It may be said that this has been provided for already, and that is true to a limited extent, but only to a limited extent. We have been provided with the machine, but the motive power to operate the machine has been withheld. There is a clause in the Customs Act which says that when it is proven to the satisfaction of some legal tribunal that a combine exists, the government have the power to reduce or to entirely remove the customs duties on the products of any such combine. But the duty of hunting up evidence and of conducting the prosecution is left to a private individual. I maintain that parliament, at the instance of the government of course, having enacted the tariff law, it is their duty to protect the public from all abuses which may arise under that law. While the exactions of these combines or trusts are very large in the aggregate, they are comparatively small to the individual, and hence it is not worth the while of the individual to go to the expense of seeking evidence and conducting a prosecution against them. The result is that the combines are allowed to go on from day to day, growing in strength and power, and, if I might be allowed to use the expression, in impudence. As an illustration, I am just as sure as I am standing here at this moment that a combine exists among the paper manufacturers of this country. You may apply to a dozen different paper manufacturers and you will get precisely the same quotation from each; you will receive from any one only such advantages or privileges as others will grant; you have to pay your money and take what you get, good or bad, and be thankful for it. I have seen the statement made, and not refuted, that the paper manufacturers of this country are selling paper in the United States at a lower price than they are selling it at to their customers in this country. I am also informed on excellent authority that you can import paper, what is known as news print, from Chicago laid down in Toronto, plus the freight and the duty, at just about the same price that you have to pay to the manufacturers of this country, showing that the whole of the duty goes into the pockets of the manufacturers instead of any portion of it going into the treasury of the country. Now, although I am perfectly convinced of this, and although the exactions of this so-called combine are very large in the aggregate, yet it is not worth my while, for all it amounts to me, to search for the evidence and conduct a prosecution in order to prove the existence of that combine. What I say is that this law should be treated just as are other laws—the customs law and the excise law, for example. Officers should be appointed under the government whose duty it would be to ascertain where any combine existed and look up the evidence and conduct the prosecution. If a man attempts to bring foreign goods into this country, though it may be only a silk handkerchief, without paying duty, he is met at the frontier by a customs officer; his goods are confiscated, and possibly he is fined and punished. The same is true with regard to the excise law, and properly so. This is necessary in order to protect the revenue of this country. But surely it is as important to protect the interests of the great consuming masses of this country as it is to protect the public revenues. I use the case of the paper manufacturers, not as implying that theirs is the only combination that exists in this country, because I believe there are many such. I use this case as an illustration simply because I am more acquainted with that line of business than any other.

It has been said that we could take advantage of the Criminal Code in order to stamp out these combinations in trade. Well, that has been tried in this country in three or four instances, and I am sorry to say that it has proved a disappointment, a miserable failure, largely because of the apparent indifference of the legal authorities and the long delays that are possible under the law. I may also say that there is a very strong feeling in the minds of a great many people that the springs of justice are tempered with very great mercy towards these combines.

In conclusion, I wish, as a friend and supporter of this government, to urge them with all the earnestness that I can command, to take this matter in hand, and at once; and if the remedy I suggest is not the best remedy, then let them apply what may in their wisdom be considered the best remedy in order to stamp out this evil; because every day these combines are allowed to continue they are growing in strength and influence. We have had an example of that in the neighbouring republic, where the combination have grown so strong that they really master the people and set parliament and the governmnet at defiance, and even the courts are afraid to touch them very strongly. If such a state of things should every unfortunately occur in this country, God help the people of the country. Again I urge upon my friends to use their utmost endeavours to free the people of this country from the tentacles of such an octupus as these combines.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean), which is a severe criticism of several of the departments of the government. I can heartily endorse what he says with regard to the combines; and if these combines exist in this country, it is certainly up to the government to take some definite action with regard to them. The hon. member gave us a great many excuses for the enormous expenditure of this country; but he did not tell us of some expenditures which have been going on in his own riding under his very nose and encouraged by him, such as the expenditure on a wharf at a place called St. Joseph's, where the whole town was sold last year for $700 of taxes.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. I have had nothing to do with that expenditure. It has been supported by every representative of that constituency, including the late representative.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am glad to hear the hon. member say that he has had nothing to do with the expenditure on that wharf; but why did he allow the government to go on spending money there year after year, even within the last year, since he has been a member of this House? If he will turn up 'Hansard', he will find that the Minister of Public Works, in reply to questions I asked, distinctly stated the amounts of money expended on that wharf during the last few years. I know that the previous representative of that riding condemned the expenditure on St. Joseph's wharf.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. There has been no expenditure authorized since I became member. There was some expenditure authorized shortly before that, and any work done since has been to complete.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. gentleman has just substantiated the statement which I made. He says that the government have been spending money there merely to complete the work started years ago. I do not want to go into details, but the hon. gentleman knows that the original contract was practically closed and the wharf partly swept away.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. I saw the wharf last year and not a foot of it was swept away. There is not a more substantial, better constructed work in Canada.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the hon. gentleman only saw the wharf last year, he does not know the portion swept away. I have visited that wharf myself and have seen portions scattered down along the shores of Lake Huron. The hon. member knows well that large parts of the wharf were swept away.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. I do not.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Some years back. If he is satisfied with this work at a cost of $20,000 of the people's money, he is prepared to support this government in anything they may do. Let me call his attention to another wharf, a wharf built at the corner of his own riding, at Grand Bend That wharf cost $25,000, and has to be kept continually in repairs. Years ago, the government thought they had completed it, but they built it on top of the sand, and the waters of Lake Huron undermined it, and the government have been spending hundreds and thousands of dollars to repair the top part.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. There never was $100,000 spent on that wharf altogether.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I stated hundreds and thousands of dollars. When the hon. gentleman is aware of matters going on right under his very nose, and when we find him coming here prepared to stand up for any expenditure in his own riding, I cannot but think that he is prepared to back the government through thick and thin.

I do not intend to take up more time with the remarks of the hon. gentleman except to say that the method in which he attacked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) in connection with the different branches of his department is a severe condemnation of that department. But be that as it may, what I am particularly interested in is to call the attention of the government to our present position with regard to Germany. That position is deserving our most serious consideration. The mismanagement of the present government has been the means of driving us out of the second best market in the world, and has placed us in the humiliating position of being unable to get our goods into that market. The only market we have for the products of the farm, to any great extent, is the British.

And the British markets are open to every country in the world on the very same footing. Let us look for a moment at the German market and see whether it is worthy our consideration. True, we are sending out large quantities of grain and food products to Great Britain, but where else can we send them? We cannot send them to Russia or the United States, because both these countries are large exporters of food products. The only place where we can dispose of our surplus is Great Britain under present circumstances. The population of Germany in 1907 was 62,000,000, whereas in 1850 it was only 35,000,000. Only $500,000 worth of agricultural products went into Germany from the Dominion in 1908, according to the statement given by the Minister of Customs in the last few days, while millions went into Germany from other countries. The total imports to Germany were over $2,000,000,000, and the total food products imported into Germany amounted to over $1.000,000,000. Yet of the latter, only $500,000 came from Canada.

The imports of Great Britain amounted to $3,138,626,598, and her total exports $2,000,000,000. You can judge then whether Germany is worthy of being traded with.

Germany imported $56,000,000 of horses and other animals. Canada did not send one of these. I wonder if my hon. friends from the western provinces, who are deeply interested in raising all kinds of cattle, are not interested in that $56,000,000 worth of animals going to Germany?

Germany imported of barley 96,000,000 bushels last year, valued at $56,000,000. What about the eastern provinces of this country? Take Ontario, one of the best barley producing provinces in the Dominion. We cannot get our barley into the United States on account of the American tariff. I find that Germany imported 96,000,000 bushels of barley, and paid for it $57,000,000, and all that Canada sent was $625 worth.

Of oats, the Germans imported 41,700,000 bushels, value $18,000,000, and all that Canada sent of that quantity was $1,894. Surely that is of some interest to the farmer?

Of rye, 25,000,000 bushels went into Germany last year, for which they paid $18,000,000, and not a bushel came from Canada.

Wheat, surely our men in the west at least are interested in the wheat that goes to Germany. 73,000,000 bushels of wheat went into Germany last year and they paid $67,000,000 for it, and not one bushel went from Canada. Total those few important exports into Germany up, and what do you find? You find 236,000,000 bushels of grain valued at $216,000,000. Canada got in $2,619. Now, we come to the item of apples.

Our people in the province of Ontario are deeply interested in the apple industry. Two years ago, it was estimated, Ontario produced 18,000,000 barrels of apples. If you add the production in British Columbia and other provinces, it will be seen that we produced easily 20,000,000 barrels. Of these, we exported only 1,500,000 barrels, leaving about 18,500,000 barrels in the Dominion. Suppose we ate and destroyed 8,500,000 barrels, there would be still 10,000,000 barrels left for export. Now, the British market can only consume something like 2,500,000 barrels. Germany is a greater consumer of apples than Great Britain. Is it not natural for our men who are producing apples in large quantities to be anxious to get into the German market? A few years ago, we sent them over $400,000 worth of apples. But the German surtax was placed on the apple industry, and the effect was that last year we sent to Germany only $82 worth of apples—eighty-two dollars worth sent into the best apple market in the world, not only the best for green apples, but the best for dried and evaporated apples. When I see men rise in their places in this House, as I have in the last few weeks, to ask this government to give back to the men who are evaporating this fruit a portion of the surtax they have to pay to get into Germany, and when I find men pleading with this government for the removal of the surtax, I cannot but believe that it is high time that this subject should be investigated. The United States sent into Germany 28,000,000 pounds of evaporated apples, for which they received $2,400,000, also 123,000 barrels of green apples, for which they received $620,000, an average of over $5 a barrel. The total quantity of apples imported into Germany was 2,839,000 barrels. Multiply that by five and you have over $14,000,000. Surely that is of some interest to the farmers who are interested in raising apples. Germany's total imports of agricultural products amounted to over $300,000,000 last year, that is of such products as we produce in this country, for I am not talking about the products such as other countries send into Germany, but of the staple products of Canadian farms. We got in, as I have stated, about $500,000 worth. We must recognize the fact that Canada is mainly an agricultural country. In spite of our great developmeent of trade, in spite of our railways and our other trade institutions, the fact is that they all depend on the farmer—it is the man behind the plough, who to-day is building up our trade, our manufactures and our railroads. We ought to realize this, and, instead of confining our farmers to one market, the market of Great Britain, we ought to seek access to every market in the world on the same footing as any other nation.

Now, let us consider Germany's business with other countries. When you consider that Canada is exporting to Germany only $1,900,000 worth of goods, one would naturally infer that other countries cannot be sending in such very large amounts. But take the case of even some of the smaller countries. Australia sent Germany in 1907, $42,000,000 worth of goods. Let me run over the figures of some of these countries:

Imports by Germany from various countries, 1907:

Australia	$ 42,075,000
British East Indies	106,040,000
South Africa	11,016,000
Brazil	47,000,000
Argentine Republic and Patagonia	106,200,000
Chili	34,000,000
United States	316,600,000
Great Britain	234,300,000
Canada	1,959,891

Surely this is sufficient to call attention to the fact that Canada's trade with Germany is a mere bagatelle, and that it is time we took a greater interest in our affairs in that connection and investigated this matter more fully.

Now, consider our exports of farm products to Germany in some detail. These figures are taken from the Trade and Navigation returns:

Canadian farm products exported to Germany, 1907:

Cheese	$ 3
Barley	625
Oats	1,894
Apples	82
Flour of wheat	1,742
Wheat, the product of Canada	None.
Wheat, not the product of Canada	248,000
Rye, hay, peas, flax, butter, horses, cattle, swine, sheep, beef, ham, mutton, bacon, poultry	None.

So you can go through the whole list and see the position in which our great industry is in the second best consuming market of the world and practically the only market to which we could send our products outside of Great Britain. We cannot emphasize our position too strongly nor too strongly urge upon the government the necessity of investigating this matter and trying to get together with Germany with a view to having our products enter that market under the most favourable auspices. Now, let us consider what this $1,900,000 worth of exports from Canada to Germany was made up of. In the first place, there was about $500,000 worth of farm products, including grease and grease scraps, dried apples, clover seed and bran. Farm implements represented about $774,000, and sewing machines, organs and numerous little things such as hair oil and chewing gum make up the balance. But what about the Canadian farmer? Look at the position in which he is in regard to the export of his products to the markets of the world. Great Britain is our best market. We may be glad and proud that we are sending such an enormous amount to Great Britain. But, if we had not Great Britain, where should we send these goods? As I have already said, you cannot send them to the United States or to Russia. You may send a little to Japan and China, but you have to educate the people there to consume the products we produce in this country before you can export to them in any great quantity. Now, take the British market and see the position we are in. I have here figures showing the total imports into Britain and the position that Canada occupies in that market in relation to all the other countries of the world that export to the same market.

Products.	Imports into Great Britain.	Canada's Exports to Great Britain.	Canada's Exports to all other Countries.
Wheat	97,000,000 cwt.	47,000,000 bus.	1,619 bus.
Wheat flour	$33,000,000	$ 7,625,685	$ 31,879
Oats	10,485,290 cwt.	6,337,455 bus.	831,498 bus.
Pease	1,245,670 cwt.	550,015 bus.	$ 118,609
Hay	97,424 tons.	33,911 tons.
Apples	2,521,179 brls.	1,490,311 brls.
Cheese	$35,000,000	$22,886,671	$ 35,109

It must be remembered that all other countries have like privileges on the British market.

Mr. PATERSON. One is struck with the enormous quantity of products that Great Britain has taken from us and the very small proportion of our exports that went to Germany. Yet if I understand the hon. gentleman his position is that we are to withdraw the preference from that country which is taking 60 per cent of our great agricultural productions in order to conciliate Germany which imports $2,000,000,000 worth and put us upon its maximum tariff because we gave the preference to Great Britain. Does the hon. member want the British preference repealed?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. This is an old question, a hardy annual; you can expect it every year. I asked the hon. minister a question. Does he not realize that we are practically compelled to send the goods that we send to Great Britain there because we cannot send them anywhere else? Can we send them to the United States, a country that exported $250,000,000 worth of just such products as we are exporting to Great Britain? Can we send them to Russia?

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. member asks me a question, I answer yes. He says we have sent 60 per cent to Great Britain. There is 40 per cent more of that market, we can work on that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the hon. gentleman will look back a few years, he will find that we were sending these goods there long before he took the office he now holds.

Mr. PATERSON. Not in such quantities.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the hon. gentleman remembers his own statements he will recall that he said distinctly on the platforms of this country that he was going to give to the people of Canada the market to the south of us, a market of 85,000,000. He told us he was going to open up the markets of the world to the farmers of Canada. Has he done it? No, he has done the opposite, he has practically sealed the second best market in the world and now he is hiding behind the preference. I would like him to tell the people of one advantage that the preference has been to the farmers or people of Canada. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) stated the other day that the preference was a far-sighted policy, as regards the development of Canada, in that it affords us access into the best market of the world, the British market for our ever-increasing agricultural products. He knows full well that we have access into the British market on exactly the same footing as any other nation.

Mr. PATERSON. Better.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. gentleman last session tried to make us believe that the Canadian farmer was receiving more for the product of his farm on the British market because of the preference. I defy him now and have defied him time and again to show where the British consumer pays one cent more for the products of Canada than he pays for the products of Australia, New Zealand, Russia or any other country. The hon. gentleman knows full well that the preference does not bring us back one penny in increased value of the products of the farm.

Mr. PATERSON. I hope the hon. gentleman does not assume that I am assenting to that?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. He knows that by granting the preference to Great Britain he has driven us out of the German market and where are we going to be in a few years' time? The late member for Lisgar stated that the little province of Manitoba, with 73,000 square miles, was capable of producing 500,000,000 bushels of grain. When the other two provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan with 250,000 square miles of land come to produce 500,000,000 bushels where are you going to send it? How much is Great Britain taking? How is her consumption increasing? If you examine the figures for the last five years you will find that her consumption is diminishing. That may seem a strange statement but hon. gentlemen will find that it is true. Instead of the consumption in the British market of the products of the farms of the Dominion of Canada increasing it is decreasing. Great Britain only takes 93,000,000 cwts. of wheat from all countries. Where will we be with the markets of the world closed to us as they will be? I would ask the minister how we are going to get rid of our products? The Minister of Customs knows full well that if we continue in the blundering mismanagement of our treaties and our trade relations with some of these countries, we will be placed in one of the most humiliating positions you can imagine any nation to be in. The hon. minister says we have 60 per cent of the British market now, what better do you want, why do you not get the other 40 per cent? The hon. gentleman knows that if the Argentine Republic which sent $106,000,000 worth of farm products to Germany last year could sell these goods on the British market to greater advantage than on the German market she would send them to Britain. When the minister argues that having control of 60 per cent of any market we should go on and get control of 100 per cent before getting into any other market, I claim that he is not fair to the Canadian producer. The hon. gentleman knows that the ships that are going out carrying the products of Great Britain to these foreign lands must bring back loads and he may depend on it that the goods which they bring back from foreign countris are sold on the British market in competition with our goods and that you cannot, it is not reasonable to expect to get 90 per cent of any market.

Mr. PATERSON. When the hon. member quoted the German returns he gave the quantities and values of grain; had he figured out how much per bushel these different grains would bring?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I have not reduced it to prices per bushel. I was most careful in gathering these statistics to have them accurate. I spent some time with the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I am indebted to him for a great deal of assistance in compiling them.

Mr. PATERSON. In making a mental calculation as the hon. member proceeded, it appeared to me that the barley, for instance, would bring about 40 cents a bushel laid down in Germany. That would not be considered a large price to the Canadian, after he had paid the freight and the duty, and so the German market would not appear to be a valuable one for him. I would like to know what it would be worth a bushel.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. It would be worth more than forty cents a bushel.

Mr. PATERSON. About that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I have not figured the price per bushel.

Mr. PATERSON. Would it be any bonanza for the farmer to sell his barley for forty cents a bushel, pay his freight across the ocean and pay the duty to get into the German market? Can he not do better than that?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That is a very poor argument for the hon. gentleman to advance.

Mr. PATERSON. No, I think it is a good one. I want to know what the value of the market is.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Germany is a large consumer of barley. She imported 96,000,000 bushels of barley and paid for it $67,000,000. Does the hon. gentleman seem to think that it was a good argument to say that we should not have access to the German market? He says that barley is forty cents a bushel. I have seen the time, when, on the farms of Ontario, we were glad enough to get forty cents a bushel.

Mr. PATERSON. But that is less the freight——

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That cannot amount to very much.

Mr. PATERSON——and the minimum tariff.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Do I understand from the Minister of Customs that he is not anxious that we should get into the German market at all?

Mr. PATERSON. I want to know what the value of it is, to see if it is worth our while to sacrifice the British preference for it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I have tried to show the Minister of Customs that Germany imported $56,000,000 worth of horses, 96,000,000 bushels of barley, 41,000,000 bushels of oats, 25,000,000 bushels of rye, 73,000,000 bushels of wheat, and I might go on down through the list. The trouble in gathering these figures is that they are given in kilos, marks and pesos; so that it requires a great deal of figuring to ascertain quantities and values. I have chosen a number of the most prominent products of the farm and I am trying to show that Germany imported last year over $300,000,000 worth of agricultural products, such as we are producing, and that we were only able to get into the German market $500,000 worth owing to the mismanagement of our trade relations with Germany by the present government.

Mr. PATERSON. My hon. friend has not demonstrated that we have done anything that excludes us from that market.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The Minister of Customs knows full well what he has done. No man knows better, and I venture to say that if the minister investigates these figures he will satisfy himself that it is time we opened up our trade relations with Germany.

Mr. PATERSON. What did we do to Germany?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. There are a number of new members in this House and I have no objection to stating what the hon. gentleman did do to Germany. I will tell it in just as few words as I can. We were a favoured nation in the eyes of Germany in 1896. Our goods were going into Germany under the most favoured nation clause, or under the lowest possible tariff. The government came into power and in the first budget that he brought down the Finance Minister granted a preference to Great Britain of 12½ per cent. When that 12½ per cent preference was granted Sir Charles Tupper rose and stated distinctly that they would have to include Germany in the treaty. The Finance Minister rather poohpoohed that proposition. But before a year elapsed we found him asking Great Britain to denounce the treaty between Great Britain and Germany. Great Britain did denounce the treaty between Great Britain and Germany as it then was as far as Canada was concerned, but Great Britain took mighty good care to see that she looked after herself and all the other colonies, because I want to tell you that Great Britain and all the other colonies are to-day sending their goods into Germany under the most favoured nation clause, while Canada not only has the maximum tariff against her to-day, but she has the surtax placed on top of it. What else did these hon. gentlemen do? In 1898 they increased the preference to 25 per cent. Germany said: If that is the way Canada is going to treat us, if he is going to slap us in the face, we will put her under the maximum tariff. The result is that to-day Canada comes under the maximum tariff. In 1900 this government raised the preference to Great Britain to 33⅓ per cent. Germany said: They are determined to still slap us in the face and we will place the surtax upon Canadian goods coming into our country. Germany placed upon her statute-book a provision for the collection of the surtax, but she did not apply that surtax until one or two years afterwards and then this government applied the surtax to German goods coming into this country. The agricultural products that were going into Germany from Canada continued to go into Germany under the favoured nation clause until the last year or two, and it is only quite recently to some of these products that Germany has applied the surtax. There is the whole position, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite will tell us that the British preference that they granted to Great Britain has been the means of giving to the farmers of this country a wonderful advantage. I have not the time to go into the question to-day, but the hon. gentleman knows full well that a large portion of the goods coming into this country under the British preference comes through the middlemen to Great Britain, and that these goods are the product of foreign countries. No one knows that better than the minister himself. I would like to show the position that this government occupies with regard to the preferential tariff, but I have not the time. I want to impress upon this House the importance of getting into the German market with the products of the farms of this country, and the sooner we get in there the better it will be for the Dominion. You can depend upon it that it will take years to develop a market in Germany even after we get in there. If you look into the figures relating to the products that other countries are sending into Germany you cannot help but feel humiliated to find that Canada is sending so little.

Mr. BLAIN. The Minister of Customs interrupted my hon. friend from East Lambton by saying that the 96,000,000 bushels of barley imported by Germany were valued at only forty cents a bushel.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, roughly.

Mr. BLAIN. If my hon. friend will make the calculation he will find that this barley was valued at sixty cents a bushel instead of forty cents. That makes a considerable difference.

Mr. PATERSON. At sixty cents a bushel for Canadian barley, paying freight across the ocean and paying the minimum duty in Germany, will the hon. gentleman tell me how much that will bring you? Will it bring 35 cents a bushel net?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That is similar to the statement made by the minister a short time ago. He then said it was forty cents a bushel, and now he admits that it was sixty cents a bushel.

Mr. PATERSON. You agreed with that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I could not stop to figure it out.

Mr. PATERSON. Neither could I.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Germany imports the products of the farm in large quantities, and the freight on the goods from Canada to Germany could not exceed a very few cents per bushel. We were examining the figures with respect to British trade and we were trying to find out what it is that she is importing from other countries, because we are looked upon as supplying such a large portion of the British trade that other countries are not likely to get much in there. Total imports of Great Britain from and total exports of Great Britain to the following countries:

Total imports.

From Canada	£ 28,029,461
" Australia	33,836,353
" New Zealand	17,783,729
" Argentine Republic	26,479,724
" United States	133,683,631

Total exports.

To Canada	£10,220,973
" Australia	27,146,803
" New Zealand	9,441,908
" Argentine Republic	18,294,492
" United States	58,052,574

The Minister of Customs is fond of telling us of the wonderful expansion of Canadian trade in comparison with the trade of other nations, but the figures I am able to give show that unfortunately we are not making equal commercial progress with some other countries. The following tables will show the total imports and exports of the countries therein named

Total imports and exports, 1907.

Imports—
Argentine	$ 285,860,683
Australia	252,137,295
New Zealand	84,207,256
United States	1,194,341,792
Canada	370,786,525
Exports—
Argentine	$ 296,204,369
Australia	354,411,335
New Zealand	97,668,924
United States	1,860,773,346
Canada	280,006,606

It will be noticed that in the case of these countries the balance is on the right side of the ledger, but in the case of Canada the balance of trade against us amounts to $118,000,000, and the balance of trade against us with the United States alone is $100,000,000. Permit me to refer briefly again to our trade relations with Germany, and it is for that purpose principally that I have risen to speak. I would point the Minister of Customs to the fact that the deplorable condition of our trade relations with Germany is not only bad enough in itself, but that it has had such an effect on immigration from that country to Canada that we get scarcely any German settlers, although they are probably the best citizens a country like ours could possibly have. The Argentine republic is giving large grants of land to German settlers, and the United States is eagerly seeking immigration from the Fatherland, but the Canadian government is spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to get inferior settlers from southern Europe and there is no effort to induce the German people to come here. When I look at the money we are spending to extend our trade with other countries, and the deplorable commercial relations existing between Germany and Canada, I cannot help but feeling humiliated. This government is spending $200,000 now to encourage trade relations with France when they must know that mighty little of our wheat or our oats or our barley or the products of the farm will ever get into that country. We are subsidizing steamers to Mexico on the east coast and the west coast; we are endeavouring to cultivate a trade with Japan and China where we must first educate the people to consume our products, but Germany one of the best customers in the world for our natural products is without a Canadian trade representative. We have trade representatives in China and Japan but we have no representative in Germany, nor have we one in the United States to which we are sending $100,000,000 worth of goods. I ask the Minister of Customs to take this matter into his serious consideration and to see to it that in the near future his government will endeavour to come to some satisfactory understanding with Germany. Look at the example of the United States which last year sent a commission to Germany the members of which were fêted and feasted throughout the empire, and came back with a satisfactory basis for a commercial arrangement between the two nations. But, in Canada, when I rise in this House to call attention to our unsatisfactory relations with Germany, we have the Minister of Finance calling me unpatriotic, and the Minister of Agriculture denouncing Armstrong for attempting to make such statements. I believe, Sir, that when we find this government so self-satisfied and so ready to sacrifice our trade relations with the German empire it is time for some one to wake them up to a true sense of their responsibility in this matter. For thirteen years has this condition been existing; how much longer is the irritation going to last? The tariff war which this government has been waging for the last 13 years has been most damaging to our trade and at this eleventh hour I appeal to the government to put an end to it. In conclusion I urge upon the government the necessity in the near future, of bringing about some satisfactory understanding with Germany which will be beneficial to the agriculturists and the manufacturers of Canada.

Mr. ALEXANDER B. WARBURTON (Queens, Prince Edward Island). Mr. Speaker; even though the debate on the budget has been continued for some considerable time, I think its importance justifies every member of this House in expressing his views on the financial and industrial condition of the country. As a new member of this House and one who takes an earnest interest in the prosperity of Canada, I should not feel satisfied with myself were I to allow this debate to end without letting my views be known in as brief a form as possible. In conjunction with other members of the House who hold the same political views as I do, I have the utmost pleasure in congratulating the Minister of Finance on the financial statement which he has been able to present. We have become so used to the announcement of surpluses by the present Minister of Finance that I hardly know how we would feel were he compelled to make a budget speech declaring a deficit. But from our long and intimate knowledge of the business and financial ability of the hon. gentlemen we do not look to see any such misfortune attend the country while he remains in office. But I suppose it will be unreasonable to expect all members of this House to take the same view of this matter. That would indicate a tendency towards perfection, and I am not sure that we are yet ripe for that.

The hon. gentleman who last spoke waxed warm over the advantages of the German market. I suppose we all agree that it would be desirable to get access to that market on fair and honourable terms; but I think hon. members on both sides of this House will also agree that unless we can trade with the German people on fair and honourable terms, we are not going to be coerced into taking down our walls while they shake the whip over us. The German government undertook to dictate to Canada the position she should take in regard to the British preference. They practically told us that if we dared to give a preference to the old motherland which we did not also give to Germany, Germany would punish us; and she at once put us under her maximum tariff. I frankly say that much as I would like to see the German trade with Canada restored, I would not, as one member of this House, consent to the surtax being withdrawn so long as Germany continues her present attitude towards this cuontry. I look on Canada as a great and growing nation that should maintain her dignity in her dealings with Germany or any other nation. What does the hon. member want to do? We know the result he aims at; we would like to have the same result ourselves; but does he wish us to knuckle down to Germany, to take our licking lying down?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is there no other way?

Mr. WARBURTON. It would appear that there is no other way. I was not brought up in that school of politics. My people and their people before them belonged to the old Liberal school; we have always been willing to make friends where perhaps we had not friends before; and I do not wish to depart from that principle. But I hope never to see the day when I shall consent to get any advantage for my country by dragging her honour in the dust. The market of Germany may have been lost to our farmers temporarily; I do not believe that it is permanently lost. The German people, I believe, possess a fair amount of common sense. I believe the mercantile community of Germany and the people of Germany generally are possessed of much more common sense than their rulers; and I have seen it stated in the press in different times in recent years that the mercantile community of Germany are getting together in regard to the falling off in their trade with Canada, feeling that it was an unwise action on the part of Germany to enter into a tariff war with this country. It was not Canada that began that tariff war, but Germany; and so long as Germany continues that war, so long I think should the surtax continue. I think that is a matter that will cure itself. It appears to me that there is a certain amount of inconsistency on the part of the hon. gentleman and his friends in the strong grounds they take on this question. His friends applauded what he said, and therefore I presume they entirely agreed with him. This is a tariff war, they tell us, and report has had it lately that we are threatened with another kind of war with Germany. I have not seen any indications on either side of this House of a disposition to lie down and take a licking from Germany. Our hon. friends of the opposition are loyal and patriotic, and they were going to do great things in a physical war with Germany if the occasion arose, and I would be heartily with them. They were prepared to throw Dreadnoughts costing millions of dollars into the fray, if necessary they would shake the red rag before the eyes of the German bull. Yet when Germany threatened what was supposed to be a small and helpless colony with a tariff war, these hon. gentlemen say that Canada should not resent that, but should give way.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Speaker, I must correct the hon. gentleman when he says that I suggested that Canada should give way or anything of that kind. The hon. gentleman knows full well that he is telling something that is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WARBURTON. I am quite prepared to accept the correction of the hon. member; but I do not think it is quite in order for him to tell me that I am making statements which I know are not true. If I have not correctly understood the hon. gentleman, it is due to my ignorance of the English language.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I rise to a point of order. I have distinctly said tha the hon. gentleman's statement with regard to me is an untrue statement, and he should withdraw it.

Mr. WARBURTON. The hon. gentleman said that the statement which I made was untrue. If I have made an untrue statemen, I will withdraw it with pleasure. I would be very sorry to make an untrue statement with regard to the hon. member or any one else. But the meaning I drew from his remark was, I venture to say, the meaning drawn from it by many other hon. members. If I was mistaken why were the Minister of Customs and the government generally asked repeatedly to get busy and come to some arrangement with the German government in this matter?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is there any harm in that?

Mr. WARBURTON. I do not say there is any harm in that; but the inference to be drawn from that suggestion, in view of the stand taken by Germany, is, in my mind at least, that we have to go to Germany, which has been threatening and trying to bulldoze us, and say: Here we are, prepared to take back water if you will let us get into your market.

Mr. PATERSON. And do away with the preference.

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes. The hon. member did not answer the question whether or not he was willing to do away with the preference—because I take it that must be in his mind, otherwise what would be the use of going to Germany and asking her to remove the maximum tariff against Canada? The reason Germany adopted a hostile tariff against Canada was because we enacted the preference.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WARBURTON. At six o'clock I was discussing the question of our trade relations with Germany; and in that connection it seemed to me that the ground taken by the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House (Mr. Armstrong) was not consistent with the position taken by the financial expert of the Conservative party (Mr. Foster). In his speech on the budget the other evening, the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), referring to the position taken by the United States in its negotiations with foreign powers, pointed out that it always avoided entangling alliances, so that it was always in a position, in dealing with any foreign country, to deal with that country alone regardless of others. For instance, in negotiating with Spain, the United States had only to look to what was beneficial between Spain and the United States. Going on in that strain, the hon. member for North Toronto spoke as follows:

I am decidedly of opinion that the old method of most favoured nation treaties is entangling and embarrassing, and that it is constantly leading us into difficulties. With our largely increasing trade in Canada, I believe we cannot go on any longer without very carefully considering and making up our minds on this matter. There is another reason why I would plead with the government to hold its hand for at least a time in making these arrangements with different foreign countries. I am one of the men who believes that if we can get a proper arrangement between ourselves and Great Britain and the British empire, that there is an opening field for the richest, the best, and the most secure trade in the world. I look over this great British empire and I find that there is no variety of climate which it does not possess, there is no possible thing that grows which is not grown in more or less abundance within the borders of the empire. It is in that respect absolutely self-contained with reference to powers of production and facilities for trade.

I feel very much inclined to agree with the hon. member for North Toronto in the remarks I have just read, but these remarks do not appear consistent with the argument made by the last speaker (Mr. Armstrong). If the principle laid down by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) holds good, that hon. gentleman would be opposed to our entering into negotiations with any other country for the establishment of special trade relations. I commend these very pregnant remarks of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr.

Foster) to the consideration of my hon. friends in the opposition, because if those remarks are pondered, and pondered carefully, they will be found to run counter to a good many that have fallen from the last speaker (Mr. Armstrong), and others who think with him.

I listened with a great deal of interest, and a certain amount of amusement, to the speech made by the hon. member for Dauphin the other evening (Mr. Glen Campbell). That hon. gentleman is a genial and pleasant speaker to whom we always like to listen, but it did appear to me that, in some of his remarks, he did what I am sure my hon. friend, who is a manly man, will on reflection regret having done. He struck below the belt. He spoke of bouquets having been given hon. gentlemen who had been taking part in late election campaigns in widely separated parts of this country. Bouquets were put on their desks to welcome them on their return from these elections, but, he said, there were none laid on the desk of the Minister of Mines (Mr. Templeman) when he took his seat. True, there was no bouquet laid on his desk when he took his seat, nor was any sent to him, when he lost his election in Victoria, but I would far rather be in the position of the Minister of Mines (Mr. Templeman), when he went down to defeat like a man in Victoria, than be in the position of the victor in that contest, who won it by the means he did. The hon. minister will, I hope, pardon my referring to him for a moment or two, and I do so because I think that the references made to him the other evening were not those which should be made to a gallant opponent who went down in unfair fight, as the hon. minister did. It is not necessary to revive the discussion which has already taken place in this House regarding the methods employed in order to secure the defeat of the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman) in Victoria. And I wish to say emphatically that the remarks I am about to make are not intended to apply to any member of this House. But I do say that outside of this House, there seems to be some sort of conspiracy on the part of the worst elements of the Conservative party to bring that party into disrepute, and I feel sure that the leaders of that party, and every hon. member belonging to it in this House, personally regrets that sort of conduct. Nevertheless, such conduct has prevailed and continues to prevail; and no doubt some one or other, acting in the supposed interests of the Conservative party, resorted not only to the ordinary means of political warfare in order to bring about the defeat of the minister, but went further and added criminality to these methods. And I do say that when hon. gentlemen criticise the Minister of Mines (Mr. Templeman) because he lost his seat, I do not think they are acting a manly part. If they had seen fit to attack any other hon. gentlemen who had come to grief in the last election, and who came to grief in fair fight, there would be something to justify their remarks, but I am quite sure there was nothing to justify them in the case of the Minister of Mines. That hon. minister nailed his colours to the mast. When he went into that fight in Victoria, he knew that he was going into a very difficult one because of the strong feeling which had been worked up over the Asiatic question ; and when he gave his adhesion to the policy which this government had adopted, he knew that he was likely on that account to alienate a lot of votes. But he went into the contest, knowing he had that handicap against him, and if he went down, he went down like a man.

A good many hon. gentlemen have spoken on the balance of trade. I should have thought that the balance of trade question had been pretty well threshed out in this House and in this country on many a previous occasion, and even that it had been pretty well threshed out during the present discussion. I certainly do not propose to go into the merits of the balance of trade theory, because I think those who have preceded me have done that quite as fully as there is any occasion for. But when I hear hon. members talking of this terrible thing, this balance of trade against us of $118,000,000 or thereabouts, and of the evil effects it must have upon the welfare of Canada, I cannot but ask myself how it is that almost every nation of which we have knowledge which has a balance of trade against it is a prosperous nation, and almost every nation which has a favourable balance of trade is not a prosperous nation. If my memory serves me well, Russia is a country with the balance of trade decidedly in her favour. On the other hand, Great Britain, as we all know, for many years—I do not remember how many—has had the balance of trade enormously against her. Canada has usually had the balance of trade against her; but can any man look around this Dominion to-day and not be compelled to admit that Canada is going on prospering and to prosper? Never in her history has Canada been in a more prosperous state than to-day. In every part of the Dominion from the small province from which I come, the other maritime provinces, the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec, the great west and the Pacific coast, the Canadian people are better off than they have ever been before. How can we reconcile this prosperity, which is evident on every side, with the opinions of our theoretical friends that an adverse balance of trade is ruinous ? It seems to me that in calculating the balance of trade our friends of the other side overlook a great deal. I am not aware that in making up the balance of trade in personal and other effects any part of the $70,000,000 or more of wealth brought into this country from the United States by the immigrants that are pouring into Canada, is taken into the calculation. I am not aware that large sums in cash brought in by the immigrants coming into Canada are counted in making up the balance of trade. I am not aware that the most valuable asset of all, the men and women who come into the country, have been calculated in making up this balance. Again, if this unfavourable balance of trade is such a terrible thing, and if it is so bad as hon. members tell us and that the duties are all against the Canadian farmer and in favour of the United States farmer—and, of course, it is quite possible these hon. gentlemen may be right—how is it that thousands and tens of thousands of farmers in that tax-blessed land are shaking the dust of their own country from their feet and are coming across to dwell in the Northwest of Canada seeking for homes where the taxes are not so great and, light as they are, according to our friends opposite are very much less favourable to the farmer than are those of the United States?

I listened with considerable curiosity—I think that is the word that best describes my feeling—to the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) who spoke in reply to the hon. member or Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith). He said that at some meeting which he addressed, and which had been referred to by the hon. member for Nanaimo, he had grown reminiscent. I thought we might all grow reminiscent in a case such as that brought before the House by these two hon. members. Judging from the hon. member's remarks there is what looks to me like a conspiracy of the worst elements of the Conservative party to bring the members of this House belonging to that fine old party into disrepute. We find that the hon. member for Vancouver has been the victim of that awful typographical error microbe which seems to be spreading far and wide amongst the Conservative constituencies and people. The hon. member (Mr. Cowan) waxed bold at the conclusion of his speech and threw out challenges to the members of the government, to the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and to every member of the government. These challenges were far flung like 'Kipling's 'far flung battle line,' and seemed to take in every member who professes to be a follower of the right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister of Canada. It struck me that challenges of this kind do not indicate prudence or wisdom on the part of the person who issues them. I fought my own way and carried a constituency along with my hon. friend (Mr. Prowse), and I think I could do it again. But I had enough trouble in that campaign to cause me not to flash challenges round and to keep out of the fight until, by the effluxion of time, I have to go into it again. And I fancy my hon. friend who is looking at me (Mr. Staples) feels as I do. I do not think it an evidence of wisdom on the part of any hon. member to throw these challenges loosely around. I have said that the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) grew reminiscent. I should like to be allowed to be reminiscent too. I had not the honour of a seat in the last parliament, but I occasionally sat in the gallery and listened to the discussions that took place on the floor. I remember that in the last parliament there were two members sitting on the opposition side who seemed to be very fond of throwing out challenges. I am satisfied that hon. members who sat in the last parliament will remember hearing these challenges. They were thrown out to the Prime Minister, to every minister in his cabinet, and to every man who took up arms in behalf of this terrible government. I must say that no one seemed to regard them very seriously. An hon. member whom I may call a knight errant of politics went into that warfare from which those of us who are now in the House returned victorious while some fell in the melee. This hon. gentleman (Mr. Chew) had never had a seat in this House, but he went out to test his prowess in the riding of East Simcoe against a member of the last parliament who had issued these challenges and about whom I do not wish to say anything more than that he is no longer here. In the province of New Brunswick, there was another gentleman who often threw out challenges and talked in very loud tones of voice about the members of the government side of the House. But a friend of mine, a gentleman in the medical profession, a very clever and able man, who had not had a seat in parliament before, applied, I presume, to the political life some of the arts he had learned in the management of our physical bodies, and the hon. gentleman who had been heard so often giving forth his challenges died the death, politically. The honourable and learned member (Mr. McAllister) who succeeded him seems to have added the duties of undertaker to those of the politician, for he buried the gentleman below a cairn of some 350 of a majority. So, Mr. Speaker, I think you will agree with me that challenges of this kind are not wisely made.

The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) spoke on financial matters fully and clearly, and I think very well, although I did not agree with all he had to say. He asked us if we knew where the surpluses came from, and said that if these surpluses had not been taken from the pockets of the people the money would still be in their pockets. I do not always agree with him, but in that case I do, that is unless the money was spent for some other purpose.

The money certainly came out of the pockets of the people, that is a self-evident fact. Does the hon. member object to surpluses? Does he wish the government to go on year in and year out, having no surplus, going into debt for whatever permanent works they may have to erect? Then again we were told that we have £23,400,000 falling due between January 1, 1904, and October 1, 1913. The hon. member then presented a table of colonial stocks in order to show how Canada was falling away. He compared the depreciation of our stocks and those of other nations in the markets of the world. He compared the Canadian three-per cents, which I understood him to say sell at 93½, with the stocks of the Australasian colonies, including New Zealand, and said that New Zealand stocks had advanced from 85 in 1906 to 87 in 1908, while those of the other Australian dependencies had advanced in a similar manner. They were all still some five, six or seven points behind Canadian bonds. Canada, it seems, had lost about 3½ points but still maintained a good lead. That argument was used to show how the credit of Canada was being depreciated owing to the action of the present government when borrowing money and the way in which they carry on the financial affairs of this country. It seems to me the hon. member missed the strongest and most evident lesson that was to be learned from his own figures. That was that these great sister nations of ours out on the southern seas had not yet attained that standard of money value, that high degree of credit, which they ought long ago to have reached. There would seem to me to be no inherent reason why any of the states of Australia or the Dominion of New Zealand should not be able to dispose of its bonds at as high a rate as Canadian bonds are sold at. We all believe that these bonds are safe. Any man investing in Australian bonds would feel that he would get his money back and as a permanent investment he would get a high rate of interest for the bonds which he bought at a low price. So the lesson I took from the hon. gentleman's figures was that Canada having long ago attained the reputation of having gilt-edged securities, standing at the top, among the great countries whose bonds were valued highly and were sought after, is still first, while there of course would be fluctuations in the value of bonds these other countries, whose bonds should be as good as ours, are still away behind and are approaching our standard but slowly. At the present rate it is difficult to tell how long it will take them to catch up to us.

I wish to illustrate the argument used by the case of New Zealand without taking up time to deal with the other states in the southern world. The argument was that owing to the way in which the Finance Minister of Canada had placed various loans, short and long, upon the market, and his poor judgment in issuing them in such a way that we had loans clashing, maturing close together, Canada's credit was bound to suffer. As an illustration it was stated that we had £23,400,000 sterling falling due between January, 1904, and October, 1913. He cited the case of New Zealand, whose bonds were going up very slowly, but still had increased showing, as he said, that they were improving financially while we were falling back. Some three or four weeks ago at the time of the discussion in this House on the granting of naval assistance to Great Britain, I pointed out that in my opinion New Zealand, in her offer of a Dreadnought to Great Britain with promise of another if required, was being generous before being just, in other words she was undertaking to make large presents, away up in the millions, when she ought to be paying her debts. I looked up the position of New Zealand and find that in 1908 she had a net debt of £63,524,961, that is over $300,000,000, a net debt as large as that of Canada. I found also that the ordinary revenue for New Zealand for the year 1907-8 was £8,766,343, and the territorial revenue £250,000, a total of £9,000,000, or about $45,000,000, a little more than one-half the revenue of Canada. Her population, according to the census of 1906, and including the Maoris, amounted to less than 1,000,000, the figures in the Statistical Year-book being 989,555. That means that New Zealand, which was held up to us as a country which was going forward and increasing the value of its bonds, has a net debt of $345 per head for every man, woman and child, including the Maoris, while Canada has a net debt per head of about $45. When I see a country like New Zealand, wonderfully rich in natural resources, going behind in this way, I cease to wonder that her bonds have not attained the position they should have attained. I shall quote from the official year-book of New Zealand for 1908 the position in which that country stands:

> The net public debt, after deducting the accrued sinking fund (£2,928,936) was on March 31, 1908, £63,524,961, an increase of £2,248,419, during the year. About seven years revenue, ordinary and territorial at the present rate would thus be required to pay off the net debt.

Three and a half years' revenue, or perhaps less, would pay off the net debt of Canada. I think you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that it is utterly absurd to compare New Zealand, or these other countries of the eastern world, with Canada. I do not desire to weary the House by referring to the statistics in regard to other countries. I think this is enough. Then the report goes on to say:

> The net indebtedness per head of population (excluding the Maoris) in March, 1890, stood at £60 5s. 3d.; in 1895, £57 9s. 9d.; in 1900, £61 17s. 3d.; in 1905, £66 7s. 4d.; and in 1908, £67 15s. 1d.

And by the time they have begun to issue bonds and to borrow money for these two Dreadnoughts the indebtedness will be another £4 per head. It is preposterous to compare the workings and the financial operations in a country like that with those which have been carried on here. But let us go farther. I wish to read this because I want to point out the position in which New Zealand stands in regard to the time at which the different loans mature. During nine years we will have £23,500,000 worth of loans maturing, but New Zealand is easily first in the matter of loans maturing in a limited time. We find in the same report that:

The large sum of £29,150,302 will fall due on November 1, 1929; £9,580,674 on January 1, 1940, and £9,659,980 on April 1, 1945, making £48,390,956 of the debt repayable during or subsequent to the financial year 1929-30.

I am not going to weary you with longer quotations from this report or with references to these eastern countries. It does seem to me that if you compare the public credit and the market values of bonds issued by Canada with the quotations that have taken place in the market for the bonds of those countries which have been referred to you will agree with me that our Canadian bonds stand immeasurably higher than they have ever stood or can stand for many a year.

The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), speaking the other evening said, referring to the debt per capita, that:

The vital point is what you take out of the individual citizen for all purposes. If my hon. friend had taken up that branch of the argument, he would have shown a different state of things. Whereas in 1896 we took from the people in taxes $5.46 per capita, last year my honourable friend took $11 per capita. That is a vital point.

I would like to ask the hon. member for North Toronto if it is possible for him and his friends to turn their eyes forward instead of backward, to try and forget the financial slough of despond in which Canada was submerged in the last years of their rule. When the present government came into power they removed the shackles which bound the enterprise of our people and prosperity began. The trade of the country and the revenue increased by leaps and bounds, and the people who were about to go away remained at home and those who had gone began to come back. We all remember the exodus that there used to be from different parts of eastern Canada to the United States and, if my memory serves me aright, there were very few people then returning from that country to Canada. But that has all been changed and we have now people coming into this country at different points. A vigorous and wise immigration policy was inaugurated with the result that our prairie lands are being filled up and there are 40 per cent more people in Canada to-day than there were in 1896, all of whom assist in paying this taxation which is looked upon as a crushing one. My hon. friend from North Toronto must bear in mind that neither under this government or under any government were all the taxes levied upon the people paid into the Canadian exchequer, but I do believe that a far larger proportion of the taxes are being paid into the exchequer now than at the time when his government were in power. Owing to the financial policy in vogue then it was believed, and rightly believed, that a very large proportion of the goods that we require in this country were made here and charged for while the government of Canada got no benefit.

Mr. BLAIN. Would my hon. friend explain how it comes that the best sale of bonds ever made in the history of Canada was made a year after this government came into power?

Mr. WARBURTON. The hon. gentleman is asking me a question that, I think, has been explained before. The reason is that in the money markets of the world at that time money was cheap and there was no difficulty in floating first-class bonds. Money was much cheaper then than it is now. The same remark applies to more than bonds. A farmer who wanted to borrow money on mortgage on his farm four or five years ago could borrow it at a cheaper rate of interest than he can obtain to-day. I happen to know something about this because I do some business for loan companies. Within a couple of years they have increased their rate of interest even on gilt-edged farm land mortgage loans. I cannot explain what the causes were which led to cheap money in 1896, but we do know that money was cheaper in all the money markets of the world at that time. What the cause was I leave to financiers to explain I have no doubt the time will come when money will again be cheap. But, to revert to what I was saying, times have improved in this country and the people have become better off. It does not require a great array of figures to prove that the people were better off than they were thirteen years ago. If you drive along the roads or walk along the streets you can see it for yourselves. They live better, dress better, and they buy more, with the natural result that the revenue has increased. There is nothing very extraordinary about that. The trade of the country has doubled, and if the trade of the country has doubled there must be larger receipts coming into the treasury. The people that were turning their faces to the south and crossing to the United States are not doing that now. They are finding their way back and helping to make up the revenues.

Some few evenings ago the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Harris) made a very excellent speech in this House in which he referred to a very excellent article in the Ottawa 'Citizen' of that day. The 'Citizen' the next morning, in referring to that, published another article which was also a very excellent article, but the key-note—I might also call it the text—which ran through the whole of the article was to let the dead past bury its dead, that it was not well to keep up this reference to old financial times or to compare the book-keeping of to-day with the book-keeping under a former government. For some years past the opposition have apparently been trying to get clear of the dead past, but so long as they have as their financial expert—and I have not a word to say against him—a gentleman who in all probability would be Minister of Finance should the Conservatives ever get to power during his political career, how can they bury the dead past? Is not the whole official utterance of our Conservative friends on the fiscal policy simply and solely a voice from the dead past? I was going to call it a moan from the whited sepulchre of Conservative finance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer briefly to the policy of granting bounties, and I would say right here and now that so far as I am individually concerned I am no great lover of bounties. But I love bounties more than I love high protection, and I can very well recognize that there may be occasions when the application of bounties, like the application of the knife in surgery, or of a mustard poultice may do good. I do not believe in the principle of granting bounties as a general thing, nor do I believe in the principle of protection either, although of course we must have revenue to carry on the affairs of the country, and so a revenue tariff is an absolute necessity. I have, however, noticed that industries which get bounties would very much prefer to get protection instead of bounties, and in that light I am led to have a preference for bounties over high protection. I think the fact is undisputed that when duties are levied the manufacturer may in turn levy on his purchasers to the extent that the duty will allow him to do so before outside competition comes in, but when the manufacturer gets a bounty then the moment he goes beyond the bounty outside competitors come in it and keep the price down for those who buy his wares, and so of the two evils I prefer the bounty system to high protection. We have heard a good deal of argument with regard to the system of bookkeeping followed by the Dominion, and possibly the system may be an antiquated system of keeping our accounts, but the difficulty is that if you do change the system you render it difficult to make comparisons between the present and the past condition of public affairs. Let me say in conclusion that I listened to the budget speech of the Minister of Finance with satisfaction and pleasure. I knew that the times were hard, and I was simply surprised that the Minister of Finance had been able to add another to the long list of surpluses which had become a sort of habit with him since he has assumed office.

Mr. J. W. MADDIN (South Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, during this debate I have been struck by the many laboured efforts of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to point out the great difference which they allege to exist between the tariff as it is and the national policy of the Conservative party. It seemed to me that the object of speaker after speaker on the government benches was chiefly to say something uncomplimentary of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and it was quite evident that too many of these gentlemen opposite were inclined to regard the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Foster) from a pessimistic point of view. The hon. gentleman from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) treated the House to a quotation from one of the Scotch poets, and I will venture to offer him a couplet which he and others of his political friends may take into consideration:

> The world's a very funny place where each man plays his role,
> The optimist looks at the doughnut; the pessimist sees but the hole.

And if hon. gentlemen on the government side put on their optimistic glasses when they are dealing with the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto they will see a good deal more than they do now. I wonder if, after all, there is such a great difference between the present tariff and that which the Liberal party found when they came into power in 1896.? We know that prior to 1896 the Liberal party were in the habit of decrying protection from Vancouver to Halifax and Charlottetown, and threatening to destroy it root and branch. Amongst the industries which it was said had fattened at the expense of the toiling masses of the country were such concerns as Frost and Wood and Massey-Harris; yet the Prime Minister was not so very long in power until he found places in the Senate for the Hon. Melvin Jones and the Hon. Frank Frost, so that these agricultural implement industries might have their interests well guarded in the parliament of Canada. This may to some extent account for the fact that during the past thirteen years the government with its tariff for revenue only has seen fit to reduce the tariff on farm implements by only 2½ per cent. The hon. member for Red Deer was not quite content to confine himself to observations on the budget, but thought it well to step aside from the issue before the House to cast animadversions upon the people of Nova Scotia. I quote from the hon. gentleman:

I should always wish to recollect that Nova Scotia is inhabited by a race of men who are reputed to keep the Sabbath and everything else they can lay their hands on.

The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson), who followed the member for Red Deer, censured him for these remarks, and the hon. member for Red Deer informed the hon. member for Digby that he was not quoting him properly. The hon. member for Red Deer said:

If my hon. friend will pardon me, I said they were descended from a race of men who had that reputation.

Which is entirely different from what 'Hansard' credited him with, having actually said. However, later on the hon. member for Digby was followed by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith), who informed the hon. member for Digby that the hon. member for Red Deer was only in fun, that it was only a joke, only a little jovial way we had. Well, I have only this to say, that the hon. member for Red Deer did not say that he was only joking; and if the hon. member for Nanaimo is his apologist and says that it was only a joke, I can assure him that the people of Nova Scotia are not to be joked with in that light. I put it to the hon. members from Nova Scotia on both sides of the House whether they can tolerate aspersions of that kind upon the people of that province.

Mr. McKENZIE. We do not mind it worth a cent.

Mr. MADDIN. I suppose not. I wish to say, with regard to the remark of the hon. member from Red Deer, that the people of Nova Scotia do keep the Sabbath; they also observe the Golden Rule, and that teaches them to deal properly with other things that come into their hands, and I can assure the hon. member for Red Deer, for whom I have a high regard, that it is in no Pecksniffian spirit that I resent the aspersion which he has cast upon the people of my native province. The hon. member for Red Deer, shortly after he had uttered this aspersion against the people of the province of Nova Scotia, spoke about the national policy in these words:

I fail to see how protection ever works in any other way, and I fail to see that its outlook ever entitles it to the high-sounding name of national policy. Show me where it is a national policy in its operation as between the various classes of a country. It is constantly happening in the high protectionist countries of the world, that goods are sold in enormous quantities more cheaply abroad than they are in the country in which they are produced. A well informed American, intimately acquainted with the iron trade, told me the other day that in Pittsburg, in the month of January, 1908, steel rails were sold to the American people in pursuance of a national policy at $28 a ton, and on the same date were sold in Middlesborough on the north east coast of England for $19.50 a ton. Now, if it be a national policy to rob your own people in order to sell cheaply to foreigners, with the incidental advantage of building up a few millionaires in your country, then a policy of high protection is a national policy, but otherwise it is not.

Mr. M. CLARK. Will the hon. member permit me to say that my information referred to 1906, instead of 1908?

Mr. MADDIN. So far as the principle is concerned, the particular year matters not. I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman that the national policy of the Liberal-Conservative party was not a policy of high protection. The Liberal-Conservatives never advocated a policy of high protection; they advocated a policy of adequate protection for Canadian industries, which does not necessarily mean high protection. On the contrary, it may mean a very low tariff, according to the commodity to be safeguarded. The hon. gentleman need not have cited the particular instance of steel rails to bear out the argument he offered to the House; for butter, cheese and flour all cost more where they are produced than in the market to which they are exported. In an inquiry before a board of conciliation in this country, English miners testified that they paid four cents a pound more for Canadian cheese in Nova Scotia than they could buy it for in England, and Five Roses flour, a household flour manufactured in the province of Ontario, can be intercepted in the town of North Sydney, en route to Newfoundland, and sold there at fifty cents per barrel less than the largest firms in the county of Cape Breton can bring it there for. I would like also to point out that beef produced in the province of Ontario and sent to the county of Cape Breton in cold storage can be bought cheaper there than it can be in the city of Ottawa. So the hon. gentleman need not have gone so far afield for an illustration. But his illustration does not bear out his argument. The same thing is proved true in the countries that enjoy free trade. The prices are governed by the conditions surrounding production, and it cannot be argued that it is because of a protective policy that manufactured articles are sold at higher figures where they are manufactured than in the markets to which they are exported. Some hon. gentlemen have endeavoured to impress on the House, and I presume on the country that the policy of the Liberal party differs a great deal from that of the Liberal-Conservative party when they were in power, and I have no doubt, if one were to follow the arguments of some hon. gentlemen opposite to their logical conclusion, that free trade is the goal to which they look forward. I would, however, ask hon. gentlemen from the western provinces and hon. gentlemen from the province of Ontario, on what articles do they consider that the tariff between 1878 and 1896 was very high and whether or not the tariff existing at the present time is not as high as was the tariff of those years. There is nothing in a name, and no one will fail to recognize in the policy being pursued by the Liberal party at the present time the old national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper.

One phase of the budget about which I have not heard much during this discussion is the question of coal. The hon. Finance Minister, in his budget speech, steered clear of that question altogether; but previous to coming into power in 1896, the Liberal party, including the hon. Finance Minister, the right hon. leader of the government, and many gentlemen who support these hon. gentlemen to-day, were very anxious about the coal industry of the country, and professed to be the great friends of the coal miners and the coal industry of Nova Scotia. At the first session after the Liberal party came into power in 1896, Mr. Tisdale, on behalf of Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, asked the following question;

Mr. TISDALE (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked:

1. Did the First Minister receive a telegram reading as follow:

Pictou, June 18, 1896.

Honourable Wilfrid Laurier, Mtl.

Conservative misrepresentations render it extremely important assurance should be given that coal interests would be guarded. Answer.

(Sgd.) E. M. MACDONALD.

And the Prime Minister replied as follows:

Black Lake, Que.

E. M. Macdonald, Pictou

Policy to be followed as laid down in Liberal platform adopted at Ottawa convention. Coal interests will be carefully guarded.

(Sgd.) WILFRID LAURIER.

If these telegrams were sent and received, will the Prime Minister now definitely explain what is meant by the sentence 'Coal interests will be carefully guarded?'

The Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) received a telegram identical with the telegram now quoted, he sent an answer identical with the answer now quoted and the Prime Minister now definitely explains that what was meant by the sentence, 'Coal interests will be carefully guarded' was that at the proper time, coal interests would be guarded carefully.

This explanation of the right hon. the leader of the government was significant at the time and is significant now. I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that for the last two years the coal industry in Nova Scotia has been suffering substantially. During those two years the Montreal market has been encroached on by the American coal operators to the extent of 664,000 tons of coal altogether namely, 90,000 tons of coal dust, 400,000 tons of bituminous and 174,000 tons of anthracite coal. That was in the year 1908. In that year there were 664,000 tons more American coal entering the St. Lawrence than in the year 1906. I quote these figures to show the inroads that American coal are making on the St. Lawrence trade to the detriment of Canadian coal, and I do so in order that the right hon. the Prime Minister may take the opportunity to carefully guard our coal interests because the time has really come when they need guarding. The coal business in Nova Scotia during this past winter has waxed exceeding dull. I would like to point out that the Prime Minister was not the only one to exhibit some anxiety regarding that industry. In 1897, when the hon. the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) was called from the premiership in Nova Scotia to take up the higher and more onerous position in the federal House which he now occupies, the hon. G. H. Murray was chosen to replace him. The first thing Mr. Murray did was to go to the country in 1897. During that election, the issue was whether or not the government of Nova Scotia should adopt such tactics and bring such influences to bear on the federal government having a friend at court in the person of the finance minister as would insure proper protection to the coal industry of Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), who was a candidate at that election, endeavoured to convince the people, as did Mr. Murray himself, that if the duty on bituminous coal, which had been imposed by the Conservative party in 1896, was not sufficient, the Liberal government at Ottawa would place a duty on anthracite coal as well. And in 1898, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) after carrying the county, was making a speech in the local House in reply to the address, and from that speech I wish to quote a few remarks:

Some of our friends, that are members of the opposition, may be inclined to say that because we take that position that means we have adopted the Conservative policy. I propose to show the fallacy of that contention. What was the position of the Conservative party upon this question? They claimed to be the special conservators of the coal industry of this country; they claimed to be giving it great protection; they claimed, Sir, that the bread and butter of the operatives of the coal mines in this country depended upon their remaining in power, and you would believe that a government considering protection to be such a good thing would have lavished all the wealth of their protectionist policy upon this one industry. We find them doing nothing of the kind. We find that in dealing with the coal industry of this country they were not giving a protective tariff. We find, taking the total imports of articles used in the prosecution of that industry that the average of the duty imposed by the late government was less than ten per cent. What title could they have from their standpoint to be called the conservators of the industry of this country? Their policy of a revenue tariff in this particular instance was not a protective policy in any degree. Considering the attitude of the American people I say that if the late government had wished to lay any claim to the title of protectors of the coal industry they should have imposed a duty on anthracite coal. They should not have allowed $4,000,000 worth of American coal to be imported into Canada every year free of duty when the people in Ohio who sent it were those in the congress of the United States, which said: 'We should press Canada all we can.'

That was the attitude of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) in the Nova Scotia legislature in 1898. He said that in order for the Conservative party to be in a position to claim the credit of having been the conservators of the coal trade of Nova Scotia, they should have imposed a duty on anthracite as well as bituminous coal, and he pointed out the deplorable condition existing, under which $4,000,000 worth of American coal had gone into Ontario free of duty. Well, in the last fiscal year $20,000,000 actually went into that province from the United States, and the encroachment made in the Montreal market previously controlled absolutely by Nova Scotia, has been increased to the extent of over 600,000 tons, which means the winter's work of many of the miners in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton. And this is taking place under the American tariff which discriminates against our coal to the extent of seven cents per ton. Under article 415 of the United States tariff, the duty against our coal is 67 cents per ton of 28 bushels of 80 pounds each, or 67 cents per long ton of 2,240 pounds, as compared with our tariff of 53 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds. That amounts to a discrimination of seven cents per ton in favour of American coal against Canadian coal. This may not look very much, but when it is borne in mind that, in competing for contracts in the Canadian market, a matter of one cent or two cents or three cents, where the contract is for several hundred thousand tons, may turn the scale, it will be seen what advantage it would be to have our tariff remedied so as to do away with that discrimination.

I was struck with the lack of unanimity which has characterized the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite in dealing with that coal question. We all remember the observations of the hon. member for Cape Breton and North Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) in this House on the 22nd inst. These observations, I endorse in every particular. But I was also struck with the remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith). Nothing short of free coal would satisfy the hon. gentleman. It appears to me therefore that unanimity among the rank and file of the government followers on the coal question is singularly lacking. It may be interesting to hon. gentlemen however to learn that the hon. member for Cape Breton Mr. McKenzie) had addressed himself to this question on a previous occasion. Speaking in the legislature of Nova Scotia in 1901, in moving the reply to a speech from the Throne, he used the following language:

Our fisheries, our coal mines, and our manufactures of iron and steel, are perhaps matters which receive the largest amount of attention in the province of Nova Scotia. It is gratifying to know that the coal industry of the province is to-day on a better footing than it ever was before, and when I talk about the coal industry I talk about something that comes very near home to myself, for I represent a county that has a larger coal industry within its bounds perhaps than any other county in Canada—certainly than any other county in Nova Scotia. We have in the county of Cape Breton the Dominion Coal Company. We used to have there the General Mining Association, which has now changed its name, although the property is still there and is worked by another company —the Nova Scotia Steel Company—which is well and favourably known in connection with other works apart from its works in the county of Cape Breton. When the Dominion Coal Company came into Cape Breton seven years ago, the whole output of coal in the island, including what was mined and shipped by the General Mining Association, together with every other mine then in operation in Cape Breton, was 800,000 tons. This was considered a very large and great output at that time. When we consider that this was the output seven years ago, and that in this year now current, we have the fullest assurances from Mr. Donkin, the manager of the Dominion Coal Company, that the output of that company alone will be 3,000,000 tons, we have evidence of prosperity, which is perhaps, unprecedented in any part of the Dominion, and the government of this province is to be congratulated indeed upon the successful result of its policy in respect to the coal mining industry.

Further on the hon. gentleman said:

It is not for me to say to-day whether or not duties should be levied on coal, but I will say this, that I am willing to stand by anything that is necessary to protect the coal industry or any other industry in Nova Scotia, and if duties are necessary for the protection of the coal industry in Nova Scotia, let us have duties. But I say this, and I do not say it on my own authority, but on the authority of those concerned in the business —that as far as the coal industry of Nova Scotia is concerned, it is independent of duties of any kind. The coal production of the Dominion Coal Company will be more than consumed by the works at Sydney, and by the works at Everett in Massachusetts, and it will take all the time of the other companies to supply other markets. I do not want to be misunderstood—I am in favour of duties upon coal, and of bounties upon iron, and of anything and everything that is considered to be necessary for the protection of every industry now established or hereafter to be established in the province of Nova Scotia or in the Dominion. But I have been assured by those deeply concerned in the business that the coal business of Nova Scotia is absolutely independent of the result of duties. This is the state of the coal industry in Cape Breton, and I am sure there it like prosperity in every other part of the province.

The result of this enterprise has been that the people engaged in this coal industry, and whose living depends upon it are happy and prosperous. It has been a fact that in the past, for four months, and perhaps five and six months in the year, the people of Cape Breton who depended on the coal industry for their livelihood were idle and that the wages of the other six months were eaten up by getting goods on credit, and that in that way they were continuously in debt and unable to have a dollar in their pockets. But to-day the conditions are changed, and these men can obtain employment continuously throughout the year, and one sometimes hears the complaint from a man that he does not get a moment of rest. That is a complaint, however, with which we can have no sympathy.

Now, these are some observations from hon. gentlemen opposite in speaking about the coal question. And, in view of the observations of the hon. member for Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) in the legislature of Nova Scotia, it does seem to me it might well be difficult for the Minister of Finance to know what to do under the circumstances. The coal industry in Nova Scotia has had a hard time of it during the last two or three years, and particularly during the last year. The capability of the coal operators to compete with American coal, of course, depends on the cost of production in the province of Nova Scotia, and I wish to point out to the members of the House that the responsibility for the cost of production in Nova Scotia rests in large measure with the local government of that province, for, during the regime as premier of the province of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and during more recent years under the present administration headed by the Hon. Geo. H. Murray in that province, the manner in which the coal leases are dealt with and handed out in that province has gone a long way to hamper the cheap production of coal. The railway charters have also cut no unimportant figure in the province in that matter. In the county of Inverness, in 1887, Hon. Geo. H. Murray, now Premier of Nova Scotia, who was not then even in the legislature, but merely a private citizen, along with some other gentlemen, secured a charter to build a railway from the Strait of Canso up through Port Hood, Mabour and by St. Rose and Margaree to Cheticamp. That covers the section of which I wish to speak, though it was to proceed further and eventually join the Intercolonial near Grand Narrows. This charter called for the building of the line in five years. The gentlemen who had secured the charter had the charter renewed from time to time, and eventually it was handed over to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann. These gentlemen had secured coal areas in Inverness, and these they proceeded to develop and they built the railway as far as their own mines. It is a fact that there are large and valuable coal areas north of the town of Inverness which are undeveloped, this lack of development being due solely to the fact that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann have not completed the railway for which a charter was granted in 1887. As I have said, they completed the railway up to their own mines. But from time to time they found the government of Nova Scotia so plastic as to assure them of the renewal of the charter, and the county council of Inverness so plastic and pliable as to renew their free right of way through Inverness. The Nova Scotia Collieries Company hold coal areas at St. Rose, three or four miles from Margaree. They have two or three valuable seams of coal, six, seven and nine feet in thickness, which they are unable to develope for want of railway facilities. Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann are not disposed to complete this road for the benefit of one of their competitors, yet the Nova Scotia government has allowed this charter to be renewed from time to time at the behest of these gentlemen and to the prejudice of the development of valuable coal areas in Nova Scotia. There is another feature in the cost of production of coal in Nova Scotia, and that is the manner in which the coal leases in that province are dealt with. There are no less than 148 coal leases in Nova Scotia held by speculators. We must all admit, and it must be apparent to hon. gentlemen whether acquainted with the coal trade or not, that coal, in order to be cheaply produced, must be taken from somewhere near the surface, that if coal is produced at a great distance from the surface the cost of production is necessarily increased. In the county of Cape Breton, the Dominion Coal Company is the only company in a position to produce coal at a reasonably low cost. The Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, on the other side of the harbour, is producing coal in a number of instances from a distance of a mile and a half or a mile and three-quarters from the foot of their shaft. Only last July, in company with the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, Professor Adam Shortt, I had an opportunity to go down the Queen pit shaft of the Sydney mines, which is on the shore near Cranberry Head, and is sunk to a depth of 800 feet. We travelled 2,460 yards to a tool house or station where the miners' lamps are tested and they get their tools to proceed to their work. This will give some idea of the cost of mining coal to that company. When it is borne in mind that this company were obliged to drive through crushes in order to win the coal at even this great distance, one can form a still further idea of the cost of production. The company cannot develop the areas to the south because they are bounded by the Dominion Coal Company, or to the north because these areas are held by private individuals and concerns that are not developing.

Let us leave that county for a moment and go up to the county of Pictou. There the two principal producing concerns are the Acadia Coal Mining Company and the Intercolonial Coal Mining Company. Both these companies are circumscribed in their operations and the result is that their slopes have been sunk to a depth now of over 7,000 feet and the great output of coal comes from a distance of over a mile from the surface. When we remember that driving for such a distance the roof and pavement becomes bad and a great amount of unskilled labour is required to keep up air ways, timber and ventilating, we can form some idea of the cost of producing coal there. This condition exists notwithstanding the fact that there are over 140 coal leases in Nova Scotia tied up in the hands of non-producing speculators. We are givn to understand that the coal in that province is vested in the Crown and may be mined on payment of a royalty of so much a ton, but still this large number of leases have found their way into the possession of speculators. The member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie), in his observations before the local legislature in 1901, was very proud to point out that in past years the miners of the county of Cape Breton were obliged for four and even five or six months of the year to go without employment, and that their earnings during the months they worked were sometimes eaten up, and they were obliged to go into debt in some instances in the four or six months of loafing. I would point out to him that the conditions of the miners of Cape Breton county and of the province of Nova Scotia were very much better from 1878 to 1896 than they have been from 1896 until the present time. I wish to show that the miners in the province of Nova Scotia are in a more deplorable condition at present than they ever were under he regime of the Liberal-Conservative party. In 1878 when Sir Charles Tupper came to the east to announce the national policy of the Liberal-Conservative party, the coal industry of Nova Scotia was at its very lowest ebb. At that time, standing on the site now occupied by the Dominion Steel Company in the city of Sydney, Sir Charles pointed out that before any great length of time iron and steel works would doubtless grow up under the national policy. He announced that it was the intention of the Conservative party if returned to power to place a duty on coal, and to make the duty so adequate as to develop the mineral resources of the country and to afford adequate protection to its industries; that protection would be given to the iron and steel industries of the country, and he said the time was not far distant—waving his hand toward the shores of Sydney harbour—when great smoke stacks would rise up from iron and steel and smelting works upon those shores. He spoke as a prophet. In 1878 Sir John Macdonald commencing at the west and Sir Charles Tupper at the east, went through the country and preached the national policy. The people of Nova Scotia and of the Dominion took them at their word, and they were swept into power in 1878. In 1879 they brought down that tariff affording us adequate protection for coal. In 1883 they commenced the bounties on iron and steel. The legislation providing for bounties on iron and steel was introduced by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), who was Finance Minister, in 1891, and during those eighteen years the development of the mineral resources of the province of Nova Scotia was an established fact. It only required the continuation of the fostering care of the Liberal-Conservative administration to secure the growth, development and extension of these industries. It is quite true that up to 1896 the output of these mines was not so large as to warrant the shipment of coal in winter. Some of the mines banked more coal and some less; some none at all, and so at some of the collieries of Nova Scotia work during the winter fell off considerably, with the result, as the hon. member for Victoria quite rightly said, the miners for four and sometimes six months in the year were unable to find employment about the colieries. But they were enabled to make their daily bread the year around; they brought up and reared about them large families and enjoyed as good a measure of prosperity as they do to-day. What is their position to-day? It is practically true that for eight or nine or ten years the miners of Nova Scotia have been afforded employment for twelve months of the year.

and if these twelve months were to be proportionately as remunerative as their employment during the months they were at work prior to 1896, you would expect that, having their employment practically doubled, they would be twice as well off. That, however, is not the case. In the county of Cape Breton the miners do not own their own homes; they live in company's houses; they trade in company's stores, and it is safe to say that at least 30 per cent of them have never known for the last seven years what it is to be out of debt in the company's books. Striking instances have been brought to my attention time and time again. There are at least hundreds of instances where the indebtedness of a family in the books of a coal company in Cape Breton aggregate from $600 to $1,000. If the condition of the miners in Nova Scotia was deplorable before 1896 because they were able to work only six, seven or eight months in the year, but were still able to make a livelihood, I submit that they were very much better off, having the additional four or five months off to improve their minds, than they are to-day when they are able to work for twelve months but are still in the unfortunate position I have described. I am not viewing their position from any pessimistic point of view. I would be very sorry indeed, coming from amongst them as I do, to make their case out as worse than it is, but I have been brought in personal contact with so many instances such as I have described that I cannot allow the opportunity to go by without pointing out that the condition of the miner of Nova Scotia is to-day not as good as it was pervious to 1896, notwithstanding that the men are now able to work for twelve months in the year. I have brought these matters to the attention of the government. The Minister of Finance in a by-election in the county of Cape Breton in 1896, he being then premier of Nova Scotia, seemed to have very little sympathy with the coal duties as enjoyed by the operators of Nova Scotia. I do not wish to be understood as a suppliant on behalf of the mine operators in Nova Scotia, because as a class I do not think Boswell ever slobbered over Johnston as abjectly as the mine operators of Nova Scotia as a class fawned over the government in power, whether it be Liberal or Conservative. This was true of them previous to 1896, and it is true now. Thus it is not out of any feeling I have for the coal operators of Nova Scotia, but rather out of feeling for those who are employed that I speak. Their interests are so interwoven and so closely associated with those of the coal operators that it seems to me the government should introduce some remedy to relieve the situation in connection with coal in the province of Nova Scotia.

As I observed a few moments ago, the Finance Minister was not so friendly to the coal operators of Nova Scotia in 1896. He was wont to say, according to the 'Morning Chronicle,' speaking in Temperance hall, Sydney, in 1896, that if the coal industry of Nova Scotia could not exist without duties let them close down the mines. I have quoted to you the telegram sent out by the right hon. Prime Minister to the hon. member for Pictou on the 18th June, 1896. I have referred you to the observations of the hon. member for Pictou in the local legislature in 1898 when he said that for a government to be able to pose as the conservators of the coal industry they should impose a duty on anthracite as well as on bituminous coal. I have pointed out the observations of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria. When the right hon. Prime Minister went to the country in the last general election he had for his slogan 'Let Laurier finish his work.' Inferentially, I presume, he is not going to the country again in person or at the head of his party to seek re-election for another term in power. I have pointed out that the coal industry of Nova Scotia is now in need of the guardianship which he promised to give it in 1896. I believe from the observations of the press and of the Prime Minister that he is not going to the country again, and therefore I would urge upon him and his administration that they study carefully the needs of the coal interests in Nova Scotia. I believe that we are not again to have the spectacle of the Prime Minister leading his party in another election. No longer are we to see him as, on the 2nd of October last, we saw him in the county of Russell with his political stock in trade, leading in the van himself with his beaming countenance and sunny smile, speaking the liquid and dulcet language of diplomacy and accompanied by his Irish Catholic Secretary of State, good natured, genial and gentlemanly, and the rear brought up by the Highland Scotch bagpipers of the city of Ottawa. I believe that we are not to see a pageantry of this kind again in the political history of Canada, and I would therefore urge upon the Prime Minister—

Mr. McKENZIE. You do not expect to die before the next election?

Mr. MADDIN. I expect to be very much in the flesh. I would urge upon the Prime Minister that he carefully consider the observations which I have submitted this evening. I have quoted the remarks of hon. gentlemen who support him. The Prime Minister has the Finance Minister from Nova Scotia, he has the hon. member for Pictou and the hon. member for Cape Breton North. These are all great conservators of the coal industry of Nova Scotia and I would ask them and the government: 'What are you going to do about it?' There is no doubt the coal industry has substantially fallen off and as one of the best evidences that the miners of Cape Breton are not enjoying the wonted and boasted prosperity I need only mention that Dominion No. 6 mine has closed down during February and March, or partially closed down. The mine had not been idle three weeks until public subscriptions were called for and the clergy and members of the local legislature were called upon to form committees to provide relief for miners in that community. Hardly a week passes but there are instances of distress brought to the attention of the authorities in the mining towns of Nova Scotia. So much in regard to the coal question.

The hon. member for Queens, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Warburton), while discussing the budget, just preceding me, spoke of the emigration that took place when the Liberal-Conservatives were in power. He said that it was quite a common thing for the people to leave the farms and the country, but that now they were coming back to us. Under the wise administration of this government the people were coming back to their native heath, were coming once again to Canadian soil. There was no one so well able to depict the sad consequences of the flight from the maritime provinces of the people to the United States as the hon. member for Pictou. I have heard him, with a great deal of pleasure, in the most unctuous tones describing the aged pair saying the family devotions and praying for the return of their beloved ones, and he prophesied that this was going to take place as soon as the Liberal party were in power. But the hon. member for Queens has endeavoured to show us that the people are flocking back again to the land of their birth. In 1908 $2,000,000 worth of household effects were shipped into the United States from Canada. What does that mean? It means that $2,000,000 worth of family effects followed the families there that have gone over to the stars and stripes, and if you take into consideration the large number of young men and young women who have gone and taken no family effects with them, you will have some idea of the extent to which emigration from this country is going on even at the present time. I do not know how it is in the province of the hon. member for Queens, but I can assure him and this House that the people are not rushing and flocking back to Nova Scotia from the United States. There are hundreds and thousands of vacant farms in Nova Scotia, and these have been continually increasing in number from 1896 down to the present time. An effort is being made by the local government to induce settlers to come to Nova Scotia, but when one bears in mind that there are more Nova Scotians in the state of Massachusetts than there are in Nova Scotia one can form some idea of the extent to which the population of the maritime provinces has been depleted by immigration to that country. I take issue with the hon. member for Queens when he says that the people are rushing back. Since 1896 we have lost two representatives from Nova Scotia because we did not have population enough to enable us to retain our representation in parliament. Formerly we enjoyed twenty members, but now we have only eighteen, and this is the most striking evidence one could have as to the falling off in population in Nova Scotia.

There is one other matter that I would like to direct the attention of the government to in connection with this debate and it has reference to the English mail boats, I would like to urge upon the government the desirability of having the English mail boats call at Sydney harbour during the summer months. I submit that during the past two years, when these boats have called at North Sydney, the experiment has demonstrated the advisability, the sureness and shortness of that route as compared with any other route that these boats could take. I would urge it for the further reason that it would help the Intercolonial Railway which seems to be an eye-sore to some of our friends from the upper province. The English mail boats discharge the mails at Halifax in winter, and there is no good reason why they should not drop the Nova Scotia freight there as well. I can see no reason why the subsidized steamers which carry the mails for eastern Canada and the freight for the different provinces should proceed to St. John after simply dropping the mails at Halifax. What earthly reason can there be why they should not put off at Halifax the freight for Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island? The common practice at present is that the freight goes through to the city of St. John, where it is discharged, and the St. John wholesale houses are able to put their goods on the Halifax market before the Halifax wholesale dealer gets his goods which come on the same steamer. It seems that when the steamer arrives in St. John and the freight is put on shore there, the Canadian Pacific Railway in their anxiety to expedite the traffic for the west throw the eastern freight aside; and the St. John freight is taken possession of promptly by the merchants of that city, while the Nova Scotia freight is subsequently sent over the Intercolonial Railway at an additional freight expense of 50 cents per ton to the consumers of Nova Scotia. That is a hardship and it is a discrimination against the merchants of Nova Scotia for which there is no excuse. I beg to submit further that during that period of the year when the Cabot straits are free from ice, the boats should make North Sydney a port of call, which would result in the landing of quite a number of passengers and a good deal of freight there, and incidentally benefit the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt). Mr. Speaker: When the Minister of Finance made his budget speech the other day the furthest thing from my thoughts was that I should take any part in this discussion, but, as the debate went on certain statements were made in connection with western questions, which as a representative of a western constituency I feel it my duty to challenge, and which I shall undertake to prove were absolutely unfounded and misleading. Let me in the first place congratulate the Minister of Finance and the government on the very excellent financial statement which has been presented to the House. Of course the opposition members do not take the optimistic view of things which we on the government side take, but, realizing as we all must the financial depression that has existed for the last two or three years not only in Canada but throughout the world, it is a remarkable thing that notwithstanding the falling off in our revenue and notwithstanding the heavy expenditures made by this government for the building of railways, especially in western Canada, the Minister of Finance was able to announce to the House a surplus instead of a deficit. And, Sir, in view of what the government of Canada have been doing for the development of the west and the encouragement of immigration and the consequent necessary expenditures, if the Minister of Finance had come to this House with a deficit instead of a surplus he would have met with no condemnation from the large majority of the people west of Lake Superior. We all know that under the Conservative government if a railway was to be built in any part of the west it received aid from the government in the form of bonuses and land grants, and it is notorious that a large part of the heritage of the people of the west was given away by the Conservative government for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railways. But when the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power it had a different policy and that policy was to pledge the credit of all Canada in aid of railways which were absolutely necessary for the development of our great prairie provinces. As a result of that eminently satisfactory policy the country has the railways and the people have the land. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Glen Campbell) who I am glad to see is in his seat, undertook to question the statement of the Minister of Finance that the policy of this government was the land for the settler, and he claimed that since the Liberals came to power they had been prodigal and profligate in giving away the lands of the people in aid of railway construction. I do not know where the hon. gentleman got his information, but I propose to enlighten him, and I suppose he is open to enlightenment. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) made that statement I had a very strong impression that it was not correct, and the result of my inquiry since has been that the very contrary is the case, and that this government has not given away the lands of western Canada to railway corporations. It is true that under this government lands have been selected for railways, but in every instance these were lands that were given to the railways during the regime of the Conservative government. In this House last year, the Minister of the Interior dealt with this very question of western lands in answer to a series of questions which were put by the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Wilbert McIntyre), to be found in 'Hansard' of 1908, volume 4, at page 8182, in regard to lands in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, granted as bonuses to railways by the government of Canada previous to the 30th of June, 1896, and those given away since that date; and in answer to these questions the Minister of the Interior made the following statement:

1. The total acreage in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta in odd numbered sections of lands granted to railways before the 30th June, 1896, was 29,550,179 acres.

2. The total acreage in even numbered sections granted to railways before the 30th June, 1896, was 2,212,775 acres.

3. The acreage in odd numbered sections of land granted to railways since the 30th June, 1896, to 1st November, 1907—none.

4. The acreage in even numbered sections granted to railways since the 30th June, 1896, to 1st November, 1907—none.

5. The acreage of add nuubered sections otherwise disposed of before the 30th June, 1896, was:

Classed as swamp lands.. ..	453,647	acs. est.
Surveyed school lands..	4,375,200	" "
Other lands..	3,155.056	" "
Total..	7,984,803	" "

6. The acreage of even numbered sections disposed of before the 30th June, 1896, otherwise than as homesteads with Hudson Bay Company as excluded was:

Classed as swamp lands.. ..	453,647	acs. est.
As sub. railway lands..	2,212,775	" "
Other lands..	2,475,485	" "
Total..	5,141,907	" "

7. The acreage of odd numbered sections otherwise disposed of since the 30th June, 1896, to 1st November, 1907, is:

Classed as swamp lands.. ..	688,308	acs. est.
Surveyed school lands..	1,951,500	" "
Other lands..	1,402,988	" "
Total..	4,042,796	" "

8. The acreage of even numbered sections disposed of other than as homesteads with Hudson Bay Company land excluded since the 30th June 1896 to 1st November, 1907, is:

Classed as swamp lands..	688,308 acres.
As subsidies railway lands..	None.
Other lands..	2,240,505 "
Total..	2,928,813 "

9. The acreage of Indian reserves surrendered and sold before the 30th June, 1896, is 17,828 acres.

10. The acreage of Indian reserves surrendered and sold since the 30th June, 1896, to 1st November, 1907, is 198,987 acres.

11. The total acreage in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta covered by homestead entries and pre-emptions with cancellations deducted before the 30th June, 1896, is:

Pre-emptions..	1,712,960 acres.
Homesteads..	6,208,440 "
Total..	7,921,400 "

12. The acreage covered by homestead entries and pre-emptions with cancellations deducted since the 30th June, 1896, to the 1st November, 1907, is:

Pre-emptions..	None.
Homesteads..	23,592,590 acres.

Of course, this return only brings the figures down to the 1st of November, 1907, and I have not heard that the government has since that date made any land grants to railways in western Canada, while with regard to the lands given to settlers in western Canada by this government up to date, I am free to say that the amount mentioned in the return falls very far short of the mark. This is the answer to the statement made by an hon. member in this House that this government had been giving away the lands of western Canada to railway corporations. So far as that is true, it has been in consequence of contracts entered into by the preceding government, which this government was in honour bound to carry out. The hon. member for Dauphin also undertook to attack the bargain that was made by this government with the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Saskatchewan Valley and Manitoba Land Company.

Mr. NEELY. The 250,000 acres referred to were disposed of, if my information is correct, to the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company. The hon. gentleman found fault with the government for having, as he stated, disposed of this land for the paltry sum of $1 per acre, leading the House by inference to believe that the government had granted a very great concession to the men who formed that company. The hon. gentleman might just as well tell the House that when the government allows an actual settler to go to a Dominion land office anywhere in western Canada and obtain a quarter-section of land for the insignificant sum of $10, he is getting that land for a ten dollar bill, whereas the hon. member and every other member of this House knows that the actual homesteader does not acquire the patent of his homestead by the spending of a $10 bill, but only by fulfilling the homestead regulations as to residence and cultivation duties. They call for a certain amount of expenditure in each year during three years before the homesteader can get his patent. The hon. gentleman knows that when the bargain was made by which the government disposed to the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company 250,000 acres at $1 an acre, there were conditions attached. That company bound itself to perform a certain amount of immigration work. It obliged itself to settle 32 actual settlers in every township in which its lands were located, and the hon. gentleman ought to know that before that company ever succeeded in putting a homesteader on a quarter-section of that 250,000 acres, it had to spend, not a few dollars, but many thousands. So that to say that the company obtained the land for $250,000 is absolutely wide of the mark, and I am happy to have this opportunity of enlightening the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Glen Campbell). No doubt the hon. gentleman made statements similar to those he has made in this House to the people in the constituency of Dauphin who, being situated a considerable distance from the locality where these lands were situated, were without better information than the hon. gentleman gave them. It is no wonder, therefore that he should sit in this House as a representative of a constituency in Manitoba. He sits here by virtue of such statements made in the last election in connection with this Saskatchewan Valley Land Company contract.

Regarding that contract, I have just this to say. While the hon. gentleman and others of the same political stripe have made the statement in this House and on the public platform that this was a bad bargain, it seems to me that the people of that part of the country directly interested ought to be the better judges as to the quality of that bargain. Well, I am fairly familiar with the conditions that existed there before these lands were turned over to that company. Not more than eight or ten years ago, you might take a train on the Saskatchewan, Qu'Appelle and Long Lake Railway, which runs from Regina to Prince Albert, and after you had left Regina some twenty or thirty miles, you would travel through that country for a distance of 125 to 150 miles and you would see perhaps a coyote or gopher or other animals that inhabit the unpopulated prairie, but you would look in vain for actual settlers. To-day, however, that country is inhabited by thousands of settlers, homesteaders and others, who have taken up lands and are living on them. The conditions along that line of railway at the time the government made this contract were such as I have described. Why was that country not then settled? Why is it settled to-day? People went to that country through the efforts of the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company and made homes there for themselves and are prospering, so that instead of a bare desert, we find thousands of people now located there and cultivating profitable farms. But how comes it that that country lay barren so long? One of the reasons was that the railway company gave it a black eye by refusing to accept the lands given it as a bonus for building the lines from Regina to Prince Albert. The company refused because they said the lands were not fit for settlement and therefore did not meet the terms of the contract under which they undertook to build the railway. That was the condition of things when the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company was offered the land and purchased it from this government at $1 an acre, subject to the settlement duties I have described. And to-day if that country is well settled, it is due to the energetic colonizing efforts of the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company. If the people of that district believed that this was a bad bargain, if they thought that this government had given away the heritage of the people, surely we would find those people to-day strongly opposing the government which put through that bargain. Yet my hon. friend from Dauphin (Mr. Glen. Campbell), who took some small part in the provincial elections in Saskatchewan last August, will bear me out when I tell him that every provincial constituency along the line of that railway from Prince Albert South in which this land is situated, returned last August a supporter of the Hon. Walter Scott. Surely that is sufficient answer to the hon. gentleman. At any rate it was perfectly satisfactory to the Liberal party last August and an effective reply to those who were seeking, during that campaign, to traduce the character of the Premier of Saskatchewan—a man, who, so far as honesty and integrity are concerned, has not his superior in the Dominion to-day. In that connection I wish to say that I deplore and resent the attempt made in this House by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Glen Campbell) to besmirch the fair fame of the Premier of Saskatchewan.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he, as a man and a gentleman, on his honour, mean to tell this House that he honestly believes that Walter Scott did not get the certificate of stock I spoke of?

Mr. NEELY. The hon. gentleman does not need to put me on my honour in order to get me to make a true statement. But to gratify him, I will say on my honour that I do not believe for one moment that Walter Scott, the Premier of Saskatchewan, ever received one share or one dollar's worth of stock, and I want to say further that I have the word of Mr. Scott himself, in that connection and the sworn affidavit, right in my possession, of officers of that company, who state that neither in the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company nor the company formed to handle the Canadian Northern lands, the Saskatchewan and Manitoba Land Company, does Mr. Scott hold or did he ever hold one dollar's worth or one share of stock.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Perhaps I may be allowed to interject a remark. What I said on Friday night with regard to the Hon. Walter Scott and his getting a certificate of stock in the way I stated is, to my knowledge, as far as a man can believe his eyes and believe his ears, absolutely correct and true.

Mr. NEELY. When the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) undertakes to make statements of that kind, he ought not to ask this House to accept his bare statement; he ought to bring some substantial proof. If he brings that proof, every hon. member will be compelled to believe his statement. But, on the other side, we have the declaration of Hon. Walter Scott himself. I have also the sworn declarations of Mr. A. D. McRae, secretary and treasurer of the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company, and the statement of Colonel Davidson, one of the chief officers. And I say that when this charge was made in the provincial elections in Saskatchewan last August, notwithstanding the fact that one of these gentlemen is a supporter of the party to which my hon. friend from Dauphin belongs, when he saw these statements in the Conservative press of Saskatchewan, he came forward like a man and a gentleman and gave an affidavit that these statements were absolutely false.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If I have permission to speak, I would like to say a word concerning the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Neely) statement that proof is necessary. I give as proof this fact—that when Hon. Walter Scott knew that the charge was made on the platform, and made over the signature of one of the directors of that company, he went to the length of telegraphing up to Balcarres to have that man arrested. His friends did not arrest the man. Yet Hon. Walter Scott, knowing that his name was besmirched publicly up there, has not to this moment dared to institute any proceedings against the man I speak of, the man who handed him the certificate of stock personally.

Mr. NEELY. And I want to repeat that the reason the Hon. Walter Scott did not prosecute the men and newspapers who made that charge was that these men and newspapers withdrew the charge.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This charge was not withdrawn and never will be withdrawn.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) has had an excellent opportunity to explain his position on this question——

Mr. CAMPBELL. Thank you; I appreciate it.

Mr. NEELY—I want to say that the charge was withdrawn.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a point of order. I stated absolutely, and as a member of this House, that the charge I referred to had never been withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is one of fact of which I am not competent to judge as between the hon. gentlemen. It is customary for members of the House to accept a statement made by another member.

Mr. NEELY. I am not stating that I do not believe that the hon. gentleman thinks he is telling the truth when he is making this statement. I am simply contradicting the assertion. The hon. gentleman said he believed that——

Mr. CAMPBELL. I state that I know it.

Mr. NEELY. I state that I believe absolutely the contrary, and I see no reason why my word should not be taken as well as that of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell). I have documents here to show that the charge was withdrawn by Conservative newspapers of the province. For instance, there was the Saskatoon 'Capital,' the chief Conservative organ of the central part of Saskatchewan. When Mr. McRae went to this newspaper for the purpose of giving his affidavit that Hon. Walter Scott never had stock in the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company, they said to Mr. McRae, 'Oh, we made a mistake; we are on the wrong track; what we meant was the Saskatchewan Valley and Manitoba Land Company,' —which was an altogether different proposition; it was not the company that obtained 250,000 acres from this government but a concern organized for the purpose of handling Mackenzie and Mann lands, the Canadian Northern lands, throughout western Canada.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE (Lisgar). Is it not practically the same thing ?

Mr. NEELY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. W. H. Sharpe) represents a western constituency and he ought to know that it is not. Some of the same men belong to both companies, but the Saskatchewan Valley and Manitoba Land Company never obtained any concessions from this government, and if the Hon. Walter Scott had held stock in that company, if he had been given stock in that company or even bought stock or had an interest in it, that was nothing to his discredit.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is the charge I made, that Hon. Walter Scott accepted $10,000 worth of stock in the Saskatchewan Valley and Manitoba Land Company.

Mr. NEELY. That has nothing to do with his position as member of the House. And I say it is not a fair proposition to talk in this way on the basis of rumours that are heard on the streets, in the highways, byways and alleys.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. I rise to a point of order. I claim that the hon. member (Mr. Neely) is not discussing what the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) spoke about. What that hon. gentleman said was that Hon. Walter Scott had received this stock from the Saskatchewan Valley and Manitoba Land Company.

Mr. SPEAKER. A point of order must refer to an infraction of a rule of the House.

Mr. NEELY. What I have said is, that, apart from their withdrawal, if these statements had been believed by the electors of the province of Saskatchewan, we should not have had the result so eminently satisfactory to the government, and to its hon. leader, Hon. Walter Scott, that was obtained in the election in August last. And I want to say this, that when the people of that part of the country went to the polls, when they endorsed the action of the government in disposing of this quantity of land to the Saskatchewan Valley Land Company, they went of their own free will. And I would say in this connection that, when the people of Saskatchewan want to vote, they always have the privilege according to the election law of our province. We have not a padded list such as our information leads us to believe they possess in the province from which my hon. friend comes and in the constituency which he represents.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that statement should be withdrawn.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Withdraw it at once.

Mr. NEELY. I wish to keep within the rules, and I was not aware that a reference to the lists of Manitoba would be out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that, used in the circumstances as referring to an hon. member coming from that province, who would be elected on a padded list, the expression was clearly not parliamentary.

Mr. NEELY. I am not stating that the hon. gentleman was responsible for these lists.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. NEELY. I have not made that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman had better withdraw the statement.

Mr. NEELY. As far the hon. gentleman is concerned, I am quite willing to withdraw the statement but I still must say, Sir, and this surely will not reflect on the hon. gentleman himself, that the electors of the province of Saskatchewan, if I must not speak of the lists, when they go to the polls are not met by officers of the Attorney General's department of that province and practically intimidated in a great many cases.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. State your point of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. My point of order is a reflection cast by the hon. gentleman——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh. Rats.

Mr. CAMPBELL—on the lists on which members were elected.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think there is any point of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Intimidation, he says.

Mr. NEELY. I want to say that it is a rather difficult thing for the hon gentleman or for any hon. gentleman who knows what actually happened in a great many of the constituencies of Manitoba, I dare not say all or the hon. gentleman would probably rise to another point of order, but in a great many constituencies in Manitoba the machinery of justice, the Attorney-General's Department of that province, was prostituted and debased for the purpose of securing the return of the Conservative candidates from the different constituencies.

Mr. STAPLES. Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to ask the hon. gentleman to mention one place in which that happened.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman having the floor can only be interrupted by his own consent except on a point of order. The hon member has no right to interrupt him.

Mr. STAPLES. When I asked a question and the hon. gentleman, having the floor resumed his seat, I assumed I had his consent. I repeat the question and ask for an answer.

Mr. NEELY. I am quite willing to give the hon. gentleman an answer. If the hon. gentleman will read the newspapers of the City of Winnipeg——

An hon. MEMBER. The 'Free Press?'

Mr. NEELY. Any of them, after the election of October 26 last, he will see wherein the Attorney General of the province was humiliated to the extent of having good substantial boot leather applied to the unmentionable part of his anatomy for the way in which he had interfered with the rights of the people in connection with the election, I think that ought to be sufficient answer to the question. I am quite willing to give any hon. gentleman opportunity to ask all sorts of questions but I do not propose to become an encyclopaedia for him. I have given him the information he has asked on this point and I am not lacking for information. Instances can be multiplied where the machinery of justice in that province was prostituted for the ends which I have indicated.

Mr. STAPLES. I challenge the hon. gentleman——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. NEELY. Hearing these statements made by the hon. member for Dauphin in connection with these transactions, especially the Saskatchewan Valley land transaction, and the way in which he attempted to bring before this House rumours that he said were circulated through Saskatchewan during the August election in connection with the good name of the premier of that province, I do not wonder that he sits in this House representing a constituency and that the late member for Dauphin fell by the wayside, if the hon. gentleman used those methods and made those statements on the platform in his own constituency during the late election.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The point of order is an insinuation thrown out——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And a misstatement made by the hon. gentleman who is speaking.

Mr. SPEAKER. I fail to see that there is any infraction of a rule of the House in what he has said.

Mr. CAMPBELL. There is a misstatement.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not see any point of order and I failed to see any misstatement.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He said I based my attack on an hon. gentleman on rumours. If he will take the trouble to read 'Hansard' he will see that what I said was not on a mere idle rumour, I did not say it was rumour, I said I had it from the man who handed the certificate of stock to Walter Scott, signed in blank. That is no idle rumour.

Mr. SPEAKER. If I understood the hon. member he referred to another matter, he referred to the late member for Dauphin, another member altogether.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, he is dead now.

Mr. NEELY. Well, Mr. Speaker, the dead have been known to come to life again and the hon. member may find that out on some future day. The hon. gentleman says that I accused him of bringing rumours before this House. The hon. member makes practically the same charge against a member of this House whom he did not see fit to name, at least he made the same statement in connection with what he had heard about an hon. member of this House as against the Hon. Walter Scott. If the hon. gentleman has the excellent and absolute proof he tells the House about, why does he not rise in his place and bring his charge like a man against the hon. member whom he says is guilty of this corrupt transaction? The Hon. Walter Scott, Premier of Saskatchewan, was formerly a member of this House. He is no longer here to defend himself against statements of this kind, but the hon. member of this House mentioned is presumably here and if the hon. gentleman has the kind of proof that he says he has, why does he not rise in his place and on his honour as a member lay a charge against that gentleman and have him expelled from this House for a corrupt transaction? I understand it to be the case that in the election of last October in the constituency of Dauphin, which the hon. member represents, the hon. member went even further than that to besmirch the good name of this government in connection with so-called graft charges that were made so extensively throughout the length and breadth of Canada by the Conservative party on the platform and in the press during that election. I am told, Sir, that the hon. gentleman who represents Dauphin, during the election campaign, on the public platforms throughout his own constituency, made the statement that in order to get a closed grazing lease from the Department of the Interior for the firm of Brown, Beddington and Company, in which the hon. gentleman is interested, he had to spend $2,000 in bribing a high official of the Department of the Interior. This hon. gentleman, this self-confessed briber, if these statements are true, and I give the hon. gentleman the privilege of denying that they are true——

Mr. CAMPBELL. I want to tell this House that I have never in my life applied for any right or franchise from this government or any other gov——

Mr. CARVELL. Go on and make your statement.

Mr. CAMPBELL——that any other man, Liberal or Conservative, did not have the absolute right to make application for.

Mr. CARVELL. Did you make the statement?

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the hon. gentleman wants information in regard to anything—

Mr. CARVELL. Answer that question. Did you make the statement?

Mr. NEELY. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is not making a statement in answer to the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is making a statement and he should be heard.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the hon. gentleman wants an answer to his question I will give the same answer to the question here that I gave on the public platform in Dauphin when the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) was there supporting his brother-in-law. I think that these two hon. gentlemen knew all about the matter as well as I knew about it, and if they choose to give away the name of the official they are welcome to do it.

Mr. NEELY. I am sure the members of this House will agree with me that a lamer statement in answer to a straight and direct question was never given by a member of this House. The hon. gentleman evades the point at issue. If he has information that a grazing lease covering lands in western Saskatchewan was obtained by any company by a corrupt method that he does not deny, I say it is his duty, now that he has been elected by the people of his constituency to represent them in this House, to represent western Canada and all Canada, to put that information in the hands of the Minister of the Interior that the official may be properly punished for his conduct in accepting such a bribe. But, if it is true that the hon. gentleman made the statement that he had to spend $2,000 to bribe an official in the Interior Department surely it comes with very bad grace from the hon gentleman, who admits himself to be a briber of government officials, to get up here and besmirch the fair name of the honoured premier of the province of Saskatchewan. These statements made by the hon. member for Dauphin in the late election were brought to the attention of the Minister of the Interior who, speaking at McLeod on the 1st of October, or thereabouts, made this statement:

> Mr. Campbell now said that he had to bribe an official with $2,000 in connection with procuring the lease. Such a vague statement on the eve of an election was not good enough. Mr. Campbell to be believed, must name the official and give proof of the bribery. If Mr. Campbell did this he, as Minister of Interior, undertook that if the official was in the service of the department he would not be there a minute after the bribery had been established. Mr. Campbell must either prove this charge, naming the offender, or withdraw. If he did neither, he was merely a despicable slanderer.

That was a challenge that was thrown out by the Minister of the Interior at this hon. gentleman and at the statements that he understood the hon. gentleman was making to the people of his constituency. I repeat that the position taken by the Minister of the Interior on that occasion was an absolutely correct position. If we examine into the statements that were made in connection with the lands given to railways in Manitoba I think we will find they are equally as correct as the statements made in connection with the lands disposed of by this government in the province of Saskatchewan. The hon. gentleman refers, at page 4992 of 'Hansard,' and the hon. gentleman can find it for himself, to a grant of land that was given many years ago to a railway which was supposed to be built from Winnipeg in the direction of Hudson bay, and complains bitterly of the fact that the Manitoba government were unable to secure these lands from this government, and that these lands were eventually turned over to Mackenzie & Mann, the promoters of the Canadian Northern Railway, who took over this proposed Hudson Bay Railway. Although the hon. gentleman comes from Manitoba he seems to be very poorly informed even on the question of land in his own province. I would like to say to the hon. gentleman that the statement he made in this House the other day, as far as the facts of that statement in connection with these lands are concerned, is quite misleading. The history of this land grant dates back to the time in Manitoba when Mr. Norquay was the premier of that province. A certain gentleman by the name of Hugh Sutherland, of Winnipeg, obtained a charter to build a railway to Hudson bay. He got from the federal government, not this government, Mr. Speaker, but the government that preceded it, the Conservative government, a land grant of 6,400 acres for every mile of this railway that should be built. This company found that they could not finance the building of the road on the land grant that was to be given them by the federal government of that day. So, they went to the Manitoba government and said: 'We want you to finance this road; we want you to take over these lands that are to be ours as soon as we earn them, that are to be given us by the federal government and we want you to place your bonds on the market.' The Norquay government of Manitoba did as the railway company suggested. And, with the usual stupidity of Tory governments this Tory government of Manitoba actually handed over the bonds of the province to this railway company before they had earned the lands, and before the Federal government had inspected the road and approved of it. The result was that when the provincial government came to the Federal government and said the company had assigned to them their rights to these lands, they were met with the reply from Sir John Macdonald that the lands had not been earned by the railway company and therefore could not be assigned. And so, through this blunder on the part of the Tory government of Manitoba there was lost to the province some $250,000, the value of these bonds. As time went on the Greenway government came into power in Manitoba, and MacKenzie and Mann, the promoters of the Canadian Northern who in the meantime had acquired the charter and rights of the Hudson Bay Railway Company came to the Greenway government for assistance for the building of other branch lines. The answer they received from Mr. Greenway was that when they had undertaken the construction, of this Hudson Bay road and when they had earned this grant of land from the Federal government, then, if the Greenway government would give them any aid to build branch lines through Manitoba they must contract and agree to hand over 256,000 acres of land to the province, and so in this way the Greenway government made provision to correct the blunder committed by the previous Conservative government. The House will readily see that this was a question between the railway companies interested and the Manitoba government and that the Federal government had nothing to do with it. As time went on a new combination of statesmen, a new type of politicians took up the helm in Manitoba, and instead of compelling MacKenzie and Mann to live up to the terms of the agreement they had made with the Greenway government and turn over 256,000 acres of land, we find this new Conservative government in Manitoba selling their right and their title to these lands back to MacKenzie and Mann for the paltry sum of $1.54 per acre, for lands which at that time were worth from $5 to $10 an acre. Here was another instance where, through the mismanagement of a Tory government, the province of Manitoba lost a large sum of money. Surely, before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Glen Campbell) again undertakes to charge the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier with squandering western lands he had better learn something of the history of his political friends in the province of Manitoba. Let it be remembered that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) sat for some years in the legislature of Manitoba as a supporter of the Roblin-Rogers government which, as we know, has a world-wide reputation in connection with transactions in public lands and public assets. It is a well known fact throughout western Canada that since the Roblin government came to power it has squandered the heritage of the people of Manitoba. My hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) sat in the legislature of Manitoba supporting the Roblin government when the premier of that province actually put a Bill through the House guaranteeing the bonds of a line of railway into a sand pit owned by himself.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the hon. gentleman know as to the truth of what he says now?

Mr. NEELY. Most assuredly I vouch for the truth of what is common and public property, stated in the public press, discussed in the legislature and so far as I know not denied.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I can tell the hon. gentleman something with regard to that which he perhaps would like to know.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot allow any interruption of that kind except with the consent of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. NEELY. Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) will have an opportunity to reply through some of his friends from the province of Manitoba, who, if they wish, can later on take up the cudgels in his behalf. Surely, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) is the last man, who, if he has any regard for consistency, should undertake to charge this government with profligacy in their dealings with the lands of western Canada. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) further undertook to score this government for, as he alleged, their extravagance in the manner in which the contract for the National Transcontinental Railway was being put through. I venture to say that the hon. gentleman had very little to say in criticism of the government policy in regard to the construction of the National Transcontinental Railway when he appeared before the electors of Dauphin last October. In my own constituency the gentleman who opposed me in the Conservative interest had as the principal plank in his platform the early completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and the immediate construction of the Hudson Bay Railway, and I have no doubt that the sentiment in Dauphin would be very much the same on these questions as the sentiment in Humboldt; and I wish to say that the people of western Canada are glad to know that, notwithstanding the financial depression and the various difficulties in the way of the completion of this great project, the government are coming to the aid of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and are going to see that that great national undertaking is carried to a successful conclusion.

I have here some facts which I have looked up in regard to the statement which the hon. gentleman made as to the excessive price paid for ties by the National Transcontinental Commission; but I just wish to say that, as I understand, every one of these contracts was let by tender, the lowest tender being accepted in every case, and even then on certain sections of the railway the contractors found the greatest difficulty in securing ties in sufficient quantities to carry through the work.

Another statement which struck me as very strange coming from a man who represents a western constituency, was one which the hon. gentleman made in his discussion of the question of the tariff. These were his words:

> On this side of the House, Sir, we call a spade a spade; we believe in protection and call it protection.

It is very evident that my hon. friend was not a member of this House during the last term of parliament, or he surely would not expect this House to accept his bald statement that his party stood for the principle of protection. It is true, the leader of his party stands for a policy of protection, but the hon. gentleman knows very well that the sentiment on the tariff question west of Lake Superior differs very materially from the sentiment of the people living east of Lake Superior. The hon. gentleman knows very well what the view of the people of western Canada is on the question of the tariff. It is true that the election is over, and the hon. gentleman is very courageous. It will be another four or five years before he will have to appeal to the electors of Dauphin, or else I believe he would not have the temerity to stand on the floor of this House and say that he is in favour of protection. Was that the position taken by the hon. gentleman's friends from the province of Manitoba in the last parliament? Surely he is not cognizant of what occurred at the last session but one of that parliament, when the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) introduced a resolution proposing to reduce the tariff, not on all agricultural implements, but on mowers and binders from 17½ per cent to 10 per cent? The hon. member for Souris when he introduced his low tariff resolution on agricultural implements knew perfectly well that he was voicing the sentiment of the people west of Lake Superior. We know that in western Canada the farmer spends almost annually large sums of money for the purchase of these implements, and I have this to say to this House and to the government, that we who represent western constituencies and the people of western Canada feel that although this government has done something in the way of tariff reduction, that reduction has not gone far enough. As a representative of a western constituency, I am not going behind the government's back to say exactly what I think on this point. I said it to the people in my constituency in my election, and it met with their approval in every case, that while the duty on agricultural implements had been decreased, it had not been decreased sufficiently to equalize the burdens on all the people of Canada, including the western Canadian farmer. When the hon. member for Souris brought in his resolution in the dying hours of the session of 1906-7, he was supported by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) and other Conservative members from the province of Manitoba. I wonder if the hon. member for Dauphin, when he got up and said that he called a spade a spade and that he was a protectionist and believed in protection, was aware of the attitude of these hon. gentlemen in moving that resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, and I will vote for it, too; will you?

Mr. NEELY. I would most assuredly vote for any bona fide resolution brought before this House for the reduction of the tariff on agricultural implements. Now, I want to say this, that the hon. member for Souris, the hon. member for Macdonald and other hon. gentlemen representing Manitoba constituencies in the last parliament were very excellent judges of the sentiment of the people of their constituencies when they moved that resolution in the House. Did these hon. gentlemen expect to carry that resolution? Why, Sir, if they wanted to undertake the contract of having such a resolution passed in this House, if they wanted a majority of the members of this House converted to their views on that question, where would they have commenced that noble work of conversion? They would have commenced it, Sir, with the leader of the opposition himself. We know perfectly well that, in his last tour through the western provinces the hon. the leader of the opposition kept as far away from a thorough and a comprehensive discussion of the tariff as a good skater steers clear of thin ice. Why did he do so? Because he knew that his policy of adequate protection was so indefinite that it did not appeal to the people. He knew that the people of western Canada wanted a clear and unmistakable pronouncement, and that this hazy and indefinite policy was contrary to their views and ideas. That is the position in which hon. gentlemen opposite find themselves to-day. Why, on this very resolution proposed by my hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) the leader of the opposition got up and said he could not support it. Did my hon. friend from Souris expect to carry that resolution when he proposed it? Why, he could not get even his own leader to support him. How comes it then that my hon. friend submitted that resolution at the time he did? I am not going to suggest motives, but I think I shall be in order in suggesting that at the time there was an election somewhere in sight not very far away.

An hon. MEMBER. Two or three years.

Mr. NEELY. That may have been the case, but my hon. friend did not know it at the time. If the electors of the various constituencies in Manitoba were brought to believe that the hon. member for Souris and the other representatives from Manitoba were in good faith, if they believed that resolution was a bona fide one, submitted in the hope and expectation of getting the support of this House, is it any wonder that the province of Manitoba sent eight members to support the Conservative oppsition in this House and only two to support the government?

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I regret to have to interrupt my good friend. So far as my motives are concerned and the time it was brought in, that resolution was submitted the only time it could be, as an amendment to the tariff, and the motive was the honest one of obtaining the reduction it called for. I am prepared to vote for a similar motion, whoever may bring it in.

Mr. NEELY. I am surprised, since my hon. friend recognizes the importance, in the eyes of the people of the west, of a lower tariff, and since the party of which he is a member never, when they were in power, reduced the tariff on agricultural implements until they saw doom ahead of them, until they saw their political life about to end and since this government has made reductions in the tariff—I am surprised at the hon. member for Souris supporting the leader he does in this House. His position is not a consistent one, to say the least.

Mr. BLAIN. How did the leader of your party vote on that question?

Mr. NEELY. He voted according to his convictions.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is the hon. gentleman consistent in supporting him?

Mr. NEELY. Has the hon. member for Lambton the floor or I? The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Glen. Campbell) says he is in favour of protection. Surely he must have made that statement without consulting his political friends, representing constituencies in his own province.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think that is imputing motives.

Mr. NEELY. Not at all. I am simply suggesting that my hon. friend, when he declared himself a protectionist, could not have consulted with his friends from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) and from Macdonald (Mr. Staples). My hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) says that we must take his word that he did bring that resolution before this House in all good faith. Well, I have looked up the report in connection with the vote taken. The House was in committee, and I find that out of a total membership in this House of some 214, there were actually 78 in their seats when that vote was taken. If my hon. friend was so anxious to have his resolution carried, if he was so anxious to have himself and his party definitely committed to that policy, why did he not compel every member of this House to go on record as to whether or not he was in favour of the resolution? Why, the division bell was not even rung. I have looked up 'Hansard' and I find that there is not a name recorded. The vote is simply recorded as so many nays and so many yeas. But if my hon. friend wanted to create a good opinion in his constituency, why did he not call for a record of the vote?

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (Leeds). He could not do it at that stage.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I could not take any other course than the one I did.

Mr. FIELDING. He could have divided later.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Eighty per cent on this side voted for my motion, and absolutely every Liberal, including the members from the west, voted against it.

Mr. NEELY. It is a striking comment on the interest taken by the hon. gentleman's friends in this important matter, that when we look up the vote on it, we find that there were but 22 who supported the hon. gentleman. That surely shows a deplorable lack of interest on the part of his political friends in this House, and so far as his leader is concerned, he knows that he was one of those who voted against the resolution.

Mr. STAPLES. Better read what he said.

Mr. NEELY. I assure my hon. friend I have read it. In the recent election contest, this question of the tariff played a very important part in many of the constituencies of western Canada. I do not see the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. McCarthy) in his seat, but the hon. gentleman was very much exercised, during his contest, over certain statements to the effect that he had shirked his duty in connection with this resolution. On looking up the files of the Calgary newspapers, I find that on the 21st of October, the hon. gentleman offered to bet the Liberal newspaper of Calgary the 'Albertan' $100 to be donated to any hospital, if they could prove that he had shirked his duty and had not voted on this question. The hon. gentleman realized very well what the sentiment of his constituency was in that respect, yet the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) tells us that he is a protectionist. In connection with that same resolution, let me point to this fact, that while only 78 votes altogether were cast upon it, on another amendment submitted by the leader of the opposition on the same evening—very much later in the evening—when one would naturally suppose there would be still fewer members in the House—what do we find? We find that 120 members voted for the amendment of the leader of the opposition. That resolution of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) was one that, if the government could have seen its way clear to accept it, would have been very acceptable to the people of western Canada. But, when these matters are brought before this House, we want them treated with fairness and justice; and I say that I myself, if I had been in the House at that time under the peculiar circumstances surrounding the introduction of the resolution, in all probability would have felt compelled to vote against it.

I have exceeded the time I intended to occupy. I have only this word to say in conclusion: I believe that the people of western Canada stand to-day in support of the present government because of the fact that on the tariff question, if they have not moved as far as they ought to have moved, yet they have moved in the right direction. And I hope they will go further in the same direction when the next revision of the tariff takes place.

Mr. T. G. WALLACE (Centre York). Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I do not wish to take up the time of the House at great length. But, when a candidate in an election presents his views and makes promises to the people of what he will do, if elected, it is clearly his duty when he is honoured with a place in this House to redeem the promises thus made. We are discussing the budget of the Minister of Finance of the Dominion of Canada. As I understand that hon. gentleman's (Mr. Fielding) statement, the revenue of this country last year was eighty-four and a half millions, the expenditures eighty-three millions, leaving a surplus of one and a half millions. But I understand the hon. gentleman to tell us also that the debt has increased by forty-six millions. To the uninitated, it hardly looks as if we have a surplus when we go further into debt to the extent of forty-six millions, particularly when we find that such items as bounties on steel and iron amounting to $3,200,000, and expenditure for rifles for the militia, $1,300,000, have not been charged to current expenditure. Had these items been charged to current expenditure, as would surely be most reasonable, we should have a deficit instead of a surplus. I regret that the government have not manifested greater care in the expenditure of public money. Had they done so, we might have had an actual surplus instead of a surplus that, in my opinion, exists only on paper.

I regret that the Minister of Finance in his budget has not announced that he will give protection to a certain class of people in this country, the farmers, market gardeners and labourers. As I understand the national policy enunciated by Sir John Macdonald in 1878, it is a protection first to the agriculturists and manufacturers, but also to the labourers, in fact to every class. The manufacturers of this country are fairly well protected—in some lines, probably, too highly protected, though I have no quarrel with the government on that score. But when the manufacturers are protected, I think we should protect the agriculturists, the market gardeners and labourers as well. We are living in a country which has not so early a spring as the country to the south of us. The Finance Minister has been urged to consider the granting of protection on market garden products coming into Canada. It is hardly to be expected that Canada can compete at all seasons with a country situated like the United States. By the time the Canadian products are coming on the market, the price of the second-class stuff coming from the United States is low, and this material comes into competition with the Canadian product. What the market gardeners and farmers of this country want particularly is a specific duty on these products, not an ad valorem duty, because that is not of much use at the time of the year when protection is most needed. I do not wish to go into this matter at length, but I have a letter here from which, perhaps, I may be permitted to read a part, as it states the need better than I could state it:

> The Ontario Vegetable Growers' Association ask that the customs tariff on vegetables be made specific instead of ad valorem, which we believe would prevent our markets from becoming a dumping ground for culls, as they are at present. We would advise a specific duty equal to 30 per cent on a fair cost of production on market value of average quality on vegetables imported, which would not deter the importation of vegetables at times of scarcity or when the Canadian grower cannot supply the demand ; the market price being high at such times, the specific duty would be smaller relatively.
> A specific duty would prevent our market from being flooded with the surplus or damaged products of other countries sent here at a low valuation, at a time when Canadian growers are prepared to supply an abundance of fresh home-grown products. At the same time it would improve conditions for the Canadian consumer by improving the quality of the goods imported.
> We also wish to draw your attention to the fact that a very large part of Californian grown vegetables imported into Canada are produced by Chinese labour. Especially is this the case with celery, practically all of which is grown by them, and the low prices at which it can be invoiced at point of shipment is largely determined by that fact.
> The parliament of Canada having imposed, and we believe wisely so, a tax of $500 on this class entering this Dominion, as a protection to Canadian labour, it appears to us unfair that the product of such coolie labour should enter into competition with the product of the Canadian vegetable grower, and by an ad valorem duty evade the protection which our laws are intended to afford. We would ask that the following duty be imposed on the vegetables mentioned.
> Cabbages. .. .. 2 cents per head.
> Celery... .. .. 20 cents per dozen.
> Onions... .. .. 20 cents per bushel of 50 lbs.

In the arrangement of our duties, it is clearly wise for us to take into consideration the fact that Canada is a northern country. We should allow for the fact also that Canada is a young country, one whose industries are not fully developed, and whose population is not large. The agriculturists, market gardeners and labourers are certainly deserving of consideration. We have imported within the last few years hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of these market garden goods from the United States nearly all of which should be grown in the Dominion. Such articles, when demanded before their season, are clearly a luxury, not a necessity. Such a duty therefore, is a luxury and would not affect the poor, and the rich the only ones whom it would affect, can afford to pay a little more for the benefit of a class of producers who should be encouraged. I hope the government will take that into their serious consideration, and that the Minister of Agriculture will do something for the market gardeners. The deputation that waited on him and the Minister of Finance asked that when seeds are put up in packages the percentage of germination be printed on the packages, as thousands of dollars are lost every year through the use of worthless seeds and nobody is made responsible for that loss.

I regret that the government did not see their way clear to place a higher duty on hogs and hog products entering Canada, as the present duty is not sufficiently large to prevent the fluctuations of price in hogs in the United States affecting the price of hogs in Canada, and therefore it is the duty of the government to place a sufficient protection to prevent our market from being made a slaughter market for American hogs. The government has been giving a great deal of protection to manufacturers, and they should seriously consider helping out the farmers to the moderate extent asked by these deputations.

During the election campaign one of my planks against the Dominion government was their system of immigration. Much of the immigration coming into this country, I believe, is not in the public interest. This subject has been thoroughly discussed in the House. I think we should encourage, as we are encouraging, men from the old land, men from different parts of Europe who make good settlers and men from the United States who are coming in in thousands, but I do not think we have any room for the class of people who come to Canada but never become good Canadians or British subjects. We want people who will come in and make good citizens in time to come. The immigration of Japanese and Doukhobors and people of that class should be either restricted or not encouraged. I have listened with a great deal of attention to members on both sides of the House during the budget debate, and it is only fair to say that I agree heartily with some things said on both sides. I noted particularly that nearly every man speaking on the government side goes in to defend nearly everything the government has done. The government of this country is certainly not perfect, and a man who defends all its acts must defend some things which are wrong. I was rather amused at the member for South Grey (Mr. Miller) who, in making a very able, eloquent and well studied speech defended the government in everything they had done from 1896 down until he struck what is known as the Newmarket canal. Before I came here I concluded from my own belief and knowledge that the construction of the Newmarket canal was a useless waste of public money. After listening to the defence of that project by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Railways, I was sure I was right in that conclusion because their defence was no defence at all. The Prime Minister said that the reason for building a canal and spending one or two millions of dollars on it was that a delegation came down from North York to ask the government to do it. Why, I could get a deputation from any part of Canada to come down and ask the government to spend one or two millions near a village, but that is no reason for spending the money. Another point about that expenditure was that $30,000 or $40,000 was spent before the delegation came down here, and yet we are led to believe that the government started that canal because the deputation came here. That was hardly fair, and I do not think it was intentional. There was no expenditure on the canal for four years except some $31,000 up to March 31, 1908, but from that date to the present about $182,000 have been spent on it. It looked to any one who studied the question at all as if this expenditure was intended as a bribe to the electors of North York, spending $182,000 in a constituency just before an election. I do not think that any hon. member, no matter to what political party he belongs, should support expenditures of that kind. I condemned that expenditure on the platform in Centre York and once or twice in North York, and I believe that the people of that district, although the money is being spent there, will in time reject the men who wasted public money in that way.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House at this late hour. I would simply impress upon the government the necessity of doing something for the market gardeners and farmers. I hope the government will realize that what we ask in this respect is not for the benefit of one class or for one section of the country alone but is for the good of the Dominion at large.

Mr. W. S. LOGGIE (Northumberland, New Brunswick), Mr. Speaker, you have not heard from the province of New Brunswick during this debate and therefore I wish to make a few remarks. The hon. member for Centre York (Mr. Wallace) who has just taken his seat, has asked that the government should restrict immigration and he refers to the Japanese as a people who should not be allowed to enter Canada to any great extent. The hon. gentleman should know that this is exactly what the government have done, that restrictions are now being enforced and that during the last year a very limited number of Japanese have come into this country. The hon. gentleman ought to know as well that the government are using every endeavour to have a proper class of immigrants come into this country, and that every precaution is taken that when undesirable immigrants are landed in this country they are returned to the place whence they came at the expense of the transportation company bringing them to Canada. Another plea made by the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat is that the government should increase the protection to the agricultural interest, and he cites the protection on hogs, which he says ought to be increased. Forsooth there is a duty now of two cents per pound or four dollars per barrel, and yet the hon. gentleman wants to have the farming interests of Canada protected to a greater extent than four dollars per barrel on pork. The hogs that come into this country are very largely of a class which are not raised in Canada. The imported hog products are consumed in the maritime provinces and in the lumbering operations of Ontario and Quebec and the eastern provinces. My hon. friend would ask that those who are consumers should pay an increased tax to the farming interest of this country. In my judgment it would be unfair to the consumer to increase the taxation on that product when we realize that the producers are already protected to what I consider a sufficient extent. If there is one item in the tariff list which, it seems to me, is on a protective tariff basis, it is the item of hog products. That is one of the items which the Liberal party have continued in force which was in force under the Conservative party in 1896. As to the request of the market gardeners that they be protected, I think we will admit that the products that are imported into this country are imported at a time at which they cannot and are not supplied by our Canadian market gardeners. If that be true is it reasonable that the consumers should be unduly taxed? They are reasonably taxed now? They pay what is a fair tax for revenue purposes. I think that the government have acted wisely in not every year tinkering with the tariff and making changes. We have framed a new tariff about each decade, and during the interim changes of no great consequence have been made. I do not think that I need refer any more to the remarks by the hon. gentleman. But, I want once again to congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Finance on the showing that he has brought down to this House. A year ago he told the House and the country that it was a time for caution and that yet we should take courage. It seems to me, from the report laid on the table by the Minister of Finance, that this is exactly what the Finance Minister has done.

The hon. member for Centre York (Mr. Wallace) tells us that the expenditure was $83,000,000, that the revenue was $84,500,000 and that we have a surplus of $1,500,000. It is certainly an encouraging fact that it is so because of the stress, if I may so term it, it might have been fair to expect that the Finance Minister would come down to the House showing a deficit on the year's transactions. I think, therefore, that we might repeat what was said a year ago that perhaps no Finance Minister has ever done more to sustain the high credit of the country than has the present Minister of Finance. From his statement we find that the estimated net debt of the country on the 31st March, 1909, was upwards of $323,000,000, and that during the twelve and three-quarter years, since 1896, we have added to the net debt, in round numbers, $65,000,000. But, Mr. Speaker, I want you to mark that the $65,000,000 is accounted for by $52,500,000 expended on the Transcontinental Railway. That leaves a balance of only $12,000,000 expended on the great public works of this country which would represent about $1,000,000 each year for the twelve years. Will you just recall to mind what has happened during the last five years of the Conservative regime? During that five years they expended $16,000,000 on capital account. During the very same term they borrowed $21,000,000: that is to say they had not sufficient money in the treasury to pay the ordinary running expenses of the country. They had to borrow $5,000,000 for that purpose. But the Liberal party have expended about $100,000,000 annually on ordinary consolidated account and the other great public works that they have undertaken during the past twelve years, have added to the public debt only $1,000,000 per annum over and above the expenditure on the National Transcontinental Railway. It seems that the situation is one from which we might well take courage and which should warrant us in going on and completing this great undertaking. We find that in the year 1896, when the Conservative party gave up the reins of power the per capita debt was $50.82, while in 1909, after we had expended $52,500,000 on the Transcontinental Railway, and after the expenditure on other great public works, we have reduced the per capita to $45.72, equal to a decrease in the debt of the country after all these great expenditures of about 10 per cent. I mean the per capita debt, of course. I have explained already that the net debt has been increased, but we have assets for it as I shall tell you later on. Now, I want to say a word about how we got this money. Perhaps I should remind the House here that the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in speaking of that the other day used the following language:

> ——which surpluses were got absolutely and solely because of extraordinary taxing powers that the government availed themselves of. If the government had kept the volume and burden of taxation down to what it was, or to anything near what it was, in Liberal Conservatives times, they could not have amassed such immense sums of money, and they could not have had such large surpluses. If a government will tax sufficiently, it will have large revenue and may have large surpluses.

Now, Mr. Speaker, during the last five years of the Conservative regime, they taxed at the rate of about 14 per cent more than the present administration is taxing. Let me put it in this way. In 1908 we collected 16·48 per cent on $351,879,000 worth of imports. In 1896 there were imports valued at $105,- 361,000 and the rate collected in that year was 19·12 per cent. Our rate is $2.74 on the $100 less on the value of the invoice, or equal to a difference of about 12½ per cent on the duty collected. Apply this and it would demonstrate that if in 1896, under the Conservative government, the people of Canada had imported as many goods as they did last year under the Liberal regime, the Conservative government would have taken out of the pockets of the people over $9,000,000 in extra taxation. If, on the other hand, last year the Liberal government had exacted the same rate of duty as did the Conservative government before 1896, there would have been $9,000,000 more collected in duties, and then our surplus would be ten and a half million dollars instead of one and a half millions. But, the hon. gentleman from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and the hon. gentleman from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) say that the vital point is that the present government collects $11 per head, whereas in 1896 the Conservative government collected only $5.46 per head. My contention is that the vital point is the rate at which $11 per head was collected. If I pay taxes on $10,000 this year at two per cent, and I am fortunate enough next year to have $20,000 on which to pay taxes at 1½ per cent, I pay a less rate but I pay more money on the whole and I ought to be glad I am able to pay it because I have something to represent the extra payment. And why is it that at a less rate of duty than formerly, there is more revenue produced? The answer is perfectly simple. A merchant will keep in his store just the goods his customers require, and if there is a demand for two suits of clothes now where there was only a demand for one suit before, the merchant will have the two suits and the customer will buy them instead of one.

Mr. BLAIN. Why not manufacture them here and pay no duty?

Mr. LOGGIE. Oh my dear man, don't you know we do manufacture them here? Let me tell my hon. friend that there is a very small proportion of clothing imported into this country.

Mr. BLAIN. The house doing the largest business in the province of Ontario imports all their ready-made clothing under this tariff.

Mr. LOGGIE. I will accept the hon. gentleman's word but I can tell him that I know of not one but of dozens of mercantile establishments that do not import one dollar's worth of ready-made clothing. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) advanced an argument the other day which it would have been fairer for him to have carried out to its logical conclusions. He told us that in 1886 we would find $10,000,000 charged to capital account but that was for seven and a half million acres of land, which, as an asset, converted into money was worth $22.500,000, and he asked us to take that into consideration. Well, I will admit the hon. gentleman's argument, but had he been fair he would have carried it further and he would have explained that the fifty-two and a half million dollars spent on the National Transcontinental Railway was a national asset. Will the hon. gentleman have the audacity to tell me that in the National Transcontinental Railway we have not an asset representing that fifty two and a half millions. Does he not know very well that in a short time that money will be bearing interest and and that it is just as if we got the fifty-two and a half millions back, put it in the bank, and drew our interest on it, as in the case of the twenty-two and a half million dollars we received for the public lands. Is not that a fair comparison to make? Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) spoke about borrowing during the interim, but that argument was answered by the Minister of Finance who told us that it was a temporary loan which had been paid off. If the manager of an ordinary mercantile establishment borrows during the year and pays off his debt, he has no explanation to make to his directors. What he has to explain to the directors is what he owes and what he has to represent it. Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) also insinuated that if the Minister of Finance had taken care of the surpluses it would not have been necessary for him to go to the London markets to borrow money. I would point out to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that no one can deny that the moneys received by the government have been wisely expended, for, although there may have been some small items here and there that might not be expended as we all would like, yet on the whole there is not a man on the opposite side of the House who would undertake to charge that there has been any improper expenditure of public money. It is all very well to make insinuations and inuendo, but when it comes to making a charge hon. gentlemen opposite will not assume that responsibility. Has this government not promoted the prosperity of our great country; has it not deepened the St. Lawrence, protected our fisheries, aided agriculture, assisted in the building of great railways ? It is true that if we had tied the surpluses up in a napkin as it were, we could have reduced the debt, but in growing times such as these and in a growing country like Canada it was wise that we should have applied our expenditures in the days of prosperity to developing the resources of the country. But nevertheless we have reduced the per capita debt, and yet we have an increase in 13 years in the net debt of only $65,000,000, $52,500,000 of which I call liquid assets that will bring us a return in good time. Just one more word and I have done——the hon. gentleman from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) gave us a long list of duties levied by Canada and compared them with the duties levied by the United States. I quote his words:

> I submit that it is manifestly unfair and unjust to Canadian farmers, and when we take into account the fact that the United States sent into Canada last year 6,428 horses valued at $1,254,704 we must see that a portion of that was deliberately taken out of the pockets of the Canadian farmers.

If that hon. gentleman were here I would ask him who pays the import duties on goods that come into Canada. Would the hon. gentleman have the audacity to tell me that the Canadian farmer pays the duty on the horses that we send into the United States? And yet that is the logical conclusion of his whole argument; and he turns round and tells us that on the horses we sent into the States that the Canadian farmers pay the duty, and that argument is manifestly unfair. I do not understand the tariff if that is the basis of the hon. gentleman's reasoning. Perhaps in the case of a few artices there may be an exception to the rule. If you have no market but the United States, and are forced to sell your goods there on commission, it may be possible in some cases that the Canadian producer pays the duty; but in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the Canadian farmer pays the duty on the goods imported into this country, just as the United States farmer pays the duty which his government levies on goods imported into that country; and it is unfair for the hon. gentleman to argue that it is unfair to the Canadian farmer to allow horses to come into this country at a lower rate of duty than United States citizens have to pay on going into the United States.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The Minister of Customs tells us that the Canadian farmer has to pay the duty on Canadian barley going to Germany.

Mr. LOGGIE. I have no doubt that the Minister of Customs will answer for himself. Now, I want to say just one word in regard to the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). Why is it, he asks, that there is a reduction of $35,000 in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture for 1909-10? And then he makes some inuendoes or insinuations—is it because of this or that or the other thing? If the hon. gentleman will read the budget debate of a year ago, or if he studies the budget debate of this year, he will probably get the answer, but I want to tell him this: In 1896 how much do you think the Conservative government expended on the agricultural interests of this country? No less a sum than $210,000. And how much did this government expend on agricutural interests in 1908? $1,218,000, or more than $1,000,000 in excess of what was expended in 1896; and yet the hon. gentleman has the audacity to ask why the estimates for 1909-10 for the Department of Agriculture are cut down $35,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, my five minutes are up, and I thank the House for the attention it has given to me.

Mr. A. L. FRASER (Kings, P.E.I.). Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I do not wish to inflict a long speech on those patient members that I see present. I wish only to refer to one or two matters that have been touched upon in this debate. The first is the statement made by the Finance Minister that there has been a surplus this year. Now, this is either true or it is not true. The Finance Minister makes the statement that the revenue of last year from all sources was about $84,000,000. During that time there was spent about $120,000,000, leaving an excess of expenditure over income amounting to $46,000,000. That is the statement in a few words, and yet the astute Finance Minister ingeniously contrives to figure out a surplus, and the way in which he does it is by the old method adopted by this government year after year, while the net debt of the country increases every year. During the last year it has increased by $46,000,000, equal to $7 per head on every man, woman and child in this country, and the interest on that debt for all time to come until it is paid off will amount to $1,500,000 yearly. Now, by what plan does the Finance Minister figure out that there has been a surplus during the last twelve months? The method of keeping the books will explain how the alleged surplus—because there is no surplus, only a fictitious one—is arrived at. This government has two accounts, one called the capital account and the other the current account. I do not find any fault with them for this, because a great many governments, if not all, as well as large mercantile houses and banking institutions follow the same method. To the current account is charged the current expenditures of the year, while to the capital account should be charged expenditures on permanent public works—works that are assets to the country. But this administration, besides charging undertakings of a permanent character to capital account, go on and charge to the same account what we contend should be charged to current account. Among other things, they charge to capital account the bounties. What assets has this country for the bounties paid during the last twelve months on steel and coal? None whatever. Similar bounties under the Conservative administration were charged to current accounts, but this administration does not hestitate to charge them to capital account in order to figure out a surplus. By this false method $2,500,000 bounties, which should have been charged to current account, were charged to capital account, and a fictitious surplus of one and a half millions thus created. And we have had the papers supporting the government and benefiting by government patronage and government advertising heralding this surplus throughout the country. Can it be wondered at that many people should really accept that surplus as genuine, although in reality, instead of having a surplus this country has gone back and added to its debt to the extent of $46,000,000?

During the last year, the hon. the Finance Minister has had to take some trips to the other side for the purpose of borrowing money. I should like to see the hon. gentleman take many trips across the Atlantic, I hope he will live long enough to make frequent visits to the other side, but I would like to see him go on a pleasanter mission than to borrow money and put himself into the hands of the money lenders. I would ask him to remember that we have money here in the post office savings banks, and government bank, from which the depositors only receive three per cent, although the government has to pay three and a half to four per cent to the money lenders in the old world. It seems to me that our Finance Minister should give our small depositors in the post office savings banks at least the same rate that he pays to foreign money lenders. Why should our small depositors in the government savings banks receive only three per cent on their money, when the government have to borrow abroad at from three and a half per cent to four per cent?

There is another subject to which I wish to refer and which was first introduced in this debate by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Sutherland). That hon. gentleman charged the hon. member for North Toronto with having gone down to Prince Edward Island shortly before the elections and promised to build a tunnel there. In support of the charge, he read this extract from the 'Examiner,' a Conservative paper published in Charlottetown:

> For myself I stand ready to implement our bargain with Prince Edward Island by the construction of a tunnel.

The hon. gentleman charged my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) with having said this. Well, that is a statement of which no hon. gentleman need be ashamed. No public man need ever be ashamed of saying that he stands to carry out the bargain made between the Dominion and any of its provinces. Yet, time and again, during this session, I have heard the hon. gentleman criticised for having made this promise. But what are we to think of the Finance Minister who also went down to Prince Edward Island last fall just before the election and who also spoke in the same connection? I find on the 24th of September in the Daily ' Patriot,' the following words attributed to the hon. gentleman:

> If $10,000,000 would bring communication through the tunnel, I should be willing to support it with my whole heart, and I might be willing to support a larger sum.

Mr. FIELDING. The whole tenor of my statement was that I refused to build a tunnel.

Mr. FRASER. I am only reading.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman is not reading enough.

Mr. FRASER. I will continue.

Mr. FIELDING. The substance is as I said.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. Did the Finance Minister promise it?

Mr. FRASER. I do not say whether he did or not. I am reading as he is reported.

Mr. FIELDING. Would my hon. friend begin earlier? Let him read what preceded that.

Mr. FRASER. I can only read the extract as I have it here. There is nothing false about it.

Mr. FIELDING. I am not charging the hon. gentleman with misrepresenting.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. minister can remember if he said these words.

Mr. FIELDING. I remember very well.

Mr. FRASER (reading):

> If $10,000,000 would bring communication through a tunnel, I should be willing to support it with my whole heart and might be willing to support a larger sum.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. FRASER. Now, these other members on the government side charged the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) with having committed a crime almost because he said that he stood ready to implement the bargain made with Prince Edward Island.

Mr. FIELDING. I have somewhere among my papers a despatch in a Conservative paper with the very heading: 'Mr. Foster promised the tunnel.' My speech was commenting on that and I distinctly said I would not promise the tunnel.

Mr. FRASER. This is taken out of the 'Patriot' newspaper of September 24.

Mr. FIELDING. It is correct as far as it goes.

Mr. FRASER. That is the sentiment I wanted to bring out. The hon. gentleman said further:

> But there is no information that would justify me in saying: 'Put me in power and you should have the tunnel.'

That is the finish of the sentence. He says there is 'no information' to justify him in promising a tunnel. That is the whole trouble. There is no information that would justify any man in saying that if he is elected he will build the tunnel.

Mr. FIELDING. Why, then, did Mr. Foster say it?

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Foster is not reported to have said so in the extract referred to by the member for North Essex.

Mr. FIELDING. I will bring the paper in which it is reported

Mr. FRASER. I know that after Mr. Foster left the province, it was reported outside that he had promised the tunnel at a cost of $150,000,000. But I never heard him make that statement; it was never reported in any paper in our province that he had said such a thing. The Finance Minister tells us that there is 'no information.' We in that province want the tunnel; it is the most vital thing affecting our prosperity. We made a bargain with the Dominion of Canada when we entered confederation, and one of the conditions of that bargain was that the Dominion should maintain continuous communication with the mainland. That part of the bargain has not been kept. We thought we were to become part of the great Dominion and to share in its prosperity, and we depended upon this continued communication with the mainland for a very large share of that prosperity. But thirty years have elapsed, and this part of the bargain is not carried out. It is true this government has already had to pay some damages on account of the breach of that contract, and likely they will have to pay more. Two provinces, any more than two individuals, should not make a solemn bargain, signed and sealed, and then break it. Now, we want the information which the Minister of Finance says is necessary in order to justify him in promising or not promising the tunnel. We want a sum put in the estimates to make a survey to ascertain whether or not a tunnel can be built. We are not unreasonable; we will not ask for the tunnel if it is to cost $150,000,000, or half that much. We will only ask what is reasonable. In the meantime, we want to know what is possible. And we cannot get that information because this government does not see fit to spend a few thousand dollars, or a few hundred thousand dollars if necessary, to find out whether or not this tunnel can be built. Did the Conservative administration behave in this manner? No; they started to make a survey of the Strait and spent some money on it. But the survey required some time, and the government went out of power before the work was completed. And, since this administration came into power in 1896, it has not spent a dollar in getting the information referred to by the Minister of Finance. I have quoted what the Minister of Finance said when he was in Prince Edward Island. I would like now to refer to another very prominent man on that side. In 1891, the right hon. leader of this government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) visited Prince Edward Island, and he is reported—and has never denied it—reported by a prominent Liberal politician—as reported in the papers at that time and published all over the island—as saying:

> Every man who has given attention to the condition of things and the interests involved by the entering of the island into confederation must admit that such a tunnel must be constructed if the thing is reasonably practical.

Coming to the province before an election, the right hon. gentleman made this promise. Yet he has been in power for twelve years, and has never made a step to find out whether or not the work is reasonably practicable. I urge the government, with all the strength I have, to place a sum of money in the estimates and have a proper survey made of the straits so as to have this question settled, whether or not this tunnel is practicable. That is all we ask—'only this and nothing more,' or less. But I regret that this tunnel matter is not taken up properly even by all. There is a class—a small class of people in our own province who look upon it with apathy; they say they do not think we can get it, that it will cost a very large sum of money. These people do not know that about which they are speaking. No man knows whether the tunnel will cost $100,000,000 or $10,000,000. Any man who makes a statement as to the amount of money it will cost simply shows that he does not know anything about it. We shall never know what the tunnel will cost until a survey is made of the strait. I urge the government not to allow these promises that it has made and the hopes it has held out to go into the already overcrowded graveyard of their broken promises. When the Prime Minister 'finishes his work,' I hope he will not forget to finish this survey which was commenced under the Conservatives, and which has been neglected from that day to this.

Now, as to the expenditure of money, a great deal depends not alone on the amount of money expended, but the way in which it is spent. This is a young and growing country, and necessarily will require large expenditures on public works and means of transportation and works of that kind. Nobody will condemn the government for spending this money on useful works. But what the government should be condemned for is spending money on works that are not useful and not required. This government can afford to spend a million dollars on what is called the Aylesworth ditch.

This expenditure will serve the interests only of a certain township and perhaps serve the interests of the government in securing more support in that township. It is, however, a questionable expenditure and while the government should not be condemned for expending money usefully, it should be condemned when it undertakes such large expenditures which cannot be better defended than this undertaking.

There is another expenditure of a questionable character, the building of that section of the Transcontinental Railway from Quebec to Moncton. This was condemned in the House by the most prominent railroad authority of that time, the then Minister of Railroads, the late Hon. Mr. Blair. Mr. Blair said that it was an unnecessary work, that it was parallelling the Intercolonial Railway and that the construction of that road would eventually turn the Intercolonial Railway into scrap iron. Yet this government has gone on with the construction of that road at a great cost and we will have the spectacle of two government roads parallelling one another from Quebec to Moncton, when one good road would amply serve the purpose and afford railway facilities for the people in that country. At the same time other sections of the country are languishing and starving for railroads, but the government in its wisdom or unwisdom has seen fit to build this unnecessary and unjustifiable section of the National Transcontinental Railway.

The expenditure on the Militia Department is open to criticism. This is the only department whose expenditure has not been reduced this year. The department costs the country about $7,000,000 a year. To keep up what? A standing army? We have read of an army where they were all officers and no men. There is a feeling in this country that a great deal of this money is going to the officers, and yet when the time comes, if ever it should come, when there will have to be fighting by the people of this country, it will be found as it has been before, that the fighting will be done not by the men who are living in luxury and enjoying large salaries with all this fuss and feathers as the hon. member for Nanaimo says about them, the fighting will be done by the hard working men from the country and the towns. There is a feeling of distrust with reference to this militia expenditure. I have no doubt there are many good men in the Militia Department, I have no reason for saying otherwise, but there is a feeling that there is much more spent in that department than the returns justify, and I think that perhaps a certain amount of that money might be more profitably spent in other directions.

Much as has been said about making a gift of a Dreadnought to Great Britain. If the government and the people saw fit to do this, I do not think any fault could be found. I think it would be better to make some such gift as that than to waste any money on the Militia Department. I am not saying all the money has been wasted, but there is a feeling that this department is doing as it likes without any check and I am not surprised that a government supporter should come out and state that there is too much fuss and feathers in that department. I firmly believe that of the $7,000,000 spent on the militia at least some has not been spent in a profitable and useful way.

On motion of Mr. E. M. Macdonald, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 12.30 a. m., Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, April 27, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PAYMENT OF FEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington) moved that the Fourteenth Report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines be concurred in. He said: As this is a special report recomending some changes in the rules, I might offer a word of explanation. There is apparently some anomaly in the rules of the House of Commons in respect of private Bill legislation, as they stand at present. The clerk of the committee, who is very familiar with these rules, and a very capable and experienced officer, drew the attention of the committee to the fact that a difference exists in regard to private Bills originating in this House and those originating in the Senate as respects the payment of fees. If a private Bill originates in this House, by rule 88, subsection 3, it is provided that certain fees shall be paid having regard to the capitalization of the proposed company; and by subsection 5 of the same rule, other fees are chargeable in respect to the borrowing powers or bonding powers of the company. If the same Bill happened to be introduced in the Senate, fees would only be charged in respect of the capitalization and no fees would be required in respect of the borrowing powers. This difference arises by the peculiar wording of subsection 8, of section 88, which provides:

The additional charges provided for in section 3 of this rule shall also apply to private Bills originating in the Senate.

But section 3 of the rule only applies to fees payable on the capitalization of the company, and not in respect to the borrowing powers of the company. The other amendments to the rules which the report mentions are merely to conform with the main objection which I have now submitted to the House, except in regard to section 87 of the rule. Section 87 provides that:

Petitions for private Bills shall only be received by the House within the first six weeks of the session.

It so happens that as a petition has to lie on the table for two days before being received by the House, the time allowed is really six weeks less two days. No doubt the intention was to allow the full six weeks, and the proposal of the committee is that the rule should be amended by inserting the words 'if presented' after the word 'House' in the second line of the rule, which would allow a clear six weeks after the sitting of the House for the presentation of a petition for a private Bill. There is one other change also recommended in regard to companies who seek to increase their capital stock, it being provided in the Bill of incorporation that if at any time they so desire they may increase it. There have been instances where companies have come forward with practically a nominal capital and have asked for power. In that case they pay a very small fee and subsequently increase their capital to what sum they see proper and escape the payment of the fees on the increased capital. The report proposes that in such cases the amount of the increased capital that a company desires at any time to have shall be stated in the Bill and the fees shall be paid in respect thereof.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) that he do not press this motion to-day, but that it stand as a notice for future consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stands as a notice of motion.

Mr. GUTHRIE.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 157) for the relief of John Denison Smith.—Mr. Guthrie.

Bill (No. 158) respecting the Bank of Winnipeg.—Mr. Guthrie.

Bill (No. 160) to incorporate the Canadian Red Cross Society.—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill (No. 161) to incorporate the Equity Fire Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Macdonell.

CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 159) to create a permanent commission on the conservation of the Natural Resources of Canada.

Mr. MONK. Explain.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, this Bill is introduced for the purpose of the formation of a permanent commission on the natural resources of Canada. Hon. gentlemen will no doubt remember that there was a conference held in Washington at an earlier stage of this session at which Canada was represented, and that the report of that conference recommended and urged strongly that the countries taking part in it, namely, Mexico, the United States and Canada, should each of them establish a permanent conservation commission for the purposes of considering, investigating and recommending in regard to the development of the natural resources in their own countries. The government has judged that it is wise to accept that recommendation and has entrusted me with the duty of drawing up a Bill for that purpose. I will just say shortly that the Bill provides for a commission, which shall be an honorary commission, of thirty-two members, twelve of whom shall be ex officio members, three members of the government at Ottawa and one representative of each of the provincial governments in Canada, that representative to be, as a general rule, a minister of the province in charge of the lands, forests and mines. That will depend, of course, on the duties assigned to the different provincial ministers. That would provide for twelve members of the commission. It is proposed to provide that the twenty other members of the commission shall be appointed by order in council. The government will appoint one of these commissioners as chairman. The commissioners shall not be paid at all, but shall receive their travelling expenses when they attend a meeting of the commission. There will be one annual meeting in the month of January and other meetings shall take place at the call of the chairman of the commission. The work of the commission shall be conducted by a small office at Ottawa which office shall be included in the inside service here and be in charge of one officer who shall be called the secretary of the commission. I think this outlines the chief details of the Bill. The Bill, which is a very short one, outlines these details and defines the objects and intentions of the commission.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is there just one similar commission in the United States or does each state have its own commission?

Mr. FISHER. There is a commission appointed by the President and then most of the states—I do not remember exactly how many, but I think some thirty of them —have also created commissions. The President has appointed one federal commission, which is not appointed under any law of congress but upon the initiative of the President.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC—LABOURERS FROM SIBERIA.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I would like to inquire from the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Lemieux) with respect to an answer given yesterday to a question on the Order Paper regarding labourers from Siberia. The minister's answer was that:

> The Department of Labour has received no report as described by the hon. gentleman on this question. The only notice we have had on this matter is the mention that was made of it in the House.

I wish to inquire as to the significance of this answer whether the minister does not consider that a report is made to the department when a member, from his place in the House, reads the details to him and asks the department to be good enough to investigate the statements there contained. That is what I did, and I would like to ask the minister to make clear to us what our standing is in that connection.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Minister of Labour). I might just say to my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Taylor) that my remark of yesterday was not intended to hurt the feelings of that hon. gentleman. I merely wished to state then that the first notice the department had received that any Siberians had come to Prince Rupert was through the remarks made the other day in the House by the hon. gentleman. The department, since these remarks were made by the hon. gentleman, has endeavoured to find out whether the statement made on the authority of a newspaper by the hon. gentleman, is true or not. As soon as we get any precise information I will let the hon. gentleman know. But I meant to say that the only notice received of any Siberians coming to Canada was from the hon. gentleman's remarks. There is nothing in the Department of Labour to make us acquainted with any such state of things. We have written to the president of the Transcontinental Railway.

HECATE STRAIT.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Has the Prime Minister any information to give in reference to the statement made in the press of the United States, that the State Department of the United States has been unable to ascertain any information as to the position which Canada takes with regard to the Hecate Strait?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think the question is at all as represented in the press. I have given instructions that the papers should be collected and they will be brought down as soon as possible.

HOURS OF LABOUR ON PUBLIC WORKS —ORDER DISCHARGED.

Mr. VERVILLE moved:

That Order No. 35 of the Public Bills and Orders for the second reading of Bill (No. 22) respecting hours of labour on public works, be now called for the purpose of its being discharged from the Order Paper.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If the object be to discharge the order there can be no objection.

Mr. AMES. Why does the hon. member wish the order discharged ?

Mr. VERVILLE. I wish the order discharged because its discharge will enable me to bring the matter before the House this session in another form. The question as to the hours of labour on public works is, I consider, of considerable importance at the present time.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. LENNOX. An order of the House was issued on the 3rd of March (Votes and Proceedings page 297) for a copy of all tenders received for the construction of certain sections of the eastern division of the National Transcontinental Railway, &c., and I call attention to the fact that the order of the House has not been complied with in that the copies of all tenders for contracts have not been included in the return brought down.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will make inquiry.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the ways and means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, the debate which is now drawing to a close may be said to be the first prolonged budget debate in either the last parliament or in this. We have had expressions of opinion from a great number of hon. members on the condition of the country, and with one or two exceptions where partisanship has produced a tone of pessimism, the House must note with satisfaction that the underlying current of all the addresses has been confidence in the future of our country. I believe, Sir, that the Canadian people as a whole share our feelings of confidence in Canada, and confidence in the men at the head of the government of this country who for twelve years past have given us wise administration with its consequent prosperity. and a splendid start in this first decade of this twentieth century which we all hope and believe is to be Canada's. That feeling of confidence contributed in a large degree towards the people renewing on the twenty-sixth of last October their mandate to the Liberal government to continue in the course which they have been pursuing since they attained power. Beyond all doubt we have had in Canada twelve years of sane, practical business administration; an administration not based upon theory but upon sound practical common sense guided by wise statesmanship. In the first place as a result of that administration, no matter what the depression abroad in other lands, the Canadian government while amply providing not only for ordinary expenditure but for laying the foundations for our future progress, has always been able to announce that the finances of the country have shown a balance on the right side of the ledger. Our population has increased year after year in a ratio never before equalled in our history and our manufactures have developed to an unprecedented extent, and the consumer has had no reason to complain of oppression because of the encouragement which the government has been able to give to our industries. During these twelve years we have not followed free trade fads nor protectionists fetishes. In the days when our Conservative friends were in power they claimed that by reason of the protection theory which they attempted to put into practice Canada would be able to pull herself up by the boot legs, and her people would become rich. This government has not hung out any false signals of that kind; it has discarded fads and theories and given to Canada a wise and practical and business-like administration. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) told us that he would plant one or two feathers in the cap of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), but he must have felt that there were already in the cap of that hon. gentleman one or two feathers which he had the right to wear with distinction; feathers which the hon. gentleman from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) would like to have the title to wear were he himself Minister of Finance, but feathers which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) as a pessimistic developer of deficits in the days when he had charge of our finances was unable to lay any claim to. And so my hon. friend looks askance with envious eyes at the plumes which are so worthily worn by our present minister. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) told us that it was no credit to the Minister of Finance to have a surplus, because anybody could have a surplus by putting up the taxation. Well, in the days when he was Finance Minister though he imposed greater burdens of taxation per capita on the people than the hon. Mr. Fielding ever did, he was unable at any time to so manage the affairs of our country as to have a balance on the right side of the account.

One of the other pessimistic things to which my hon. friend gave utterance, and which justifies us in speaking of him as a little Canadian, was the proposition that the Transcontinental Railway should not be constructed so as to bind the whole of Canada together. He did not wish to see it built from Quebec to Moncton. I say that the man who takes that position is a small Canadian, who talks as if the whole history of this country had been written, and that we had nothing to look forward to—no hopes or aspirations of extension or development to stir the pride and the confidence of this young Canadian nation. The hon. gentleman says that it would be better to have no debt than to have that section of the Transcontinental Railway; that is his position. If that is so, then this whole northern country of Canada is to be left uninhabited, unexplored, untilled. Whatever the people of these original provinces may do in their future history, we in the beginning of this twentieth century are not going to do anything in the way of laying the foundations for that future. All that country is to be a closed book. We are going to build three transcontinental lines through the central and western portions of Canada, and are going to extend branches from them everywhere like arteries; but when we come down to the province of Quebec, to the verge of the little provinces down by the sea, our railway development must stop, and for all time to come, according to this small Canadian who sits on a front bench and sometimes essays to lead the opposition, we are only going to have one line of railway stretching from the provinces by the sea to the central portions of Canada. No matter what progress or development the central portions of Canada may have, our provinces by the sea are to have no advantage from that, and are to be confined to the single line of railway that has been there since confederation. My hon. friend would willingly go on and spend millions in the building of Dreadnoughts in order to satisfy the aspirations of the constituency which is giving him a resting place for the time being in the province of Ontario; but he would entirely forget the smaller province which gave him birth, and would ostracise and penalize that province, and the others by the sea, by confining them to one line of railway and not permitting them to share in the future development of this country, because forsooth if we go on and prepare for the future we are going to put a little additional debt on the people of this country. Although my hon. friend takes that position, I assume that he does not speak for all the gentlemen who sit behind him. It is but natural that he should be actuated by a spirit of pessimism; but I have sufficient confidence in the Canadianism of a large number of those who sit on the left of the Speaker to believe that they stand with us in favour of preparing in our day for a Canada which shall be properly developed all along the line, feeling that because an Ashburton treaty has to a certain extent ostracised a portion of this Dominion on the east, just as the Rocky Mountains constitute a barrier in the case of our most western province, these barriers shall not be allowed to prevent all portions of Canada from becoming united together as one country stretching from sea to sea. The construction of that railway, so far as the eastern portion of this Dominion is concerned, has in my judgment become an imperative necessity, and I hope that it will pave the way at an early date to the adoption of a policy whereby the imports from the mother country which receive the benefit of the preference shall only be permitted to receive that benefit when they enter by Canadian ports. Our hon. friends who talk about Canada for Canadians will find in such a policy an easy means of benefiting Canada in her trade relations with other countries without imposing burdens.

We are told that because the debt of this country has increased by $65,000,000 during the last twelve years we have reached a terrible condition of affairs. Our hon. friends opposite in eight years increased the debt of this country by $82,000,000, and they never worried about it; and while they were doing it, the population of the country stood still, and the business interests of the country retrograded. Yet we are told that we are on the verge of all kinds of difficulties and that our credit is impaired, because the people of Canada, having made tremendous expenditures out of ordinary revenue, which have advanced this country along lines which will ensure a full return, have increased their debt to the extent stated. In the interim we have gone on increasing our population until it has almost doubled, and the wealth of our people has increased to an astounding degree. Take, for instance, the deposits in the banks of the country. In 1896, when our friends opposite went out of power, and when they had a debt which, in relation to the population, was more onerous than our debt to-day, the deposits in the banks amounted to only $193,000,000, whereas in 1907 they amounted to $654,000,000, an accretion in that respect alone of over $461,000,000. The assets of the banks have increased $625,000,000. The Dominion savings banks holdings by the people have increased $15,752,000. So that the Canadian people during the past twelve years have increased not only in population, but in wealth; and we would be recreant to our whole duty to posterity if we did not go on with full confidence in these expenditures which are sure to yield a full return. Although the accretion to the debt took place within the last few years, very largely on account of the construction of the National Transcontinental Railway, we have also been building great public works. We have among other things greaty improved the St. Lawrence ship channel. Our hon. friends opposite claim to be the only people who have done anything in Canada; yet they went out of power, after almost a quarter of a century directing the affairs of this country, with the great national port at the foot of our canal system in such a condition that it was absolutely impossible for a vessel to go up and down the St. Lawrence below Montreal after five o'clock in the evening of a summer day. But the man who goes up and down the St. Lawrence to-day sees the splendid development that has gone on there. In that one port there have been returns for the great expenditures which have been made which the business men of this country appreciate to the full, and that is one of the reasons why they stood by the government last October and helped to send them back to power for another four years.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say we have not been getting a return for our expenditure. Is this expenditure in the northern country not to bring any return? These hon. gentlemen are singing the same old song that their friends in Ontario did when they were in opposition and when the Hon. G. W. Ross, Premier of the Ontario government, brought down this proposition to build the Temiskaming Railway, these good old Tories in the local House did then what their friends are doing now. They said that railway would run through a country where nothing was growing, where nothing would be found, and they opposed its construction to the limit of their ability. To-day, however, when splendid returns from that country are coming in, when we find a new mining camp developed there almost every six months, the wisdom of that policy and the justification for the money expended on that undertaking are proved beyond doubt. The development of the clay belt alone in those northern regions, as the result of the policy of the Ross government, will amply vindicate that policy. In the same way, to-day, in Canada, by the construction of a railway through our northern country, we are paving the way for a return, through the development of our great forests in that region and of our mineral wealth, which will compensate us a hundred fold. There is not a man who has any pride in his country and has marked its advancement during the last twelve years, who does not feel in his heart that we would be recreant to posterity if we did not go on manfully and hopefully to open up and develop this great north land of ours.

There is one other thing which has been developed by this debate. I have had the honour of sitting in this House for some five sessions. I have heard my hon. friends outside of this House and have read in Conservative journals something about the united policy of the Conservative party with regard to trade, but I have seen very little illustration of it in this parliament. In fact, I have seen no evidence in this parliament of our friends opposite having any policy at all on the tariff. This debate is another evidence of that fact. Ever since my hon. friend the leader of the opposition developed this theory of his about 'adequate protection'—which nobody, not even his own followers, ever understood, and which the country realizes he never understood himself—no one has attempted, speaking with any degree of authority for the Conservative party, to lay down any proposition regarding the tariff. We have had those gentlemen who claim to be the only people loyal to the mother land and who talk glibly on the platform and elsewhere about the advantages to the empire of a preference between the mother country and her colonies—we have had them telling us that the woollen industry was being ruined by the British preference.

Mr. THOBURN. Hear, hear.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. I suppose my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Thoburn) would vote against the preference and would like to see it abolished. He gives a sign of assent. I knew he would be more frank than some of his friends who sit around him, who would like to see it abolished but will not venture to get up and say so.

Then I was amused by my hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) last night. He gave us a picture of the grand old Conservative chieftain standing down at Sydney in 1878 and predicting that a great steel industry would grow up there, and he told us that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), when he was Finance Minister brought down a proposition to establish steel bounties so as to encourage this steel industry. That is a fair sample of the way my hon. friends opposite argue. There is a steel industry down in Sydney. In fact there are two. But the iron ore which forms the basis of the development of that industry was discovered in Newfoundland some fifteen years after Sir Chas. Tupper had made the prediction which my hon. friend so glowingly described. And the company which was incorporated for the purpose of carrying on the business of making iron and steel was incorporated since this government came into power, and I had the honour of supporting the measure to incorporate it in the local legislature in 1898, two years after these hon. gentlemen opposite had been removed from office. I know that it is the fashion of some hon. gentlemen opposite to forget the great career of Sir Chas. Tupper, the once militant leader of the Conservative party in this country. I know that his name is not a popular one with the Conservative party in certain portions of Canada, and I am quite well aware that his distinguished son, who was to have been an opponent of mine in the last contest in Pictou, is not persona grata with all these hon. gentlemen. But I do not suppose that it was on that account we had man after man on the other side standing up here and declaiming against these frightful steel bounties. One of them went into close figuring to show that every man, woman and child in his riding in Ontario was having a debt placed upon him for all time to come on account of this nefarious proposition of the Liberal government to grant steel bounties. Yet there are some gentlemen who run away with the idea that the party oppoite stands for assistance to the steel industry. It does not stand for anything. It hardly knows what it does stand for. One minute my hon. friends opposite will laud the national policy, and the next they almost unanimously vote in favour of a reduction of the duty on agricultural implements. I remember a staunch old Conservative from my province who said in this House some years ago, when the hon. gentlemen were in power: 'If you remove one brick in the structure of the national policy, the whole fabric will fall to pieces.' Well, the Conservative party made no scruples of removing any number of bricks and stones from the edifice and are going on doing the same to-day.

My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) wants to have a lower tariff on German goods. He is continually attacking our genial Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) because our tariff is so hard on the Germans. Yesterday we had a return of that attack. He wanted to lower the tariff so that we may buy German goods. Is not that a strange story for a man to tell us who glories in the virtue of high protection? Then adequate protection was the latest pronouncement. That pronouncement never had any tangible meaning, and has ceased to have any significance, and for five years our hon. friends opposite have been wandering in the wilderness, waiting for a Moses to come along, who, with some divining rod, would strike the water and produce some magic shibboleth with which they might gull the public. Let me recall the fact that while these hon. gentlemen have been laying down theories here and there about what their tariff policy would be if they were in office, they have never ventured to lay down any general policy in opposition. They have never ventured to submit an amendment, declaring for any system different from that advocated by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). No alternative proposal of a general character to the tariff policy of the government has been made by my hon. friends opposite during the past six years. Of course, once in a while one of them gets up and wants to reduce the duties on agricultural implements, another inveighs against the steel bounties, while others, like my hon. friend from North Lanark (Mr. Thoburn) want a higher duty on woollens. And so the inconsistency goes on, with the result that this government, among the satisfactory things on which it can congratulate itself, have the fact that, after twelve years directing the affairs of this country, it has a tariff policy which its opponents in this House do not venture to question in general principles, against which they have never moved any amendment, and in regard to which they have never set up any alternative proposition

When my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin), who spoke last night, went on to discuss what is popularly known as the coal question, I was somewhat curious as to his position. I have heard that my hon. friend had been regarded as a humorist at least at one period of his career in his addresses in election campaigns; and, though I have never heard him discuss questions on the stump, I am satisfied that he has more than lived up to any reputation that he had in that regard in his utterances on the coal duties and coal business in this House last night. His utterances will be regarded with amusement by every intelligent miner and everybody connected with the coal industry in the province of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman reached the summit of temerity and audacity in his discussion of this question. When I heard him, I wondered if I could believe my ears, and now that I find his words in cold print I almost wonder whether I can believe my eyes. This is what he said:

> I cannot allow the opportunity to go by without pointing out that the condition of the miner of Nova Scotia is to-day not as good as it was previous to 1896, notwithstanding that the men are now able to work for twelve months in the year.

That is a very curious statement. Previous to 1896, hon. members opposite were accustomed to claim that they were the sole and only friends of the coal industry of this country, and that if the Liberals ever got into power, such determined foes were they of everything connected with coal that the coal mines would be destroyed and the industry rooted out. And my hon. friend (Mr. Maddin) paid me the compliment of reading certain telegrams that passed between my leader and myself in 1896 and some further utterances made by myself a couple of years afterwards in the provincial legislature. It is not always in these changing times in Canada, that a public man can say of an utterance of his made twelve years previously that he stands by that utterance absolutely. I myself enjoy that satisfaction in regard to the language my hon. friend has quoted as having been uttered by me in the legislature of 1898.

Mr. HUGHES. Was that about the Highlanders?

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. My hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) does not know much about the Highlanders.

Mr. BOYCE. Tell us about them.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. My hon. friend (Mr. Boyce), I am afraid, would be too obtuse to appreciate anything in regard to the great Celtic race to which I have the honour to belong. I ventured to point out, in 1896 and 1898, that our Conservative friends claimed that they were the special friends and patrons of the coal industry, and that that industry would expire if anything should happen to the Conservative party. But, while they claimed to be rampant protectionists, and preached the glory and virtue of protection everywhere in this country, and while they were protecting everything else they were not giving the coal industry any protection in comparison with what other industries enjoyed. And what was the result. In 1896, after eighteen years of Conservative rule, in regard to the coal industry? We did not have the St. Lawrence market. In the great county of Inverness, represented by my hon. friend (Mr. A. W. Chisholm), there was not a pound of coal raised. It is true these hon. gentlemen talked about giving the St. Lawrence market to the coal miners of Nova Scotia, but the chief colliery in my county never sent a pound of coal in Montreal during the whole eighteen years the Conservative party were in power. And, instead of there being continuous employment for the coal miners, what was the position? In the winter months, there was destitution and poverty in almost every coal mining town in the province.

My hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) displayed his talent as a humorist when he declared that it was a satisfaction in those old Conservative days that the men did not work in the winter time, that they had a chance to improve their minds. Unfortunately, the result of that was, that in many of the mining districts of the province, appeals were being made to the charity of the citizens during the latter days of the Conservative party's term of power. And, in 1896, under this beneficent Conservative reign, to which my hon. friend refers, the total sales of Nova Scotia coal anywhere and everywhere in this country amounted to only 1,831,357 tons. There were poor wages in all the departments of labour in and about the coal mines, and it was impossible for the people to get along. My honoured leader, in 1896, declared to me and to the coal miners and to people interested in coal in Nova Scotia, that under a Liberal government, the coal interests of that province would be carefully guarded. And let me tell you that my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has more than fulfilled his promise in that regard. The great advancement that has come to Nova Scotia industries, particularly to the coal industry, is such that not a man in this country, I care not what his political proclivities may be, who looks at the history and the facts, but must be bound to admit the change that has come over Nova Scotia since my right hon. friend took charge of the affairs of this country and the Liberal party began to dominate the policy of the Dominion. Instead of 1,851,000 tons of Nova Scotia coal being sold, last year we sold 5,485,583 tons, an increase of 3,654,226 tons, or three times as much coal as we sold in 1896 when the Conservatives went out of power. And, as regards the home market, we supplied to it last year 4,203,134 tons, including 2,047,638 to the St. Lawrence River market. And we sent it from all the counties of Nova Scotia that produce coal. The county of Inverness which never produced a pound of coal in 1896 last year produced 335,000 tons. In addition to that, the last act of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, when he left provincial politics, was to introduce and carry through a policy of developing the coal industry of the Island of Cape Breton by the inauguration of the Dominion Coal Company. And the fruits of that legislation are evidenced not only in our own province, but throughout the whole Dominion of Canada. No less than $40,000,000 of capital is invested in the coal mines of the county of Cape Breton alone. In addition to that, the inauguration of the Dominion Coal Company paved the way for the inauguration of the Dominion Steel Company, which is also in our province, and of which we have heard so much of late. But that is not all this government has done for the coal interest, in Nova Scotia. In 1896, in the days when my hon. friends claimed to be the be-alls and the end-alls in rendering assistance to the coal industry, not a pound of coal could be sent from Nova Scotia west of Levis in the winter time of the year. Our coal mines were paralysed when the navigation of the St. Lawrence was shut up on account of the necessity of paying two freight rates over the railroads in order to reach Montreal, the great commercial metropolis. But the taking over of the Drummond County Railway and the extension of the Intercolonial to Montreal enabled our mines to send their products into the city of Montreal during the entire year. As a result of this action the depression which existed in the coal industry during the winter, in the olden times, has completely disappeared, and in almost every instance work is going on in the coal mines continuously, in the winter months as well as during the summer months.

Then my hon. friend told us that the wages of the miners had not improved. I happen to have under my hand a return on this very point—I am sorry my hon. friend is not here. Here is an actual return of the wages paid in the winter of 1889 in the Victoria mines in the county of Cape Breton. In January the men worked 19 days, in February 16 days, in March 19 days, in April 14 days, an average of 17¼ days per month. The average daily wage of coal cutters was $1.60 per day during that time. My hon. friend from Cape Breton was member of a board of conciliation which sat last year to settle some dispute between certain employees of the Nova Scotia Steel Company and the company itself, and the investigation brought out the wages that were being paid last year by this coal company. Hand miners at No. 1 colliery were getting $2.51 a day; at No. 5 colliery, coal cutters were getting $2.95, and machine runners from $4.57 to $4.70 per day. The average during the same months of 1898 was $4.50 a day, instead of $1.60 during the time our Conservative friends were in power. I am here to say that there is no industrious miner in the province of Nova Scotia who need lack work in the mines, under this government, under the hopeful conditions that exist, not only in Nova Scotia, but all over this country. There is no necessity for any industrious miner lacking work in any of the coal mining counties of Nova Scotia. My hon. friend tells us that these miners go to the companies' stores for their purchases. Perhaps I ought to apologize to the House for going into these details, but these statements require correction. The provincial legislature of Nova Scotia, a few years ago, passed legislation peremptorily requiring that all the wages of these men employed in the mines should be paid fortnightly and in cash, irrespective of any relation to the stores. That measure was passed by the Liberal party in the provincial legislature. Not only that, but I am in a position to know that the various operators, men controlling the coal companies in our province, are anxious to assist the miners in obtaining their own homes. Cottages are being built by the companies for their miners, in order to provide their men with homes. My hon. friend would like this House to believe that the conditions are bad and objectionable. The fact is that these coal companies have gone to the extent of giving land free to assist their employees to provide homes for themselves about the coal mines of our province. I may say again that unless my hon. friend wants to appear before this House and the people of his own province as a humorist, I can account in no other way for the statements he made last night. So far as the record of this Liberal government is concerned towards the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia, it is one in regard to which we welcome the fullest criticism, and I for one will be glad to hear anything that any hon. gentleman can say about it. I can prove that whereas there was difficulty, whereas there was gloom and despair all over the coal mines in Nova Scotia when the Conservatives were in power, to-day we have prosperity, advancement and development everywhere.

That is one of the reasons why I would like to notice the remarks of my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Smith), and to point out to the government the necessity for care in observing the attitude of the United States in regard to this matter. My hon. friend believes that the prosperity of our coal mining industry depends largely on a foreign market. My hon. friend is misinformed in regard to that. The markets for the Nova Scotia coal mines are in Canada, are in Montreal, where we send over 2,000,000 tons of coal yearly. This talk about Nova Scotia going into the American market is not based upon actual knowledge. I notice that my friend, Mr. Daniel Mann, of the Canadian Northern, gave an interview in Philadelphia the other day, and he undertook to dispose of this question with a wave of the hand. My friend, Mr. Mann, may know something about building railroads, but he has a good deal to learn in regard to this coal question. I am here to say that his opinion in regard to what should be done with reference to coal, deserves very little weight simply because he is not properly informed. It is one of the old theories that the Ohio and Pennsylvania people are able to send coal down to New York. It would be a very nice state of affairs if the duty was taken off by the Americans, because then of course Nova Scotia would send her coal into New York and Boston, and we would have coal coming in here from Pennsylvania. Now, these are not the conditions that exist at all. The coal conditions along the Atlantic sea-board are controlled by the coal miners of West Virginia. We do not hear of West Virginia coal coming into Canada. An hon. friend near me says it does come in. Well, that only shows how the West Virginian people are extending their operations; if they can send coal across the lakes, and up to the head of Lake Superior; it shows how completely they control the New York and Boston market. I had an opportunity of being south not long ago, and seeing these tremendous piers where the coal of West Virginia comes down from the mountains to Norfolk, and is carried in barges and schooners along the coast up to New York and Boston. Any one who studies the situation will tell you in a moment that the New York market is controlled completely by the coal miners of West Virginia, and that Ohio and Pennsylvania are not competitive factors at that point. The same conditions exist largely also with regard to Boston. The total coal market in Boston is not more than 5,000,000 tons, not much more than Montreal. It might be interesting to the House to see just what these coal mining people say for themselves. You find that the Pittsburg people want to have the duty taken off coal, and West Virginia don't want to have it taken off. I have under my hand a memorandum which the West Virginia people made to the Ways and Means Committee in the United States. This is what they say. and the wisdom of their statement will be recognized by this House:

> The coal trade of West Virginia has been built up against great difficulties in the way of transportation facilities and competition in the markets, and while the operators have, of course, taken their chances in the markets, and while the operators have of course taken their chances on a revision of the tariff injuriously affecting, perhaps destroying their investments, the fact remains that the business has been created and grown under conditions substantially as they are.

There are $70,000,000 of Canadian capital invested in the coal industry in Nova Scotia in regard to which the same statement might be made with equal truth as the West Virginia operators make in regard to themselves. The business in which that capital has been invested has been created and grown under substantially the present conditions as to tariff and on the faith that things would continue substantially as they are. That is what the West Virginia people say. Now, here is what the Pennsylvania or the Pittsburg people say:

Our experience in past years has demonstrated that practically no more coal has been brought into this country from Canada when the duty has been much reduced or entirely eliminated.

That is laying down a good sound principle. That is laying down a principle which we are bound to accept in Canada in regard to anthracite coal. It was urged that the duty should be taken off anthracite coal so that anthracite would come into the province of Ontario at a cheaper rate. Not a single cent cheaper has it come in. The American operator charges the Ontario consumer just as much for his coal as when the duty was paid, the difference being that he puts it into his own pocket instead of allowing it to go into the treasury of this country. The proposition that these gentlemen lay down here is—— —that practically no more coal has been brought into this country from Canada when the duty has been much reduced or entirely eliminated.

It also shows another thing—that if the duty were taken off bituminous coal it would not help the Canadian people to send any coal into the United States. Then it goes on:

We believe that there is little grounds for the argument that our eastern sea-board markets would be supplied with coal from Nova Scotia, and the coal from West Virginia and central Pennsylvania displaced.

These gentlemen go to the United States government and one group say that they would like to get in here and the other group say that they do not want the duty changed. Every one can see that the question of dealing with coal duties as far as the United States is concerned is not a matter of argument and could not by any possibility be so considered unless there was some idea of a long-term reciprocal arrangement. Then you would have a proposition about which there might be some argument, but the idea that the duty should be taken off in Canada on the theory that the coal purchaser in Ontario is going to get his coal cheaper is the most delusive idea and one that is objectionable——

Mr. STRATTON. The Canadian and American consumer pay the same price for the same coal exactly at the mine.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. Yes, at the mine. Well, my hon. friend is telling us what the conditions are now. But, my hon. friend has heard of the dumping clause, has heard of the manufacturing interests of this country coming to this government and asking them to deal with cases where the Americans had made Canada a dumping ground for their products when they were in difficulty and my hon. friend will probably find that a changed condition in regard to coal would apply there. But my hon. friend is beside the mark as regards the ordinary everyday consumers of coal. My hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) gave us the figures showing that the imports of bituminous coal amounted to 6,485,000 tons and that of this 4,311,000 tons were imported by railways. I am aware that there is a large quantity of bituminous slack coal imported into Ontario, but there is no onerous difficulty in regard to that because the duty is only 15 cents a ton—a very much lower amount than a good many of those gentlemen who buy that coal ask and obtain from this government by way of protection to the products that they want to sell to the people of Nova Scotia. There were imported into Canada 1,154,000 tons of slack coal and the total amount of coal that came in for general consumption over and above what was used by the railways was only 2,173,481; so that, one-third of the coal that comes into Canada and is used by the ordinary consumer is slack coal on which there is only 15 cents a ton and on the whole quantity of bituminous coal the duty collected from the ordinary consumer in this country is only $1,000,000 or thereabouts. The ordinary coal consumer of this country contributes to the revenue outside of the railways, which occupy a peculiar position, only in the vicinity of $1,000,000. I do not think that is an unfair contribution and it does seem to me that the integrity of this country demands that due consideration should be given to all the industries all over the Dominion. Of course in addition to that, 615,000 tons of coke came into this country, but it came in absolutely free. One result of the policy of this government in regard to this question and in regard to the tariff question generally has been that it has taught the United States people that this country is a country that proposes to do business at its own stand and on behalf of its own people. In the days when our Conservative friends were in power we were regarded as a mere football for American interests and for American statesmen and manufacturers. But the position has so completely changed that the man who sits down and reads the tariff hearings that have gone on before the Ways and Means Committee at Washington rises from the perusal of that document with the conviction that the intervening years have brought Canada into such a position that the republic to the south of us regard us as a brother country practically of equal position and entitled to the same consideration as they extend to any country in the world.

Mr. J. D. REID. The hon. gentleman is a protectionist now.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. My hon. friend need not worry about my position in regard to this question. My position in regard to the tariff is one that has never been concealed and that has never been in doubt.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. What is it?

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. I am neither a fad protectionist like my hon. friend nor a fad free trader. I stand for a sound business tariff such as this government have given this country for the past twelve years, one which is adapted from time to time to meet the needs we have and which has regard to the industrial conditions of the country all over. That, I say is a business tariff and I do not wish to be considered at all as a fad protectionist or a faddist free trader. I hope my position is satisfactory to my hon. friend.

Mr. J. D. REID. Perfectly — a good protectionist.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. Now, the conclusion at which I wish to arrive in regard to these few remarks is that the coal duty on coal and coal products to-day does not impose an enormous burden on the ordinary consumer and is necessary in order to maintain the proper adjustment of revenue production having regard to the different provinces of the Dominion. Nova Scotia produces very few things that enter into the business life of the rest of the country, and we purchase and purchase gladly from other portions of Canada Canadian products, the result of the efforts of Canadian manufacturers and Canadian workmen. The adjustment of conditions in regard to coal, as it has been made by this government, leaves our province in its proper place in regard to the whole tariff situation. The $70,000,000 invested in that province in that great industry creates a condition which cannot be disregarded whenever any of these problems come up for consideration. The attitude of the American nation to-day with regard to these matters shows that the policy pursued by this government in regard to coal and in regard to all other questions, has earned the respect of the great American people, and shows that they take us into consideration to a degree that they never did before when they come to settle their tariff problems and tariff considerations. The proposition laid down by the West Virginia coal miners in regard to this question is one which should be well considered and I have no doubt will be considered by this government in whatever action may be taken on this question. For myself, I submit that the position of affairs with regard to our relations with the United States was never better laid down than it was laid down by the right hon. Prime Minister of this country some years ago when he declared that we would send no more delegations to Washington. That policy is one which should be maintained not only in regard to this question, but in regard to all the tariff questions which affect the interests of this country. My hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) in his speech last night dealt with the coal industry in Nova Scotia, and were he in the House to-day I should like to know from him what is his policy with regard to coal. We have a very aggressive paper called the 'Halifax Herald,' which is supposed to speak for the Conservative party, and for months it has been promulgating the theory of free trade in coal. A distinguished journalist very high in the councils of the Conservative party, Mr. Milner, has been carrying a campaign for what is described as a Free Coal League, but the exact existence of which, unless it is a side wheel of the modern Conservative party, nobody has been able to discover. However, the object of his campaign is free coal with the United States. In 1891 the policy of the Conservative party was reciprocity in coal with the United States, and whether or not they have changed that policy I do not know, but for my part I submit that the record of this government for the last 12 years and the results achieved prove that there is no necessity for changing the existing conditions. Of course, as business developments arise conditions may change which might warrant the situation being reviewed in the common interests of the coal industry and of the people of Canada, but, in my judgment that time has not arrived, and should it ever come I have confidence in the ability of this government to grapple with the question and to arrange it in the interest of those concerned in the coal industry as well as of the coal consuming population of the country.

Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maddin) attempted to show that the exodus of Canadians to the United States is as great to-day as it was under the Conservative government, and he cited as a proof that last year $2,000,000 worth of settlers' effects had gone out of Canada. I took the trouble to look at the official returns and I found that the exact amount was $1,664,662, so that the hon. gentleman was only about $342,000 out. It may, however, be interesting to look at the other side of the account and there we find that there came from the United States to Canada last year settlers' effects to the amount of $6,818,673, and that there were over $10,000,000 worth came into Canada from all countries. This is truly a pleasing change from the days of Conservative rule when the balances were largely against us. My hon. friend (Mr. Maddin) is a pessimist. He of course followed the lead of the ex-Minister of Finance, who seems unable to rise above that feeling of settled gloom which has characterised him during the past three or four years in this House. Other Conservative members occasionally do exhibit some feeling of hope and confidence in their country, but the hon. gentleman from North Toronto has settled down to the gospel of pessimism and the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) seems to have caught the disease. Our people in Nova Scotia do sometimes stray abroad, perhaps because of the adventurous spirit which characterizes the sons of the heather; but, the happy fact is in evidence now that whereas in the days of our Conservative friends they went to the United States, today they are migrating to the fertile plains of the Canadian west. I regret that the sons of Nova Scotia should leave their native province, but if go they must is it not a consoling thought that they go to another part of our own land where their industry and energy are directed to the development of the resources of our own country. One of the things for which as Canadians we should congratulate ourselves during the past twelve years of our national life is that in that period Canadians have been taught to know their country and to feel proud of it; to believe in its great possibilties and to feel a certainty in its future which nothing can shake. Looking forward to the days to come, and taking a retrospect of the years that have passed in this first decade of the twentieth century, no matter what our politics, we realize that in this northern land we have a country lavishly endowed with vast resources, and a people who, not with faint hearts and doubting words, but with strong minds and hopeful thoughts are eager to develop these resources and to lay the foundations of a great and strong nation. I am one of those who believe that Canada is but at the beginning of her nationhood, and no matter how gentlemen opposite may cavil, expenditures have to be made to-day and will have to be made in the future to prepare our country for the high rank she is destined to take. The feeling of the Canadian people today, and we ought to be proud of it, is a feeling of confidence in the future of Canada, of confidence in this Liberal party which has governed the country so well and under whose administration unprecedented national progress has been made.

Mr. WM. WRIGHT (Muskoka). Mr. Speaker, the annual delivery of the budget speech by the Minister of Finance, dealing as it does with the financial affairs of the country and outlining the general policy of the government, opens up such a wide field for discussion that no member of this House need apologize for expressing in this debate his views on the condition of the country. Before proceeding I want to refer to what has been said by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) who has just spoken. He told us he did not know what the policy of the Conservative party was, but I can assure him that we have had a well defined policy for a good many years, and before the hon. gentleman casts any reflections on that policy I would suggest to him and to his friends that they should endeavour to find some designation for that poor, nameless, characterless, fatherless, motherless, something of a policy which belongs to the Liberal party, and which so far nobody has been able to christen. The Minister of Finance arbitrarily fixed the population of the Dominion at 7,000,000 and I may say that having given sufficient attention to this question to enable me to give a fairly accurate approximation of what the population of our country really is, I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) that if he gives the population of Canada at 6,000,000 he will be much nearer the mark, and his deductions as to per capita taxation and so on drawn from the population, would have been much more accurate than they were. These gentlemen opposite claim that they have stopped the exodus of Canadians to the United States but that I most emphatically deny. More Canadians are leaving this country to-day than ever before, and they are being driven out by the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. In that connection I wish to read one or two items which I have culled from the newspapers, and which like straws show which way the wind blows:

Toronto, April 13.—'The United States owes much to Canadian nurses,' said Mr. E. F. Stevens, hospital architect, of Boston, addressing the third conference of the Canadian Hospital Association at the parliament buildings to-day on 'Some Points in the Architecture of Small Hospitals.' 'One can scarcely visit a hospital from Maine to California without finding Canadian nurses in charge. In one hospital I visited I noticed a British flag in almost every nurse's room. I asked the superintendent how this was, and she told me that about ninety per cent of the nurses were Canadians. Thus you see that here in Canada I feel among friends.'

This prevails all over the United States. Here is another item which I cut out of a newspaper on the same day:

Seventeen families, all French-Canadians, are reported to have left the vicinity of Farnham, Quebec, for the United States.

Here is another which I cut out of one of the Ottawa papers this morning:

There are glowing reports of the success of the Canadian society of New York, which during the past year added 71 members to its rolls, and endowed a cot at $5.000 in the Presbyterian hospital of New York. Dr. J. J. McPhee is the president.

If hon. gentlemen opposite have stopped the exodus to the United States, where are the recruits coming from who are referred to there? To my own personal knowledge, there are young men and young women leaving Canada for the United States on every train that crosses the border, and in most instances they do not return to this country. I admit that there is quite an influx of Americans from the western states who are tempted to come to this country, bonused to come by the gift of $1,000 worth of land. A great many of them are coming, tempted by free land and the opportunity to make money out of the land, but a great many of them have no intention of becoming permanent residents of Canada. I will give an illustration. Being in the town of Moosejaw about a year and a half ago, while waiting for an early morning train, I met an American who told me that he had come to Canada some five years before and taken up a homestead, brought some of his relatives, homesteaded in their name, stayed long enough to get his patent, speculated in lands in the neighbourhood, made a lot of money out of Canada, and then took his family back to the United States, and he had come over again to collect some money still due to him. He told me that he was a representative of a great many Americans who came to Canada without intending to make it their permanent home, but simply took advantage of the offer of this government to make some easy money and then go back. I do not mean to say that a large number of these people will not become permanent settlers. Once they settle in Canada, they will find it difficult to pull up and go back, but I do say that a great many come without any intention of becoming permanent residents of this country.

To return to the speech of the Minister of Finance. A great many of the apologists of the government have given a great deal of credit to the Minister of Finance for having what they call a surplus. When you have two accounts open, one a running account dealing with the ordinary running expenses of government, and the other dealing with expenditures on matters of a permanent character, it is very easy, if you are allowed to transfer from one account to another, to make your running account balance and show a surplus, and since hon. gentlemen opposite have come in they have made it easier. When the old rails on the Intercolonial become worn out and they put in new ones they charge the new rails to capital account. When a locomotive wears out and they buy a new one, they charge the new locomotive to capital account. This method of transacting business runs through all their accounts, and by doing business in that way it is the simplest thing in the world to have a surplus. I have been somewhat amused at the government and their friends adding up these surpluses year after year. They always suggest to me the story of the man who went to town before Thanksgiving to get a turkey. He bought the turkey, but also bought and consumed a good deal of liquor. But he knew that it was important that he should bring the turkey home, and he started. After rolling and tumbling in the mud a good many times, he managed to reach home, but the turkey was so muddy that it was hard to tell what it was. He threw it on the table, saying: 'Here, wife, are thirteen turkeys.' His wife said: 'You foolish man, when the mud is off we shall see whether there is one or not; but there are not thirteen.' He said: 'There must be thirteen, because I fell down thirteen times, and every time I fell down I picked up a turkey.' Those thirteen turkeys were not more visionary or harder to find than the surpluses of hon. gentlemen opposite. Some hon. gentlemen opposite suggest that it is important to know where the money came from to make the surpluses. I think it is as important to find out where the surpluses are stored and what use is made of them, and I would ask the Finance Minister to enlighten the House on these points.

We have heard a good deal with regard to the policies of the two parties of this country, as to which bears most heavily upon the general public. My own view is that the only rule that we can apply in deciding that question is to compare the amount of money that has been extracted from the pockets of the people under the respective policies. When we do that, and find that hon. gentlemen opposite have taken nearly three times as much out of the pockets of the people as their Conservative predecessors did, we must come to the conclusion that their policy, whatever its name is, has been successful in taxing the people to a much greater extent, both in bulk and in detail, than that of their predecessors. Now, it is not a very hard thing to tax the people. Some hon. gentlemen opposite thought that the Minister of Finance was deserving of a great deal of credit because he succeeded in taxing the people almost to the limit. To my mind, that is something to apologize for, not to pride themselves upon. It ought to be the policy of public men in Canada to take from the people just as small an amount in the way of taxation as possible. I lay that down as a rule, and that was the policy of the Conservative party when they introduced the national policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be surprised that we should favour a reduction of the tariff under certain circumstances. Let me reply that it has always been the policy of the Conservative party to lower the tariff to the lowest possible point on everything we do not produce, such as tea, coffee, sugar and other things of every day consumption. Then we would set the tariff high enough to give protection to our manufacturers and at the same time take care to see that the general public were not taxed more than they ought to be. Wherever any manufacturer in this country showed a disposition to take more out of the pockets of the people than he was fairly entitled to, we were in the position to cut the tariff from under him and in that way look after the interests of the people. We were more successful in this matter than our hon. friends opposite. They have succeeded in taxing the people abnormally. They have extracted more out of the pockets of the people than there was any warrant for. So much for the difference between the two policies. But some of our friends, when they attack the national policy say that some manufacturers and producers would take advantage of the high tariff and tax the people beyond what they ought to pay. Well, I admit there is always a danger of that, but it has always been our policy, under the national policy, to protect the interests of the general public, and I do feel that these interests were safer in the hands of the Conservatives than in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. I need only refer to what we have heard this afternoon from my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and the other night from my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith). The hon. member for Nanaimo advocates free coal; my hon. friend from Pictou advocates the very opposite. Where is the unanimity there? What is their tariff policy—free coal or a high protective duty? Will some member of the government answer that question? I am afraid no one will attempt to answer it. They will not even give their policy a name because they want to make it all things to all men in every corner of the Dominion. In some places, it will be high protection; in others free trade; in others reciprocity with the United States; and elsewhere something else. It is one of those patent double back action arrangements which will adjust themselves to any kind of conditions anywhere.

Hon. gentlemen lay down the theory that our exports and imports are infallible indications of the prosperity of this country. I feel like taking issue with them. To my mind they are an index of the very opposite. I pin my faith to the theory that the nearer you can bring together the original producer and consumer, the better for the country. What is it that makes the farmer the most independent man in creation? Is it not the fact that within the borders of his farm he can produce a larger measure of what he needs than can any other man? What is true of the farmers is true of the country. Given a country like Canada, with all its natural resources, with its minerals, coal and iron, with its timber, fisheries and agricultural lands, is it not a shame that we should take up a policy apparently designed to make us merely the hewers of wood and drawers of water for the people of the south. What are our exports? Are they not simply the raw material upon which just as little work has been performed as possible to get them out of the country. True, we thresh wheat and ship it, and we ship it that way because we could not ship it in the stock. We cut our timber and ship it in logs because otherwise the United States would charge us a duty. If we cut it into boards, they will not admit it free. We are depleting our forests and taking out our minerals as fast as we can, and sending out our raw material to be manufactured some place else, and then brought back to this country and sold at a profit. That policy is altogether wrong. It ought to be the duty of the government to have these things manufactured in this country. If we had not half the exports and imports we now have, we might be still more progressive and prosperous. Why do we have these excessive exports and imports? Simply because we have been content to ship our raw materials out of Canada. Sooner or later we will begin to realize our mistaken policy, and realize it very keenly. The result of that policy has been that our young men are going to the United States where they can find the diversity of employment lacking at home. Our young men go to the United States in large numbers, and the only people whom we can keep at home are the boys who are content to go and work in the lumber woods or in the mines. To my mind that policy is altogether wrong, and it is the duty of the government to try and develop those lines of manufacture in which we have the raw material, and the brain and the brawn to convert that raw material into the goods we need. Is there any reason why we could not, if we had a proper policy, develop all these things here instead of sending out good money in order to bring into this country goods from Europe and the United States?

There is a feature brought to my mind in connection with this debate with which I wish to deal at a little greater length. Before doing that, I want to say a word with regard to some statements which were made by some hon. gentlemen who addressed this House. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean) stated that the people of Canada did not want to go back to the days of soup kitchens, and he intimated that during the time of the Conservative government soup kitchens were a common thing. I want to say to him and to hon. members opposite that there has been more soup ladled out in soup kitchens in the last two years than in any two years—or any four years—of the Conservative government. In the riding I have the honour to represent, there were more idle men last winter than in any two years of the Conservative regime. In that riding we have three factories closed that were closed within the last year or two—shut up by the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. No smoke comes from their chimneys, the wheels are standing still, the workmen rap at their doors in vain, and as they stand they bear eloquent though silent tribute to the efficacy of the policy of the present government. We are hopeful that possibly we may be able to start one of these again, but we are not sure. We had a linen mill started there very hopefully a few years ago. It went on until the people found difficulty in selling their product. In discussing the matter with the manager, I stated to him that government objected to putting on higher duties, on the ground that the prices would be raised accordingly. He said to me: If the government will give us a little higher duty, sufficient to afford us a reasonable grip of the market, we are ready to give a bond to the government or to anybody in their employ that we will not raise the prices to the consumers of Canada; what we want is the market; the price is all right, we are quite satisfied with the price, but when we put our travellers on the road, they find that dealers are already supplied from importing houses in England, France, Germany, or elsewhere, making it very hard for us to carry on our business. Besides, there is the prejudice against Canadian goods fostered by hon. gentlemen opposite in the years, to them long and weary years, when they were out of office. During that time, they travelled up and down this country—and I charge them with it now—trying to poison the minds of the people against the manufacturers of Canada, calling them robbers, thieves, scoundrels and every name they could lay their tongues to. That is absolutely true; I have heard them say it myself.

Mr. PATERSON. When was that mill built?

Mr. WRIGHT. About six or seven years ago.

Mr. PATERSON. Under the present tariff?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, and it has been shut up under the present tariff.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Misplaced confidence.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not wish to be understood as saying that the linen mill is permanently closed. The people are hopeful that they will be able to go on when they can get rid of their stock, or when the government come to their assistance. What is true of the linen industry is true of others; the people do not ask higher prices, but they ask the market and right there hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends throughout the country are unfair to the producers and manufacturers, of Canada. The manufacturers, as I understand it, do not ask higher prices, they only ask the market, and there is all the difference in the world between these two. Let me give an illustration. I was once in the manufacturing business in a small way, and I take this illustration from the business I know—building wagons: Suppose a small manufacturer is building one hundred wagons a year and feels that he ought to make $1,000 a year out of it,—he works hard not only with his hands, but with his head. To make the $1,000 he has to make $10 on each wagon. If he can make 1,000 wagons instead of 100 wagons, he will only have to make a profit or $2 each in order to make $2,000 a year, which is better for both parties. The amount of business a man can do is the important matter. A manufacturer in the United States selling in our market, while he has his own market also is at a decided advantage over a manufacturer in Canada who has only a limited market and has to divide it with a competitor, who has an advantage over him in so many ways. I am speaking not only for the manufacturers of this country but for the consumers as well. I believe that, under a proper policy properly carried out, the consumers would get their goods cheaper than they do to-day. I ask hon. members on both sides of the House: Comparing with world-prices, are the people of Canada getting their goods cheaper to-day than they did fifteen or twenty years ago? The answer must be, emphatically, No; they are paying more in proportion to the prices of the world than when the Conservative party were in power. Hon. gentlemen opposite say wages are up. We have not found it so in the riding I have the honour to represent. I will not say they have gone down quite to the point they reached in the days of the depression from 1893 to 1896. Wages in the lumber camps and work of that kind came down to $18 a month. Of course, at that rate the people were fed. During this winter, wages came down to $20, and, in some cases, as low as $18. But there is one great difference: There never was a time during all the years the Conservative party was in power when men were out of work; they had to take comparatively low wages during some years, but they could get work; but this winter they have had to walk the streets and could not get work. I have never had as many men at my door asking for employment as last winter. I am not a pessimist; naturally I am an optimist. And I have not used outside this House the facts I have stated. I have never said to one of these men that it was the party in power or the policy of the party in power that was responsible for the dearth of employment. I have never tried to create discontent with the government or with the country in which we are living and which we desire to see prosper. We on this side will not adopt the tactics of hon. gentlemen opposite when they were out of power. Up and down the side lines, and through the press and on the platform they decried the country, and tried to make the people believe that they were being robbed. If we had adopted tactics of that kind at any time within the last two or three years, we could have brought about a condition that would be appalling. But we think more of the country than we do of the government benches, and we will not follow the example of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to this matter.

Now, I have said a word or two with regard to emigration from the country. Before I take up the matter of public works, I would like to refer briefly to the subject of immigration into Canada as to what we are getting in this country in place of the young men and women who are going to the United States. Perhaps I cannot illustrate this better than to read this item from the Otawa Free Press of April 13:—

> Galicians fought like demons upon the streets of Winnipeg while mad with whisky.
> Wild orgy in connection with the celebration of the Galician Easter—The whole affair was a bestial exhibition—Police had hands full trying to arrest offenders.
> Winnipeg, April 13.—Police court officials will have to take a rest to recover from the effects of the police docket yesterday. It was the aftermath of the Galician Easter celebration, and the names on the list looked as if the alphabet had been dumped into a big bag and each individual had grabbed a handful of letters to be arranged as best suited himself. And the mix-up in the names was no worse than the mix-up in the features of the owners. There were men with faces scratched and gashed, men with parts of their noses missing, men with pieces chewed out of their ears, men and women with bandages of all sorts and colours.
> And the story told by the police who were on duty was lurid. The battle raged all over the foreign settlement, and in the later stages it was simply a case of gathering up the victims and stacking them where they would not suffer from exposure. A couple of constables would pick up a drunken man and start on a two-mile carry to the police station, but before they had gone a block they would sight a fight which looked as if murder was about due. The drunk would have to be dropped in the more pressing need, and by the time the fight was stopped there would be one or two more in sight. There were drunken and battered men in sheds, on the sidewalks and in the ditches. A woman threw a beer keg through a door, smashing it from its hinges. Another keg went through a window. A man stole a keg, was seen getting away with it, and was hammered over the head with a stick of wood till he joined the 'dead ones.'
> From a point on Mangus avenue there were three fights in sight at one time, and the police had no time to make arrests for they could not be spared from the difficult task of keeping the gangs of sots from killing each other. The whole affair was bestial in the extreme. The fines yesterday ranged from $10 down. There are prisoners awaiting trial on more serious charges, and gangs of foreigners are besieging the stations, wanting to lay information against others who beat them during the carousal.

I think, Mr. Speaker, comment is unnecessary.

Now, I wish to say a word or two on the subject of what is done with the money that is extracted from the pockets of the people of Canada for the purposes of this government. I will take up only one phase of the question, and will deal very shortly even with that—the question of public works. To my mind, the whole system under which this is managed by the government is wrong. There seems to be no plan to guide the government, and so we have large expenditures made in places where they are not needed, while other places are denied expenditures which ought to be made in the public interest. It seems that everything in this regard has to be done through the Minister of Public Works, who is supposed not only to look after the erection of the buildings and other public works of this country but to have an intimate knowledge of the intricacies of every other department, enabling him to form an opinion as to whether a public work is necessary or not. In my opinion, no Minister of Public Works could fill such a place. I think that if the Minister of Public Works looks after the erection of Public Works and sees to it that the public money is properly expended, he is doing all that we ought to ask any man to do who fills that position. The head of every great spending department ought to primarily assume the responsibility for the expenditures made for that department. If it is a matter of post offices, then the Postmaster General ought to say where the post offices should be erected, and in the same way with the Minister of Militia, who has the facts at his finger ends, ought to assume the responsibility of deciding where buildings should be erected for his department. In the same way with regard to the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and others. The Interior Department certainly ought to know whether an immigration building is needed at a certain point in the west and whether a court house is needed at some other point better than the Minister of Public Works can possibly know. In that connection there is a little matter in the Post Office Department to be noted. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in making his budget statement said that the Post Office Department paid its way. I want to say that, under a fair statement, of receipts and expenditures, the Post Office Department does not pay its way and never has paid its way. Large expenditures incurred by the people of Canada purely for the carrying on of the post office are not shown in the statement of the Post Office Department. We are putting up post office buildings here and there all over Canada. But, when the Postmaster General deals with the finances of his department, he leaves these buildings out of consideration—they find no place in his report. Prior to the erection of the post office, the Postal Department has been making an allowance to the postmaster or some other official to pay for the maintenance of the post office, but, as soon as a public building is erected for the use of the post office, the Postal Department is relieved of that charge which is assumed by the Department of Public Works. When a deputation comes asking for a post office, they ought to appear before the Postmaster General. Right in his own department he would have all the facts and figures as to the revenue and the needs of the office to guide him in arriving at a decision as to whether the circumstances warrant the erection of a building there or not. When we criticise the Minister of Public Works for erecting a post office here or there, he tells us that the people came down from there and told him that it was necessary. The result of the present management of affairs appears to be that during certain seasons, generally prior to an election, the Minister of Public Works undergoes a sort of softening process, he gets his heart and feelings in pliable condition. Somebody is sent out to the various constituencies where there are Liberal candidates to notify them of the fact. They organize a deputation and it comes down, and, while the minister is in that pliable mood, they are able to make an impression upon him which is indelible, and which he will hold when he is getting up his estimates for the next year. But when the discussion of the estimates is reached in this House and we try to press upon the minister the urgent need of public works here and there, his heart is as hard as the nether millstone or as the cement made over in Hull which we see advertised in the 'Citizen'; we cannot make any impression upon it. I have taken the trouble to go into this question to show the way public buildings of the Postal Department are erected. I take about fifty places in which post offices have been erected—the number is large enough to give a fair estimate. I find that the average cost of these post offices is over $30,000. This includes the towns and villages and leaves out of consideration the large cities.

But they erected public buildings in these places, and were paying the postmasters the average sum of $150 for light, heat, rent and looking after the office, all that was necessary to carry on the business. But in these places where we got a public building for $150 per annum, they have erected a post office that cost us $30,000, and the result has been that we have an average cost for maintenance of that building of $1,200, and at 4 per cent, the average interest on that investment, is another $1,200. That gives us a charge that we have to make up of $2,400, an annual charge for all time, making no provision for finally wiping out the debt we contracted in putting up the building. That is the position. What we got for $150 before, costs us $2,400. Now I think that if better quarters are occasionally needed, by giving a large sum in rent in these small places men could be found who would be willing to make a good postal building and put it at the disposal of the department, and there would not be, in many instances, any necessity for the erection of a public building at such a very large cost, for which there can be no necessity. I may say that I went over 25 of these small offices to see about what the average income of the office was, and I found that the average gross income of 25 of these offices was $1,628. Now these were considered, I suppose, works of urgent necessity. I have here the list, which hon. gentlemen can see if they wish. I have also a list of 25 places which were not considered of sufficient importance to warrant the erection of a building; they had not reached that stage of development that would warrant the government in putting up a new building, and yet the average gross revenue in these 25 places, three of them in towns in my own riding, was $7,225. But other places averaging a little over $1,600 were considered of sufficient importance to warrant the government in spending large sums of public money. Now I charge hon. gentlemen opposite with giving more attention to party expediency in these matters than to the public welfare, and so far as the expenditure of public money is concerned, they have left public benefit out of sight altogether. It is simply a matter of trying to win elections, and of trying to please their party friends; that is the reason they expend such large sums in places where the revenue is so small.

Now I wish to speak of some other items of expenditure. I want to take up an occurrence with which I am familiar, because it transpired in the riding I represent, and it shows the manner in which the public moneys of this country are spent. We have a little village in my riding called Baysville, a little town that rests on the north-west bank of the Muskoka river, the south branch. About five years ago the government determined to put a little wharf there, and when the appropriation was voted, they started to build the wharf and spend that sum of money. A little later on, after I came into the House, they appropriated another small sum of money to complete that wharf. The contractor had started to go on when somebody, evidently from the department or under the authority of the Public Works Department, arrived on the scene and instructed him to go right across the river on the opposite side from the town, and expend the money there. So they started to build a wharf there, and the result was that we had two wharfs started, neither of them completed. Again, last year they determined to complete one of these wharfs, and a gentleman was instructed to go on again and to complete the wharf on the side where the town is situated. He started to work, but he was again stopped and sent across the river. He has completed a little wharf on the east side, and put a nice deck over it, and a gentleman who is a good party friend of this government has been appointed wharfinger. He has a little store just above this wharf, on the east side of the river, and he is the only man who can use that wharf, it is no benefit under heaven to anybody else. The government simply built that wharf for a party friend, and they have denied it to the people of the town where the wharf should be. They say to them, 'You will have to wait until some future time, the interest of our party friend is so paramount that we must look after him first.' Now in that town, which is not very large, there are two ordinary hotels, a large summer hotel, churches, stores, a post office, shoemakers' shops, and all that goes to make up a nice little village; while on the opposite side there is only one business man, and he is well looked after by this government. Now that is not an isolated instance, similar instances can be cited all over Canada where they have been looking after their party friends first, and the moneys of the people of Canada are being squandered in that way.

Now the riding I represent pays annually into the treasury of this Dominion, in customs revenue and taxes, something over $250,000. And when I come to this government and ask them to renew a little grant for the town of Gravenhurst, an item of $4,000 that was in last year, they cannot afford it. They take out of the riding $250,000, and they cannot give us back $4,000. Now, is that a condition of affairs that ought to prevail? Yet they have money to squander on that little wharf for a party friend; they have money for the Newmarket ditch, they have money away upon Lake Nipissing for a little place called Monetteville, where they dredge out a channel for one man who has a little sawmill, but of course he is a party friend. That is the way the money of this country is being spent, and we decidedly object to it. When hon. gentlemen opposite get up and tell us of the the great public works that cannot be stopped, I want them to stop looking after their party friends. They are squandering many, many thousands of the money of the people of Canada for no benefit whatever to the general public. To my mind it requires more than a mere statement that a work is for the general benefit of Canada to warrant us in making public expenditures of that kind.

I might go on in the same line, but I have already spoken longer than I intended. It has never been my habit to absorb the time of the House to the detriment of others, nor do I intend to do so to-night. I feel that any member of the House who confines himself to the subject can, in a reasonable time, say what he wants to say, and give all the members of the House an opportunity, at some time during the session, to express their views on public questions that come up for discussion. I feel that when public money is honestly expended, and expended on great public works that are of benefit to the public, we on this side of the House ought to give our assent, and we ought to assist the government in that matter. But that is entirely different from the wastefulness and extravagance that has prevailed all through the expenditures of this government. It is not confined to the items I have mentioned. We find Merwins all through the spending departments, we find hundreds of others who are feeding at the public crib, occupying the same position of middlemen, absorbing the wealth of the country which should be devoted to necessary public works. If the money that is being wasted every year could be put to some good use, we could carry on the business of this country without unduly increasing the public debt. But hon. gentlemen opposite will never be able to do a great deal in giving us public works as long as they continue the system which has prevailed during the past. I would urge upon them the necessity of cutting out their wastefulness, of cutting out the middlemen. Let us get an honest administration of public affairs and let us see that with every dollar extracted from the people we shall do something that will be of real benefit to them. I dissent from the proposition that we should carry on great works, many of which will never be of any permanent benefit. I think that we should, as far as possible, pay as we go, and that we should not leave to posterity a great legacy of debt for works that will probably have tumbled into ruin before posterity arrives. The people who come after us will have their own problems to solve and their own burdens to bear. We will have pretty well cleaned out the timber resources and the minerals and will have taken the virgin elements out of the soil, so that it will be much harder then to till and to produce the wealth of grain that the people are producing so easily to-day. We will leave them problems that it will be hard for them to solve, and I think we ought not to unduly increase the public debt. We ought to see that every dollar we spend is spent in the interest of the public

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate I suppose it will be somewhat difficult to interest the House to any great degree in anything new that I may have to offer upon this subject. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wright) who has just taken his seat, has gone over the ground pretty well from the standpoint of his party, and criticised the policy of the present administration in a modest and moderate way. Speaking for myself, I have no great fault to find with the manner in which he has discharged his duty to himself, and, as I suppose, he feels he is called upon to discharge his duty to his constituents and to his party. The keynote of the hon. gentleman's speech was the reckless expenditure of public moneys in the Dominion of Canada. If there be a reckless expenditure of public moneys that is a matter of which the public, whose money is being expended should take note. It is a matter to which their attention should be called and it will certainly be the duty of the people to take such steps as are necessary to prevent any reckless expenditure of money, if reckless expenditure there be. But, we are pleased to note, notwithstanding the description that my hon. friend has given of the people of the city of Winnipeg, that we have in Canada a highly intelligent class of people. We have a class of people that, I venture to say, are as intelligent, taking them man for man, as any other number of people in any part of the known world, if not more intelligent. After the opposition, which, I presume, was doing its duty, had sifted out to the very foundation anything that could be said to be wrong about the administration, the case has been once, twice, aye, three times submitted to that intelligent, well qualified jury, and every time they have brought in a verdict, that, as far as they could ascertain, and having had the evidence fully before them, they found no extravagance in the administration. They found that the government was capably and competently conducting the public affairs of the country, and that whatever money was expended was expended in the best interests of the people. That being the verdict of the people more than once, more than twice, I am not much disturbed by the speech made this afternoon by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. The conclusion that a large majority of the people have come to is that there are no wasteful expenditures and that if there are expenditures they are in the best interests of the country. As my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) said on a previous occasion, if we are to-day spending $100,000,000 in this country we are spending it on a hundred million dollar country. That is the difference between the expenditure that is being made to-day and the expenditure in the days when the friends of my hon. friend were in power. They were proportionately spending very much more money than we are spending to-day, spending it with very poor results and spending it in such a manner that when the administration of public affairs was submitted to that high and intelligent jury of whom I spoke a moment ago, the actions of the government were condemned and they lost the confidence of the people. There is a great difference between the two administrations. My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson), the other night, said that the party to which he had the honour to belong never lost the confidence of the people by reason of their tariff or fiscal policy. I agree with the hon. gentleman that they did not, but he must not forget, while he and his friends are charging this administration with extravagance and mismanagement, the real reason why his party were turned out of power. While the hon. gentleman said they were never put out of power by reason of their financial policy he neglected to tell us why they were put out of power. It is no new story to this country that they came into power in the early days of confederation and that they went out of power in 1873 or 1874. Why did they go out of power then? It is well known that they went out of power, by reason, not only of reckless expenditure and mismanagement of public affairs, not only by reason of expenditures that were wasteful and could not be defended, but by reason of dishonest expenditures and by reason of shockingly scandalous expenditures that the people could not stand for and they were hurled from power. That is the reason why they went out of power on that occasion and not by reason of any defect in their financial policy. They got back to power and why did they go out of power again? Ask them and ask the records of this country. It was because some of the canker, some of the microbe, which we heard so much about from the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) still remained. It seems that this microbe got into their constitution and the people's scourging in 1873 did not eliminate that microbe altogether. It broke forth again in 1894, 1895 and 1896, and the people were again obliged to scourge them from power. This time the people, having given them two opportunities of giving the country an honest administration of its affairs and having found that they were not capable of taking the lesson, again turned them out of power. It seems to me that the great public have made up their minds that never again will they give them an opportunity——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE——of managing the affairs of this country.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That is a joke.

Mr. McKENZIE. Let us see how they are getting along and what gains they are making. My hon. friend from Leeds is very fond of figures, of calculations, and of discussing the question of the finery of women, blouses, gloves and all such things as that. My hon. friend dearly loves to peruse the Auditor General's Report. I fail to find it very interesting reading myself but it seems that my hon. friend, the whip, finds it so interesting that he sleeps with it under his head at night. He went into figures and he gave us a dissertation on the rule of three; but just as we have dispensed with allowing the Tory party to manage the affairs of the country so we have dispensed in mathematical circles with that ancient system, and we now deal with such problems under a more unique and mathematically correct unitary method. After hearing the hon. gentleman the other evening I tried to figure out how long it would take by the rule of three, and calculating the proportionate gain of the Tory party since 1896, for them to get back into power. I was rather sorry to discover that 60 or 70 years would roll by before, on the basis of that calculation, the Conservative whip and his friends would resume their seats on the government benches. And, that long cycle of years rendering it impossible for any one in this House to ever see the day, I passed over the question as not being within the range of practical politics. The present government is doing first-class work, the country is well governed, there is no reckless expenditure notwithstanding some irresponsible statements which have been made by members of the opposition, Canada is being developed along proper lines and so long as the government continues to do as they have done there will be no desire in the minds of the people for a change. If it were true that there had been reckless expenditure it would be a serious matter, but let me ask how it is, that the members of the opposition have challenged so very few, of the appropriations which have been passed by this House. Even if all the votes they contested were deserving of censure, it will be found that a very small percentage indeed of the vast amount of money expended during the past 12 years has met with opposition from the Conservative benches. I may say that I ran two elections for the Dominion House, in both of which I was keenly contested by a very competent gentleman, a Conservative of the old school well versed in the ways and means and the theories and practices of the Conservative party; a gentleman well capable of putting up a campaign against me or against any other Liberal who might cross swords with him. But that gentleman, capable as he was, and capable as were his supporters in these campaigns, they could not put their finger on one single dollar of misappropriated money. It is a fact that to-day there is a lawsuit pending in the province of Nova Scotia taken by Mr. Morrison against my opponent because he charged Mr. Morrison with the misappropriation of $59.37 of money belonging to the province which he alleged had been expended improperly in the painting of a bridge in the northern part of the county. This will serve to show how our opponents were driven to their wits end for scandals against this government when they had to rake up such a small matter. It is a fact proven by my experience in this House that there are more claims for the expenditure of public money coming from the Conservatives than from the Liberals. I do not think there is a solitary Conservative member who, in Committee of Supply, has not stood up manfully and pointed out where in his county or in some county adjacent there was necessity for a further expenditure of money. That being so, how is it that these gentlemen criticise the government for its expenditures. I cannot see the logic of their contention, and I am quite sure that the Conservative members themselves do not see any logic in it either.

A few days ago, at the opening of this debate, the financial critic of the opposition made some statements to which I would like to refer. I am rather disinclined to mention the name of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) because it seems to be insinuated that every new member wishes to climb to glory and fame by making some attack on that hon. gentleman. I disclaim any such intention at once. But, as the hon. gentleman is the chief financial critic of his party, and as—without disparity to any other hon. gentleman—he certainly made the ablest speech from his side of the House, it is natural that those who follow him should be more apt to have something to say about him than about others of his friends. However, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) at the end of his very clever speech proceeded ironically to show the Prime Minister why he should be proud of his Minister of Finance. Let me say to the House that we in Nova Scotia are proud of the Minister of Finance, and we are prouder still when we know that Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific are also proud of that hon. gentleman. I venture to say,—without reflecting in the slightest degree on the popularity of any other hon. gentleman in Canada,—that with the exception of the brilliant leader of the government there is not a man to-day in Canada who is better beloved by the whole people regardless of party politics than is the Hon. W. S. Fielding. We had a trial of him in Nova Scotia for 14 years as premier of that province and his high character and reputation live to-day in the memory of our people. He has now for 12 years occupied the distinguished position of Minister of Finance of the Dominion and we have reason to be proud that although millions and millions of dollars have passed through his hands in the administration of his department, he stands to-day the same pure-minded, clean-handed, good-hearted, and upright W. S. Fielding who 12 years ago fresh from his laurels as premier of Nova Scotia, took charge of the finances of the Dominion of Canada. No man can truthfully say one word against the character of that gentleman, character or reputation, private or public life of that gentleman, and why should not the Prime Minister of this country, and why should not the people of Canada, and why should not the people of Nova Scotia especially be proud of the Minister of Finance? We are all well satisfied with his administration and with the way in which he is handling the finances of this country. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) a few days ago delivered a very admirable address in this House, in which he discussed very ably the financial side of the budget. He pointed out that even if some of the loans were not exactly such as he would like them to be, if the very best terms that were possible under the circumstances were obtained, no fault could be found with the Finance Minister. I approve entirely of the sensible and logical position of the hon. member. I do not profess to be a financier; I am a lawyer by profession, and I am willing to leave to other gentlemen who are experts in finance questions of this kind. Being satisfied of the honesty and ability of the Minister of Finance and of the honesty and ability of every minister who asks him for a vote of money, I discharge from my mind at once every criticism of the finances of the government. I am satisfied that the moneys are required by every department that asks for them, and I am satisfied that the Finance Minister will find the moneys on the most reasonable terms possible.

I have heard the criticism that this government has no policy. Indeed, the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Wright) referred to this government as a sort of Melchizedek without beginning of days or end of time, without father or mother, something that could not by any possibility be defined. I cannot understand what justification the hon. gentleman has for such a description. Perhaps we sometimes get a little off our feet or lose our head in the effort to say something clever. I do not think the hon. gentleman has improved his speech by applying such a description to this government.

Mr. WRIGHT. I made no description of this government. I described their policy.

Mr. McKENZIE. What is a government but its policy? If its policy is bad, it must be a poor government. We admit, of course, that taking them man for man the government are very excellent Canadians; but I take the responsibility of saying that not only is the personnel of this government all right, but its policy and its administration are equally so.

Four years ago the opposition had a policy, and, after all, as is said about questions of title to land, you have to succeed upon the strength of your own title, not upon the weakness of the other man's. So I say to my Conservative friends that if ever they expect to attain power, they must get there by the strength of their own policy, and not by displaying the weaknesses which they may discover on our side. In 1904 they had a fairly sensible policy, so far as I could understand it, and I was put pretty hard against it in my own county. They were in favour of the public ownership of railways. That is a strong policy. I do not know how wise or how workable it is in this country, particularly from the financial point of view, but it was a plank in their platform, and they stood to it.

They also had a policy of high protection —adequate protection, as they called it, which no man living or dead could describe. No man on earth could tell you what adequate protection might mean. My hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) came pretty near to attempting a definition of it last night. I do not like to ask questions of a member who is speaking, or I would have asked him to define it, as I have been very anxious for four years to find some man who can do so. My hon. friend, with that jaunty way of his, referred to it as if it was very easy to define it. I was reminded of the attempt of Mr. Dooley to give a definition of Kruger's franchise, of which he failed to give any intelligent definition. If my hon. friend from South Cape Breton had attempted to wade in the deep waters of adequate protection, I am sure that he would have found himself in the same boat as Mr. Dooley. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition is a clever lawyer, and definitions are not out of the line of lawyers. They are trained to understand language; but though he rather prides himself on the fatherhood of this phrase, when it comes to being its godfather and giving it a definition, like the old story of the man who could not read the letter he had writiten and sent it off saying there were better scholars in Ireland, the hon. gentleman left it to the world at large to provide the definition.

Besides adequate protection, the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1904 included opposition to the Grand Trunk Pacific. They advocated opposition to the Grand Trunk Pacific. That was a stand to take worthy of a great party. They were wrong of course but they had the courage to put forward those three issues: Higher tariff, public ownership of railways and absolute and strenuous opposition to the policy of building the Grand Trunk Pacific. On those three issues they went to the country and were routed horse, foot and artillery. Hardly a man of them was left to tell the tale. But if high protection were a sound policy, if the public ownership of railways were a good policy, if opposition to the Grand Trunk Pacific were a wise policy, why did they abandon them? No political party has the right to abandon its policy simply because the people have turned it down. They should stand by their policy unitl they succeed in winning for it the approval and confidence of the people. The policy of high protection has been that of the Conservative party for a long time. Although they might abandon their theories regarding railway ownership and their opposition to the Grand Trunk Pacific, they could not very well abandon their policy of high protection. Why then did they do so? We find not a vestige of it to-day. I did not find a shadow of it in the last campaign in the province from which I come. When, shortly after the election of 1904, a commission was appointed to inquire into our trade relations with other countries, there was ample opportunity given to every man, who had views on the subject, to express them. What did we find? We found that after evidence was taken all over the country, and the tariff of 1907 was brought down, our hon. friends opposite took no action. If they were earnest in their policy of a high tariff, the time to bring forward a resolution to that effect was when the tariff of 1907 was being discussed. That was the time for them to put themselves on record..

At six o'clock House took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

PATENT OF F. M. GRAY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 132) respecting certain letters patent of Franklin Montgomery Gray.—Mr. Rankin.

On section 1,

Mr. FISHER. This is a Bill which we were asked to let stand last night, in consequence of some words at the end of the second clause. I have made inquiry, and find that this Bill is quite in accord with some other Bills which have been passed, and that these words which were objected to last night are in three other Bills which have already been passed by the House this session. The delay between the time when the patent lapsed and the request for legislation, was only a few weeks, and it was due to the fact of the owner being away from the country.

Mr. MACDONELL. I quite concur in the remarks of the hon. minister. I think, if we are going at all to reinstate lost rights on the part of owners of patents because of oversights in paying the fees, this is certainly a case in which we may well do so.

Mr. FISHER. If we do it for any body we ought to do it here.

Mr. MACDONELL. This is a case in which the committee may properly exercise its discretion in passing the Bill.

Mr. LENNOX. The information that the minister gives us now is in line with the information that I thought we ought to have on all occasions, when I spoke on this case yesterday. I quite appreciate that the minister is necessarily a busy man, at the same time I feel we should have some information from the minister on every occasion when a Bill of this kind is before us.

Mr. FISHER. The words which were taken objection to last night seem to be entirely unnecessary; but they are in the Bill, and I do not think they can do any harm.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock I was going over the different stages of the abandonment of the various planks of the Conservative party in the year 1904. I had stated what those planks were, and had stated that they comprised fairly respectable issues to be presented to the people of Canada. The three principle planks or issues which we had to deal with, and upon which the verdict of the people was sought in 1904 were: First, the public ownership of public utilities, particularly of railways; second, a decision upon the tariff of the present administration, contending that it was away too low, and that a mandate should be given to the Conservative party to make it higher; third, their declared policy of opposition to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. Those three planks, as I say, made respectable issues, worthy of consideration by the people of this country.

There was a time when the great Conservative party of Canada claimed that they alone had the genius to rule, that they alone were anointed to rule this country, and they alone were inspired to give it a proper administration. But I am afraid, when they consider what has happened to these three planks, when the great Liberal-Conservative party of former days sit down calmly and quietly to consider the present prospects, and the evil times that have fallen upon them during the last twelve or fourteen years, they must come to the conclusion that the glory has departed from Israel, and that they are no longer the chosen race destined to administer this country. Especially I think must they conclude that they were hardly inspired when they adopted the policy of opposition to the Grand Trunk Pacific, because there is not a man in this House, so far as I can find who is willing to take the responsibility of standing up and declaring himself against the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Naturally they want to criticise and find fault with the government in connection with that work, but that is all done on side issues, because there is no one among them who will take the responsibility of standing up in his seat to oppose the policy of building that road. The other night I heard the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) speaking in this House. Now there is no person who will accuse the hon. member for Souris of being partial towards this administration, I rather think that he is a strong opposition man. I sit as his neighbour in this House, and I have opportunities of knowing the pulsation of his heart sometimes, and I think he is as good an opposition man as there is on the left of the Speaker. But he was obliged to come down the other evening and say that he could not too strongly support the proposition of building, and rapidly building, this road; that the people of the west were longing to have it built, and that everybody so far as he knew was in favour of it. He scouted the idea of any one, any one at least possessing influence, having anything to say against the proposition of building that road, and building it as rapidly as possible. I think that the hon. member for Souris is a fair sample of the western men upon the question of the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific. But, I have further evidence in support of this contention. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Martin) put this question very straight to the western men a few evenings ago and issued a challenge to any hon. members supporting the opposition, coming from the western country, who would dare to stand up in this House and oppose the building of this road and the giving of assistance to it as is now proposed. That being the case, I believe it will be impossible for the hon. leader of the opposition to obtain the support of the members of his party from the west unless he abandons that plank of his platform and withdraws all opposition to the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific. We must come to the conclusion that there was no particular inspiration or wisdom guiding the leader of the opposition when he made opposition to that road a plank in his platform and one of the great issues upon which he thought it was proper to go to the country in 1904. We must, therefore, conclude, with hon. members from the west, that they are wrong in that question and that they should never have taken that course but that they should have known beforehand that the policy of building the road was one that the people approved of.

The next plank in the hon. gentleman's platform is the public ownership of railways. I cannot understand, in view of the history of this subject in this country, how the leader of the opposition came to make that a plank in his platform in 1904. He could not hope, so early in his history as the leader of the Conservative party to have gained greater confidence in the minds of his own supporters at that stage than the people had in such men as Sir John Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper and other leaders of the once great Conservative party who had put themselves on record as being unreservedly opposed to the doctrine of the public ownership of utilities such as railways, canals and telegraph lines, but particularly railways. That was the policy of Sir John Macdonald and he was backed up by the people upon it. That was the policy of Sir Charles Tupper and he had the confidence of the people in holding to that policy. I think it was ill-advised on the part of the leader of the opposition today to have made that a plank in his platform. Having discovered that he had made a mistake, I suppose that it was the part of wisdom to recede from that position as rapidly as possible and therefore the second plank in the platform has been hurled down the stream with the others. There is a question in connection with public ownership that perhaps did not receive the attention that it should have at the time. If our friends of the opposition wish to be economists, if they say that too much money is being expended and too much money being borrowed I would like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, and the country to consider for a moment where would our financing be if the country had adopted this government-owned railway policy that the opposition presented to it in 1904. We would have to buy the property of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I want any sane man in this House to consider for a moment what the proposition would mean of providing enough money to purchase the Canadian Pacific Railway. They would not sell their railway without selling everything else they owned incidental to the railway. I want some more capable financier than I am to contemplate for a moment the task of providing the money that we would have to borrow in order to meet that obligation. That is only a small part of the money we would have to borrow before we could own all the railways. Our experience with government owned and operated railways is not of a character that would justify any wise leader in plunging this country into the policy of buying, owning and operating railways. I think it was a very unwise plank to put into the platform and that the leader of the opposition and his friends acted wisely and well in dropping it as fast as they could get away from it.

But, Sir, we are told by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that we must be candid, honest and straightforward. These are good lessons indeed and this is advice that we should be willing to follow. If these hon. gentlemen were practising their preaching in 1904 when they were telling the people of this country that they were looking for an opportunity of raising the tariff why did not they follow it up? As you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was coming to this point. If high tariff is the remedy for all the ills that flesh is heir to, our friends of the opposition should insist upon that policy being adopted. They say that we are at sixes and sevens amongst ourselves upon the question of the tariff. I do not suppose that a large body of men who are supporting a government can be at one on any given question—I do not care what it is. I think it is a sign of intelligence that one hundred, or one hundred and fifty, or one hundred and seventy men, cannot agree exactly upon every given point. It would only show that we were not thinking at all, but we simply were machines who were doing as we were told because you cannot get intelligent men to agree exactly in all particulars of any given policy. It is not a sign of weakness that while upon the government side we stand firmly and strongly behind our leader, in cases where a man has a right to exercise his own judgment we are beyond and above any party. I think it is a healthy sign to show that we are capable of having differences of opinion and, if occasion requires, of expressing them. But what I wish to say to our hon. friends upon this point is that when the Fielding tariff of 1907 came before this House they had a most excellent opportunity for testing this question. That was a most excellent opportunity for them to move an amendment to the Bill for the raising of the tariff if it was too low and for the lowering of the tariff if it was too high. I was not here but the opportunity was open to our hon. friends, and I am told that when it came down to the crucial point of dividing the House upon this very important matter no division took place. What then are we to conclude? What is the country to conclude? We must conclude one of two things, either that the tariff is all right or that the opposition is all wrong. If the tariff was wrong then was the time to have put it right when it was going through the process of being made and when it was in the institution which was making it and in the only institution that had the power to make it. That was the time when the people of this country would say to the opposition: Put yourself on record as being in favour of a tariff which you consider to be proper for this country. But, they did not move; they did not do anything. I am not going to say that the opposition is no good. There are bright men among them and they would have discerned the weak points, if weak points there were and would have moved against them. Not having done so there is only one conclusion, and I think that the conclusion the country has reached is that the tariff as brought down by the Minister of Finance was as perfect, in view of the large scope that it had to cover and the many articles with which it had to deal, as any human institution could possibly be, and that it was the part of wisdom for our friends of the opposition not to touch it at all but to leave it as it was.

Further evidence that the tariff policy of the government is all right, lies in the fact that at the last general election no issue was raised against it, and the people of Canada endorsed that policy and returned to power the Prime Minister, the Finance Minister, and the other members of the government. It comes with poor grace from the members of the opposition to now raise the question in this House; when it was staring them in the face during the elections they failed to say a word about it. We hear our friends in the opposition repeat to-day the same old story: It is our tariff, you have made no changes in it, it is the old national policy. Well, if I were called upon to prove what was or what was not the national policy, I would be disposed to call the parent as the best evidence of the identity of the child, and if I can cite Sir Charles Tupper as my witness that the fiscal policy of the Liberal party is not the old national policy, I think even our Conservative friends will admit that that is pretty good evidence. At all events, Sir Charles Tupper himself claims that he was the chief author of the national policy, and now that many of the older men who were associated with him in launching that policy have gone to their reward, the testimony of Sir Charles Tupper ought to be convincing. We know that he told us, that he was in it, he was under it, he was around it, he was about it, that in fact he was the whole push, but however we may doubt that no one will question but that he was amongst the chief authors of the national policy. Now, in 1897 Sir Charles Tupper was leading the opposition in this House, and I cannot conceive that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) with all his astuteness and all his cleverness could successfully run the blockade right in front of Sir Charles Tupper and pass a tariff Bill which was in reality the national policy without Sir Charles Tupper discovered it. At all events, when the Liberal fiscal policy was launched by the Hon. Mr. Fielding in 1897 Sir Charles Tupper had an opportunity of dissecting it, and here are his words:

The result is that this tariff goes into operation and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralysed in consequence, while honourable members gloat over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of these industries in the Montreal 'Gazette,' where one manufacturer after another declared that those industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

I feel that so far from rejoicing at it from a party standpoint, I deplore from the bottom of my heart the ruin that is going to be inflicted upon the best interests of Canada, and upon its great industries. Still, I unhesitatingly say that, from a party point of view, the hon. gentlemen are doing our work; they are showing the people of this country that no reliance can be placed upon the most solemn declarations that they make either in the House or out of it; they are showing the people of this country that, having obtained power, which was all they wished for, they are now prepared to abuse that power at the cost of sacrificing the industries of Canada.

With all due respect to the calibre of the men who to-day sit on the opposition benches, I do not believe there is a man amongst them so capable of pronouncing an opinion on what is or what is not the national policy as is Sir Charles Tupper, and we have his own declaration here that it is not the national policy that has been in force in Canada since the Fielding tariff was promulgated in 1897. Therefore, whatever success the country has achieved on account of the fiscal policy of the government is not due to the national policy but to the Fielding tariff. I leave it to my hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) and his friends to reconcile their declarations in this respect with the strong pronouncement of Sir Charles Tupper which I have quoted to the House. They have abandoned this high tariff policy because they could not agree upon it. It is a great thing for them to get men from such a prosperous province as Manitoba or from the great west to support the opposition. They felt that with a high tariff policy they could not expect to get support from that country, and the leader of the opposition simply looked over these three planks of his policy and called his friends together, and said to them: 'We must dissolve partnership and leave every man to do for himself.' That was the position of the party when they faced the electors in the last general election. Is it necessary to refer to the kind of issues that were presented to the people on that occasion? I am not going to go over them. I will simply ask my hon. friends to look at what so strong a Conservative paper as the Montreal 'Star' said about the 28th or 30th of October last:

Mr. WORTHINGTON. It is not a Conservative paper.

Mr. McKENZIE. The paper I refer to is the 'Montreal Herald and Weekly Star,' which is certainly an old-time Conservative paper, whose support in many respects has been of great help to the Conservative party. No doubt as an intellectual force it was a great stand-by. Its circulation is very large, and the views of the Conservative party found their way to many households through that medium. There were other ways in which that paper and its products, in the way of gifts of cash, were of material assistance to the Conservative party. There was another piece of machinery created for the purpose of circulating the moral influence of that paper, well known to the people of this country. These formed the machinery by which the honest cash of that paper, as no other would of course be received by it, was circulated throughout this country for the benefit of the Conservative party. But that paper, with all its love for that party, said on the 28th or 29th of October last, that there were no issues before the people to-day, that it was simply a campaign of slander. I am not going to go over the various scandals that were raised. I will merely say that the Conservative party abandoned every respectable issue that they had in 1904, and went to the country in this campaign of slander, and got licked out of their boots. I want to know where they stand to-day. All their former policy is gone, their campaign of slander was no good, and they must have some new creation on which to go to the country again. I can imagine the hon. member for North Toronto making the same statement about it that he made about the Remedial Bill. He found that that was a poor vote-catcher, and I remember well his speech in the House: 'I have given it a trial, but while water runs and grass grows, I will never again put myself in the hands of any man as I have done with this thing.' I can imagine that after the severe castigation our friends received from the people of this country for dragging these scandals before them, they are saying, 'While water runs and grass grows, never again will we besmirch ourselves by going to the country in such filthy rags.' I hope that when they again face the people, they will face them with honest, straight business propositions.

When our hon. friends accuse us of having no policy, we reply that we have the same consistent policy that we had when the people entrusted us with the administration of this country some thirteen years ago. When they charge us with being a broken-up party and with having no policy, I ask them to take their own distances and courses and tell us exactly where they are. Are they back to the policy of 1904, or are they going to stand by the policy of slander on which they went to the country in the last election? I think it best always to go before the intelligent people of this country on good, square issues, on which the people are willing to judge the conduct of the two parties.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we are taking too much money from the people, taxing them too heavily. If we are, that is a serious matter. The statement which we put forth in the last campaign, and which I have heard nobody contradict, was that the average tariff of the Conservative party, while they were in power, was 18 per cent, while the average of the present tariff is 15 per cent. Now, if with a tariff of 15 per cent we get more money into the coffers of this country than the Conservative government got with a tariff of 18 per cent, I cannot understand how it can be truthfully said that we are taxing the people more than they did. A man who imports $100 worth of goods, would pay under the Conservative tariff $18 before he could take them out of the customs house, while under the Liberal tariff he would pay $15. The difference is, as has been explained many times, that more of those $100 came into the country under the Liberal tariff, that trade increased, and that out of the enormous volume of trade we got more money than they did. But it was entirely voluntary to the people. If they did not want to import the goods, there was no compulsion upon them. Therefore, this argument that we are taxing the people unduly is without the slightest foundation. If hon. gentlemen opposite find it difficult to understand the operation of the tariff, let them take the administration of the Post Office Department. We have lowered the postage on one class of letters from three cents to two cents, and on another class from five cents to two cents, and yet despite these reductions in taxation, nearly double the money is going into the treasury from the postal service than did when our hon. friends were in charge, and before the rates of postage were reduced. How do they account for that? Is it possible for them to make out the argument that because we reduced the postal rates more than 75 per cent in some cases and have collected a larger amount of revenue, we are taking more taxation out of the people than we did before? I shall now leave this question of more taxation and higher taxation, because the people had the opportunity to pass upon it and they came to the conclusion that the opposition were not justified in their criticism and re-elected the government of the day.

Before closing, I wish to deal with some questions which my hon. friend from south Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) brought before the House last evening. He endeavoured to show that the Conservative party was the great party in favour of the labouring people, particularly in the province of Nova Scotia. Let me ask him what that party ever did for the labouring classes during the 18 years they were in office. Where is the Act on our statutes or where is the effort to better the conditions of the labour element during those 18 years, by legislation or otherwise, by the political friends of the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin)? They were asked to do something for the labouring classes and positively refused. My hon. friend further went on to claim great credit for what his party had done in the local legislature. Well, I do not see how it could have been possible for them to do less than they did. Whatver position the miners in Nova Scotia hold to-day, they owe to the legislation introduced in the local House by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), who was then leading that House, and which was continued by his successor, the Hon. Mr. G. H. Murray. My hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) undertook a few days ago to make the prediction that a certain railway, to be built in Nova Scotia, would be held in abeyance until there was an election on. I wish I never had a harder task to perform than to defend the reputation and standing in Nova Scotia of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and his successor Mr. G. H. Murray. We have had Mr. Murray leading the Liberal party in Nova Scotia during the last 12 years. Previous to the last election there were only four men in opposition to him in that House and now there are but five. The leader of the opposition in Nova Scotia thought he was strong enough to measure swords with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) but the people of that constituency turned him down. Then he had to come back to lead his party in the local House. But after he did go back, the people of Pictou county turned him down again under an avalanche of ballots and sent a young untried man to represent them in the local legislature. My hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) claims that Mr. Murray is afraid of the people and is holding back a certain railway until the next election so that he may make use of that railway to carry him to power again. The idea is ridiculous. Why should the intelligent people of Nova Scotia turn down Mr. Murray? Everything we have in Nova Scotia, from a political standpoint, we owe to the Liberal party, because we have had nothing but that party in power in the local House since confederation, with the exception of a short period from 1878 to 1882—a period entirely forgotten. And to-day there are but four men in opposition in the local legislature. That being the case my hon. friend from South Cape Breton was hard up for material when he tried to make a case against Premier Murray by talking about his administration with regard to our coal industry. Whatever we have in Nova Scotia in the way of coal development we owe entirely to the Fielding legislation, carried forward by Mr. Fielding's successor, Mr. Murray. During the 18 years the Conservatives were in power in this Dominion, we had but a poor development of coal industry. Whatever we have in Nova 600,000 to 800,000 tons during the whole course of the 18 years. But when Mr. Fielding and Mr. Murray put their shoulders to the wheel and introduced what is known as the Fielding legislation, when we got capital into the country and put our coal mining industry on the footing it enjoys to-day, that brought about the establishment of the steel works. There can be no question that the steel works in Cape Breton owes its establishment to the greater development of coal mining which was brought about by reason of the Fielding legislation. That legislation was bitterly fought by my hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) and his friends. The history in connection with that legislation is one they have no reason to be proud of. They fought it in the local House, and some Tory members from Nova Scotia forgot their responsibility, as members of this House, and broke away from every rule by going to the Governor General over the heads of the then Tory government sitting in this country and endeavouring to defeat this legislation for what purpose I do not know. But His Excellency had better sense than to listen to their argument. That legislation was allowed to pass and we have to-day, by reason of it, this great development in Nova Scotia in the coal and iron industries and the many other industries which have sprung up in that province.

The hon. member for South Cape Breton thought proper to criticise the railway policy of the government. He has thought it proper to quote at great length from a speech I made in the House some eight years ago. I am pleased that there was nothing in that speech from which an opponent of mine to-day could get any comfort. I was a supporter at that time of any policy that would better the position of the working classes in the county of Cape Breton, and I so expressed myself. Since I came to this House, I have followed the same policy and expressed the same view. My utterances of that time were read by the hon. member last night, and I have no reason to feel ashamed of anything I then said, nor do I find that I have departed in the slightest degree from the opinions which I then expressed. I ask permission to put on record the position I took in regard to the railways in Cape Breton. Though against my wishes, I shall be obliged to read to you the views I expressed upon the railway policy of the Tory party in the House of Assembly on February 22, 1904.

In view of these declarations by the leader of that party——

Declarations made by the leader of the opposition, then in the Assembly.

—it was amusing to listen to his hon. friend Mr. Tanner, in solemn tones and feigned honesty, asking the people of North Sydney and Sydney Mines to vote both governments out of power at once, because forsooth they were not proceeding sufficiently rapidly with the building of railways. Before his hon. friend who led the opposition in the House undertook to criticise the conduct of the Liberal party in respect to the procuring of railway facilities to Sydney Mines and North Sydney he should find out if his party during the eighteen years that they were in power at Ottawa did anything in the line of extending railway construction at Sydney Mines. The proper and natural time to look after the railway comforts of North Sydney and Sydney Mines was when the Cape Breton Railway was being located and built. But, the Tory government of that day and the Tory representatives entirely neglected the interests of those towns, and established a condition of affairs that was not easily remedied. It was perfectly clear that the Cape Breton section of the Intercolonial Railway below Georges river should have been built along the shore through the Little Bras d'Or district touching the towns of Sydney Mines and North Sydney and putting them on the main line, this would have settled the railway question in these towns and in the large and populous districts of Bras d'Or and Boulardarie. But this grand opportunity was lost through Tory neglect, shortsightness and indifference. But to-day the leaders and candidates of that party had the effrontery to hold Liberal governments and Liberal members responsible for their own criminal political incapacity. There was no doubt Sydney Mines should and must be connected with the Intercolonial Railway at the earliest possible moment. A town of the size and importance of Sydney Mines within less than two miles of the Intercolonial Railway of Canada and not connected wih it was ridiculous and absurd. He had no doubt one of the first acts of the present popular and public spirited Minister of Railways would be to right this Tory wrong and give the important and rapidly growing town of Sydney Mines the privileges which were her rights.

Now, I thought it my duty to put on record the views I expressed more than four years ago, so that my hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin), if he wishes to get comfort from the position I took at that time, will have an opportunity of seeing my words and presenting them to his friends as well as to hon. members of this House.

I do not think I need follow that position. I think that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald) has so fully answered the arguments put forward by the hon. member for South Cape Breton that it is quite unnecessary for me to follow them further. But, before I sit down, there are one or two things I wish to refer to, matters which I would rather not be obliged to refer to. A few evenings ago, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) whatever his purpose may have been, undertook to represent in this House the leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as having made certain statements reflecting upon the standing and credibility of the Conservative party. At that time, although I very much dislike interrupting hon. members who are addressing the House. I took the responsibility of saying that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) never used the language ascribed to him. I am not attributing motives to the hon. member for Dauphin, but I cannot understand why he should undertake to misrepresent the Prime Minister unless it should be for some political purpose, making it appear that the Prime Minister had referred slightingly to the great Conservative party and those who compose that party. The hon. member represented the Prime Minister as having said:

> I am sorry to say that it is another evidence that we are not to trust Conservatives when they pledge themselves to us as members of this House or as a delegation.

It was thus held forth as an absolute truth that the right hon. Prime Minister of this country made that statement with reference to the Conservatives of the Dominion of Canada. Sir, if the Prime Minister had made a statement of that kind, it would be, coming from him, a very extraordinary statement. What he said is to be found at page 3258 of 'Hansard.' I should not feel that I was doing justice to the right hon. Prime Minister if I did not bring this matter to the notice of the House and the country, if I did not set side by side with the language used by the hon. member for Dauphin that actually used by the Prime Minister, so that the people will have an opportunity of judging for themselves how correctly the language of the Prime Minister was construed by the hon. member. What the Prime Minister said was as follows:

> Why, Sir, if there is any wasted money in this instance, it was at the instance of the taxpayers of this country. We had a delegation here of the Sound electors, the best men in the riding of North York. We had the mayor of the town of Newmarket, and the leading citizens of that town and its vicinity. They were not party men, not political friends of Sir William Mulock coming here to boost his election, but men who came in their capacity as citizens, laying aside all party differences, and asking us, in the interest of the town of Newmarket and the riding of North York, to undertake this work. I remember that delegation very well; it was one of nearly one hundred, certainly more than fifty. So large was it, at all events, that there was not room in the ordinary rooms of ministers to receive it. We had to get the use of the Railway Committee room for the purpose, and there man after man rose up and told us that this was not a party question, but that they asked us, in the name of the town of Newmarket and the riding of North York, to give them that improvement.
> Now, is the Holland river to be improved? If a boat is to be taken from Lake Simcoe to Newmarket it cannot be taken any other way than the way contemplated by the present work. My hon. friend tells us now that all these representations made to us by men of his own political persuasion were ridiculous, and if I am now to take the word of Conservatives in the House of Commons, the Conservatives in the town of Newmarket and the riding of North York are not trustworthy and their representations are to be treated with contempt.

Now that is the speech made by the Prime Minister at the time. He simply said, as I have read, that if the Conservatives treated with contempt a statement made by their own friends, he could not so treat it. But that was turned around into a representation that the Prime Minister was speaking of the Conservatives of Newmarket, and that they and Conservatives generally were not to be treated with respect. I could not for a moment, feeling as I do towards the Prime Minister, and feeling further a sense of fairness to every man, allow such an insinuation to pass without putting the facts before the House.

Now the other day the hon. member for North Toronto asked if we were proud of our Minister of Finance. In the earlier portion of my remarks I said that we certainly were, and I gave my reasons, and I intend to repeat them. We are proud of him, and we are prouder still of the great chieftain under whom he serves and whom we are all proud to follow. The hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) said last night a great deal about personal leadership at the next election, and he suggested that the present Prime Minister would not be leading the Liberal forces in the next election. Of course we cannot tell what will happen under Providence, we cannot tell what may happen from one day to another; but we of the Liberal party are full of confidence and trust, in view of the stalwart strength of our great leader, that he will again lead us to victory in the next election, as he has done during the past twelve years. When I heard the hon. member for South Cape Breton speaking, I could not help but think of what happened to his own party some years ago; I remembered that there are various means taken of getting rid of a leader who is not satisfactory, there is a way by which the Conservatives got clear of a man that they didn't think was just the man they wanted, but I do not think we will follow their example, I do not think we will build any such nest, nor have any such animals in it as they had in a certain institution that they called a nest of traitors. We are not going to deal that way with our leader, we will stand with him, and every Liberal from Scaterie to Vancouver will be proud to stand by him when the next election comes around.

Now a great deal has been said by our hon. friends from British Columbia about the policy of excluding Asiatics. I hear them rending the air in this House, telling how determinedly they are in favour of the total exclusion of Asiatics, they want to control absolutely the immigration policy of this country. That is all very well. But in the next breath they say we must stand true to British institutions, we must remain a part and parcel of the British empire. Let me ask hon. gentlemen how, if they are going to stand true to British institutions, they can fulfil their obligations to the mother country by opposing the immigration of Asiatics. It is well known that the total exclusion of Asiatics means non-intercourse with Japan; total exclusion means refusing to have any further dealing with that country. Some of my hon. friends from British Columbia are laughing at this. I ask them, as constitutional lawyers, as great authorities on international law, whether they think we have power to pass a law excluding people of another nation entirely from putting their feet on Canadian soil. We have no such power. There is no such power in a colony. The passing of such a law, whether in regard to Japanese, or Chinese, or Americans, would be equivalent to a declaration of war against such country. Do we possess the power to declare war—for that is what it means? When my hon. friends talk so flippantly about passing a law absolutely excluding Japanese, they are talking about declaring war upon Japan—for that is what it means. Now I would advise my hon. friends who talk that way to consult their leader and get his opinion. He is a capable constitutional lawyer; let them ask him if it is within the prerogatives of this parliament to pass an act absolutely prohibiting an American from putting his foot on Canadian soil. I venture to think that the leader of the opposition will tell them that we can do nothing of the kind; we cannot do it in the case of America, we cannot do it in the case of Japan. Not having that power, the proper thing for us to do is to respect British Institutions, to respect the relations between Japan and Great Britain, and to be content with the restriction we have already placed upon what we consider undesirable immigration, and in this way we may obtain peace with honour with the great nations of the world. Let us continue in the paths of peaceful diplomacy, and not stir up a war, which would be the result of that unmentionable telegram if it was carried into effect.

Speaking of the leader of this government, I want to put on record testimony of a gentleman who is not a partisan of this government. I want to show what this gentleman thinks of the great leader whom we follow. The testimony is that of a man who is high in the councils of the Conservative party, a man who is at the head of a great newspaper, the Toronto News. I think it right to make this quotation for the benefit of my hon. friend from South Cape Breton, when he speaks of the possibility of a change in the leadership of our party.

Mr. BLAIN. When was that written?

Mr. McKENZIE. It is to be found at page 356 of the 'Life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier' by Mr. Willison, editor of the 'News.'

Mr. WALLACE. What date?

Mr. McKENZIE. Well, my hon. friend can go out into the library and get the book. I have not the date, but I suppose it is on the book written by Mr. Willison. It is doubtless in the library and if my hon. friend will know his way out and if he has the capacity to read it I assume that he will find it. They have such excellent public schools in Ontario that I presume my hon. friend can read and he can see this quotation for himself, which, I think is not an overdrawn description of the Liberal party. It is as follows:

Moderation is the keynote of all his career and the secret of all his achievements. He learned at the threshold of his public life that the statesman must often resist public clamour and stand impervious to momentary gusts of popular passion and that all enduring achievements must be based in the reason rather than in the emotions of the people.

An hon. MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would expect from the length of the ears of my hon friend that he would hear me.

The disposition to preserve is an essential element in Sir Wilfrid Laurier's statesmanship as indeed it must be the dominant principle of all successful government in free countries. So in the field of constitutional reform he has striven for amendment within the constitution and has quietly but firmly antagonized all intemperate agitation for radical alteration of the terms of confederation. His is essentially a constructive mind and a serene temperament. He trusts in the future and reverences the past. He will always be slow to lay destructive hands upon hallowed institutions and reluctant to distrust the ancient landmarks. His administration has been eminently constructive and progressive. He labours with strenuous hand and abiding faith to unify and consolidate the various elements of the confederation to promote material development and estabilsh national self-confidence.

All his heart and all his creed and all his hope he puts in his inspiring message to the Acadians of Nova Scotia:

'As long as I live, as long as I have the power to labour in the service of my country, I shall repel the idea of changing the nature of its different elements. I want to take all the elements and build a nation that will be foremost among the great powers of the world.'

That, Sir, is a description of our great leader given by a man who was not partial to him and who has given not an overdrawn picture. We would not be ready to exchange a leader of that kind for another leader of our own party and much less for the leader of a party which is untried and out of power and which must have forgotten the lessons taught by whatever experiences it has had in the past. I have endeavoured to answer the charges that were made against the administration in so far as the small circle of the debate that I have endeavored to compass is concerned. I am satisfied that the country, financially and otherwise, is in a sound condition; I am satisfied that the administration stands to-day as high in the estimation and approval of the people as ever it did, and I am satisfied that the production of the budget and the presentation of accounts by the Minister of Finance are honest, straightforward and true, and that that hon. gentleman would not bring anything else to the notice of the people of this country. The criticism that we have heard about the bookkeeping does not hold good. It is the same bookkeeping as that which prevails in the great institutions of this country. It is not the same kind of bookkeeping that they have in the Canadian Pacific Railway, in the Grand Trunk Pacific, and in every other great institution in this or in neighbouring countries? Is not the cost of great public works charged to capital account? This is a criticism of which we heard nothing during the eighteen years that hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. We heard nothing of it during the twelve years during which the present government have been in power. It is a new criticism. It is a criticism that the people are not concerned about and one which will not alarm them. For these reasons and many others that could be mentioned I support the government as it is to-day handling the affairs of the country, and I support the Minister of Finance in the budget that he has brought before the House and the country.

Mr. G. H. BRADBURY (Selkirk). Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in this discussion if it had not been for the fact that there has been so much elasticity allowed and so many new elements interjected into the debate. The fact that there have been some statements made by hon. gentlemen which deserve some consideration from some one coming from the province to which I belong is my justification for participating in the debate. Last evening there was a speech delivered by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) who, in his fiery eloquence, seemed, for a moment, to lose control of himself and who used language regarding some of the statesmen in the western country that I think was utterly uncalled for and that, in his sober moments he would not be guilty of. Speaking of the Attorney General of Manitoba he made the statement that that gentleman had prostituted the machinery of justice for the purpose of aiding the election of the representatives that came from that province. There was no statement ever made on the floor of this House more foreign to the real facts than that. There is no question that the Attorney General of Manitoba, knowing something of the record of the Liberal party and of the Liberal machine in that country, did, at the solicitation and request of the candidates, name provincial constables to man the polls and see that the Conservative party had the opportunity of having a fair and honest vote recorded. It became the duty of some of these provincial constables to arrest some of the heelers of the Liberal party, men who were caught red handed in trying to defraud the electors of the province and to deprive them of their votes. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) had a fling at the Attorney General of Manitoba, and on his own ipsi dixit without producing any proof, he stated that the Attorney General had prostituted his office, citing as evidence of that the fact that he been assailed on the streets of Winnipeg by an irresponsible person who might well pray to be saved from his friend. It was unfortunate that the hon. member (Mr. Neely) introduced that person into this discussion, because if there is a man in Manitoba who ought to regret his conduct it is that very man who assailed the Attorney General from behind his back. It was one of the most uncalled for and cowardly assaults that could be imagined, and the only excuse is that the offender was not responsible for what he was doing. He was brought before the police court and punished just as any common criminal would be punished for the offence. That surely is not a very enviable position for a prominent lawyer in Winnipeg to be placed in, and it would have been much better for him if the hon. member for Humboldt had not dragged the incident into this discussion.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Neely) also stated that the electors of Saskatchewan were given an opportunity to vote as they saw fit and that in that province there were no padded lists such as there were in Manitoba. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity of stating that there never has been in the whole history of Manitoba, electoral lists as fair as are the present Manitoba lists. The charge that the lists were unfair was made on the floor of this parliament by no less a person than the right hon. the Prime Minister, and it was repeated in the city of Winnipeg by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton). The leigslature was sitting at the time and a committee was appointed to inquire into the matter, and although the member for Brandon was subpœned he failed to appear before the committee to substantiate the charge he made in the Winnipeg 'Free Press'. However, the inquiry was held by the committee and it was no doubt attended by the Liberals of the province, and judge after judge was examined and every cne of them testified to the fact that so far as they knew the Manitoba electoral lists were absolutely fair.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. Who had charge of the lists?

Mr. BRADBURY. The judges.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. Complete charge?

Mr. BRADBURY. Yes, complete charge of the list after they had left the registration clerks. Compare the conditions in Manitoba with the conditions in Saskatchewan, where in Prince Albert two or three men left that city to hold polls in three distinct parts of the province, and only travelled a few miles into a little bluff where they opened the ballot boxes, made the lists on the ground, manufactured 130 odd votes, and were not even generous enough to record a single vote in favor of the Conservative candidate. These men came back to Prince Albert and their candidate was declared elected. The judges of that province, three new men, one of them Chief Justice Sifton, held that the law was such that they could not take notice of this dastardly act committed by these men, and they confirmed in his seat the Liberal candidate. But the facts were laid before the legislature and the Premier of Saskatchewan and his followers were shamed into declaring that election void and giving the seat to the Conservative candidate who honestly deserved it. Now, I had the honour of contesting a constituency in Manitoba, and I never during the whole campaign heard my opponent raise any objection to the electoral lists on which he was contesting the election. On one occasion he did say that electors had been left off the lists by the judges, but this had been through some clerical error and that was the sum and substance of this grievance. So far as the lists themselves were concerned he was forced to admit, and his supporters in the campaign were forced to admit, that they were absolutely fair in that constituency as they were all over the province. My hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Neely) deplored that a man who had not a seat in this House should have been attacked when he had no opportunity to defend himself, but in the same breath he assailed members of the Manitoba government and he charged the Premier of that province with having subsidized a railway into a sand pit for his own benefit. Well, Mr. Speaker, I want to give that statement as flat a denial as the rules of this House will permit, and in justice to the Hon. Mr. Roblin, a man whom we all admire and look upon as the greatest premier Manitoba ever had, I will place his statement on 'Hansard.: We in Manitoba realize that the government that has been given to the province since Mr. Roblin became premier, has been the best government the province of Manitoba has ever enjoyed. This matter came up in the dying days of the recent session of the Manitoba legislature and Mr. Roblin made the following statement as reported in the Winnipeg ' Telegram ' of March 11:

Premier Annihilates so called Sand Charges of the Opposition.

A frank, thorough and convincing explanation of the attack by the opposition on the Premier's business connections and the guaranteeing of certain lines of the Canadian Northern Railway was made by Hon. R. P. Roblin before the close of the legislature yesterday.

The following is the Premier's statement:

Premier's Statement.

Before the orders of the day are called, I desire on a question of privilege to occupy a few moments of time in which to make a reference or statement regarding a matter which was under discussion yesterday in this House, upon a motion made by the honourable member for Lansdown (Mr. Norris). I propose to do so for the reason that any one who may have been enough interested in the matter to read anything that has been published concerning it, may have the facts in the case.

When the matter was introduced yesterday I withdrew from the House out of respect to the rule and practice that when any member is directly censured by a resolution for any act of his, he shall withdraw until the matter has been discussed and dealt with. I would have preferred to have remained and made the statement at the time could I have done so without violating the rule to which I have referred.

History of Case.

In order to give a minute detail of my relation or connection with what is called the 'Eli Sand Company' and the 'Gunn Sand Company,' I shall be compelled to go back to the time when the province took over the Northern Pacific and in turn leased it to the Canadian Northern. Among the other things that were taken over as assets and properties under the lease was found a ballast pit at Eli, and a short branch thereto, located some mile and a half north of the main line, about thirty-five miles west of Winnipeg. No bonds were guaranteed on this line then or any time since.

The Canadian Northern found that the roadbed required ballast in order to keep it up to an efficient state and they undertook to secure from the Eli ballast pit the material for such work. They only operated for a short time until all the ballast that was fit for a roadbed was exhausted. The pit worked out into pure sand.

They then abandoned the pit as a source of supply for railway purposes and immediately began searching for another pit. They finally located one and bought it, at Birds Hill, which they are now using. They secured a charter from the legislature to build a line out in that district several miles beyond what is now their gravel pit. They completed the line to the pit; they partially constructed, I understand, several miles beyond, known as the Dundee line.

Necessary to Construct Line.

It was absolutely necessary in the public interest in order that they might have ballast to keep their roadbed in shape to handle passenger and freight trains that they have this pit. They came to the government and said that in view of our blanket mortgage they were compelled to ask us to guarantee the bonds that they might raise the money for the construction of that line.

Delegations had waited on the government from that district—that is, the district farther out than the gravel pit—for this extension. Knowing that it was necessary for them to have the ballast and that it was in the interest of the public for them to use it, the government guaranteed their bonds for $10,000 a mile. They have operated it continuously ever since as a ballast pit, having taken out thousands upon thousands of carloads of material for their yards in Winnipeg and for ballasting the line between here and Emerson, between here and Portage la Prairie, and between here and Carman.

Business Proposition.

I will now go back to the time when the Canadian Northern abandoned the Eli ballast pit, to show where the Eli Sand Company began. When the ballast was exhausted by striking pure sand, this fact came to the knowledge of myself and some other gentlemen, and as building sand was in good demand in the city, we thought it a good business proposition to secure the pit and bring the sand to Winnipeg for sale.

The land in question was owned by a private individual. I bought the land myself in trust for the other gentlemen and myself and held it until we had exhausted the sand in the pit, when the land was sold for the benefit of the parties who were originally interested. There was no written agreement between the gentlemen and myself but simply our verbal understanding of the operation.

Initial Point.

This statement gives you the initial point of the starting of the Eli Sand Company. While we were operating the Eli sand pit representations came to us from all over the province for the extension of the Canadian Northern system, as was our announced policy. You will remember that this was about 1903. Among the many who came to solicit the influence of the government were several large delegations from Gimli, and Icelandic River districts, from Stonewall town and from the country east and north of Shoal lake. So strongly did they press, headed by the members for Gimli and Rockwood, for an extension that the matter was taken up with the railway company. The company said that they would consider an extension from the point on the old Hudson Bay line in a northeasterly direction; but they would not go to Stonewall, and they further wanted the government to give an assurance that no other company would extend lines in that northern country, especially from Teulon north as well as from Winnipeg Beach north.

Of course, the government could give no such assurance; but we assured them that if they would construct we would guarantee their bonds and they could build out a reasonable distance that year and the local business would justify the extension even though the Canadian Pacific did extend their lines.

Agreed to Certain Distance.

They agreed to do this for a certain distance. When it became known that this line was probable, a gentleman who owned 240 acres of land along the projected line, and which was said to be a gravel, ballast, sand pit, met those who were associated in the Eli Company and asked if it were not possible to arrange a company to handle the material at that point. The result was a company was formed. I had a small interest in that company. I have it yet. The company owns the land at that place.

There was some sand and ballast taken out from that particular pit, but not in any great quantities. As it developed, there was no quantity there for commercial purposes.

Pressed for Extension.

The government guaranteed those bonds on that line and have been pressing the railway company for an extension ever since, supported and backed by the people who live in that district. Only a few days ago a large deputation, headed by the member for Rockwood, waited upon the government and presented a petition, signed by nearly five hundred names of residents from the present end of the track, praying for an extension. The matter is now still being considered by the company and I hope to succeed in getting the extension.

The line that is built handles freight only in carloads, is a great convenience to the people and absolutely satisfactory to the district.

Birds Hill Line.

I now come to deal with the sand shipped from Birds Hill—not the company which was incorporated to operate out on the Hudson Bay line. They had no pits with which to operate and in the location of the Birds Hill ballast pit it was discovered that there was a large deposit of sand, convenient to the line that ran to the ballast pit. Arrangements were made by which the company agreed to haul the sand that we might load to Winnipeg at the ordinary rates or charges for such service.

I was one of the gentlemen interested in the handling of sand from Birds Hill to Winnipeg until the end of the year 1907. I then withdraw, for the reason that I refused or declined to make any financial arrangements in order that the business might be continued ; and the remaining gentlemen who were interested, so far as I know, have continued the business down to the present.

Tariff an Ottawa Matter.

I further wish to state for the information of the House and the country that the tariff of charges are the regular ones, and are filed at Ottawa with the Railway Commission of Canada, open to the inspection of all who desire to examine them.

I have stated the facts exactly as they are and I am satisfied to leave the matter with the House and with the people of this country. I cannot hope to satisfy any one who wishes to make political or party capital out of the fact that I have used the Canadian Northern Railway as a transportation line for handling articles of trade that I was properly engaged in. Neither can I hope to satisfy the individual who will claim that I have no right, being a minister of the Crown, to engage in commercial pursuits.

Right to Trade.

I do not believe, however, that any good citizen will deny me the right to trade and conduct a commercial business where I receive no favours from any one in so far as the transportation of my commodities, whatever they may be, is concerned, over a line of railway that has been projected and aided in the public interest.

I submit this statement of facts as a full and complete justification for the course that I have taken, and therefore a complete and absolute answer to the criticisms that have been made upon my business relations in this connection, and repeat my regrets that the rule and practice of the House prevented me from being present when the matter was up for discussion.

I am handing this statement to each of the three papers, published in the city, for publication.

I do not think it is necessary for me to say a word more in this connection. The premier of Manitoba has been assailed in this House in a manner very ill-becoming a gentleman having a seat in this parliament, and especially a young man coming from the sister province. The only ground he had was dame rumour, and while he was so glib in criticising the action of another member for daring to allude to a gentleman who had not a seat in this House and consequently could not defend himself, it ill-became him to take advantage of his position to assail those who are not members of this House and consequently have not the opportunity to defend themselves.

I want to deal for a short time with another question, one of great importance to Manitoba, and that is the land question. I was rather amused when I heard the Minister of Finance, a few days ago, make the statement, in his speech on the budget, that the Liberal party stood for the policy of the land for the settler and not for the speculator. That statement was endorsed by the hon. the ex-Speaker (Mr. Sutherland). But what are the facts? These hon. gentlemen surely do not imagine that the country forgets some of the notorious land deals which have taken place under this government. Take for instance one of the first which occurred after this government came to power. They had been very glib all over the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, impressing upon the people that not one acre was given by them to a railway company, while the Conservative party had given away millions of acres for the construction of railways, but the Liberal party had secured railway construction without giving a subsidy of one acre. But what are the facts? In 1882 there was a charter granted for the Hudson Bay Railway. That charter carried a grant of 640 acres per mile, for the mileage in Manitoba, and 12,800 per mile for the mileage outside that province. When these gentlemen came into power that charter was in existence but had not been acted on and was dying a natural death; and if they had been sincere in their pledges, they would not have given one acre of land to that company and would have refused to extend the life of its charter. But they gave an extension of the charter on three or four different occasions, thus securing that land grant to the Canadian Northern, and they allowed the Canadian Northern to absorb the Hudson Bay Railway grant. That company built about 320 miles of railway in an almost opposite direction from that defined in the charter, and this government allowed the Canadian Northern to get for the road they had already built out towards the Dauphin country 6,400 acres per mile; and when they went west from Irwin to The Pas and built 97 miles of railway, they got about 1,200,000 acres of picked land out of the Saskatchewan district for the construction of that road.

Mr. MOLLOY. Was the land granted by the preceding government or by this government? Or did this government carry out the contract made by its predecessors in office.

Mr. BRADBURY. The land grant was voted for the Hudson Bay Railway in 1882. I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite were in office then. But the Hudson Bay Railway Company did not take advantage of that land grant. The charter practically died on three or four different occasions, or would have died if it had not been renewed by hon. gentlemen opposite. Consequently they are directly responsible for the fact that that land, which was granted the Hudson Bay Railway Company, was absorbed by the Canadian Northern for the extension of their line in a direction different altogether from what was at first intended. Another feature was this. The Canadian Northern secured 12,800 acres per mile as soon as they left Manitoba. They built about 97 miles outside of that province, from Irwin to The Pas, and secured something like 1,241,600 acres of picked land in the Saskatchewan valley. If that land is worth what the people of the west say it is, about $6 an acre, we find that the Canadian Northern secured for that 97 miles over $7,000,000 worth of land, and they secured that from those gentlemen who claim that they are holding the lands for the settler and not for the speculators.

There is another notorious deal on which I wish to touch on for a moment or two. I refer to the Saskatchewan land deal. My hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Neely) dealt with that question last night in a very laboured manner, and in a way which showed either that he did not understand the subject or that he was not altogether frank with this House. The facts were simply these. This government allowed a few political friends to secure 250,000 acres of picked land in the Saskatchewan valley for $1 an acre. They had the privilege of picking these lands out of nearly a million acres, and within a very short time these gentlemen sold that land at from $6 to $10 an acre and pocketed about $1,760,000, which should have gone to the settlers. A gentleman who had the honour of occupying a seat on the government side of the House was one of those who secured that land at a dollar an acre and who shared in that enormous profit. And still we are told that the right hon. gentleman who leads the House and his government have been conserving the lands of the west for the settlers and not for the speculators. We remember the many land scandals ventilated in this House last session; we remember the grazing leases, covering some 372,000 acres of land alienated from the Crown for a period of twenty-one years with the right of purchase at about one-tenth of $1 an acre. This is the way these gentlemen have been conserving the land for the settler.

Another matter has been dinned into our ears every time an hon. member rose in his place on the other side to address the House on the land question. We have been told that the Conservative party gave to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company 25,000,000 acres of land that we practically gave the whole Northwest away for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When the contract for that railway was under discussion in this House, we did not find the leader of the opposition, the present leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the men who sat around him giving to the government of that day any support in the carrying out of this great undertaking. They come before us to-day and tell us what they have done for the west. But, Sir, we who knew of the events of that time remember that the Canadian Pacific Railway was built in the face of the most unscrupulous opposition ever offered to any public undertaking, and that opposition came from men who occupy the treasury benches to-day. When this land grant was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, what was land in the Northwest worth? I remember that when I went to that country myself in 1881 I went by way of the United States. Stopping off at St. Paul, I saw bills as large as the picture of her Majesty the Queen that hangs in this chamber posted up in the St. Paul station, giving the speeches of Sir Richard Cartwright and other leaders of the Liberal party on the subject of the Canadian Northwest. Immigrants who were going through were taken by the American officials and shown the opinions expressed by these men of our great west. 'There,' they said, 'you can see that these men say that this country to which you are going is only fit for Indians and buffalo.' And in this way they induced these people to settle in North Dakota or South Dakota. To-day, these speakers on behalf of the Liberal party blame the Conservatives for aiding the construction of the Canadian Pacific with this grant of land. But what is the history of the Liberal party in relation to the land grant for that road? On the defeat of the Conservative party in 1873, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie came into office. He and Hon. Edward Blake, one of the greatest Liberals, I suppose, this country has ever produced, but he had no faith in the great west, had no faith in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But I suppose they felt they were forced to go a certain distance in that direction on account of the compact entered into by Sir John A. Macdonald in bringing into confederation the province of British Columbia. Their scheme was not to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway as we have it to-day; they started off with the idea that they would build from the head of Thunder Bay westward. I have here the statutes, and they show that Mr. Mackenzie and his government at that time provided that the road should be built in four sections, and that 20,000 acres of land and $10.000 in cash per mile should be given toward it. This applied to every branch line as well as to the main line. When you figure it out you learn the startling fact—which our Liberal friends do not know or they would not be so prone to throw this land grant into the teeth of the Conservative party—that the Liberals of that day were willing to give, not 25,000,000 acres of land, but 50,000,000 acres and $25,000,000 in cash for the construction of the road. There is no one who has lived in the western country for a number of years and seen the steady progress made there that ever thinks of blaming the Conservative party for building that road under the conditions accepted at that time. What would the great west be to-day if the Canadian Pacific Railway had not been constructed? Where would the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) be? He would not be living in Humboldt, And my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) would not be here to-day. That hon. gentleman has only been in this country seven years, yet he lectures this House on the policy we are following in this country, and though he does not come out squarely as a free trader, gives us a speech along those lines. I do not intend to refer particularly to what the hon. gentleman has said, but I may say that he is in very bad company for a free trader when he supports the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and his ministers. We have to-day the national policy as firmly as it ever was fixed in this country, and we are thankful to know that the Liberal party, when they came into power in 1896, had not the courage of their convictions and dared not put in practice the policy that they had enunciated all over this country for eighteen years. And that very fact largely accounts for the great prosperity Canada has enjoyed during the last ten or twelve years of the regime of these hon. gentlemen.

Now, I wish to refer to a matter in which I am directly interested in connection with this land question. While listening to the speeches of hon. gentlemen claiming that they believed in a policy that keeps the land for the settler and not for the speculator, I was forced to recognize the fact that they preach one doctrine in this House and practice something altogether different in the western country. About a year ago we had, adjacent to my own town, an Indian reservation. This covered about 50,000 acres of the best available lands in the province of Manitoba. There was supposed to be an agitation for the surrender of that reserve and the removal of the Indians, but just where that agitation came from I have failed to find out. I have lived in the town of Selkirk off and on, for the last twenty-eight years, and there has been no agitation along these lines there. But something had to be done for the boys and the government had to give them a chance to get in on a land deal. So the surrender of that great reserve was decided upon, and a commission was sent down to Selkirk to arrange that surrender. The present Chief Justice Howell, of the city of Winnipeg came down to Selkirk to arrange with the chief and council. When they came there the chief and council would have nothing to do with them, refused to meet them, or to discuss the surrender of the reserve. But these men were determined that the reserve should be surrendered and thrown open, that a few of their friends might reap the benefit. So an arrangement was made by two or three citizens of the town who were approached, and the Indian chief and council were got together. There was some deal arranged with the chief and council to this effect: These men were to be bribed, were to be bought, to betray the rest of their band, and they were promised five times as much land as the ordinary Indian got as an inducement to secure the consent of the band to a surrender. I am told on good authority—I do not make the statement because I have not got the proof—I am told, however, on the best authority that the Indian chief and council were promised $200 cash in addition, 5 times as much land as the other members of the band were to get, for inducing the rest of the band to agree to this surrender. Now what occurred? These men agreed that every soul, every man, woman and child on that reserve, should receive 16 acres of land; this, Mr. Speaker, was given as an inducement to these men to agree to surrender. In all, it amounted to something like 25,000 acres of land. This was the first experience these Indians ever had in possessing anything that they could transfer or sell. They were always regarded as incompetent, and I confess I thought myself that they were incompetent to hold land or transfer it. But the parties who were arranging this deal no doubt had this matter all studied out before the arrangement was made.

Now then, these men suddenly found themselves possessed of 16 acres of choice land in this settlement and they were immediately besieged by a few men who wanted to pick up those allotments. Last session, I think it was, a question was asked on the floor of the House whether any protection could be given to a purchaser from the Indians of one of these 16-acre lots, and the answer given by the Minister of the Interior was, if I remember right that the Indians had nothing to sell until the patent issued, and that the Interior Department would not protect anybody who purchased this land. Now, Sir, the ordinary man on the street took it for granted that this land could not be placed on the market until these patents were issued. But there were a few political friends who were on the inside. There was one gentleman who made a trip to the city of Ottawa and got thoroughly posted, and he came back and started in to buy. He and his friends got from the Indians some kind of a quit claim deed, I do not know exactly what it was, but they got something anyway that held, and they bought these lands from these Indians at the very best bargain could they make. Now, every one in this House knows how incompetent the Indian is, how improvident he is, how little able he is to protect himself against a keen speculator. The government, I understand, had supplied the Indians with a solicitor to look after their interests in the surrender; and they had an Indian agent there who was supposed to protect the rights of the wards of the government; but the result has been that both the solicitor and the Indian agent worked hand in hand with the speculator, and the Indian was practically beat out of his land. That land which was worth $15 or $20 an acre, fell into the hands of a few of these men at a figure averaging something like $3 per acre.

Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult for me to make this transaction as plain to the House as I would like. But if you can imagine 25,000 acres of land divided up into 16-acre lots; no man knew where his lot was going to be situated. They formed what they called the Northern Land Company, every one of them being political friends of the government. I venture to say from my place in this House that there was not 100 acres out of that 25,000 acres of land that passed into the hands of a Conservative. There was not a Conservative in the town of Selkirk dared to invest $1, because he had no protection. He felt that he was at the mercy of the Indian agent and of the Indian Department; there was no guarantee that he could get his patent, or that he would be protected. It was arranged in such a way that no man but Liberals could buy these lands, and Liberals did buy them. Now what happened with the balance of this land? There was something like 25,000 acres of land left after these men had picked this 25,000 out of the 50,000, because when they had the right to locate this land they had the right to pick. They went round and located this land in blocks, in some places of 100, or 1,000 acres, just as they could manage to buy it. The balance of this 25,000 acres was put up to auction, and some of the men who secured this picked land for about $3 an acre, when they were bidding against each other for the remnants of that reserve, much of it very inferior land in comparison to what they had bought for $3 an acre, they had to pay three times as much at auction as they had paid for the picked land on that reserve which he had bought from the poor unprotected Indian. Now, this will give you some idea of the seriousness of the hon. gentlemen opposite when they proclaim the doctrine of the land for the settlers and not for the speculators. Every acre of that land has fallen into the hands of speculators.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to point out to the Minister of the Interior, whom I see in his seat, what might have been done with that land. We have on the shores of Lake Winnipeg, west of the lake and north of Teulon, 3,000 or 4,000 settlers, Ruthenians, Polanders and Germans, as fine a people as ever went into that province. This government placed these men on lands utterly unfit for human beings to live on. In the spring of the year they have to wade in water up to their waists to get out to a settlement. Last year the local government undertook to drain some of that district, and spent a sum of money to help them, for all of which they received, not the thanks of the Liberal party or press of Manitoba, but the severest and most unfair criticism for that expenditure. If the Minister of the Interior and the government had been anxious to secure the land for the settlers, they could have taken that 50,000 acres of the finest land in the province, surveyed it into 100 acre lots, and sold it on 25 or 30 years purchase to these people, and we would have had one of the finest settlements in the province of Manitoba at Selkirk, and the land would have passed into the hands of settlers and not into the hands of speculators. But that is not the policy of the present government. The Liberal party or the Liberal heelers of that district, because, unfortunately, we have a number of them around Selkirk, would have had no opportunity of making the rake-off they have made out of that land. You cannot buy an acre of the land of St. Peter's reserve which was bought for $3 last year at less than $10 to $20 from the men who hold it at the present time. I intend placing on record a letter which I have from an Indian chief. This may be the last opportunity I will have, and I want the House to become aware of just how the Indians feel about this matter. I know that the Indians have complained bitterly to the minister and the Indian Department about the treatment they have received. They are the wards of the government. We, who have gone into that country and have had occasion to mix with that class of people, know that these Indians had one of the finest reserves in the province and they deserved better treatment than they have received. The letter is as follows:

Selkirk, February 25, 1909.

G. H. Bradbury, M.P.,
Ottawa.

Dear sir,—We, the chief and council of the St. Peter's band, beg leave to make a statement how we were used in regard to the sale of our lands.

The government had given these Indians a new reserve on Lake Winnipeg and they had been out apparently visiting this reserve.

After coming back from the lake, Mr. E. Rayner came to the chief councillors and asked us to give him part of our land for security and so he would help us through till the patents came. He asked us, how much we would want per acre. I told him not less than $15 an acre. So he said all right, and when the patents came he would complete the bargain. So we went on getting the goods from the store until we received a letter from Frank Pedley saying that the Indian Department would not recognize any bargain made by the white people. Then Mr. Rayner said to us that he would not give us anything more until our patents came; so we did not get anything after that. On the——

The date is left out, but I think it is on the 26th October.

—Mr. William Frank came to Selkirk and wished to meet the chief and council. So we came up to Selkirk, met Mr. Frank and he told us that he wanted to buy lands from the Indians. The chief and the rest of the councillors did not say anything to him. I spoke to him and asked him what authority he had to buy land or who permitted him, for the Indian Department had sent a letter to us by Frank Pedley saying that he would not recognize any bargain made by a man for buying land. He said that he would buy anyway and take the risk.

It was not much of a risk in this case.

The rest of the chief and council were against me saying this to Mr. Frank. But, he went on buying land and he asked us to be at Selkirk while buying from the Indians, to be witness to this bargain or deeds, he, promising to help us as much as he could. Afterwards he promised to give us $2 per day. So it went on in this way. We helped him as much as we could and about the month of July, 1908, he told us that he would take all the lands that we had given to Mr. Rayner and would pay what he had given us. He said that he would not pay us $2 per day, but that he would search the best land near Selkirk, that would be worth $25 per acre, and that we would get all we needed. He said: I will hire two rigs from Mr. George Dickenson's livery stables and will drive around to search for the good land. We drove around west from Selkirk and not very far from the asylum he took locations for the chief, and councillors Williams and Harper, and none for W. H. Prince, councillor, but he said that he would look for land for me at East Selkirk. So he did start next day and we found good land at East Selkirk. He located there for $25 per acre and then he asked me if I could work for him while he was at Selkirk, promising that he would give me $50 per month. I consented and I went on working for him. He paid me all right for two months and after that he did not give me anything, but still I was working for him. And he did not give us much money, he got rather awkward himself to us, so we talked to him one day that he ought to treat us better, because we want to live. We don't want to work for nothing. Then he got rather mad, so he said to us, the chief and councillors, he got mad with me and said to me: 'Be careful what you say to me or else I will take off your coat of office as chief and councillor, for you are drinking.' Then I said to him: 'Who learnt us to drink? for you gave drink sometimes in the morning.' He did not say anything more. We after that, asked him to make a proper settlement about our land he took but as he would say that he would treat us right, not to be afraid of him, he went on like that all along till this month, February, I asked him to settle with me for my land. Before Councillor Williams, he said to me 'I overpaid you; there is nothing coming to you.' I asked him how that could be. He said 'I am only allowing you $6 per acre for your land. I said to him 'I am not such a fool to give you my land for $6 per acre when I can easily get $15 per acre.' And I said to him 'I will try and do something to make you pay what you promised for my land.' He promised to give the chief and councillors if they would help him to the end buying land $100 each as present and promised to give $25 per acre for all the land we, the chief and councillors, received in settlement, but after securing our land and patents only allowed us $6 per acre. This is the way the speculators are aided and allowed to rob the poor Indian.

WILLIAM PRINCE,
Chief.

W. H. PRINCE,
JAS. WILLIAMS,
Councillors.

This gives you an idea of how these speculators have handled the Indians and how little the government have interfered to protect them. The point I want to make is that these Indians were the wards of the government, that it was the duty of the Indian agent to see that these men got justice instead of which the Indian agent and the solicitor who was appointed and paid by this government to take care of the interests of these Indians were in collusion with the speculators, and the Indians in that case were beaten out of their just rights. Now, I have taken up all the time

I intend to in this debate. I just want to say that I do not honestly think that the government have any right to claim that they have in any way preserved the lands of the Northwest for the settler. In every case where there was an opportunity to hand the land out to their friends and to speculators it has been done. When we look at the manner in which they have dealt with our great fishing interests in that country, when we think of these great fishing rights that they gave to two or three men, when we remember that a lawyer in Montreal secured Athabaska lake, or 10,700 square miles of water teeming with beautiful fish and the whole of the Nelson river down to Hudson bay for $10, when we remember the McNee lease which gave that gentleman nearly 300 square miles of James bay for $10 a year, and when we remember the Mackenzie lease which handed over Lesser Slave lake for $10 a year we can easily see that these gentlemen have not been guided by a desire to protect the settlers in any one case. I congratulate the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) for having had the courage, in face of the opposition and political influence that was brought to bear, to cancel these leases. I believe that he is being pressed at the present time for a lease of Lac du Bonnet, and if he yields he will put himself in the same position that his predecessor was in when he granted the leases that I have been referring to.

Mr. JOHN PATRICK MOLLOY (Provencher). Mr. Speaker, I would not have taken part in this debate were it not that certain statements have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite regarding events in the province of Manitoba which I think it my duty to correct. I have the greatest respect for the hon. gentlemen on the Conservative benches who come from the province of Manitoba, and I think that we Manitobans should all have a friendly feeling for each other, but, when Conservative members from the province of Manitoba make statements which are not founded on fact I will have to be excused if I express my dissent. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) stated, evidently without any knowledge whatever on his part, that he had come to the conclusion that the Minister of Finance was a great joker, and I might return that compliment by saying that in my opinion the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sharpe) is the greatest joker who has yet spoken in this debate. Among other things he talked about Bill Miner. Do you know Mr. Speaker, what I think of Bill Miner and the Conservative party: I believe that the Conservatives are jealous of Bill Miner because while Bill Miner got into a hole he got out of it, and the Conservative party have got into a hole from which they are not able to extricate themselves. In my opinion Bill Miner is a cleverer man than all the Conservative party put together. We were given to understand that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) was going to make a charge in regard to the escape of Bill Miner, but he failed to do so up to the present because perhaps he knows that some people who have been making charges in connection with the escape of Bill Miner are in an unenviable position. Take the case of ex-Warden Bourke who was brought into the courts of the country and who had to make an apology and undertake to pay the costs in connection with the suit. The gentleman who compelled ex-Warden Bourke to make that apology and pay the costs also brought a case against the paper owned by the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. That statement is altogether untrue.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. A point of order has been raised and I will hear it stated before giving a decision. Who raises the point of order?

Mr. FIELDING. I raise the point of order that the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. D. Taylor) has said that what an hon. gentleman on this side of the House has stated is absolutely untrue. That is not parliamentary and cannot be upheld.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Does the hon gentleman from New Westminster wish to speak to that point of order?

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Speaking to the point of order I wish to refute what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Molloy) stated——

Mr. FIELDING. That is not the question.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I have the floor, and I am speaking to the point of order, I wish to say that what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Molloy) has stated as reflecting on me, and mentioning my name in connection with his statement, is not true.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question now before the Chair is as to whether the point raised is a point of order, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. D. Taylor) must not enter into further detail but must speak to the point of order.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Speaking to the point of order I wish to ask your ruling whether it is proper when a member of this House makes a statement, no doubt unintentionally, which is not true, the hon. member against whom that statement is directed is permitted to say that it is not true. If I am not within the rule of order and you so rule Mr. Speaker, I will of course unreservedly withdraw it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It appears to me that the member for New Westminster is privileged to say that the statement made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy) is not correct. The word 'untrue' is not desirable language to use in parliament, but as the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. D. Taylor) is denying what he is in a position to deny without attributing falsehood to another hon. member, I am not prepared to rule it out of order.

Mr. MOLLOY. I do not think the hon. member (Mr. J. D. Taylor) will deny that ex-Warden Bourke did apologize to Mr. McIntyre and that he agreed to pay the costs in conection with the suit. Now, I did not intend to cast any reflection on the hon. member for New Westminster, but what I intended to say was that the press reports stated that Mr. McIntyre who got this apology from ex-Warden Bourke had entered an action against the paper that I understand is owned and controlled by the hon. member for New Westminster. If that statement is not correct I am quite willing that the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. D. Taylor) should state whether or not Mr. McIntyre has entered a suit against his paper.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. That is an assertion which I have already stated to the House is not true.

Mr. NEELY. What part of the statement is not true?

An hon. MEMBER. What have you got to say about it anyway?

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite have the privilege of cross examining me on this occasion.

Mr. MOLLOY. I take it for granted an action has been entered against the 'Columbian' owned by the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. No.

Mr. MOLLOY. The hon. gentleman would like to be enlightened on that.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I state again that the hon. gentleman is not correct in saying that any action has been entered against the 'Columbian.' If he will permit me I think I can give him information which may save him from further confusion. I wish to state for the information of the House that the matter as to which Mr. Bourke apologized to Mr. McIntyre is altogether foreign to anything which I have ever mentioned in this House; it is altogether foreign to any issue that has been brought before the House, and it simply arose from Mr. Bourke's supplying the name 'McIntyre' to Miner's statement, when all that the convict said was that his lawyer had done so and so. That matter I have never referred to either in the House or out of the House; I have said nothing at all in reference to Mr. McIntyre.

Mr. MOLLOY. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) is satisfied with that explanation it will satisfy us and we have no complaint to make. The hon. gentleman from Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) quoted from the 'Free Press' a statement made by the Hon. Clifford Sifton and commenting on it he said:

> When the last election was over the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) asked the hon. member for Brandon the reason why the elections had gone against him in the province of Manitoba, and the hon. member for Brandon made practically the same reply to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister repeated that same statement or pretty nearly the same statement, on the 22nd of January last in this House. I claim that if the statement made by the Prime Minister on the floor of this House on the 22nd January last is true, and if the statement made by the hon. member for Brandon in this interview with the Winnipeg 'Free Press' is true, I, for one, have no right to a seat in this House. If those statements are false, as I claim they are absolutely false, then the hon. member for Brandon has no right to a seat in this House.

I would like to know what reason or justification the hon. member for Lisgar has for pronouncing on the right of the hon. Clifford Sifton to a seat in this House when he has been duly returned by the electors of the constituency of Brandon. He went on to say:

> I do not intend to dicuss the merits and demerits of the Manitoba voters' lists at the present time, more than to say that the electoral lists for the province of Manitoba are the fairest lists that are compiled in Canada to-day.

I do not intend to discuss the merits and demerits of the Manitoba lists as they exist to-day, but I will say that they are the most unfair lists compiled in the Dominion of Canada to-day. At the proper time I will discuss the Manitoba lists as no man who ever sat in this House could discuss them, because I can discuss them from actual experience of the doings of the political machine in that province. No man ever sat in this House in the same position as I am in. I am here to-day because I was beaten out of the seat I won from the Attorney General of the province of Manitoba by the returning officer and an unfair list in the constituency of Morris. The hon. gentleman says that the judges have complete charge of the list. I say that is not correct. I am not privileged to say that it is untrue.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Can a voter be put on the Manitoba voters' list without the sanction of one of the judges of the province of Manitoba, or can a name be taken off the list without the sanction of one of the judges of the province of Manitoba?

Mr. MOLLOY. I am surprised at the ignorance of the law regarding the making of the lists in the province of Manitoba exhibited by the hon. member for Lisgar. He has asked me the very question that I have been fishing for if I was fishing for a question. I will explain to him how that is done, and that is one of the reasons I am here to-day. In the constituency of Morris, on the list made in 1906 there were three men put on by John W. Parker, a good Tory politician. The gentleman is dead now, and where he is at the present time I do not know, and I care less. The law as it applies to a Liberal is simply personal registration. I had to apply personally; my supporters had to apply personally. They had, for instance, to swear that they had lived for a year in the province and three months in the constituency, that they were 21 years of age, a British subject by birth or naturalization, and so on. John W. Parker applied to the registration clerk to put on the names of three men. One of them did not live in the county at the time, and he wrote out a form saying: 'Take notice that I, John W. Parker, apply that So, and So, and So, the names of the three men, be added to the electoral list of the county of Morris in the province of Manitoba. The law is that in opposing the addition of a name to the list, you give notice to the judge by a registered letter that you appeal against the addition of that name to the list. What is the result? The constituency of Morris is made of three municipalities, and this happened in that portion of the constituency which belonged to the county of Macdonald. The Liberals in that constituency were not taking any particular interest in the matter, and therefore nobody appealed against the addition of those three names. The judge held the court of revision in the town of Morris, and we appeaied and absolutely satisfied him that the three names had not a right to be on the list; but he said: 'I am absolutely helpless, because there is no appeal before me against them by registered letter or otherwise.'

Mr. STAPLES. Is there not provision in the Manitoba Election Law whereby persons can be put on the list by another person when the persons who should be on the list are unavoidably absent?

Mr. MOLLOY. That is all right if he is a Conservative, but otherwise not.

Mr. STAPLES. Has not a Liberal the right to make application for a person who is unavoidably absent but who has the qualification to go on the list?

Mr. MOLLOY. If you follow the letter of the law, and if the registration clerks are fair and square and manly, and will give to a Liberal what they give to a Conservative you should be able to do it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MOLLOY. The boot is on the wrong foot. If they will do it; but the registration clerks will not do it in the province of Manitoba. I challenge the hon. member to name one instance where a Liberal, in that portion of my county where a Liberal applied, succeeded in getting a Liberal on the list.

Mr. STAPLES. I want to ask the hon. member the names of those three persons.

Mr. MOLLOY. I will have to name them from memory, and I will not say I am absolutely correct. You told me the other day that you knew their names.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman must address the Chair.

Mr. MOLLOY. The name of one, I think, is a Mr. Macdonald, and another was Mr. Pedley. The other I do not remember, although I have met him. No doubt the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) has met him because he is an out and out partisan Tory. And very proud he was of getting on the list without having been put to the same expense and trouble as his Liberal neighbours. But there was one of those three, manly enough, straightforward enough, over and above board enough, and frank enough, who, when the matter was explained to him in which his name was added to the list—Tory though he was—call him Tory or Conservative, or that choice name Liberal-Conservative—he refused to vote for the Attorney General on the 7th of March, 1907. But there were two added, and the election was a tie, and he got the benefit of those two who were added by John W. Parker.

Mr. STAPLES. I wish to correct the hon. gentleman. He knows that under the law John W. Parker could not possibly add those names to the list. Therefore he should not accuse a man who is not here to defend himself.

Mr. MOLLOY. Under the law, if it was meted out to Liberals, as it should be, as well as to Conservatives, perhaps he could not, but he was in snooks with the Tory registration clerk. Let me tell the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) that the same John W. Parker, with the registration clerk, put on a man not later than last year who was in charge of an elevator nine miles from the seat of registration. Will the hon. gentleman deny that? And I will give him the name of the registration clerk—Mr. Conrad Dausie, of Jean Baptiste, Manitoba. He came to me and begged for mercy and asked me not to put him to trouble and expense. He said he acted as he did because the man could not afford to lose his time. Therefore he travelled nine miles from the registration booth and put on that man, who had charge of an elevator at a place or near a place called Stanford, nine miles away. If the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) will give an instance in his county, where a registration clerk consented to drive nine miles out of his way to put on a Liberal, I will give $100 to any hospital in the city of Ottawa or of Manitoba. There is a straight challenge and I am always as good as my word. I will give it to a hospital in the constituency represented by my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe).

Mr. BRADBURY. Will the hon. gentleman allow me? The statement he made a moment ago was that two or three names had been added on illegally. The challenge issued by the Premier of Manitoba to the commission granted by the House was to prove there was one added on or left off illegally. Why was not that accepted? Why did not the hon. member for Brandon or somewhere else face that commission?

Mr. MOLLOY. What the Liberals asked in the local legislature was this: They asked that a commission be granted, and they made seven distinct charges, and they wanted to go back to 1903, when personal registration was first introduced in Manitoba, and the Roblin government refused that.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. Why did they want to go back to 1903?

Mr. MOLLOY. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that the Attorney General does not know the three cases I have mentioned? Why, he has been dreaming about them ever since. They have helped to keep him alive politically, and the hon. member for Selkirk knows that. He knows the facts just as well as the Attorney General for Manitoba. They are not so indelibly stamped on his memory perhaps as on mine, but he has seen them published from time to time, and he knows that my opponent holds his seat by virtue of the vote of the returning officer of Manitoba—the smallest majority of any minister in the Dominion. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) goes on to say:

> I was elected in the constituency of Manitoba by 105 of a majority. If the government will appoint a royal commission to inquire into the lists in that constituency, and if they can find 106 Conservatives improperly put on that list. or 106 Reformers improperly left off, I will resign my seat.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. Read it all.

Mr. MOLLOY. I intend to read it all, but was giving it in junks on the instalment plan:

> If they can find 106 Conservatives improperly put on that list or 106 Liberals improperly left off, I will resign my seat provided the hon. member for Brandon will agree to resign his, if his statements, are not true, as I claim they are not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MOLLOY. The hon. member for Lisgar must think we are pretty dense. He says: 'I will resign if so and so will.' But he knows full well that he cannot resign. There are just two ways in which he can avoid the election petition—by appointment to the Senate or death. We will take mighty good care that he will not get in the Senate for a long time to come, and I hope, as he is a fairly good fellow, that he will not die and avoid the petition in that way.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. I am just as free to resign my seat as the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) is free to resign his.

Mr. MOLLOY. The hon. member for Brandon did not say anything about resigning his seat. He has never been defeated He has had 25 years of parliamentary experience in this House and in the local legislature. He has been thirteen or fourteen years in this House, and when the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) is a member of this House as long as my hon. friend, the ex-Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), he will have something to boast about. I would advise my hon. friend from Lisgar to keep in mind the old maxim, that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. If he should resign before the term of this parliament expires and face his electors in the county of Lisgar, he may not come back. Strange things happen in elections, and I would advise him to stick just as fast to his seat as he possibly can. He tried to get elected in 1904 but failed, but the lists perhaps did not then help him out as we believe they did the last time, which is the reason he is here now. So that I will close here, so far as that idle boast is concerned.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. It is no idle boast at all.

Mr. MOLLOY. He knew he could not resign, and if he did resign he has every reason to believe he would not get back. If he will face the election petition, which I believe he will have to do, perhaps he will be very glad to resign. How would he like that? There is quite a difference in doing a thing voluntarily and being compelled to do it; and the hon. member for Lisgar had better sit as close to his seat as he possibly can and just as long as he can, and we will take chances on his coming back on the next appeal to the people of Manitoba.

Now, I think I have disposed of the statement that the judges make the list. There is one point in connection with the list on which I will barely touch. If the registration clerk is fair and honourable, no man gets on the list except the man who applies personally and takes his oath; and if that list is brought before the judge and revised by the judge, the judge is absolutely helpless unless somebody takes interest enough to appeal against a name. Names are appealed against by different people in different constituencies, and they are often upheld by the judge who declares that they have the right to be on, and I think in the majority of cases they have the right to be on. We have every confidence in the judges of Manitoba. But the fact that the list can be stuffed was sworn to by Judge Ryan of Portage la Prairie, an appointee of the Canadian government in this investigation which went back only to the list of 1908 and which the government would not carry back to 1903. Judge Ryan, who is one of the ablest and most reputable men in Manitoba, said that the list could be stuffed. He did not pretend to have knowledge of it being done, but I say it has been done and I say that men from the province of Manitoba in this House believe—or, at least, they have good reason to believe—that it has been done.

Mr. STAPLES. Read what Judge Ryan said on that point.

Mr. MOLLOY. You read it. The hon. gentleman asks: Will this government appoint a Royal Commission? I will send him back to his political chum the hon. member for Lisgar of the province of Manitoba to ask them to grant the commission that is practically demanded by the people of Manitoba to determine whether the lists in Manitoba are stuffed, and whether the system of appeal on the lists is fair and square. And let them go back to the year 1903, and we will undertake to prove, as I have said before, not only that the list was unfair, but that it was the most unjust list in the Dominion of Canada. That is the reason the members for Manitoba sitting on the other side of the House are so much in love with that system—because it had a good deal to do with them getting to this House in the election of October 26, 1908.

Something was said here the other night—and I think the statement was challenged—as to the prostitution of justice in the province of Manitoba. Justice is being prostituted in certain cases for political effect. And I am making the statement that it has been done in my own county; and I make the statement also that I believe these cases are known to hon. members from the province of Manitoba. I will mention one,—the case of Dominion City. The party there was sentenced by the magistrate appointed by the Attorney General's department of the province of Manitoba to a term in the common gaol. The party was taken to Winnipeg, but great political influence was brought to bear—at least the local member for that county thought so,—and it is a matter of history that that party was back in Dominion City the same day and before the constable who had taken the one convicted to Winnipeg. That cannot and will not be denied by any man from the province of Manitoba.

Mr. STAPLES. What was the name of the person?

Mr. MOLLOY. Krivel. Then, take the Lac du Bonnet liquor case. The house of a man there was, to use the common expression, 'pulled,' and he was fined for running what is commonly known as a 'blind pig.' But the party thus fined was an active political worker, and this was during the election of 1904. The magistrate received a telegram signed 'Colin H. Campbell,' 'Do nothing in the Lac du Bonnet case until you hear from me,' or words to that effect. And nothing has been done from that day to this. If my memory serves me well, there have been 40 odd political cases since the present Attorney General took office—40 odd charges including arrests. And I will ask the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) or any other hon. member from the province of Manitoba, to name a case where a man was charged with a political offence and was ever brought to trial by the Attorney General's Department. The last is the celebrated Ingram case in Brandon. This man had acted as returning officer in the last Dominion election. Was he brought to trial? No. He was arrested, not prosecuted but persecuted, for political effect, and they tried to make a deal with the Liberal party, and according to the statement of Ingram they failed to make the deal and did not carry on the case. They dare not carry on this case and they know it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Tell the House what Ingram did.

Mr. MOLLOY. I will tell what he did, and I will tell everything he did. I have already told what action the department took to punish the crime.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Tell about the prosecution.

Mr. MOLLOY. There was no prosecution and he knows it. So far as the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) are concerned, that hon. member is a personal friend of mine. It is not necessary for me to deal with any statements he made. My hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Neely) handled the 'Tall Pine' from Dauphin to a finish the other night. It will be quite a while before the hon. member for Dauphin will make an insinuation, much more a charge, while he is a member of this House.

Mr. STAPLES. He made a charge.

Mr. MOLLOY. He did not. He hinted at what he thought had been told by a another man who, he said, occupied a seat in this House, but he did not make a charge. And no man sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker, has dared, since 1896, to make a charge against any hon. member of this government, present or past.

So far as the remarks relating to the Grand Trunk Pacific are concerned, I am sure that I never heard of any Conservative in Manitoba opposing the building of that road. Though they spoke of it as an enormous cost to the people, they were afraid to say—at least they did not say—that they were opposed to the building of the road. They did not care apparently what it cost so long as they could convince the people that they were in sympathy with the building of the road and that the road would be built. And I think that in that they took proper ground. I think that their constituents, whether they ever return them to this House again or not, will appreciate their action in relation to the Transcontinental. There are few men west of the lakes, whether Liberal or Conservative, who will oppose the building of the Transcontinental. Liberals would not be here if they opposed it, and some Conservatives who are here would never have had seats in this House had they dared to oppose, even in the most feeble way, the building of this road.

As regards the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) regarding the tariff question, I am sorry for him. He is the only one, however, west of the lake who bears the name of Conservative, who dared to get up in his place in this House and say he was a protectionist. He said it out and out, and in a manly way, and I give the member for Dauphin credit for that. But I must say this, that I believe he has made a mistake, and the proof of that will appear when he appeals to his constituents again. But that of course is his own business. I am glad from a party point of view that he made the statement, because I believe it will be his undoing. Personally I am sorry for him. The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) did not state that he was a protectionist, not yet; nor did the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) state that he was a protectionist, although he did move a resolution asking this government to reduce the tariff on implements from 17½ to 10 per cent. But the people of Manitoba have a pretty good idea of the stand the Conservative party takes on the tariff. I am free to state the stand I take on the tariff, regardless of who is in power, regardless of the fact that I am a supporter of the Liberal government. I say here that I would not support an increase in the tariff. It is wrong from a western point of view. I believe the consumer pays the duty, and I believe the consumer west of the lakes has a greater need of a reduction in the tariff than he has of an increase in the tariff, so far as the necessaries of life are concerned. Therefore I will not support any increase in the tariff, I do not care whether a Liberal or a Conservative government is in power.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. To what extent would you vote for a reduction of the tariff?

Mr. MOLLOY. Lower than you would. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) threw a number of bouquets to the Liberal government for Manitoba, and I do not blame him. I do not blame any Conservative member from the province of Manitoba who will stand up and support, so far as they dare, and as long as they dare, the party that holds sway in the province of Manitoba, for they have been a great help to the Conservative party in the Dominion in the past. They may be a great help to it in the future, but we do not think so, for we believe they will not be there. The hon. member for Selkirk says the present premier of Manitoba is the best they have ever had, but I take issue with him. The best Conservative premier that Manitoba ever had was the honoured, the late lamented John Norquay, honest, great-hearted John Norquay. He was a good man, he meant well; but the other fellows, all they meant was to win, and they generally did it, and I give them a certain amount of credit for it. The hon. member for Selkirk, in praising the party that holds sway in Manitoba, did not tell us anything about the number of cheques that were proven before the Public Accounts Committee of Manitoba to have been paid in his constituency a few days prior to the last Dominion election. If my information is correct, there were 141 cheques for various amounts, signed on the 21st and the 22nd day of October. They were paid in some cases, if my information is correct, at the very polling booths on the 26th October, and the man that paid them took the train back to Winnipeg on the 27th day of October, and his name was Szablowski.

Mr. BRADBURY. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman in his romancing, but I just want to tell him that he is entirely wrong. I did tell the House that the government had done work in the constituency of Selkirk, I told the House that they had received unfair criticism for trying to drain a district in which the government had put people, a district that was not fit to live in. Now the hon. gentleman says that cheques were paid out at the polling booths on the 26th October. I say his statement is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. MOLLOY. I said if my information was correct. But I will challenge the hon. gentleman to this statement: Is it a fact or is it not that cheques were issued by the provincial government and paid in that constituency between the 20th and 26th October, for public works?

Mr. BRADBURY. The hon. gentleman asks me a question. I want to be honest and frank, I will tell him that I could not answer that question because I do not know.

Mr. MOLLOY. It is sometimes a good thing not to know. There are many things, particularly if your election is contested, that it is better not to know. But there are many things that happen in an election that the other people find out later on.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MOLLOY. I am not charging my good friend from Selkirk with having done anything, far from it, I have great respect for him. I think he did pretty well, but I think he got a lot of help, according to the public accounts investigation held in the last session of the local legislature. Those who had any experience in elections know that 141 cheques of various amounts are likely to be a great factor in an election. Supposing they were paid out in the county of Provencher, they would be a big factor. In that case it would go to my opponent, and in that case there was a certain amount went to my opponent, but it didn't help him very much. The hon. gentleman spoke of the harm that a certain gentleman in Winnipeg did himself. Well, the opinion of the magistrate was that it was not a great offence, because he was only fined the small sum of $20, and there were many men in Manitoba who told me personally that they would be quite willing to pay $50 to do the same job. The hon. members for Manitoba have heard the same thing, no doubt they would willingly have paid $50. As regards the statement that has been made concerning the list in Saskatchewan, I have not heard any complaint made except in the Prince Albert election for the local House, where I believe the facts would rather go to show that the candidate opposing the Scott government was unfairly dealt with in the northern polls. The Liberal legislature, however, gave that gentleman his seat without his having to fight for it. Now my hon. friend from Selkirk resented something that was said about the premier of Manitoba by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely). All I can say is that during the last session of the legislature, Mr. Ross, the member for Springfield in the local House, used words to this effect : 'Grant me a committee of investigation, and I will charge that the premier of Manitoba has used his position for his personal enrichment, and if I do not prove that charge, I am not fit to keep my seat in this House.' Will any member from the province of Manitoba deny that those words were used, or words to that effect? I have no quarrel with the premier of Manitoba. He is a political opponent. He will remain that and I will remain what I am, but I simply state what a duly elected and respected member of the legislature of Manitoba said to the premier of that province. What happened? Was there a committee of investigation granted? Not at all.

Mr. BRADBUHY. What was the committee of investigation asked for?

Mr. MOLLOY. The House prorogued next day and it has stood that way ever since.

Mr. BRADBURY. What was the committee of investigation asked for? What was the occasion of it?

Mr. MOLLOY. It was asked for in reference to a statement you made——

Mr. SPEAKER. It is irregular to speak in that way.

Mr. MOLLOY. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. It was that the premier of the province of Manitoba was a party in a sand pit which he was using for his personal enrichment and further the member for Springfield, at the nomination in the county represented by the hon. member for Selkirk, stated two weeks ago, that he still stood by the charges made against the premier of Manitoba, that he still would prove that he was a partner in a deal known as the Eli sand pit deal.

Mr. BRADBURY. I thought I had made it very plain and frank in my statement. I said that the premier stated that he was a partner in the Eli Sand Company, that he held stock in it, that he had a small interest and that he went into it as a part of his legitimate business.

Mr. MOLLOY. Did he grant a committee of investigation?

Mr. BRADBURY. What for?

Mr. MOLLOY. To inquire whether he used his position for his personal enrichment as the premier of Manitoba. The fact remains that this railway refused to carry the produce of the farmers along its line, but consented to do so about a week before the House prorogued. Now, I may be wrong, but I do not think so. I will let my statement go as being correct. As far as the Department of Justice being prostituted in the interest of the Conservative party is concerned, if I may be permitted to do so I will file a statement.

Mr. LENNOX. I rise to a point of order. I let the hon. gentleman go on with this kind of thing before, but I understand that you cannot attack a judge or use offensive language towards any of the courts in Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have not heard any reference to a judge yet.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. gentleman speaks of the prostitution of justice.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand him to speak of the Department of Justice.

Mr. LENNOX. Justice can only be administered by the judges.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Department of Justice was referred to.

Mr. LENNOX. Justice is administered by a judge.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MOLLOY. I state in addition to what I say now that there is no charge against any judge in any part of Canada, let alone the province of Manitoba, but the Liberals charge that the Department of the Attorney General of Manitoba was prostituted for political ends. When I was interrupted by the hon. member for South Simcoe I was proposing to read a statement by Mr. Ingram, who was made to suffer for his affiliation with the Liberal party. If I may simply give the title of the article and then allow it to be put on 'Hansard' I will be willing to do so; otherwise I will be compelled to take the time of the House while I read it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. MOLLOY. It is headed:

Begun in Revenge and continued for Party Advantage.

This is a statement made by Mr. J. Herbert Ingram who was the returning officer in Brandon in the last Dominion election.

Brandon, Man., April 21.—The abject abandonment by the Roblin government on the eve of trial of the prosecution of J. Herbert Ingram, returning officer for Brandon at the last Dominion elections, who since the Dominion elections has been lying under the charge of 'fraudulently altering the voters' list' appears to have been a clear case of funk.

The hon. member asked me to state what he actually did, and I propose to state the facts in connection with this affair.

The Conservative machine here, has for some time appreciated their unhappy position in connection with this prosecution; and when brought face to face with the necessity of going on with the case and proving their charge they wilted. The case was fixed for trial Friday before Judge Ryan who was coming from Portage la Prairie to take it. Mr. Ingram and his solicitors had no intimation that the Crown did not intend to go on with the case until yesterday, when Messrs. Philp and Kilgour, barristers, who were acting for Mr. Ingram received the following letter from J. P. Curran, the law partner by the way of Hon. G. R. Coldwell:

Mr. Coldwell is the Minister of Education in the Roblin government. The letter is as follows:

Brandon, Man., April 20, 1909.

Messrs. Philp & Kilgour,
Barristers, &c.,
City.

Dear Sir:

Re the King vs. Ingram.

I have received instructions from Daly, Crichton and McClure——

Mr. Daly was the gentleman who opposed the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) in the Dominion election.

—who represent the Crown in this matter, to attend for them and enter a stay of proceedings in this case.

I telephoned Mr. Darrach as to the indictment and he informs me that no indictment has been lodged with him. He thinks an indictment should be drawn and that the stay of proceedings should be inscribed upon it. I hardly know what course to take under the circumstances but you are at liberty to treat this letter as a stay of proceedings or evidence of the Crown's intention to enter a stay of proceedings upon any indictment that might be found or presented in accordance with the information and commitment.

You are at liberty to notify the judge of the contents of this letter and to intimate that so far as the Crown is concerned there will be no necessity for his attendance at the court house on Friday next to deal with this case.

If you require anything further you might let me know and I will do my best to adjust matters so that the case may be finally disposed of as before stated.

Yours faithfully,
J. P. CURRAN.

That is the partner of the man who was instrumental in having Mr. Ingram arrested and who was Minister of Education in the Manitoba government. Here is Mr. Ingram's statement and hon. gentlemen opposite can make any statement that they see fit and that they believe is correct in rebuttal of what Mr. Ingram says:

To a representative of the 'Free Press' who interviewed him, Mr. Ingram made a statement of the case, which is given below. It is the most interesting expose yet made of the manner in which the Conservative machine uses its power of arrest and prosecution as a political weapon and asset.

'I was arrested,' said Mr. Ingram, 'on the evening of the 26th of October, charged with adding the name of William Nicholls to the voters' list in polling division No. 3 in the city of Brandon and with scoring out the name of Dan. Hugh MacCullough from the same list. In the first place the names on the Dominion lists should be exactly the same as on the provincial list; the duty of the county court judges in preparing the lists for the Dominion elections is confined to the allocation of names. However, it is necessary that the judges should make copies of the provincial lists with the names thereon properly allocated to the proper constituencies and these written lists are thereupon sent to the King's Printer who prints them for use in the election.

I would ask my hon. friends from Manitoba to pay particular attention to this:

'About a week prior to the date of the election Judge Cumberland, of Brandon, came to see me and stated that either through his error or through the error of the King's Printer, he did not know which, the name of William Nicholls was left off the list in polling division No. 3 in the constituency of Brandon. He stated that he would like me to add that name to the list if I, as returning officer, had the power to add it. I replied to the judge that the provisions of the Dominion Election Act did not seem to impose upon the returning officer the duty to make any changes in the list, and that I was not disposed to make any changes in the list in view of the fact that such conduct was open to criticism on the part of either of the political parties.

Judge Approached by Conservatives.

'Judge Cumberland in reply stated that so far as the Conservative party was concerned there would surely be no complaint; that his excuse for coming to me in regard to the matter at all was that Mr. Bronsdon, who was the chairman of Mr. Daly's executive committee, had been to see him and requested him to arrange with me to make the changes which were subsequently made in the list, that is to add the name of William Nicholls which was evidently left off in error and to score out the name of Dan. Hugh MacCullough which was repeated on the list. I told the judge that I would think it over and see him again about it.

I submit that that was an absolutely fair proposition. The judge, according to Mr. Ingram, stated that perhaps through error he had left off the name of Mr. Nicholls or perhaps the printer had left off the name of Mr. Nicholls and that through error the name of Mr. MacCullough appeared twice. The position was a fair and manly one that the name of Mr. MacCullough which appeared twice should be stricken off and that the name of Mr. Nicholls who was entitled to vote should be placed on the list regardless of the party to which he belonged.

'After a lapse of two or three days I happened to meet the judge when he again asked me what I had decided to do about changing the list. I told the judge that the decision I had come to was this: I would wait until the day of the election and if William Nicholls was absent from the city and did not apply to me personally to be placed on the list I would let the list stand as it was, but that if Mr. Nicholls came to me on the day of the election and personally applied to be placed on the list, I stated that I would take him to the booth and in the presence of all the officials of the political parties and in the presence of the deputy returning officer, I would make the change.

'Judge Cumberland was satisfied with my decision in the matter and on the day of the election Nicholls met me on the street and complained that his name was not on the list and asked me to put him on. Whereupon I told him that if he would call at polling division No. 3 an hour or so afterwards that he would be able to vote, as I would, in the meantime, go to the polling booth and make the changes necessary to enable him to vote. According to my arrangement with Nicholls I called at the booth and made the change after explaining to the deputy returning officer and to the persons engaged by the political parties present why I proposed to do so. Some objection was made to my changing the list. However I made the change and subsequently Mr. Nicholls called at the booth and voted. I did not know then, nor do I know now which candidate Nicholls supported or what are his political leanings.

'I might say that before telling the judge that I would make this change in the voters' list I had looked up the law on the subject and I was satisfied that unless the change in the voters' list was made maliciously or with corrupt motive that such an act could not amount to a crime. I was abundantly satisfied in my own mind in the present case, at all events, that such an act could not be a crime as it was done in the interest of justice to both political parties and to Nicholls. Certainly the striking out of a repeater from a voters' list could not be considered a crime.

'Shortly after I made the change in the voters' list on election day, I was at Aagaard's café in the city getting a lunch, when I met Mr. Coldwell, Mr. Daly, Mr. W. A. Macdonald and Dr. Macdonald, the foremost men in the Conservative party in Brandon, and they made light of the incident and joked me about it considerably until I came away from the café, when the Hon. Mr. Coldwell said that if I behaved myself during the afternoon that they would let me go, meaning by that, I dare say, that unless some greater political offence were committed there would be no notice taken of the change I made in the list. This speech was made in a joke.

Shortly after I left the café I was called upon to sign, as returning officer, a warrant for the arrest of Brownlee, the license inspector, for interfering with a Dominion officer in the discharge of his duty. This warrant was issued and Brownlee was arrested, being held in restraint until the close of polling. Shortly after Mr. Brownlee's arrest I ran into Mr. Coldwell on the street. He asked me if I had caused the arrest of Brownlee and I stated that I had. He expressed his disapproval of it in violent language, and I told him that I did not value his opinion on a subject of that kind. He immediately turned round and said, 'I will fix you for this,' and struck out for the Conservative committee rooms where I am informed by Lawrence Armstrong, the man who laid the information against me, that Mr. Coldwell made him swear out an information against me. As I stated above, I was arrested and held under arrest until I had arranged for bonds in the sum of $4,000 to appear the following morning for my preliminary hearing. The case was adjourned for a week and on the following Monday I appeared. A second adjournment was asked for to which my solicitor objected.

Mr. Curran, acting for the Crown on that occasion, called me into the office of the chief of police and asked me what proposition I had to make. I said I did not understand him. He said, 'Well, you are tied up with a criminal case, what proposition are you prepared to make to get out?' I said I did not understand what he was driving at, and he said it was easy enough for me to make a proposition that would save me from further prosecution. He remarked that Sifton's return had not yet been made. I told Mr. Curran that I had no proposition to make and he then said: 'We will adjourn the case for another week and in the meantime we will see what can be done.' Before the case came up again I had occasion to see Mr. Curran on other business in his own office, when he informed me that had it not been for the arrest of Brownlee in all possibility, I would never have been arrested. He said he was still hoping to receive a proposition from me. About this time I was endeavouring to make the count of the ballots in order to make my returns to the department at Ottawa, and Mr. Curran had caused a search warrant to be issued and placed in the hands of a constable who appeared on the 6th of November, the date upon which I undertook to make the count of the ballots and this constable demanded the voters' list out of the ballot box for polling division No. 3. I refused to allow him to have the box or the contents of it and adjourned the count for a week. When I undertook the second time to count the ballots I had a proper force of policemen to prevent any interruption of the proceedings and effected the count of the ballots.

When my case was again called before Magistrate James evidence was taken. The only witness was Robert Purdon who acted as deputy returning officer for polling division No. 3. He deposed that I had entered the booth on the day of the election; that I had explained why I wished to make a change in the voters' list and that I did make the change in the list. He swore also that he was satisfied that I made the change from no improper motive, with no intention of committing crime; that he had known me for many years and that he knew that I would not do anything improper, if I knew that it was improper. However, on the strength of this evidence Magistrate James committed me for trial.

Shortly before the Virden election came off I met Mr. G. R. Coldwell at the Canadian Pacific Railway depot. He was waiting for a train and I had to see him in regard to the sale of the Brandon Trust Company charter in which I had an interest in common with Mr. Coldwell, and several others. I had received an offer for this charter and discussed with him the acceptance of this offer. After I had concluded my conversation in regard to the charter, Mr. Coldwell asked me what I was doing about my case. I replied that I had done nothing; that there was nothing I could do; that the matter was in the hands of the Attorney General and that I did not see that there was anything for me to do but wait for my trial. 'Do you mean to run the risk of a trial?' he asked. I said, 'Yes,' as I had no option in the matter.

Mr. Coldwell then said, 'Well, you have the whole matter in your own hands and you can go to trial or not, just as you see fit.' He further said, 'What I want you to do is to take the matter up with Mr. Sifton and induce him to effect a withdrawal of the petition filed against Alex. Haggart in the city of Winnipeg? He stated that an offer had been made to the Conservative party in Winnipeg to withdraw all the petitions filed against the Conservatives except Alex. Haggart on condition that the Conservative party withdraw the petition against Mr. Sifton. This, he said, was not good enough. He was prepared to undertake to secure the withdrawal of all the petitions filed against the Liberal candidates and the withdrawal of all the criminal prosecutions against Liberals charged with bribery and corruption in return for the withdrawal of all the petitions against the Conservative candidates, including Mr. Haggart, of Winnipeg.

'I told Mr. Coldwell that that was a matter which I could not arrange if I wanted to. He replied that I could arrange it if I liked; that I had the whole thing in the palm of my hand and he knew that. I stated that there were too many prominent Conservatives who were involved in the corruption which resulted in Mr. Haggart's election and that I was of the opinion that nothing would dispose of that petition excepting a trial before a judge. At all events as far as I was concerned I would have nothing to do with it. He said, 'Well if you feel that way about it you had better go to trial on your own case, but it is a serious matter and I would not like to see you go over the road for it.' I said I would take my chances on it.

'Some time afterwards a meeting of the provincial directors of the Brandon Trust Company was called in his office and I attended there and after the meeting Mr. Coldwell asked me if I had seen Mr. Sifton when I was in Ottawa. I replied that I had. He then said, 'Did you discuss election matters with him?' and I said, 'Yes, in a general way.' He then wanted to know if I had made any arrangement for the withdrawal of the Winnipeg petition. He said, 'Do you mean to say that you are going to trial on your own case.' I said, yes, I could not prevent it, and I did not feel disposed to prevent it any way.

'Mr. Coldwell then asked me if I had considered another phase of the matter. He wanted to know if I had considered the liability of my arrest being brought to the attention of the Law Society of Manitoba. I said that I had not thought of that. He said that there was a likelihood of it being brought before the Benchers of the Law Society and I would run a chance of being struck off the rolls as a solicitor and attorney. I said that I did not think the Benchers would consider the matter until a conviction had been entered against me and that I believed the Benchers were reasonable men and I did not think any notice would be taken of my case until it reached the stage where conviction had been obtained against me. Mr. Coldwell stated that it would not be necessary to wait that long and that that would likely be the next move unless I was prepared to act. I said I would have to scrap it out with the Benchers.

Mr. Coldwell then said, 'Then you are prepared to go to trial?' I said, 'I am.' He said, 'Well, we will go right after you as hard as we can and you will take the consequences,' and I said I was willing to abide by the decision of the judge. This was the last conversation I had with Mr. Coldwell until about a week ago when he called me over the phone and said he would be in Brandon the following Friday and would see me.

'These facts I am prepared to verify on oath at any time. The prosecution has terminated in a farce but it seems to me that the public are entitled to know the facts of the case and be able to judge whether the Conservative leaders in the city of Brandon were justified in instituting criminal proceedings against me in this matter. I am entitled, I believe, to the judgment of the public inasmuch as by the present action of the same leaders I am barred from the decision of a judge on the bench.'

If we say, for arguments's sake, that every word of that statement is incorrect, that Mr. Ingram made a false statement, the fact still remains that he was arrested by an officer of the Manitoba government, that his case was adjourned from week to week, and that it was terminated by the Attorney General's Department asking for a stay of proceedings, leaving that charge hanging over Mr. Ingram undecided. They had not the backbone to bring that man to trial, and now try to impute to him motives that are not correct. I say it is a scandal and a crime, whether committed under a Conservative or a Liberal government, not to give a British subject a hearing. If he is guilty, punish him; if he is innocent, let the courts of the land hear and acquit him I make the statement that Mr. Ingram is not afraid of his accusers, but in my opinion the Department of Justice in the province of Manitoba are afraid to take action against him as they have been afraid to take action against every man they have arrested for political purposes during their term of power in Manitoba.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. The hon. gentleman said I might make a statement, and I simply want to state that the hon. Mr. Coldwell has absolutely denied these statements made by Mr. Ingram.

Mr. NEELY. Would the hon. gentleman tell us why the charge was not proceeded with?

Mr. R. S. LAKE (Qu'Appelle). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy) has spent almost the whole of the hour and twenty minutes that he has been speaking in an attack upon the government of the province of Manitoba, the members of which are not here to defend themselves. Anyway, I do not think that this House is the proper place to make such an attack, and I do not propose to follow him in that discussion. I desire to make my remarks as brief as possible, for I feel that it is the wish of every member of this House that this somewhat long drawn out debate should soon close. The hon. member who has just spoken began his speech by defending the Minister of Finance against a charge of joking which he said had been preferred against him by a member on this side of the House. I must confess that I myself thought the situation bordered somewhat on the burlesque when I heard the Minister of Finance make some of the statements he made in his budget speech. He began by congratulating this House on the fact that he could show a surplus this year of a million and a quarter dollars, and then went on to tell us that he had to increase the debt of the country by some $46,000,000. Now it is always perfectly easy to show a surplus if you borrow sufficient money; and the absurdity of the statement made by the Minister of Finance was enhanced by the fact that, after telling us that he had a surplus, and that he expected a much larger one next year, he went on to say that the situation was a very serious one and called for one of two courses, either that he should increase the taxation of the country or that he should reduce the expenditure. That is to say, we have the statement by the Minister of Finance that having surpluses is a very serious situation calling for either increased taxation or reduced expenditure.

I would like to suggest to him, whether it is not time to cease splitting hairs and drawing fine distinctions as to what expenditures should be charged to capital and what to ordinary expense account. Let him make his statement next year fairly and squarely as to how the country stands, so that the people of the country will fairly understand what the situation is. He can explain afterwards why he has been called on to add to the debt of the country. The hon. minister makes his surplus by charging some items to capital account which in my opinion certainly should not be so charged. He charged to capital account the bounties amounting to upwards of $2,250,000 this year. This was an entirely new departure on his part from the practice under his predecessors. Then he charged to capital account the expenditures on the armaments of the militia. That is a service which will have to go on year after year, as rifles and guns wear out, and new ones will have to be constantly purchased. Then, repairs and betterments of railways and canals are many of them charged to capital account. These are expenditures which under any business corporation would be charged to ordinary current account. Then, we have a charge to capital account which seems to me to be the most absurd of all, the charge for the survey of our Dominion lands, amounting to nearly $1,000,000, while the money we receive on account of these lands is put into the ordinary revenue of the country and is expended in the ordinary expenditure of the country. That amount is nearly $2,000,000, according to the last statement. The net result of the year's finances is that the country is to be saddled, practically forever, with a charge of upwards of $1,000,000 a year as interest on the increase of debt which the government has incurred during the last financial year. Let me point out that the government pledged themselves only a short time ago to take the proceeds of some of the sales of these Dominion lands for the purpose of building the Hudson Bay Railway. But if their present course be continued, we shall find probably in the very near future that the government themselves will make the excuse that they cannot go on building the Hudson Bay Railway because they have not the funds to do so. I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that the government is positively pledged to the building of this railway at once. In speaking at Niagara, the right hon. the Prime Minister just on the eve of the elections, pledged himself in the most earnest manner to the building of the Hudson Bay Railway. Not to-morrow, he said. but to-day. We will immediately proceed, he said, to build the railway as soon as we receive the plans of the surveyors. That was a pledge given the people. But how is the government carrying it out? The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) explained the other day, how the government was carrying it out. He said:

> There is no intention of abandoning the work, but it is in the same position as other large works and at present we do not feel like proceeding with them. I am taking $65,000—that is the whole sum taken in the estimates this year—part of which will serve to learn the best routes and the best harbours, but of course not to proceed with the actual construction.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada have the right to consider that, when a pledge is made by the Prime Minister, it should be carried out. It is very much to the discredit of the country that such a pledge should be abandoned, and abandoned almost immediately after it had been given. I am wondering what the Liberal members from the Northwest are doing in this connection. The Liberal slogan throughout the elections which took place in Saskatchewan, and I believe in the other Northwest provinces, was the immediate building of the Hudson Bay Railway, and many Liberal members owe a large proportion of the votes they received to the opinion of the people that the Prime Minister's word was his bond and that that railway would be built. But to-day we find these same Liberal members sitting silent, raising no protest when told that the work is to be abandoned for the present. And strange to say we find them also quite prepared to endorse the most lavish and extravagant expenditure on other works, on which the money spent is simply wasted. Take for instance the Aylesworth canal, the expenditure on which was supported by every Liberal member from the Northwest, with the one exception of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). I would like to suggest to my hon. friend, if he were here, that he only did part of his duty when he refrained from voting in favour of that expenditure. His duty, as an honest and fearless representative of the people, was to have stood up and voted against that expenditure when it was before the House, if he believed it to be an improper expenditure.

But the main reason why I am addressing the House this evening is because I wish to register the most vigorous protest of which I am capable against the attitude which this government has assumed towards the defence of this country. This is a question which is exercising the people, from one end of Canada to the other. Everybody is thinking and talking about it. The people are beginning to realize some of their responsibility as self-respecting citizens of a self-respecting country and are prepared to take definite steps towards undertaking that supreme duty of citizens, the defence of their country should it ever be subject to attack or to foreign aggression. And yet in the face of all this feeling which is being aroused throughout the country and the excellent sentiment prevailing everywhere, we find the government actually cutting down the expenditure of its land defences. It has reduced the expenditure on the militia by nearly a million dollars—a measure which will result in preventing many of our citizens, who are anxious to render themselves fit to perform their duty to the state, from undergoing their annual training this year. And in spite of the fact that this House has unanimously passed a resolution declaring that it is the duty of the Canadian people to provide some measure of self-defence from a naval point of view, they have neglected to put anything in the estimates for this purpose; and I gather from the statement of the Finance Minister himself that he does not propose to take any adequate sum to fulfil this duty, but is postponing it for yet another year. I would like to protest against that in the most earnest way. I believe that it is the undoubted duty of a country to do something for its own protection, and I believe the Canadian people are prepared to perform that duty. I know at any rate that I can speak for the whole of the west with regard to that matter, and I think for the whole of Canada. We are prepared to do something to carry out our duty for the protection of our harbours, coasts and narrow seas, and this is the time when the government should make provision for that purpose. I have heard that there are some people miserable enough to suggest that we can hide ourselves behind the skirts of the United States, should an attack ever be made upon us by a European power. Let me suggest to those people, who would endeavour to hide behind those skirts, that they would do so in vain unless they were prepared to pay the price, and that price would surely be annexation, and the payment of our share of the cost of their army and navy. It was stated by Mr. Carnegie the other day that the expenditure of the United States on its naval and militry defence and pension fund amounted this last year to $470,000,000. It is a very simple sum in arithmetic to find out what the proportionate expense on the people of this country would be if we were to ask the people of the United States to defend us. The expenditure of one-quarter or one-third of the sum which we would have to contribute under such conditions would, if expended at present upon our own naval defence, be considered by the British government and people generally as a very considerable effort towards the performance of our duties in this respect. The government will be absolutely failing in its duty if it does not make some provision to enable a self-respecting people to do what their manhood calls upon them to do.

Now, there is one other matter that I wish to refer to, and I speak of it because I am anxious not to be obliged to address the House at length on a later occasion. That matter is the transportation question in the Northwest. During the debate that took place a short time ago regarding the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, a challenge was issued to me personally as well as to other members of this House that I would not vote against the grant of a sum of money for the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific. My position in regard to the transportation question is, as it has always been, that there is great need for the extension of our transportation system throughout the Northwest. The hon. member who made the challenge had been studying the history of that country. He quoted from the proceedings of the Assembly of the Northwest Territories a resolution passed in that assembly calling for additional transportation facilities. In that same volume and that same year, but in the preceding session of the House, he must have noticed if he was looking through the volume that I had moved a resolution to much the same effect, I being thus the first to call for an increase in the transportation facilities. When he saw that, why should he rise in this House and suggest that I was opposed to the extension of transportation facilities throughout that country? I am, as I have always been, anxious to see the facilities for the shipment of products of the west increased for the benefit of the people of that portion of the Dominion. But I am most strongly opposed to the gross extravagance which has characterized the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific. If you tell the people of that country what the Grand Trunk Pacific directors state the road has cost, they laugh at the suggestion that this road will afford competition in freight rates. They know that the extraordinary cost of the railway will make the fixed charges so high that the railway will not act as a competitor of the railways already in that country, but that the tendency will be to actually increase the freight rates charged at the present time. Further, it was supposed that in the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific new territory would be opened up and that the railway would go into parts of the country where railway facilities were not already provided. I denounce in the strongest way the building of that railway for a distance of 350 miles parallel to and within anywhere from a few yards to five miles from existing railways. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. W. M. Martin) made the statement to the House that the settlers in that country are, on an average, ten miles from railway facilities. Yet we find this government placing an enormous burden on this country to build this Transcontinental Railway which is running its line for 350 miles or more at no greater distance than five miles from existing lines, leaving many people who are at the present moment suffering from the lack of transportation facilities out in the cold.

I do not propose to extend the remarks I have made. I had intended to mention a number of other questions which have been brought up during the progress of this debate, questions of great interest to the people of the Northwest. For instance, there is the car shortage which annually costs the people of that country an enormous amount of money. There are questions in connection with the provision of better elevator facilities than we have at the present time. There is the question of that iniquitous exemption from taxation which is enjoyed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The members of this House know perfectly well that when the Autonomy legislation was introduced here the government deliberately placed in that legislation a clause which imposed this exemption from taxation upon the people of that country for all time to come so long as that clause remains in our constitution. That was done, I say, deliberately. I believe that the clause is ultra vires of this parliament. At any rate, that is a question which, I am quite certain, will be decided when the opposition in the province of Saskatchewan or the province of Alberta are in a position to take the matter before the final court of appeal of the empire. At the time the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was speaking in reference to the exemption from taxation, he virtually made the promise to the members of this House, especially to the members from the Northwest, that he would take the question up in the near future and see if he could not come to some arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company by which this exemption from taxation could be done away with. But, though he has been reminded of that promise in this House on more than one occasion, he still fails to take the first step to carry it into effect. We find that he has granted favours to the Canadian Pacific Railway off-hand without endeavouring to get any quid pro quo from them. Yet here is a matter on which he might, if he chose, enter into negotiations with them and in return for favours granted by the people of this country arrange with them to relieve the people of the Northwest from the burden that rests on their shoulders by reason of this exemption.

The hour is late, and I know it is the wish of hon. members of this House that the debate should not be prolonged, and I therefore reserve any further remarks that I may have to make for another occasion.

Mr. ALEXANDER W. CHISHOLM (Inverness). Mr. Speaker, in rising to address this House for the first time, I can give you one assurance and that is that I will not detain you very long. I had not intended, during the present session, to take any part in the debates of this House, for the simple reason that I never had any experience in Parliamentary procedure. However, there are certain matters relating to my own constituency that have been mentioned, and if I did not refer to them I should consider myself recreant to my duty as a representative of that constituency. Yesterday the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin) took occasion to stray from a discussion of the budget, and to refer to the conditions of the coal industry in the county of Inverness, and also to the condition of railway facilities. I think if my hon. friend had consulted the interest of his party he would have let that county alone, because if there is one county in all Canada that has benefited permanently from the policy adopted by this government, it is the county of Inverness. When I compare the conditions that prevailed in that county previous to 1896 with the state of things to-day, I am proud to be a supporter of this government. As regards the condition of the working man in the county of Inverness previous to 1896, I think my hon. friend was also ill advised in making the references he did. I well remember the conditions in 1896, and the difficulties the labouring men had to contend with in order to get employment. Indeed in order to earn a dollar they had to go to the neighbouring republic, and their chief difficulty was to get the means of transportation to that country. As a result of the hard times then prevailing, there was an exodus from that county which we will never forget. In fact labouring men left that county in such large numbers—and I make this statement knowing that it will go back to the county—that at certain seasons of the year you might travel for six hours and you would not probably meet a dozen young men in that time. Take the condition of the farmers previous to 1896, they could not get sale for the products of their labour, they became discouraged to such an extent that numbers of them left the county. Take the coal miners in the county of Inverness, and these are the people that my hon. friend from South Cape Breton paid particular attention to. Previous to 1896 there were no miners in the county, notwithstanding the fact that it is one of the richest mineral counties in the province of Nova Scotia. But what are the present conditions? Our labouring men need not leave the county, or the province, if they want employment. They can get the best wages paid in any county of the province. The farmers get the best price for their products probably of any place east of Montreal. The mining industries of the county of Inverness previous to 1896 were an unknown quantity; notwithstanding the fact that we had large coal areas, they remained undeveloped. My hon. friend referred to the fact that Mr. George H. Murray and other gentlemen associated with him got a charter to build a railway from the southern end of the county to Cheticamp. Although these gentlemen, good business men, had that charter for a long time, and notwithstanding the fact that every effort was made to interest capital in the undertaking they were unable to do so until 1898. At that time McKenzie & Mann took over this charter and built a railway from the Strait of Canso to the town of Inverness. They also have a charter extending from the town of Inverness to Cheticamp. My hon. friend from Cape Breton tried to leave the impression that it would be impossible for any other company to build a road in that county because Mackenzie & Mann have built a road as far as the town of Inverness, and hold a charter to Cheticamp. Let me tell my hon. friend that another company are now preparing to build a road from a point on the Strait of Canso known as Cariboo to the collieries of Ste. Rose. I have strong faith that this concern will build that road in the very near future; indeed, I am in possession of facts which lead me to believe that they are going forthwith to build that road. What is more, let he tell my hon. friend that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann—I have this form one of the leading officials of that company not later than yesterday—are going to extend the road from Inverness to Ste. Rose also, with the purpose of developing the coal mines at Ste. Rose. These conditions are very satisfactory to the people of Inverness, but they were unknown previous to 1896. The coal industry is the most important in our province. It will be surprising to you, Mr. Speaker, to learn that previous to 1896 not one ton of coal was exported from my county. scarcely one ton of coal was sold or mined in the county of Inverness previous to 1896. But in 1908 there were 335,943 tons of coal exported. Surely this is a great development, and it ought to be satisfactory even to my hon. friend from Cape Breton who has taken such a great interest in the county I have the honour to represent. Surely this is a convincing proof of the progress that had taken place in that county during the last 12 years.

My hon. friend has also taken occasion to refer to the conduct of the municipal council of Inverness. Although I am a young member of this House, I have had sufficient experience in public life to know that it ill becomes a young member, and still more an older member, to bring municipal politics into the House of Commons. I am sorry that my hon. friend from South Cape Breton is not present, because I would like him to hear these remarks. I think he ought to hesitate to refer to the affairs of the municipal council of Inverness in this House of Commons. I think that council knows how to discharge its duties just as well as my hon. friend knows how to discharge his duties, and when he chose to cast reflections upon the municipal council in my constituency, I must characterize his conduct as puerile and childish. The municipal council, in the discharge of their duty, saw fit to extend the time for the completion of that road from end to end, and in doing so I am sure they were consulting the wishes of the taxpayers of that county. It is, I know, very irksome to the ears of the hon. members to hear me make reference in this House to matters appertaining to the municipality of Inverness, but I must do so in reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Maddin). I have great faith in the industries of that county of Inverness. I look upon that county as destined to be one of the finest counties in Canada in the near future. We have great mineral resources and they are now being developed quite rapidly. We have the finest farming county in Nova Scotia, we have great fishing resources there also, and I am sure that we will only have to wait a little while to satisfy our friend from South Cape Breton that Inverness will be capable of looking out for itself. I would ask your indulgence for a moment or two while I refer to another matter in reference to railways, because this is a subject that I wish particularly to bring to the attention of the House. A commission has been appointed by this government to look over branch lines of railways and to report upon such lines as might, in the opinion of the commission, be profitably taken over by the government as branch lines of the Intercolonial Railway. I do not know the terms of the instructions received by the commission when they went on their mission but I do think it possible that they were asked to visit and inspect the most important lines of railways in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I am sorry to think that they have failed to inspect and report on the railway to Inverness county. It may be said that the railway is not for sale. This commission has no evidence but that it could be purchased. I must say that had that commission gone over the line they would have found that it is to-day one of the best paying roads in Nova Scotia. That commission have failed to visit this road and also the Dominion Atlantic. The hon. member for Hants county (Mr. Black) has given the reason why they did not visit the Dominion Atlantic. I cannot give the reason why they did not visit the Inverness county road. The people of Inverness are anxious to see the Intercolonial take over the line for various reasons which I do not propose to submit to the House to-night, because I think it would be imposing too much upon its patience. But, I am sorry that the commission did not visit the road so as to be able to submit to the government the various conditions which, I claim, would make this a very paying road as a branch of the Intercolonial Railway. I am satisfied that the day is not far distant when the Intercolonial Railway will put forth an effort to purchase this road. The road extends from a point on the strait of Canso to Inverness and it passes through one of the best farming sections in Nova Scotia. It passes through three important villages and it carries the product of three coal mines. All these conditions being considered, I am sure it would be a splendid thing for the government to take over this line and I believe that it would be a good thing for the county of Inverness that the government should do so.

There is another matter which I also desire to refer to. I am glad that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) is in his seat to-night. I refer to the fact that, notwithstanding that the Inverness and Richmond road has been built and operated for the last eight years and forms a junction with the Intercolonial Railway, there has never been a station at that junction, I am sure the older members of this House must have a vivid recollection of this matter being brought to their attention by my predecessor the late Dr. Maclennan. I do not know that I can add very much to the remarks of my late lamented predecessor, but I do say that, in my opinion, the conditions obtaining there could not be duplicated in any place in Canada. Here is the Inverness and Richmond road carrying passengers to this junction. These passengers are left there and have to remain until the arrival of the eastern or western bound train. They have to suffer the inclemency of the weather. They have to stand out there in the drenching rains of spring and fall and in the snow storms of winter. These are conditions that I do not think any people of this country would put up with, and I think that the people of Inverness should be the last who should be called upon to suffer these inconveniences in view of the fact that they put their hands into their own pockets and spent $2,000 a mile to get that road built. I do not know that it will help the case one particle to discuss it any further, but if it is my privilege to come back here next session, as I hope it will be, unless I am called away, I trust I will not be called upon to bring this matter before the government again. We are not looking for a mansion, we are satisfied with a humble building, something that will shelter the travelling public. I am sure that if the people of Inverness believed that this station was not going to be built they would build it themselves. That is all I am going to say on that point and in fact that is all I purpose saying to-night further than that there are a very many things that I would like to bring to the attention of the House in reference to the county of Inverness, but at this very late hour, and as this is my first attempt, and the House has been so indulgent and kind to me, I shall not impose myself further upon its patience.

Mr. J. F. STEWART (West Hamilton). Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up much of the time of this House, at this late hour, in the debate on the budget, when it has been so thoroughly discussed by honourable members on both sides of this House, so much so that not much is left to be said, and, being a manufacturer myself, and representing a manufacturing constiutency, as I do, one of the largest in the Dominion, I desire to point out that the stove and the granite manufacturers of this country are not properly protected. The government, in framing the tariff, always keep one thing before them, that is, to keep the tariff just high enough to admit foreign goods into this country,—the more goods come in the more money the government gets,—and allow the manufacturers of this country to take care of themselves. That is not the policy that will develop this country. The stove manufacturers in this country have invested about $6,000,000 and one and a quarter millions of this amount is invested in Hamilton, and during the last two years, the factories have only run seven months out of the twelve. The other five months the men walk the streets looking for work, while our retail stores and shops were selling American stoves at such prices as our manufacturers could not afford to sell for, and, since the panic in the United States, their manufacturers have been rushing stoves into this country at such prices as would leave no margin for our manufacturers. During the early part of last year, no less than four hundred car loads were shipped into this country and the Northwest, valued at half a million dollars. Now, all these stoves could and should be manufactured here, if properly protected, and when you take into account that the manufacturers of this country have to import from the United States several articles that go to make us stoves, and pay duty, it reduces the duty from 25 per cent to 14½ per cent.

Another reason for more protection, is, large stove manufacturers in the United States are centered at or near Chicago and one firm employs about seven thousand hands, nearly as many as all Canada, and, from Chicago to Winnipeg the freight is 50c. per hundred pounds, while from Hamilton, the rate is one dollar per hundred. The American manufacturers have eighty million people to sell to, while we have only seven million. American manufacturers make fifty stoves to our manufacturers' one. American firms have another advantage. They can give a man one pattern to work on day in and day out, and he becomes an expert at that work. Our manufacturers, on account of the small number of stoves made here, are forced to give one man several parts to work on, and he must be a good mechanic and all round man commanding good wages. American manufacturers give their best men surface parts, and unskilled labour the inside parts. Our manufacturers cannot do this, on account of the small number manufactured, and all stove manufacturers in this country suffer in some way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know for a fact, that stove manufacturers in Hamilton, for the last two years, have paid no dividends, or earned any profits. The American firms have nothing to lose by sending into this country stoves at cost, but may gain in two points. First, they succeed in putting our manufacturers out of business and getting this field for trade, and, at the same time keep their men in employment.

Some time ago, Jones, of Binghampton, was selling hay scales in this country at $48 per set. Our manufacurers' price was $125. I remember, I asked the manager, at one time, how he explained that their firms were able to sell these scales at such a low price. He replied that they made up the list that they expected to sell in their own country, they shipped the surplus to foreign countries, and made some profit on their own scales, on account of the large number manufactured.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the government would add 10 per cent to the present tariff, it would enable our manufacturers in Ontario, to trade successfully. Now, it may be said that this would raise the price of stoves, which I do not admit, but, for argument's sake, I will admit that it would raise the price, say one dollar to one and a quarter per stove. A man only requires to buy a stove once in fifteen or twenty years, and surely this could not be considered a burden, and a Canadian that would object to pay our manufacturer a dollar more for a stove than an American, is not loyal enough to live in this country. and had better go to the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word about the granite trade of this country. We have, in this country, about one thousand persons in the monument trade, and this number has not changed in the least for ten or twelve years Out of this number, about twenty-five are manufacturing granite monuments, the remainder are buying monuments finished and ready to set up, from the old country, and the United States, and, while we have, in Canada, all the granite this country will ever require, just as nature left it in beds all over this country, and this government has not seen fit to make an effort to have our quarries opened up and developed, the Americans have their quarries opened up in the United States, and are doing a successful trade. While, in Canada, we have a few opened up in the lower provinces, which can only furnish four or five different shades of colour, we are forced to go to the United States for our rough granite, and, in doing that, we are forced to pay a duty, and, after the granite is manufactured into monuments, and we desire to ship them into the United States, we are forced to pay some 50 to 65 per cent duty, in addition to the 15 per cent paid on the rough stuff coming in, making in all 80 per cent, while old country granite comes in here at 30 per cent, and the American monuments at 35 per cent, while our manufacturers are forced to pay 80 per cent to compete with them.

Now, some member may say, why not open up our quarries? The reason is that it will cost from $40,000 to $45,000 to open up and equip a quarry. No man will spend that amount of money and only have twenty to twenty-five customers to sell to, but, if our men were all in the manufacturing, then there would be a good market in this country to sell to, and their quarries would then pay. Now, Sir, when you take into account the fact that the old country manufacturers make their monuments at the quarries, and have saved the freight on the rough stuff, and at the same time, procure their labour at less than half the price paid in Canada, and can send the monuments to this country at the same freight as I would have to pay to ship one here one hundred or one hundred and twenty-five miles.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a firm in New York, Townsend & Townsend, who sell largely in this country, and have their monuments shipped to Montreal, and have the customs cleared at that port of entry, and send on to their destination, and pay, I suppose, the local rate of freight. I am at a loss to know why any firm will have its goods cleared at Montreal port of entry, and pay local rate of freight, instead of through freight to its destination, unless there is some good reason not seen on the surface. If I buy a carload of granite from the United States, the duty and freight amount to more than the cost of the rough granite, while I have to compete with a firm that has no freight to pay on rough granite, and gets its labour at less than half what I do.

Now, some member may say that he cannot see why we canot manufacture monuments here as cheaply as in other countries. Well, the answer is avery easy one. In the United States, they use a machine that is called a surface machine, and that machine can surface about one hundred and fifty feet a day, at a cost of about $12, and it will cost us here to do the work by hand, at least, $60. Now, you may say, why not use those machines. The answer is, I could not use one one day a month. as I have not the market here to sell my goods to.

Now, in conclusion, to give you a better idea of the effect it would have on this ccuntry if all monuments were manufactured in Canada, in Hamilton, there are eight firms in the monument business, and I am the only manufacturer, and I pay out, in wages alone, about $10,000 a year. The other seven pay out, perhaps $15,000 a year, in all $25,000. This amount would be kept in this country instead of being sent out to foreign countries, and handed out for labour. Now, Sir, if $50.000 can be kept in this country, for our labourers in so small a section as the city of Hamilton, in place of sending it to foreign countries to be paid out, believe me, it is a positive proof that this country is loosing heavily by the present tariff.

I want to say, before sitting down, moreover, as to the quality of granite in this country, I had the pleasure of exhibiting a piece of granite from Gananoque quarry, at the Pan-American Buffalo Exposition, amongst one hundred and sixty different kinds there, on exhibition, and I am glad to be able to say that I succeeded in capturing the Bronze Medal, as having the best quality of granite on exhibit.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FIELDING. As hon. gentlemen have expressed a desire that we should not proceed with the resolutions to-night, I beg to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MONK. Will the hon. gentleman say what the programme is for to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. The motion will be made to resume the Committee of Ways and Means for the purpose of proceeding with the resolutions, and if there be sufficient time at a later stage, I think the intention is to take up the Grand Trunk Loan Bill.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.40 a.m. Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, April 28, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

CANADA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. PARDEE moved:

That Bill (No. 56) respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company be placed on the orders of the day for Committee of the whole, on Monday next.

Mr. HENDERSON. I scarcely understand the purport of this motion and perhaps the hon. gentleman ought to explain it. Does he intend to move on Monday that it be again referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce? That to my mind is the proper course to take, as the House cannot deal with this Bill until it has been again dealt with by the Committee on Banking and Commerce. If the hon. gentleman's intention is simply to bring the matter before the House his motion is quite in order, but it would seem to me that the proper motion now would be that Bill (No. 56) be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, in order that it may be dealt with there and subsequently by the House. The Canada Life Insurance Company has had this Bill readvertised, and I should say it is the duty of the House to give the general public the advantage of that advertising and allow them an opportunity of appearing before the Committee on Banking and Commerce to state their objections to or approval of the Bill before it is considered by the House. The hon. gentleman says it is not his intention to move on Monday that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. Then I certainly think that his motion is not the proper one, as the general public, the policy-holders, who may have objections to the Bill, should have an opportunity of appearing before the Banking and Commerce Committee and stating their objections, if they have any, to this measure.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is only a notice of motion. I express no opinion at this moment as to the course which ought to be taken when the Bill comes up on Monday.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I understand it is still open to refer the Bill to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Oh, no, I express no opinion on that. This is simply a notice of motion to be moved on Monday; I express no opinion at all on it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that this is only a motion to put it on the Order Paper.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that this motion is unnecessary, that the Bill will appear on the Order Paper.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is on the Order Paper, and it may be dealt with on Monday.

QUESTIONS.

SESSIONAL CLERKS—EDWARD S. CARTER.

Mr. DANIEL asked:

1. Is one Edward S. Carter employed as sessional clerk or in any other capacity by the government or House of Commons?
2. If so, what remuneration does he receive, and what are his duties?
3. Has he been paid, or is he to be paid, for the time he has been absent from Ottawa?
4. Is His Honour the Speaker aware that the said Edward S. Carter has been recently spending a great deal of time in St. John, N.B., in connection with the civic election recently held there?

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister):

1. Mr. Carter has been temporarily employed in typewriting and secretarial work in the House of Commons during the present session.

2. He receives when employed $4 per diem and his duties are to perform such work as may be directed, principally secretarial work and typewriting.

3. He has not been paid, nor is to be paid, for any time during which he has been absent from Ottawa.

4. The Speaker is informed that Mr. Carter was absent during and a few days after the Easter vacation. Mr. Carter states that he took no part in the election referred to and was in St. John only three days during his absence.

ALEX. MUIR MEMORIAL.

Mr. MACDONELL asked:

Has the government been requested to aid the Alexander Muir Memorial Fund? If so, is it the intention of the government to place something in the estimates this year for such purpose?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). A request of that nature has been received and the matter is under consideration.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—J. AYLEN.

Mr. LENNOX asked:

1. Was J. Aylen at one time employed as a district engineer on the Transcontinental Railway, or in any capacity?

2. Is Mr. Aylen still engaged on this railway as district engineer or otherwise?

3. If his services have been dispensed with, for what cause?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. John Aylen was assistant district engineer of District 'D' from February, 1905, until October, 1907, acting district engineer from October, 1907, until September, 1908, and assistant for the remainder of 1908.

2. No.

3. Voluntarily resigned, December, 1908.

MARKET GARDEN PRODUCE.

Mr. WALLACE asked:

What was the total imports of market garden produce for 1900, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906, 1907 and 1908, and what was the amount of duty collected on them?

Hon. WILLIAM PATERSON (Minister of Customs):

A statement is submitted herewith.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. McCRANEY moved:

That the following Bills from the Senate be placed on the Order Paper amongst private Bills for second reading on Friday next.

Bill (No. 157) for the relief of John Dennison Smith.

Bill (No. 158) respecting the Bank of Winnipeg.

Bill (No. 160) to incorporate the Canadian Red Cross Society.

Bill (No. 161) to incorporate the Equity Fire Insurance Company.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. Fielding the House went into Committee on Ways and Means.

	Preferential British Tariff.	Intermediate Tariff.	General Tariff.
135b. Raw sugar as described in tariff item 135, when imported to be refined in Canada by Canadian sugar refiners, to the extent of twice the quantity of sugar refined during the calendar years 1909, 1910, and 1911, by such refiners from sugar produced from Canadian beet root, and an equal quantity of sugar to that refined during the calendar years 1912 and 1913 by such refiners from sugar produced in Canada from Canadian beet root—the whole under regulations by the Minister of Customs.
Per one hundred pounds testing not more than seventy-five degrees by the polariscope...	31½ cts.	31½ cts.	31½ cts.
And per one hundred pounds for each additional degree over seventy-five degrees..	1 ct.	1 ct.	1 ct.
Provided that sugar imported under this item shall not be subject to special duty.
This item to expire December 31, 1914.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand this is the same resolution we have now in the tariff, the only difference being that the time is extended.

Mr. FIELDING. I would have to qualify that slightly. As respects the three years the resolution is the same; as respects the two succeeding years the resolution is modified.

Mr. PATERSON

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the purpose of the provision that sugar imported under this item shall not be subject to special duty.

Mr. FIELDING. Special duty is what is commonly called the dumping duty, and this does not come within the class of matters as to which the dumping duty was deemed expedient.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Has it any application to the surtax?

Mr. FIELDING. None whatever; the surtax is not touched in any form by this amendment.

Resolution agreed to.

135c. Raw sugar as described in tariff item 135, when imported to be refined in Canada by any sugar refining company not engaged in refining sugar from the product of Canadian beet root, to the extent of one-fifth of the weight of sugar refined from raw sugar by such refining company in Canada during the calendar year in which such raw sugar is imported—under regulations by the Minister of Customs.
Per one hundred pounds testing not more than seventy-five degrees by the polariscope..	31½ cts.	31½ cts.	31½ cts.
And per one hundred pounds for each additional degree over seventy-five degrees..	1 ct.	1 ct.	1 ct.
Provided that sugar imported under this item shall not be subject to special duty.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the minister explain what advantage this clause gives over the present law?

Mr. FIELDING. In the event of a shortage of the West India sugar, which shortage is alleged for various causes, the refineries would be at liberty to import this small proportion of foreign sugar at the preferential duty. They would get no advantage in respect to the rate of duty, unless we assume that they would necessarily be obliged to import foreign sugar and pay a higher duty. If they should be obliged to do that we think they would be placed at a disadvantage.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understood from the minister a few days ago that the shortage is not the whole matter complained of. The complaint was that the West India planters enhance the price of their sugar on account of the double duty and compel the Canadian refiners to pay a higher price than they ought to pay and that the British refiners pay. Would this amendment of the tariff apply only in the case of a shortage, or could the refiners make their purchases under this clause of the tariff even if there was no shortage?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes. The percentage we allow is comparatively small and they would have the right to import that percentage unconditionally.

Mr. AMES. I understand that although the matter is in dispute as to the existence of such a combine, whether it be found that a combine does exist or does not exist this law goes into effect just the same.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes. If it were absolutely certain and beyond debate that there was a combine and that it was likely to continue I think we should probably be obliged to apply a more drastic remedy. To the extent of this limited importation they are permitted to import the sugar at the preferential rate unconditionally.

Mr. AMES. If it should be discovered there was no combine the law would be on the statute books just the same?

Mr. FIELDING. Then it would be a proper matter for consideration at another session.

Mr. AMES. I understand that the West Indian sugar exporters deny that there is any such combine.

Mr. FIELDING. That is correct.

Mr. AMES. And they consider that we have given them cause for a grievance against us; and the remarks made by the minister in the House the other day are regarded by the West Indian exporters as detrimental to them and to the general entente cordiale which should exist between British colonies and which we hope will lead in the future to a large interchange of products. Is there not a commission sitting or about to sit of which the hon. Minister of Finance is or is about to become a member, that will determine the truth or falsity of these allegations as to a combine?

Mr. FIELDING. The commission to which my hon. friend alludes was mentioned by me in the budget speech. It is proposed by the imperial authorities to appoint a royal commission for the purpose of inquiring into trade relations between Canada and the West Indies; and the Colonial Secretary, Lord Crewe, was good enough to express a wish that I should take a place on that commission. That has not yet been officially determined. At all events, Canada will be represented on the commission. The purpose of the commission is not particularly to inquire into this point which has come up, but into the question of trade generally, though I have no doubt that incidentally this matter will be investigated. Since the introduction of these resolutions, I am aware that it is contended by the exporters from the West Indies that no such combine exists. It is, however, an established fact that a very considerable quantity of foreign sugar was imported last year, I think by the Montreal refiners, on which they paid the higher rate of duty, for the reason, as they alleged, that they could not obtain the West Indian sugar.

Mr. AMES. Has the minister taken into consideration the fact that the trial and conviction and penalizing of the West Indian exporters just on the eve of a gathering in which different parts of the British empire propose to discuss how they may increase their friendly exchange of trade, may have a prejudicial effect in the way of their making a bargain with one another?

Mr. FIELDING. No doubt those connected with the exporting of West India sugar would rather prefer that this item should not be in the tariff; but still they have not much reason to complain. We have been granting them this preference for a good many years, and we have not received anything in return. While we do not complain of that, they have no reason to complain if it suits us to withdraw some small portion of the concession that we have given to them in the past. I do not think that our friends in the West Indies have any reason to say that this is evidence of any unfriendliness on our part towards them.

Mr. AMES. The minister, then, regards this rather as a precaution taken than as a penalty inflicted?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes. If it were a penalty, I think we would have to make the privilege to the refiners very much larger. If a combine exists, this will rather cause the West Indian exporters, I think, to consider seriously whether or not it is wise for them to adopt that policy, while if it be found that there is no combine, I do not think they can suffer very much from having this small portion of foreign sugar imported at the preferential rate.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the Finance Minister say whether or not there has been any negotiations or correspondence between the Canadian government and the United States government with reference to an interchange of logs, pulp and lumber between the two countries? This has formed the subject of a great deal of discussion in the United States, and it is one of the items variously placed in the tariff now being discussed in the United States congress. Can the Finance Minister give us any information with reference to that?

Mr. FIELDING. I would not like to speak too positively lest some of my colleagues may have received something; but subject to that qualification, I would say that there has been no correspondence with the United States authorities.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the government or any responsible member of it given reason for supposing that if the United States made a proposition for an interchange on that line, it would be favourably considered by the Canadian government?

Mr. FIELDING. I am not aware of anything of the kind, and would think it exceedingly improbable that anything of the kind occurred. There has been no correspondence on the subject, the Prime Minister reminds me.

Resolution reported, read the first and the second time and agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 162) to amend the Customs Tariff, 1907. He said: This Bill simply confirms the resolution which has just been adopted, with the customary clause that it shall come into force on the morning after the day on which the budget speech was made, that is, the 21st day of April.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first and the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to ask whether or not the government has taken into consideration its attitude respecting the matter alluded to by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and whether or not it is prepared to make any announcement on the subject during the present session?

Mr. FIELDING. We have not had that under consideration with the view of taking any immediate action. There are yet so many uncertainties in connection with the American tariff that it would not be wise to base any action on it at present. After it has become law, there may be aspects of it which will demand the attention of this government; but we do not think that, in the present state of the Bill in Congress, it would be wise to take any action at present or found any future action on it.

Bill reported, read the second and third time and passed.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC LOAN.

Mr. FIELDING moved second reading of Bill (No. 128) to authorize a loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the Bill passes, I would like to address a few observations to the House respecting the position of this matter as it stands, having regard to the debate which has already taken place on the resolution. A good many things have happened since the 30th of July, 1903, when the right hon. the Prime Minister delivered, on the first reading of the Bill, a very lengthy address covering about forty columns of 'Hansard,' without doing us the courtesy of sending us an advance copy of the Bill, but contenting himself with presenting to us, at the conclusion of the speech, a copy of the Bill which, of course, we had no opportunity of examining or considering at that stage before replying to that speech. The right hon. gentleman indulged on that occasion in a great many predictions—predictions with regard to the outcome of the enterprise and predictions with regard to its cost; and it is said that this particular enterprise is to be regarded as his special political monument. Well, I have only to say that if any monument should be erected in this connection, I would suggest that it ought to be in duplicate—one containing the predictions as to cost, should be erected at Moncton; and the other, giving the actual cost, at Prince Rupert, so that no one could see the two except at very considerable intervals of distance and time.

When one comes to consider five years later that we were solemnly told in the first place that this government possessed mountains of information, the most absolute and accurate information that could be desired —I presume that is what that term was intended to express—not only with regard to the merits of the enterprise when once completed, but with regard to the cost of that enterprise, one is amazed at the discrepancy between the predictions based on this absolute information and the results which have obtained thus far. When we contrast the solemn statement made to the House upon those mountains of information, upon the reputation and knowledge of the Prime Minister of Canada, that the mountain section would cost $18,000,000—when we contrast that with the latest report of the officer of this government, charged with the supervision of the western division, who informed the House and country that the same mountain division, instead of costing $18,000,000, will cost $67,000,000, we are reminded of the works of a celebrated German thinker and writer: 'Nothing is so terrible as ignorance in action.'

Now, Mr. Speaker, the project of constructing a transcontinental railway across this country is a very great enterprise, and I thoroughly understand that the people of Canada ought not to be backward in dealing with the great problem of transportation, whether in the east or west of Canada, or whether covering Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. But there are some people in this country who seem to take it for granted that any great railway corporation entering upon an enterprise of this kind has an absolute vested right to all the assistance that the resources of this country can give. I do not so regard the situation. It may be very much in the interest of the people of this country, as sometimes it has been in their interest in the past, that public assistance should be given to great schemes of transportation. That was done in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It has been done in the case of the Canadian Northern. And last, but not least, it has been done in connection with the enterprise we are now discussing. But it is not too late, it seems to me, to emphasize once more the importance of the statement made to the House by the Prime Minister, in 1903, and again in 1904, namely, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company were in this enterprise and were of it and formed the whole thing ; and the proposal which confronts the people of Canada to-day is that the same Grand Trunk Railway Company being in this enterprise and of it and forming the whole thing, are asking the people of Canada to hand back to them $7,000,000, which they have invested in it. Well, it may even be in the interests of the country to do this, although it is a rather stiff propositon, considering what was promised and declared to us in 1903-4 —it may be in the interests of the country to do that rather than allow this work to stop, and the credit, not only of this company, but of Canada as a whole, to be thereby affected; but I desire, before the Bill is read the second time, to point out that not only is the Grand Trunk Pacific in difficulties over this enterprise, but that, looking a little ahead into the future and having regard to the terms of this bargain, we can very readily foretell that the government itself will be in difficulties over it before long. One of my objects in speaking on the second reading of this Bill, before it goes to committee, is to point out what I deem some of these difficulties to be, and to inquire from the government whether or not they have had these under consideration and whether or not they propose, or have proposed, to arrive at any understanding or agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company for the purpose of preventing certain unfortunate consequences to this country that, it seems to me, are very likely to occur.

I have already emphasized the probable cost of this road. Roughly speaking, from the best information I can gather from the utterances of hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches themselves, the entire road will cost in the vicinity of $300,000,000. The eastern division will cost at least $180,000,000, and probably $190,000,000, all of which must be paid out of the revenues of Canada. The western division will cost —if my estimates are correct—and I have based them on information afforded by the government itself, between $110,000,000 and $120,000,000. And if you look for a moment at the details of the expenditure, you will find about this result. The government provides in cash, in respect of interest on the mountain section—interest paid by the people of this country without any recourse—$13,413,750; the government provides in guarantees and bonds for both the prairie and mountain sections $66,658,000; then there is the loan now proposed of $10,000,000. If you sum these up, you will find the total to be $90,101,750, and you will find also that the Grand Trunk Railway will guarantee bonds, according to the information brought down by the government, to the extent of about $28,750,000.

Now, it must be obvious to any person, that the only real security we have for this loan and these guarantees will be the success of the enterprise. If the enterprise is not successful, we have no real security; if the enterprise is successful we shall have good security. So far as I am concerned, I have no hesitation in saying that it is my sincere hope that the enterprise will ultimately be successful. But in the meantime, if there be any risk—and no one can say, in a great enterprise of this kind there is not some risk at least—we are assuming about nine-tenths of that risk and the Grand Trunk Railway about one-tenth. Now, the road, it is needless to remind hon. gentlemen on both sides, is being built out of moneys derived from two sources. The greater part of the money for the building of the road was provided by the people of Canada, or upon their credit, and the remainder by the influence and financial support of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. If you consider this as one great railway enterprise, one Transcontinental Railway extending from Moncton in New Brusnwick to Prince Rupert in British Columbia, the country is financing this enterprise to the extent of nine-tenths and the Grand Trunk Railway Company is financing it to the extent of one-tenth. Now what advantage and what benefit do the people of this country as represented by the government receive on the one hand and what does the Grand Trunk Railway on the other hand, receive from the enterprise? I am not speaking for the moment of the benefit that may accrue to the people of this country from having a great line of transportation extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I do not overlook that, nor do I desire to minimize it. But, looking at the direct financial advantage and results which can be derived from this railway enterprise, you will observe that the Grand Trunk Railway, in return for the financial support and backing which it is giving to this enterprise, is receiving—nay, has already received—common stock of this company to the amount of $25,000,000, common stock handed over otherwise for a mere nominal consideration. You do not find the people of Canada, who have given their financial support to this enterprise to the extent of nine-tenths of the money necessary for the building of the whole line, in this regard at least you do not find them receiving a single dollar of profit from this enterprise—not a single dollar is Canada to receive of the great future profits which will accrue from the operation of this road if it proves successful, as we all hope it may, not only in the distant but in the immediate future. Now, is there any particular reason why a result of that kind should accrue from this proposition? Has the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway corporation, or any other corporation in Canada any vested right to government assistance for the purpose of building a road through the very best portion of Canada so that, although it receives such splendid, such enormous financial support as that just being given by the people of this country to the enterprise of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, they shall receive $25,000,000 of common stock, and the people of Canada represented by this government shall receive absolutely no return or compensation of that kind?

Mr. Speaker, we did make an argument in 1904 and we proposed a resolution in that respect from which I, for one, do not recede to-day. I think that if our proposition had been accepted by the government it would have resulted in very much greater benefit to the people of this country than any which is likely to accrue to them from the proposition as carried out. We said in 1904 that as the people of Canada were providing nine-tenths of the financial support necessary to construct this great transcontinental railway there was every reason for believing that the wise course would be to go one step further and provide ten-tenths instead of nine-tenths and thus own the road from the Atlantic to the Pacific as a great national highway in every sense of the term. I, for one, have never been able to appreciate the arguments of the government in that regard. I should not dignify what was said in opposition to that proposal by the name of argument, because, speaking in all sincerity from my place in this House, I have never heard anything from the other side in opposition to the proposal which deserved the name of argument. If you are pledging your credit or handing over your money for the construction of a great public utility what especially is the object in handing that public utility over to a railway corporation? I am distinguishing sharply, just now, between government ownership and government operation. I am bound to admit that government operation of the Intercolonial has not been very successful, and I do not think we have had, in the past ten years especially, any such object lessons from the operation of the Intercolonial as would suggest that we should move forward along that line until we have demonstrated—as I believe we can demonstrate—that the Intercolonial Railway or any other state-owned railway in Canada can be operated as economically and efficiently as any corporation-owned road in this country or any other. We have not done so up to the present time. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals proposes to take some steps which he believes may result in important advances and benefits, and I sincerely hope and trust that his expectation may be fully realized.

But reverting for a moment to the argument on the point I have just suggested, why should you hand over a great public utility that we have paid for? Why should the government, in 1904, have desired to do that? Is it in the interest of the people of this country that we should hand over all our forests to a private corporation, formed for speculative purposes or for operating purposes? Is it desirable that we should hand over all our water-powers? Is it desirable that we should hand over all our mines and minerals? Is not the true course, the wise policy rather that which is being pursued by the provincial government of Ontario, when it retains its forest wealth and its mineral wealth under such conditions that royalties, bonuses and rentals should be received proportionate to the increasing value of that public domain, as it does increase in value year after year? So it does not seem to me the height of wisdom, to say the least, that the government of this country should have pledged the country's credit, as they did pledge that credit in 1903 and 1904, to almost the whole extent necessary to build this great transcontinental railway, merely for the purpose of handing it over to a private corporation, and so that such private corporation shall enjoy all the fruits, advantages and benefits which may result from the increasing value of that road, when the great west of Canada has a population of 10,000,000, 15,000,000 or perhaps 25,000,000 people. Well, that contract has been made, we cannot undo it now except with the consent of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Railway Company; and I presume it would be rather too much to expect that either one or the other of those companies would be willing to consent to a proposal of that kind.

But it does not seem to me to be too late, when we come to some other considerations, for the government to have regard to the true interest of the people. There are $20,000,000 of preferred stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company still. If we are to finance this road to the further extent of $10,000,000, would it be absolutely out of the question that we should say to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, 'Very good, hand us over $10,000,000 of that preference stock, and we will be very glad indeed to assist this enterprise, because we thoroughly realize the misfortune which would be entailed, not only upon the company but upon the people of this country, if any stoppage should occur in that work.' Let us look at it for a moment. The Grand Trunk Company finances the road to the extent of one-tenth of its total cost, receiving $25,000,000 of common stock. The people of this country finance this road to the extent of nine-tenths of its total cost, to the extent of $275,000,000. Would it be too audacious, would it be trenching too much upon the rights and privileges of railway promoters in this country, if the government of Canada should at this juncture say, 'You are receiving $25,000,000 of common stock for financing this road to the extent of one-tenth of its cost; give us $10,000,000 of preference stock for financing this road to the extent of the remaining nine-tenths of the total cost. Has the government made any proposal of that kind to the Grand Trunk Railway Company? If not, are they absolutely oblivious of what the true interests of the people are?

My hon. friend has spoken during this session of the land grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Does he doubt that the men who were at the back of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at that time, would have taken 75 cents per acre for that land, and been glad to get it in those days? I have it on the best information that they would have been ready and willing to compound their land grant of 25,000,000 acres at 75 cents on the dollar. Why was the land valueless at that time? Because of its inaccessibility. What makes that land valuable at the present time? The building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, founded mainly upon the faith, hope, courage, and foresight of the great statesmen of those days, who realized what the splendid future of that great western country was going to be.

Then it seems to me that there are some other considerations the government might very well have had in mind. I will not allude to all of them just now, because it would be better perhaps that some of those subjects should be adverted to in committee. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance considers this is a banking transaction. If it is to be regarded as a banking transaction, and if we are to take the ground that a government, in conducting a banking transaction with a great railway enterprise of this kind, should make no profit, at least the government ought to keep the people whole; we ought not surely to loan money to the Grand Trunk Pacific at a lower rate of interest than that which we have to pay.

But there is another matter, and I alluded to it in a question which I addressed to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways a day or two ago. I would like to know whether the government has taken into consideration what its position will be with respect to the line from Quebec to Moncton before the completion of the Quebec bridge. In the first place I would like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals whether he is prepared to set any date upon which that bridge is likely to be completed?

Mr. GRAHAM. In reply to my hon. friend, it is impossible to do that until the board have fully completed their plans and have reported them. We have not interfered with them in any way, as we want to put upon them the full responsibility of getting a complete set of plans for the bridge, the building and permanency of which will be absolutely assured. I hope the time will come when we can give that information, but at the present moment I am not able to do so.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Could not the hon. gentleman state an approximate date?

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then I am without any information from the government. But I have been informed by an authority for which I have some respect, that the very earliest date at which that bridge can be completed would be 1915 or 1916. I am informed further—and the Minister of Railways will correct me if I am wrong, because it is a matter of which I have no personal knowledge—I am informed further that the line from Quebec to Moncton will be completed in 1910; so there you will have a period of five or six years at least during which the line from Moncton to Quebec will be upon the hands of the government. The estimates already brought down show that that road will cost about $29,000,000. I am informed on authority for which I have a good deal of regard, that that road will probably cost well up to $35,000,000 before it is completed. But I am not going to argue on that assumption. I will assume that the road will cost $30,000,000. I would ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) or the Prime Minister whether they have at present any idea as to what they would do with the road during that period?

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend can clearly understand that the conditions which have arisen were entirely and wholly unexpected, that they have to be treated as unexpected conditions and cannot very well be criticised from the standpoint of a premeditated arrangement of the government or the country. Conditions having arisen which are wholly unexpected, the government have under consideration the establishment, if it be possible, of a ferry across the river at that point. My hon. friend smiles. Possibly from a practical standpoint he has a right to smile, as he understands some of the difficulties that would ensue.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I was not smiling.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would not at all complain if he did smile.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I thoroughly realize that the government did not anticipate the fall of the Quebec bridge. I do not want my hon. friend to imagine that I do not appreciate the fact that this situation is entirely unexpected. The fact that it is unexpected has left the government face to face with a certain condition, and I think the House ought to be made acquainted with the proposals of the government in this connection, because, while the Grand Trunk Pacific Company is in difficulties with respect to the financing of the prairie section, this government is also in difficulties with respect to the operation of that road for five or six years between Quebec and Moncton. Therefore, when one party to the contract, being in a certain difficulty, comes to the other party to the contract, also in a very considerable difficulty, it might have been regarded as a matter of reasonable prudence that both difficulties should have been considered at the same time and that some arrangement should have been made with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company to lift the government out of the difficulty occasioned by the fall of the Quebec bridge. Has the Minister of Railways and Canals made any estimate of what percentage the interest and depreciation upon the line from Quebec to Moncton will amount to per annum?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am unable to get any information from my hon. friends opposite, but I have endeavoured to obtain some information from outside, and I am informed, upon authority for which I have a good deal of respect, that the interest and depreciation upon that road during those five years will amount to at least 7 per cent per annum, in other words $2,100,000 per annum, or, if you estimate a period of five years, $10,500,000. This country has great resources, but still a condition which involves an amount of that kind during a period of five years might, it seems to me, invite the attention even of my right hon. friend who claims that his soul is turned to higher things than considerations of this kind.

Mr. GRAHAM.

Then I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals, and I am giving him this notice now in order that we may discuss the matter in committee upon the most ample notice, whether or not he imagines that that line from Winnipeg to Moncton, with a ferry across the St. Lawrence river, can be operated as a through line, for the transportation of wheat for example? I have no knowledge upon that subject except that which comes to me from persons who, as I think, are qualified to judge, and they entertain a very great doubt upon the subject, in fact they are rather inclined to laugh at the idea. Would the minister propose to operate his ferry there during the winter? Has he undertaken to consider the expense of that? Does he remember the language to which we listened from a certain hon. gentleman in this House put up by the government in the debates of 1903 and 1904 as their great authority upon this subject? Does he remember that Mr. Charlton, the gentleman to whom I refer, spoke of trains a mile long, hauled over grades not exceeding four-tenths of one per cent, trains which, according to his estimation, would be able to haul grain from Winnipeg to Quebec in competition with water carriage? Does he imagine that these trains a mile long, going over grades of that kind from Winnipeg to Quebec, can be transported across the St. Lawrence in winter and go on to Moncton, and that all this can be done upon a profitable basis according to the view placed before the people of Canada in some of the glowing speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1903 and 1904?

Then there is another consideration. What about the local traffic on the line from Quebec to Moncton? Has my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) any information which would indicate that the local traffic upon that line can be of any appreciable value considering the enormous cost of the road between those two points? If he has any information of that kind I can only say it is entirely dissimilar to any information I have been able to collect from authorities to whom I have applied for information on this subject.

Another consideration in connection with the line from Quebec to Moncton concerns the operation of the road not only before but after the Quebec bridge shall have been built. I gave the government credit, when I spoke on this subject during the present session, for a saving of 29 miles in distance between Quebec and Moncton as compared with the Intercolonial Railway. That was on the government's statement and I am bound to assume that it is a correct statement; if there is any variation from it later on, it will be a matter for criticism. In the debate of 1903, the government claimed that the Intercolonial Railway was wholly unsuitable for transcontinental traffic on account of its excessive grades. Mr. Charlton, who was put up to reply to the criticism of the late Mr. Blair, elaborated this point very fully, as may be seen by any gentleman who will refer to page 8481 of 'Hansard' of 1903. That gentleman then said:

What are the grades on the Intercolonial Railway? There are 62½ feet grades, and 50 foot grades to the mile. No road can claim to be a first-class road with grades more than one-half per cent or 26 feet to the mile. In the construction of this short line——

Because at that time you will remember the Prime Minister estimated that there would be a saving of at least 120 miles in the distance between Quebec and Moncton.

—in the construction of this short line and in the construction of the line from Quebec to Winnipeg it should be an absolute condition that the road should be first-class in point of grades, in point of construction and in point of weight of rails. The object of the building of a short line from Chaudière Junction to Moncton is to correct the costly mistake that the country made when the Intercolonial Railway was constructed.... Why should we shorten, straighten and improve the Intercolonial Railway? It is simply because we have set out with the purpose of securing trade for our own seaports, and if we are to secure that trade we must have the best obtainable conditions with regard to our lines of transportation. We must not have to go away around by the sea 120 miles further than a short line would take us. We must not have grades 62½ feet to the mile, but we must reduce the distance, reduce the grades, improve the efficiency of the road and secure the necessary conditions so far as it is possible to do so in order to get the trade. That, we aim to get.

Now, I understand that the government has obtained this advantage of 29 miles in distance by the adoption of what are called pusher grades. In that connection it is not out of place that I should give to the House what information I have as to the grades of both the Intercolonial Railway and the National Transcontinental Railway between Quebec and Moncton. The Intercolonial Railway follows the St. Lawrence for some two hundred miles east of Quebec to St. Flavie and while it is true it has grades of one per cent at a few points in this distance a large proportion of the two hundred miles is comparatively level road.

From St. Flavie on the St. Lawrence it crosses the summit between the Quebec and New Brunswick waters at an elevation of 751 feet above sea level or 485 feet above St. Flavie and 25 miles in distance therefrom. For the next 150 miles to Gloucester Junction the line follows the Metapedia lake, the Metapedia river and the Bay Chaleur and the grades are exceedingly favourable.

For the next 117 miles to Moncton the line runs nearly at right angles to the river and consequently the grades are not so favourable. There is one summit of 500 feet between Bathurst and Newcastle and three others of about 300 feet each between Newcastle and Moncton.

The National Transcontinental Railway begins to rise directly after leaving Quebec and steadily climbs for about 105 miles to a summit of between 1,400 and 1,500 feet above sea level and then drops 1,000 feet, in the next one hundred and ten miles to Edmundston on the St. John river in New Brunswick, to within 470 feet of sea level.

Then it rises and falls and passes over some considerable summits for about 100 miles when it reaches the Tobique river at an elevation of about 500 feet above sea level. From that point it rises almost continuously to an elevation of about 1,400 feet above sea level at the head waters of the Miramichi river, a distance of 116 miles F. Then it falls about 1,300 feet in 100 miles to an elevation of 100 feet above sea level at the crossing of the Salmon river at Chipman.

From Chipman to Moncton, 56 miles, there are no high summits to cross and altogether the grades on this section are favourable.

In the net result, so far as the National Transcontinental Railway is concerned, there are at least two pusher grades upon that road as I am informed; one against western traffic and one against eastern traffic. One of these is in New Brunswick, it is about 12 mile slong, it is against western traffic, it rises southerly from the Tobique river to the head waters of the Miramichi, the rate of rise being 1 1-10th per cent or 59 feet in the mile, or in all 708 feet. The other pusher grade to which I allude is in the province of Quebec and is with the western traffic and against the eastern traffic. It occurs in getting down from the Quebec summit to the St. John waters; it is of about the same length as the other and the grade is about the same, namely,1 1-10th per cent. I do not know whether these grades have been adopted, but I am placing this information before the Minister of Railways in order that he may correct me if I am wrong and that he may place an exact statement of the position in that regard before the House and before the country. I observe by reference to the National Transcontinental Railway Commissioners' Report for 1907, pages 5 and 6, that there is some comparison of cost between the three surveyed lines between Grand Falls and Chatham, and I assume the one which has been adopted is the central pusher grade which is alluded to in that report. Now, if the comparative merits of the Transcontinental Railway and the Intercolonial Railway between Quebec and Moncton are estimated on the basis which is adopted in the report of the Transcontinental Commissioners for 1907, there are people in this country who have some knowledge of the subject and who are very much of the opinion that the Intercolonial Railway will have the greater advantage of the two roads. What I desire the Minister of Railways to do is to place before parliament during the committee stage on this Bill such full and complete information as to distances, grades, curvatures, and otherwise both on the Intercolonial Railway and on the National Transcontinental Railway between Quebec and Moncton as would enable an expert to make a correct estimate of the cost of haulage over each road. I think that is a fair and reasonable request, and indeed I do not think that I should be obliged to make it, because I would have thought that if the National Transcontinental Railway possesses that abundant merit which the government claim for it in respect to the section between Quebec and Moncton, during the very first days of the present session we should have had exactly such a statement as I now ask to be placed upon the table of the House. And more than that, we should have had expert opinion submitted which would indicate to the people of Canada what advantage they are to receive from the exxpenditure of $30,000,000 of public money upon the line between Quebec and Moncton. I have already asked the Minister of Railways for his estimate as to deterioration and interest on the line between Quebec and Moncton; I have asked for his views as to the local traffic on that line between Quebec and Moncton; I have asked as to the date of the completion of the Quebec bridge.

I now revert to the question which I dwelt upon a moment ago, and that is as to whether or not the government have made any proposal to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company with respect to the operation of the Quebec-Moncton line during the five or six years before the completion of the Quebec bridge. If you look at the statute and contract of 1904 you will find by section 3, that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company is entitled to obtain a lease of any portion of the road which may have been completed in advance of the whole line. I do not find that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company is bound to take a lease of any such portion of the road. I find they are entitled to do it; they have an option there as they have under nearly every one of the provisions of this contract. Thus they are not bound to take it, and therefore the Grand Trunk Pacific Company if they see fit can absolutely decline the operation of that road until the Quebec bridge is completed. That is the contract as I understand it. If hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have a different appreciation of the meaning and effect of that contract, and if they will pledge themselves to this House that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company concurs in any view different from that which I have just now expressed, then of course the question which I am raising goes by the board to a certain extent and has not the importance I am now placing upon it. But as I understand it, the Grand Trunk Pacific Company will not be bound to operate that road until the completion of the Quebec bridge, they being only bound to operate the line as a through line from Winnipeg to Moncton. It would appear that they are not bound to operate it with that link left out. In the very last report of the chief engineer of the Transcontinental Railway, Mr. Lumsden says 'The Quebec bridge is an essential link in the line from Winnipeg to Moncton.' Mark the words 'essential link.' Suppose you take one and a half miles or two miles out of this line anywhere between Moncton and Winnipeg; is the Grand Trunk Pacific bound to operate the two ends of the road or are they only bound to operate the line as a whole. Could they not similarly set up the contention, and will they not set it up, that if you take out of that line one and one-tenth miles at Quebec they cannot operate it as a through line from Winnipeg to Moncton, and in that way may there not be five or six years during which time they will not be obliged to take over this line but leave it upon the hands of the government. Either this is a difficulty or it is not a difficulty; it seems to me to be a difficulty. If it is a difficulty, it is a very serious difficulty which confronts the government of this country. Again I ask, whether or not under the conditions which have been disclosed to the House by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance in introducing this measure, the government have been so occupied with the difficulties of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company that they have absolutely forgotten their own difficulties, and have paid not the slightest attention to the point I am now discussing.

There are just one or two other matters upon which I would like to ask for information from the government, and I give them notice now, so that we may be supplied with it at the earliest possible moment after reaching the committee stage. How is it that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company has been enabled to provide the money for the building of its branch from Port Arthur to its main line without any assistance from the government, and must needs come to the government for assistance upon the prairie section? We all realize that the branch from Port Arthur to the main line of the National Transcontinental Railway is a very important line to the company. We recall the provisions of the contract under which, so far as the disposition of these branch lines is concerned, the result, roughly speaking, is this, that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company can keep what they desire, and compel this country to take the rest. I have no idea that they will ever ask the government of this country to take over the branch from Port Arthur to the main line. That is regarded by people who can speak with authority on the subject, as a key to the operation of the whole Transcontinental Railway system, and it seems rather peculiar that the funds should have fallen short so far as the prairie section is concerned, and that the funds should have been so abundant so far as the branch from Port Arthur to the main line is concerned.

Then, I would like a little more definite reply to the question which has already been proposed across the floor of this House, whether or not the government is prepared to state, in connection with this loan, that it will be the last application for assistance to be made to the people of this country by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, or whether we are to expect a succession of applications for assistance, especially when the construction of the mountain section is begun in earnest. I think the government could not have been so remiss in its duty as not to have put that question fairly and frankly to these gentlemen when they came forward with their application. It is to be presumed that there was some answer, and parliament, while engaged in the consideration of this additional assistance to the amount of $10,000,000, is surely entitled to know what that answer was, and whether this is the last as well as the first application, or whether we are to expect a series of applications covering the whole amount of assistance that will be required in the construction of the mountain section.

As I have said, the country has embarked on this project, it has been ratified by the people of this country as well as by parliament in 1904, and I agree that the work must not stop. If this loan is absolutely necessary, it must be made, in order that the work shall not stop; but in investigating the terms on which that loan shall be made, the interests of the people of this country ought to be considered in respect of the matters which I have brought to the attention of the House, and ought to be conserved and safeguarded to the fullest possible extent.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways). Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat has maintained his reputation very well for giving the government a large order by way of inquiry. We will endeavour to satisfy his appetite in this respect as far as it is at all possible. It seems to be a difficult one to satisfy, as he comes up hungry on every occasion.

Mr. FOSTER. Get your menu card ready.

Mr. GRAHAM. I thought our menu card was pretty comprehensive on previous occasions. However, the hon. gentleman is entitled to all the information we can possibly get. The hon. gentleman asks if there will be any other request from the Grand Trunk Pacific for aid. For myself I am not prepared to say; I would not like to accept the responsibility of what any person might do in the future. But this much my hon. friend ought to consider. He says that this enterprise must not stop, and that if it be necessary to make this loan of $10,000,000, it must be made. Suppose the Grand Trunk Pacific Company said to the government and to this House to-day, 'This is the last time of asking, as well as the first;' and suppose that in a few years they forgot or ignored that and asked us for further aid, would not my hon. friend be in exactly the same position that he is in to-day? Would he not have to say: 'Well, the work has commenced, we are partners in the work to a large extent, we may not like to do it, and you promised that you would not ask us; but if it be necessary to complete the work, we must do it.' That is practically the situation we might be in. Therefore I would not like to express an opinion one way or the other. The conditions have to be taken as they arise; and while we are in hopes that the Grand Trunk Pacific, the great project in which we are all so much interested, will now go on to completion successfully, it would be more than human, it would be approaching the prophetic attributes of a higher power to say what might be in the mind of a railway man a few years hence. My hon. friend remarked that the branch from Superior junction to Fort William had not received any government aid. So far as a guarantee is concerned, that is true. I think it has received a subsidy from this House, and to that extent my hon. friend's information would be incorrect.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I was speaking of applications to the government for assistance.

Mr. GRAHAM. Perhaps I misunderstood my hon. friend's meaning. What he said was that that branch had not received any assistance from the government.

Mr. LENNOX. Had not made any application at the present time for assistance.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is a different matter. Well, we understand the hon. gentleman's meaning now. I want to make it clear to the House, what they understand without an explanation, that few railways of that extent are constructed without coming to the government for aid, and they generally get it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How much did you grant it?

Mr. GRAHAM. The usual government subsidy, and they got something from the Ontario government as well. With reference to the pusher grades east of Quebec, the only object of having good gradients, as I understand it, is for the benefit of transportation. If a condition arises in a particular part of a railway where the use of a pusher grade may be adopted without interfering with transportation, and so as to reduce the cost of the railway, probably it would be right to adopt it. But this much must be borne in mind, that through the long summer months a good deal of the shipment of grain from the west will probably take place through Quebec, and the pusher grade interferes with the transportation only of a very heavy load. The ordinary train does not need to have a pusher to take it over the grade, but it is in developing the transportation problem to the extent of hauling a very large train that a pusher grade is used. I may be asked what a pusher grade means. It simply means a grade where a second engine is used to help to push the train over the summit. East of Quebec there is one pusher grade against east bound traffic and a similar grade against west bound traffic. It is immaterial what are the various meanderings of the railway from this point to another point, from the summit to the depth, except so far as it affects the grade. And notwithstanding the very interesting description of the line, read by my hon. friend, and the various heights it has to climb, it resolves itself into the fact that there are two pusher grades, one against eastbound traffic and the other against westbound traffic. The other facts dwelt on by my hon. friend would simply mean it was an expensive line to build to get rid of the grades. The more uneven the country, the more hills there are to cross, the more mountains to climb and the more valleys to get over, if the grade is to be got rid of, the greater the expenditure in the building and it is true that the expense of building a line in the east is considerable. In district A at the Tobique river there is a pusher grade against the eastbound traffic, for 12·65 miles. That saves in the length of the line 17·2 miles and in the cost of construction approximately nearly $2,000,000.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the grade there?

Mr. LENNOX.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think my hon. friend described it properly.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. One and one-tenth?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think that is right. In district B near the New Brunswick boundary, there is one against the westbound traffic, 10·7 miles long, said to save a distance of about 18 miles, and a saving in expense of over a million dollars.

Mr. AMES. What would be the total length of the road between Quebec and Moncton provided the pusher grades were eliminated and the grade was what was originally expected?

Mr. GRAHAM. There might not be any difference in length if they went to the expense of getting over the pusher grade by cuttings or fillings at that particular point.

Mr. AMES. I understand that the elimination of these two pusher grades would add 35 miles to the length.

Mr. GRAHAM. If you got rid of the pusher grade by making a circuit, by going around the acclivity and adding to the length, that might happen.

Mr. AMES. That would make the road six miles longer than the Intercolonial Railway, would it not?

Mr. GRAHAM. We may go on figuring out if this should be the case, and if the other is the case, the following will be the result; but I have not admitted my hon. friend's starting point. If you went round another hill or two, you would make the road considerably longer.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Was the grade I mentioned correct?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think so. The only question is whether to accept the two pusher grades, considering the traffic from Quebec to Moncton, with the saving that would involve, or remove them. The engineer reports that it is better in those instances to have the pusher grades and save the money.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Are there any pusher grades on the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. There would be if we had the very large trains these are intended to haul, when they have the western traffic of the Grand Trunk Pacific. There are three very steep grades, as my hon. friend has remarked, on the Intercolonial Railway. There is one at the Bedford grade, 1·80, at Folleigh, 1·22, at Metis, 1·29. These might be called pusher grades.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. That is in both directions.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. How many west and how many east?

Mr. GRAHAM. I could not tell that at the moment.

Mr. LENNOX. Has the minister any actual report from the engineers that they could have avoided those pusher grades in any way except by lengthening the line some 35 miles?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not got them at hand.

Mr. LENNOX. Has the hon. minister any such report?

Mr. GRAHAM. That would be a report from Mr. Lumsden, and my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, has the three reports to which the hon. gentleman refers. Now, we come to the Quebec bridge. It is easy enough, under present conditions, to raise all kinds of criticisms as to the effect of the destruction of the Quebec bridge. But this House is supposed to be composed of practical men, who are not following shadows. No doubt, the collapse of the bridge was a great calamity and we have to face the results. There is no escape from the situation by raising all kinds of possible objections and pointing out the result of the calamity. We admit at once that it was a calamity, and the inconvenience it will cause, and the difficulties which have arisen, are not to be minimized. I do not quite agree with my hon. friend, although I will not say, speaking from memory, that he is altogether wrong, when he says that the Grand Trunk Pacific will not be compelled to operate the eastern section without the Quebec bridge. The question of the Quebec bridge being a link in the railway is indisputable, so far as the operation of the railway is concerned, but it does not follow that it is a part of the railway itself. The bridge was undertaken before the railway project was outlined, and there would have been a Quebec bridge had there never been a transcontinental railway. But for practical purposes, and for the operation of the line, the bridge is an integral part of the railway.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. Under the contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific, are you obliged to build the Quebec bridge?

Mr. GRAHAM. I would not put it as strongly as that, but that is the understanding.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. Is it in the contract?

Mr. GRAHAM. Possibly it is. But the Quebec bridge was to be constructed without any Grand Trunk Pacific contract and was undertaken before that railway was thought of. Consequently that does not add to the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Quebec bridge would have been built had there been no contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific. My hon. friend may be sure the government has not at all overlooked the difficulties arising on account of the absence of the Quebec bridge. Not only will that bridge be finished as rapidly as possible, but the difficulties which are arising and which will continue to arise, owing to its not being completed as early as was anticipated, are not being overlooked by the government. Coming to the question of the Grand Trunk Pacific, my hon. friend has outlined that project at great length, and he made one statement, which I think is perhaps the keystone of the whole situation. He said that the government or the country is a partner with the railway company in this great project. My hon. friend makes it a greater partner than, I think, he is entitled to make it, when he names its proportions of holdings as nine-tenths, or ninety per cent. But that is immaterial; the foundation of the request for the loan and the granting of it by this government is that the Dominion of Canada is a partner with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in the carrying out of this great project. It is our project as well as theirs, and the interests of Canada and the Canadian people are paramount even to the interest of the railway company in the completion of this line.

Now, this leads me to one or two questions that have arisen. My hon. friend will pardon me if I go back for a moment. The question has been discussed in this House, and has been referred to mildly to-day of the necessity of this road. My hon. friend agrees that there was a necessity for the construction of this line. Let me look for a moment at the remarks made by the Prime Minister in 1903 when he was introducing this measure, and see if there is any part of these remarks which should be retracted by the Prime Minister or by any member of the government or of this House on his behalf. He said that a railway was a national as well as a commercial necessity.

Mr. FOSTER. 'A railway.'

Mr. GRAHAM. 'A railway.' And my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) will remember that by 'a railway' he meant, not a line from North Bay westward, but a line from the eastern part of Canada to the western part of Canada all the way on Canadian soil. No person will say to-day, looking at it from a national standpoint, that Canada was not justified and is not now justified in pushing this project to completion as rapidly as possible. Our position as a country is something of which we should be proud. Some hon. members, properly, grew eloquent over the defences of Canada, the necessity for being prepared to defend Canada against intruders who would attempt to molest her trade, or interfere with her freedom and happiness, or drag her from the position she holds in the British empire. Sir, taking it from that standpoint, one of the first things necessary was a line of railway on Canadian soil over which troops could be carried without interference.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. We had that already.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will my hon. friend (Mr. George Taylor) tell me where?

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. The Intercolonial from the sea-board to Montreal and the Canadian Pacific from Montreal to the Pacific coast.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is two lines of railway. My hon. friend is partially correct, but very much wrong.

Mr. LENNOX. And practically all right.

Mr. GRAHAM. As I said before, and my hon. friend cannot contradict it, we had not a great line of railway from eastern Canada to western Canada over which Canadian and British troops could be carried from one ocean to another without passing over foreign soil. This is looking at the question from the national standpoint. But, after all, that is only minor, to my mind. From the commercial standpoint it was necessary to have another through line. This House and this country may think I am altogether too optimistic, but I believe when this line is completed it will be taxed to its utmost capacity with the carrying trade of Canada and the carrying trade from the Orient to Europe. I believe that before many years are over we shall have to look for greater transportation facilities in order to accommodate the increasing trade of this great country. Sir, the words of the Prime Minister are not to be taken back, they stand to-day not only true but fortified by the events that have taken place since they were spoken in 1903. Let me point out one or two things showing the necessity for this road from a commercial standpoint, and as showing the prospects for its success as a transcontinental line. The annual output of coal in the west now is about 4,000,000 tons. A good authority estimates —and I think he is within the mark—that thirty years hence there will be at least 50,000,000 tons of coal to be transported in the west. In the valley of the Saskatchewan, there are about 200,000,000 acres of land, and in the valley of the Mackenzie about 55,000,000 acres. Thirty years ago there were no wheat fields in that vicinity, and scarcely a hamlet in the valley of the Saskatchewan or the valley of the Mackenzie. Let hon. members think of the west as it is to-day and of the west as it was thirty years ago, and then prophesy, if they can, what, a few years hence, this great and growing west will be, if we do our duty and give the people we are bringing in there proper facilities for getting their products to market. These plains produce to-day, it is no extravagant estimate to say, 100,000,000 bushels of grain yearly.

Now, let me point out the bearing of that as showing the great part that Canada is to play, as I believe, in feeding the nations of the world. The world's population, it is estimated, doubles in fifty years, and the present population of the world is 1,700,000,000 people. We may believe that, in the next fifty years, there will be added to the world's population at least 900,000,000 people. But, while the world's population is increasing, man cannot add one acre to the land on the face of the earth. We may discover other wheat fields, we may open up territory that is now lying waste and make it productive in years to come, but the fact remains that poor humanity cannot create one acre of land. So, while the consumption and the demand go on increasing, the land for the production of food remains what it is to-day. Now, Sir, to-day half the population of the world never see any flour of wheat. It is estimated that there are fully 100,000,000 white people who never get enough flour to eat. The demand for this flour among these people is continually growing, and there is this demand to be allowed for as the demand arising out of the increase of population in this and other countries. To-day, the prospects are, Canada will be the main wheat field of the world. Should there be any pessimism in the outlook in the minds of people who are to-day and will be in the future the proprietors of those fields which must feed the people of the world? As the west develops and these millions of acres become productive, Canada will be, to a large extent, the world's granary. I point this out to impress on the minds of the people of Canada that in our conduct of public affairs, in our dealings with just such questions as this, we must ever keep in mind not the present only, but the great future and the development of the mighty heritage Providence has given us. For, with all our criticism of one another, this stands true, that the Canadian people to-day have one of the most productive countries in the world. Should we hesitate? Should we not have courage in carrying out this great undertaking that the people of Canada have twice said should be carried out? We may disagree on details, as men of common sense will always disagree. I appeal to western representatives as well as eastern: Should we not approach such questions as these with the larger outlook of what Canada is to be in the future? I believe that I will live, if I reach the ordinary span of life, to see Canada, and the west particularly, developed to such an extent that we who now look back fifteen or twenty years and think the development has been great, will be astonished at the increase that will have taken place in the next few years.

Sir, we talk about wheat. Fifteen years ago we sold our wheat for 50 cents, to-day wheat is worth $1.20. Some person may say: That is only the result of a panic, or a corner. I believe that wheat will continue to move upward. It may have its reverses through adverse circumstances; owing to the fact that the wheat producing area is limited, and the consumption is ever increasing, millions of bushels more will be required every year. Sir, I believe that the world, and Canada, has seen the last of cheap wheat, that the price will continue to advance, and I believe that in a few years hence we will be discussing wheat from a $1.50 standpoint rather than $1 standpoint. With this end in view, it seems to be our duty to the people whom we induced to come in and develop our country, to allow them to get their products to the markets of the world in the speediest possible way, at the lowest price, and in the best possible condition. But some one will say: 'Has the bringing of this railway into the Northwest helped any?' I believe that the projected line has already made a marked improvement in the condition of the western people so far as transportation facilities are concerned. I had intended to place on the table of the House a railway map of 1905 and a railway map of 1909, to let hon. gentlemen see just the number of homesteads that have been taken up in that country since the Grand Trunk Pacific project was introduced into this House. But you say: 'The other railways did that.' Certainly. I wanted also to point out the number of branch lines shown on the map, belonging tc other railway companies that were not there when the Grand Trunk Pacific project was first introduced. You ask me what has that to do with the Grand Trunk Pacific? It has this to do, and every practical man knows, every man from the west, and every man who has been in the Railway Committee of this House, will bear me out in saying that the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific was to go through certain portions of the west induced other great companies to extend their branch lines in every possible direction in order to compete with the Grand Trunk Pacific. If the Grand Trunk Pacific never carried a pound of freight from the west to the east or from the east to the west, the launching of that project has been to a large extent justified by the improved facilities that other lines have given to the people on account of the proposed construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific. But you ask me: 'Have not the people come in along the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific?' Let me point out a thing or two in that connection. In a carefully prepared statement of Mr. R. E. Young, superintendent of railway lands for the Department of the Interior, he estimates that 15,389 homesteads have been taken up in a belt of 12 miles on either side of the Grand Trunk Pacific, 15,389 homesteads on a strip of land 24 miles wide, 12 on either side of the railway, or on a belt of land 8 miles less on each side than were exempted from taxation under the old contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. AMES. Since how long?

Mr. GRAHAM. Since the projection of the Grand Trunk Pacific. My hon. friend should know that people go ahead of the line, when they once discover in what direction it will run. As a direct result of the Grand Trunk Pacific, to say nothing of the branch lines, to say nothing of the general influx that has been taking place in other parts of that country, since the projection of this line, on 12 miles on each side of the railway 15,389 homesteads have been taken up, equal to 2,461,928 acres. If I had time to go into the details, I might figure out what the cultivation of 2,461,928 acres means to the people of the west, if no more were taken up.

Mr. AMES. You might also figure out how large a porportion of these homesteads are within a nearer distance of another parallel line of railway.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend will remember that this parallel line of railway was there before, but the people were not; and he will remember the fact that they went there because they are to have the Grand Trunk Pacific competition, which they otherwise would not have had. Now, Sir, we have also prepared a statement of the population, and I trust the House will not weary with me if I give it, because it has a bearing on the advisability of seeing that this project is put through with all necessary speed. In 1906, Manitoba had 365,688; in 1908, 462,569. In 1906, Saskatchewan had 257,763; in 1908, 335,721. In 1906, Alberta had 185,413; in 1908, 265,820. This shows an increase of over 25 per cent. Sir, with the population of the west increasing so rapidly, this government could not hesitate, if the proposition of the Grand Trunk Pacific were less favourable than it is, and the people of this country would not allow us to hesitate, in seeing to it that nothing is left undone to give proper facilities to this ever increasing population.

Now, I think I have shown fairly well that the words of my right hon. friend, the leader of the government, in introducing this project into the House have been more than justified by the influx of people into the west. A great deal has been said about the cost of the line, and that seems to be the chief complaint made against this project. We even find our friends from the west complaining that we are building lines that are too poorly constructed, that will not carry the traffic they have, the bridges of which are not strong enough, the rails of which are not heavy enough, the ballast of which is not well enough placed, the curvature and grades of which are not of the proper kind. Sir, that is not the criticism that we hear of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The only criticism we hear of this Grand Trunk Pacific line from railway men is that we are building it of too high a standard, that it would be better to build it of a lower standard and improve it as the years went by. That is one method of building railways, but I think I will be able to show that that would be poor economy. I think the best economy is to build a line that will be able to carry its full freight, at the proper price, the first day a train is run over it, rather than to carry small trains and be obliged to improve the road year after year, robbing it of its income, as well as its capital expenditure, and getting, perhaps, after 20 years, as good a road as we now mean to make it on the first day it is run. Now the question of cost comes in.

I need not again traverse in detail the statement made time and again as to the increased cost of material and wages, the higher standard of the road and the benefits to be derived. I know my hon. friend will say: Yes, the road is of a very high standard, but the people of Canada were told in 1903 that it was to be of the standard of the line of the Grand Trunk Railway between Montreal and Toronto. Sir, the standard of the Transcontinental line is a higher standard than the standard of the Grand Trunk Railway between Montreal and Toronto. The grades are less and in every respect the standard is as high and in some respects higher than that of the Grand Trunk between those two cities at the time this contract was made. Some people will say: 'Yes, but they have laid steel rails of 100 pounds to the yard and double tracked the line between Toronto and Montreal.' But there were no steel rails of 100 pounds to the yard at the time the contract was made and the specification in the contract as to the standard referred to conditions then existing. Any man who has travelled from Montreal to Toronto on the Grand Trunk line knows that it is one of the best lines on the continent, and will agree that this is a very high standard, but as far as grades are concerned, it is not as high as the Transcontinental line between Moncton and Winnipeg or even Moncton and the eastern side of the Rocky mountains.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would not answer the hon. gentleman in the way he suggests, because I have quoted already the language of the Minister of Finance in 1903 or 1904 when he said he was estimating on a four-tenth per cent grade. He will find that language at page 3687 of this year's 'Hansard.'

Mr. GRAHAM. The contract, I think, will bear out my statement that the standard was to be the standard of the Grand Trunk Railway between Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is quite so, but I was speaking of the estimates.

Mr. GRAHAM. A good deal has been said about the estimates. Mr. Schreiber's estimate was made in 1903 before the contract was made. Whatever difference of opinion there may be, there is no doubt that Mr. Schreiber had not in his mind the high standard which the country has exacted in making the contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific, but rather had in mind a road like the Intercolonial Railway with its gradients and lighter rail, of 65 pounds instead of 80 pounds. But there are other factors which tend to increase the cost. Labourers' wages, which were $1.25 to $1.50 per day at that time have increased to $2.25. Ties, which were 25 cents and 28 cents, have increased to 50 and 60 cents. Timber and lumber for use in culverts, trestles, &c., has increased from 30 and 32 cents to 38 cents and 40 cents. Steel rails have increased in price from $25 or $28 a ton in 1903 to $35 or $36 in 1908 and a duty has been added since then of some $7 per ton. Then the rails used, instead of being 65 pounds are 80 pounds to the yard, a difference of 23 tons to the mile. These facts account for a portion at least of the increase in the cost of the road.

I do not wish to go further with this comparison but to simply point out that the cost of all kinds of material and labour has increased and that the road is of a higher standard than was anticipated by Mr. Schreiber. Further than that, I make the statement without any fear of contradiction that for a transcontinental line or one approaching a transcontinental line the standard of the Grand Trunk Pacific is the highest on the continent of America. Of the mountain section about 100 miles is under construction and a good deal of difference of opinion exists as to its cost. I have an opinion by a gentleman who I think has a fairly good knowledge of the conditions, that he believes that the mountain section, with the exception of one or two points, will not average a higher cost than the cost of the Lake Superior pertion of the eastern section. He believes the construction is not any heavier in the greater part of the mountain section than it is in portions of the eastern section being built by the government. The suggestion that it would cost $100,000 per mile is altogether out of reason.

Mr. J. HAGGART. The minister must see that in order to understand that, we must have an idea as to what the eastern section would cost.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend will find that information in returns I have brought down as to the different sections. I have the contract price according to sections.

But, speaking of the advanced cost, is this the only line, is this the only project in which the cost has greatly exceeded the estimate? I need not refer to large undertakings, I need only refer any hon. gentleman who has built a house to his own experience. If he looks up his accounts he will find that the house has cost him a good deal more than he estimated. I wish to make one other comparison. We have heard the Panama canal quoted as a sample of what could be done and the economies that could be effected by the appointment of a good commission. In speaking of the cost of building the Transcontinental Railway by a commission, the question of the personnel of such a commission would naturally come under review. I wish to point out that in the criticisms of the Transcontinental Commission I have not yet found anything which would lead me to believe that this commission have not performed and are not performing their work in an able and conscientious manner. When the American government undertook the construction of the Panama canal, they selected certain commissioners who were said to be very efficient. But these commissioners remained only a short time, they were not allowed to complete the canal, and were replaced by other men. The men who replaced them were again replaced by other men so that a comparison of the selection of commissions on the Panama canal and on the Transcontiental Railway does not reflect discredit on the Transcontinental Commission. The commission now entrusted with the construction of the Panama canal is composed of military engineers on the staff of the United States War Department, with the addition of one or two other men, and it is now directly under government control. Being members of the military staff the present Panama Canal Commission are not so open to criticism and fault-finding and tale-bearing, if I might use that expression, they are under more thorough discipline both as to work and talk than they otherwise would be.

As to the cost of the Panama canal, may I point out that with all the care that was exercised by the first commission, the second commission and lastly the government commission, the original estimate will be greatly exceeded. The first estimate for the Panama canal was $140,000,000. The sum did not include the purchase price of $50,000,000 nor the cost of sanitation and civil government of the canal zone, $27,000,000. By putting all this in—which for argument sake might be compared if omitted to omitting the Quebec bridge from the Canadian project—by putting all this in we have $217,000,000. But the board of experts with Mr. Taft reported in February, 1909, that the cost would be not $217,000,000, but $360,000,000, or an increase of $143,000,000. And Colonel Boutelle, chief engineer, before the House committee on appropriations placed the estimate not at $360,000,000 but at $375,000,000, and if we take the interest during construction as is taken in the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific, we will find that the Panama canal project which has been cited as an example, of economy and good management was at first estimated to cost $217,000,000, and that the present estimate when it is not merely completed, is $400,000,000 or nearly twice as much as the original estimate. I will cite some other instances to show to the country that all this talk about increased cost over the estimate is not peculiar to the National Transcontinental Railway alone but is common to every project private or public in this or any other country. The New York Erie barge canal was estimated in 1899 to cost $61,536,788, but two years afterwards the board of experts estimated the cost at $94,000,000, a difference of $32,764,484 or an increase between 1899 and 1901 of something over 50 per cent. But in 1903, two years later again, the state engineer revised that estimate and raised it from $94,000,000 to $100,562,993, and in chapter 147 of the laws of New York you will find an act authorizing them to borrow $100,000,000 for this canal which originally was estimated to cost $61,000,000. And, if we include the interest as is done in the case of the National Transcontinental Railway it is safe to say that the Erie barge canal which was estimated to cost $61,000,000 will exactly cost $125,000,000, or more than 100 per cent extra.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. You must estimate the interest in both cases.

Mr. LENNOX. That should be a warning against your predictions.

Mr. GRAHAM. It should be a warning against any hon. gentleman citing the Panama canal as an example.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Surely the Minister of Railways does not pretend to say that the engineering work on the Transcontinental Railway can be compared in difficulty with the engineering work on the Panama canal.

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. gentleman will understand that the engineers of the Panama canal were engaged as experts to give the people of the country an estimate of what it would cost including all the engineering difficulties. Let me point out further that taking the details day in and day out, the difficulty of estimating a line through the Rock mountains and from one end of Canada to the other is approximately as great as estimating the cost of the Panama canal, and I think you will find some competent engineers who will say it is more difficult to estimate the cost of the Transcontinental Railway. Now, Sir, I want to make this statement which may be considered a strong statement, and I want it to be considered strong; I say that not only will we have the highest standard transcontinental line on this continent, but we will have a line that will cost no more than any line similarly situated under like circumstances which has been built anywhere during the last 15 years. Let me cite as an example the cost of one or two other lines of railway. The Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Company are building a line from Evarts, South Dakota, to Seattle, Washington, 1,500 miles long. They started that line about the same time as the Transcontinental Railway and the maximum grade is 52 feet to the mile as compared with 21 feet on the National Transcontinental Railway. It is estimated that road will cost over $60,000 per mile on the authority of the 'Financial Chronicle,' and a large portion of that road is through territory, I am informed by engineers, comparatively speaking on a par with the prairie section of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. AMES. What will their prairie section cost?

Mr. GRAHAM. If I were to make the statement as strong as my informant makes it, I would say that it is nearly all prairie section, but I would not like to say that.

Mr. AMES. Surely it has to pass through the Rocky mountains to reach Seattle.

Mr. FOSTER. It can't get there any other way.

Mr. AMES. It is certainly not all prairie.

Mr. GRAHAM. I certainly admit that it will have to run through the Rocky mountains.

Mr. BURRELL. Between what points did you say the line ran?

Mr. GRAHAM. From Evarts, South Dakota, to Seattle.

Mr. BURRELL. You will not find much prairie section there.

Mr. GRAHAM. My statement is on the authority of engineers who say they have been over that territory. At all events the cost of that road is $60,000 per mile as given by the 'Financial Chronicle' which is considered to be an absolute authority.

Mr. HUGHES. Do not the Rocky mountains intervene between these two points?

Mr. GRAHAM. Most assuredly they do. Nature has not removed the mountains, and I do not attempt to make a prairie section over the mountain portion. The Western Pacific is building a line from Salt Lake City, Utah, to San Francisco, California, 929 miles, and although the maximum grade is 52 feet to the mile as against our 21 feet, that road will cost over $70,000 per mile.

Mr. AMES. All in the mountains.

Mr. GRAHAM. Not all in the mountains.

Mr. AMES. With a cut-off across Salt lake.

Mr. GRAHAM. Approximately speaking my hon. friend may say that a large portion of that line is in the Rocky mountains but it is not all in the mountains.

Mr. AMES. What about the cut-off?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have simply given a statement as to the cost of that line on the authority of a financial paper that is a standard authority. My object in referring to this is to show that these railroads have cost much more than the estimate. But, take the new Canadian Pacific Railway from Sudbury to Toronto and you will find a similar condition. It was estimated that line would cost about $30,000 per mile, and I want to read an extract from the annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1907 to its shareholders, which no doubt will be taken as an authority by hon. gentlemen opposite:

> In 1894 you authorized your directors to proceed with the construction of a railway from a point in the vicinity of Sudbury to Kleinburgh on the Ontario division in order to provide entirely under your own control a line between Toronto and the main line, and to meet the cost you empowered your directors to issue and dispose of consolidated debenture stock of the company to such amount as they might deem expedient but not exceeding in the aggregate $30,000 per mile of the railway to be constructed. Owing to the difficult character of the country and the increased cost of labour and material the expense involved in the construction of this line exceeded the original estimate, and therefore you will be asked to authorize the issue and sale of such further amount of 4 per cent consolidated debenture stock as your directors may deem necessary to complete the work, but not exceeding $10,000 per mile of the miles constructed.

From this it will be seen that although this was a short line, under the eye of everybody, with a large portion of it running through a settled portion of the country, and although the estimate was made by the engineering staff of the Canadian Pacific Railway than which there is no more competent staff in the country, yet in the case of that short line they discovered in a year or two that they had made a mistake of 33⅓ per cent in the estimate of the cost of construction. Now, I want to point out one or two other things.

My hon. friend has said that the Grand Trunk is really the Grand Trunk Pacific. I am not going to argue that with my hon. friend, because these two companies are in the position of many other companies in this country, that the same men are in two companies with interests largely identical, but assets and liabilities distinct and separate. Many men in this House are in the same position themselves, and they would not care to have the assets and liabilities of one company attached to those of the other. I might call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that two of the largest companies in Canada in that position have had one of the largest law-suits ever known in this country; I refer to the Dominion Coal Company and the Dominion Iron and Steel Company. Though the same persons are largely interested in both companies, they found it necessary to go to law in order to have the rights of the two companies determined.

Referring to the amount of stock in the Grand Trunk Pacific owned by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, I think it would be only fair to read a short statement made by Mr. Wainwright, and add to that the statement made by the Minister of Finance in the House the other day, and let these two be recorded together. Mr. Wainwright says:

At confederation the Grand Trunk owed the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada a principal sum of $15,142,000 with accrued interest to the amount of $10,465,000, making the total indebtedness $25,607,000. The debt was taken over by the Dominion in 1867, but since then has not been carried as an asset. It originated in an advance of provincial debentures by the government of Upper and Lower Canada to the following portions of the Grand Trunk between 1854 and 1861:—

St. Lawrence and Atlantic division.	$ 2,275,000
Quebec and Richmond division.. ..	1,217,000
Grand Trunk elsewhere..	11,650,000
Total..	$15,142,000

These debentures bore 6 per cent interest. They were issued as a first lien on the road but by subsequent legislation were put behind other liens ; and as the net earnings of the company have never met all the prior charges, no part of the interest on the debentures has ever been payable to the government. The old Northern and the old Great Western roads likewise received loans; but the circumstances surrounding the construction of the Grand Trunk were so unique that its loan would cut a very different figure in a court of morals.

The original prospectus of the Grand Trunk, promising the holders of ordinary stock a dividend of 11½ per cent per annum after the stated interest on the bonds had been paid, were issued with the quasi-official endorsation of the government of old Canada. The ordinary stock amounts in round figures to $110,000,000. But the British holders have never received a dollar in dividends from that day to this.

The statement of the Minister of Finance, in answer to the hon. member for Leeds, was as follows:

INDEBTEDNESS OF GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY TO DOMINION GOVERNMENT.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR asked:

1. In what amount, if any, is the Grand Trunk Railway Company indebted to the Dominion of Canada?

2. How much is owing for principal and interest, respectively, upon the said indebtedness?

3. How many years' interest is due?

4. On what date was interest last paid?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance):

This deals with a very old and complicated account. It might be more convenient to put it as a motion for return, but as I thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. George Taylor) might regard it as having a bearing on proposals of this ssesion, I have brought down the answer:

1, 2, 3 and 4. In the year 1862, five years prior to confederation, a reorganization of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada was effected under chapter 56 of the Statutes of Canada of that year.

Provincial debentures of the provinces of Canada to the amount of $15,142,633.34 had been issued, prior to the passing of this Act, in aid of the company. These debentures carried interest at the rate of six per cent per annum.

By section 19, of the chapter referred to, the province of Canada consented to allow its claim for interest due and accruing in respect of these debentures to be postponed to the payment of certain charges which were made prior by the statute. The section provided that after the payment of the working expenses of the railway the balance of earnings was to be appropriated and applied in payment:—(a) of interest on equipment mortgage bonds; (b) of interest on first preferential bonds and the dividend due on first preference stock; (c) of interest due on second preferential bonds and the dividend due on second preference stock; (d) of dividend due on third preference stock; (e) of dividend due on fourth preference stock; (f) of dividend of 3 per cent per annum for ten years on the ordinary stock of the company and thereafter at the rate of 5 per cent per annum; (g) of further dividend on one per cent per annum on the third preference stock; (h) of further dividend of one per cent per annum on the fourth preference stock; (all the above were given priority over the government claim for interest); and then: (i) in payment of the interest for the time being due and accruing, subsequent to the 1st January, 1862, on the provincial debentures issued in aid of the company, before the passing of the Act, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

The interest on the provincial debentures referred to amounted, at the time of confederation, to $10,457,458.01. Amounts, represented by these province of Canada debentures, $15,142,633.34 and this interest of $10,457,458.01 were, at confederation, taken over by the Dominion from the province of Canada, and have since then carried in the balance sheet without change under the heading 'Railway Accounts,' but these amounts have not been included in the statement of assets of the Dominion.

As the net earnings of the company never met all the prior charges, as provided by the Act, no part of this interest has ever been payable.

There was also carried in the province of Canada accounts and taken over at confederation a special interest claim of $7,302.18, which has been continued in the balance sheet. This special interest claim arose from an adjusted balance of various accounts made between the province of Canada and the Grand Trunk Railway Company which balance was confirmed by an order in council of the 18th October, 1866.

Besides the above, the province of Canada was, at the time of confederation, the holder of fourth preference stock of the company, (converted, by section 11, chapter 18, Act of 1873, into third preference stock), of the par value of $121,739.65. Dividends have been paid to the Dominion on this stock on several occasions as follows:

During year	1881	$ 608 70
"	1883	1,643 48
"	1884	1,978 26
"	1902	1,217 40
"	1903	2,434 80
"	1905	2,434 80
"	1906	3,652 20
"	1907	3,652 20

This fourth preference stock was accepted by the province of Canada in payment of a certain part of the accounts adjusted by the order in council referred to.

Coming now to the loan, which is the subject of the Bill before the House, the whole question is this—not what has the Transcontinental Commission done between Moncton and Winnipeg, not what has the government done, not whether the Quebec bridge has fallen down, not whether the gradients of the eastern section of the Grand Trunk Pacific are pusher grades or four-tenths of one per cent or six-tenths of one per cent, not whether the ferry will be run at Quebec, not whether there will be local traffic on the Transcontinental east of Quebec. The question before the House and the country is: Under the conditions existing, is it in the interest of the people of Canada to grant a loan of $10,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company? I say most unhesitatingly it is. My hon. friend says we ought to ask them for $10,000,000 of preference bonds. I say we are not presenting the Grand Trunk Pacific Company with anything. We are allowing them to issue bonds, which we will take as security, guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, and we will hold those bonds, as the Minister of Finance has remarked, merely as security for the payment of this loan; and if on the issue of these bonds they were put on the market and sold, all the liability the government has and all the risk it is taking is the difference between what they would sell at and their par value. We are not giving the company a loan without security; we are not taking security on a piece of railway either; but we are taking security which is guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, which, if it is getting so much as hon. gentlemen say, if it is being placed in such a position of affluence and wealth as they represent, is gilt edge security for this loan. It should be remembered too that the stock which my hon. friend proposes as security would only be valuable after the bonds held by the government are provided for. The government, as I have said, is a partner in this great undertaking, and no matter what the conditions might be, the Dominion of Canada could not allow the Grand Trunk Pacific project to fail. It has undertaken it, and what Canada has undertaken Canada is prepared to carry out, whether this government or hon. gentlemen opposite are in power. As they deemed it wise when in power to come to the aid of the Canadian Pacific Railway, although they had aided it bountifully in the first place, so I believe they will not take the position that it would be wise on the part of the Dominion of Canada at the present moment to refuse to grant the request of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, for in granting that request we are making secure the carrying out of a project in which the hon. leader of the opposition himself said we have nine-tenths interest while they have one-tenth.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If we are partners, why don't we get some of the stock?

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend forgets the principle upon which aid has been given to railways in the Dominion of Canada. Did we get any stock in the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. NORTHRUP. We were not partners.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, we are partners, speaking broadly. Why was the Canadian Pacific Railway aided if it was not in the interest of the people?

Mr. NORTHRUP. Who said anything about interest of the people? My hon. friend must not put in my lips words which I did not utter. I said not a word about interest of the people. I said we were not partners with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. GRAHAM. If the country was not a partner with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the benefits it was receiving from the railway, then the people of Canada gave the Canadian Pacific Railway Company benefits for which it got no return.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Does the minister believe that?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not believe it, but my hon. friend tries to get around it by a play on words. He has great ability, I know, in the use of language; but I do not propose to let him get away with a play on words. The people of Canada are partners in every railway that helps the development of the country; if they are not, they have no right to aid railways. Do we aid railways for the amount of stock we are going to get in them? No. We give them money, municipalities give them bonuses, provincial governments give them subsidies—and sometimes land grants, as in Ontario during the last few weeks—provincial governments guarantee their bonds, Dominion governments guarantee their bonds. This government gave the Canadian Pacific Railway 25,000,000 acres of land, a large stretch of line already constructed and $25,000,000 of money; and if that does not make the country a partner with the company, then nothing at all can make a partnership so far as the development of Canada is concerned. When I speak of a partnership, I do not mean a partnership which provides that the government must get stock for stock and share for share, but a partnership in this respect, that our interests run parallel with those of the railways in the development of the country, and in order to get that development and to benefit ourselves we grant aid in different ways to the construction of railways, and thus in the broad sense become partners with them, are responsible to the people of Canada and the British empire for the development of this part of the empire. We give a certain amount of aid.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Who are the 'we'?

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend is one of them. We are the people of Canada.

Mr. NORTHRUP. But my hon. friend says: We are responsible to the people of Canada; and then he says we are the people of Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM. If my hon. friend disputes that he is one of the 'we,' I will excuse him.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I hope I am. But I want my hon. friend to explain what he means when he says: We are responsible to the people and we are the people.

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, I will give another example that perhaps is a better one. I will take my hon. friend the leader of the opposition and say that he is representing the other 'we.' We, the representatives of the people in this House, are responsible to the people of Canada for the development of this country.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Certainly, but I do not see anything about partnership in that.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not going to get away any further from the point, even though it may displease my hon. friend to find that he is unable to draw me any from the question under discussion.

Mr. NORTHRUP. You could not.

Mr. GRAHAM. Not from what is really a good example. I do not think any one has misunderstood me. In speaking of partnership, I mean distinctly, and I have said it in this House before, that you cannot disassociate the interests of the transportation companies from the interests of the people. We aid them in order to benefit ourselves. We aid the transportation companies and become, practically speaking, partners in the construction of railways and canals and in all those things which procure for the people the benefit of transportation facilities, and in which we have invested the public money.

Mr. SPROULE. In a sense, we own part of this road, and the company owns the other part.

Mr. GRAHAM. We do own 1,800 miles of this road, and we do not own a mile of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We have an interest in the development of transportation, and although we do not get a return in cash for the aid we give, if we do not get value otherwise, then the policy of this country in aiding the building of railways has been a lamentable failure. Every mile of railway that we add to our transportation facilities adds that much to the facilities of getting our goods to market and enables our people to get higher prices for their products, and the return we are to get from the construction of this line, as in the case of the others, is not the amount of stock we are to procure or the money to go into the exchequer, but the benefit that will go into the pockets of the people from the improvements of their transportation facilities.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will my hon. friend allow me? The idea originally expressed by Mr. Hays, the president of the Grand Trunk Railway, was to this effect, that we were partners of the Grand Trunk Railway, and as both the Grand Trunk Railway and the country were supporting the enterprise and might in that sense be regarded as partners, both and not one partner alone, should be entitled to some share of the profit, the direct profit.

Mr. GRAHAM. I was not dealing with the partnership from that standpoint but we aid all railways, the only difference being that in this project that aid is given in a different form. But in the one form or the other, we are in partnership with this road as with all railway lines, although as my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) says there is another way in which we are partners in it, and that is they are to operate both portions of the road, including 1,804 miles which the government has built and owns.

At the present stage of the project, should we lend this $10,000,000? Looking to the past, the people, through their representatives in this House, entered into the project of building the Grand Trunk Pacific. The method of doing that was fully discussed. It was fully discussed on the hustings in 1904 and in 1908, and on both occasions the people said they wanted the Grand Trunk Pacific constructed. I know that conditions have arisen largely since the undertaking that did not exist when the project was started. No one needs figures to show that the cost of the road is considerably greater than was expected. It was thought that the cost of the prairie section would be $17,000 to $18,000 per mile and it has been found to cost $32,000 to $33,000 per mile. The mountain section will cost considerably higher than was anticipated. It was considered that the $13,000 per mile guaranteed on the prairie section would be practically three-quarters of the cost of construction. The contract provides a guarantee of three-quarters the cost of construction, not exceeding $13,000 per mile, which would imply that the three-quarters might be a little less. But conditions have changed and the cost has been much greater. The Grand Trunk Pacific then come to us and ask for a loan and offer security. We think that the security is good. We merely act as other bankers would. We take their bonds and place them in the treasury until they can be sold to advantage. If they were sold by the Dominion to-day our risk would be the difference between the par value and the price they would realize, which would be a very small amount. You ask how we arrive at the $10,000,000? Well, we arrive at it as follows.

On the prairie section, the proceeds of the government guaranteed bonds on $13,000 per mile, amount to $10,335,482.91:

'A' bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway..	$ 9,601,926 30
Balance due on proceeds of 3 per cent government guaranteed bonds..	1,572,517 08
Construction equipment..	1,000,000 00
Total..	$22,509,926 29
Government proposed loan.. ..	10,000,000 00
Total..	$32,509,926 29

Now, Mr. Schreiber's estimate, including interest to January, 1910, is $33,007,449. And the estimates of the Grand Trunk Pacific, including the same interest, is $32,198,351.30. This sum of $10,000,000 then, for which the government is becoming the banker of the Grand Trunk Pacific, will place them in a position to proceed with the construction of that portion of the road with all possible speed. It is in the interest of the country that no delay should take place. Although a large portion of the prairie section is constructed and running, it is necessary that the entire portion should be completed as rapidly as possible. It is also necessary that the Grand Trunk Pacific should make provision as rapidly as possible, not only that its line across the prairie over the productive section where there will be paying traffic, should be completed, but also for the extension of branch lines, not only for the benefit of the people by providing them with railway facilities, but in order that the Grand Trunk Pacific may get feeders which will bring it the traffic it needs for its through trains.

Sir, I appeal to the hon. members of the opposition, I appeal to the House, I appeal to the Dominion of Canada at large, on this question of giving this loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific. I believe that it is in the interest of the country; I believe that the country is safe in giving it. As I have already said our national interest and the success of our transportation system are bound up in the success of this undertaking. And I believe, Mr. Speaker, that members of this House on both sides will support the proposition of the Minister of Finance to give this $10,000,000 as a loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. SPROULE. If the minister can conveniently do so, I wish he would answer a question. What proportion of the prairie section is now built, and how much will it require to complete it?

Mr. GRAHAM. The road is constructed from Winnipeg to a point near Edmonton. When I say 'constructed,' I would not like to be understood as meaning that it is entirely perfected. It is constructed so that they have been operating as a construction company, and I may say, as a matter of encouragement, that the net recepits for which they have been given credit in our statement amount to $29,000.

Mr. SPROULE. The answer of the minister does not cover what I wanted to know. What percentage of the work is done?—three-quarters, two-thirds?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The road is completed to Battle River, and it is expected to run to Edmonton in June.

Mr. SPROULE. What expenditure will be required in order to finish the prairie section? I think the minister ought to be able to tell us this. We are asked to give them $10,000,000. But of that $7,000,000 is to be paid back to the Grand Trunk, leaving $3,000,000. Will that amount finish the prairie section?

Mr. GRAHAM. I will be able to give my hon. friend details in committee. I have made a statement in a general way on that subject.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the minister to say that we had already spent $23,000,000 and that the estimate of the engineers was that it would take $33,000,000 for the entire work. That means that $10,000,000 more is required. But of the $10,000,000 now proposed to be given them, $7,000,000 is to go to the Grand Trunk Railway, leaving only $3,000,000, apparently, to finish work that will cost $10,000,000. Would it not apear that the company will again be in trouble very soon? If our object is to hurry on the completion of the road, have we any assurance that the assistance we are giving will bring about its completion?

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) is wrong about my statement. I said that over $1,500,000 was due them on the proceeds on the three per cent bonds.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Do the government intend to exact from the Grand Trunk Pacific the same rate of interest that they will be compelled to pay on the bonds when they are purchased on the market?

Mr. FIELDING. I have discussed that. There is a possibility that we may have to pay a shade higher rate, but there is also a possibility that we may get the money at a lower rate. That is not a point on which we can answer definitely.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. (South Lanark). I do not intend to discuss very fully the question at present before the House. There is a good deal of information which will be needed for the purpose of a full discussion, and that information, I suppose, will be given us in committee. The question before the House is a very simple one. The government come down with a proposal to give $10,000,000 to assist the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to finish the prairie section which they contracted with this government in 1904 to build. In order to understand the matter fully, it would be necessary to consider the whole position in relation to the railway. It was only a few short years ago that the government came to this House with a proposal to build a transcontinental railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific with modern grades, through our own territory. They told us what the road would cost. I stated at the time that the cost would be largely in excess of the government's estimate. My friend the leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) stated—and so did the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding)—that the total cost to the country would be $13,000,000 or less. We laughed at the idea. We have now an acknowledgment that this road from Moncton to Winnipeg will cost in the neighbourhood of $180,000,000, by the time you get not only the road but the Quebec bridge and terminals required for operation of the railway all paid for. A very pertinent question was put by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) as to the gradients on the road between Levis and Moncton, and as to the need for building this road. I remember stating, when the question was before the House, that a better line could not be found between Moncton and Levis than that over which the Intercolonial was built. The line they propose to take had been surveyed by the Intercolonial engineers, but it was not accepted. We find now that they have got a line barely 29 miles shorter than the Intercolonial between Levis and Moncton. And the gradients are the same, because there are two pusher grades, one of 1 and one of 1-10th, on this new line, and there are only three on the Intercolonial. And the cost of this new line is over $30,000,000. If one-tenth of the money had been expended in bettering the grades on the Intercolonial, we should have had a better line than either and the country would have saved $27,000,000. But what is $27,000,000 to these gentlemen? The object of this road from Moncton to Winnipeg, they say, is to bring the western grain to our maritime province ports. But is there any one in this country foolish enough to believe that a single bushel of grain—well, perhaps, a few bushels, but any considerable proportion of the crop—will come from Winnipeg to St. John or Halifax over the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway? However, we are in for it. The Minister of Railways boldly says that we are partners in the road that is now under construction. We are obliged to come to the assistance of the company. We have already pledged ourselves for eight-tenths of the amount to build the road, and now we are asked to supply the remainder. And, after all, we have no interest in the road. True, the road comes to us after a certain number of years of working, but if there is any profit in the undertaking, that profit goes to the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. We are partners but without profits.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. Yes, as my hon. friend (Mr. George Taylor) says, we are partners, but without profits.

Mr. NORTHRUP. The other party takes the profits, and we take the losses.

Mr. LENNOX. And they want us to be silent partners.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. The Minister of Railways justifies his course by saying that we are partners in this railway. He says we are partners, not only in this undertaking, but in every railway we have built in Canada. When I was Minister of Railways, we assisted railways to the extent of $3,200 per mile; we gave this assistance to such railways as were not able to be constructed without it. That was the price put upon the rails. The company had to grade the road, build the bridges, and do everything else, and they virtually owned it. The view taken by the government at that time was that whatever amount we expended on railways, we got it back indirectly in customs taxes, and other benefits which accrued to the country within two or three years after the money was spent. Now admitting the premises of the Minister of Railways, what are we called upon to give this $10,000,000 for? The Minister of Railways says that it is necessary to help them on the prairie section. There is no necessity for anything of the kind. According to the statements of the Grand Trunk Pacific people themselves, they only require a couple of million dollars to help finance them to build that section of the road.

Now, I want the Minister of Railways to tell us why we are called upon to return to the Grand Trunk Railway Company $7,100,000 which they alleged they expended on the road. Where did the Grand Trunk Railway Company get the $7,100,000 to loan on the prairie section? That information should be given; the people are entitled to it, this House is entitled to the details of that $7,100,000. I do not believe the Grand Trunk ever advanced $7,100,000, they never had this sum in their possession to advance. If they had it in their possession, they would be committing a fraud by ad-advancing it, without the consent of the stock-holders, to such an undertaking as this. And yet, on the meagre information brought down by the Minister of Finance, he asks us for $10,000,000, of which $7,100,000 is to recoup the Grand Trunk Railway Company for an advance. We ought to have detailed information in regard to that, we have not a bit of information. Can the Minister of Railways give us a detailed statement of what that $7,100,000 consists of, or is he unable to give us the details because he does not know them? It may be explainable, but it is not explainable on the statement the Minister of Finance has brought down to this House. He says that the amount advanced to the Grand Trunk Pacific was $7,094,000. I am curious to know where the Grand Trunk got the $7,094,000; and if they had it, how they could loan it to the Grand Trunk Pacific. If it is for the purpose of purchasing bonds which have been issued by the Grand Trunk Pacific, we have no right to return it, because if we return it we are making a present of $7,094,000 to the Grand Trunk Railway. Is that not so, Mr. Finance Minister?

Mr. FIELDING. We do not propose to pay one dollar to the Grand Trunk Railway Company in the way my hon. friend suggests. As a matter of fact, the Grand Trunk Railway Company have put that amount of money into the enterprise. As to where they got it, and their authority for it, that is for them to consider. We will only pay out of this $10,000,000 the money certified by our engineers as having gone into the work. As a matter of fact, we will not pay it to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, we will pay it in the usual way to the Grand Trunk Pacific. As to their arrangements between themselves, and the Grand Trunk Company and their bankers, we are not concerned to meddle in that, so long as we pay the money out on the certificates of our engineers that the money has gone into the work.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. The Grand Trunk Pacific borrowed that $7,094,000 from the Grand Trunk, the minister says. It is a most extraordinary transaction, I do not understand it. This company is coming here to borrow $10,000,000, a company that is in the position of the Grand Trunk Company, having a couple of million of preference securities. They have been paid interest for a number of years. I cannot understand how they arrange to borrow $7,094,000. However, with the assurance of the Minister of Finance that the government will see that the $7,000,000 has been laid out on the work——

Mr. FIELDING. We will see that this $10,000,000 is laid out on the work.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. I do not know in what form it has been laid out on the work. It may have been laid out for the purchase of rolling stock.

Mr. FIELDING. No, this is not for rolling stock, this is for the work of construction.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. It has gone into the actual construction work of constructing the road?

Mr. FIELDING. Sure.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. Some time ago when the Bill came before the House, the government assured us that the prairie section would not cost over $17,000 a mile, and the maximum amount to be paid was $13,000 per mile, leaving us to believe that it would cost less than that. Now the estimate is in the neighbourhood of $33,000 per mile, or more than double the original estimate. Engineers make mistakes, the Minister of Finance says, the price of labour has gone up, there has been a duty on steel rails. Every one who knows the condition of the country now and the condition in 1904, is aware that there is no jurisdiction for the statement of the Minister of Finance that the increased expenditure is due to an increase in the cost of material. He could easily find out what railroads cost on the prairie, he has only to write to the directors of the Northern Railway. He quoted the report of Sir Thomas Shaughnessy to his directorate as to the cost of that road north of Toronto. He could just as easily have ascertained what the cost of the prairie section was likely to be, which is similar. The Grand Trunk Pacific are building a road from Winnipeg to Edmonton, a road of similar character to this, that will not cost in excess of $25,000 per mile. Yet we are called upon to pay $32,000 per mile. What is the position? We were to have a first security on the prairie and on mountain sections for the money advanced, but by the legislation of last year we were placed pari passu with parties who had mortgages second to ours on these two sections. We have now no preferential claim, we cannot take over that road and work it by a receiver or in any other way except in the interest of the other bondholders who rank pari passu with us, and after putting the bondholders of the road in that position we are to advance them $10,000,000. The Minister of Railways says: Oh look at the glorious prospect in the Northwest, 200,000,000 acres of land to be opened up on the Saskatchewan river and I do not know how many more on the Mackenzie river; think, he says, of the prospect of that immense country that empire that will yet furnish the world with food stuffs within a time which we may expect to see. You would think that all these things would strike investors in an undertaking of this kind and render it more easy for the railway company to raise money. The strongest possible reason which the government could urge for not advancing $10,000,000 to this railway company is that they are building a road through a magnificent section of the country. We pay eight-tenths of the cost of the road and interest for a number of years upon it. Why is it not possible, with such grand prospects, before them for the company to raise the $10,000,000? One would think that the government in advancing this money would take all the securities which the company have to offer. The leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) asks the government why they do not get possession of the stock of the company. That might not be of very great benefit after all but we have a right to it. We have also a right to a claim or lien such as the Grand Trunk Railway possesses upon that road from Port Arthur to Winnipeg, which is the key to the situation, but that is left out of our security altogether, we have no claim upon it. What would a road leading from Winnipeg or Edmonton down to this section of the country be without a branch to Lake Superior? It would be a useless undertaking. The hon. gentleman pictures to himself immense trains of grain crossing over this Grand Trunk Pacific from the fertile prairies to the maritime provinces. Does he or any man in this section of the country think that any large quantity of grain will pass the head of Lake Superior by rail? The grain will naturally seek the channel of cheapest transportation, and that is the water route to the sea-coast. The construction of the road to Quebec and Moncton does not promise to be profitable. I hope sincerely that the development in that section of the country from the discovery of minerals, timber and good lands may be such that it will have a bright future, but I do not believe in the manner in which that road is being constructed. The same system of construction should be adopted as is pursued in the case of other roads built through sections of the country which do not at the time of construction furnish sufficient products to afford a profitable traffic. The road should be built as the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, and all other roads in the United States and then as the country developed and traffic increased the road should be improved. But this gentleman says that all these immense crops from the Northwest can be transported to the maritime provinces on a four-tenths per cent grade from the mountains to the Atlantic, and that this through traffic will pay the cost of the road. But the cost of the road is not simply the interest we have to pay; we have to consider the danger that the road may be thrown on our hands in the future, especially that portion of it from Winnipeg to Moncton so that we will lose not only the interest on its construction but also the immense sum annually which our experience in the government operation of railroads leads us to expect will be lost in its operation.

I observe that the Grand Trunk say they want only $9,400,000 but the chief engineer of our railways says that $10,000,000 and some odd thousands will be required to finish it. That is a difference of only about a million dollars. This money apparently is needed to recoup the bankers of the Grand Trunk Railway Company for money which they advanced to the Grand Trunk for the building of this road. I do not think we are called upon to complete the section of the road with the amount of money and bonds remaining unsold. According to the statement of the Grand Trunk people themselves it will require about $2,000,000 to finish the western section. There will shortly be available $1,400,000 of rolling stock and construction rolling stock which can be transferred over from the prairie section to the mountain section as $1,000,000 worth has already been transferred, and the prairie section will get credit for that so that we will have at the most $1,000,000 to provide for. This then is a loan not to assist the Grand Trunk Pacific to construct their road but to recoup the Grand Trunk Railway for money advanced by them to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in a manner which the Finance Minister says he does not quite understand, they borrowed the money from some bank in order to put it into the undertaking. I shall reserve further criticism until we reach the committee stage and have more detailed information.

Mr. F. D. MONK. I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but I wish to enter my dissent against this transaction as strongly as I possibly can. Those who were in the House will recall that when the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme was first brought to the notice of the House and of the public there was a universal agreement among the members that further railway accommodation across the continent was necessary. Attempts have been made to show that the Conservative opposition of the day were opposed to the building of a national transcontinental railway, but every one who has followed the debates knows that we were agreed as to the necessity of another transcontinental line, although we absolutely differed from the government as to the method of supplying it.

Under ordinary circumstances it is possible that I for my part would approve of this loan, but under the circumstances in which it presents itself to us I must emphatically enter my dissent. I remember declaring in this House that the scheme submitted by the government was not the scheme suggested by the Grand Trunk Railway Company at all, and the Minister of Finance will remember that at the end of the lengthy debate on the National Transcontinental Railway Bill he was obliged to produce before the House a document setting forth what the Grand Trunk Company had proposed. The Grand Trunk Railway had a net work of railways in Ontario and Quebec with extensions into the United States, but it lacked an entry into the rich territory of the Northwest, and it proposed to extend to the Pacific ocean so as to provide western connections for its eastern system. Had the plans submitted by the Grand Trunk originally been carried out it would have cost us comparatively little money, and to-day we would easily be able to meet the demands of the company, instead of having to provide for the fearful expenditure which now faces us. Instead of adopting the proposal of the Grand Trunk the government decided to construct this serpentine, circuitous, extraordinary railroad which is going to saddle the country with an expenditure of over $150,000,000. It was plain to everybody at the time, that the project of the government could not be carried out except at enormous expense. The Prime Minister who has a great many admirable qualities but who is neither a railroad builder nor a financier, told us with pathos that the project would cost us $13,000,000 and he added with a wave of the hand that it was only the surplus of one year, and this government glories in its surpluses.

Mr. FOSTER. However it gets them.

Mr. MONK. However it gets them, and no matter what may be the opinion of political economists as to the surpluses. We on this side argued that the road would cost us over $100,000,000, and the Minister of Railways has to admit that it must cost us $113,000,000. I think we are fairly safe in saying now that the country will have spent over $160,000,000 on the National Transcontinental Railway by the time we have it completed. It was stated when the project was launched in this parliament that this railway would develop the northern parts of Ontario and Quebec, and during the elections which followed, the Conservatives were attacked in Quebec because we had denounced this absurd scheme and declared that it threatened to ruin the country. We were told that we were antagonistic to this railway because we had a hatred of the province of Quebec and were opposed to its development. I remember arguing at the time in the House that the two older provinces of Ontario and Quebec were certainly entitled to railway development, and that if we had the money there were other expenditures that might better be made. I said that what we required in my native province was the development of colonization lines which beginning at the valley of the St. Lawrence would extend north and south into these portions of the province which had no railway. I said that in Quebec we required colonization roads which would open up that province and bring the traffic down to the St. Lawrence which is the natural outlet for our trade. I presented motions to that effect but these motions were voted down. Can anything more ridiculous be imagined than the construction of a rival road to the Intercolonial Railway between Quebec and Moncton? Is there a man in Canada outside of this House, who does not point out at once this radical objection which vitiates this part of the scheme? We all know that in the territory between Quebec and Moncton there are companies incorporated to build railways which if they were properly assisted would infinitely better develop that district of the province of Quebec than does that section of the Transcontinental Railway. But, instead of encouraging by money grants and otherwise the construction of these railways which would be feeders to the Intercolonial Railway, we are building a rival road, 29 miles shorter between Quebec and Moncton and paralleling for a considerable distance the present government owned road. Well, we prophesied in 1903 that this scheme would not stand, and we are prophesying to-day that the proposal now before us is but the first of a series which will impose further obligations upon the country. The fact will remain that when this line is finally built the country will have paid for it but will not own it, a thing which is contrary to the principles I hold in reference to such public utilities. In the following year, I think,—I am speaking from memory—the National Transcontinental was placed by an enactment of this legislature in this situation. We are told that we are going to lease it, that we have a good tenant for the road, and therefore that although we are expending these hundreds of millions upon its construction, we are sure to recover the interest out of the rental which the road will yield. Where is our tenant, and what certainty have we that we shall ever collect one dollar of that rental, under the second step which we made in the evolution of this very unfortunate scheme which we have not seen the end of by any means. As I understand it, we are in this position. The Grand Trunk Company will become the user of that road when we shall have expended 180 millions upon it. If the Grand Trunk, under its exploitation, cannot pay the rental, what becomes of our tenant? He is absolved from any obligation to pay the rent to this extent. that if the Grand Trunk Railway cannot pay it, the only recourse the country has under that statutory enactment is to place the whole concern in the hands of a receiver, who will distribute what money he can make out of it in certain indicated ways.

When I hear that this railroad is going to become a great grain-carrying road to our sea-board, I entertain very serious doubts. In the first place, as between rail carriage and water carriage, there never will be any competition possible, because water carriage will always be cheaper, and in winter I cannot conjure up, whatever effort of imagination I may make, the idea that any considerable portion of the grain of the west is going to be carried over that road to the Atlantic. There is nothing to prevent the Grand Trunk from realizing the idea which it had in the very inception of this enterprise, and which I regret very much was not carried out, after traversing the plains of the west, and coming into Ontario, to connect with its own system; and does anybody think that with the branch lines that will tap the Transcontinental, in the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec, the Grand Trunk will bring any grain it may carry, not to its own network of railways and over its usual route, but through this vast wilderness of the north and down to the lower provinces? I do not believe it. Neither will the Canadian Northern nor the Canadian Pacific. Their interests are all to bring the grain to their own systems of railway and their own ports, and they will do it; and this will never be a grain-carrying road. Under these circumstances, it is proper for one who at that time foresaw what is happening to-day, to recall the attitude taken at the time, and to base on that attitude a protest against this loan. Because in an enterprise of this magnitude, where there has been such an entire difference as to the method of carrying it out—I say the method advisedly, because our hon. friends opposite are always asserting that we are against the completion of new and improved means of communication between the east and the west—I say it is proper for one who was opposed to that method at that time, to say that he does not believe in this loan. This loan is a consequence of what was done then, and I as one who was opposed to the scheme at that time, am opposed to the consequences of that scheme. Now, the loan itself does not commend itself to me on account of the circumstances and conditions that surround it. If we now have to break up the contract that was made solemnly a few years ago, why are we not given the very best conditions? My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, when he first presented this project, told us that he placed very small reliance upon the mortgage security. I entirely concur in that view. I have very little reliance on a fourth mortgage. I would place more, as my hon. friend did at the time he made the announcement, upon the hope that the road will pay, and that our personal recourse against the road will become good. But can we not get anything better? Here is a company that has in its treasury $20,000,000 of common stock. Who owns it? The shareholders of this company. The stock is held in trust by three of them, and it is better than a fourth mortgage. Everybody admits that. No man will rise in this House to deny it. Why can that not be given to us as a security, as it could if the company wished it? Why are we not given preference stock? There is no possible difficulty about that stock, as it is in the company's treasury. Then, there is a company composed, I think, of men who are interested in this enterprise, and formed for the purpose of purchasing town sites along the line of this railway, which of course will become daily more valuable as the line is constructed. That would be good security for our loan. That company is going to enrich these fortunate men. They are going to become millionaires by the construction of this railway and by the re-sale of these town sites along the line of a road which, as the hon. leader of the opposition has said, we are financing almost entirely with our own money. There are three kinds of securities that are infinitely better than the one mentioned in this Bill.

Are we now getting the very best security since we are asked to depart from the terms of the original contract. That is the second reason why I wish to enter my dissent to this transaction. At present we have urgently needed public works, the construction of which should not be delayed. We have to provide increased accommodations for our friends in the west. That was the original plan of Mr. Hays when he came here to ask government assistance in order to place the vast net work of the Grand Trunk Railway system in contact with that rich region. We have to increase our canal facilities. Since we have thrown into the waste paper basket the report of the Transportation Commission, with all its practical suggestions, our American neighbours have awakened to the necessity of increasing their facilities for water transport; and while we are neglecting our plain duty they are building and deepening canals to tap our trade. Not only was the report of that commission unanimous in recommending the immediate construction of the Georgian Bay canal, but when the president, Mr. Reford, got the information that our American neighbours were taking action he wrote an additional letter which was published, saying that we had not a moment to loose in building the Georgian Bay canal, if we wished to keep control of the great traffic of the west. At the present moment, we ought to start that canal at the Montreal end. If we do not, the cost we will have to pay when we ultimately build it will be increased fourfold. We should at any rate begin at that end and the other, and the intervening space might be kept in abeyance for a time, since we have no money. Our ocean ports ought to be made free. We have American rivals in that respect who will otherwise take the traffic from us. They are increasing their facilities in Boston, New York and Baltimore. In some of their ports they are actually bonusing the traffic while we are increasing the burdens on our own. The Transportation Commission reported that certain of our ports should be made free to enable us to properly carry out the immense traffic we have with Europe, but we have not taken one step to give effect to that recommendation. Instead we have taken upon our shoulders this National Transcontinental Railway, which must for many years to come absorb all our resources. That was the scheme we condemned at the time and I condemn it now. Experience has justified what we said at the time, and I wish to enter my protest against this transaction under the circumstances.

Mr. W. B. NANTEL (Terrebonne). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I am bound, like my chieftain for the province of Quebec, to protest against the proposition which is now laid down before us. I was against that project of railway from the very beginning, and in 1904 I have fought indeed against that project of railway because it was untimely and not enough elaborate.

I consider to-day that we must accept the accomplished fact, that we are too much involved, that we cannot turn back and that we cannot frustrate the endeavours made nor the expenditure incurred. But in another point of view, it does not follow that we are bound to approve of every thing which has been made.

The Conservative party has never been against the construction of railways; it has been on the contrary, always identified with all these undertakings in our country. It has built the Canadian Pacific Railway —the first transcontinental—and that line was built, I can say it, in spite of the persisting hostilities of the Liberal party as a whole.

I am speaking for myself but I am satisfied that the Conservative party, as a party, will not try to kill that enterprise and will not fall into the exaggerations of the Liberal party from 1880 to 1884.

However the conservative party is entitled to see through this matter, and as a matter of fact we are only beginning to get an insight into it.

When we are told that the people have approved in 1904, and ratified in 1908 this undertaking on the part of the government I fail to see on what grounds such a statement is made. In 1904, the people endorsed the building of a railway which, according to the right hon. gentleman himself was to cost about thirteen millions or thereabouts. They endorsed the building of a railway, which according to the Minister of Finance—a man who should have been well posted on the matter—was to cost $11,512,325.

What do we see now? That same undertaking is to cost two or three hundred millions, at any rate over two hundred millions; which goes to show that the people had not been supplied with sufficient information in 1904. I find some further evidence on that point in the columns of the Witness, a paper generally well informed and whose loyalty to the liberal party is well known. The quotation is as follows:

The following is a brief summary of the principal facts to date; Expended on National Transcontinental Railway from Moncton to Winnipeg, $50,000,000; required to complete it, $66,000,000; required to build prairie section of Grank Trunk Pacific, $32,000,000; required to build mountain section of Grand Trunk Pacific, $68,000,000; total probable cost from coast to coast, $250,000,000; original estimated cost, $100,000,000; length of line east of Winnipeg, 1,752 miles; under construction, out of 3,556 miles, 2,000 miles. It will be seen from these figures that very much remains to be done, and that the original figures are very far astray indeed. If there were any chance of similar disparity between the estimated cost of building the Georgian Bay canal and the actual cost, the country would be likely to hesitate very long indeed before embarking on that enterprise.

Mr. O. E. TALBOT (Bellechasse). What about the remarks that your honourable chief (Mr. Borden) made a few days ago about the construction of the Georgian Bay canal?

Mr. NANTEL. Allow me to get to the end of this quotation.

It is interesting in this connection to note that the Canadian Pacific Railway, with over twelve thousand miles of railway, with big fleets on two oceans and the great lakes, with a chain of big hotels across the continent, enormous workshops and a rolling stock unsurpassed in the world for size and quality, only has an issued capital stock of $150,000,000, preference stock $48,800,000, debenture stock $115,650,000, and mortgage bonds of $39,620,000, or a total indebtedness of about $350,000,000.

Compare this with the Grand Trunk Pacific's 3,556 miles and its debt of $250,000,000, and the conclusion will soon be reached that if all this money were only honestly expended there is every reason why the Grand Trunk Pacific should be the 'finest and most substantial' railway on the continent. The Canadian Pacific Railway, however, runs no risk of losing its well won laurels.

So the 'Witness,' a faithful organ of the Liberal party, has criticised this undertaking, and that shows that the people had not been sufficiently enlightened at its outset in 1903.

It is contended that the people have approved of this undertaking. The people in this country are sometimes consulted in odd fashion; that is they are consulted after the matter has gone through, and not at all before it is decided and the contracts awarded. The people are fooled, and later on the government boasts of having obtained their approval. As I have already said, there are two ways of consulting the people, before or after deciding. It seems to me it would be more manly and fairer on the part of the government to consult the people before taking their decision, instead of waiting until that decision has been taken. For instance, in the case of that undertaking, which was launched towards the end of the parliament of 1900, it would have been a very easy matter indeed to submit it to the electorate at the election of 1904, previous to starting the work.

In connection with the increase of the salaries of the ministers and members of parliament the proposal was brought forward immediately after the general election of 1904, although the people had not had the least inkling of it in the course of the elections. It seems as though the people had approved that measure, but in that case again they accepted a state of things already in existence.

In regard to this important proposal for the granting of an amount of $10,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, it would have been an easy matter to submit it to the people at the last general elections. But nothing of the sort has been done. It would have been necessary to enlighten the people, to acquaint them with the facts and circumstances; but it was thought preferable to leave them under the false impression of 1904.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER. (Translation). Will the hon. member allow me to ask him a question? Does he accept, as concerns himself, the increase of the members' sessional indemnity which has been voted?

Is he willing or not that it should be maintained?

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation). In answer to that question, I may say that, had I been here I would have voted against that proposal, not so much because I considered it unfair in itself, but on account of its being sprung by surprise on the people. I am not called upon to discuss that question just now; I have referred to it by the way and not with any idea of criticism. It seems to me that in connection with questions of such importance, it would be advisable to consult the people. The manner of consulting the people which the government have adopted is not the ideal one to my mind. It is in accordance neither with the spirit nor with the letter of the constitution. It is an arbitrary and anti-liberal mode of procedure; it is neither generous nor frank, and surely it is not manly.

That sovereign people in whose presence, during the elections, politicians are so apt to take a cringing attitude, is deserving of more consideration.

As will have been noticed, the extra expenditure on this undertaking will be enormous. As stated by the 'Witness' that road will entail on the Dominion an expenditure, not of thirteen millions, not of a hundred millions, but rather of $250,000,000 or possibly $280,000,000. This government is going to supply all the funds for this undertaking from Moncton to Prince Rupert, from ocean to ocean, for all sections east and west, and the prairie and mountain sub-sections, including the Quebec bridge, and these amounts will be returned when there are funds available.

With whom are we dealing? Is it with the Grand Trunk Pacific, or with the Grand Trunk Company of Canada, or with a third company which has made its appearance under the name of the Grand Trunk Town Site and Development Company; or lastly, is it with the fourth company, the "Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Line Company"? All these companies are apparently amalgamated; the directors are the same in every case, they constitute in reality a single moral person; and I say that parliament should under the circumstances show great caution in granting them favours. They are endeavouring to secure privileges, while avoiding all risks. These companies are much more anxious to make money out of us than to endure the welfare of the country.

The hon. Minister of Railways stated a minute ago how important it was from our point of view to have an entirely Canadian line of railway, over an all-Canadin route. Now, do all these companies which seem so anxious to provide us with an all-Canadian Transcontinental Railway, have as stock holders and directors Canadian citizens, or at any rate foreigners intending to become citizens of Canada. Are they not rather strangers, Americans, anxious to make money at our expense, without even going to the length of getting naturalized?

When I heard the Minister of Railways and his friends booming the West, I remember what the Liberals had to say in this connection in 1880 and 1884. It is important, I think, to recall the past, for fear certain incidents in the history of our country should be too soon consigned to oblivion. It was not usual then to boom the West, to speak of it as destined to become the world's great storehouse. I shall quote presently some of the sayings of these gentlemen in that connection, when the Canadian Pacific Railway was applying to parliament for help towards the completion of their undertaking.

However, as regards this proposed second transcontinental, it was launched prematurely, with inexplicable haste, in the full blast of a session, when parliament was drawing to an end, and against all expectations. It should be no matter for surprise if in the end the expenditure is found to be enormous. Arrangements were taken as if the matter had been of very little importance, without going to the pains of getting precise information in regard to the physical features of the country through which the railway was to be built, nor as regards the expenditure, and the cost of the road in stead of amounting to $13,000 per mile or $30,000 per mile, reaches $35,000 and even $80,000 per mile.

That is not surprising; it was bound to happen, and the best evidence of it I find in a speech of the right hon. Prime Minister, delivered on July 30th, 1903. He said:

> I do not expect even the most fastidious of our critics will ask us that we should have had an exploration across the prairies. They are satisfied that we have enough information now to deal with this question so far as the prairies are concerned. But I shall be asked: What about the Rocky mountains? My answer in regard to the Rocky mountains is that we have mountains of information. We have mountains of books, pamphlets and reports—books, pamphlets and reports from traders, from explorers, from engineers.

And he mentioned Samuel de Champlain, Robert Cavelier de la Salle, La Verendyre, Alexander Mackenzie, Captain Butler and many others who at that early date, in their travels on land and sea, had not the least idea of making surveys or specifications and estimates for railways. No wonder that with such data, the government should have been out in their calculations.

At six o'clock the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, April 29, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

CANAL FROM LAKE WILCOX TO NEWMARKET.

Mr. WALLACE—by Mr. Blain—asked:

1. Is it the intention of the government to construct a canal from Lake Wilcox, Whitchurch township, York county, to the town of Newmarket?
2. Was the survey made of this route as a feeder of the Newmarket canal? If so, what did it cost?
3. What was the probable cost of building such a canal from Lake Wilcox to Newmarket?

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals):

1. Such a project has not been considered by the government.
2. No survey was made for a canal; but a line was run for a conduit which might if necessary carry water from a reservoir to the canal.
3. Such a canal was not contemplated.

CUSTOMS COLLECTOR AT BATHURST.

Mr. CROCKET—by Mr. Geo. Taylor—asked:

Has the Department of Customs granted the collector at Bathurst, New Brunswick, any leave of absence from duty since November 1 last?

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs). No.

BOWLING ALLEY IN WOODSTOCK, NEW BRUNSWICK, ARMOURY.

Mr. CROCKET—by Mr. Geo. Taylor—asked:

1. Is the Department of Militia and Defence aware that the superintendent of the armoury at Woodstock, New Brunswick, is said to have built and is operating a public bowling alley in said armoury?
2. If so, is this not a violation of the regulations relating to armouries?

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN (Minister of Militia and Defence):

1 and 2. The officer commanding Military District No. 8 reports that he gave permission for the use by the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the militia at Woodstock, of the west wing of the Woodstock armoury as a temporary bowling alley.

From the report it does not appear to be a public alley, as the rules do not allow of any one bowling except members of the militia or friends introduced by them.

MINIMUM TARIFF UNDER FRENCH TREATY.

Mr. SAM SHARPE—by Mr. George Taylor—asked:

1. What is the minimum tariff, in Canadian currency, under the Franco-Canadian Treaty on the following products of the farm exported to France, and what is the maximum French tariff on the same articles, viz.: horses, cattle, mutton, pork, wheat, barley, rye, maize and buckwheat?
2. On what any ten staple products of the farm, produced in considerable quantities will Canadians enjoy the benefit of the minimum tariff on goods exported to France, as distinguished from the maximum tariff; and what is the amount of such minimum tariff in Canadian currency?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). The information is covered by a paper submitted to this House at the last session, a copy of which I will have sent to the hon. gentleman.

LETTER CARRIER SYSTEMS IN CITIES.

Mr. FOSTER asked:

1. What cities in Canada are equipped with letter carrier systems?
2. Are the letter carriers in all these cities organized on the same basis as to duties, classes and salaries?
3. In how many of these cities is the appointment of clerks in the post offices made by the government, and in what cities are they made and paid by the postmasters?
4. What is the amount received by each of these latter postmasters, and what number of clerks does each employ?

Hon. R. LEMIEUX (Postmaster General):

1. Montreal, Toronto, Quebec, Ottawa, Hamilton, St. John, Halifax, London, Winnipeg, Kingston, Victoria, Brantford, Edmonton, Calgary, Stratford, Berlin, St. Hyacinthe, Three Rivers, Peterboro, Sherbrooke, Guelph, Charlottetown, Brandon, Windsor, St. Catharines, Sarnia, Fort William, Port Arthur, Moncton, St. Thomas and Chatham.
2. Yes.
3. In all of the offices named above the clerks are appointed by the department with the exception of Stratford, Sarnia, Chatham and Moncton.

4. Stratford	$6,581 02
Sarnia	6,298 39
Chatham	7,992 32
Moncton	7,659 48

In consideration of the above allowances the postmasters are required to engage whatever assistance may be necessary to properly perform the post office work. No record is kept in the department of the number of clerks employed at such offices. The matter of also placing these offices on a semi-staff basis, that is, that appointments to clerkships shall be made by the department, is now under consideration.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—MORNING SITTINGS.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

That from this date to the end of the session, the rule of the House concerning the closing of the sitting on Wednesdays at six o'clock, p.m., shall not apply; that from Monday, the 3rd of May next, and until the end of the session, the House shall meet on that day and on every subsequent sitting day at eleven o'clock in the morning; and that in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock, p.m., there shall be also an intermission every day, including Wednesdays, from one to three o'clock, p.m.

Motion agreed to.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC LOAN.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding, for the second reading of Bill (No. 128) to authorize a loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. W. B. NANTEL (Terrebonne). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last night, I had just quoted from a speech where the right hon. gentleman spoke of piles and mountains of information he had in the shape of books, pamphlets and reports from commercial people, surveyors and engineers about the projected railway. Now, with all due regard for books written by travellers, traders or engineers out on hunting or exploration trips, who often make the description of a country as a matter of literary essay, I think it would have been better to have the report of a railway engineer on official duty before engaging the country in such an important undertaking. Had we had such a report before running the risks of the construction of a new transcontinental railway from Moncton to Port Rupert, through the wild regions of North America, the Rockies and the Laurentian mountains, if we had been patient enough to wait for a report made by serious engineers, I think the mistakes in calculation we know now would have been avoided. We would have been brought nearer to reality, even taking into account the higher grade of the proposed line of railway, the augmented price of materials and labour, together with the constructor's appetite. Again, if there had been competent engineers, the Quebec bridge would not be now lying at the bottom of the St. Lawrence. For my part, I think the construction of the first transcontinental railway was by far more necessary than that of the second one. It was one of the conditions of the entering of British Columbia into confederation. The west had to be opened to settlement; there was no time to be lost, and each hour delay involved a double loss, as was shown by the event.

This work had been completed for years. Since 1870, the different governments had often attempted to give the contract. The first contract was even entered into, but it was not carried on. So that the plan was laid out, matured and even antiquated. In 1880, when it was proposed to complete the contract and to hand over the railway to the company which had constructed it, my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who was the first lientenant of the leader of the opposition, and every oppositionist member at that time stated that the government was in too great a hurry, that information was needed and that moreover there was no lack of communications with the west. Among others, the right hon, the First Minister, said in an ironical and satirical tone :

The government say—it was the government led by Sir John Macdonald—'accept the contract it is the best we could get.' Is that the language of a free government, of the executive power of a free country? What has seized the government of this country that they have been compelled to accept this contract from the syndicate? Who in the world compelled the government to negotiate with the syndicate? What great calamity has befallen this country that the government should be compelled to surrender unconditionally to the syndicate? If there had been a war and we had been defeated and the government forced to accept from the victor such terms as suited him to enforce, and if the government came here to have the treaty ratified, would their language have been different to that used in order to induce their supporters to accept the contract? When in the year 1871, at the termination of the disastrous war with Prussia, the provisional government of France met the newly elected national assembly and presented to it the treaty concluded with Germany by which France ceded to that country two of its best provinces, some of the members protested against the clauses of that treaty. And what was the language of the French government in reply? It was exactly the same as used to-day by our administration: 'Accept the terms, they are the best we could get.'

In 1884, the company having spent large sums, having exhausted their resources, and having shown by a detailed statement, sworn to by reliable auditors of the expenses incurred to date, and of the money required to complete the work, and being anxious to carry on their contract, which was nearing completion, before the delay elapsed, in spite of the unjust war waged against them by rival companies and jealous capitalists, and offering as a guarantee, not only a section of their road, but their whole road, all their holdings without any reservation, to secure a loan of $30,000,000, the government to remit the money only on progress estimates, their proposal was bitterly attached by the right hon. the first minister, his leader at that time, the hon. Edward Blake, and their friends. The right hon. gentleman said :

But am I again to repeat what is in the knowledge of everybody, that the Northwest Territories are tapped by the railway system of the continent and that there is communication with it by the lakes, and, therefore, not one more settler would go into that country if the road were opened through its whole length.

And, further:

I would say to the company let your motto be festina lente; take your time but build your road, and it will be for your advantage and the advantage of the people as well.

At that time no one praised the western plains as they are now praised; no one had found out that the west was the granary of Europe and of the whole world. However, that granary had been discovered as early as 1870 by the leaders of the Conservative party, Sir John Macdonald, Sir George Etienne Cartier and Sir Charles Tupper. Yesterday, we heard gentlemen on the opposite side of the House extolling that western granary. Great was my surprise when I heard them. It is the reason why I recall those past events which we are prone to forget.

Now, what did happen in 1903? What a change ! What a transformation ! O ! 'quantum mutatus ab illo,' would the Latin poet say.

During a session, the plan of a second transcontinental line is laid out and explained to parliament by the First Minister. It must be approved, and that without delay. There is no more thought of those Prussians who imposed terms so severe upon the French in 1871. It was not Hobson's choice; you had to take it. There was no time to be lost, if it were not too late. Trade was seeking another channel. Our country was in the clutches of the Americans. It was necessary to relieve the situation without waiting any longer.

There was a lack of reports from engineers but it did not matter; the writings and pamphlets of tourists and traders would be used instead! Is it, Mr. Speaker, that we are to be deprived hereafter of the means of communiaction afforded by the great lakes? Then, the Canadian Pacific Railway is built and fully operated, but all that goes for nothing. There is need of another transcontinental line, and they must have it now. The late Hon. Mr. Blair is shocked and resigns as the Minister of Railways. To him the whole mystery—for he believed there was a mystery—was that the Hon. Senator Cox would not wait any longer. That was the most grievous insult on the part of an ex-member of the cabinet to his former leader and colleague. But it was all to no avail. Everything was settled and patched up in less than no time and the deed was executed.

Mr. Blair was right when he said that the railway could cost $139,000,000, but no body would believe him. The leader of the government had stated that it would cost $13,000,000. His Minister of Finance, going him one better, had mentioned the sum of $11,512,325, so as to have the people believe that he had figured it very closely, since he had found these $325 instead of a round sum. The people gave credit to that information and Mr. Blair kept silent. Was it on account of his outspoken language or on account of his silence that he was royally rewarded by his apointment as chairman of the Railway Commission at a salary of $10,000 a year ? Everybody was pleased. In 1904, the people sanctioned an expenditure of $13,000,000; in 1908, they gave the same verdict, but now they are called upon to face an expenditure ranging between $250,000,000 and $280,000,000.

Neither Mr. Blair nor anybody else had the slightest idea that the work would cost $280,000,000, or that in 1909, before having completed the prairie section, the sister companies would ask the government for $10,000,000, threatening to stop work in case of a refusal.

Some say it is a loan. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what those gentlemen thought of such loans when they were in opposition ? In 1884 when the Canadian Pacific was asking the government for a loan of $30,000,000, in order to complete the railway, the right hon. the first minister expressed his fears that the loan would be converted into a gift and borrowing the language of the Scriptures he said that he would as soon believe that the waters would flow back from the sea to the lakes as that one cent of that money will ever come back from the Pacific Railway exchequer to the Dominion exchequer. And the Hon. Mr. Blake, the leader of the opposition at that time, spoke of the clause stipulating that if the company did not refund the money, the government would ' ipso facto ' become proprietor of the railway and he added:

We had other companies which did not lose their roads under similar circumstances. We have had the Grand Trunk, to which we made advances on a first lien, a very first lien, a splendid first lien, and where is that lien now? It is away down among the dead men. I believe it is seen in the Public Accounts and in our balances, but it is visible nowhere else. So it might be here. It is impossible not to recognize the lesson and the story of the past, when looking at the present and trying to forecast the future. Should default be made, you are not going to sacrifice the interests of those shareholders. The past tells what the future will be.

That statesman, that distinguished leader of the Liberal party is undoubtedly surprised that the Canadian Pacific Company has so well repaid their indebtedness to the Canadian government and that, on the other hand, his language did not cause the Grand Trunk Railway Company to pay off their mortgages.

That sum of $10,000,000 together with what the Grand Trunk Company of Canada owed us before is a heavy burden upon our people, already overloaded, as the right hon. the first minister used to say. And Mr. Speaker, $7,094,000 of that loan of $10,000,000 will fall into the exchequer of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, our debtor to the extent of $25,600,000, according to the Minister of Railways and Canals.

The hon. Minister was asked whether the G. T. P. Company would again ask parliament for other sums of money and the hon. gentleman answered that he could not tell, although it was quite possible.

As for myself, I am free to see that this request of the company shall be granted though the sureties that are offered are worth nothing, as we have it from the mouth of the hon. Minister of Finance himself in his speech of the 30th of March last. Our guarantee only affects the prairie section which is under construction and only amounts to a fourth mortgage. A second and perhaps a third similar request will soon follow. They shall all be granted and the mortgages—in the terse style of the hon. Mr. Blake—will be away down among the dead men.

How powerful are the railway companies in this country of ours. They are in full control of everything, 'de facto,' if not 'de jure.' The more I look into the matter, the more I am confirmed in my belief, and the speeches delivered in 1884 by the then members of the opposition are of a nature to satisfy me entirely as to the correctness of my assumption. I am unable to resist the temptation of quoting some of their fine oratory. That debate was also in connection with a loan of thirty millions to the Canadian Pacific Railway. What were the grounds for granting that loan? No other grounds can be shown, stated the right hon. gentleman to-day leader of the government:

> That the government are to-day controlled by a power mightier than they. They are like the wizard of old, who, through his incantations, gave life to a monster which made him its slave and in the end destroyed him. The governments are in the hands of a company which it must obey, just as the servant in the Scripture, to whom his master said: 'Go, and he goeth; come, and he cometh.'

Then Sir Richard Cartwright on the same occasion put the following query to the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives):

> 'Does the hon. member suppose that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has no paid advocate in this House? Does he suppose that no member is interested in favouring the Canadian Pacific Railway? Does he imagine that the company has no friends in the House and in the cabinet?

Mr. Speaker, when men of the standing of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister and Sir Richard Cartwright, men of exceptional intelligence and wisdom, veterans in parliament, experienced speakers possessing the art of expressing all they wish to convey and of conveying nothing more than what they really wish to say, express themselves in such a manner before the House, it is not surprising that we, the new members of the House, should feel serious misgivings when we see all the Grand Trunk Companies besieging parliament for new favours.

Do not these speeches, Mr. Speaker, in the light of the facts before us concerning the difference of $775,0000 as between the $27,031,453 submitted by the company as chargeable to future construction on the 31st December, 1908, and that of $26,256,455 really approved, in the light of that other item of $162,000, of which so much has been said but no explanation yet given, and which the Grand Trunk Company of Canada holds against the Grand Trunk Pacific Company of Canada—are we not justified, I say, to apply to the Grand Trunk Pacific and to the present government what was said in 1884 of the government of that time.

If at one time the Pacific ruled, to-day the Grand Trunk Pacific commands. The position is the same, only the name has changed. That is the least that can be said. It is a painful, but logical, conclusion which cannot be denied.

When governments make advances to railway companies under such circumstances, they should, it seems to me, insist upon the transfer to the country of an amount equal to such advances in paid up privileged and common stock of the company, and so become to all intents and purposes shareholders of the company until such advances have been refunded in full. That would be a good, practical security, besides giving the government means of controlling the companies. In the present case, the government should require bonds from the company and the latter could not refuse; if the bonds are in the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, that company could not refuse. For my part, I consider such security better than any mortgage, to which I attach little importance.

Mr. O. E. TALBOT (Bellechasse). (Translation.) Would the hon. member allow me to put a question? What are the bonds of any company worth if they are not paid up in full?

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) There would be no risk in accepting such bonds, and for my part I would not hesitate to accept them. They are a much better security than the mortgages of which Mr. Blake spoke, and which are gone the way of last year's snows.

If we had acted in that way towards the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, is it not probable that we would have recovered the sum of $25,000,000 still due and which, as Hon. Mr. Blake said, is to be found nowhere except in the public accounts? To me the thing appears clear.

Mr. TALBOT (Translation). You are easily satisfied.

Mr. NANTEL (Translation). Perhaps I may not require as much as you do. The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada never paid these mortgages because the net profits of the company never covered its first bonds. And those bonds were never covered on account of enormous promotion costs and lobbying costs and of other expenses of a more or less legitimate nature which the company was obliged to defray at every step, because excessive salaries and perquisites were paid to managers and administrators, to princes of finance, to lawyers and to those friends whom Sir Richard Cartwright mentioned in 1884, and who seem to have been everywhere even within the precincts of parliament and in the cabinet.

History repeats itself ; that is the reason why the privileged bonds and other stock of such a company are better security than mortgages.

The Hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals told us yesterday the country was in partnership with the company for the construction of this railway. If such be the case, Canada must be the sleeping partner providing the funds without any hope of sharing in the profits. But are we in partnership with the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk Company of Canada or any other company springing from the original Grand Trunk Company? I mentioned yesterday two of those new creations. It appears that I had forgotten a third, the Grand Trunk Construction Company. We may perhaps be in partnership with them as long as it is necessary to disburse money but when the day of reckoning comes we will find only the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, the probable inheritor of all the debts. Town lots, hotels and parks will belong to some other of those companies, branch lines to a third, and still another will crop up at all points with privileged claims for works and construction. The Grand Trunk Pacific will hold all the indebtedness. I would prefer having to deal with one single company, the Grand Trunk Company of Canada. That company should come forward alone and openly to take charge of the whole construction and incur the full responsibility of the advances now sought for. They should take charge of the whole road, of branch as well as trunk lines, and hold in their own name city lots and all other assets; such a proceeding would be more reassuring for this House and for the government. For my part, Mr. Speaker, if I were in the place of the government of Canada, before granting this loan of ten millions to the Grand Trunk Pacific, I would require, besides the conditions I have just mentioned, bonds and a settlement of old accounts on the part of the Grand Trunk Company. I would liquidate the old claim. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is what I would do, and that is, no doubt, what the government will do, unless they have fallen under the influence of that old magician of which the right hon. Premier spoke in 1880 and 1884, whose life, says the story, was constantly threatened by the claws and teeth of the strange progeny he had begot, as it turned out, to his own undoing.

This railway, Mr. Speaker, is a hastily conceived idea of the present administration. One might suppose that it was suggested to the hon. gentlemen now holding power by the magician of the story or by some mischievous imp for the purpose of placing them in contradiction with their past, of giving us a further proof of the weakness of human nature and of showing us how the finest political intellects must of necessity contradict themselves several times in the course of their career, especially when having long remained in the cold shades of the opposition they are at length called upon to bask in the golden rays of power.

The other evening I heard with pleasure the statement made by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Pardee), that the great Canadian statesman, Sir John Macdonald, had been unwisely opposed at the time to the construction of the first transcontinental. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that patriot was unwisely and injudiciously opposed in a great national undertaking, and the wonder is that he was able to accomplish his task in spite of the opposition he met with. Everyone will admit that the construction of the first transcontinental was a more difficult and especially a more necessary undertaking than the present and that the prosperity we have since enjoyed, and of which our opponents are wont to boast, is is great part due to that railway. Those words of the member for Lambton West are an act of justice, of tardy justice towards the memory of a great man; I thank the hon. member for them and I congratulate him, the more so that it must have cost him an effort to say that which implied a censure against his leaders.

In spite of my criticisms and certain expressions, perhaps rather harsh, that I have borrowed from opponents for the purposes of debate, I accept, I repeat it, the accomplished fact and I am ready to second all legitimate and advantageous measures calculated to carry the work to a successful termination. But while accepting the situation, let us act like business men and like freemen, not like the vanquished of 1870, of whom the right hon. premier spoke in 1880.

First of all, if all these companies are not in a position to build the road, should we not be immediately advised of the true situation. Then, if the government is obliged to advance all the money, would it not be preferable to pay to the companies the value of the work they have done and take up the road as state property, with a view of disposing of it as soon as possible in favour of the company which may be in the best position to work it and especially to pay for it.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, if to secure the success of that colossal enterprise to which the country is now bound, it is necessary for us to grant this loan and to become the bankers of the companies, let us at all events stipulate that they will pay interest at a rate at least as high as that which the government itself is obliged to pay. The interest on the loan to the companies is fixed at 4 per cent, but the government may have to pay more than that; why not stipulate, therefore, that the companies shall pay whatever interest the government may be obliged to pay on loans?

Would it not also be advisable to make an attempt tending towards the settlement of the old claim of $25,000,000 due to the country by the Grand Trunk Company of Canada? If the claim must be lost, let us make the sacrifice at once and hear no more about it. If on the contrary, the claim is of any value, should we not attempt to have it paid? When favours are asked conditions may be imposed. The Grand Trunk Company of Canada owes us $25,000,000 and wishes to borrow $10,000,000 more.

Is it not time that we should say to them: We will give you this money, but at the same time we shall settle this old claim which dates away back before confederation. In one word, let us compel them to give us as security a certain amount of shares in the capital stock of the company, either common or preferred stock; let us become shareholders of the company. It is, according to me, the best security, a far better security than those mortgages in which Mr. Blake no more than I had any confidence whatever.

Mr. NANTEL.

Mr. TALBOT. What are those shares bringing to-day?

Mr. NANTEL. I must confess they are bringing very little just now, but before long they will be worth double their present value.

Mr. TALBOT. Mortgages will have to be paid first.

Mr. NANTEL. No doubt mortgages will have to be paid first, but the stock will always have a market value, and the government can always dispose of them to some advantage, while a mortgage like that which is held by the government against the Grand Trunk Railway is valueless, inasmuch as the government lacks the manliness to compel them to pay.

To conclude, I say that I am bound to accept the fait accompli, and that we must make the best possible arrangements with the company in order to ensure the proper carrying out of this huge project wherein is pledged the good name of the nation.

Mr. ALEXANDER McCALL (Norfolk). Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks on the question before the House, I need scarcely ask that the courtesy always extended to new members will be extended to me. I am glad to observe a spirit of fairness prevailing on both sides. In discussing this question, I cannot hope to touch upon more than a few phases of it, for it is too great a question for me to discuss in its entirety. But representing, as I do, one of the first organized counties in this Dominion, a county whose people have for more than a hundred years contributed to its taxes and to the cost of every public work, I wish to give voice to their sentiments on this question. Being a thrifty people, who have suffered hardships for the good of this nation, who in their early days gave of their strength to the nation's defence and to making the country habitable and fit to enjoy life in, they may justly feel some alarm at a proposition that means doubling their liabilities, and I would be unfaithful to them, if I failed to say something on the question before the House this afternoon.

The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals spoke of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway as a partnership. That idea is a good one. In reality, there are three parties to the partnership, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, the administration of the day, and the people of this country. In a business partnership it is a fundamental principle that all parties must be absolutely fair with each other. One must not take advantage of or be untrue to another, or else the partnership fails. Applying this thought to the proposed resolution, I think I can safely say that the people of Canada, the third party in the partnership, have not been treated fairly by the second party, the government of the day. Is there a gentleman in this House who will say seriously that if the people of this country had believed that they were facing a $300,000,000 proposition, or a $250,000,000 proposition, or even a $200,000,000 proposition, they would have ratified it four years ago? I will not take up the time of this House in discussing the promises made by the ministers as to the cost of the work to the country, whether it was $13,000,000 or $14,000,000, or which it was; but I say that a proposition which simply doubles the liabilities of this country, which increases the net debt of the country from $250,000,000 to $500,000,000, which places our liabilities at half a billion dollars, is not one that will receive the approval of the people of this country when placed before them in that bald, plain way. Therefore, I say that the third party in this partnership, the people of Canada, have been grossly deceived by the second party, the government, in the interest of the first party, the railway company, who did nothing but drive a very hard bargain with the government and now not only hold them to that bargain, but come and ask for this loan of $10,000,000, and the Minister of Railways and Canals would not say that this was the last call that he expected them to make. Instead of that, he rather intimated that there would be another call, and perhaps others after that. Clearly that is a breach of faith towards the third party in this transaction. To me and to others on this side of the House the Minister of Railways and Canals seems to have treated this important question in a spirit of levity. He spoke in a jocular way of the increased cost of the undertaking as a matter of course, referring to the Panama canal, the Erie canal and other canals whose cost outran the estimates of the engineers. But it is to be noted that the Panama canal will one day carry the ships of every nation, whose flags float the seas, and if it is to cost $400,000,000, the cost is to be borne by eighty million people, twelve times our population; and yet the sum to be expended on that one work is not much larger than the sum we are called upon to expend on this scheme. I am not discussing that proposition by way of comparison with this; but the point I wish to make is that if the cost of the work turns out to be anywhere from 50 per cent to 200 per cent more than the estimate of the engineers, then in estimating the cost of a work of this kind, after the engineers have done their worst, so to speak, the government should say to the people of Canada: 'While our engineers have estimated this work to cost $100,000,000, we will be frank with you and will say that it will cost $200,000,000;' you are going to pledge our future earnings and those of our children to this stupendous scheme, and we should know the liability we are to share. Need I ask this House if that information was given to the people of this country, so that they could vote no to the proposition if they chose? No, the reverse was the case.

Much was said by the Minister of Railways and Canals about the quality of the railway. Well, we ought to get the best railway in the country or on the continent, but I do not believe that the plans and estimates provide for this. Every one who knows anything about railway construction knows that the first consideration is a good tie. If you have a good tie, you can do with an indifferent rail and roadbed. An American standard tie is a tie 8 feet 6 inches long, 7 inches thick, 8 inches wide. The Pennsylvania, one of the great trunk lines in the United States uses a tie of those denominations, made of southern pitch pine or white oak. Bear in mind that that is the standard tie used by all the eastern trunk lines in the United States. But just consider the ties which are being laid on the National Transcontinental Railway—8 feet long, 6 inches thick, and 7 inches wide, and made of the cheapest timber known, namely, jack pine and tamarack. The roadbed and the rail may be sufficient, but that tie is not one which can stand any heavy traffic. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) speaks about the high standard of the road. Well, time will tell whether we get a freight standard road or not. In fact, it is a railway still on paper, and it will require actual observation when completed to see whether the minister's promises are made good or not.

I am not going to discuss the price. The great question is whether we are getting value for it. In dealing with the cost of this road, from the standpoint of our national resources, I propose to offer a few words; and I would ask hon. gentlemen to bear with me if I should appear careless and drop a million or two when dealing with the millions of this country. In handling hundreds of millions, one might easily drop an odd million or so, but our liabilities will not fail to turn up in good order. They will all be in their place when the time for payment comes and will have to be met by the tax payers. Before this country began to pay out money on account of the Transcontinental, our public debt was about $258,000,000. This sum represents all the debt of all the provinces at their entry into the confederation and all of the debts of the Dominion to the time of the announcement of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Taking the most moderate estimate—and I have not heard the Minister of Railways attempt this session to say just what sum of money is necessary to complete the work—this entire road, the eastern section, the prairie and the mountain sections and the government guarantee, will require $250,000,000.

That is a moderate estimate of our liabilities which must be paid within the next four or five years, making $500,000,000 in all. Admitting that to be the case, ought we not all to feel anxious that the country should keep its expenditures within its capacity to bear the burden? But that expenditure is not all we are committed to. There are other schemes which are bound to become national liabilities. For instance, the Hudson Bay Railway and the Georgian Bay canal. In connection with the latter scheme, the right hon. the Prime Minister last year said it was one which was near to his heart; and when the right hon. gentleman says that a scheme is near his heart and puts his hand there, that is good for a million. I hope we shall not have too many such schemes.

It is true that some people from a county right near the city of Toronto, came over here and asked for a sum of about a million, and it is said that there were a number of Tories in that delegation and that through their influence a sum was granted for the proposed expenditure. Let me say to the Prime Minister that if he knew the Tories of North York as some of us do, he would not give them a quarter of a million. He must not be too credulous on such occasions because when Tories come in company with Liberals, it is a sure sign that they are after the public treasury.

As I have said, other expenditures will be necessary, and we ought not to tie ourselves up to one large outlay, but must leave something to meet other requirements. Great questions are coming up and great obligations which will need money, and in this one matter of the National Transcontinental scheme, we have been altogether too generous. This scheme ought not to have been brought up at the time it was. We should have waited until the public demand was more insistent, and then, in estimating the cost of the road, we should have figures to submit to the country, based on the full knowledge of the extent of the burden we were assuming.

The question comes right here : What are you going to do about it ? That is the question we are facing to-day. Not only have we to meet the original obligation, but we are asked to pay another $10,000,000. Is there any guarantee that we may not be asked for still another $10,000,000 and still another until the entire cost of this transcontinental railway will be on the debt side of the ledger. You will find that the whole cost of the road will be our investment, and that in return we will assume 100 per cent of the risk and have none of the profits, whereas the Grand Trunk Railway will get all the profits, if there be any, and not have invested a cent in the undertaking. Would it not be possible at this stage to reconsider this scheme? Would it not be possible to ask for an extension of the time of the New Brunswick section? It is patent to every one that the New Brunswick section must compete with our own Intercolonial Railway and thereby render that railway of less value. Why should not the construction of the eastern portion of the road from Winnipeg to Moncton be delayed? The western section and the outlet to Lake Superior could be pushed rapidly so as to give that country an outlet to the lake. The traffic of that country is largely during the season of navigation. This might not only enable them to finance this scheme but it would look better to the country, and the feeling of the people that they have been deceived would gradually disappear. There is no question, this proposed loan will be made ; whether it meet with the approval of members on this side or not, it will be voted. I am glad to hear the expressions from hon. members on this side that they assume responsibility for this work and declare that it must eventually be pushed through to completion. I admit that I share in the belief expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite that that western country is a country of great promise, one that will need further outlets than those already provided.

I urge again upon the government due consideration for those who have really made the wealth of this country. We are the sons of the pioneers who came here in the latter part of the seventeenth century and in the early part of the eighteenth century, and, not only bore the burden of the defence of this country, but built it up, establishing and maintaining law and order, living thrifty lives and laying the foundations of our national wealth. The savings of our people in the government savings banks and in the chartered banks of our country help to finance these great schemes that we discuss in this parliament. There were periods in the lives of these pioneers when the failure of a harvest or the coming of illness into the home made their lives a tragedy. They faced destitution and want at times. Some regard should be paid to the sentiments of people of that class. If we succeed, it will be upon their thrift and energy. In a question of this kind, involving such a large sum of money, a scheme that means the doubling of our national obligations ought not to be entered upon. The people ought to be treated at all times by the ministers who have charge of the public expenditure in a serious spirit, and in an earnest way, so that their expressions may command respect among the people. I hope that parliament will consider this question, perhaps I should say more seriously than it has, but in the light of our ability to bear the enormous burden of this Grand Trunk Pacific scheme. Whatever may be the result, even should our worst fears be realized, we can depend upon the Canadian people to meet the responsibility with the high courage characteristic of the nation to which we belong.

Mr. MARTIN BURRELL (Yale-Cariboo). I do not wish to unnecessarily delay the House in going into committee on the proposed Bill, but I do desire to make a few general observations before the matter is specifically dealt with by way of amendment in committee. And I may add that my justification for so doing must be the fact that I have gone through two long and wearisome campaigns with the Grand Trunk Pacific matter, affording a great deal of ammunition in those campaigns. I followed very carefully the different speeches made in this Grand Trunk Pacific debate since the Finance Minister introduced the resolution. While concurring, as members of both sides of the House do, that it is desirable that this work should finish speedily and efficiently, I wish to utter my protest against the methods adopted and the statements made by the government, and also against the extraordinarily favourable position in which this company has been placed in contradistinction to the position occupied by the people of Canada. I notice that the general line of argument adopted by the government has been designed to show that we, as members of the Conservative party, are opposed to the construction of this road. Probably the wish is father to the thought when these arguments are adduced. Secondly, they attempt to say that they are doing what we did as a Conservative party in connection with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. And, thirdly, we have been treated to a great many elaborate and very misleading statements indeed as to the supposed wholesale and sweeping endorsation of the government's policy by the people. Let me refer for half a moment to the first line of argument that the supporters of the government have been taking during this whole debate. Coupled with and reinforcing the argument that we are opposed to the construction of the road have been some magniloquent speeches as to the greatness of this country, given to the House 'ore rotundo' and implying how small is the faith of members on this side in the country in which our lot is cast. It is a rather singular attitude for the Liberal party to take. I have no desire to dwell upon this point, because these pyrotechnic utterances are not intended to deceive anybody. I suppose we all have our party balloons to inflate, and duly inflate them. But I would point out that it is comparatively easy to display faith when somebody else has blazed the way and, by noble foresight and high endeavour, has laid the foundations on which we of the later generation can happily and safely build. Hon. members on the other side need not distress themselves as to the faith in our country of a party whose leader, in the teeth of most appalling difficulties, consummated the policy of opening up the vast hinterland which was literally terra incognita in those days, and made it possible for the people of my own province of British Columbia to unite their fortunes with those of the people of Eastern Canada. The The name of Sir John Macdonald will ever stand out as that of a man having faith and faith accompanied with great works. The party which took so large a part in laying deep and broad the foundation of this nation which has coupled the east and the west, which established a trade policy which has now lasted for thirty years, will not be found lacking at this particular time in the most whole-hearted efforts in advancing the interests of the country and heightening its prosperity. But in doing so it by no means follows that we have to endorse every phase and every detail of the great scheme now under consideration, and which in so many of its details and phases is so regardless and careless of the rights and true interests of the people of Canada.

The second line of argument addressed to the House by hon. gentlemen opposite was a comparison with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not wish to deal at length with that. I would say, however, that the comparison is a most unfortunate one for those who make it. It has been pointed out in this House that the Liberal party themselves, between 1873 and 1878, made as large or larger offers of land grants and money to the Canadian Pacific than the Conservative party made. The attitude of our friends opposite is somewhat changed in recent years. I notice that last session the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) so far from taking the attitude which our friends the enemy delighted to take in years gone by, stated that we had liberally assisted and aided the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that it was not for him to say, and he would not say, that we had aided and assisted them too liberally. Then I need only point out also that in regard to this loan the difference is so vital and so marked that it is remarkable that the argument is used at all, and the comparison made. In that admirable speech that was delivered by my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) on this subject some time ago, he showed the fundamental difference that existed between this loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific and the loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway some years ago, of $30,000,000. He pointed out that the Canadian Pacific Railway people pledged their land, their railway, their equipment, their branch lines, the whole institution, lock, stock and barrel, and repaid the whole thing within two years. For that reason, I say, it is astonishing that a comparison of this kind is made by our friends opposite, and one cannot but think that if it is made, it cannot be made in good faith.

Now this loan only accentuates the free and easy way in which the government has been dealing with this House on behalf of a company which was in a sense a partner of the government. I listened attentively yesterday to the speech of the Minister of Railways and Canals. We on our side of the House, I think many of us, always listen with a good deal of pleasure to that hon. gentleman. He is so good natured that he compels a certain amount of acceptance, although we have to dissent from a good many of his arguments. I must say that his speech yesterday certainly stamps him as the Harold Skimpole of the government side. He has the same dazzling way of dealing with figures, he also has that magnificent disregard of responsibility that characterized the gentleman I have referred to. Like Harold Skimpole, I think the Minister exhibits also the same easy disdain of such gross and material things as days of reckoning, and discharge of liability. The Minister of Railways yesterday laboured the idea of partnership. I think his words were that he did not believe that we should get stock for the accommodation we were giving the company, that it was rather a sordid idea, and that we must finance this railway because we have to carry it through at all costs, because we were in partnership. That is true, but after all the Canadian people, one party in partnership will be called upon in future time to pay very high rates on the enormous cost of construction to a company which had apparently never assumed any serious obligations, and who will reap all the profits. Last session the attitude of the Minister of Railways was slightly different. He figured it out on that occasion that the total liability, that is the actual cash we should have to pay would be $38,263,976 for the benefits we receive from this through line from Moncton to the Pacific coast. He added that if:

> Instead of taking this out of revenue we borrowed it at 3 per cent,—I find that for the great benefit we will receive this country will have to pay annually the sum of $1,144,919.28.

Before finishing his speech he also added:

> I believe the Grand Trunk Pacific Company will never call on the Dominion of Canada to pay one cent of the guarantee of the bonds, nor one cent of the 3 per cent interest on the cost of the railway.

The fact that instead of borrowing at 3 per cent, we have had, as my hon. friend from St. Antoine pointed out the other day, to pay something like 4½ per cent, for the last big loan, and something like $450,000 in commission, besides brokerage charges, and the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific are now coming to us for another loan of $10,000,000, I presume, won't disturb the Minister of Railways at all as he apparently regards this whole thing in an extremely light and jovial spirit. He introduced a new line of argument yesterday, he had to face facts to some extent, and he attempted to draw a parallel with other great lines of railways and with undertakings in other countries. For instance he tried to draw a parallel between it and the Erie canal, an unfortunate illustration, as that undertaking was permeated through and through with the most gigantic graft. Then he dealt with the Panama canal. He seems rather prone to draw his illustrations from canals. The other day he defended the Newmarket canal, and now he is treating us to arguments which remind us, not only of Harold Skimpole's methods, but of Mark Twain's humour, so that it is hard for us to take him seriously. The Minister of Railways also stated as a justification for this loan, that the matter had been discussed on the hustings in 1904 and 1908, this question had been discussed in all its bearings, the voice of the people had been asked, and they had given it ample endorsation.

Now, I would like to consider that argument for a moment. In 1903 we had a speech from the Throne, which, as speeches from the Throne are usually supposed to do, should have outlined broadly the policy of the government for that session. There was no allusion made to this project at all. There was, as I remember, only a reference to the fact that the needs of transportation were considerable, and a commission was to be appointed to go into that question. But nothing was done, or little was done. But to the astonishment, not only of the House but of the country, the right hon. gentleman who leads the fortunes of the Liberal party, about five months after the House met, divulged a plan which embraced, to all intents and purposes, the present Grand Trunk Pacific Railway scheme from ocean to ocean. Now in spite of the right hon. gentleman having shelved that commission, in spite of any defence he might have offered for that scheme, yet he was entitled to credit for originating a great idea and disclosing the scheme, although it was only a scheme in embryo. But if he had later on submitted it in skeleton to the House and country to see with what sympathy it would be received, no word of criticism could have been offered;

if it had been endorsed by the people of the country no one would have said anything deprecating the project. But what actually happened? Nothing of the sort. Without any mandate from the people at all for a scheme of so gigantic a character, we find the right hon. gentleman was closeted with one of the most astute railway magnates on this continent, for a long time, and that, desirous of the kudos which should perhaps rightly attach to the formation of any large scheme, he allowed himself to be outwitted in every part of the game, and we had the scheme forced through parliament, the government refusing to wait either for advice or for the people's opinion. One of the ministers, Mr. Blair, said that he urged him to wait, and that if he didn't wait it must be because there was an absence of any really good and substantial argument to sustain the case. We know that Mr. Blair, the only gentleman who was thoroughly conversant with railway affairs in the government at that time, was villified on that side of the House. Later on he was promoted or rewarded by a very high post, because the government usually find that it is the better way of silencing opponents. Now when that agreement was finally signed, sealed and delivered, and supposed to be lived up to, hon. gentlemen will remember what happened. Sir Charles Rivers Wilson, president of the railway company, in speaking to his shareholders after the close of that session, told them that he had succeeded in driving the government into adopting a position more favourable to the company, that is, in amending the contract. I do not think there is any doubt that from that day to this the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific have insistently and persistently driven the government of this country. The government called another session of parliament for the purpose of considering the ratification of the altered or amended contract. We all know the great differences between the original and the amended contract. I am not going into that matter in detail except to point out one or two of these differences. We contended that the original contract was unfair to the people of Canada, but we were assured by the government that it was a fair contract and that at all events it was finally settled. Yet, we find, amongst a great many other serious alterations, alterations of a vital character that, whereas, before the people had undertaken to guarantee three-quarters of the bonds of the mountain section of this road up to a limit of $30,000 a mile, afterwards that was amended by striking out the words '$30,000 a mile', and we undertake now to guarantee three-quarters of the cost of the mountain section to an unlimited amount. At the commencement of the session in which this change was made the mover of the address stated that while this was an important amendment the road might cost $30,000 a mile or it might cost less. When the prairie section is costing about $35,000 a mile it is a bold man who would estimate the cost of the mountain section, although I understand that the government, or the railway company, have put it somewhere about $80,000 per mile. Then, in paragraphs 31, 32 and 33 of the old contract there was at least some provision made for securing the people if the company fell down. There was some right of foreclosure. If the government felt called upon to pay the interest on the bonds after a specified time there was some little security offered. We find in the amended contract that it is amended in such a way that practically all the security is done away with. In paragraph 6 we find these words:

> Notwithstanding anything in the said contract contained, the government shall not exercise any rights in respect of possession, foreclosure or sale, by reason of non-payment of interest by the company under the thirty-first, thirty-second or thirty-third paragraphs of the said contract, or under all or any of them, unless and until there shall be such default to the extent in the whole of a sum equal to five years of such interest, as the company is not relieved from payment of or permitted to defer or capitalize by the provisions of the said paragraphs.

We find that the limited right that we had in the shape of a foreclosure, the little security we had in the first contract, was so interfered with by the amended contract that every safeguard is done away with and is reduced to so shadowy a point that it is impossible to see anything except that if the undertaking should prove unprofitable the government are at liberty to take it over and then they may hand it back when the affairs of the company have become more prosperous. There are other important differences which I shall not touch upon. It was not enough that this amended contract was bad but, by the aid of the government supporters, it was put through parliament immediately before an appeal to the country was made. That may have been a good party move, I do not say it was not, but to say that the result was the voice of the country in even a partial way is to say something which is absolutely untrue. When our friends say that they have been sustained and that they have the confidence of the people, I would like to ask them what sort of an endorsation it was. They had the people tied hand and foot to a contract of this sort before the appeal was made. What was the character of the whole campaign?

We were told throughout the length and breadth of this country the one horrible thing that was presented to the people by Conservatives was the repudiation of a contract solemnly entered into by the government. That word 'repudiation' would have such an ugly sound that no true Canadian would dream of supporting a man who would put forth a policy of that kind. The people were told that every Conservative candidate was opposed to the construction of the road, and that if the Conservative party were put in control the scheme would be destroyed. This repudiation phrase was worked to a finish throughout my own province and not only that but gentlemen supporting the Liberal government in British Columbia laid enormous stress upon the question of speedy construction. My hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman) who, I am sorry to see, is not in his place, particularly made great efforts in that direction. He assured the people of the Pacific coast, that, although there was nothing in the contract to that effect, he had Mr. Hay's assurance that the road would be commenced at once. They so persuaded the people of British Columbia that construction was going on at once that, in their desire for the early construction of the road, and in their natural deprecation of anything that savoured of repudiation, it is perhaps small wonder that the whole of that province went Liberal at that time. If, however, they had known what the facts were, if they had known that not a sod was to be turned in British Columbia for four years it is natural to assume that we would have seen a different state of things. There is an old saying that once bitten twice shy. The same appeal was made last fall, the same arguments were advanced, but, although British Columbia wanted to see that road built and although the people there still have faith not only in the road but in the country, the result was that while there was a Liberal majority in 1904 of 2,872, there was a Conservative majority of 4,091 in 1908. In the first contract which was put before the people of the country we were assured, as the right hon. gentleman who formulated the scheme also assured us, that there was a tremendous haste for the thing to go through. There was a clause which dealt with the time and which placed the completion of the road in the year 1908. In paragraph 10 of the contract we have this:

> The work of locating and constructing the said western division shall be commenced forthwith after the ratification of this agreement by the parliament of Canada, and shall proceed with the utmost dispatch and shall be completed within five years from the first day of December, 1903, unless prevented by the act of God, the King's enemies, internal disturbances, epidemics, floods or other causes beyond the control of the company.

This, as we know, was altered in this amended contract to 1911 and the word 'strikes' was also put in after these other contingencies which were mentioned. I might point out that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) made a good deal of the unforeseen and tremendous difficulties that they had met with and what had resulted in bringing about the present position of affairs. I do not know that the King's enemies, or any act of God, or floods or strikes, have greatly interfered with the operations of the company. I might illustrate that point by a very short allusion. Some time ago a case was brought up by a certain farmer against a man to whom he had leased his land. One of the stipulations of the lease was that the land was to be left in as good a state as when the tenant had taken it, as to the seeding down to wheat and so on, unless the act of God interfered. It seems that the tenant did not leave it in as good a state, and when the case came up for trial one of the points to be decided was whether the act of God had anything to do with it or whether it was due to the man's own fault, and the jury brought in a verdict that there had been damage and that the fault was partly that of the defendant and partly God's. I take it that the present government, who are so ready to ignore the existence of a kind providence when things are going smoothly, will always contend, when things are not going smoothly, that it is the act of God. The haste which was so necessary in 1903 and which led the government to allow the company only until 1908 to finish their construction was forgotten, and the time extended to January, 1911. I do not think that any sane man believes that 1911 will see anything like the completion of the road. The government brag that they have been endorsed by the people, but that endorsation is of no value under the circumstances. In the olden times, when the country was supposed to be afflicted with witches, a test, known to every one acquainted with history, was employed to determine whether a woman was a witch or not. The woman suspected had her right thumb tied to her left big toe and her left thumb tied to her right big toe, and, thus bound, she was thrown into a pond. If she sank she was not a witch and was unfortunately drowned. If she did not sink she was a witch and was unfortunately burned. That is like the test that was applied to public opinion in this case. The government tell us the country has endorsed them, that the people have voluntarily approved of their course. First, they tied the country hand and foot and then they issued a repudiation argument, and when the people endorsed them in reference to these things the government said: This is a full endorsation of the whole scheme. The same methods were employed to some extent in 1908. Last fall we again had the frantic appeal that we should again put my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in to finish his work. I do not say that in a sense it was not perhaps good party politics of my hon. friend to lie low and say nothing about this loan, but I question the honesty of that procedure. When we know that Mr. Hays' letter asking for this loan was dated only November 16, I think we are absolutely justified in believing that this was a compact, if not signed, sealed and delivered, at least thoroughly understood between the right hon. gentleman and the Grand Trunk Pacific; and although it is true that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was too astute to acknowledge that there was such a compact, he was also too honest to deny that there was a compact.

The right hon. gentleman cannot be allowed to congratulate either himself or his party on a scheme of this kind. I do not believe he has shown the great and prudent statesmanship he might have shown in connection with this whole matter, but rather that he has woefully failed to rise to a real sense of his duty to the people of Canada. In this I do not say that I am voicing the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite or even all of my friends on this side, but I say from my own point of view that at that time Canada was at the parting of the ways, and while some people do not share my views, I say that, having evolved a great scheme for a transcontinental railway from ocean to ocean which included the principle of government ownership in the eastern section, the right hon. gentleman displayed a grievous lack of foresight in not applying that principle to the whole road, adopting it from ocean to ocean. In 1904 I campaigned for five long months on this ground, and on the programme of the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) of government ownership from ocean to ocean being infinitely preferable to the bargain the government have made, and from the extreme north to the extreme south of the immense riding which I have the honour to represent I obtained an enthusiastic response. More than that, had my election come on on the same day as other elections I would have won out hands down on that very appeal for government ownership. Hon. gentlemen here know that what I might call almost a scurvy trick, at all events a shady trick was played in deferring the election, yet in spite of that and in spite of the fact that the government had been sustained all through the country, I was defeated by so small a majority that a change of one vote in each polling place would have elected me. Therefore when my right hon. friend and the Minister of Railways, the Minister of Finance and other gentlemen on the other side of the House talk of optimism and of faith in our country, I would like to see them extend their optimism and faith a little further. There is at this moment no subject which is so agitating the public mind and which is of such importance in the development of democratic government in this country as the great question of public franchises, and I say that it is a true patriotism which not only looks out for to-day but studies the needs of the country for years to come. Those who embrace Socialism in many cases are driven to it from the multiplication of millionaires whose wealth comes from the unearned increment and the sweat and toil of others to which they have not contributed. We have great abuses in our industrial system to-day and I do not say that these abuses would be solved by the appropriation of the wealth of individuals by the State. I do not believe that any State has the right to kill private initiative. There must be room for private enterprise and a man is entitled to what he justly earns, but I would point out that we are having daily forced home the necessity of the people of the country owning its great public franchises. Public ownership of this great Transcontinental Railway system need not necessarily mean government operation. It did not involve government operation as my right hon. friend knows in respect of the eastern section, although here again I say I have perhaps felt greater faith than some of my friends in government operation. I admit that it is practically impossible to have successful government operation of large industrial enterprises as long as our government operations are riddled by party politics, but it is a want of faith to say that successful government operation is impossible. We could eliminate partyism and employ in government work only men who are thoroughly trained and thoroughly capable of discharging the duties devolving upon them, not simply hack politicians, reaping their reward for party services. I say that the principle is fundamentally and eternally right, and to assert that the people of Canada are not capable of carrying out this principle in their national life is not to display courage and patriotism but something quite the reverse.

Speaking of the loan which is now before the House, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) have said that the Grand Trunk Pacific can sell their own bonds at about 90 cents on the dollar, and yesterday they said that therefore the margin of 10 per cent is practically all the money on which we are running any risk or on which we could sustain any loss. Why should we saddle ourselves with more debts? Why should we pay out great sums in commissions and brokerage to save the pockets of the people who already owe the country $15,000,000 of capital to say nothing of interest? If either claim is true it would be almost better to pay the Grand Trunk Pacific people that ten per cent margin and have done with it. Why was not that proposition made, in order that we should at least know the limits of our obligations? We all know, it has been pointed out in unmistakable terms, that this loan practically means that we shall repay the Grand Trunk people $7,000,000 expended for the Grand Trunk Pacific. This company already owes us an immense amount and its chief men are in various ways making immense fortunes out of this work without advancing any money and without taking any risks. The Grand Trunk Railway, by guaranteeing one-quarter of the bonds, receive $25,000,000 worth of stock for which apparently they do not give one dollar's worth of cash or its equivalent. The contract of 1903 contained a clause practically compelling them, if they took that $25,000,000 worth of stock, to give cash or the equivalent of cash. On page 11203 of 'Hansard' of 1903 we have these questions:

Mr. BARKER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask the minister a question? Will he tell us how the Grand Trunk Pacific is going to build branch lines and buy rolling stock by giving away their stock to the Grand Trunk Railway Company?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. They cannot give it away. They must get cash in exchange for it. The very face of the contract shows the untenable position which my hon. friends take.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. gentleman overlooks the fact that the contract says that the Grand Trunk Railway Company must get at once the whole $25,000,000. If they get the whole $25,000,000 at once, how is the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway going to use that to build the railway?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. My hon. friend supplies the obvious answer. The answer is because the Grand Trunk Railway will pay for it and give the money. My hon. friend supplies the answer to his whole argument.

At that time, then, these people, who were taking some little part in this project, were required for that $25,000,000 of the common stock to give its full equivalent, either in cash or in some other valuable form ; and yet in the cloudy and ambiguous amendments made since, they have been relieved of that obligation, and they get the $25,000,000 of common stock for no value except the guarantee of the bonds.

The reason I have so little sympathy for the Grand Trunk Pacific people is that they are making money out of this project in a variety of ways. Besides the assistance we are giving them, they are making money through their townsite company, in the marvellous way in which railway companies always make money out of the unearned increment. This has been well shown by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), who said, at page 4188 of 'Hansard' :

We find that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company hands over all its town sites to a separate company called the Grand Trunk Pacific Town Site and Development Company. I find that the directors of this company are C. M. Hays and friends. There are thirty thousand shares of stock in this Grand Trunk Pacific Town Site and Development Company. The directors, according to the return brought down by the Minister of Railways, are C. M. Hays, E. J. Chamberlin, William Wainwright, W. H. Biggar and E. H. Fitzhugh, all of them directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific also, each of whom owns two shares and has paid $200. That is to say, these five directors who have the management and control of the Grand Trunk Pacific Town Site and Development Company have only invested $1,000, in the institution, which controls and owns eighty-one town sites between Winnipeg and Edmonton. The acreage is 78,640 acres. There we have that acreage, composed chiefly of town sites made valuable by the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, which we are financing, and these gentlemen who have only invested $1,000 are controlling the whole company. In addition to that, they own a three-quarters interest in the whole town site of Prince Rupert.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the reason why we are relieved of any feeling of sympathy for these men, who in various ways are making an enormous amount of money out of the people of this country.

Mr. SPROULE. What did they pay for the townsites?

Mr. BURRELL. I have not the figures, but I know that they did not pay very much for those in British Columbia. For Prince Rupert, I think they paid something like $2.50 an acre; but we made a much better bargain than the Federal government, because we retained one-fourth for the people of British Columbia.

This company have been astute enough to see that the government and the people of Canada are kept off their most valuable asset, namely, the branch lines and the terminals. In the contract of 1903, we have this paragraph:

35a. A mortgage which shall be a first charge upon the railway, undertaking, equipment and property, tolls, rights and franchises of the company, including all equipment and property to be thereafter acquired by the company (but not including branch lines exceeding six miles in length or the revenue therefrom or the franchises in connection therewith, or such additional rolling stock as may, with the assent of the government, be designated and marked by the company as constituting the equipment thereof, and not including ships or any municipal or provincial grants of land, by way of bonus or subsidy, to the said company for other than railway purposes) to secure the payment of the said issue of first mortgage bonds guaranteed by the government.

That is to say, they give us a security, but when they give it they take care to keep out of it all the good and tangible assets. Contrast that with the bargain made by the Conservative government with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which our friends opposite talk so much about. In that case the company threw in every branch line and every terminal they had, as security.

In the face of these facts my own feeling is—and I am voicing the feeling of a large number of the people of western Canada, that if this loan must go through, if the government have neglected, as I believe they have, the true interest of the country, these people should give some adequate security for the loan. It is not a case of an eye for an eye, of stock for stock, or anything of that sort. We Conservatives believe in giving help when it is necessary and there is just reason for giving it; but if we are to be the bankers of this institution, let us behave as bankers should. If we pledge our credit for them, let us hold that common stock as security until they have paid their debt. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has rightly said that the needs of the great west are obvious to the government. We believe that it is the duty of the government to think twice before handing out in this lavish way the moneys of the people of this country without seeing that the just needs of the people are met. I will conclude by emphasizing the fact that we in the west believe in this road, we want to see it assisted where that assistance is necessary and justifiable, we want to see it extended in every reasonable and just way, but we hold that when that is done the rights and interests of the taxpayers of this country should be safeguarded. This is the position which I placed before the electors of my constituency, and which was endorsed by them in the strongest possible way, and I do not hesitate to place it before this House.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara). Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to repeat the arguments that have been made on this side of the House as to the improvident nature of this proposed loan—improvident from the point of view of the people of Canada—which I am afraid the government have overlooked; but I wish to emphasize one or two aspects of the question which have struck me. The bargain which was made by the government representing the people in 1903, and modified in the interest of the company in 1904, it has been said was approved of by the country in the general election following. But I wish to emphasize here a matter that he touched upon but did not go into quite as fully as he might have, probably because he was not in the House at the time. It was only two years after that second bargain, that the most profitable part of the undertaking was deliberately put in the name of another institution so that it would not be liable for the obligations which either the Grand Trunk Railway or the Grand Trunk Pacific had assumed in those two contracts that the people were supposed to have passed on in the elections of 1904. The Act to incorporate the Grand Trunk Pacific branch lines company came up in this House in 1906. I opposed it, and so did other hon. gentlemen, in the Railway Committee and in this House, but it was voted through by the government and its supporters, notwithstanding the fact that they practically made no reply to the objection that those branch lines, which were to be the main source of revenue and profit and I may say of solvency, in the case of these companies with which we had contracted, were being put in the name of another institution, thereby avoiding entirely the obligations which the people of Canada had against the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railway. After the two bargains had been made in 1904 and 1903, which my constituents and myself considered bad bargains for the country, the next serious thing done was the establishing of that company for the construction of branch lines, and thus relieving those branch lines, which are to be the great source of profit to the main line, from any liability for the obligations of the Grand Trunk Railway or the Grand Trunk Pacific. Following that concession, I was surprised to learn this session that the government proposed to advance the Grand Trunk Pacific $10,000,000 more. What was always the contention of the government? They said: 'If you will give these companies all they ask, they will certainly be able to give you profitable railway transportation for the people.' And they put through this most unbusinesslike and purely philanthropic legislation in order to remove all possible danger and doubt of these companies not being able to carry out their obligations. The intention then was that by this legislation regarding the construction of the branch lines, we would make it certain that these lines would be speedily built and the much desired transportation facilities afforded. But we find to-day that none of those lines have been built, and that nothing has been done except that we have paid out a lot of money. We find that the Grand Trunk Railway has been getting all the benefit without giving any actual value in return, but simply acting as the endorsers of the Grand Trunk Pacific. We find that the Grand Trunk Railway has been allowed to get stock in the Grand Trunk Pacific in return for their mere endorsation, just as a broker would charge for lending his name to enable some one to raise a loan, without giving any actual value. The government have acted on the assumption that the whole benefit to this country, which this country need expect, consists in hurrying up the completion of all the transportation facilities required and supposed to be served by the construction of this railway. Having in view the great concessions which we gave in 1903 and 1904, no one expected that any attempt would be made to incorporate the branch lines under any other name than that of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Let me point out that every opportunity was given the government to protect the people by adding a condition in the Act incorporating the branch lines company, which would make these branch lines subject to the same obligations as the parent company. I urged that in the railway committee: and when the Bill came back from that committee, I had the temerity to move an amendment providing that that charter should not in any way impair the security or lien of this government, but that the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch lines should be held liable with regard to the branch lines in exactly the same way as it was in the original contract. The amendment was objected to by the government, and the Bill passed without that protective clause. On the third reading of the Bill, I felt it my duty to move the six month hoist, but that also was voted down, and the government passed the Bill regarding the branch lines without any protection to the people.

On this side we have always contended that if we are to provide practically nine-tenths of the cost of the railway, we might as well own the railway. If the people had believed in 1904 that that railway was going to cost what we then contended it would, and what time has proved it will cost, there is not the slightest doubt that the government would have been swept out of power. But the people said : 'We have the word of the Prime Minister that it will only cost $13,000,000.' Campaign literature of the government had on its front page in large letters the inscription: 'A new Transcontinental Railway for $13,000,000', and it also contained the statement of the Prime Minister, who had made the bargain and claimed to know all about it and whose Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) had left this cabinet because he differed from them on that question, that the road would be built for $13,000,000. The people believed that we were entirely wrong, that we were unduly afraid, that we were the victims of our imaginations, and relied on the pledge of the Prime Minister, circulated in all his campaign literature, that they would get this Transcontinental Railway for $13,000,000. They had not then the slightest idea that these branch lines would be taken away from our security, that the security of the people would be impaired by the building of these branch lines by another company. Now, what do we find ? Either the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railway are not able to carry out their contract with the people or else they are able and are asking for $10,000,000 as a gift. One thing or other must be the case. If they cannot carry out their contract, if they cannot build the road with all the assistance given them, with all the legislation passed entirely in their interests and upon a basis which would not be dreamed of in any other business transaction—if they cannot, with all these advantages, build the railway, what ought we to do? We ought to let them default and then take over the railway ourselves and own it and operate it or lease it to somebody else.

It is contended that this railway policy of the government will be of great advantage to the country because the earnings of the railway will be great and the traffic enormous. Let me submit this point. We are here to make a bargain for the people, and I concede that we must not be mean in doing it or pessimistic or afraid of the future of our country. Now, the Grand Trunk Pacific either can carry out the contract without this $10,000,000 or they cannot. If they cannot, they are no railway builders, and we can find somebody else who will build that road on better terms. The Grand Trunk Pacific contended that in 1903 and 1904 that with the assistance then given them they could carry out the work. Were they deceiving us then? Were they not honest in making us believe that, with the assistance then given them and the additional assistance which they got in being allowed to build branch lines free from the obligations they had originally incurred, they could complete the road. If they were not, we ought not to lend them this $10,00,000. If they were then honest, they are not entitled to this loan, because they do not understand their business. Take the other alternative, if they can build this road without this $10,000,000, why not let them do it, or borrow the money somewhere else. Why should Canada give them this money and lead them to believe that all they have to do is to come to the government and say :

'We need the money and because you have already incurred such large, obligations, you must give us all we want more.'

Now, not to detain the House at too great length, in view of the fact that these matters are not answered seriously by any one upon the government side, in view of the condition in which this debate is at this moment—that, notwithstanding what was said in regard to the resolution by hon. members of the opposition, from our respected leader down, there is no answer to these propositions or suggestions as to the improvident nature of this loan, I am not prepared to vote (speaking for myself and my constituents) for the second reading of the Bill. For, as the Bill stands, there is no protection in it, and I am afraid that if I were to declare myself as voting for the second reading, it might be said by some that I had been willing to adopt the principle of the measure, and the principle is all wrong if it is to be judged by the arguments that have been used up to this time. If we have to throw more money into this deal, then it simply means that we have to pay for this whole road from Moncton to the Pacific. Under these circumstances, we ought not to grant the loan. As the effect of this is that we must pay for the road, it will be much better for the government to own it and either operate it or hand it over to the Grand Trunk Pacific or some other institution to operate it on rental. This would be much better than going on with this legislation that we now have before us.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. R. L. BORDEN What is the estimate of the Minister of Finance as to the actual cost to the country by way of interest on the loan which will be necessary for the purpose of raising this money?

Mr. FIELDING. It is difficult to determine that to a fraction. Our last loan, as stated here, cost us a shade over four per cent. By the way, I notice that to-day an hon. gentleman not only quoted that at a shade over four per cent, but added various charges. Of course, four and a fraction covered the charges referred to. If this loan were placed on the market at this moment, we might have to pay four per cent, but I think the probability is that we can get it a shade less. I think the tendency of the money market is rather downard, and our next loan should be on somewhat better terms than the last.

Mr. AMES. When quoting four per cent, does the hon. minister mean the nominal percentage or the interest including expenses?

Mr. FIELDING. In quoting four and a fraction, that meant the unit rate. I think we ought to realize a shade better. That will depend on the condition of the market.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If it is a banking transaction, why should there be any doubt about it?

Mr. FIELDING. There is no doubt about the rate we are to charge.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am aware of that. But there is certainly doubt as to whether that rate will indemnify the country. This is a banking transaction, and bankers usually get in deposits at a certain rate and lend them out at a higher rate. I am not disposed to press that argument unduly in this respect, but surely it is a fair proposition that the country ought to receive as much interest as it pays. If there is any doubt, as there seems to be—and the doubt entertained by others may be greater than that entertained by the Minister of Finance—I should think that some provision might be embodied in the Bill which would make that absolutely certain and which would thoroughly safeguard the country against any loss in respect of the interest on this loan.

Mr. FIELDING. That is hardly necessary. It is desirable there should be a fixed and definite rate on the loan, and that should be made, as nearly as may be, the rate that will guard against loss. I think it is just as likely that this rate will show a profit as that it will show a loss. We take that risk. I think that in the present tendency of the money market we are not likely to pay more than four, and the probability is as strongly in favour of our getting it at less.

Mr. AMES. As I understand it, the government will actually have to borrow the money before it will lend—the transaction of borrowing will have to be completed before lending commences?

Mr. FIELDING. As soon as the preliminaries are settled, we should begin to use money out of existing funds if any are available. But that we would later make good, so, practically the answer to the hon. gentleman's question would be 'Yes.' The government moneys all go into a general fund. If anything is taken from that general fund for this purpose, steps must be taken to replace it.

Mr. AMES. Is it not probable that the minister will not be acquainted with the effective rate of interest per unit prior to the time he will be called upon to pay out the first instalment?

Mr. FIELDING. Possibly not. If our finances generally were in condition to allow it, we would pay them the money the moment they comply with the provisions of the Act. But, immediately, we should have to borrow it, and so the two transactions go together.

Mr. AMES. Has the minister taken any steps to float a new loan having this in view?

Mr. FIELDING. No formal steps have been taken, but we are watching the money market and intend to take the steps when the proper moment arrives.

Mr. AMES. The minister will watch his chance, and, when he sees the proper moment has arrived, will float a new loan?

Mr. FIELDING. We will watch the money market and will seize the most favourable moment for making the loan, as in the past.

Mr. MONK. If, before the loan is finally disposed of, there is some financing to be done, as there was in the case of the Quebec bridge, and we pay a higher rate than four per cent, is this going to be charged to the Grand Trunk Pacific? It is probable that the moment the statute is passed the money will be sought for by the construction company. It is not probable that we could get money at four per cent, but shall be obliged to pay more than that. Speaking, generally, would it not be better for this section to be so framed that the country would recoup itself, as bankers do, from the loan to the railway company the whole amount of interest that we are obliged to pay?

Mr. FIELDING. Then, we should have to associate with that the provision that, in the event of our borrowing the money on more favourable terms, we would give them back the difference.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Why ?

Mr. FIELDING. We have the suggestion of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) that we should charge exactly what it costs us.

Mr. MONK. I could understand that, for the purpose of negotiating a loan, the rate must be fixed by statute—at least, I conceive that that is possible. In connection with the question put by my hon. friend from St. Antoine, Montreal, (Mr. Ames), would it not be possible to ascertain what are the whole charges to which we are going to be subjected? What are the accidents of the loan, so to speak, so as to fix the rate we shall absolutely require?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think it would be possible to ascertain definitely. If this legislation were completed immediately, and the Grand Trunk Pacific were to comply with the requirements of this statute respecting the mortgage and so forth, and if we had the money in hand, there is no reason why we should not give them that money instantly. But of course, we should have to include it in our borrowing powers, borrowing at the market rate. I think the situation is such as enables us to say that we are just as likely to borrow at a shade below four per cent, as we are to pay four per cent, or about.

Mr. AMES. There is no necessity for settling the rate of interest the moment the first advance is made to the company. The company want the money as soon as they can get it, and they have to pay the interest on it semi-annually. Consequently, the first interest payment will not be due until six months after the first instalment is advanced, and in the course of those six months the government can tell exactly what that money has cost to raise; consequently they could without difficulty bill the company at that rate, the rate it actually costs to get that money.

Mr. FIELDING. I think it would be more satisfactory to have a fixed rate, leaving no doubt whatever, and in fixing that rate we have estimated that we will be able to borrow money at four per cent. I have a decided opinion that we are quite as likely to borrow at a shade below four per cent as above; and therefore the company is taking as much risk as we are.

Mr. AMES. Judging from past experience, the company is likely to get the best of that gamble. I think we should protect ourselves.

Mr. LENNOX. From the minister's experience of loans, about how much will it cost to float this loan of $10,000,000?

Mr. FIELDING. We don't stop to consider what the expenses are, only to get the net result. When I say four per cent, I think that will cover all expenses. In fixing the cost of a loan we include all expenses. I am assuming it will cost four per cent, it may be a fraction above four per cent, but it is just as likely to be below, in which case the company takes the risk.

Mr. LENNOX. I think there was a return brought down some time ago which showed that it cost for floating loans somewhere between two and three per cent.

Mr. FIELDING. They are expressed in net rates in each case.

Mr. LENNOX. I think an answer was made in the House that it cost us two or three per cent to float certain loans.

Mr. FIELDING. Our loans cost us, as respecting the chief items exactly what they have been costing us for many years. But there is now a new item which adds ma terially to the charge, that is, the item of underwriting, which is about 1¼ per cent. We think that while that has to appear as a part of the cost of the loan, we get a benefit in the better prices we obtain through that operation. Yet it has to appear as a part of the cost of the loan, just as in some past instances discounts would have to appear as a part of the cost of the loan. I have no doubt that if a comparison were made between these loans it would be shown that the cost of our loans, broadly expressed, is not greater than it has been in former years, except for this new condition which has arisen, that is, the item of underwriting, which must include brokerage in connection with the underwriting. The broker meets you at every door when you endeavour to place a loan, and the charge for the underwriting, and the brokerage in connection with the underwriting, amounts to 1¼ per cent. That is, in that sense, a new charge which did not exist in former years, because the conditions of the money market did not require it. But while we have to account for that as a charge, in reality it is not a burden to us, because we are satisfied we get a benefit for it in the better price which is fixed by the underwriters. For illustration, in our last loan we had to come to an agreement with the underwriters as to the price. Naturally we wanted the best price we could get, and naturally the underwriters would like the price to be as low as we would be willing to make it. So after careful discussion we agreed upon a price, and it turned out that that price was higher than the public in the money market was willing to pay, and when the loan was offered to the public, only 41 per cent of it was taken up at that price, because the ordinary public investor thought we had fixed our price too low. But the underwriters had to guarantee it to us. And so we got the benefit. Although this is a new charge, it is not a new burden to us, because we are satisfied we get the benefit of that in the higher price we are able to obtain.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister does not meet my point. I am not concerned to know whether we are better or worse off in borrowing than under a former government. The minister says that the underwriting and brokerage are a new item, and that it costs 1¼ per cent. Now, will the minister tell us what the former cost was before this new item was added?

Mr. FIELDING. I would have to turn to the contract we have with our financial agents. But I will at a later stage give the hon. gentleman the information. It is already on the table of the House, in a return.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister tells us that as a matter of fact his underwriting cost 1¼ per cent. Now would the other branch of the expense be equal to 1¼ per cent, less or more, speaking generally.

Mr. FIELDING. I think it is not as much as that, but I would not like to answer definitely. I would rather give an exact statement.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be decidedly less than 1¼ per cent.

Mr. LENNOX. Would it be as much as one per cent.

Mr. FIELDING. It would be materially less than 1¼ per cent.

Mr. LENNOX. Supposing we take it as ¾ per cent, for the purpose of my argument, that would represent in all 2 per cent that it would cost to float a loan. But the return brought down showed, I think, that there was a considerable expense in connection with the floating of these loans. But we have suffered a good many disappointments already in connection with this railway, and I do not feel any great confidence in the statement made this afternoon that this will be a net expense of 4 per cent, including the expense by way of floating the loan. If the minister has brushed that item aside as immaterial, even if it cost 2 per cent to float that loan, of course it would represent $200,000 upon this transaction, and if not included in that 4 per cent, it will mean a net loss to Canada of $175,000 or $200,000. I think the least the minister should do is to make perfectly sure that we at least should not be losing money by this transaction in the way of interest.

It is a very easy thing to arrange that whatever rate of interest we pay we shall at least be recouped for that amount. It is right enough to provide for the payment of four per cent, but there should be a supplementary provision that if it costs more the country will not be put to a loss. Every step in this transaction that we have taken since the day when the Prime Minister first made the announcement of this legislation has been a disappointment to the country. Every amendment made has been an amendment by which the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific have benefited and by which the country has suffered and has been put to loss. Therefore, it is very little to ask that it shall be made absolutely clear that if it costs us more than four per cent—and the position that Canada is now in as regards the money market does not make it unlikely that it will cost more than four per cent—we shall be recouped by the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. FIELDING. I see the matter in a different light from my hon. friend both as regards the contract generally and as respects this transaction. When I state the probable rate of interest I am including the expenses of every kind. The rate will include what we will have to pay for brokerage, printing and the various incidental charges. What precise rate they may ask us we do not know, but we know as respects the past and there is no reason to suppose that it should be more in the future. If, a few months ago, when we went to the money markets, when the conditions were more severe than they are at the present moment, we were able to borrow money at a shade over four per cent, which is probably the net rate of our last loan, is it not reasonable to suppose that another loan, with an improving market, may probably be obtained at a cost of four per cent? But while I state that as a reasonable proposition, I also state frankly that we have thought it best that we should take a measure of risk on both sides, that we should fix a definite rate of interest in the expectation that we would be able to borrow the money at that rate and at perhaps a shade less. If it costs us a shade more we take that risk to the extent of what we pay in addition.

Mr. SPROULE. What risk will the company take?

Mr. FIELDING. If we borrow the money at three and a-half per cent and charge them four we may make a profit out of it.

Mr. J. D. REID. Why not make it a matter of certainty?

Mr. FIELDING. We think it desirable to make it a matter of certainty as to the rate which they shall pay, but not as to the rate at which we shall borrow the money at some time in the future. That is why we take the risk.

Mr. LENNOX. When the Minister of Finance says that it is reasonable to suppose that the condition of the money market will be less stringent he does not refer to the fact that the position of Canada as regards the borrowing of money is not likely to improve for a great many years to come. The fact that Canada is going so heavily into the borrowing business and so frequently, that the minister will have, in all probability to take a trip to England immediately this session is over, and that we will be constantly on the borrow for the next few years will probably far more than counteract any improvement in the money market. So, I think I might say, by way of prediction, against the experience of the minister in the borrowing of money, and he has had a great deal of experience in that respect, that it will not be found that we can effect better terms in the near future than we have done in the near past.

Mr. FIELDING. I will not predict. I think there is a fair chance of it, but we will get the best terms that we can get in the money market. That is all I promise to the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not see why we should be discussing the question of a gamble and risk being taken either by one or the other. This company comes to us for a loan. We should fix the rate of interest. We are under no obligation to the company. We are stepping in where they should have remained. We are getting in under the burden that they should have shouldered and which, according to the first contract, they inevitably would have had to shoulder, which it was intended they should shoulder, and which the right hon. Prime Minister and three of his ministers declared they would shoulder. Now, we let the Grand Trunk out from having provided for a certain sum of money for the construction of the prairie section. We are repaying them that money. We are under no obligation to them. Why should it be a matter of risk between either party? The country should not risk anything. We should have a rate of interest which would make the country absolutely secure and we should charge them what we think would carry that amount. We should charge them such per cent as we pay for the loan, including all costs of charges. I would ask the minister whether he proposes to make a special ten year loan to cover this $10,000,000 which is to be repaid in ten years.

Mr. FIELDING. I would think not. I would like to have a free hand to do what is best, but I do not at present anticipate such a course.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this $10,000,000 that we are lending to the Grand Trunk Pacific to be expended yet upon the road or is it the purpose of the $10,000,000 loan to pay back to the Grand Trunk what they have already expended on the road?

Mr. FIELDING. We will pay it to the Grand Trunk Pacific upon the certificate of an engineer in the usual way. As a matter of fact, I understand that the Grand Trunk have advanced moneys which have gone into the road and in that way they will be recouped. We will only pay upon the evidence of an engineer in the usual form that this money represents work which has been done on the road.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend knows, I suppose, as a matter of fact, that a very large proportion of the $10,000,000 has already been expended and payment made?

Mr. FIELDING. It has been advanced by the Grand Trunk.

Mr. FOSTER. And payment made.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes. But we have no certificate of it. We can only pay this money on the engineer's certificate that the work has been performed.

Mr. FOSTER. This money will not be paid for rolling stock or anything of that kind? It will be paid for the actual construction of the road bed?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. AMES. Will the loan for which this money will be paid out be made as to time according to this loan? Will you float a ten year loan in order to pay this?

Mr. FIELDING. I said to my hon. friend from North Toronto that while I desire to have a free hand to do whatever is best in view of the condition of the money market I do not at the present time contemplate a ten year loan. I would anticipate that the loan would be for a longer period.

Mr. AMES. If the minister makes a thirty or fifty year loan and agrees to pay the present high rate for fifty years in order that he may accommodate this company for ten years he may have to pay this increased rate of interest for many years after the loan to the company ceases.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend puts in words to which I object. He says at this rate. We do not necessarily propose to pay this rate. The fact that we raise the money, if it be deemed expedient to raise it, as part of a loan extending over fifty years, would probably help us to get it at a better rate. If the market condition is such that a fifty year loan is expedient and if that would help us to get a lower rate then, we should be free to take advantage of that condition.

Mr. AMES. If we negotiated a thirty or a fifty year loan at three and four-fifths per cent in order that we might be able to accommodate these people for ten years we would be bound to pay three and four-fifths per cent for thirty or fifty years when probably before that time we will be able to get cheaper money.

Mr. FIELDING. That does not follow. I have no doubt that at the expiry of that 10 years, when the money is repaid, the government of Canada will find abundant uses for it and we will suffer no loss.

Mr. AMES. Would not the simplest manner be for the government to float a special ear-marked issue of $10,000,000 of bonds at the best rate they can get and to say to the company: 'Whatever the money costs us for the ten years you want it, you must pay us?' The government should simply act as their bankers in this particular case.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think it would be wise to float a ten year loan unless the market conditions for the moment seemed to make that the proper course to take. I think it better to look at the market conditions and issue the loan in the manner and for the term and on the conditions that will give the best results. If it proves a satisfactory rate, we will be the gainers. I am strongly of the opinion that there is a greater probability of our getting the money a shade below four per cent than above it; but I will not prophesy, we will get the best rate we can.

Mr. LENNOX. I think the minister has nearly exhausted his power of prophesy on this railway.

Mr. FIELDING. Oh, no.

Mr. LENNOX. And I do not think he can complain if some one on this side should offer one casual remark on that line.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not complain.

Mr. LENNOX. This is an accommodation, it cannot be put on any better ground by the government, we are accommodation endorsers for this railway. The very easiest terms on which a neighbour accommodates his friend is that he shall not lose one cent, unless the person for whom he endorses becomes bankrupt. He may exact as a condition of endorsement a percentage for the accommodation, but at least he will insist on not losing on his advance. That is the position which we should be in in this matter. The government ought to make definite arrangements for four per cent with a supplementary condition that in no event shall this loan entail loss upon Canada. This loan should be kept distinct so that we could know in the end exactly where we come out on the transaction.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend will know next session what it will cost us, as we will have to replace it by another loan.

Mr. LENNOX. We ought to know now what we are going to pay and it should be kept distinct. That, however, is not a sine qua non, the main point is that we should not lose by this loan. As was stated by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), we understand that the Grand Trunk Railway Company allege that they have loaned $7,000,000 of this money and it is alleged that that $7,000,000 has been put into the road. The minister says that he will ascertain definitely that that money has been put into the road. I take it that the minister will do that but supposing that that $7,000,000 has been put into the road, then there will be left only $3,000,000 available for new work. Does the minister know how much it will take to complete the prairie section? In other words, will $3,000,000 of new money put into it complete the road?

Mr. FIELDING. At an earlier stage, in introducing the resolution, I gave in very full detail the figures which were designed to show that this $10,000,000 to be applied in the way described will finish the prairie section. We have, of course, only the reports of the engineers in that respect and I am beginning to give engineer's estimates with a word of qualification.

Mr. LENNOX. If that is the case it would appear that the prairie section is within $3,000,000 of being completed. Does the minister believe that?

Mr. FIELDING. That is the information I get from the engineers and I am bound to accept it in good faith.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. I wish to be clear as to the application of the $10,000,000. From the statement brought down by the minister it seems that the $10,000,000 is to be used for the completion of the road and for the payment to the Grand Trunk Railway of seven million odd dollars which they allege they have advanced for the construction of the road. The minister sent officers of his department who have inquired into this expenditure and this advance by the Grand Trunk Railway, so he must now be in a position to state whether that $7,000,000 was actually advanced by the Grand Trunk and used in the construction of the road.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not see that we are very much concerned now with that $7,000,000, because we will not pay out one dollar of this $10,000,000 except upon the certificate of the engineer that that money is represented by work in the road. If, in the meantime, they have arranged with their bankers or the Grand Trunk Railway or any one else for that advance, I do not think we are much concerned. As to the $3,000,000 finishing the road, it is $3,000,000 in addition to other funds which are still available from the government guarantee. This amount, plus the other amount available from the government guarantee, we are advised will finish the prairie section.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. The minister must concern himself as to whether the money is earned or not. His officers have examined the accounts and certified that this money has been expended upon the road. Surely we are entitled to the details of the expenditure of that $7,000,000? Grand Trunk Pacific say they want $9,500,000 to complete the prairie section. This is referred to the officer of the department and he says $10,500,000 is required. You split the difference at $10,000,000. What available assets have they? They have available assets of the bonds not yet sold and of construction material which is available to the amount of $1,500,000, and they want to return this alleged advance of $7,100,000. The officers of the department certify that this has gone into the construction of the road. In what form was this advance made?

Mr. FIELDING. We have nothing which earmarks that particular $7,000,000, and it does not strike me as of importance to us to so ear-mark it. What we want to have certified to us is that there is work to represent the money which they will claim from us. The Grand Trunk Pacific will file statements that they have done the work; we do not care where they get the money; it is not our concern. They claim they have done work representing a certain outlay. We will submit that to our engineers, who must certify to it; and if the work is there to represent it, I do not think we are concerned whether they got the money from the Grand Trunk Railway Company or from a bank. That is a matter of their own arrangement. The vital point with us is to see that the work is there, and then the money is paid out only on the certificate of our own engineer that the work has been done.

Mr. AMES. The government has already agreed to advance $13,000 per mile on the 916 miles of the prairie section, amounting to $11,908,000; and we now propose to advance $10,000,000 more, making a total of $23,900 per mile, or altogether $21,908,000. Do I understand that the government will see that vouchers for that total amount are checked and passed as being for perfectly legitimate expenditures, and that when they reach that point their responsibility as to checking these accounts ceases, and any additional expenditure will not be subjected to the same examination?

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend treats two funds as in a sense the same. One of these funds consists of the proceeds of the government guarantee, as to which the procedure is that the guaranteed bonds are issued and sold, and the proceeds deposited in a special account in the bank to the credit of the Minister of Finance, separate and apart from our ordinary government revenue. This may be deemed trust money for the purposes of the railway. Not a dollar of that money can be drawn out until the government engineer has certified the accounts sent in as being correct, and only when he certifies that the claim is a proper and legitimate one against that money is any of it drawn. So much with regard to the government guarantee. With respect to the other transaction, which represents a portion of the money guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, inasmuch as they have asked us for this loan, we have put it in the same position as our guarantee fund, and we say that this money must be drawn out only when the government engineer certifies that there is work to represent it.

Mr. AMES. The minister has not seen the point of my question. The governmen are supplying $22,000,000 for the prairie section, which we will say will cost $32,000,000. The Grand Trunk Pacific Company are then obtaining $10,000,000 apart from the government. Is the government going to see that there is a careful audit of the whole $32,000,000, or only of the accounts they present up to $22,000,000?

Mr. FIELDING. The audit covers the whole expenditure. Then it becomes a question of what proportion is chargeable on the guaranteed bonds and what proportion is provided by the Grand Trunk Company. But the audit of the Railway Department covers the total expenditure without any reservation.

Mr. AMES. Then do I understand that the government will satisfy themselves, in respect to all the indebtedness that stands against the road with respect to the first, second and third mortgages which are prior to our fourth mortgage, that every item which makes up those amounts has been carefully passed on by the government auditor, so that we may know that the government has taken the precaution to examine carefully every item of expenditure on the road, whether the government is to supply the money or not?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, the audit of the Railway Department applies to the total outlay on construction.

Mr. AMES. With the minister's assurance, then, if next year we inquire how this $10,000,000 has been expended, we shall be permitted to travel in the same steps in which the auditor of the government has travelled, and examine the list of vouchers that make up the statements which the auditor has passed; so that what is now being done to satisfy the government that these expenditures are legitimate may be ratified by a committee of this House at the next session if it is so desired?

Mr. FIELDING. We are not changing the system in the slightest degree by this Bill. I am advised that the auditor of the Department of Railways does take into view all the expenditure on the road which are charged to construction account, and certifies that they are fair and proper and reasonable, and then a certain portion is charged to one fund, and a certain portion to the other. But all are subject to the audit of the department.

Mr. AMES. Then do I understand that a committee of this House will be permitted next session to travel in the same steps as the auditor and accountant of the Department of Railways in order to be assured that the whole of the $32,000,000 has been legitimately expended?

Mr. FIELDING. We are making no change whatever in the system or in the terms of the contract, whatever they are; but my impression is that the audit of the Department of Railways is as broad as my hon. friend suggests. If I find that I am mistaken, I will qualify my statement at a later stage of the discussion.

Mr. AMES. The hon. gentleman knows that we were permitted to examine as trust funds how the first portion of the $13,000 per mile was expended. Do I understand that this $10,000,000 being in the same position, we shall be entitled to check over the amounts which are paid out as part of this advance?

Mr. FIELDING. The contract is not varied in the slightest degree by this Bill. The moneys can only be drawn after government audit, and in the manner I have described. But I will read in 'Hansard' what my hon. friend has said and will discuss the matter with the auditor of the Railway Department, and if my answers have been too comprehensive, I will modify them.

Mr. AMES. This Bill is practically an amendment of the contract.

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. AMES. It is to all intents and purposes, for it is putting the company in a better position.

Mr. FIELDING. No. We agree voluntarily to help them by way of a loan, but it is not an amendment to the contract. An amendment to the contract would have to be mutual.

Mr. AMES. At this time if we desire we can lay stipulations on the company, and if this matter is not clear, we can easily make it clear in this Bill.

Progress reported.

At Six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

AGRICULTURAL FERTILIZERS.

House went again into committee on Bill (No. 110) respecting agricultural fertilizers.

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN (Minister of Inland Revenue). I move the reconsideration of section 6. My object is to move an amendment by adding sub-section:

(e) The materials from which the fertilizers were made.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. What is the object of this?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. To give further information to the department. They already have to give the guaranteed analysis, and this is added.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 10 reconsidered:

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This section provides that the purchaser of a registered fertilizer may send it to the department and have an analysis made on paying a fee of $5. It is suggested that this is too high a charge in case of farmers and others desiring an analysis, and I propose to reduce it to $1.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 15 reconsidered:

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This provides for penalties. It says:

Every person who sells or offers or exposes for sale any fertilizer in respect of which the provisions of this Act have not been complied with——

And so on. I propose to strike out the word 'person' and insert the words 'manufacturer or agent.'

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Would that include the storekeeper?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. No, I am bringing in another amendment to include the vendor. This applies to the party who gets the license to manufacture and guarantee the analysis.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 17 reconsidered:

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I propose an amendment that will cover the point raised by the hon. member (Mr. Sharpe). It has been pointed out in the discussion that after a fertilizer is placed on the market with guaranteed analysis, some vendor might tamper with it by mixing with it inferior substances, thereby reducng its fertilizing value. I propose, after the word 'fertilizer' in the third line, to add the words:

—and every person who lowers the fertilizing value of a registered fertilizer by mixing any other substance therewith after said fertilizer has been placed upon the market by the manufacturer or agent.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I propose to add to this Bill the section, No. 21, as follows:

This Act shall come into force on the first day of January, nineteen hundred and ten.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN.

This will give the manufacturers time to conform to the Act. The season for fertilizers for this year is over.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. A great deal of fertilizer is used in the fall of the year. Better make it 1st October.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. So far as the convenience of the department is concerned, 1st October would do as well as January 1, 1910. It might suit the trade better to begin with the year. It does not make much difference to the department.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. But it makes a difference to the public, because a good deal of fertilizer is used in the fall in the Niagara district and elsewhere. It will be no more difficult for the manufacturers, but it will give the department control of the material sold for the fall season.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I move that it be made October 1, 1909.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

COMMERCIAL FEEDING STUFFS.

Bill (No. 127) respecting commercial feeding stuffs—Mr. Templeman—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN (Minister of Inland Revenue). This Bill is practically the same in all its details as the Bill which we have just passed, with the single exception that this is for commercial feeding stuffs, and the other was for fertilizers. The language is exactly the same except in those two words.

On section 2,

Mr. SPROULE. I have a letter handed to me by a party who is manufacturing one of these articles which he seems to think or has been informed, this Bill would include. I will read it, the letter is from the Beaver Manufacturing Company of Galt:

Your favour of the 15th inst. with inclosure of a copy of Bill (No. 127) is received, and we thank you for your prompt attention. The government bulletins already published and distributed throughout the country have very seriously affected our trade. Analyses are regularly published which lead the farmer to believe that herbageum is composed of wheat refuse and one or two other very low priced materials.

Herbageum is an article which cannot, I think, fairly be called a food, it seems to be more like a medicine.

The theory upon which we have worked, and upon which we have built up a trade is a matter which we cannot get the agricultural colleges to consider at all. They and the government insist on classing us as a stock food, and when they analyse they look for food value. Now we do not and never have claimed that there is any food value in Herbageum. Our whole claim is that one quarter of an ounce fed twice daily will enable farm stock to thoroughly assimilate and digest the ordinary feeding stocks, and in this way obtain from these ordinary feeding stocks the maximum amount of food value. This being our claim, why should our product be tested for protein and fat?

They regard it rather as a tonic and a medicine, a stimulant tonic.

That Herbageum does the work claimed for it is amply vouched for by many of the most successful farmers, among them being such men as D. C. Flatt, John Orr, Telfer Bros., John Brown, Wm. Stewart and Walter McMonagle. These men have an international reputation as successful feeders and breeders, and they are staunch believers in and continual users of Herbageum. In face of such evidence, why should Herbageum be called a food, and condemned because it does not contain protein and fat in paying quantities? If it were pure protein and fat it would be a feeding stuff and not a condiment, and it would be utterly useless for the purpose for which it is manufactured and for which the stock men buy it.

In view of all this we submit:

1. In May, 1887, Herbageum was registered with the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa (No. 13, folio No. 2889).
2. Herbageum was registered as a 'condiment for animals.'
3. We have never called Herbageum a food.
4. We have never claimed any food value for Herbageum.
5. We claim that we should have special classification as a 'condiment for animals' and,
6. That therefore we should not come under the proposed 'Act respecting commercial feeding stuffs.'

Now it seems to me that the allegations put forth in this letter are pretty correct. You can hardly regard a thing as food that you feed to an animal only in teaspoonful doses. I do not know anything about the stuff, but I should think it was more of a tonic. It is a compound of herbs and certain preparations of wheat. Perhaps it might appropriately be called an aromatic tonic.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. If it is a medicine it would not come under the Act. If it possesses nutritive as well as medicinal qualities it would. But if the contention of the correspondent is correct, and it is purely medicinal and not food, it would not come under the Act.

Mr. SPROULE. He does not claim it to be a medicine, but a tonic. I assume it is called a food because it contains preparations made from wheat which contain the protein and other elements of food. It is something in its effect like pepper, salt ginger, mustard. These are condiments, they stimulate the stomach and make it secrete more gastric juice, and digest the food better.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Then it would not come under this section at all.

Mr. SPROULE. What would you put that under?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. It would not come under any Act. It has to possess nutritive properties to be a feed as well as a medicine before it can come under this Act. If the statement of the correspondent is correct that this is purely a medicine and not a food it would not come under the Act.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say that he claimed it to be a medicine. I said that it could more properly be classed as a medicine. He called it a condiment.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. And the manufacturer says that it is a food?

Mr. SPROULE. No, he says it is a condiment.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. It would have to remain for investigation to find out whether it was a food under the Act or not. If it is a condiment or a medicine purely and simply it would not come under the Act, but if it is medicinal as well as nutritive it would come under the Act and very properly so because that is the object of the Act.

On section 4,

Name of foreign manufacturer's agent or representative in Canada to be filed with minister.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved:

That the section be amended by inserting after the word 'person,' in the 30th line, the word 'resident,' and after the word 'Canada,' in the 31st line, the words 'and acceptable to the minister.'

He said the point was raised in discussing the other Act that probably the agent might be an irresponsible person. I want to put that in as a safeguard.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7,

Registration number, how fixed; statement required.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved:

That the word 'importer' in the 19th line be expunged.

He said: The word 'importer' appears and as the importer is not dealt with in the Act but simply the manufacturer or agent, I desire to expunge it.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 9,

Annual license to sell; fee; period of validity.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved:

That the section be amended by inserting after the word 'obtained,' in the 2nd line, the words 'by the manufacturer or agent.'

Mr. DANIEL. Does this section mean that no one can sell any of these foods except he has a license, or has the license only to be taken out by the manufacturer?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The object of the Act is that the manufacturer shall take out one license himself, and that no commercial food stuff can be sold unless the manufacturer or the agent of the foreign manufacturer shall take out a license for that food stuff.

Mr. DANIEL. The section is not very clear.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I think so. There is only one license to be taken out for each brand.

Mr. SPROULE. That is an annual license?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Yes.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10,

Purchaser of registered feeding stuff may obtain analysis.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. There is a blank in the last line and I therefore move:

That the blank in the last line of clause 10 be filled in with the word 'one.'

Making it read one dollar.

Mr. SPROULE. How will it be with those parties all over the country who have a lot of feed on hand? The manufacturer will take out a license on the 31st December. There is a stock of these goods all over the country. Will the license taken out on the 31st December cover what is in the hands of the trade at that time, or will it only cover what the manufacturer or his agent sold after that?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. It might be necessary to introduce a clause to exempt stocks in the hands of vendors.

Mr. SPROULE. Otherwise you might do injustice to merchants and others.

On section 13,

Analysis in case of samples imported for personal use.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I propose making the fee in that case $5. The same amendment will apply in the case of analysis of food stuffs manufactured to the order of a purchaser.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The Act does not provide for the case of a foreign manufacturer who, without registering a resident agent imports a lot of feed materials, placing them in the hands of merchants and having them sold without being registered. Who would then be liable under the Act?

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. That is material imported by the foreign manufacturer and sold under consignment?

Mr. S. SHARPE. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We might amend section 17.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The merchant is not an agent under the wording of the Act and the only suggestion I can offer is to make the merchant or person who sells an unregistered article liable under the Act.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We could amend section 17 in that way.

On section 17,

Forgery of certificates, &c.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I would move to add the words 'and every person who sells an unregistered food stuff.'

Mr. S. SHARPE. That would cover the point. Would it not be well for the minister to amend the Fertilizer Act in the same direction?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We would have to have the amendment made in the Senate, and I will see if that can be done.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I would also suggest that such fertilizer as Chilian nitrate, wood ashes and phosphates, sold in the commercial state, should be exempted in the same way as this Act exempts grains. For instance, it might be considered illegal for a person to buy Chilian nitrate by the bag and to sell it as such. I would like the minister to consider that.

On section 20,

Commencement of the Act.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I think that Act should come into force before the 1st of January next.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. There is no objection to it coming into force on the 1st of October if the House thinks that the better time.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. As against the manufacturer the Act should come into force at once, except as to the stocks now on hand, because the manufacturers all over the country are manufacturing and selling to the farmers fraudulent foodstuffs.

Mr. SEXSMITH. I think it would be wise to have the Act brought into force as quickly as possible. During the months of June and July an immense amount of food is purchased and consumed.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I would move that the date be changed to the 1st of July, 1909. I might say that this foodstuff is a staple article which is sold daily. It is not something that a man need put in a stock of for a year, and there will be ample time for the dealers to get rid of all their stock before the 1st of next July. This is a matter that is pressing very hardly upon purchasers. The frauds in this class of food, as shown before the Agricultural Committee, are so great that drastic measures are necessary. The hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith) and I have introduced Bills on this matter which this Bill now covers. It was ascertained before the Agricultural Committee that in a great majority of cases this commodity was made out of absolutely worthless stuff, such as sawdust and ground chaff and ordinary turf and moss, which were ground up and sold to the farming community as cattle feed. It is about time that this was stopped, because there is not 25 cents of food value in a ton of it. I would also suggest to the minister that something ought to be done to relieve the farmer of the duty of prosecuting the parties who wilfully break this law. The matter is now left in such an indefinite shape that there is no officer specially charged with the enforcement of the law. I pointed that out the other evening in the case of fertilizers and the objection is even greater in this case. The merchants are selling the farmers this foodstuff for cattle, which has no food value. We may run across cases where the purchaser gets an analysis made and finds a fraud has been committed on him, but he might not like to institute proceedings himself. Under the Adulteration Act, he would have to deposit $25 before any prosecution could be made. I do not see how the minister proposes to have the law enforced. Let him make it more easy to prosecute in such cases. Every few days we get circulars from the department showing the results of analysis, but there is no prosecution. The circulars show that the articles are fraudulent but no effort is made to punish the guilty. Analysis of these foods have been made for years and the results sent out to the public in bulletins issued by the department, yet still these frauds are growing larger every day. I think the minister would do well to consider the advisability of inserting some provision which would enable an officer of the department, when he found there was a fraud, to lay the information before the magistrate. The minister said the other evening that it was the business of the department of Justice to prosecute. Possibly this department should in one sense be the prosecutor, but it would be much more effective to give an inspector the power to lay the information before a magistrate and file his certificate showing that an article put on the market was not up to the analysis printed on the package, and then have the manufacturer summoned to show why he should not be fined.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. It would not be possible for the manufacturers of these commercial food stuffs to conform to the provisions of this Bill before the 1st of July, 1909. We require that they shall register, and take out a registered number, and put upon the packet a printed guaranteed analysis and other statements of fact. It would be scarcely fair to compel them to do this in that short time. I would be quite willing to have the Act come into force the 1st of October, 1909. Within that time they should be able to comply with it. With reference to the suggestion of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Currie) regarding prosecutions for violations of the Act, it is not the department who creates the standards but the manufacturers. The officers of the Department of Inland Revenue would procure a sample of every food-stuff on the market and analyse it, and if the analysis printed on the packet does not come up to that made by the department, the manufacturer can be punished under clause 15.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The department undertakes to prosecute?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Yes. I move that the Act comes into effect the first of October, 1909.

Mr. SEXSMITH. I agree that the 1st of October would perhaps be early enough to have the law come into force. There is a considerable manufacture of food-stuff of medicinal qualities such as herbageum. I have in my desk analysis of that stuff and it is not worth as much as a food as ordinary linseed meal. It is composed of pure wheat meal, charcoal, sugar, &c. I do not wonder that the manufacturers of these protest and say they should not be compelled to put a label on the outside. If we have this Act come into force the first of October and then have it carried out, that will be time enough. The people have been defrauded a good many years and it is time to put an end to it.

Mr. SPROULE. There are thousands of samples which must be analysed and the department has not a sufficient number of analysts to do the work between now and then. The work is very much behind now. Then you require to have the brands registered and licenses taken out and to make your own regulations, and all that will have to be done by the department within that time. Who is going to collect those samples for your analysts?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The department does not make the analysis. It is the manufacturer himself who will analyse and place a guaranteed anaylsis on the packet.

Mr. SPROULE. If he wants to give his food any standard, will he not require to have the government analyse it?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The department does not guarantee the analysis at all. We would not allow any of our analysts to make the analysis. The manufacturer must have that done himself. Then the label on the package shows what nutritive value the food has. After it is put on the market, we have it analysed, and if the food is not up to the analysis labelled on the package, we take proceedings.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose you want to prosecute, what is your evidence? There must be an analysis made, and there are not sufficient analysts in Canada to analyse the samples of food on the market at present.

Mr. J. D. REID. I agree with what the minister says. This government must not be responsible for the analysis, but the manufacturer can get it analysed by any chemist he wishes.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the hon. member mean to say that any chemist in the city is fit to analyse it?

Mr. J. D. REID. They certainly can get it done. As to the question raised by the hon. member (Mr. Sproule) that it would not be possible with the staff the minister now has to make these analyses in the time, would it not be much better for to to pay a few more officers for three or four months in order to bring the Act into effect all the sooner? Surely that would be better than to allow the farmers to be defrauded out of thousands and thousands of dollars. I think the first October is ample time for the manufacturers, and the saving to the people who buy these goods will be much greater than any possible cost in preparing for coming into force of the Act.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I do not believe there are a dozen manufacturers of these goods in the country that have not had their stuff analysed already by the government on one or two occasions. They all know the value of the analysis, though I think they will be slow to put the analysis given them by the government on their brand. As to giving them time, there is no need to be too lenient in this matter. Of course, hypothetical cases can be quoted. In the case of change in the custom law, which we make here in five minutes, there may be shown thousands of cases of people who have been injured by it, but we do not delay the law for that reason. I do not see why we should be so awfully kind to these other people and give them so much time to load up the country with a few thousand more tons of this stuff. I do not wish to press the motion I have made, in opposition to the minister's wishes, because I would like to see this Bill go through without any contention. I think we should take the business view of this. If a business man had this in hand, he would bring this law into force at ten o'clock to-morrow morning. It is not going to hurt the small dealer, he may have some packages on hand, but, if he can show that he bought them before the change in the law—and his invoices will establish the facts of the case—there is not a magistrate in the country who will fine him.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think the hon. member (Mr. J. A. Currie) knows much about the trade. You cannot find many respectable drug stores that do not manufacture this for themselves. They use linseed meal, ginger, antimony, sometimes shorts, bran or other material. Is everyone of these druggists to take out a license and get the feed analysed? They probably have a large stock on hand. It is not useless by any means. It is a food, a condiment, and a medicine, and it is good for cattle. There is a great difference between this and ground-up corn stalks or chopped straw. I can understand that all this trade can be brought under control. But, if you are going to do it in a short time, you will have quite a contract on hand. With three-quarters of the respectable drug stores all over the country to register and their products to be analysed, there are not enough analysts in Canada to analyse all these samples between now and 1st October.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The hon. member (Mr. Sproule) seems to think that the 'guaranteed analysis' must be the exact analysis of the contents. But, without an analysis, the man who makes the mixture can put on it a description as a 'guaranteed analysis' that will be safely within its value, and that will fulfil the requirements with relation to the guaranteed analysis.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the analysis for? It is to show the contents of the mixture. The analysis would have to be made by some one competent to go into the witness box and prove the case if called upon. Will any court accept the analysis of a druggist? Not unless he is also a qualified analyst, and not one druggist in fifty is a competent analyst. To get all these analyses made by the duly qualified people will take time. I say, and I say advisedly, that there are not enough analysts in the Dominion of Canada to analyse all these samples of food between now and 1st October.

Mr. SEXSMITH. The hon. member (Mr. Sproule) may know of druggists who are mixing up these feeds, but the druggists in our vicinity do very little of it. We have the National Stock Food Company selling hundreds of thousands of dollars worth to these people. This concern advertises that it spends $200,000 a year in advertising its stuff. Who pays for all that? I understand that it has been said that a great portion of this feed was made of ground corn cobs, and they are selling it by the train load. These are the people we want to get after. Very few druggists make their own, they handle other well known brands. In the stores you will see it piled up by the wagon load, and sold at these exorbitant prices. As I understand it, the manufacturer must register with the department and get his mixture analysed. Then, if he puts on the market a class of feed that does not come up to the standard given on the tag, prosecution will take place.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I think the 1st of October is a medium course between the proposals of my two hon. friends opposite. One wants the Bill brought in immediately, while the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) says it should not come into force until the beginning of the year. The chief analyst advises me that if the Bill is brought into force on October 1, there will be no trouble in doing our end of the work.

On schedule A:

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. It is stated that the method of taking samples can be obtained on application to the department. It would save the department a great deal of trouble if instructions to obtain a sample were published along with the other things.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Samples, in nine cases out of ten, will be taken by the officers of the department.

On schedule B:

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. Was clause 15 amended to provide for imprisonment in default of payment of a fine? The Fertilizer Act was so amended.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I have that memorandum on my Bill. I move to add that after the words '100', where they occur, the following words be inserted:

And in default of payment of such penalty, to a term of imprisonment for 30 days.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill reported.

On motion for third reading,

Mr. SPROULE. I think it is an outrage upon the feed dealers that no provision is made for the stock they have on hand. There are certainly thousands of tons of it all over the country that are being sold today. Now every manufacturer who sells or exposes for sale any commercial feeding stuff after this Act is passed, is subject to a penalty. There is no provision made in the Act to let them sell what they have.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We give them four months in which to sell their stock on hand. The Bill will not come into force until the 1st of October. We have got to make a start some time. I do not know how we could make an exception for the stock at present on hand.

Mr. SPROULE. You did it in the Patent Medicine Act.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We provided that all stocks of drugs on hand, on the coming into force of the Act, should have a small label attached to them as provided by the department. But it seems to me that is not so necessary in this case. Holders of these feeding stuffs should be able to dispose of them during the next four months. I would also point out that it is the manufacturer or agent who is liable, not the vendor, for a contravention of that portion of the Act. The vendor is only responsible under the Act if he adulterates a food stuff already in the market. So I do not think the retail dealer will be hurt at all in selling any of his old stock, even after the Act comes into force.

Mr. SPROULE. Is he exempt? He is a manufacturer in every sense of the word under this Act. He has not taken out a license but he has a large quantity of this material on hand. He has only sold as much as is called for and he has to lose what he has on hand or sell it illegally. It is not the part of wisdom or fair play if you do not make some provision whereby these people may carry on their business in a legal way.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. My hon. friend must be referring to condiments or medicinal preparations rather than to feeding stuffs. There are very few druggists who would put up feeding stuffs in such quantities that they cannot dispose of them in four months. The Act does not apply to them unless they are foodstuffs proper. If any druggist has such a large quantity on hand that he cannot dispose of it before 31st December next he should come under the Act and be liable to its provisions.

Mr. SPROULE. Your Act provides that these compounds may be feeding stuffs, condiments and medicines. Take the prescription that I have spoken of again. Take linseed meal, bran, shorts and ground oil cake which are food stuffs. Put them with certain drugs and you have a preparation of foodstuffs and medicines combined. You sell them by the patent pail and they are valuable foodstuffs and medicines as well.

They will come under this Act. I have been so associated with the trade that I know very well how this is done. Take Orangeville, Shelbourne, Dundas, Flesherton, Markdale, Chatsworth and Owen Sound; you cannot go into any one of these places but you will find drug stores selling these goods and in most cases druggists manufacturing them. They will be selling them in violation of the Act under the provisions as contained here. They may decide to quit the manufacture of them in future but there is a lot of stuff that is not sold, they do not want to lose it and yet they do not want to sell in violation of the law.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. In reply to my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) I think that these druggists are amply protected by this Act. There is no druggist of ordinary intelligence who cannot turn up the Pharmacopaea and in five minutes decide the food value of any of the ordinary articles that would be employed in a compound of this kind. He can turn up seed, meal, bran, &c., and ascertain their food values. Any man who is a druggist will very soon find out the food value of materials which are used to make up one of these articles and then all he has to do is to put a cerificate of the food and if he is going to give a false value to it let him put on a certificate for less than the actual value of the article. The analyst takes a sample of it, and sends it to the department and if it is found that the value of the article is five or ten per cent over, the guaranteed value I do not think the department would be inclined to prosecut the manufacturer. A man who undertakes to compound an article of this kind can very easily calculate the value of it from the means at his hand. I object to the length of time which is given for bringing this Act into force because there is no trade which has been treated with so much leniency as this. They have still five months to make up their minds what they will do and if they want to be safe they can tag their product with a statement of the food value really below the actual value. There is no misrepresentation if the value is greater. The hon. member for East Grey knows very well that there is no druggist in this country but who could very soon find out what food value there is in any article that he compounds or sells.

Mr. SPROULE. My hon. friend may be a travelling encyclopedia but he only exposes his limited knowledge when he says that it is only necessary to turn up the Pharmacopaea to find out the value of foodstuffs. Suppose that you went to court on that what would happen? You cannot find an analysis of food in the Pharmacopaea. That would be absolutely valueless and the druggist would be liable under the law if any person questioned the matter.

Mr. J. D. REID. I think this is a good Bill, but there is one point in regard to which I do not think it goes far enough. If a manufacturer mixes a certain proportion of bran with middlings and grinds them together, thus reducing the food value of middlings, this Act would not touch him at all. The farmers have been complaining very much about the manufacturers mixing one of the lower grades made from the same grain, and thus decreasing the value of the article they are supposed to get. However, we may try this for a while and if it does not work satisfactorily we can amend it.

Mr. GOODEVE. I think there is a great deal in the contention of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). This Bill, I understand, is a Bill to protect one class as against another class and in making legislation of this kind we should be very careful that no class is injured. I cannot agree with the position taken by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) in that he says that every druggist should be an analyst.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I did not say that he should be an analyst.

Mr. GOODEVE. It is absolutely necessary to carry out the hon. gentleman's argument that he should be an analyst. But, it should be remembered that all druggists are not analysts. There are only a few in the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Inland Revenue. As the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has said, a man although he may be a very skillful chemist, may not be able to conduct properly an analysis of a food product. The hon. member's point is well taken that there may be thousands of pounds that the retail vendor has bought in good faith, and if he is not able to dispose of them before the time stated in the Act then the manufacturer of these goods becomes liable, although both he and the vendor have acted innocently and in good faith. For that reason I think that some provision should be made, just as in the case of the Act in regard to proprietary and patent medicines, whereby stocks on hand should be exempted from the operation of the Act or at least some further notice given. It is difficult for even a lawyer to keep track of all the changes made in the law from time to time. The druggists are a responsible class of the community, men of good standing, men who are already subject to rigorous provisions of the law and I believe that some consideration and protection should be given them in introducing this law.

Mr. JOHN BARR (Dufferin). I quite approve of this very important legislation.

I believe it is in the interests of the farming community, as there is no doubt that farmers have been gulled by food stuffs which contained very little substance. For instance the manufacturers of pea meal for human food preserve the hulls of the peas, grind them up and sell them for cattle feed as pea meal, although they contain very little substance. Therefore it is of the greatest importance that these feed stuffs should be analysed and that the farmers should know the value and the strength of what they are purchasing. At the same time there is force in the argument of the hon. member for East Grev that the druggists may have large stocks of these goods on hand. There is little sale for them except in the spring and fall and large quantities are necessarily carried over. Injustice may be done to these druggists by cutting off the sale of their present stock in the fall. I think that the suggestion of my hon. friend is worthy of consideration.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT.

On the order

Resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Oliver for the second reading of Bill (No. 17) respecting Immigration.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). When this Bill was up for consideration some days ago, I asked the Minister of the Interior to wait until we had concluded the examination of the Superintendent of Immigration in the Committee on Immigration. We have concluded that examination, but as a matter of fact the result has not been reported to the House. I believe the committee meets to-morrow in order to report. Personally I would have no objection to the Bill taking one stage to-night, but this is an instance amongst many of the difficulty we experience from the manner in which the proceedings of this House are carried on. Many members who are deeply interested in this Bill are absent to-night and I think excusably so, because this afternoon everything led members to believe that the important motion then under discussion would occupy the whole of this evening and probably a part of to-morrow. I do not wish to retard the progress of the Bill, but I would suggest that only one stage should be taken to-night, and that the consideration of the Bill in the committee should be postponed. I and a number of my friends, who have taken an interest in this subject for many years, have suggestions to make in committee. Does the minister accept the proposal to allow the Bill to take its second reading to-night and postpone the committee stage until those interested in the Bill may be present and may express the views they entertain?

Mr. OLIVER. I have no desire to push this Bill forward without due consideration, but it has been before the House since shortly after the session opened. It was brought forward for second reading nearly two months ago, and its consideration has been already postponed for some two weeks at the request of my hon. friend. The session is nearing its close; the Bill is important; if we desire to make its provisions efficient, and if my hon. friend desires to take the responsibility of delaying the passage of this important measure, I have no objection to accede to his request, but the responsibility must certainly rest upon him and not upon me.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend is very much mistaken, and I find his statement unfair. The Bill has been called only once for its second reading, and I objected to it being then read the second time as we were proceeding with the examination of the chief officer of immigration, and my hon. friend consented to its postponement. The chief officer of immigration has been examined, but his evidence is not before the House, and I can validly object to the second reading being taken to-night under the circumstances. The Bill could only take one stage this evening, and I have no objection to that. I believe in the principle of the Bill; but when members of this House have taken the trouble to study the question as they have, and desire to avail themselves of the evidence of our chief immigration officer, my hon. friend goes far when he desires me to assume a responsibility which I do not think exists at all.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 131) to amend the Canada Shipping Act—Mr. Brodeur—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. BRODEUR. This Bill is for the purpose of inserting in the French version a paragraph which has been accidentally omitted from the Revised Statutes of 1906. The words which have been omitted are of course included in the English version.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the exact equivalent?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

FRENCH STEAMSHIP SUBSIDY.

Bill (No. 146) to amend the Act relating to Ocean Steamship Subsidies—Mr. Brodeur—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. BRODEUR. This section was adopted last year with the exception of the following changes. We provided that a contract should be made for the purpose of establishing a steamship line between Canada and France, and that we should pay a subsidy not exceeding $200,000, based upon the sum of $5,555 per trip. Last year the contract was made for one year only, because it was not known whether or not the French treaty would be adopted by the French authorities, and we thought that we could this year renew the contract for one year or for a longer period. But as the power which was given to the Governor in Council to make a contract had been exercised, the Department of Trade and Commerce were advised that they had no right to enter into another contract, and that it was necessary to obtain authority from parliament to do so. This Bill gives authority to the Governor in Council to enter into a contract or contracts with any person or company. It also provides that the subsidy shall be based on $6,666 per trip instead of $5,555. It is contemplated to improve the service by putting on ships of 12 knots instead of 10 knots, as provided by the present contract.

Mr. MONK. In order that this change should come into effect, I think that the treaty with France should be ratified first, as the whole question of these subsidies depends upon the completion of our new arrangement with the French Republic. I quite approve of these new arrangements which we are making with the Allan Line, but subject of course to the confirmation of the treaty. That treaty at the present moment is an incomplete one, and under these circumstances I suggest that we cannot proceed with this Bill.

Mr. BRODEUR. I do not think it would be fair not to enter into a contract for a large number of years at this time. It is true, the treaty has not yet been ratified by the French Chamber of Deputies, though it has been approved by the French Senate, before which it has been standing for more than a year. I have no doubt the Chamber of Deputies will also approve of the changes made in the treaty, because it has approved of the treaty of 1907, and because these changes are in accordance with public opinion in France. My hon. friend suggests that we should not enter into any contracts for the service even for this year so long as the treaty is not ratified. I cannot agree with him. The Allan Line has had that service established for several years.

Mr. FOSTER. Between what ports?

Mr. BRODEUR. Between Havre, France, and Montreal and Quebec in the summer and St. John and Halifax in the winter. Many people were requested to avail themselves of the subsidy but would not do it, but in 1894 or 1895 the Allan Company agreed to take it up. They started the service and last year the subsidy was going to expire but we passed legislation providing for its renewal. Even if the treaty should not be ratified, I think we ought to provide for the contract this year because otherwise this service, which was established with a great deal of difficulty, would cease. It is expected, however, that the treaty will be ratified in May as soon as the Chambre des Deputés meets again.

Mr. FOSTER. Last year you paid $5,555 per trip. Did you have 15 trips?

Mr. BRODEUR. I think so.

Mr. FOSTER. A service of how many knots?

Mr. BRODEUR. I think ten knots.

Mr. FOSTER. Were the vessels capable of running ten knots?

Mr. BRODEUR. The contract provides for a ten knots service, and they must prove that they have furnished such service or they do not get the subsidy.

Mr. FOSTER. What were the results in the way of trade? We ought to know what we are getting for our money.

Mr. BRODEUR. Last year the trade amounted to $10,000,000 or a little more.

Mr. FOSTER. How was that divided between exports and imports?

Mr. BRODEUR. There were $8,000,000 odd imports and nearly $2,000,000 exports.

Mr. FOSTER. This is not the only line by which we get French goods into Canada.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is mostly.

Mr. FOSTER. What has been the growth of imports from France in the last few years?

Mr. BRODEUR. In 1905 the exports were $335,000, and in 1904 they had increased to $1,992,928. The imports were:

1895	$2,585,000
1896	2,810,000
1897	2,651,000
1898	3,975,000
1899	3,889,000
1900	4,368,000

1901	$ 5,398,000
1902	6,672,000
1903	6,580,000
1904	6,206,000

I have not got the figures since. We expect to have larger exports because our exports have now to pay the maximum duty when the most of our competitors, such as Germany, Australia, Italy, Spain and Switzerland, export their goods to France under the minimum tariff, and there is a great difference between the maximum and the minimum. When the treaty is ratified, our trade with France ought to increase immensely, as our exports will get the benefit of the minimum tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. The French chambers and government have been at work some time revising their tariff. What is the general course of that revision? Is it towards raising the duties both in the minimum and maximum list against foreign imports?

Mr. BRODEUR. The tariff in France is not submitted by the government itself but by a committee. I have seen somewhere that the French Senate are preparing a tariff, and that body is largely protectionist. It may be that the Senate committee would report strongly in favour of an increased tariff. But I do not know whether that same feeling exists in the lower House. I am under the impression that in the lower House the general feeling is in favour of more extensive commercial relations with other countries.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to bring a few considerations to the attention of the minister. I suppose the government does not intend to put this subsidy into active operation for a period of years unless the French treaty is finally ratified.

Mr. BRODEUR. Our intention is to make a contract for only one year, and after the treaty is ratified, we will make it for a longer term.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to having the contract go on, so as not to break the connection. But I want to call the attention of the minister to two or three things that may happen in the future. In the first place, it is true that whatever may be the minimum tariff in France we will get the same rates under that minimum tariff that other favoured nations get. It is also true that if you put the minimum tariff up to a certain point, if it is a very high tariff, it precludes freedom of trade. It is not sufficient to say that it does not make any difference whether the minimum tariff is 25 per cent or 95 per cent, if we get the same advantage as others. In that respect that statement is true, but if it is a 95 per cent minimum tariff instead of a 25 per cent, it practically precludes trade from outside countries. Now the other consideration is this: The French Chambers are revising their tariff, and from what I have seen in the newspapers it is probable that the tariff will be raised rather than lowered, and it may be that the minimum tariff will be brought up on a parallel, with the maximum, and that both of them will be raised. I think it would be the part of prudence not to make a contract for more than one year at the present time, until we see what the French tariff is going to be under its new form, because it might take such a basis in heightened minimum duties that it would not be worth while for us to spend $2,000,000 in order to cultivate the trade. I think before the French treaty is brought up for ratification the government ought to be able to give this House information with reference to this proposed revision, what is being done about it in the French Chambers. The other point is one I brought to the attention of the House in the budget debate. The United States tariff is not yet fixed. We do not exactly know what it will be, but there is not much doubt but that there will be some provisions in that tariff which will probably make us sit up and think with reference to our relations with other countries. That would be another consideration why it would not be well to make the contract for ten years. Whilst I am anxious to do what we reasonably can to promote the trade, we must yet have regard to our own interests. These two considerations would lead me to think that it would be wise for us to make but the simple yearly arrangement this year, and another year we will be able to see where we are.

Mr. BRODEUR. The contract for the present will be only for one year. It expires on the 1st of May, and we have to make a new contract right away, because the season of navigation is about to open. I think the intention of my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is simply to make a contract for one year, until we have more definite information from France as to the application of the treaty.

Mr. MONK. The Allan contractors are entitled to the highest consideration, because not only were they the pioneers of the service between England and our own country, but in the beginning they laboured against great odds. Even during the period of this service with France they have had a great many obstacles to contend with. Does my hon. friend mean that this contract is for one year only?

Mr. BRODEUR. The contract made last year is only for one year, and it is the intention to renew it for one year only.

Mr. MONK. Am I mistaken in thinking that after the treaty has been accepted by the French Chambers, it is still incomplete until it has been ratified by our own parliament?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes. The treaty which was made this year by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will have to be submitted to parliament for its acceptance.

Mr. MONK. So it will be next session before it is a finality?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, I think my colleague the Minister of Finance is now in communication with the French government to find out when the treaty will be approved in France. We may prorogue very soon, and it is the intention of the government to bring down the treaty and ask parliament to approve of it.

Mr. MONK. The Minister of Finance stated, I think, the other day that we will not take it upon ourselves to ratify the treaty again until it has been finally approved by France.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The Minister of Finance discussed this question with me a few days ago. It is not anticipated that there will be any difficulty on the part of France in accepting the treaty. The treaty was ratified last year, it has been modified since, but the modifications are not of such a nature as to make the treaty more difficult than it was from the French point of view. We have made it easier for France to ratify the treaty, therefore we do not apprehend that there will be any difficulty on the part of France. The French Chamber of Deputies has adjourned, but is going to resume early in May. The Minister of Finance I think is now in communication with the authorities in France, and I think it is his intention to submit the treaty to parliament this session for ratification.

Mr. MONK. When the treaty comes before us again we will have something to say about the marvellous achievements of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, for which he claimed great glory when he came home from France. I do not suppose there will be any expense this summer in connection with the ratification of that treaty, such as there was when my hon. friend returned from France on that occasion, and boasted that we were going to feed the whole of France with our fat cattle.

Mr. HUGHES. Is there a bonus given to the Hamburg-American line which runs between Canada and Hamburg, calling at an English port?

Mr. BRODEUR. Not that I know of. There is a subsidy for a line to Antwerp.

Mr. AMES. I hope the minister, in making this contract, will arrange, if trade warrants it, to reach some port in the south of France as well as the port of Havre. Perhaps the minister will remember that when we were discussing the French treaty last year, I stated the view of some importers of French goods in Montreal that we lost the benefit of a considerable trade that might come to us, under the treaty, from the southern ports of France because of the fact that there is not a line of steamers between Canada and any of these southern ports. It was pointed out that, in the case of quite a number of exports from southern France, if they had to be sent by rail across France to Havre to take advantage of the direct steamship line the railways would be practically prohibitive of the exportation. May I ask the minister to endeavour, if he can, to make it possible later on, when the trade warrants it, for the government to secure a steamer service from the southern as well as from the northern ports.

Mr. BRODEUR. As my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) is aware, most of the business done to-day is done with Le Havre. I admit that there are some exportations from the southern part of France.

Mr. AMES. From the port of Marseilles.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes, but the business to-day would not warrant us in making a contract for a direct line from Marseilles or any other southern port. If a line were established to southern France, of course it would be to the port of Marseilles, that being the most important. It may be, as my hon. friend suggests, that, at some time in the future, trade may warrant the establishment of a line between Canada and Marseilles, or having the present steamers call at Marseilles. At present, it is only contemplated to establish a line between Le Havre and Canada. Under this law, the suggestion of my hon. friend can be considered.

Mr. HUGHES. In connection with the trade of the Mediterranean, I recently received a letter from Syria, the scene of the massacres. It was written before the massacres began, and I do not know whether the gentleman who wrote to me has gone down or not. He pointed out that there was a great trade to be done between Canada and Syria. He went on to explain the difficulty they experience in obtaining the class of goods that Canada exports, and gave the prices at which these goods are sold there. He asks me to bring the letter to the attention of some commercial houses in Canada. If it will be to the advantage of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I shall be glad to hand it to either. I am sorry I have not it here that I might read it to the committee. He writes from Beirut and says that there is this large trade to be done with Canada if we had a steamship line with trips once a month or as often as the trade might warrant.

Mr. MONK. Can my hon. friend (Mr. Brodeur) tell me how he and his colleague came to forget, while negotiating in France, the existence of that Swiss treaty which was an obstacle to the final settlement?

Mr. BRODEUR. Perhaps the fault does not lie entirely with us. I remember having read a question and answer given in the House in the year 1895, when the first French treaty was brought before the House. The government of that time was asked what were the nations enjoying most favoured nation treatment, and in the answer Switzerland was omitted. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs, later, published a book containing the names of the countries enjoying favoured nation treatment, and he followed the answer which had been given and omitted Switzerland. There has always been great doubt as to whether Switzerland occupied this position or not. Some legal gentlemen, with whom I had occasion, not very long ago, to discuss this question, were of opinion, after having read the provisions of the treaty of 1885 that this treaty did not apply to Canada so far as the favoured nation stipulation was considered. At one time there was doubt expressed also by the imperial government in the matter.

Mr. MONK. I think it is to be regretted that, when the hon. gentleman entered into negotiations, he and his colleague did not consider this. As a matter of fact, we have recognized since that, the Swiss treaty Bill.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Bill reported.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT.

Bill (No. 152) to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act—Mr. Brodeur—read the second time and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. BRODEUR. Under the present law, when a wreck is a menace to navigation, we give notice to the vessel owner to remove the wreck. If he does not do it, we advertise in the papers asking for tenders for the removal. It happens very often that, in the meantime, the owners remove from the vessel everything that is worth while, and when we come to remove the hull or to give a contract for its removal, we find that there is hardly anything of value. This means expenditure by the government. The object of this legislation is to declare that not only the vessel shall be a guarantee of the cost of removal of the wreck, but also what is in the vessel, equipment, tackle and machinery.

Mr. FOSTER. Does that mean that if a vessel comes to grief with a valuable cargo on it, the owner of the vessel has to let the cargo go and await the long period which will elapse before the department gets its machinery in operation to remove the wreck?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, we provide in subsequent sections that the wreck will have to be removed immediately, and if they do not remove it we will do it ourselves.

Mr. FOSTER. Immediate is a relative word. The cargo might be of a kind which, if it were necessary under the law to allow it to remain with the vessel, might be rendered of no use. Surely, if a man owns a vessel, if he has a cargo in it, if the vessel meets with a mishap and it goes down, he should have the opportunity of taking out such part of his cargo as is valuable as soon as possible and of saving it in the best condition. Is he absolutely prohibited from removing any part of the cargo?

Mr. BRODEUR. No, in that case he would have the right to give us a guarantee that the removal of the cargo would not be detrimental to the interests of the department.

Mr. MONK. Are there any cases that have given rise to this legislation?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes. In almost all of the cases that come before the department they remove what is the most important and valuable part of the vessel leaving the hull which is generally not worth anything.

Mr. MONK. Will my hon. friend give an instance?

Mr. BRODEUR. We had a case in the west lately where a vessel sank. They removed the cargo and there was nothing of value left to us. We had to take the necessary proceedings to remove the wreck and it was done at a great cost to the department without any revenue being derived from it. The country had to bear the expense. If the cargo had remained, or if it had been removed under a bond guaranteeing that this cargo would serve first for the payment of the cost of the removal of the wreck, there would have been something saved to the department.

Mr. MONK. What did it cost in that instance?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have not the information now as to how much it cost. In some cases it costs us large sums of money. Last year we asked for public tenders for the removal of a wreck at the mouth of the Saguenay and it cost us $12,000 although we did not get anything for it.

Mr. MONK. What ship was that?

Mr. BRODEUR. The 'Protector.'

Mr. PORTER. Suppose a vessel goes down in navigable waters, is the equipment of the vessel—her anchors, chains, &c.—to remain there until a bond is given? How long has it to remain or where has it to remain? The anchors, chains, &c., would have to be removed before the hull could be removed.

Mr. BRODEUR. We expect in that case they will proceed right away to remove the wreck, but they will not be permitted to remove the equipment without giving a guarantee that this equipment will be considered as a part of the vessel. We will therefore have a lien not only upon the hull of the vessel but also on the equipment for the purpose of reimbursing the department for the expenditure we make in removing the wreck.

Mr. PORTER. Suppose the owner is incompetent to give a bond?

Mr. BRODEUR. Then we will proceed right away to remove the wreck, either doing it ourselves or calling for tenders.

Mr. PORTER. As my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has pointed out, most of the equipment would be destroyed or rendered practically valueless in the time that it might remain in the water before the government might remove it.

Mr. BRODEUR. No, if we proceed immediately there is no danger that this equipment will be destroyed. The anchors, chains, &c., will still be of the same value.

Mr. PORTER. These wrecks usually occur in places that are dangerous from the presence of rocks or rapids. A vessel might go down in a place where, if she were left for a few days, the whole thing would be cleaned out. What would become of the cargo and equipment then? Would it not be better to provide that the cargo and equipment could be removed under government supervision to some place of safety and stored there until the wreck was removed? Then, if it became necessary for the government to remove the wreck, they would have the goods and equipment of the vessel in store upon which they would have a lien to recoup them as far as they would go for the expense they might have incurred in removing the hull. The owner could always remove the goods and this would be preferable to requiring him to give a bond. He might not be in such circumstances that he would be able to give a bond.

Mr. BRODEUR. In considering this provision we must keep in mind the definition of a vessel under chapter 115 of the statute. I will read the clause and my hon. friend will understand the advisability of adopting the section that we have now submitted to the consideration of the committee. Section 13 reads :

> In this Act unless the context otherwise requires, 'vessels' includes every description of ship, boat or craft of ever kind whether impelled by steam or otherwise or whether used as sea-going vessels or on inland waters only.

That is all there is as to the definition of a vessel and the result is that later on when we proceed to the removal of a wreck we have no lien upon the most important part of the wreck, the equipment, the ballast, cargo and the machinery. The owners or insurance companies remove all that. we cannot prevent them doing so, and we have nothing left but the bare hull which may be of no value. That is why we have extended the interpretation of the word 'vessels.'

Mr. LENNOX. It is noted that this corresponds with the English Merchants' Shipping Act of 1894?

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. PORTER. I quite agree that it is important to have this lien on the equipment of the boat, but my inquiry was directed more to the care of the material taken from the boat until you wish to enforce your lien. Of course you do not wish to have the material remain in the vessel for months or weeks, where it must be destroyed or stolen.

Mr. BRODEUR. I admit that we have not formally provided for that in the Bill, and if the committee think it advisable we might put in such a provision or it might be made the subject of regulation.

Mr. LANCASTER. Would it not do to say that the government shall have a lien on the material wherever it may be. That would not prevent the owner from immediately getting to work to save the material.

Mr. BRODEUR. Under the law the owners or the insurance company will put themselves in communication with the department at once. We want to have our lien on the material wherever it may be.

Mr. PORTER. It might be done by having the material stored in the public warehouse.

Mr. MONK. It seems to me that there should be some time within which the government should act. Ought there not to be a notice to the interested parties that the wreck interferes with navigation, that the government has decided it must be removed and that under certain conditions the interested party may take possession, provided he gives security for the cost of removal of the wreck. Sometimes the government are very slow in acting whereas the owner of the cargo or vessel will be interested in proceeding at once with salvage operations. There may be doubt as to whether the government would remove the wreck.

On section 2,

Section 14 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:—

2. The owner of such vessel or thing shall forthwith begin the removal thereof, and shall prosecute such removal diligently to completion; but nothing herein shall be deemed to limit the powers of the minister under sections 16 and 17 of this Act.

Mr. LANCASTER. What are clauses 16 and 17?

Mr. BRODEUR. They provide that the government or the minister has the right to remove obstructions. There is no provision in section 14 requiring the owner of the vessel to remove the wreck immediately, and we had to give notice to that effect. We want to force him to take the necessary steps immediately to remove the wreck. In some cases, where such notice is required, the delay might be dangerous. A case occurred last year or two years ago in the harbour of Montreal, where a vessel sank just at the mouth of the canal, and it might have seriously impeded navigation if we had to give notice.

Mr. LANCASTER. How do you enforce that?

Mr. BRODEUR. If the owner does not remove the wreck forthwith, we might proceed under section 16 to call for tenders for its removal.

Mr. LANCASTER. Would not this be a good place to provide that in case the owner proceeds to remove the cargo and equipment and does not remove the wreck, the former shall be stored and shall be held as security by the government until he does?

Mr. PORTER. Suppose you add after the word 'completion' the words 'and shall place all portions of such vessel other than the hull so removed in a public warehouse after removal until the hull of the vessel has been removed'.

Mr. BRODEUR. He is bound to remove it to completion, which means not only the cargo, but the vessel itself. If he undertakes to remove only one part, that is, the cargo, we shall have a lien on that until he removes the whole wreck. I do not see any great objection to my hon. friend's suggestion, and I will consider it.

Mr. LANCASTER. You could not assume that the man was not going to remove the hull as well as the contents, for it would be consistent with his intention to do so that he would remove the contents first. But you might be disappointed by finding that he did not remove the hull. Therefore, you might insert the provision that such parts as he does remove should be subject to a lien until he removes the hull.

Mr. BRODEUR. I will see if we should not provide that in that case he should, for instance, report to the receiver of wrecks. My hon. friend suggests that he might put the contents in a warehouse. There might not be a warehouse at the place. I will see if we cannot incorporate some provision in this Bill or make some regulation which will meet the point.

On section 3,

Mr. BRODEUR. The present section reads that 'the minister under the authority of the Governor in Council' may do certain things. The reason I am asking to strike out the words 'under the authority of the Governor in Council' is that it sometimes causes a delay of weeks to get that authority. If these were struck out the minister could proceed immediately.

On section 5,

Mr. BRODEUR. This is to provide that after two years, if nothing has been done towards removing a wreck it will be forfeited. We consider that if the owner of a vessel has left it for two years without doing anything, it is only fair that it should be considered forfeited to the Crown, or we might remove it or give some one the contract to remove it for his own benefit.

Mr. PORTER. Should not that right be exercised only after notice to the owner?

Mr. BRODEUR. Sometimes we do not know who the owner is, and sometimes there are obstructions to navigation other than vessels.

Mr. PORTER. Then give notice by publication.

Mr. LENNOX. This section seems to apply to vessels alone and the other applies to things other than vessels.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is a mistake, it should apply to vessel or other things.

Mr. LANCASTER. Have we not changed the interpretation clause so that 'vessels' covers these things any way?

Mr. BRODEUR. The interpretation clause simply provides for the vessel itself. The removal of the wreck may include not only the vessel but anything else which is an obstruction to navigation such as floating timber and saw logs which are not sunk entirely. The vessels cannot see them as they are partially under water and we do not know who are the owners of the logs. We should add the words or ' other things.'

Mr. LALOR. Would it not be wise to provide that notice should be given to the owner when known or by public advertisement when not known?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have no objection.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It was moved that the clause be amended by adding after the word 'vessel' in the first line the words 'or other things' and in the second line after the word 'thereof' the words or 'other things.'

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LALOR. At the expiration of the two years we should provide that a month's notice be given to the owner if known or a month's public notice if not known.

Mr. LANCASTER. We should also add the words 'or other things' in the second line after the word ' vessel.'

Mr. BRODEUR. If a man has left his things there without doing anything for two years, it is to be supposed he does not care much about them.

Mr. LALOR. They might consist of a quantity of very valuable timber.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have no objection.

Mr. MONK. How would you give public notice?

Mr. BRODEUR. In the ' Canada Gazette.'

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is moved in amendment that after the word 'casualty' in line six, section five, the following words be inserted 'upon giving to the owner when known one month's notice and where unknown public notice of one month in a paper published nearest to the place of the wrecked vessel or other things.

Mr. MONK. Then the obstruction would remain there a month longer.'

Mr. LALOR. After it has been laying there two years another month would not matter.

Mr. LENNOX. You should add the words 'the minister may after giving notice.'

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is moved in amendment that after the word 'may' in the seventh line, the words be inserted 'after giving notice.'

Amendment agreed to, clause five as amended agreed to.

On section 6,

6. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following, as Part III thereof:—

PART III.

INTERPRETATION.

31. In this part, unless the context otherwise requires,—

(a) ' ferry cable ' includes any ferry cable, rod, chain or other device put across, over, in or under any navigable water for working a ferry.

(b) ' swing or draw bridge ' means and includes any swing or draw bridge other than a railway bridge.

Mr. BRODEUR. We take this power because a year or two ago a petition was sent to the Manitoba government asking for legislation to regulate those ferry cables. In Manitoba the custom is to put those cables, not in the water, but over the river, so that boats are unable to pass. The Attorney General, Mr. Campbell, sent the petition here stating he had no power as it was a question affecting navigation, and asked us to have the necessary legislation passed.

Mr. PORTER. Why railway bridges? Why should they be exempt?

Mr. BRODEUR. Because they are provided for in the Railway Act.

Mr. PORTER. In my riding there is a swing bridge, known as the bay of Quinte bridge, and it is over a navigable water. The company and the bridge are under special Act of this parliament. Would the fact of their not being exempted from the operation of this Bill give the minister power over their bridge?

Mr. BRODEUR. Is it a railway bridge?

Mr. PORTER. No, it is for passengers and vehicles. But it is a swing bridge across a navigable water. Should not it be exempted also?

Mr. BRODEUR. No. The reason we are taking this power is to force these bridges to show lights, for the protection of navigation.

Mr. PORTER. The special Act relating to the bridge I speak of provides for that.

Mr. BRODEUR. Then, this legislation will only amplify the application of that provision. The intention of the department, if this legislation is passed, is to ask the owners of these bridges to expose lights on the bridges.

Mr. LANCASTER. Do bridges controlled under the Railway Act and crossing navigable waters have these lights as a matter of course?

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand so.

Mr. LANCASTER. There is a bridge on the Welland division of the Grand Trunk Railway that crosses the Welland canal. I would not be too positive, but I do not think it is lighted—not as a bridge; the canal is lighted

Mr. BRODEUR. Perhaps it is not necessary to have the bridge lighted when the canal is lighted. Besides, my department is not concerned with bridges over canals, that comes under the Railways and Canals Department. What we are speaking of is bridges crossing navigable waters not canals.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not see any need for excepting a railway bridge—I do not see why the country would not be better off without that exception. It need not be enforced if the railway is doing all you want it to do. I do not say that the Department of Marine and Fisheries has control in this matter over the Welland canal, but, using this as an illustration, I see no reason why railway bridges should be excepted under this Bill. The government is not going to apply the law unless there is reason for it, either in the case of a railway bridge or any other.

Mr. BRODEUR. I understand that the Railway Act provides that these bridges must maintain lights and that the penalty is provided under that Act. Under this legislation, we propose to impose a penalty. We thought it was unnecessary and unjust to provide for two penalties.

Mr. LENNOX. In this Bill the minister is dealing only with matters that come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. LANCASTER. It does not say that.

Mr. LENNOX. We have not the whole law before us.

Mr. BRODEUR. Regulations will be passed.

Mr. LENNOX. But the hon. minister does not seek to deal with matters except those in his own department?

Mr. BRODEUR. No. If there were no provision in the Railway Act, I would ask to have power given here. But provision is made, and the penalty fixed.

Mr. LANCASTER. It is the navigable waters you are protecting here. I do not say that the Railway Department would not try to protect navigable waters also. But that is not their business, while it is the business of the Minister of Marine. I think it is not wise legislation that under which the Minister says, in effect : 'I am not going to look after navigable waters so far as railway bridges are concerned.'

Mr. BRODEUR. I am not absolutely sure I am right, but if we find that railway bridges are not provided with lights, of course the matter will be reported to our department, as the department most interested, and if the bridge is not soon lighted according to the provisions of the Railway Act, I suppose we shall take proceedings. At least, we could petition the Department of Railway and Canals.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is what I object to—the circumlocution.

Mr. BRODEUR. In the case referred to by the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter), if their Act of incorporation imposes upon the company the duty of maintaining certain lights during certain portions of the year. I apprehend that any difficulty could be obviated by making the words of the excepting words read 'other than a railway bridge or bridge governed by special legislation.' Will the hon. member give me the name of the bridge?

Mr. PORTER. The title of the company is The Belleville and Prince Edward Bridge Company.

Mr. BRODEUR. Is it under Act of this parliament?

Mr. PORTER. Yes. The Act was passed fifteen or sixteen years ago, I will give the minister the date.

Mr. BRODEUR. We might make a special exemption, because the argument which I was making concerned railway bridges.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. It will be the same provision as for a railway bridge. I know there is a railway bridge across the mouth of the Gananoque river, but it is not used and yet the company keep lights on it all through the season of navigation.

Bill reported.

Mr. BRODEUR. I will not ask the House to give the Bill its third reading to-night, in order that I may examine the Act my hon. friend has just mentioned, and see whether it is necessary to have special exemption made for that bridge.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS OF MONTREAL.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 154) respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

Mr. MONK. I would like to ask my hon. friend the meaning of this change of jurisdiction. What power is now exercised by the commissioners of the port which is henceforth to be under the jurisdiction and control of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. BRODEUR. The port of Montreal is that part of the St. Lawrence river which extends from Portneuf to Montreal. My hon. friend remembers that some years ago that part of the St. Lawrence was under the control of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. Until 1888 all the work done between Quebec and Montreal was done by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. In 1889 a change was made, and the government assumed the debt the Harbour Commissioners had incurred for dredging that part of the St. Lawrence. The Harbour Commissioners, however, remained the pilotage authority for that part of the river until 1903, when an Act was passed providing that in future the pilotage authority should be vested in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, but there was no change made in the Harbour Commissioners Act itself. The statute I have just mentioned was a special one, declaring that the Department of Marine and Fisheries would henceforth be the pilotage authority, and control the pilots between Montreal and Quebec. Since that time the Harbour Commissioners have ceased to exercise any jurisdiction over the port of Montreal as a pilotage authority, but they have continued to exercise the right of making the rules of the road in that part of the St. Lawrence river. In the port of Quebec the rules of the road are prepared by this department, and in all the other navigable waters of the country as well. The only authority by which the rules of the road, which had not been changed for many years, could be prepared or changed, was the Montreal Harbour Commissioners. Well, we thought that as they had ceased to be the pilotage authority, had ceased to have anything to do with the dredging in that part of the St. Lawrence, and ceased to have any jurisdiction there, it was thought adyisable to have the law amended.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Might I suggest to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that as this is a very long Bill, and it is now half past eleven, he had better let this stand over, and let us take up some short Bills that are standing in the name of the Minister of Justice and of the Postmaster General.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Very well.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Bill (No. 153) respecting the National Transcontinental Railway (Mr. Graham), read the second time, and House went into committee thereon..

Mr. GRAHAM. This is merely to give the National Transcontinental Railway Commission power to enter into an arrangement with the city of Winnipeg and the town of St. Boniface to build a bridge together if they can come to terms, and the terms have to be submitted to the Governor in Council.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

YUKON ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 156) to amend the Yukon Act—Mr. Aylesworth—read the second time and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Qualification of judges.

Mr. LANCASTER. How would that section read with this amendment in?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). I have not the original section here, but the section which it is proposed to amend provides who shall be eligible for the position of judge of the territorial court in the Yukon territory. It provides that the judges of that court are to be selected from barristers of a certain number of years standing in different courts of the Northwest and, I think, of the provinces of British Columbia, Saskatchewan or Alberta, but it does not mention the bar of the Yukon Territory, and the whole effect of the amendment is to add to the clause as it stands the words ' or of the Yukon territory'. If this amendment is passed judges of the court may be selected from either the bars of the present provinces mentioned in the existing statute or from the bar of the Yukon territory itself.

Mr. LANCASTER. Are there any barristers in the Yukon who are educated in that territory as distinguished from other provinces, or is there any law society there?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I think I can answer my hon. friend that there are barristers of standing in the Yukon territory who are not members of the bar of any other province or territory in the Dominion.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXTRADITION ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 149) to amend the Extradition Act—Mr. Aylesworth—read the second time and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Depositions for use in a foreign state may be taken in absence of accused.

Mr. LANCASTER. I think we ought to have some explanation about this. It is interfering with the rights of the man accused.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. The Bill is introduced with the object of supplying what appears to be a defect in our present procedure under the Extradition Act. It applies to the case of a fugitive from Canadian justice who has been found in some foreign country with which country we have an extradition arrangement, and whom it is desired to extradite into Canada. Proceedings are taken by the laying of an information in Canada, which of course, is a proceeding taken in the absence of the accused person. The whole of the proceedings in Canada will of necessity be taken in the absence of the accused person. There is no express provision in the Extradition Act authorizing the magistrate or commissioner before whom the information is laid to take depositions in the absence of the person accused, and the method by which practically that difficulty has been in some instances obviated has been by obtaining the magistrate not to issue his warrant upon the information but to wait until he should receive all such depositions as witnesses might voluntarily choose to make before him. There is no power expressly given to summon witnesses and no power expressly given to the magistrate to take depositions in the absence of the accused person. Accordingly the means for getting them ordinarily taken have been those I have described. This Bill proposes to obviate that by conferring upon the magistrate expressly the jurisdiction to take those depositions notwithstanding that he may have issued a warrant and to take them in the absence of the accused person. Also a subsequent clause in the Bill empowers the magistrate to issue a summons for a witness who may not be willing to come voluntarily.

Mr. LANCASTER. I admit that there seems to be a need of some remedy for the state of affairs mentioned by the minister, but I doubt very much whether we are giving the power to the right tribunal. We are giving to laymen, who have very little ability to protect the absent man, however good their intentions, power to deal with evidence to be used against that man in a foreign state, in extradition proceedings. While I would be in favour of some remedy for the condition described by the minister I would strongly urge that the taking of these depositions should not be entrusted to any one of a lower legal standing than a county court or district judge who would be able to rule out leading or improper questions, and to see that the interests of the absent man were protected.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I think on further consideration the hon. gentleman will agree that there is no danger in the Bill as drawn. These depositions as taken are not to be acted upon by the magistrate but are to be sent to the foreign country where the accused person is and will be passed on by the tribunal there. Before that tribunal objections may be urged on behalf of the accused to the regularity of the depositions, the authority under which they are taken, and the admissibility of evidence given. There may be applications for habeas corpus in the foreign state, after the accused person is committed for extradition, in that state by the proper official, who in the first instance would inquire into the sufficiency of these depositions, so the duty which is imposed on the magistrate is simply the duty which all magistrates will discharge not only in the case of fugitives from foreign countries, but also in the case of Canadians who may be arrested on any criminal charge and brought before a magistrate for preliminary hearing. We have entrusted magistrates in such cases with the duty not only of taking the depositions, but also of passing upon them, committing a prisoner for trial. If we can safely entrust that duty to our magistrates in the ordinary case of a Canadian citizen accused in Canada of some criminal offence, why may we not with equal safety entrust the like duty to a magistrate in the case of a fugitive from Canadian justice, especially when the magistrate does not pass upon the evidence he takes?

Mr. LANCASTER. The answer to that is that in one case the man is present, it is all done before his face and the British principle that no man shall be proceeded against in his absence is not departed from, but here you are proceeding against a man in a foreign country in his absence. Then of course these depositions taken before the magistrate are not in the form of question and answer, they are converted by the magistrate into narrative form and every lawyer knows how frequently both counsel and accused, when a deposition is being read over before being signed, see that the magistrate's narrative report does not convey just what the man intended to say. Unless these depositions are taken before men of legal training and experience, such as the judges I have mentioned, you will certainly have many statements taken down and signed by witnesses that would not be signed in that form if the accused was present and understood how to protect himself or if he was represented by counsel who would see that the statements were correctly taken down and the cross-examination conducted. I want to impress this upon the minister, and I think that he will find in the course of a year or two if not in the course of a day or two, that what I am saying is right.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that every piece of magisterial work could probably be better done by the county judge than by the average magistrate in the country. The county judge is, in virtue of his office, a magistrate for his county; but the difficulty is not only in increasing measurably the work of the county judge, but also in the circumstance that the county judge is not within easy access of every man in his county. Not all the jurisdictions of county judges are as small as many Ontario counties with which we are familiar. Think of the tremendous distances in the least thickly settled portions of Canada, where men may be needed as witnesses upon a preliminary inquiry of this sort who reside hundreds of miles from the county seat, where the county judge is to be found. I think these considerations will convince any one that it is better that work of this sort should be as far as possible decentralized. Then consideration should be given to the purpose for which these depositions are required, and for which alone they are to be used. They are not for the trial of the charge in any sense. I am not certain at the moment whether, in the absence of the witness, they could be used on a trial. The trial is to take place after the fugitive is brought into Canada, and the depositions only answer the purpose of securing his presence in Canada, from which perhaps in most cases he should never have departed. The depositions would no doubt be better taken in shorthand, in the form of question and answer; but that is not practicable. I am sure that my hon. friend can remember, as I can, when we had no shorthand reporters even in our high courts in Ontario at the trials of actions. We had to get along in the best way we could with evidence noted by a judge, which was often the only material on which an appeal in an important civil case could be taken. We have now the better system of taking the evidence in shorthand and extending it in full in question and answer, but that is not practicable in every minor proceeding, and this evidence being only to secure the presence in Canada of the fugitive person, it seems to me that it is sufficient to leave it to a magistrate, even though taken down in ordinary longhand.

Mr. LENNOX. I am sorry that the hon. minister does not fall in with the view of the hon. member for Lincoln. I had not given much thought to the matter, but having listened to what he has said, I am very much impressed with the importance of having this evidence taken by a judge. We are taking a proceeding which is contrary to the ordinary common law practice in criminal matters when we provide that the evidence may be taken in the absence of the accused. But every person must see the necessity of it in this case, and I do not think that any one is disposed to question the wisdom of the Minister of Justice in making provision along these lines. I entirely commend the legislation that far. But the minister must not argue it on the basis of an every-day transaction. He has spoken as if it might occur several times a week and in several counties, but we must bear in mind that this extraordinary procedure is resorted to only in a case which involves and justifies a good deal of work. It is only in a case of a serious crime, and it is a serious matter for a man to be removed from a place which he has chosen as his domicile, unless there is a clear strong prima facie case made out against him, and that should be made out on legitimate evidence reasonably obtained. We do not think that we are surrounding a case with any more than reasonable safeguards when we say that this evidence should be taken before some one capable of judging the bearing of evidence and the proper manner of adducing it. It is not enough to say that this evidence, when it comes before the foreign tribunal, may be objected to by counsel on behalf of the accused. It may not be objected to, because the accused may have no counsel to raise an objection on his behalf. But even if he has a counsel, and if his counsel is ever so astute, the evidence presents a certain aspect, when it is produced before that foreign tribunal, which is governed, not by the importance of the facts, but by the manner in which the evidence has been taken. The result is that to the foreign tribunal it presents a picture altogether contrary to the true facts of the case. Perhaps no one has been there to guard the interests of the accused; perhaps the evidence has been elicited by a detective, who is interested to an enormous extent in running down the accused and bringing him back to Canada. All lawyers know the length to which men of that class will go and the methods by which they work. Get a magistrate who is without experience in the law taking down evidence at the dictation of a constable or a detective in the absence of the accused, and you are doing something that is very dangerous. I think that the very least safeguard we should insist upon in these cases is that the evidence should be taken before a judge of a county court or of a district court or before a judge of the high court. The minister has said that one reason against it is the throwing of too heavy a burden upon the county judges. That is not a well-taken argument. If there is anything we want in this country, it is in many instances that the county judges may have more work to keep them occupied; because, as an hon. friend says, they are rusting out rather than wearing out. In some counties it is necessary to have two judges, because one is sometimes absent holding division courts, though there is perhaps not enough work for one. In other cases there is only work for a judge and a half, and you must have the two. We are not throwing too great a burden on the county judges when we ask them to do this work and we are giving them work which many of them will be quite ready to do because it is in the interests of honest and effective administration of justice. In how many cases in any county in a whole year would you throw this duty on a county judge? In not one in a county in a year. In not one, as a rule, in a score of years, so that the argument that this would throw too heavy a burden on the county court judges is not entitled to any weight. Surely the hon. minister was not taking a photograph of the real situation when he talked of the accused having to travel probably a hundred miles in order to give his testimony before a judge. I venture to say it would be very rare indeed when he would have to travel even 25 miles, and the probability would be very remote of his ever having to travel one hundred miles. But even if he had, that would be ten thousand times better than that we should set aside any of the necessary safeguards in the interests of the person accused. The suggestion of my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) is a very judicious one.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend is talking entirely from the standpoint of the province of Ontario, where they have a county court judge and in some cases two for each county. But it may surprise him to learn that down in the maritime provinces we have often but one county court judge for four or five counties. In my portion of the province of New Brunswick, the district administered by the county court judge is over 200 miles in length, and on the north shore of New Brunswick there are four counties with but one county court judge. The amendment is hardly fair to the intelligence of the average magistrate in Canada. As far as my experience goes, a magistrate can take down evidence and draw conclusions fairly well. If a magistrate is given authority to take the depositions of the accused in so important a matter as a murder, I do not see why he cannot take depositions which may be acted on in a foreign country for the purpose of obtaining witnesses. My hon. friends are drawing on their imaginations for difficulties which do not exist. If this Bill passes, no harm could be done, and in many parts of Canada great difficulties will be caused if we oblige a county court judge to travel 100 or 200 miles to take depositions.

Mr. LENNOX. I was not speaking of the average intelligence of the magistrate of Ontario or any other province, but of the fact that in some isolated cases the magistrates are not very intelligent men. These may be only isolated cases, and I would not be surprised if some were in my hon. friend's province as well as mine; and the average intelligence in Ontario will compare fairly with that in any other province. What applies to the general public would apply to the magistrate as well. Our magistrates have been selected from good motives in many cases, and as a rule are an excellent class of men, but there are instances where they do not possess any great degree of education and have no judicial training. Therefore I think that the Minister of Justice would be wise in not having legislation enacted in this form.

Mr. PORTER. I want to add my approval to what has been said by hon. members on this side. Is the Minister of Justice aware that there are provisions in the statute now, under which depositions taken by a magistrate may be read against the accused on his trial under certain circumstances and as this law stands, such depositions are taken in his absence. If this Bill should pass, I take it that the general provisions of the Code will apply, and we will have evidence taken against the accused in his absence read against him in his trial when he comes back to this country, and upon such evidence he might possibly be convicted. If the minister thinks it necessary, as I believe it is, to have some such provision made as is made in this Bill, then the interests of the accused should be safeguarded to the extent of providing that such evidence taken in his absence should not be used against him on his trial, if there is any doubt whatever about the right to have it read.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I am not prepared to express any opinion whether, on the death of a witness, a deposition taken for the purpose of extradition could be read at the trial. I should doubt it. It may be so according to the language of the provision of the Act which permits depositions to be read in such cases as I have described, but I would not accept that view without much more careful consideration and examination of the statute than I have been able to give it. But the whole question is surely whether or not the existing state of things is preferable to that which would arise should this Bill become law. Under the existing conditions, these depositions are in practice taken before a magistrate in the absence of the accused. They are taken, it may be, without sufficient legal warrant. I do not know that that question has ever been raised in a foreign state, but it is liable to be raised, and it is to meet such an objection, if it should be raised, that this Bill is designed. At the present time, there is nothing to prevent the magistrate, when the information is laid before him upon which it is desired to get proceedings instituted for extradition, withholding his action until he shall have taken, as a part of the material on which he shall issue his warrant, all the depositions that any witness who may choose to appear before him may make. That is done in practice in, I suppose, all or nearly all, of the cases of accusations for extradition. I am not prepared to say that that is an irregular practice, but it is one for which there is no express statutory warrant. The whole effect of this Bill will be that the magistrate before whom the information is laid, the magistrate who receives the charge may, after having so received it summon witnesses and take their depositions.

Mr. PORTER. Does the minister think that that is evidence that should be read against a man on his trial?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. My hon. friend (Mr. Porter) wants an answer categorically whether I think that ought to be read. I am free to say that I see no more danger in doing it in the case of a person charged for extradition than in doing it in the case of a person who is in this country and who may have been present and may have been objecting as much as he pleases. He is subject to the same magistrate's rulings which, upon the hypothesis of hon. gentlemen who have spoken, are going to be without authority and without judicial character. He is subject to the same illiterate magistrate—if there be one—in taking down the evidence incorrectly. That if it is the present condition of things, arises from the circumstance of men being selected as magistrates who are not properly fitted for that position.

Mr. LANCASTER. When the minister cannot see any difference in the protection afforded to a prisoner between having evidence given when he is present and having it given when he is absent, it is hopeless to argue with him. Under the circumstances, I have two things to say about the matter, the first is that the Bill should not be gone on with, and the second is that it is useless to argue with the minister on the merits of the question.

Mr. PORTER. In view of what the minister said, why not provide in this Bill that such evidence when taken should not be read against the prisoner at his trial? Make it certain.

Mr. BUREAU. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Porter) say that in this Bill there ought to be a clause stating that such deposition should not be read at the trial of the accused?

Mr. PORTER. Yes, make it certain.

Mr. BUREAU. Suppose the witness is dead?

Mr. LANCASTER. All the more reason why the evidence should not be read, for you would be using evidence concerning which you cannot punish the person if perjury has been committed. Is there no idea in the head of the Solicitor General (Mr. Bureau) or of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) that a man accused has some rights in this country? Have they no idéa that harm may be done by taking evidence behind his back before a magistrate who, instead of having the evidence reported in the form of question and answer, transposes it into narrative form? As has been well said by the hon. member for West Hastings, the detective or person interested in getting a conviction goes before the magistrate, and it is all one-sided, the accused not being present or represented. And what the detective or magistrate may be tricky or ignorant enough to do, the Minister of Justice, apparently, is approving by his legislation. There is nobody there on behalf of the prisoner—nobody can be there, for they do not know what is being done. They have no knowledge that the poll is to be held, so to speak, at that time, and they have no idea that they are being dealt with on that occasion. And the evidence, instead of being taken down in question and answer form, the only way in which one can readily judge of what the witness said, is transposed by these people into narrative form behind the back of the accused. And this evidence so taken is to be used against him. The Solicitor General says: 'Suppose the witness is dead.' The witness is the onlv person, it may be, beside the magistrate, who knows anything about it, the prisoner not being there and not being represented. The very fact that the witness is dead is all the greater reason why the evidence should not be read, because the witness cannot be proceeded against for perjury or asked to explain it.

Mr. BUREAU. How about the other witnesses, if perjury can be proved?

Mr. LANCASTER. Who is going to bring these other witnesses? And how are you going to convict when you do not know what is going on? You are taking away a man's liberty or taking a step towards it, and that may mean the same thing in the end. The Solicitor General said: 'How about the other witnesses?' Who knows about the other witnesses? How does the accused know of the evidence that is being given affecting his liberty and that may lead to his being taken from a foreign country where he has his domicile? He may be completely innocent. Suppose he is charged with forgery, a witness testifies against him, though he knows nothing of the proceedings. The witness simply says: 'That is not my signature on that bill; or, That is not my father's signature.' The magistrate transposes that in such a way that, on the face of it, the witness has sworn that the accused forged that bill. There is no opportunity for cross examination, no opportunity for the accused to show that, for instance, he had the authority of the man to sign the bill in his name. My hon. friend speaks of a case of murder tried in the presence of the accused. If the accused is present, he is to be blamed if he does not see to it that things are done correctly, or employ a counsel who will protect his interests. His friends may interpose if he is too weak-minded to attend to his own defence. Or some charitably disposed man may interfere to see that the prisoner gets justice. Or, as is well said by a friend near me, the court may say as it often says in such cases: 'This is a serious accusation and this prisoner should be defended,' and may pick upon some counsel and ask him, in the interest of justice to see to it that the accused gets a fair trial. So much is this a recognized practice that it is considered, if not exactly contempt of court, an impolite thing for counsel not to accept the appointment and see that the man gets a fair trial. But here is the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth), with the Solicitor-General (Mr. Bureau) apparently agreeing with him, saying that it is no harm to take all these proceedings behind a man's back, with no one there to represent him to see that the evidence is taken down by a judicially-minded officer, no opportunity for him to engage counsel to see to it that the evidence is taken down in the shape that would be directed by a judge who knows what evidence is.

Mr. CARVELL. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster) wants to be fair about this. I am satisfied that he is not trying unduly to prevent the passage of this Bill. But I think he has failed to appreciate the real meaning and intention of the Bill. My hon. friend is discussing what may happen at the trial in case of the death or absence of a witness. I have not examined the Code, but I am satisfied that the only evidence which can be read at the trial is the evidence given at the preliminary examination by a witness who is either dead or absent from the country.

Mr. LENNOX. The Minister of Justice won't take that responsibility.

Mr. CARVELL. This does not refer to the preliminary examination at all, but to the evidence being given by a witness to be used in the foreign country for the arrest of the supposed criminal for the purpose of bringing him to this country to take his trial, and when he is brought here on this evidence, then he must have his preliminary examination.

Mr. LANCASTER. No, he goes right to the extradition commission.

Mr. CARVELL. No, he must have his preliminary examination.

Mr. LANCASTER. Before whom does he have his present examination?

Mr. CARVELL. He goes to the person who issues the order for his arrest.

Mr. LANCASTER. He goes to the county court judge directly.

Mr. CARVELL. No, I am satisfied I am correct. Therefore I contend my hon. friend is making a mountain out of a mole hill, he is conjuring up something in his mind that does not exist. He raised the question first whether this evidence should be taken before a justice of the peace or a county court judge. I cannot see why a justice of the peace cannot take down evidence just as intelligently as a county court judge. If the evidence is admitted, due respect would be given to that fact before the foreign tribunal.

Mr. PORTER. If the Minister of Justice will confirm what has just been said by my hon. friend from Carleton, that that evidence cannot be read against him at his trial, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. CARVELL. I cannot answer for the Minister of Justice, but my hon. friend can see by the Bill itself that the only object of getting the evidence is to send it to the foreign country. I submit that the only deposition which can be read at the trial of an accused person is the deposition taken at the preliminary examination. But this is not a preliminary examination, this is only an examination for the purpose of getting evidence to be sent to the foreign country.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) may be satisfied, but we have the statement of the Minister of Justice that he is not sure, he will take chances with it and let it go whichever way it may. But the Solicitor General says that if the witness is dead, why, so much the better, it is all right. I am prepared to say that we are encountering a great danger. My hon. friend from Lincoln and Niagara took the case of forgery. A man who gives evidence in the absence of the accused may be the man whose monetary interest is at stake, he may be the man who is shielding himself by accusing another, who is saving his pocket by accusing another. But the Minister of Justice is prepared to take chances of that form of evidence upon which this man may be ultimately tried and convicted.

Mr. CONGDON. There is no doubt that the deposition cannot be used. This section merely provides that the evidence may be taken as if such accused person was present and charged with such extradition crime. Section 999 provides:

> If upon the trial of an accused person such facts are proved upon oath or affirmation that it can be reasonably inferred therefrom that any person whose evidence was given at any former trial upon the same charge or whose deposition has been therefore taken in the investigation of the charge against such accused person, is dead, or is so ill as not to be able to travel, or is absent from Canada, and if it is proved that such evidence was given or that such deposition was taken in the presence of the person accused——

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the hon. gentleman say that those words do not cover this evidence?

Mr. CONGDON. No doubt they do not cover it.

Mr. CARVELL. I think that ought to satisfy the hon. member for Simcoe.

Mr. CONGDON. It provides that the evidence shall be taken as if the person accused were present, it does not provide that it shall be subsequently used as if the person were present. Unless there is such a provision as that the condition required to be complied with by section 999 would prevent the introduction of such evidence. The requirement is that the evidence shall be taken in the presence of the person accused, and that he or his counsel shall have full opportunity of examining the witness. This Bill says it shall be taken as though he were present, it is to be taken as if he were present for the purpose of being sent to the United States or other foreign country to support the extradition warrant there. The same principle prevails here as in the United States, and merely validates the existing practice in this country. With regard to taking evidence before a county court or superior court judge, the greatest objection is that this evidence as a rule requires to be taken with dispatch in order that it may reach the place in which it is to be used and secure the extradition of the criminal. It is necessary that it should be promptly taken, and you cannot get it promptly taken in many places in Canada if you require it to be taken before a county court or a superior court judge. Such requirement may necessitate the judge or the witness travelling a great distance. This evidence is worthless in 99 cases out of 100 unless it is taken with a promptitude that is not usually possible if it must be taken before a county court or a superior court judge. In my experience I think the majority of magistrates take evidence of this kind quite as well as the judges. I do not know where evidence is more carefully taken than it is generally taken by magistrates.

Bill reported.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Bills, commencing with the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill.

Mr. MONK. I would call my right hon. friend's attention to the fact that we are nearing the end of the session, and it is essential that we should know, in order to expedite and facilitate the business, exactly what is going to be taken up on the following day. To-morrow many of us will be absent. Are we going to take up Bills, as my hon. friend has said, indiscriminately? Shall we take the Bill on immigration? We are all anxious to advance the business of the House and it would aid us in doing that if we could know almost exactly what is going to be the business of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I said to my hon. friend that our intention was to take up Bills, commencing with the Grand Trunk Bill. We intend to follow the order on the paper and to take the Immigration Bill to suit the convenience of my hon. friends. If they are not prepared to go on with the Immigration Bill we will not take it up.

Mr. MONK. My right hon. friend knows that if we take up the Grand Trunk Bill it will probably obviate the necessity of taking up the Immigration Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I hope not. I hope we can take the Grand Trunk and other Bills as well.

Mr. MONK. Is there a probability that the Grand Trunk Bill will be taken up?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I say it will be taken up first.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.37 a.m. Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, April 30, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 163) to incorporate the Prairie Provinces Trust Company.—Mr. Sutherland.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY EMPLOYEES PROVIDENT FUND.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 164) to amend the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees Provident Fund. He said: The change in the management of the Intercolonial Railway necessitates a change in the description of the chairman of the Board of the Provident Fund. Hitherto he has been described as the general manager. This Bill merely defines who the general manager is as applied to the Provident Fund Act. It will make no difference in the personnel of the chairman.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House will on Monday next resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient in connection with the Bill now before this House, intituled: 'An Act to establish a Commission for the Conservation of Natural Resources,' to provide for:—(a) The appointment of a secretary to the said commission and such officers and clerks under him as are necessary for carrying on the work of the commission, at such salaries as, under the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, are appropriate to the divisions and subdivisions of the service to which such officers and clerks may be assigned; (b) the employment of such assistants as are necessary for the purpose of any special work or investigation, and for their remuneration and expenses; (c) the actual disbursements of the chairman and members of the commission incurred in travelling to, returning from, and remaining at meetings of the commission, and of the chairman in travelling or otherwise attending to the work of the commission.

He said: The subject matter of this resolution has been presented to His Excellency the Governor General and he recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. CROCKET. I desire to call attention to an order passed by this House on February 11 for a return of all reports and accounts in connection with the survey of the St. John river between Fredericton and Woodstock. This return has not been brought down although I have called the attention of the Minister of Public Works to it on two occasions. I have received many inquiries from the counties of Carleton and York in reference to this matter, and I am particularly anxious to have the papers brought down as soon as possible.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 146) to amend the Act relating to Ocean Steamship Subsidies.—Mr. Brodeur.

Bill (No. 149) to amend the Extradition Act.—Mr. Aylesworth.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC LOAN.

House again in Committee on Bill (No. 128) to authorize a loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Fielding.

On section 1,

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR (Leeds). The hon. the Minister of Finance said yesterday that they did not purpose making a loan for ten years, but the chances were they would make a long loan for 25 years or 30 years, or perhaps 50 years. His remarks would lead to the conclusion that he has no hope that the Grand Trunk Pacific will pay off this loan at the termination of the ten years. Now, look at the thing from a business standpoint. Would any business man make a loan at a high rate when he did not intend to use the money? If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance collects the amount of this loan from the Grand Trunk Pacific at the end of the ten years, as he intends doing, he should simply make a loan covering that period. Then, when he is repaid by the Grand Trunk Pacific, he will pay off that loan; and if he requires more money, he would borrow at a lower rate. He says that this loan which he intends making in order to obtain the funds for the Grand Trunk Pacific, will be at four per cent or perhaps a little more. Looking back, I find that in 1895 and 1896 my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) who was then Finance Minister, floated loans at about 2½ per cent. Canada was then passing through a period of depression, which should have made the loan dearer, yet, notwithstanding the good times we have had since, my hon. friend has succeeded in lowering the credit of Canada to that extent that he has to pay four per cent for money, as compared with 2½ per cent paid by his predecessor. And this money which he requires to borrow, to hand over to the Grand Trunk Pacific, and which the Grand Trunk Pacific agree to repay in ten years, he purposes borrowing on a long term. Would it not be much more businesslike to borrow the money for ten years and then when repaid by the Grand Trunk Pacific pay off that loan. By that time the interest rate will in all probability be lower; and should he require more money, he would be able to borrow it at less than four per cent. But by his present policy, he is about to bind himself to pay four per cent during 25, 30 or even 50 years. Suppose for instance, a property owner wanted to raise some more money on his property, but found it difficult to get advances from money lenders because his property was already subject to first, second and third mortgages. He however goes to a neighbour who has money to lend and who also owns property and says to him: 'If you will go to the money market and borrow the $10,000 I require, which you can do on more favourable terms than I can, I will in return give you the security of my property for an advance of the same amount.' The transaction is put through in each case for ten years. At the end of that term, the one who borrowed in the money market will repay his loan with the money obtained by him from the second borrower; and then if he should require other money, he would borrow it at a lower rate. He might in that time be able to borrow at 2½ per cent. But the government proposes to go on paying four per cent for 25, 30 or 50 years, instead of making a ten year loan at four per cent, and then if necessary reborrowing at a lower rate.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). I have to dissent entirely from the statements of my hon. friend, in so far as they imply that any loans have been placed by this government on terms otherwise than favourable, having regard to the conditions of the money market at the time the loans were issued. An argument which does not take account of these conditions is absurd. You cannot make a loan at a better rate than the conditions of the market at the time warrant. Suppose a buyer for one of the great houses is sent abroad to purchase goods. When he returns his employer says to him: 'I see that you bought goods at one and six per yard which some years ago you bought at one and three per yard. You have therefore failed in your duty to your firm.' Would not a satisfactory answer be: 'I bought the goods at the best rate I could at the time.' Well, in buying money, as in buying dry goods, you have to pay what the market demands. You are governed in both cases by the conditions of the market. Judged by that test, which is the only true one, every loan made by this government is a satisfactory one. If it be found necessary to make comparisons between the loans floated by my predecessors and those floated during my retention of the office, I am confident there will be nothing in the comparison which will in the slightest degree reflect on the policy of the present government; and in saying this, I do not wish to criticise in the slightest the actions of my predecessors, who no doubt got the best prices they could at the time and under the conditions then existing. With regard to the policy of restricting the government to the issue of a 10 year loan, to cover this advance, I do not think that would be wise. It is possible that the conditions of the market may be such as to render it desirable that we should issue a 10-year loan, and in that case I would hold myself free to do so. I hope, however, it will be otherwise. A short term loan necesarily implies, in most cases, a higher rate of interest than a long term. Whenever it becomes necessary for us to borrow, our duty is to have regard to the conditions of the money market, and issue the loan on the best terms, at the best rate, and for the best period that will meet the existing conditions. I would object just as much to a proposal to limit the loan to a 25 or 50 year period as to the proposal to limit it to a 10 year period. So much with regard to the first two points. As to the third point, although it does not add anything to the argument, it may surprise my hon. friend to know that we are pursuing the same course as that which was pursued by the late government in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway loan. That loan was made for some five or six years. Immediately after it was agreed upon, the then Minister of Finance had to go on the money market and he placed on that market a loan—for what term? Five or six years? No. He made it for fifty years with the option of redeeming it at the end of 25 years.

Mr. LALOR. What was the rate of that loan?

Mr. FIELDING. I am very glad my hon. friend has put that question. They lent the money to the Canadian Pacific Railway at a fixed rate of interest, four per cent, as we propose to do to the Grand Trunk Pacific, and then went into the money market and paid more than four per cent for the money. So they pursued exactly the same policy as I am asking the House to approve. If it should happen that we will be obliged to pay a fraction more than four per cent, we shall be having the same experience as my predecessor.

Mr. LALOR. Does the hon. minister approve of the plan pursued in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. FIELDING. I was not here at that time; but looking back, I do not hesitate to say that I am glad the government lent the Canadian Pacific Railway that money. There was a difference of opinion at the time regarding that policy. Better men than I thought it was not wise, but they have possibly since changed their views. It is easy to be wise after the event, and the men who were in parliament then had to determine the question according to the best light they had at the moment. And many of that day thought it was not a wise plan. I express no opinion except to say that in view of the great success of the Canadian Pacific Railway, there is none of us, I hope, who would not be willing to say, on looking back upon it, that we are glad the government gave them that aid. I say that, at all events, speaking for myself. So, the hon. gentlemen will see that on every point of criticism of this loan, I can cite the precedent of the Canadian Pacific Railway loan. I do not attach much importance to that, but it is quite proper that, as a matter of illustration, I should refer to it. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we are going to receive only 4 per cent and that the loan will cost us more. That was exactly the condition of the case with the Canadian Pacific Railway loan, and, as a matter of fact, in the case of that loan the rate of interest paid for the money was somewhat over 4 per cent. The hon. gentleman asks why we do not seek a short term ten year loan. Well, my predecessors did not think it was wise to do this in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway loan. They held their hands free, they went into the market and found what the condition was, they adapted their loan to that condition, and, no doubt, they got the money at the best price at which it could be obtained. I mention this, not as an accusation against those who made the Canadian Pacific Railway loan, but as it may help to illustrate the present transaction. But I do not think that argument necessary to the case. I maintain that this loan is a fair business proposition, and that it ought to commend itself to the judgment of the House.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The ground of my complaint is that the Finance Minister is anticipating that, ten years from now, he will not be able to make a loan at less than four per cent, notwithstanding the progress of the country in the meantime, which he looks forward to so hopefully. He seems to think that the credit of the country will be so bad in ten years from now that he will look to the railway company to refund the money, and he will use it for the balance of the term of the loan. If we are to have the great progress and the good time that he anticipates on account of the building of this railway, we ought to be able to borrow ten millions in ten years from now at 2½ per cent.

Mr. FIELDING. Then, my predecessors must have——

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Never mind your predecessors. You are doing business now.

Mr. FIELDING. I am doing business, true. But in this case, I am not comparing myself with my predecessors to their disadvantage. I am saying that, as far as I can see, they acted as reasonable business men. I am commending them. I see nothing in that transaction to-day that was not proper and businesslike. Nor have I said anything to suggest the contrary. We are pursuing the same businesslike course that they pursued. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Geo. Taylor) says that we are anticipating that we shall not be able to borrow at less than 4 per cent in ten years. That might have been applied to the Canadian Pacific Railway loan in its time. At the expiration of ten years, when the money is repaid, it is reasonably probable the government of Canada will still require money for its public purposes, and the situation then will be that, instead of being obliged to go out and float some new loans to meet the demands of that moment, we shall have $10,000,000 in the treasury. So, I do not think there is any cause of criticism from that standpoint.

Mr. PORTER. I have not yet heard from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) any convincing or satisfactory answer to the question submitted from this side of the House as to whether it would not be better, in fixing the terms of this loan, to provide that the borrower should pay to the government exactly what it might cost the government to make the loan. An attempt has been made to answer that, but it does not seem to me to be satisfactory or to meet the case. Now, this loan has become necessary owing to the stress of circumstances pressing upon the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. In other words, the government is coming to the assistance of the railway, as one might put it, as a matter of charity, and, at the same time, while the government is professing to do this charitable act, the Finance Minister tells us that the conditions of this contract are such that, if he has to pay a little more than four per cent for the money, the government will suffer the loss. At the same time, he says that if the government is able to borrow this money at a rate a shade less than four per cent, the country will be making a profit out of this loan. It does not strike me that the circumstances warrant the position taken by the Finance Minister. Would the Finance Minister feel quite comfortable with a profit made from this poverty-stricken offspring of the government jingling in the treasury? It seems to me that, in an act of charity, the government ought to get back—if it gets back anything—just what it paid, and, considering the care the government have taken to foster this child of theirs, that it would not be fair to take a profit won through an act of charity. It seems to me that it would be quite within the power of the government, and it would not be asking anything unfair from the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Comqany, to insist that this contract should contain a condition that the railway company shall pay to the government just what it costs the government to make this loan. We do not want to make a profit out of the railway company in this matter. But we do not want to make a loss. It is quite possible, quite within the range of our powers, to so provide in this contract that we shall neither make a loss nor make a profit. Would not that be a reasonable, fair and proper way to protect the rights of both parties?

Mr. FIELDING. I confess that, if we should make a profit out of this transaction —I have not said we shall, I have guarded against that—I am free to confess now that I shall probably have more comfort, speaking officially, in jingling the profit of the transaction in my official pocket than my predecessor had in pocketing the loss incurred in the former transaction. And, if the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, in receiving this aid, is to be described as a 'poverty-stricken' concern, and if this is to be described as 'an act of charity,' I suppose we shall have to say that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at the time of the loan made to it was a 'poverty-stricken' concern, and the loan to them as 'an act of charity.' I would not apply those terms to either case. In each case, the loan is legitimate aid granted to a great enterprise. And when I show the hon. gentleman (Mr. Porter) that, in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway it was deemed wise to fix a definite rate of interest, as we are doing, I do not ask him to accept that as a conclusive argument, but I cite it as showing that at least the men of that day and the men of this, dealing with a business transaction, thought alike and acted alike.

Mr. PORTER. That does not seem a very convincing argument. If, in the light of subsequent events, the loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is shown to be improper or wrong, or not on the best terms that could have been obtained, why should the Minister of Finance use that loan for an argument in committing that wrong a second time?

Mr. FIELDING. I say it was right.

Mr. PORTER. But my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) would not say that in answer to a question put a few minutes ago. He has not expressed an opinion upon that, but left that to the expression of opinion that had been given years ago. If it was wrong in that instance—and the minister will not say it was right—why will he invoke that as an argument for a repetition of the act? It is reducing the argument to this: two wrongs make a right. And he is going to commit the second wrong.

Mr. FIELDING. Except that I have not said it was wrong.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Has the minister made any effort to obtain money outside the London brokers? My reason for asking is, that, in looking over the finances of the United States, I find that they have a total debt of $913,000,000, of which $118,400,000 is at four per cent, $63,900,000 at three per cent.

and the balance at two per cent. I believe I am correctly informed that the bonds floated by the United States in respect of the Panama canal pay only two per cent. I cannot quite understand why they can borrow so much cheaper than we can.

Mr. FIELDING. If my hon. friend will look into that matter, he will find that in the case of United States bonds, there are certain exemptions and privileges which give them special value. He will find also that the banks have to have certain classes of these bonds to deposit against their note circulation. All these things create a value for certain classes of United States bonds which would not apply to the bonds of any other country. My hon. friend began by asking if I had made any efforts to borrow money outside London. We have no difficulty in borrowing money at current rates. Our loans as a rule are placed in London, because London is the cheapest money market of the world. We keep our eyes on other markets, of which we have occasionally availed ourselves to make temporary loans, and we are not unmindful of conditions in the United States. At times when there seemed to be an abundance of money in the United States, I have inquired, and I have always found that if we attempted to issue our loans in the United States the charges against them would make the expense of the transaction very considerable, and the net result would be less favourable than we were able to obtain at the same time in London. Indeed, in many cases when United States bankers and others take up foreign loans, what actually happens is that while the transaction nominally takes place in the United States, the bonds are placed in London, and they are sold and bought on the basis of the London prices. I can assure my hon. friend that though occasional conditions, according to the newspapers, might show that for certain purposes and under special circumstances money is cheap in the United States, it is safe to say that for the purposes of large loan transactions, London is to-day, as it has been for a great many years, the cheapest money market in the world.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I can understand why the banks of the United States should have some advantages, but I cannot see why we should be paying double the amount the United States are paying on a similar loan. When you see them paying only two per cent on $700,000,000 you cannot but feel that in some way we are paying a higher rate of interest than they are paying in proportion.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART. What I am particularly interested in is to find out how this $10,000,000 is to be applied. I tried to get an explanation from the Finance Minister the other day, and he stated that he would carefully guard the payment of that money and see that it was paid on progress estimates. The statement that he brings down to the House is two-fold: An estimate is to be made by the engineer of the Railway Department for the purpose of the payment of some indebtedness to the extent of $7,100,000, and to finish the prairie section, an amount equal to $10,500,000. The Grand Trunk Pacific, who are borrowing the money, only ask for $9,400,000, and in that statement there is a sum for the purpose of recouping them, a payment which they allege to have made of $7,100,000. The Finance Minister says, 'I will carefully guard the payment of this sum of money to the railway company by seeing that the work is done and completed.' But the work has been done and completed long ago, the money is paid to the parties who have done the work, and there is the certificate of our own engineer saying that the work is done. Then what do they want the $7,100,000 for? It is an alleged indebtedness which, he says, the Grand Trunk Company advanced to the Grand Trunk Pacific. Well, we all know the absurdity of it, we all know that the Grand Trunk had not $5 to advance, that the corporation could not endorse even a security for that amount. Who is it we are going to pay the $7,100,000 to? It is to some loan that the Grand Trunk Pacific have made, or a sum of money equal to $7,100,000 which they must have borrowed from some bank. We ought to have full particulars, we ought to have an accurate account of the payment of that $7,100,000. We do not know, by any statement that has been made by the Finance Minister, to whom we owe this $7,100,000 or whom we are going to pay it to. We have his statement that he will take care that no part of that sum is paid out unless on progress estimates on the work. The sum is paid out, the work has been done by the contractors, there is no progress estimates to come in, there is the certificate of his own engineer that the work is done and the money is paid out. Now surely this committee is entitled to this information. To whom is that $7,100,000 to be paid, and in what form was that advance to the Grand Trunk Pacific? Was it advanced solely on account of work or in the construction of the prairie section and for no other purpose? That information this committee is entitled to in detail. We are advancing a sum of $10,000,000, $7,100,000 to pay an advance of some kind. The details of that advance we have not got up to the present moment; and this committee, before voting that money, is surely entitled to a detailed account.

Mr. FIELDING. We are not going to vote that sum of money to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, we are not going to vote that $7,100,000 to any company.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. To whom are you going to vote it?

Mr. FIELDING. We are not going to vote that particular sum to anybody, we have nothing to do with that particular sum. What we have to do is to see that before we pay $1 of money raised by the aid of the government, we shall have a certificate of the engineer that that money has been expended on the road, and we have the work there before us. If the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, instead of borrowing money from a bank to pay its contractors, have been able to go to the coffers of the Grand Trunk Company itself, it is their own business, and we are not concerned in it at all. Whether they got the money from the treasury of the Grand Trunk or whether they got it from a bank, is of no importance to us. I presume that had they not got that money from some quarter, we would have a cry all over the land that a great many workmen were being unpaid, that merchants were being unpaid. My hon. friend speaks of the work having been certified. The work has not been certified for the purpose of any payment. We have the estimate of our engineers as to what amount will be necessary; we have statements made by the Grand Trunk Company of what amount is required to finish the road, and our engineers say that that is substantially correct.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. You say the work has not been certified by your own engineers?

Mr. FIELDING. Not as respects the payment of any money. If $7,000,000 drawn from a bank, or from another railway company, or from any other quarter, have gone into that work, and certificates are brought to us by our engineers that that money has gone into the work, then we are justified in responding by paying out of the funds the proper proportion of the money. My hon. friend will find that that advance to the Grand Trunk Company is practically in the same position as if one of the banks had advanced the money. We are not called upon to consider whether the company was right or not to advance it; that is none of our business. What we are concerned in is seeing that not one dollar of this money is paid except on certificates of our own engineers that it is based upon actual outlays, and that the money has gone into the work. That is provided, not upon any assertion of mine, but it is provided by the machinery in the schedule attached to this Act. I would like my hon. friend to get out of his mind this idea that we are going to pay the Grand Trunk Railway $7,000,000. If the Grand Trunk Pacific had borrowed $7,000,000 from a bank, we would not be concerned about that. We are going to pay the money, under the terms of the contract, to the Grand Trunk Pacific upon evidence that that amount of money has gone into the work. Now that is simple and I am sure that my hon. friend on reflection, will see that it is fair and reasonable.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. You have the information already that the money has gone into the work.

Mr. FIELDING. It has not been paid yet.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. You have a statement from the Grand Trunk that they have advanced $7,100,000 and you could not pay the proceeds of the bonds for the construction of the work until you had the certificates from your own engineer. A statement has been submitted by your own engineer as to the correctness of the accounts. He submits a statement which completely confirms the statement of the company. The officer of the Department of Railways and Canals who has gone down to examine the accounts of the Grand Trunk Pacific certifies to them as being correct. Why is it that we cannot have the information showing us in what form the Grand Trunk are claiming a return of this $7,100,000? You do not go over the work again and you do not get a new certificate from your engineers. You have a certificate already that the work has been done and completed. You have paid the money for that work to a certain extent. That is as far as the $7,100,000 is concerned. It is true that you will require fresh certificates for the balance that you paid out of the $10,000,000 for the completion of the work. I believe the government are acting as trustees, that they have on hand a certain sum of money and that the balance of $10,000,000, after the $7,100,000 has been paid, is intended to complete the prairie section. But, as far as this $7,000,000 is concerned, that is a completed transaction. You have the certificate of the engineers as to the completion of the work. The amount has been paid and the accounts have been audited by the Department of Railways and Canals. Surely we are entitled to a statement as to who holds that indebtedness and in what form the payment of that $7,100,000 was made.

Mr. FIELDING. I am sorry that I have not succeeded in satisfying my hon. friend. I maintain very respectfully, in view of his larger knowledge and experience, that we are not concerned about that $7,100,000 at all. An hon. gentleman opposite asked the question what amount the Grand Trunk Company have, in one form or another, put into this enterprise and we have the information brought down that they have put in $7,000,000. If they have put $7,000,000 in they stand in the same position as the Bank of Montreal would stand if it had loaned the Grand Trunk Pacific Company $7,000,000. What concern would we have in that?

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. I will tell my hon. friend what concern you have in that. Suppose it were part of the expenses of lobbying here and of the amount that was entered in an account which was considered by the Public Accounts Committee and the papers in regard to which were lost. Suppose one of these items was included in that account or something similar to it, have we not the right to see the account? When you come here and ask for $10,000,000 of which $7,100,000 has been paid out, have we not the right to know in what form this money has been paid out?

Mr. FIELDING. I quite admit that my hon. friend ought to have a better knowledge than I have as to the expenses of lobbying and things of that kind, but I still insist that we are not asking to pay $7,000,000 to the Grand Trunk, and it is not open to us to enter into an inquiry as to how they used the money or as to what they did with the $7,000,000. They stand exactly in the position of a bank which had loaned the Grand Trunk Pacific Company for the purpose of its undertaking that much money. We would have nothing to do with that. That would be a matter between the company and the bank. In this instance it is a matter between one company and another. Whether the Grand Trunk borrowed it, or loaned their credit are interesting questions in themselves, but they do not touch this loan. We are concerned in seeing what becomes of this money which we propose to lend to the company, and we have provided by this Bill that not one dollar of this money can be paid to the Grand Trunk Pacific until we receive the certificates from the engineer that the money has gone into the work and is represented by work to be seen.

Mr. SPROULE. We, on behalf of the country, promised to give aid in the shape of a guarantee or other assistance. The balance was to be provided by the guarantee of the Grand Trunk Railway. The Grand Trunk had to stand at their back and raise the balance of the money. We have lived up to our portion of the agreement. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway now come here and ask for an additional loan to help to build the road. But they say that $7,000,000 out of the $10,000,000 is required to pay back to the Grand Trunk Company because they advanced that amount. It was their duty to advance it.

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. SPROULE. It was their duty to provide the security that would raise it.

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, it was the understanding that they would advance that money or that they would be at the back of the Grand Trunk Pacific and assist them to carry through the undertaking. They advanced a sum of money and now they turn around and ask us to advance more in order that this $7,000,000 may be paid back to them. I think we should say to them: 'It is true that you have advanced $7,000,000 to build this road, but that is what you ought to do, and if you have done that we are under no obligation to raise money to pay that amount back to you. We want you to carry out your part of the bargain.' They are doing no more than carrying out their part of the bargain and we are doing all we could be expected to do.

Mr. FIELDING. The error in my hon. friend's statement is that he says that the Grand Trunk were bound to advance this money.

Mr. SPROULE. No, I did not put it that way, but I said that it was understood that they were to be at the back of the Grand Trunk Pacific and to provide the money by putting up the security or otherwise.

Mr. FIELDING. No, my hon. friend's statement was that they were bound to advance the money and that they had a right to do it.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say to advance the money; I said to be at their back and to furnish the security to aid in raising the money.

Mr. FIELDING. We must distinguish between these two things. The Grand Trunk never contemplated that out of its earnings it would take $7,000,000 and put it into this road. The Grand Trunk never agreed to advance a dollar to this company. The Grand Trunk agreed to do exactly what it is proposing to do now ; that it would guarantee certain bonds of the western division. It has agreed to do that and it is not shirking that responsibility. It is willing and ready to do that and this legislation requires the company to do it, but, for financial reasons we think it best that the company should not float its guarantee in the present condition of the money market. If the Grand Trunk was bound to advance this $7,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific, and did not do so, and now asked us to do it, there would be something in what the hon. gentleman says, but that is not the situation at all. What the Grand Trunk agreed to do it is still doing by way of a guarantee of those bonds.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. We could not assent for a moment to the statement just made by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. He says that the Grand Trunk were to guarantee the bonds, not for the balance but for some certain amount.

Mr. FIELDING. I did not say that. I was trying to show the distinction between a pledge to advance money and a pledge to guarantee bonds. I was not dealing with the question of the bonds.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) simply stated to the Finance Minister that the Grand Trunk were bound to guarantee the bonds necessary to raise the balance required for the completion of the western division.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I understood the Minister of Finance to take direct issue with my hon. friend upon that statement.

Mr. FIELDING. No, I did not.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, I was very unfortunate in my understanding of what the hon. gentleman said. There is no doubt whatever as to what the contract was:

> Inasmuch as the bonds to be guaranteed by the government only make provision for a part of the cost of construction of the western division, the company hereby agrees that the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada shall guarantee bonds of the company for the balance required for the construction of said western division, exclusive of the said $26,000,000 required for first equipment, which the company is required to provide under paragraph 22 of this agreement.

The Grand Trunk Railway Company was to guarantee the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific for the balance required for the construction of the western division; that is the balance remaining after the provision made by the government on its guarantee of bonds, and there is no doubt my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) was strictly correct in the point he made.

Mr. FIELDING. The Grand Trunk Railway did agree to do that.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Grand Trunk Railway Company entered into an agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific to carry out that condition of the contract, so that my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) is correct.

Mr. FIELDING. I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) to argue that the Grand Trunk Railway was bound to advance the money, that they have advanced it, and now they are trying to get it back. My hon. friend, however, has made it clear now that such was not his argument.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. They are required to give that guarantee and the government is becoming banker.

Mr. FIELDING Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. And they are getting back their $7,000,000?

Mr. FIELDING. That has no relation to it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. On the 22nd of February I asked the government what amount of bonds the Grand Trunk Railway Company guaranteed in respect to the construction of the western division of the National Transcontinental Railway, and the following answer was given:

In respect to the prairie section, series 'A' bonds to the amount of £2,100,000; in respect to the mountain section series 'B' bonds to the amount of £1,354,000.

This would amount to between $15,000,000 and $16,000,000. But in the letter of Mr. Hays to the Minister of Finance on November 16, 1908, he says:

As the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada has to date guaranteed bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the extent of more than $30,000,000, the proceeds of which have been used in connection with the construction of the railway and equipment and in addition has also advanced a very large amount from its own funds in order to keep the construction work going, it is essential we should receive the further assistance asked for from the government.

Why the discrepancy between $16,000,000 and $30,000,000; I cannot imagine that it is all for equipment.

Mr. FIELDING. I think the difference is accounted for by the equipment bonds which represent a very considerable sum.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I may be very ignorant as to what is correct procedure in these matters, but, to use the guarantee of the Grand Trunk Railway for providing equipment five years in advance of the time it will be required, and then to put that forward as an excuse for aid from the government seems a remarkably unbusinesslike proposition. Every one who has eyes in his head knows that some of this equipment has been continuously in use on the Grand Trunk Railway system during the past two or three years, and yet we have it gravely put forward by Mr. Hays as a reason why the government should come to the assistance of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, that a guarantee has been given to equipment which has been used not on the Grand Trunk Pacific but on the Grand Trunk Railway system.

Mr. FIELDING. There is a distinct provision with respect to the equipment bonds, and I do not see what relation that could have to the merits of the present case. I should think it would not be wise for the Grand Trunk Pacific to wait until the road was completed to look around for equipment. If all goes well a good part of that equipment will be needed for the operation of the road next season, and although I have no information on the point I take it for granted that if any car constructed for the Grand Trunk Pacific and not immediately used was loaned to the Grand Trunk Railway Company or any other, they would give in return the usual business consideration to the Grand Trunk Pacific for it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Unless the Grand Trunk Pacific Company saw they could come to some such source as this for assistance I do not think they would engage in any such unbusinesslike methods. It was perfectly proper that they should provide their equipment in good time, but it does not seem reasonable that they should provide it two or three years in advance and use it on a railway system for which it was not designed at all. There was no expectation in the minds of the members of parliament who discussed the contracts of 1903 and 1904 that the guarantee stipulated for would be utilized for the purpose of providing equipment for the Grand Trunk Railway system in the meantime. Certainly nobody ever expected that it would be used as an argument for further assistance from the government, especially as the very company which has been enjoying the benefit of that equipment in the meantime was described in 1903 as being in and of the undertaking and forming the whole thing in connection with it.

Mr. FIELDING. The only relation between the two things is that the Grand Trunk Company in stating the amount of obligation it had itself incurred in this enterprise very naturally stated that it guaranteed these bonds. I would rather prefer to discover that the Grand Trunk Pacific had the rolling stock in good time than to discover that when they needed it there was not sufficient to handle the business. I do not see why we need worry ourselves very much as to whether they got the equipment in 1908 or 1910 in view of the fact that they are spending their own money and not ours on that part of the enterprise.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If that is so it was absolutely irrelevant for Mr. Hays to introduce the statement into his letter.

Mr. FIELDING. It was perfectly legitimate to state the extent to which the Grand Trunk Railway Company was pledging its credit to help this enterprise, and more especially as it has been stated in various quarters that the government was doing everything in the matter and that the Grand Trunk Railway Company was doing nothing.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Where was this equipment obtained?

Mr. FIELDING. I cannot say I am sure, but I know that a good deal of it was obtained in the province of Nova Scotia because I have seen the cars bearing the well known name of Rhodes, Curry and Company.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. It was not supplied in the province of Ontario?

Mr. FIELDING. That must have been because the man in Nova Scotia was willing to build it more cheaply. However, I am only speaking from recollection and I will be glad to get the information.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think there was some company formed for the purpose of supplying the equipment.

Mr. FIELDING. I could not say, I am not aware of that.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Did not the Grand Trunk Pacific secure a great number of old cars from the Grand Trunk and have the name changed?

Mr. FIELDING. I could not say, but as not one dollar of government money has gone into that I do not think we need worry much over it.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood there was a provision in the Act whereby a separate company could be organized to provide that equipment and the security would be in the form of a chattel mortgage on the equipment which would be repaid by the earnings from the road when in operation. That was put forward as a distinct and important provision in the Bill, which would enable them to provide this equipment for the road without drawing on their credit to any great extent. If part of this guarantee by the Grand Trunk was for this purpose what becomes of the company that was to be organized to provide the equipment? How do we know how much has gone into equipment or where the equipment was purchased or the amount of equipment?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think there was any such rolling stock company.

Mr. SPROULE. There certainly was such a provision in the Act. I remember Mr. Osler saying it was a common and useful practice on railways.

Mr. FIELDING. Undoubtedly such a system is employed on some railways but it was not in this case.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does the minister know how much of the $7,000,000 which the Grand Trunk Pacific borrowed from the Grand Trunk Railway has been paid out for actual expenditure on the road bed.

Mr. FIELDING. We are dealing entirely with construction and can only recognize payments for construction.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Then every dollar of this may be for money that has gone towards the purchase of equipment for the Grand Trunk Pacific that the Grand Trunk are now using.

Mr. FIELDING. If it be possible that that would happen, they never could get a dollar back under this Act.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If that is so it has taken to that extent the credit of the Grand Trunk from the Grand Trunk Pacific and has made it necessary for the Grand Trunk Pacific to come here for a further loan. If the Grand Trunk had not advanced this money to purchase rolling stock which they are now using at four per cent, irrespective of the cost of repairs and maintenance, it seems to me they would have $7,000,000 more to apply to the construction of the road bed and it would not be necessary to come here for a loan of $10,000,000.

Mr. CROTHERS. Would the minister make it clear whether this $10,000,000 is all to be used on work yet to be done or materials yet to be supplied, or whether any part of it is to be used to pay for work already done or material already purchased.

Mr. FIELDING. If any application were made for payment of money for work already done or materials already furnished as respects which they have already received money why certainly they could not get it, but if work has been done by advances from the Grand Trunk or from anybody else which has not passed into the accounts and been approved and certified by the engineer, unquestionably they would have a right to draw a portion of this money for that purpose.

Mr. CROTHERS. I want to ascertain whether the whole $10,000,000 is to be used in payment of work done so that there will be nothing left to continue the line to the mountains.

Mr. FIELDING. If the Grand Trunk have advanced money and it has gone into the road they would have a right to recover from the Grand Trunk Pacific, and if $7,000,000 has thus been put into the road there would be only $3,000,000 available from this fund to continue the work.

Mr. CROTHERS. Then is it the case that $7,000,000 may have been spent in construction and road bed for which my hon. friend has no report from his engineers?

Mr. FIELDING. Our engineers know the condition of the road. We know that considerable sums of money have gone into it as respects which the statement of the Grand Trunk is probably correct, but we must know that the work is done and must have the engineers certify it before money is paid over.

Mr. CROTHERS. Does my hon. friend understand from the statement of the Grand Trunk that they have put $7,000,000 into the road for which he has no report from his engineers? If the government have reports from their engineers they ought to know how much of that $7,000,000 has already been expended and how much of that expenditure has been reported on by the engineers. Is it possible the Finance Minister does not know within one, two, five or seven millions how much money they put in for which he has no report from his engineers?

Mr. FIELDING. We chiefly require reports from our engineers when a demand is made on us for money. If the Grand Trunk Pacific say: 'We want you to pay so much money,' that is when we insist on the reports and certificate of the engineers. As respects the condition of our work generally the chief engineer has one or two officers along the road who are in constant touch with him and he is kept generally informed of the condition of the work; but we are only concerned from a financial point of view when the company come to us and want so much money. Then when they are to get that money from a particular fund with which we have anything to do, we must be satisfied that the work has been done and the money expended.

Mr. CROTHERS. We ought to have the information asked for.

Mr. FIELDING. If the information is not covered by what is before the House and my hon. friend will draw my attention more specifically to what is lacking I will endeavour to get it if it is within my reach.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. I want a specific statement that this sum is to be expended upon the road bed or stations of the prairie sections.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. It cannnot be applied to the payment of any equipment of the road or anything of that kind.

Mr. FIELDING. No. I understand that not a dollar of this can be applied to any other purpose than the construction of the road on the prairie section.

Mr. PERLEY. In what section of the schedule is that provided?

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend will find that provision in the mortgage. I think on page 18.

Mr. PERLEY. The minister has said that the furnishing of money to the Grand Trunk Pacific in respect of equipment has nothing to do with that.

Mr. FIELDING. No, I did not quite say that.

Mr. PERLEY. If that is the case we are entitled to be assured that this money is not to be applied to a purpose with which we have nothing to do. We are entitled to know that $7,000,000 of the $10,000,000 is not going to pay for equipment which the Grand Trunk is bound to furnish to the Grand Trunk Pacific, but that the $7,000,000 will be actually expended, every dollar, on the road bed.

Mr. FIELDING. I say without hesitation that this money is designed, as my hon. friend will see by the mortgage, to assist in the construction, not the equipment, of the prairie section.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If it has been expended on rolling stock, then this company is asking for $7,000,000 sooner than it should, because they do not require it for the purpose for which it is supposed to be expended.

Mr. FIELDING. I give the assurance, without any equivocation, that not a dollar of this money can be applied to any other purpose than the construction of the prairie section, as provided in the mortgage.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. That does not answer the question. The question is whether this money is to go in repayment of money which has been expended already for rolling stock with which we have nothing to do.

Mr. FIELDING. Not a dollar of it can go for equipment. The equipment is provided for by a different method.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The hon. minister does not know how much of this $7,000,000 is to be used to pay the Grand Trunk Railway for the rolling stock.

Mr. FIELDING. We are not going to pay the Grand Trunk Railway one dollar. We will pay the Grand Trunk Pacific, on the engineers' certificates, as much of this $10,000,000 as they can show has gone into construction and only into construction; and the $7,000,000, while it is an interesting item of information to the House, has actually no bearing upon this at all. For every dollar anybody claims, we must know it has gone into the construction of the prairie section and not for equipment or anything else will we pay it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The difference is this. There may come a time when you may be able to get an engineer to certify that $7,000,000 more has been expended on the road than really has been. I want to know if that money has been expended now or whether you take the money from the Grand Trunk Pacific to pay the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. FIELDING. We are not going to hand the Grand Trunk Railway money for equipment or anything else. The Grand Trunk Railway in that respect, practically act as the bankers of the subsidiary company. If the Grand Trunk Pacific get the $7,000,000 to help them out, whether they get it from the parent company or the bank or anywhere else is not a matter that concerns us, and it does not enter into our calculations as to the paying out of this money. Before any of this $10,000,000 can be paid the engineer must certify that it is represented by work gone into the road. The money for this road is drawn from two sources, in the first place, from the proceeds of the government guarantee, and in the second place from the proceeds of the Grand Trunk Railway guarantee, in certain proportions. Before we can establish these respective proportions, we must know what money has gone into the road or the total cost of construction. Having ascertained that, we assign to each of these funds its proper proportion; and before one dollar of the fund can be drawn out, we must have the certificate of the engineer that the work is there to represent it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Suppose the Finance Minister sent out to-morrow his engineer to find out how much money has been expended in the road bed, and his engineer gave it as a certain amount and that all the moneys received by the Grand Trunk Pacific had been sufficient to pay that work up to date, and that the $7,000,000 would not be required until $7,000,000 more of work had been put into the road, would he be justified in handing that $7,000,000 over now to pay for future work. Does it not look as if the Grand Trunk Pacific were getting that $7,000,000 to pay for the equipment?

Mr. FIELDING. As regards the equipment I can give the most positive assurance that nothing of the kind is contemplated or is possible under this agreement.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I find that in answers given by the Finance Minister to the leader of the opposition that there has been expended on the prairie section $27,031,000, and that there is yet to be expended on that section $5,166,000, and we have to pay the Grand Trunk Railway $7,000,000. That makes $12,200,000 to be paid on a loan of $10,000,000. Where are the other $2,000,000 to be had to complete the prairie section?

Mr. FIELDING. We are not paying the Grand Trunk Railway that money at all.

Mr. NORTHRUP. While the Finance Minister has made it quite clear that it is not the intention of the government, ostentatiously and publicly, to hand over any cash to the Grand Trunk Railway for the rolling stock, possibly the same result is to be obtained in another way. If we take the information given in this most instructive statement brought down by the Finance Minister, a couple of facts seem quite clear. The first is that the Grand Trunk Pacific had plenty of money to complete its work. If this $10,000,000 is sufficient to complete it, then they had enough, because they have spent $8,000,000 on rolling stock. If the Grand Trunk Pacific had been willing to go on and finish their road they apparently had enough money to do so. Would the thing not work out this way according to this statement? The Grand Trunk Pacific, having the money on hand to complete this road save possibly the difference between $8,000,000 and $10,000,000 said: 'No, we will not complete the road, but we will put this money into rolling stock which we do not require but which the Grand Trunk Railway require and which the Grand Trunk Railway would have to pay its own money for.' Then, they hand this $7,000,000 over to the Grand Trunk Railway to buy rolling stock, and then declare that the money went into the road bed. In this way the Grand Trunk Railway is able to take $8,000,000 of the Grand Trunk Pacific and put it into rolling stock, and then loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific at four per cent the money required for construction. If that is what has been done, and if the Grand Trunk Railway comes and says to the Grand Trunk Pacific: 'You have $10,000,000 on hand, pay us back the money we put into the construction of the road,' and the government has to aid to that extent, the only reason the government has to pay is because the Grand Trunk Railway, instead of paying for its own rolling stock, chooses to advance the money to the Grand Trunk Pacific to supply rolling stock for their use.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think that is possible.

Mr. BLAIN. I desire information concerning the estimates that were made when this project was proposed to the House on August 11, 1903. At that time, Mr. Blair was Minister of Railways and Canals, and, in placing his statement before the House, he estimated that the direct and indirect liability of this country on account of this project would be $139,000,000. We have had various estimates as to the cost of the work within the last two or three days during which this matter has been under discussion. The estimate has now reached, I think, in the neighbourhood of $250,000,000, an amount greatly in excess of the estimate of Mr. Blair as Minister of Railways and Canals, and he was looked upon by the government at that time as very extravagant. I assume that the government has looked over the estimates which were given at that time on which Mr. Blair based his conclusion that the cost would be $139,000,-

000. May I ask if these statements have been gone over by the present Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) or by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) or by any person appointed to represent the government? For, it is important to know upon what data the present estimates are based.

Mr. FIELDING. These things may be interesting in themselves and proper subjects of discussion, but I cannot see that they have any bearing on this loan. Therefore, I have not given attention to the matter referred to. I am aware that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) recently gave the House the best information he could as to the probable cost of the road. I know that the estimate is very much greater than we ever anticipated, and to that extent it is a matter of regret, but there seems to be no help for it. If the cost of the eastern division, as it is called, which has very often been spoken of, had been much greater than our anticipations and every other railway whose cost was estimated at the same time had been constructed without increased expense, I should have begun to feel that, perhaps, there was some room for criticism of the government or their commissioners as to the cost of the eastern division. But, when we find that railways everywhere are costing more than the estimates made at that time, when we find that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, with all the experience and skill at their command—for they have the benefit of the experience and skill of the engineering staff of the Grand Trunk—is obliged to pay so much more than the estimate for their part of the road, we can look more charitably upon the results of the efforts of the commissioners who are charged with the duty of directing the construction of this eastern division. These are interesting and important questions, but I think that the answer given by the Minister of Railways and Canals on a recent day covers pretty much the question of my hon. friend (Mr. Blain). At all events, I do not see that this has a very important bearing upon the question of this loan. It is a question of loaning the company so much money, as a banker would loan it; and whatever the cost of the road, be it large or small, it is not affected by this except for the explanation that it is because of the increased cost of the road that the company is obliged to come and ask for the loan.

Mr. BLAIN. Would there be any objection on the part of the government to laying upon the table estimates upon which Mr. Blair at that time based his statement of the cost of the proposed railway? I have the right to assume that, as he was Minister of Railways and Canals at that time, and giving to the House and the country the estimated cost of the construction of this important national highway, he would only speak after having had estimates on which to base his statement. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) may say that it has no bearing upon the proposed loan and that it is important to separate one from the other. But we have the right to criticise the government in this matter. They drove out a gentleman from the government because he was extravagant and his estimate was largely in excess of what other ministers led the the country to believe the road would cost. Surely we have the right now, even though the Minister of Finance may venture to say it is not apropos, to ask that he lay on the table at some future day the estimates on which Mr. Blair, then Minister of Railways and Canals, based his statement of the cost of the road, that statement being the direct and indirect liability of the country would be $139,000,000.

Mr. FIELDING. I will have to leave my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) to deal with that. I do not know whether Mr. Blair had estimates of an official character; I could not say the source of his information. If there are official estimates that were made by the department at that time, I imagine that my hon. friend (Mr. Blain) would have the right to have them brought down. I do not know, and I will have to leave it to the Minister of Railways.

Mr. LANCASTER. I think that the matter brought forward by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) is not only strictly in order, but that it is most pertinent in view of that which is before us. Referring to the schedule of this Bill, page 6, paragraph 2, I find the following:

> And whereas owing to the high standard of the railway being constructed by the Pacific Company, as well as the increased cost of labour, material and supplies, the cost of completing the construction of the prairie section will considerably exceed that estimated.

Now, I do not think that we should lightly say that the increased cost over the estimate has nothing to do with this case, which is the excuse the Minister of Finance puts forth. Like the preamble of any other document, this is the part which is to be used for the most particular manner of construction that can be applied to the document as a whole. It is stated that the people of Canada are making this loan solely because there has been a mistake in the estimated cost of the prairie section. Surely, we ought to know how that mistake arose, whose fault it was, whether we were deceived by the Grand Trunk or the Grand Trunk Pacific, or how it happened, and what we had better do about it. All that information is most pertinent, and I do think we ought to have the very best light possible thrown upon the subject in view of the fact that we are basing a contract on this preamble.

Mr. FIELDING. Referring to the previous section, mention is made of the mortgage to guarantee certain advances by the Grand Trunk. An estimate was prepared by the Grand Trunk people in respect of these bonds that they were to guarantee. The mortgage sets forth the facts of the case in a manner the hon. gentleman will appreciate.

Mr. LANCASTER. But the hon. minister will not say, as representing the country, that he is going to take the estimates of the other party, the party with whom he is supposed to deal at arm's-length. Mr. Blair had to resign because he did not think the country would stand for a transaction of that kind, and his remaining colleagues thought that his estimate was too great. There must surely, then, have been some estimate made on behalf of the people. Surely the Minister of Finance would have to have an estimate from his own standpoint to see whether he is being misled or deceived. This loan is necessary because the cost will considerably exceed the estimate, but surely that estimate must have been made on behalf of the government.

Mr. FIELDING. Not necessarily on behalf of the government; the government has no direct concern with that. The Grand Trunk were guaranteeing the moneys required for the completion of the enterprise, and we were concerned in having the mortgage express that estimate correctly. It was their estimate, and I do not think it is of very much importance to us whether it was a correct estimate or not. What we are concerned about is that if we are going to pay one dollar out of any fund contributed by the government of Canada, or by guarantee of the government of Canada, or by loan of the government of Canada, we must see that the money is paid out on evidence of bona fide cost. The question of estimates is not by any means as important as my hon. friend argues.

Mr. LANCASTER. The country was guaranteeing 75 per cent of the cost. We have two deals with these people, and we are asked to give $10,000,000 more to them. We are asked to do that by a document drawn up by the government because there was a mistake in the estimate, or an error; at any rate, the estimate was not correct. Surely we are concerned in that. If the country was guaranteeing 75 per cent of it, then it was of importance to us.

Mr. FIELDING. This estimate has reference to the balance, not to the 75 per cent.

Mr. LANCASTER. The words are: 'Whereas the cost of the prairie section will exceed that estimate'.

Mr. FIELDING. When the mortgage was being prepared the Grand Trunk people knew they had to guarantee whatever the balance might be, and they made an estimate for themselves and for their investors. It was not our guarantee, it was not our money; it was to be their guarantee.

Mr. LANCASTER. You had to act on it.

Mr. FIELDING. They had to raise that money themselves, and they found it necessary to express in their first mortgage what amount they would assign to the prairie section. They made an estimate, and they assigned a certain proportion of that mortgage fund to the prairie section. Now it turns out that it was not enough. I do not think we are very much concerned as to whether a mistake was made there or not. It was not made with any funds of the government; it was made as respects the Grand Trunk share of the obligation.

Mr. BLAIN. You must take some cognizance of the estimate that was made, for it is plain to the committee that if the proper estimate had been made the company would not now be here asking for a loan of $10,000,000. That is clearly of importance to us and the minister cannot cast it aside in that way.

Mr. FIELDING. It is quite clear that the estimate, while it may have been proper at the moment, according to the information they had, has turned out to be an insufficient estimate; that owing, as they allege, to the increased cost of material and various other causes, the money is not enough, and they want more. But that does not necessarily prove that the estimate was an improper one. It was an estimate in which they had no interest to mislead, it was an estimate of what they themselves have to provide for their share of the obligation, and they made it with the best information they had, I have no doubt, made it all in good faith, made it intelligently. But it proves to be not sufficient; that is all.

Mr. LANCASTER. Supposing the estimate given by this company to-day turns out to be equally incorrect. How do we know that the estimate they make to-day is a correct estimate, and that next session we will not be asked for $10,000,000 more, and the session after for $30,000,000 more?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not know the future. If I believed this $10,000,000 was not enough, in all probability I would be asking the House to make it $11,000,000 or $12,000,000. But I accept the assurance of our engineers that it is probably enough, and I believe it will be enough.

Mr. LANCASTER. We are to-day being asked to finance them again to the extent of $10,000,000. What we did then is the only excuse for us now to pay out $10,000,000 more.

Mr. FIELDING. Not what we did, but what they did.

Mr. LANCASTER. Didn't we do any thing?

Mr. FIELDING. Not in that transaction.

Mr. LANCASTER. We made a transaction in regard to building a National Transcontinental Railway; and it is not what we did, it is what they did not do that makes the trouble. How do we know to-day that we are not going to be told a year from now that this present estimate is incorrect? Are we any safer to-day than we were then?

Mr. FIELDING. We had no reason to be safe then because we were not asked to loan them the money, or to do anything else. They were borrowing the money from the money market, and they settled it with the people who were loaning them the money.

Mr. LANCASTER. Then it is true that that estimate which we acted upon and which is recited in this document was not true at the time.

Mr. FIELDING. The document says that the indenture at that time fixed a certain sum as the amount that might be used on the prairie section of the road. But now the company find that they fixed it at too low a sum.

Mr. LANCASTER. Will the minister tell us why he puts that recital in there?

Mr. FIELDING. I did not draft the mortgage.

Mr. LANCASTER. Do not repudiate it.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not repudiate it, I always accept due responsibility. But sometimes the responsibility of endorsing all the lawyers say is serious. All I know is that we instructed counsel that we were making a loan of this $10,000,000, and we requested that the mortgage might be prepared in the usual form to protect us so far as the mortgage might do. I have already said that for the immediate purpose I do not myself attach much importance to the mortgage, though it is in some respects important. But it was prepared by eminent legal authority, and I have every reason to believe it was prepared in the proper form. The instructions were: 'We are going to loan $10,000,000, and we want you to make us a mortgage which is a guarantee, so far as a mortgage can be a guarantee.'

Mr. LANCASTER. This eminent legal authority did not imagine what I have just read; some officer or some minister gave him these facts to put in that document.

Mr. FIELDING. The document carries the estimate on its face.

Mr. LANCASTER. It shows the company's estimate was wrong.

Mr. GOODEVE. The answer given by the Minister of Finance to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) was that the government guaranteed 75 per cent of the prairie section, and the Grand Trunk Pacific undertook to guarantee whatever might be necessary for the balance to complete that section. Following out that, it is clear from the Bill before us that the Grand Trunk guaranteed certain bonds to enable them to raise the amount of money. Out of that money so raised they expended $7,100,000 on rolling stock which was not needed by the Grand Trunk Pacific at that particular time and possibly would not be needed for two or three years. But, they expended that money, raised under their contract, on rolling stock, and afterwards leased it back to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. If that money had been put into the actual construction of the road we would not have had the Finance Minister coming here to-day and asking us to sanction a loan of $10,000,000.

Mr. FIELDING. That argument is based on the assumption that they did spend this $7,000,000 on equipment. I cannot say they did not; I do not know. I do know that the contract clearly contemplated that the Grand Trunk should not advance out of their treasury $7,000,000 for equipment or anything else. There was a provision in the contract for the issue of equipment bonds, and I would take it for granted that the rolling stock was procured in that way. However, I do not think it is important. I cannot say, but if they have spent it on rolling stock they cannot get a dollar of that $7,000,000 back out of this $10,000,000.

Mr. GOODEVE. If the Grand Trunk Pacific had had that $7,000,000 to put into the construction of the road bed they would now only require between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000, according to the minister's own statement, to complete the contract, and I do not think they would have come to us for additional assistance. That is the reason that my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) asked the same question. It is essentially important to know whether they put the money into rolling stock or not.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think they could have done so, because the equipment is a separate transaction. Equipment bonds are provided for, and I should be rather surprised if it turns out that they have spent that $7,000,000 in that way. If they have they would have to be recouped out of the proceeds of the equipment bonds. They could not be recouped out of this issue.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does the minister think it is an unreasonable request that we should procure a statement from the Grand Trunk showing exactly how the $7,000,000 was expended? If it was expended on the road bed I will throw up my hands and say that there is no impediment in the way of the loan so far as that aspect of the case is concerned. But if that $7,000,000 was used for the purpose of buying rolling stock I think they have come back to this government prematurely for a loan.

Mr. FIELDING. If that should be so what good would it be to the company to get it? They cannot get a dollar back out of this appropriation.

Mr. LANCASTER. That would be a reason why we should not lend them the money.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. We are led also to believe that this money is required because the $7,000,000 had gone into the road and not into rolling stock. If it turns out that the money was used to buy rolling stock they are not justified in asking the government for a loan of $10,000,000.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Before this clause passes the committee I would like to enter my protest against any further loan of the people's money for the building of a road that, while it is called a great transcontinental system, is not and cannot be, under this legislation, the property of the people. A great national undertaking ought to be controlled by the nation, especially when the nation supplies the money and credit for the construction of the road. Government ownership can never be realized in connection with this great national undertaking. It has not been in the past and it will not be in this case. It has not been in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The German empire to-day is dominating the world because it has nationalized its railways. We have been told in this House and our delegates to Great Britain have told the people of the empire that the great contribution that Canada has made to the empire has been the building of a transcontinental railway, which makes an intercontinental railway between Europe and Asia. That may be so as a statement, but, as a fact, this road is not owned or controlled by the nation, is not built from a national standpoint, but is built by a private corporation in such a way that the control of the National Transcontinental Railway may, any day, pass into the hands of those hostile to this country. One can imagine at the very crisis of the empire that it might be disclosed that this Grand Trunk Pacific system is owned and controlled by German capital, and so manipulated for years ahead that the system would absolutely fall down, and, as far as being a factor in or a portion of the imperial defence is concerned, so many points of weakness would develop that the road would not be of any use from an imperial or business point of view. Any day this so-called transcontinental railway, built by the money of this nation, may be owned by a foreign corporation, who might use it to the detriment of the country and of the empire. Any day it is possible that Mr. Jas. J. Hill, who has a rival transcontinental system in the United States, or a still greater magnate in the railway world, Mr. Harriman, may secure the absolute control of this so-called transcontinental railway system which the people have built so far and which they must see through. We are bound to see this road through, and we are bound to see it through as a nation. If we do see it through as a nation, why should not the nation control it? The United States to-day are building the Panama canal, but they are building it themselves as a state proposition. It is a national undertaking and it is even being constructed by engineers in the service of the state. There is no contractor in that case. They are moving on the lines of nationalism and they are making the Panama canal, which is a great transcontinental proposition, the property of the state. We are building a great system, but we are allowing it to pass into the possession of a private company, whose stock is kicked about in the money market of the world. A great mistake has been made and this mistake ought now to be corrected. The opportunity has presented itself at this crisis to recover the control of this Transcontinental Railway and to make it a great national asset, as it ought to be for the benefit of the country and of the empire. We have had experience of great transcontinental railways being in the hands of private corporations, and I am prepared to assert here to-day and prove that the Canadian Pacific Railway, which was largely subsidized by this nation, which was said to be a national proposition, is administered absolutely in the interest of the shareholders and of the men who have the control of that railway, and without any regard for the nation. The Grand Trunk will be exactly of the same kind. I am further prepared to assert that as a matter of fact the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific railways treat the people of the United States better, in the way of passenger and freight rates, than they treat the people of Canada. This has been going on year after year. Yet, in spite of that fact, in spite of the way things are moving in the world, in spite of the fact that the essential theory of nationality is to control all the national highways, we are continuing to build these railways and to find the money without having the control of them. There is no way we can have the control of them, to use them for the benefit of the nation, and to make them a great government proposition.

Of course we will be told that the Canadian people are such an inferior lot that they are not able to administer and construct and own a great national highway, but I do not subscribe to any such doctrine as that. I have every confidence in my fellow countrymen that they are quite competent to undertake such a project and that all they want is the opportunity to do it. I believe that the people of this country want to see the Intercolonial Railway developed as a national enterprise by taking it absolutely out of politics and by running it for the benefit of the nation and not of a party. I believe that the people of this country are competent not only to construct and operate profitably a line between the provinces, but a great national highway across the Dominion. And, Sir, within the next five years, within the next ten years, the whole energy and resources of the Canadian people, I venture to predict, will be devoted to securing the control of the great national highways of the country. Public feeling is running in that direction, public feeling is antagonistic to the legislation we are passing here to-day in relation to the Grand Trunk Pacific, public feeling is in favour of recovering the ground we have lost. I have no hesitation in saying that the movement in favour of the nationalization of our railways will continue to grow, and that before the next election it will become the real issue before the people. It would have been the easiest possible thing for this government to have obtained in the London market the control of the common shares of the Grand Trunk which control the Grand Trunk Railway system and now are to control the National Transcontinental Railway. These shares have been kicked about in the London market, they can be obtained for a comparatively small sum of money and they should be taken possession of by the government. The only way we can retrieve the blunder we are making to-day; the only way we can recover this National Transcontinental Railway for the people and make it truly national will be to buy the controlling shares of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in the London money market. I believe at this stage of the proceedings the people of Canada would indorse any proposition of the government which would tend towards securing the Grand Trunk Railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Grand Trunk Railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Intercolonial Railway together would have been a great national system. Their amalgamation under national control would have been of immense service to the country, and while the system would be a rival to the Canadian Pacific Railway, its benefit in that respect would not be so great as in the fact that it would widen and broaden out the railroad service of this country and provide transportation facilities where further facilities are badly needed. There is an unnecessary duplication of railways in this country, and the solution of the railway problem is not the building of one line alongside of another so much as the broadening out of the service and the extension of it where it is most needed. My protest may be in vain; many a protest made by me in this House has apparently been in vain, but I will try to retain my seat in the House so as to be here on the day when the mandate of the people of Canada will go from this parliament insisting on the nationalization of our railway systems, and insisting that this great railway which we are to-day building with the money of the people and giving to a private company shall be restored to its rightful owners. We know that this National Transcontinental Railway may be controlled by outsiders, may be controlled by rival railroads in the United States, may even be controlled by capitalistic interests that are hostile to Canada and hostile to the empire. And, when the right hon. the Prime Minister goes to England again and tells them that Canada is doing something for the empire in the building of a Transcontinental Railway system, I hope he will be able to say that he has regained control of it for Canada and for the empire. I reiterate my protest against any further giving of the credit of this country to build and complete a system that will be owned by private corporations. The people of Canada came to the aid of the Canadian Pacific Railway because of the vicissitudes of that company, and they will have to come to the aid of this National Transcontinental Railway because of its vicissitudes, but we should take advantage of the opportunity to recover control of that road and make it a great national system. You may rest assured that if we do not do so now we will have to do it some day, and all the agitation which is bound to ensue towards that end could have been avoided if we had had the wisdom to nationalize this railroad in the beginning. I conclude by protesting against granting any more of the money of the country for a proposition of this kind which does not lead to the nationalization of that railway.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. In reply to a question put by the leader of the opposition the following answer was given by the government:

The company state that the total amount invested by the promoters in the undertaking is $9,597,149 and that the total amount invested in the rolling stock is $8,273,454.

Assuming that the rolling stock is included in the $9,597,000, then the difference amounting to $1,323,000 can be the only money invested by the company in the roadbed. Taking that from the $7,000,000 which is owing to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, have we not the right to assume that practically $6,000,000 is going to pay for the rolling stock?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not so understand it; I do not think it possible.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Before the Bill passes will the Minister of Finance lay before the House the statement of the Grand Trunk Railway Company showing exactly in respect to what matters the indebtedness of $7,000,000 was incurred?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not quite see what bearing that has upon the question. However, the information I have goes to show that on the 31st December, 1908, the company had represented that the road had to that date cost something over $27,000,000, and that the auditor in examining the accounts admitted that about $26,250,000 of that was composed of items which he would approve of. At the same time, at that date there has been paid out of the government guaranteed funds $10,335,000 and out of the bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Company itself $9,601,000, making a total of $19,937,408. Observe that while there was work done at that time which the company represented to be worth $27,000,000 odd, and which the auditor of the department was willing to pass on the basis of $26,250,000, the actual amounts drawn from the two funds —that is the proceeds of the government guarantee and the proceeds of the company's guarantee—was only $19,937,000, although there was $26,250,000 of work actually done on the 31st December, 1908. My hon. friend will see, therefore, that the difference does not represent rolling stock. I think he will see on reflection that it is not possible that the rolling stock could be paid for in the way described.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. How is it that in answers brought down it appears that the promoters have only invested $1,338,000?

Mr. FIELDING. Everything depends on what you call an investment.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The returns show that the total amount invested by the promoters is $9,000,000 odd; the total amount for rolling stock is about $8,000,000 and the difference must be the amount the promoters have invested in the road.

Mr. FIELDING. The rolling stock is obtained from an issue of bonds and would not be regarded as an investment in that sense.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does the minister say that the $8,000,000 of rolling stock is not included in the $9,000,000 invested by the promoters?

Mr. FIELDING. I would hardly consider the rolling stock as an investment by the company; it is rather an investment by the men who buy the bonds.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Is the rolling stock not included in this $9,000,000?

Mr. FIELDING. The company must speak for themselves and I do not wish to interpret their words, but I do not so understand it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I think, from an answer given to the leader of the opposition that it is included.

Mr. FIELDING I do not think it is. On these questions we have to take the information furnished by the company.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. When the Finance Minister introduced the resolution preceding this Bill he said he did not think the rentals which the Grand Trunk were paying in respect of certain lines which they had leased were a prior claim to the proposed guaranty. I would ask him now if he is still of the same opinion?

Mr. FIELDING. I think I gave my hon. friend a later answer in which I stated that the rentals would probably come before the guaranty. It is a very complicated matter and I would not like to answer off-hand. I would refer my hon. friend to the 'Hansard' of March 31. If the information then given was not sufficient I shall try to supply further information later.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The information the minister then gave me was that these figures of the Grand Trunk included the amount of these rentals. So far as I know he did not give the information definitely that the rentals themselves formed a prior lien to this security. Perhaps he could say now whether they are a prior lien to this security.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend will see that on March 31, I said:

The company state that, under the earlier legislation of the company, rentals of certain leased lines, amounting half yearly to £77,603, 'would probably be regarded as working expenses,' and hence a prior charge to this guaranty.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Then the Finance Minister now admits that this is a prior charge.

Mr. FIELDING. I am advised that it is.

Mr MIDDLEBRO. Will the Finance Minister also say whether the $12,000,000 worth of stock authorized under Bill 13 of the present session will also take precedence of the proposed lien?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, if it is debenture stock. I have not the Bill, but the debenture stock certainly does take priority.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. That is a little at variance with the statement of the Minister of Finance when he placed the prior securities at about $21,000.000.

Mr. FIELDING. But these are not issued.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. But when they are issued they will take precedence of this guaranty.

Mr. FIELDING. That is another question; I answered with respect to issues outstanding.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. That will make $31,000,000 more of prior claims than we were given to understand.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand, the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) read the minister's answer that they had invested, we will say in round figures, $9,000,000, and then his answer to another question that they had invested $8,000,000 in rolling stock. The hon. member asked whether that $9,000,000 was their total investment including rolling stock or whether they had invested $9,000,000 in one way and also invested $8,000,000 in rolling stock. I think this is a very important question and the Finance Minister ought to give us something more definite with reference to it.

Mr. FIELDING. I can only give my hon. friend the company's answer in these things. I gave in both cases the answer furnished by the company. I would understand rolling stock not to be an investment of the company. The rolling stock is obtained by an issue of equipment bonds and I would assume that they are not treated as an investment by the company.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the assumption would be that they had invested $17,000,000 altogether?

Mr. FIELDING. No, because I do not treat the rolling stock as an investment.

Mr. FOSTER. Supposing you treat the rolling stock as an investment——

Mr. FIELDING. Then you can treat every bond as an investment.

Mr. FOSTER. I am dealing with one simple thing, it is a question whether the $8,000,000 invested in rolling stock is part of the $9,000,000 of total investment. The Minister of Finance seems to favour the idea that, treating the rolling stock as an investment, they have $17,000,000 invested and that the $9,000,000 is an investment entirely outside of rolling stock. The rolling stock, as I understand, was to be provided in a certain way by an issue of equipment bonds. Has the minister any statement of the Grand Trunk Pacific as to how much rolling stock it has got and as to the way in which the money was raised to provide for the rolling stock?

Mr. FIELDING. No, I could not give it off-hand. It was not among the questions concerning which I was asked to obtain information. I do not know that there was an issue of bonds to provide for the rolling stock.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. minister know the amount?

Mr. FIELDING. They issued £2,000,000 under that authority prior to the present year, and my recollection is that in February of this year they had a further issue of bonds for the same purpose. I do not think it right to consider that as an investment of the company; it is money loaned by the bondholder precisely in the same manner as any other money loaned on a bond.

Mr. PERLEY. The question of the exact position of this guarantee which was alluded to again this afternoon is very important. There is no doubt in my mind that the rentals of the leased lines come in ahead of this guarantee because they are classed as working expenses according to an answer of the Finance Minister. But a question has arisen also as to whether this guarantee comes ahead of the first preference stock, for instance. From the answer to the question which I asked some days ago, I see that Mr. Shepley takes decided ground that this guarantee does come ahead of the preference stock, so I suppose we are bound to accept that statement although I would call the attention of the House to the fact that this preference stock was originally bonds and the bonds were changed by this House from the status of bonds to stock, and that in the Act providing for this preference stock it is stated that they are entitled to certain specific dividends. The word 'entitled' is a pretty strong word and when you say a stock is entitled to a specific dividend it seems to me to be a question whether there is not some charge on the road in connection with it, although Mr. Shepley takes strong ground that this guarantee comes ahead of even the first preference stock.

I want to call the minister's attention to another case in order to show how much more careful some people are to guard the interests of bond holders than he has been in this instance with regard to the money of the people. In 35 Victoria, Chapter 64, there is an Act concerning the Grand Trunk Railway and the Montreal and Champlain Railroad Company. In that Act there is a guarantee of bonds much the same as this guarantee of bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Section 5 of that Act provides that the Grand Trunk Railway guarantees the payment of the interest and the principal of these bonds. Then it goes on to say that the interest shall form part of the working expenses of the Grand Trunk Railway as defined in the Grand Trunk Railway Arrangements Act. In other words the interest on the bonds of the Montreal and Champlain Railroad Company, which were guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway, formed part of the working expenses of the Grand Trunk, which, under the Grand Trunk Railway Arrangements Act, as is the case in every other railway, are a first charge on the receipts of the road. Why was not the government as careful in this instance?

Mr. FIELDING. There are prior bonds in this case, and anything we would do by way of creating a lien ahead of these bonds would certainly be a breach of faith, which my hon. friend would not ask us to commit. If there were no bonds outstanding, we could make any conditions apply we chose respecting a new issue, but you cannot make exceptional conditions apply to a new issue to the disadvantage of outstanding securities.

Mr. PERLEY. I am not advocating that in this instance, but I call attention to the fact that there is a case in which the responsibility of the Grand Trunk Railway for interest is made a first lien on its traffic receipts, and there may be lots of other cases. The question is where the guarantee of the Grand Trunk Railway, in this instance, comes in reference to their stocks and bonds, &c. Perhaps the government does not understand exactly in what position that guarantee is and how far the other responsibilities of the Grand Trunk Railway come ahead of that guarantee.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to a point which I raised the day before yesterday. The hon. gentleman was inclined to think that the operation of the line from Winnipeg to Moncton might be forced upon the Grand Trunk Pacific, under the agreement of 1903-4, even although the Quebec bridge were not finished and the government had provided no crossing over the St. Lawrence river for this railway. I would like to draw his attention to the provisions of the statutes and contracts in that regard. In the Act of 1903, the eastern division is described as extending from the city of Moncton to the city of Winnipeg. Then we find it provided in section 2 of the agreement that the eastern division shall comprise the portion of the said railway to be constructed from its eastern terminus in New Brunswick to the city of Quebec, and thence westerly through the northern parts of Ontario and Quebec, to the city of Winnipeg.

The said eastern division shall be constructed by and at the expense of the government, upon such location, and according to such plans and specifications as it shall determine, having due regard to directness, easy gradients, and favourable curves.

Section 8 provides:

The construction of the said eastern division shall be commenced so soon as the government has made the surveys and plans and determined upon the location thereof, and shall be completed with all reasonable despatch.

And section 20 provides:

When completed the said eastern division shall be leased to and operated by the company for the period of 50 years, at a rental, payable as follows.

Then follow the conditions of the said lease. When you come to the Act of 1904, you find, in the first place, a reference to the eastern division in section 10 which is not very material:

Section 3 of the agreement of 1904 provides:

Pending the completion of the eastern division by the government, the company shall be entitled to lease from the commissioners to be appointed under the said Act, and to operate such portions of the said eastern division as may be from time to time completed, but upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the company and the said commissioners, which terms are not to be more onerous than those of the lease of the whole division by the said contract provided for, save in so far as may be necessary to give full effect to the paramount right of the said commissioners, next hereinafter mentioned, and subject always to the paramount right of the said commissioners to use and operate the same without any payment of tolls or other compensation for such purposes as they may deem necessary or expedient in the execution of their commission.

There is a contract embodied in that statute and in the agreements which are made part of it, by which the government undertakes to build its line of railway from Moncton to Winnipeg. I understand perfectly that at that time a bridge was under construction across the St. Lawrence. That bridge was then being constructed by the Quebec Bridge Company, and I have no doubt that the government proposed to utilize it in order to provide the missing link necessary between the south side of the St. Lawrence and the north. But that was a mere accident and did not in any way relieve the government from the obligation of carrying the railway by some means across the river. That river could be no more omitted in that line from Winnipeg to Moncton than any other river on the line between those two points. Therefore the government is face to face with this situation. It cannot regard the line between Moncton and Winnipeg as completed until some means has been provided of carrying the railway across the St. Lawrence. It is perfectly apparent that that was what was intended by the contract. Then let us look for a moment at what the conditions will be. I have already alluded to the difficulties with regard to the line between Moncton and Quebec—I do not intend to repeat this afternoon what I said the day before yesterday—but much the same difficulties will arise in respect of the line between Quebec and Winnipeg. Now what will be the condition of affairs during the five or six years before the Quebec bridge is completed, and after the line otherwise has been completed between Quebec and Moncton? Let us look for a moment at the obligations of this contract on the part of the Grand Trunk Pacific; let us look also for a moment at the object of this agreement as defined in legislation, and the contracts to which I have alluded. I will read sections 42 and 43:

> 42. It is hereby declared and agreed between the parties to this agreement that the aid herein provided for is granted by the government of Canada for the express purpose of encouraging the development of Canadian trade and the transportation of goods through Canadian channels. The company accepts the aid on those conditions, and agrees that all freight originating on the line of the railway, or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined for points in Canada, be carried entirely on Canadian territory, or between Canadian inland ports, and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports, and that all such traffic, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall be carried to Canadian ocean parts.
> 43. The company further agrees that it shall not, in any matter within its power, directly or indirectly advise or encourage the transportation of such freight by routes other than those above provided, but shall, in all respects, in good faith, use its utmost endeavours to fulfil the condition upon which public aid is granted, namely, the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports.

There you have a distinct and emphatic declaration of the objects for which this enormous aid was given to this railway company, namely, the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports. Now as there are some hon. members of this House who are not familiar with the discusions which took place in 1903 and 1904, I may recall to the committee that in the discussion of this agreement we on this side of the House took the ground that sections 42 and 43 would absolutely fail of the purpose indicated therein, for the reason that those provisions were not made binding upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but were made binding upon the Grand Trunk Pacific Company alone; and we pointed out what must be obvious to any hon. member, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company could send its agents and canvassers through western Canada and arrange that shippers upon the line of the Transcontinental Railway would route their traffic, not through Canadian channels and to Canadian ports, but through other channels and to ports in the United States. It was perfectly well understood then, it was admitted by members of the government over and over again, that the interest of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which after all absolutely controls the Grand Trunk Pacific Company in every way, and for every practical purpose—the interest of the Grand Trunk Company would lead them to carry that traffic to Portland and not to Canadian ports—I am speaking more especially of the winter months. Now the government declined our proposals in that regard; they did not think it desirable in the interest of the company that the Grand Trunk Company should be bound by any such stipulations as those to which I have alluded.

May I point out to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and to the Prime Minister, that the condition of affairs that has been brought about by the fall of the Quebec bridge and the necessary delay in rebuilding that structure, is exactly what the Grand Trunk would desire for the purpose I have indicated? I think that is abundantly plain. Trade will be gathered up in the west of Canada all along the line of the National Transcontinental. What was the object and the purpose of this legislation? What was the object and purpose of the enormous public aid which the people of this country have devoted to the construction of that railway? It was that the traffic gathered up in western Canada, in constantly increasing quantities year after year, should go through Canadian channels and to Canadian ocean ports. What will be the result to-day? I estimate five years as a moderate period during which the Grand Trunk Company, pending the completion of the Quebec bridge, will not be bound to accept any lease of the line from Winnipeg to Moncton; in the meantime, as I understand it, they are entitled to demand and receive a lease of that portion of the line between Winnipeg and the junction of the Port Arthur branch of the main line. I understand that this portion of the eastern division is nearly completed now, and will be completed considerably in advance of any other portion of the eastern division. If I am wrong in that the Minister of Railways will correct me, I have no official information on the subject. But that traffic gathered upon the National Transcontinental Railway by the Grand Trunk Pacific in the west of Canada, must have some outlet, and there will be no other outlet except by the Port Arthur branch. The Grand Trunk Pacific will therefore route the traffic via Port Arthur. Well, when it has been carried to Port Arthur, where will it be transported, by what route will it go?

The Grand Trunk to-day controls the whole of the common stock, and a majority of the entire stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific; and, while that condition obtains, it can and will control the policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific. In other words, as my hon. friend on the other side of the House said in 1904 and 1905, the Grand Trunk Company is in this contract, and of it, and forms the whole thing; it will control absolutely the policy of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in that regard. So I think that I am not pushing the probabilities too far when I venture the prophecy that the traffic gathered up in the west will be brought to the junction of the Port Arthur branch, and will be carried via the Port Arthur branch to Port Arthur. Into whose hands then will it fall? It will naturally fall into the hands of the company that absolutely controls the Grand Trunk Pacific, and it will go by steamer to some port in the Georgian bay, where it will be handed over to the Grand Trunk Railway Company and will be carried, during the winter months at least, to Portland in the United States, instead of to any winter port of Canada.

Now, I do not see any escape from that conclusion; if there be any escape, I would be glad to hear it. It is a result which I am sure every one of us would deplore, and it is a difficulty which does not seem to have impressed itself largely upon the minds of my hon. friends on the treasury benches. How can it be remedied? Could it not be remedied at the present juncture by the government, giving proper heed to the interests of this country, and insisting that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, during the winter months when the ports of Montreal and Quebec are closed shall carry their freight over the Intercolonial Railway to the ports of Halifax and St. John? Is not that the purpose for which this aid was given? Is not that the purpose which is declared in most distinct terms to be the object for which this enormous aid was given, and for which these agreements were made and these statutes passed? When the government realizes that the interests of the people of this country are so seriously involved, should they not insist that the Grand Trunk Railway Company, who come here under the guise and in the name of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company for further aid, should consent to some such amendment of this contract and will absolutely prevent any such result as that being brought about?

The Minister of Railways and myself have had some discussion about grades on the Intercolonial. I admit that in a discussion of this question there are two matters to be kept in view. One is as to the haulage of these heavy train loads over the Intercolonial, and the other concerns a fair and reasonable agreement between the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk for the purpose of effecting the object which I have just pointed out as most desirable. Well, so far as grades are concerned, the Minister of Railways did not seriously controvert, as I understood him, the statement which I made the other day, that by means of employing pusher engines to assist freight trains over certain difficult grades it would be practicable to carry much the same load over the Intercolonial as over the National Transcontinental between Quebec and Moncton. My hon. friend, speaking on Wednesday last, used this language in regard to the Intercolonial:

> Mr. NORTHRUP. Are there any pusher grades on the Intercolonial?
> Mr. GRAHAM. There would be if we had the very large trains these are intended to haul, when they have the western traffic of the Grand Trunk Pacific. There are three very steep grades, as my hon. friend has remarked, on the Intercolonial Railway. There is one at the Bedford grade, 1:80, at Folleigh, 1:22 and at Metis, 1:29. These might be called pusher grades, after the description of the Bedford grade.

Might I inquire of the Minister of Railways whether the Bedford grade he alludes to, is a grade about 10 miles from Halifax?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is near Halifax.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is what I understood. Then the Minister of Railways will observe that two of these grades, namely, that of Folleigh and that of Bedford, are between Moncton and Halifax. Export freight must be hauled over the National Transcontinental to Halifax and St. John, because we know that Moncton is not an ocean port. The trains over the Transcontinental Railway will equally meet with two of the grades which he has mentioned. Therefore the only grade that remains is that at Metis, which is a grade of 1:29, while the grade which I mentioned upon the National Transcontinental between Quebec and Moncton, is a grade of 1:10. Now suppose that if, by means of pushers, you can haul one of these long trains over the 12 mile grade of 1:10, you can by similar pusher engines haul practically similar trains over the grade at Metis of 1:29. For that reason I did not observe, so far as I am able to understand the reply of the hon. gentleman, any great difficulty in carrying out what I have suggested.

Mr. LENNOX. Is the only difficulty on the Intercolonial a long grade?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is the grade at Metis a long grade?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am inclined to think it is, I think it is a long grade of three or four miles.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then my hon. friend will observe that there is just this difference, that on the Transcontinental line between Moncton and Quebec you have a grade against western traffic of about 12 miles in length, of 1:10, or about 58 or 59 feet; you have on the Intercolonial a grade—I do not knew whether it is against eastern or western traffic, that at Metis.

Mr. FIELDING. It is against traffic going east.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then it is not a grade against western traffic at all.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is against eastbound traffic.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think I used a wrong expression, the grade on the Transcontinental is against eastbound traffic also.

Mr. GRAHAM. There is one each way; one is 10 and the other 12 miles.

Mr. LENNOX. The one going east is 12 miles.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then if I am correct in my premises—and I say all this subject to the correction of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways—you have upon the National Transcontinental between Quebec and Moncton a grade as against eastbound traffic of 12 miles in length, a grade of 1·10, and you have at Little Metis a grade as against eastbound traffic of three or four miles in length, of 1:29. Now, one would think—and I speak with the humility of a person who is not very much acquainted with questions of this kind—I would think that under those conditions the carriage of this traffic upon the Intercolonial would encounter no greater grades and entail no greater cost than the carriage of traffic upon the National Transcontinental after it is completed. It seems to me therefore to be a very reasonable condition to impose upon the Grand Trunk Company at this time, that the freight gathered up in western Canada upon this road, completed practically by the people of this country, should be carried over the Intercolonial to the ports of Halifax and St .John in the winter months, and not be carried to Portland in the United States. I admit that the Intercolonial must make reasonable conditions with the Grand Trunk Company for that purpose, and the management of the Intercolonial should be prepared to agree to an equitable and reasonable division of the freight; and if that division of freight could not be arrived at in any other way, I am sure it could be arrived at by a reference of the matter to the arbitrament of persons familiar with questions of this kind; it might for example be referred to the arbitrament of the Railway Commissioners of Canada, who in all such matters, and upon all lines of railways in Canada except the Intercolonial, have the right of adjudication as to the apportionment of rates. Now would my hon. friend the Minister of Railways tell me where he thinks this traffic will go? It must reach the sea coast somewhere, it must reach the sea coast, not only in the summer months, but in the winter months as well. When that traffic has been gathered up, when it has reached the junction point of the Port Arthur branch, and when it has been carried over the Port Arthur branch to the town of Port Arthur, then it will be practically under the control of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and all the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway Company will lead them to carry that traffic to Portland in the United States instead of to Halifax and St. John, unless the government see fit, at this favourable juncture, to avail themselves of the opportunity which is now afforded to make a condition with the Grand Trunk Company that that sult shall not obtain, but I invite them to sult would be that the people of Canada will have spent many millions of money and pledged their credit to enormous sums for the purpose of constructing a railway through western Canada which shall gather up traffic solely for the purpose of carrying it to a port in the United States and building up that port. I cannot credit my hon. friends on the other side of the House with any desire that that result shall obtain. I am willing to concede at once that it is their desire that such a result shall not obtain, but I invite them to tell me now what stands in the way, under conditions such as I have described, of exactly that result being brought about. If nothing stands in the way is it not time that the government should do something at this juncture, before this loan shall be made, and see to it that the resources of the people of Canada shall not be employed for the purpose of building up a great seaport in the United States. This is a subject of very great importance indeed. I trust that the Minister of Railways will be able to give us a firm assurance that this opportunity will not be allowed to pass and that the interests of the people of this country will be safeguarded in some way by a provision in this statute, or in the agreement attached to it, by which the maritime ports of Canada, which are capable of very great development indeed, which are as fine ports as can be found in any part of the world, shall be safeguarded and shall receive that due consideration to which they are entitled in the creation of this great transcontinental line.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am sure that my hon. friend will believe me when I say that the object of this government, as has been outlined in its policy, has always been the development of our own national ports This object has been attained as far as possible in the recent French treaty. One of the objects of the building of this transcontinental railway was to give us an all Canadian line which would lead to the development of our Canadian ports on the Atlantic seaboard. It must be borne in mind at the present juncture, however, that every dollar or every cent we add to the rate of freight on the products of the west will reduce the price of those products to the producer. The object of building a high class road all the way through to our own ports was to get the minimum of rate freights. If the situation were just as my hon. friend has outlined it his conclusion would be correct, but, unfortunately, the comparison made between the proposed Grand Trunk Pacific line and the Intercolonial Railway cannot be borne out. Not having an engineer's knowledge of this line I would have made the same error that my hon. friend has made. Of the three steep grades I mentioned on the Intercolonial Railway, two are west of Moncton, and there is one each way on the Transcontinental Railway. Consequently, it might be assumed that the same load could be drawn over each. But, when you come to work it out practically that is not the result at all. The fundamental principle is that the ruling grade controls the load. A pusher grade does not interfere with the load at all because you use a second engine to get over that grade, and the load which can be carried is limited only by the ruling grade. The ruling grade on the Grand Trunk Pacific to Moncton is 4:10 of one per cent and a train load can be carried up to the capacity of a 4:10 of one per cent grade. The pusher obviates the difficulty which would otherwise be experienced in getting over the steep grade in one place. On the Intercolonial Railway, although only three grades were mentioned of a steep character the standard is a one per cent grade east and west all over and no train load can be carried that exceeds the capacity of the ruling grade which just makes the carrying capacity of the Intercolonial Railway practically one half the carrying capacity of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. HUGHES. Has the minister any data to show how many individual grades there are on the Intercolonial Railway of one per cent or over? I will go further. How many grades are there on the Intercolonial Railway of 4-10ths of one per cent and over?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have a copy of the profile of the Intercolonial Railway. I asked my chief engineer to-day to give me something along that line and he tells me the grades are practically so common east and west that the standard or the ruling grade of the Intercolonial Railway is one per cent, and we cannot load our trains to any higher capacity than one per cent. I have had a little calculation made to show that, as a matter of fact, from Montreal east the train loads on the Intercolonial Railway would practically be only one-half as great as the train loads that could be carried over the Grand Trunk Pacific. That would be a serious disadvantage. It would mean possibly, even if we made the best arrangement we could, that the freight rate would be considerably higher over that portion of the line at least than it would be on a road with a ruling grade of 4-10ths of one per cent, because the cost would nearly double in the carrying. Take a locomotive, of the consolidated type, 107 tons, or, as we say, 53 tons on the drivers, which really is the test. This is not the largest type of locomotive. What I propose to show is the net tonnage which it could haul on a practically level track, an almost impossible condition because there are very few really level tracks. But, it would haul, on a level track, 3,868 tons, on a 4-10ths of one per cent grade it would haul 1,596 tons, and on a one per cent grade 810 tons. While an engine of this type could haul 1,596 tons on a 4-10ths of one per cent grade, on the prevailing grade of the Intercolonial Railway, it could only haul 810 tons, or a very small amount over half what it could haul on the easier grade.

Mr. HUGHES. At how many points has the Intercolonial Railway a grade of one per cent? I will venture to say there are not ten grades on the Intercolonial Railway between Halifax and Montreal of one per cent. At that rate would the minister maintain ten pushers as he is going to maintain them at half a dozen places——

Mr. GRAHAM. Not half a dozen.

Mr. HUGHES. Well, I am only giving you the figures that have been given to me. There is another point I would direct the attention of the minister to. The Intercolonial Railway at its highest point is 700 feet above sea level, whereas the National Transcontinental Railway at two points is 1,400 feet above sea level. Now, no matter whether that height is crossed at a four-tenths per cent grade or on the dead level, does the minister pretend to say that the unit of power necessary is not as great one way as the other. He will use just as many tons of coal in carrying the load up that hill of 1,400 feet no matter what the grade may be, or whether he comes to the foot of the hill and raises it up in an elevator.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would not care to go into engineering technicalities with my hon. friend because one of us would be apt to get lost.

Mr. HUGHES. That is not an engineering question; every child knows that.

Mr. GRAHAM. I have stated that the one per cent grades are so numerous that the ruling grade on the Intercolonial Railway is one per cent and trains can only be loaded to the capacity of a one per cent grade going either way. That is the test which we must take as the hauling capacity of an engine on the Intercolonial Railway. The hauling capacity of the same engine on a 4-10th grade is practically double, so that the capacity of the National Transcontinental is practically double that of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the ruling grade of the Grand Trunk Railway from the lakes down to Montreal ?

Mr. GRAHAM. I cannot say.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, that is a most important thing. The reply of the minister if it means anything means that this traffic must all go to Portland in the winter months. I am not at all inclined to agree with that, however, because the ruling grade between Midland and Montreal must be a determining factor, and further than that, even if the Intercolonial Railway carried that grain from Montreal to St. John and Halifax at a slight loss it would be better to do so in the meantime than to let this traffic be routed to Portland in the United States, and to establish a channel of communication during these five years which it would be very difficult indeed to break up in the years to come after the line from Winnipeg to Moncton has been completed.

Mr. GRAHAM. I was not dealing with that part of the question; I was merely dealing with the argument that the Intercolonial Railway with its one per cent grade was as capable of having a load transported over it as the Transcontinental with its 4-10th grade; and consequently that nothing would be lost in transportation if we used the Intercolonial Railway and did not build the Transcontinental.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The case is worse than I thought.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Would it cost any great sum to alter the grades on the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. It would cost a very large amount of money but we are not discussing that.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The ruling grade on the Grand Trunk from Midland to Montreal would be an important thing to consider in this connection.

PRIVATE BILLS.

ONTARIO AND MICHIGAN POWER COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 34) to incorporate the Ontario and Michigan Power Company.—Mr. Conmee.

On section 1,

Mr. CONMEE. Notice has been given of a number of amendments. It is proposed to strike out sections 2 and 13, also 15, and to substitute other sections. The notice given by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Boyce), which denied powers of expropriation so far as the Nipigon river is concerned, has been accepted and embodied in the amendments. As we discuss the Bill, section by section, it will be seen that the amendments have met, I think fairly, all the objections that were raised the other evening when the Bill was under discussion.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by certain sections being struck out and others substituted and certain matters being agreed to. I suppose that is all a matter for this committee and not for any one else to arrange, and I do not think anything is struck out or substituted as yet. I would be glad if the hon. gentleman would make it clear to us at this stage just what is proposed.

Mr. CONMEE. The first amendment is that section 2 of the Bill be struck out. Section 2 provided for the declaration that the works were for the general advantage of Canada. In order to satisfy my hon. friend it is proposed to strike that out.

In order to make it clear that the company will not be permitted to export power from Canada except subject to the Electricity Inspection Act and the Electricity Exportation Act, 1907, this clause is inserted in place of sections 13 and 15:

The provisions of the Electricity Inspection Act, 1907, and of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act shall apply to the company and its undertakings.

2. The company shall not export any electrical power until it has obtained a license to do so under section 4 of the last mentioned Act, and such license may provide that the quantity of power to be exported shall be limited to the surplus after the company has supplied for distribution to consumers for use in Canada power to the extent defined by such license at prices and in accordance with conditions, rules and regulations, prescribed by the Governor in Council.

Speaking generally that clause is practically a copy of section 4 of the Electricity Exportation Act embodied in the Bill. Section 5 of section 19 is to be struck out and the following substituted for it.

The expropriation powers hereby conferred upon the company shall not be exercised by it until the plans mentioned in section 18 of this Act shall have received the approval therein provided for; and with respect to any lands upon the Nipigon river shall not be exercised, except as to such lands as may be required for the purposes of its transmission lines.

That cuts out entirely the powers of expropriation in regard to any water-power upon the Nipigon river and confines it under other sections of the Bill entirely to the Pigeon river, which is the purport of the notice of motion given by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Boyce). I may say that in section 18 the word 'Nipigon' will have to be struck out. Then there is a clause that was agreed upon and does not affect the powers of the company, but is merely for the protection——

Mr. LENNOX. Will the hon. member explain what he means by 'agreed upon'? —agreed upon, in what way?

Mr. CONMEE. Agreed upon between the promoters of this Bill and the Arrow river people,—but I will read the clause:

The said expropriation powers shall not be exercised as to any dams for the storage of water now constructed or that may hereafter be constructed by the Arrow River Tributary Slide and Boom Company.

This company is a lumbering concern with certain dams for storage areas on tributaries of the Pigeon river, but not on the Pigeon river. Under the Bill of last year introduced in the Senate, this company was asking for powers for the storage of water, that is, they were asking to go out upon the tributaries of the rivers and create storage for power purposes, and, in that way, their interest would clash with that of this lumbering company. That clause was agreed upon last year between the representatives of the lumbering company and this company. It is not necessary here, for this Bill does not give power to the company to extend any of its works for storage purposes or to touch any water, except one on the Pigeon river, and one on the Nipigon river if they can acquire it. But, though the section is unnecessary, they having agreed to it last year, and the lumbering company not being here, I think it is only fair to put it in, that they may have the protection agreed upon. Therefore, I desire to have that clause stand. I might, for a moment, call the attention of the committee to the provision of section 14 of the Bill. I think that hon. gentlemen will find that goes a good deal farther in public protection than any legislation heretofore passed by this House has gone. It first provides that the rates to be charged to consumers should be fixed from time to time by the Railway Commissioners of Canada. When the Bill was under discussion before the committee last time, an hon. member, Mr. Fowke, said he had two objections to it. One was that he was not in favour of permitting the company to export any portion of the power from the Canadian side without control. He was not satisfied with the provisions under section 15 as it then stood in the Bill, which, I pointed out, was put there for the purpose of giving that protection. But he had another objection,—and he was not speaking particularly against this Bill, he was announcing a principle. He was opposed to a perpetual franchise. I think that this section 14 does not give a perpetual franchise, it gives the company only a limited opportunity, under restrictions, to utilize a natural resource. If the idea of a lease, if that was advanced by the hon. member, were to prevail, what would be the result? Let me take the water-power regulations of the Ontario government. They provide for a twenty-year lease in dealing with a water-power. I have one of the leases here, and can send it to the hon. gentleman if he wishes to see it. It provides for a lease of twenty years and a renewal after twenty years, the rental to be paid may be increased, or the rates to consumers reduced, and if they cannot agree with the company on these points they may arbitrate.

Mr. LENNOX. Is the government absolutely bound to renew the lease at the end of the twenty-year period, or may it exercise its judgment as to that?

Mr. CONMEE. The government is bound to renew the lease at the end of the twenty-year period, subject to the conditions I have named, or to expropriate the property, paying the company under arbitration if they cannot agree upon the price.

Mr. LENNOX. Is the value of the franchise excluded?

Mr. CONMEE. I cannot answer that question, I do not know the exact regulations as they stand to-day ; I speak of them as they appear in a lease which I have. the regulations as I knew them a few years ago. If my information is correct, the present government does not agree to arbitrate as to the value of the property, but only as to the rental to be given to the government as to the rates they may charge the consumer. They take the power under their commission, the Hydro-Electric Commission, to regulate the rates. Section 14 provides much better protection. Twenty years is a long time. This does not limit it to twenty years, or ten, or five years. It provides that rates may be fixed 'from time to time.' Any consumer may make application, and the rates may be reduced. But it goes much further than that. It provides that the board shall regulate the conditions of the service. What does that mean? It means the hours of service, the facilities that shall be given to the consumer to utilize the power, the delivery of the power not at a station, and then to be stepped down by the community that wants to use it, but the delivery, if the board so orders, to the premises of the consumer, the board having full control over all the circumstances. There is no kind of dispute, I submit, that can well arise between the consumer and the company that the board will not have absolute control over and power to regulate from time to time. I do not know that any better protection for the public interest could be worked out. I submit also that this Bill and this company, like all others, are subject to the general law of the country. If, in the future, it is the policy of this government, or of any future government, to pass a general law regulating the use of water-power, making conditions by which it will be taken from the company, the power exists to do it, that is, general legislation would do it. But there is special power under our constitution which gives us this right. These works can, at any time, either before or after their construction, be declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada, and the government can impose any conditions they please. They can take over the works on any method that may to them seem fair and satisfactory. So, I submit, this Bill has gone a long way to settle what is a pretty intricate question as to the best conditions for the protection of the public interest. I think it goes much further than previous legislation.

Then, if hon. members will examine the Bill, they will see that municipal interests are protected. First, the company cannot enter within the limits of any municipality without the consent of that municipality, and not its consent merely but its consent expressed by by-law. It must be a formal act of the corporation to admit the company to carry any of its works or lines within that corporation's borders.

Mr. LENNOX. What section is that?

Mr. CONMEE. I have not the Bill before me, but I think it is section 11. It goes further as to cities and towns, which are, perhaps, more important. The company cannot enter a city or town, cannot have any rights there, until a by-law is carried, not by the corporation, but by the qualified electors, that is, those entitled to vote on money by-laws. I do not know what possible conditions could be drawn to better safeguard the public interest in this respect than these clauses of the Bill. If hon. gentlemen will glance them over, I am satisfied that they will say that they go about as far as they ought to go. I may say that I have more at stake, as a representative, in this Bill than any other hon. member. I represent the community that is most deeply interested in the Bill. If the Bill is not what I can, as such representative, justify before the community, I shall be damaged, no doubt.

Mr. LENNOX. Might never come back.

Mr. CONMEE. Might never come back. But the reason I am here is because I was an advocate of this Bill. If the hon. member will look at my majorities this year and four years ago, he will see that my majorities four years ago were obtained in the western portion of the constituency—and that this time my majorities were in the east.

Mr. BLAIN. Bribery did not help my hon. friend?

Mr. CONMEE. No, we conduct our elections on the square in that riding. I have no protest pending. My opponents thought I did not win my previous elections fairly, and on four different occasions they put me to the test in the courts, and every time the judges said that I won fairly. Now, my hon. friend read the resolution that was adopted by the assembly at Toronto. I have it here and he said it was carried unanimously.

Mr. LENNOX. Isn't that right?

Mr. CONMEE. No, that is not right. I do not like to accuse my hon. friend of misleading the House, therefore I assume that, although the counter resolution was on the opposite pages of the 'Votes and Proceedings' that he had in his hand, as it is in the one now before me, he failed to see it. I shall not detain the committee on this question further than to read the last paragraph of the resolution moved by Hon. Mr. Mackay, the leader of the opposition, and for which the members of the opposition voted against the resolution which my hon. friend read the other evening:

And this House recommends that a conference between the government of Canada and the governments of the several provinces be held with a view to arriving at a reasonable solution or settlement of matters in doubt as to the respective jurisdictions of the government of Canada and that of the various provinces, and that, if necessary, imperial legislation be obtained.

The purport of that resolution is a conference to settle the difficulty as to what is and what is not a navigable stream, or, if you choose to put it in other language, what is under Dominion control exclusively, and what is under provincial control exclusively. Now, I think that was a fair and reasonable suggestion, and I hope, some day or other, the Dominion and the provinces will convene such a conference, and that a solution of this more or less vexed question may be arrived at.

Mr. LENNOX. As to this amendment which my hon. friend thinks I had in the paper from which I read the other day, what page is it on?

Mr. CONMEE. According to mine—and I suppose his must be the same—the resolution which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lennox) read appears at pages 351 and 352, and the resolution to which I refer at page 353.

Mr. LENNOX. The resolution I had begins at page 5 and goes to page 6. I do not see anything of what my hon. friend (Mr. Conmee) has just read.

Mr. CONMEE. I will send it across to my hon. friend.

Mr. LENNOX. I am perfectly satisfied, but I wish my hon. friend to know that I did not refuse to read what was before me.

Mr. CONMEE. I take the hon. gentleman's word for that; I assumed there must be something of that kind. I do not dispute that there is something to be said on both sides of the question so far as the Nipigon river is concerned, because it is a river entirely within the province of Ontario. I do not recede from the position I took that, notwithstanding that fact, it was a navigable river and subject to the exclucive legislative control of the parliament of Canada. No other parliament can authorize any company to carry out works of a character such as these promoters seek to obtain. That was my position when I spoke before, and that is my position still. I do not recede from that position. I give way to the views of others. I think the powers asked by section 2, a reasonable provision to have in this Bill, and that it ought to be there, but, as other hon. members think differently, and as it is not vital to the Bill, I am prepared to have it struck out. Had that provision been in the Bill with regard to the Rainy river improvements, there would not be the confusion there is to-day, with the community most deeply interested compelled to go to the courts to get redress which they ought to have had and which was afforded them at the hands of this parliament and in the Act passed by this parliament. However, I am not discussing that question; that is past and gone for the present. I hope that with the amendments proposed the Bill will commend itself to the judgment of the House.

Mr. BLAIN. Since my hon. friend (Mr. Conmee) has given us a very full explanation of the Bill and the proposed amendments, I would suggest that he allow it to stand for further consideration, particularly as my hon. friend from Algoma West (Mr. Boyce), who took such an active part in the discussion of this Bill when it was before the House some time ago, is absent.

Mr. CONMEE. If the hon. gentleman will allow me. I met the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyce) yesterday and showed him my amendments and discussed them with him. I understood him to say that he was satisfied. There is only one point of difference, and that is on this point—I will be fair about it. The hon. member's amendment would strike out the word 'three' in section 8 and substitute the word 'two.' That would mean that the company shall commence operations within two years instead of within three years. I pointed out that this company had to get legislation from Washington before it could proceed with its works—it had to go to another country to obtain the privilege of carrying on these works on the Pigeon river. I pointed out that it was more or less a difficult undertaking and that the company ought not to be hampered by narrow conditions, but ought to be allowed a reasonable time, and I do not think that three years is unreasonable. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he would not press that point.

Mr. BLAIN. In reply I might say that I have before me a note from the hon. member from West Algoma (Mr. Boyce) to the effect that although my hon. friend had submitted some of these changes to him, he had agreed to nothing, and does not wish to give his consent to the Bill in its present state. I will send that note over to my hon. friend if he wishes. However, there are so many changes in the Bill now submitted, it is important the committee should have an opportunity of studying it, particularly as, in my opinion, it is a matter which ought to be dealt with entirely by the Ontario legislature.

Mr. SPROULE. There is another reason why this Bill should be delayed. It affects very materially the policy of the provincial government. That government believes that it is entitled to use these water-powers for the purposes of revenue if necessary. Some of them at least they are renting at an annual rental, and such leases are renewable, subject to the provision that the rentals may be increased if necessary from time to time. I apprehend that the Ontario government has not been notified of these proposed changes, nor have we heard from it. Probably it would be as much opposed to the Bill in its present form as in its original shape, because it thinks that it has a right to control these water-powers. For that reason, if for no other, the Bill ought to be delayed. As regards the nature of the changes, we have only just received them and have not had time to consider them carefully. The hon. gentleman has put forward a strange doctrine on the question of the right of this Dominion to control a stream. This government has the right to control navigable streams, but I put a question to the hon. gentleman in that connection to this effect: Suppose some 20 or 25 miles of a stream are navigable, say at its mouth, and all the rest of the way, some 400 miles, it is not navigable; does he contend that because a small portion is navigable, the whole stream is under the federal authority? I think he said it is. That is about the situation in the case of the Nipigon river. Only a small portion of that river is navigable, and for that reason my hon. friend contends that the Dominion parliament has the right to control tha stream throughout its whole length. But the provincial government thinks differently, and there is a good deal of reason in its contention.

Mr. CONMEE. This Bill, as amended does not give the company any rights on the Nipigon at all.

Mr. SPROULE. I was speaking of my hon. friend's contention and applying it to that stream, which is one of the streams in question. There are many changes in this Bill, and we have not time to consider them, and it would not be possible to understand them at this sitting. He had better allow the Bill to stand over until we hear from the Ontario government.

Mr. CONMEE. If we cannot legislate without the consent of the Ontario government, we will not be able to legislate on a great many subjects.

Mr. LANCASTER. If we legislate with regard to provincial interests?

Mr. BLAIN.

Mr. CONMEE. Are we to have no opinions of our own? There can be no provincial question as regards the Pigeon river, because it is a boundary stream, and the land passed out of the possession of the Crown more than 50 years ago, so that there can possibly be no provincial interests in that river.

Mr. LANCASTER. Perhaps if the hon. gentleman was representing the province of Ontario he would think differently.

Mr. CONMEE. I shall not debate that question with my hon. friend. But the proposition that this Bill should stand over until we can learn the views of the Ontario government is one to which I cannot consent. I do not want to unduly press the Bill, but of course if hon. gentlemen choose to take a hostile course, we cannot accomplish very much just now, as the hour for private Bills is nearly up. But I do not see what good purpose will be served by putting it off. The Bill should be dealt with on its merits. If the majority of the House are opposed to it and will vote that way, the Bill will fall to the ground.

Mr. LENNOX. As regards what the hon. gentleman said about our being opposed to this Bill, I hope he does not take that view of the matter. When it was called a little after eight o'clock, I asked him to explain, and he gave a very elaborate explanation which has taken up most of the time down to this moment. We certainly have no time to consider it now. If he prefers that we should discuss it for the quarter of an hour left within which it can be discussed, we shall do so, but we cannot dispose of the Bill to-night and he might just as well move that the committee rise and report progress.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There are some amendments to which there can be no possible objections. For instance the amendment striking out clause 2, which clause was objected to and is now removed. Surely that can be passed.

Mr. LANCASTER. But we do not know how far we may be dealing with provincial rights until we get through. We might commit ourselves to some legislation by passing clauses which we would not pass in the light of what may come afterwards. What strikes me is that we are straining here to find excuses for doing what we ought to do only if we were in the Ontario legislature. I cannot see how we can gain anything by attempting to do that. We have enough business of our own to attend to federally in regard to matters that appertain to the Dominion without bothering to be a court of appeal or advisory board to any provincial government. I have not taken any part in the discussion so far, but I have listened every time this Bill has been discussed. My hon.

friend is not lacking in astuteness or knowledge of legislative procedure and, although not a lawyer, he is just as well able as lots of lawyers to discuss this matter even from a legal standpoint. I am sorry he has not told us of some reason why the Ontario legislature cannot do all that he wants done and provide all the safeguards he says he is now willing to provide in this Bill. Why can they not provide them? Why not allow the legislature of Ontario to deal with provincial matters ? We are not competent to deal with matters that appertain solely to the people of Ontario and we are not the judges of what they should do. They are the sole judges. We have no right to think that we can do as well as they can and we are not insulting ourselves if we say we cannot do as well as they can in regard to provincial matters. I do not doubt that a good many of us would vote one way on this Bill in this parliament and an entirely different way upon a similar Bill if we were in the provincial legislature. What troubles me is that we are dealing with this matter as a federal matter without being sure that there is any need whatever for federal legislation. We have no right to exercise jurisdiction here unless the province cannot deal with the matter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend knows that the argument which he has presented does not apply. We do not commit ourselves to the Bill until the preamble is accepted. Until that is done there is nothing done. There are some provisions in the Bill to which he took exception and which are to be eliminated by my hon. friend from Thunder Bay and Rainy River (Mr. Conmee). To this certainly he cannot object. This Bill, as it is amended by my hon. friend, contains nothing as to which there should be any debate except as to the power of expropriation. My hon. friend has eliminated from the Bill that part which deals with the Nipigon river as to which I was against him. Now, the powers of expropriation are confined to a river which is international. There is a good deal to be said against the proposition of my hon. friend from Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster? that the powers there are vested in the province of Ontario, and there is a good deal to be said in favour of the other proposition that the powers are vested here. That is a question which can be discussed at the proper time, but, it seems to me we would be advancing the work for which we are here if we accepted this part of the Bill and reserved the discussion for the part which is really contentious.

Mr. SPROULE. My reason in suggesting what I did was partially the statement of the hon. gentleman himself that the Bill, as it was proposed to be amended, he felt quite satisfied, would not be objectionable to the Ontario government if they were consulted.

Mr. CONMEE. I did not make that statement.

Mr. SPROULE. That was the impression I had from the language he used. I thought, therefore, if it was submitted to them and we had information to that effect from them it would very much simplify it here and that while we might still think that they had acted unwisely, if they did not desire to exercise control over these water-powers, there are some members of this House who would not oppose the Bill very strongly. My own opinion is that these water-powers belong to the provinces. They are the assets of the province and they should be used as such. They are at the present time renting them from year to year and getting a very considerable income from some of them. They have announced to the world that their policy is to take the whole of them under their control and to develop them on provincial lines. Since what they have done has inured to their benefit, they using their own property and making money out of it, why should we take to ourselves the right to expropriate, or rather to deprive them of a part of the property that belongs to them? It is taking from them a right which they possess. I do not think we should do it.

Mr. PERLEY. The notice regarding these amendments states that they will be proposed on Monday next. I suppose they were put in too late to take effect to-day. Therefore, my hon. friend from West Algoma (Mr. Boyce) is perfectly justified in considering that these amendments should be taken on Monday. Instead of continuing the debate it would be much better to defer the consideration of the matter until Monday.

Mr. CONMEE. I gave the notice for 'Friday.'

Mr. PERLEY. The hon. gentleman must have been too late to give the notice for this evening, because the notice says 'Monday.'

Mr. CONMEE. This discussion, I submit, is irregular. The Bill should be taken up clause by clause and discussed, whereas the committee has been allowed to discuss it generally. The notice of my hon. friend from West Algoma (Mr. Boyce) is practically the same as this notice, so that there has been lots of time as far as the notice is concerned. Let me say a word in answer to the hon. member who spoke a few minutes ago (Mr. Lancaster) and who desired to know my reason why this parliament has been asked to pass this legislation instead of the provincial legislature. All I can say is that I thought I did give in the discussion of that question when the Bill was up for its second reading and again in committee, the very best reasons. I gave the judgment of the Privy Council that this parliament and this parliament alone should create this company.

Mr. LANCASTER. To do what?

Mr. CONMEE. To carry out the undertaking which this company is asking to be allowed to carry out.

Mr. LANCASTER. Did that court have this Bill before it? It depends on what you put in your Bill.

Mr. CONMEE. If my hon. friend is going to make a Bill for these promoters, or if he is going to dictate to them what they shall put in their Bill, I do not know where he will land them.

Mr. LANCASTER. No, I am not going to do that. But no court can ahead of time, say that a certain Bill which is afterwards brought in to parliament is a Bill that can only be passed by the Dominion. If you put a stated case to them, the answer to which you must know will be in the affirmative, saying that the Dominion can do this or that you can get that answer from the court, but the court could not say that a Bill to be introduced by my hon. friend at a later date is a Bill which this parliament can alone pass.

Mr. CONMEE. The best authority we have in this land has said so. The courts have decided that point.

Mr. LANCASTER. What have they decided?

Mr. CONMEE. I could give my hon. friend no less an authority than that of Sir Oliver Mowat. I was brought up in the school of provincial rights in which Sir Oliver was the teacher. I am still sound on that question. Here is the language of that gentleman dealing with a Bill introduced under similar circumstances:

> The only authority conferred upon a provincial legislature to incorporate companies is for the incorporation of companies with provincial objects. The undersigned construes this authority to mean objects provincial as to the province creating the company.

Then he goes on to give cases in which the courts held a similar view, and he uses this language:

> It would seem to follow that the statute in question which confers upon the company authority to acquire, cultivate, improve, and sell land not only in the province of Nova Scotia but also in the province of New Brunswick and elsewhere, is not limited to provincial objects in the sense in which that expression is used in the British North America Act, and therefore the enactment is ultra vires.

Mr. CONMEE.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is not this case.

Mr. CONMEE. No, but it is a case which is similar. He then commends Sir John Thomson's rulings with regard to a Quebec case in which Sir John Thompson recommended disallowance because the company undertook to divert a navigable stream, and Sir Oliver himself applied this ruling to the case of the Kaministiquia river for the same reasons. We have also had the opinion of the Minister of Justice given on the floor of the House that this parliament can alone confer the power which this company asks.

Mr. LANCASTER. I am afraid I will have to withdraw the compliment I paid my hon. friend on his legal attainment; it was paid out of politeness and I regret to have to take it back. Everybody knows that when a company operates in different provinces it is not a provincial work, but this company is going to, as I understand, is going to operate entirely within Ontario.

Mr. CONMEE. The trouble is that you don't understand it.

Mr. LANCASTER. The decision given by the learned and much respected authority quoted by the hon gentleman is based upon the ground that the company referred to in that case was going to operate in two different provinces, and not being confined to the one province it was of course a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. CONMEE. Does not the hon. gentleman see in this Bill that the company is not confined to one province?

Mr. LANCASTER. That is not the effect of this Bill.

Mr. CONMEE. The company operates not only in Ontario but in the United States.

Mr. LANCASTER. You might say it would operate in Mexico or Australia, but that does not help you.

Mr. BLAIN. When this Bill was first introduced it was considered of such importance by the Ontario government that they sent a special counsel to object to it in committee. The hon. gentleman since that time has made many changes in his Bill, and the Ontario government should certainly have an opportunity of considering these changes. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Conmee) is rather hostile to the Ontario government, but that is his right and privilege.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. gentleman should not impute motives to me. I am not unduly hostile to the Ontario government; I have no personal quarrel with them.

Mr. BLAIN. But the hon. gentleman refuses to wait until the Ontario government is consulted. In my opinion the Ontario government is just as anxious to develop the water-powers of that province as this parliament can be, and if the hon. gentleman has a proper project to submit to them he will no doubt receive their co-operation.

Mr. SPROULE. Nine o'clock.

The hour for private Bills expired.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC LOAN.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 128) to authorize a loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. GRAHAM. At six o'clock I was trying to correct a wrong impression which seemed to prevail as to a comparison of the grades on the Transcontinental and on the Intercolonial Railway from Levis to Moncton. The leader of the opposition suggested that an arrangement might be made by which grain from Midland could be carried to the sea board by the Grand Trunk and the Intercolonial Railway. From the Intercolonial Railway standpoint I would approve of that provided no injury were done to the shippers. But, the hon. gentleman also suggested that we might do that even if the Intercolonial Railway carried the grain for the present at a loss, and as head of the Railway Department I must dissent from that proposition. I think the Intercolonial Railway as a government road should be treated in the same way as other roads. If the government came to the conclusion that the Intercolonial Railway should carry the grain at a loss then it would be the duty of parliament, after ascertaining what that loss was, to pass a special vote to compensate the Intercolonial Railway and not charge it with the whole burden. In Australia, if the government asks the government railway to carry goods at a non-paying rate then the government passes an appropriation to compensate the railway, and under similar circumstances, a like provision should be made in Canada. I have not been able to consult with any person so as to get accurate information on the point, but my opinion is that the grade on the Intercolonial from Montreal to Moncton is no higher than the ruling grade on the Grand Trunk Railway from Midland to Montreal.

Mr. PORTER. No higher?

Mr. GRAHAM. My own impression is that they are about on an equal footing.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman has not yet dealt with the real difficult which I raised.

Mr. GRAHAM. The right hon. the Prime Minister was about to speak.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The difficulty suggested by my hon. friend, if I understood him aright, is as to what will become of the traffic between the west and the east during the interval which must elapse before the bridge at Quebec is completed. I need not say that the accident which has befallen the bridge is a very serious interference with the contract. We had expected when we entered into the contract that the bridge, which had been in progress for some time, would be completed about the same time as the road itself, and but for the unfortunate event which has taken place our calculations, I think, would have come out about right. The bridge has been down now for eighteen months and the plans for the reconstruction will not be ready for some time, probably not before the end of the year. I believe the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) was about right when he said that on the most favourable estimate the bridge could not be completed ready for traffic before 1915. After the lesson which we have received, after having plans prepared by engineers whom we had reason to believe were the most competent engineers on the continent, and whose efforts have proved so fatal, we have felt it necessary to take every possible precaution. We have confided the preparation of the plans for the new bridge to a board composed of the most eminent engineers to be found in Europe and on this continent. They are proceeding with the work but I do not know yet when the plans will be prepared, perhaps they will take the best part of the year. In the meantime how are we to connect the two branches of the railway, the sections from Winnipeg to Quebec and from Quebec to Moncton? I will not surprise the House by saying that the Minister of Railways and myself and the cabinet have given some attention to that question. We thought that perhaps it would be possible to place a ferry on the river. I am informed that this project will not be expensive and is quite feasible. As to this I venture no opinion at all, this is simply the information given to me, and I give it for what it is worth, I do not cite it as accurate or definite. But let us take the worst view of the case and let us suppose that it is not possible in the meantime to have a connection between the two sides of the river at Quebec. Then we are faced with the question: What are we going to do in the meantime? I am not prepared to say at this moment what we should do and what action might be taken, if indeed any action can be taken. But I take issue with the hon. the leader of the oppositon (Mr. R. L. Borden) on his statement that this was an opportunity to exact from the Grand Trunk Pacific some modification of the contract that we have with them. I take issue also upon his statement repeated during this debate that this transaction as to which we are asking the assent of parliament is a modification of or departure from the terms of the contract. I say on the contrary that the present loan which we make to the Grand Trunk Pacific is no departure whatever from the terms of the contract. The contract is not changed, it remains just as it was, there is no modification, this is simply an advance which we make to the company and which is to be recouped within a certain time. It is on all fours with the similar transaction of 1884 between the government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was not suggested at that time or since that the loan of $30,000,000 made by the government to the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1884 implied any modification of the contract made in 1881. If it was any modification, the changes were not material and the essence of the contract was certainly not modified. In this matter, so far as we are concerned, we intend to have no modification of the contract. It may be that in order to provide for the traffic which will originate in the west we may have seriously to consider how it is to be taken to the sea, but what I have to propose to my hon. friend is that this was not the occasion or the opportunity to do so. The one thing in which we are concerned at this moment is to have the prairie section constructed with all speed so that the grain of the western country can be taken to the lakes this fall if possible. My hon. friend rather suggested to us that we should take advantage of the dire necessity of the company to impose conditions upon it which it might or might not be prepared to accept. I must say that we did not think that this was an occasion to put such a condition upon the company. We felt on the contrary that the only thing we had to do at the present time was to see that the prairie section was completed in the shortest possible time. At a later time we will have to discuss with the company and make some arrangement with them in reference to the matter which my hon. friend has brought up, but we have simply to submit that this was not the occasion nor the opportunity to do so.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I very greatly regret that the importance of the difficulty, I might say of the misfortune which seems imminent, so far as the Canadian ports are concerned, has not impressed itself more strongly upon the mind of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. He seems to have a very tender regard indeed for the Grand Trunk Railway Company, but he does not seem to have an equally tender mind for the interest of Canadian ports for whose benefit ostensibly this contract was made and these statutes passed. The Grand Trunk Railway Company undertook the financing of this road to a certain extent. The government has performed its part of the contract, the government, the country, has not asked any modification of the contract so far as I am aware. There has been a modification, not a formal modification of the contract but a practical modification—I repeat it notwithstanding the disclaimer of the right hon. gentleman. According to his view if this country made a contract with the Grand Trunk Railway by a separate agreement to provide every single dollar of the money for the completion of that road there would be no modification of the contract. Would any man in his senses say that such is a practical view of the situation? Of course there is a modification of the contract from a practical standpoint. I think that this contract has beeen drafted and this Bill prepared in order that my hon. friends on the treasury benches may be enabled to say : 'There is no modification in the contract.' We are providing for $10,000,000 more to be raised on the credit of this country and yet there is no modification of the contract! How is it there is no modification of the contract when this country, by the passing of this statute, will be obliged to raise $10,000,000 more than it would otherwise have been obliged to raise for the construction of this railway? How is it possible for any reasonable man to say under these circumstances that there is no practical modification of the contract? There is not a formal modification I admit, but from a practical standpoint there certainly is a modification to this extent. Canada is raising $10,000,000 more for the construction of this railway than it would have been obliged to do if this statute had not passed.

What does my hon. friend Sir Wilfrid Laurier say? He says that he regrets the Quebec bridge has fallen and admits it cannot be reconstructed before 1915. But in the meantime where is the traffic to go? Well, it is to go apparently wherever the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway will take it; and that, according to admissions of the right hon. gentleman, which I have under my hand and can quote if desired, must go to Portland, and the absolute purpose and intent of this parliament will thus be defeated during those five years at least. My right hon. friend says no, we cannot move a finger, this is not a favourable opportunity. When does he expect a favourable opportunity, if this is not one? What is to be done about it? I have his own statement that if traffic goes to North Bay, that traffic will go to Portland. I have the statement made at a Grand Trunk Railway meeting in 1903 or 1904 that the object and design of the Grand Trunk Railway was to carry that freight by the lake ports. Well, if freight reaching North Bay must be carried to Portland, can any reasonable man say that freight going to Midland will not go to Portland also? There is absolutely no answer. Yet my right hon. friend says we must not take advantage of the dire necessity of the Grand Trunk Railway, and that this is not a favourable opportunity. But what about the dire necessity of this country? What about the necessities of the Canadian seaports of St. John and Halifax? Does regard for the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway bulk so largely in the minds of my hon. friends on the treasury benches that there is absolutely no consideration for our maritime ports? I think that the answer given by the Prime Minister is a most remarkable one, if you can dignify it by that name. There is in it not one suggestion for avoiding the imminence of the danger to which I have alluded and of which there is absolute proof.

My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) said that the carriage of this freight over the Intercolonial Railway at a small loss would not be in the interests of the people. Perhaps I do him an injustice, but at all events he said it would not be in the interests of the bookkeeping of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. GRAHAM. I did not say that. What I said was this: My hon. friend said the Intercolonial Railway ought to carry it even at a loss. I replied that if the government decided to make an arrangement to carry that traffic that way, the country as a whole ought to stand the loss and not charge it directly to the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. LENNOX. That is the same thing.

Mr. GRAHAM. Pardon me, I made the further plea that something which is done for the country as a whole ought not to be charged to the Intercolonial Railway particularly, but the Intercolonial Railway ought to be paid as any other railway would be, for carrying goods for the country.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The net result is that it would be a mere matter of bookkeeping, and I would like to point out that experiments have been made in this connection already. Experiments were made in 1904, during the six months preceding the 1st of March, 1904, and the net result was this: There were five cargoes of grain carried by the Intercolonial Railway for delivery in the elevators for export. One shipment of 16,000 bushels of wheat was carried from Depot Harbour to Halifax at the rate of 5·15 cents per bushel. Another shipment of 31,836 bushels was carried at the rate of 4·90. Another of 39,990 bushels was carried at a rate of 5·40 cents per bushel. Another of 25,718½ bushels of corn was carried at 4·94 cents per bushel. And still another of 33,892½ bushels of corn was carried at 5 cents per bushel. The Intercolonial received a very small proportionate part of the rate. It did not receive a portion of the rate commensurate with the length of its haul. The Intercolonial Railway carried that grain 828 miles, the Grand Trunk Railway 34 miles, and the Canada Atlantic Railway, 346 miles. The percentages are given of the different shipments which I need not go over, but the net result was that the Intercolonial Railway received 2·25 cents per bushel for a haul of 828 miles and the other roads received 2·75 per bushel for a haul of 380 miles. In answer to a question put by Mr. Kemp, then member for one of the Toronto divisions, the Minister of Railways said:

> The estimate of the cost per bushel for the service performed by the Intercolonial Railway was 2·27 cents and the amount received was 2·25. There was thus a slight loss on the export business; but having regard to inward cargoes and passengers obtained for the Intercolonial Railway, the business was not considered unprofitable.

Well, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways will observe that if there had been a proportionate mileage division of the rate in respect of those shipments, the Intercolonial Railway would have received 3·4 cents and the other roads 1·6 per bushel. Then as the cost of hauling to the Intercolonial Railway was 2·27 per bushel, and the proportionate amount which ought to have been received, under a fair division was 3·4, there would have been a fairly reasonable profit to the Intercolonial Railway on that haul. I am not suggesting that the Intercolonial Railway ought to make any profit upon such business, but that the interests, not of the maritime provinces alone, but of the entire Dominion, would require that the Intercolonial Railway should carry that freight to the maritime ports during the winter months at a low rate in order to prevent channels of trade being created for our western traffic to Portland and the other ports in the United States. This will be a subject of such transcendent importance during the next four or five years following the completion of the Port Arthur branch and the western division of the Transcontintal, that it was the duty of the government to have faced that difficulty just as the Grand Trunk Railway and Grand Trunk Pacific are facing their difficulties by making this application to the government. I know of no more favourable opportunity in which to press for an agreement such as I suggest. Are the interests of the country not to be considered at all? Are the interests of the Grand Trunk Railway to be always paramount? The interests of these railway corporations are entitled to just treatment on all points, but when the government, owing to conditions over which it has at present no control—and I shall say nothing as to any default of theirs in that regard—sees that traffic gathered up in the west upon a road practically built by this government is to be carried to Portland and possibly other ports in the United States instead of to our own ports, should it not follow the example of these corporations and face that difficulty in order that some reasonable, fair and just agreement might be arrived at to safeguard the interests of our Canadian seaports? Our only answer is in the words of the Prime Minister that we must not take any advantage of the dire necessity of this company, and that this is not a favourable opportunity for introducing this subject to their attention. Again I ask, if this is not a favourable opportunity, when does the government anticipate, in the ordinary course of events, that a favourable opportunity will arise, and what do they propose to do about it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. When I spoke of 'opportunity' and 'occasion' I did not say the occasion was favourable or unfavourable. I said this was neither the occasion nor the opportunity. I stated a moment ago that this loan which we are making involves no modification of the contract we have with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. My hon. friend cannot dispute that, but speaks of a 'practical modification.' Even to that extent, I think, he is in the wrong; there is no practical modification of the contract. The contract is there. We ask parliament to authorize us to make a loan of $10,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific. I assume that the terms of the loan will be acceptable to the company. With the exception of that loan, the government and the company will remain as they are, just as when, in 1884, the parliament authorized the government of that day to make a loan of $30,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which loan was recouped before the time it was due. There is no change of relation between the government and the company; they remain the same as if the loan had not taken place. If the loan is recouped as intended in the contract, and as I assume it will be, the relations of the government and the company will remain just as if the loan had not taken place; there is no modification of the contract whatever. But, though there is no modification of the contract, my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) says: 'You should have taken advantage of the company and should have forced upon them a modification as to the routing of the traffic that is to be developed in the Northwest.' I have simply this to say: This is not the occasion. The object at the present time, the paramount thing to do, the paramount duty of the government and the country, is to see that the prairie section, which is the most important part of the road, shall be completed this year, so that the settlers who are now flocking in may have the advantage afforded by the carrying capacity of the railway. But my hon. friend in his remarks pointed out that that would be an opportunity and an occasion for the discussion of these matters. He pointed out that the contract we made in 1903 provides that when the road is completed it is to be leased to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. But in 1904 we put in another provision, to the effect that the commissioners who are to build the eastern section may lease some portions of the road as they are completed. They can lease the section between Moncton and Quebec or the section between Quebec and Winnipeg, and, earlier than all this, they can lease to the company the section between Winnipeg and the junction with the branch of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company connecting with Lake Superior. If we are to make a lease of that kind, that will be the opportunity and the occasion to make the arrangement which we think ought to be made for the routing of the traffic. That will be the time and the opportunity. I repeat that it would have been bad policy and bad politics to endanger the possibility of building the prairie section this year in order to make the modification in the contract which may take place later on.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Surely the Prime Minister remembers that the very section to which he has alluded contains these words:

> Pending the completion of the eastern division by the government, the company shall be entitled to lease from the commissioners, to be appointed under the said Act, and to operate such portions of the eastern division as may from time to time be completed, but upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the company and the said commission, which terms are not to be more onerous than those of the lease of the whole division by the said contract provided for.

Then, if they are not to be more onerous, how is he to insert such a stipulation as he speaks of? What will be the nature of that stipulation? If you frame that lease according to the provision of the statute and the agreement, you will not advance the position one iota. Because, I repeat, what some hon. gentlemen in this House have forgotten, that this government deliberately voted down our proposal to compel the Grand Trunk Railway Company to be bound by those provisions of this contract which prevent the routing of traffic to ports other than Canadian ports. What hold will the government have upon the Grand Trunk at that time? It will not be dealing with the Grand Trunk, but with the Grand Trunk Pacific. They are in effect, but not in form dealing with the Grand Trunk at this time, because $7,000,000 of this loan, said to have been advanced by the Grand Trunk to the Grand Trunk Pacific is to be paid out of the proceeds of the loan now proposed. Make that lease in the terms provided by that statute and when the traffic gets to Port Arthur, it will go on to Midland, and at Midland the condition which the right hon. gentleman has described with regard to North Bay will prevail—that traffic must go to Portland, and it will not go to a Canadian port during the winter months at least. If the right hon. gentleman will explain how, on the occasion to which he has referred, he can obtain any hold upon the Grand Trunk to compel them to do that which is not only just, having regard to this whole enterprise, but which is absolutely necessary in the interests of the country as a whole, I shall be glad to hear that explanation. But, in the light of the contract and the provisions of this contract which the government must observe, I, for one, do not know in what better position the government will be at that time than at present.

Mr. LENNOX. Is that only an option of the company?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Yes, my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) is right. I pointed that out before, and did not think it necessary to emphasize it again. It is the company that has the option of leasing, and the government have no power to compel a lease.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall section 1 carry?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Carried.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If my right hon. friend's answer to this is simply 'carried,' I do not think the country will be satisfied with that answer.

Mr. LENNOX. I have great respect for the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and his statement, but for the life of me I cannot see on what reasonable basis he argues that there is no modification of this contract. He says that there is no modification, because we are only lending money to the railway company. We made this bargain in 1903. The country was to carry out a certain part of the building of the railway and the company was to do a certain other part. They came to us in 1904 and obtained modifications. I do not think the right hon. Prime Minister will say that those were not important modifications. The result of those two contracts is that, so far as the western division is concerned, we were to guarantee three-fourths of the expense of building the prairie section, not exceeding $13,000 per mile; the Grand Trunk Railway Company—because it was the Grand Trunk Railway Company that was invariably put forth as being the substantial contractor—was to do all the rest; absolutely, according to the Minister of Finance, and according to the leader of the government, the old Grand Trunk Railway Company was practically to do all the rest. We were to put our guarantee to three-fourths of the necessary money, and nominally the Grand Trunk Pacific was to finance the rest of the scheme, and to have its bonds endorsed by the Grand Trunk Company. Have they done that? No doubt we have done our part, every iota of our bargain has been fulfilled; and if they were not now asking for a modification of the bargain, would they be coming here at all? It is because the Grand Trunk Railway Company has not endorsed the bonds that it was to guarantee, according to the bargain that they entered into with the Dominion of Canada, that they are coming here to-day.

Mr. FIELDING. They will endorse those bonds.

Mr. LENNOX. That is not the bargain. The Minister of Finance will recognize that he cannot blow hot and cold on this matter. He says this contract is entirely separate from the old contract, and therefore they are not carrying out the old contract in endorsing these bonds, they are not guaranteeing them under that contract. The reason they are coming here is because, instead of guaranteeing those bonds, they have gone into some other scheme. In some way or other the Grand Trunk Company has, for the time being, obtained a temporary loan, and they have put $7,000,000 into this road. They do not want to endorse those bonds because it would impair their credit. But they thought they would form some scheme by which to tide over until after the elections, and then they would come to us and ask this parliament to provide funds, and so modify the agreement entered into in 1903 and 1904, instead of endorsing those bonds according to agreement. Is it not idle to talk about modifications under such circumstances? If the Grand Trunk Railway Company were carrying out the agreement they solemnly entered into with parliament, there would be no application here at all, there could not be any application here, because the bonds would be endorsed, the money would have been obtained, and this loan would not be required. The Minister of Finance says: 'Oh, we have nothing to do with the Grand Trunk Company; it is not the Grand Trunk Company we are dealing with at all, it is the Grand Trunk Pacific Company we are dealing with, and we do not need to pay any attention as to where this money is to go, we have only to ascertain that it has gone into the road.' But up to this time he has not found out whether it has gone into the road or not.

Mr. FIELDING. It has not gone anywhere yet.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes it has, if the statements presented to parliament are true, because we have it in black and white that $7,000,000 has actually been put into the road, that is now required to be paid to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. You cannot conceal the fact from the members of this House nor from the people of this country, that it is the Grand Trunk Company that is coming forward to get this loan at the present time; it is not the Grand Trunk Pacific, that is only a name. It has been suggested here to me that it is one and the same red-headed boy; the Grand Trunk Company is going to be the red-headed boy, and always has been. Now not only has this contract been modified in the way I have pointed out, but the right hon. gentleman will have to admit it has been modified in a much more substantial way. Not only was the Grand Trunk Company to stand behind this scheme, and be of it, and in it, and the whole thing, but as to the $25,000,000 of stock they were to hand over was every dollar of it to go into this enterprise before we could be called upon to pay a dollar. I am talking, not upon what anybody on the back benches has said, I am talking of the language of the Prime Minister himself. When the hon. member for Hamilton complained of the fact that we were making no provision to prevent the Grand Trunk Railway Company getting this stock for nothing, the Prime Minister pointed out, after being not too complimentary in his allusions about quibbling and pettyfogging on this side of the House—he pointed out that every dollar of that $25,000,000 of stock had to go into the building of this road if it were required. Has that $25,000,000 gone into the building of this road? If it has not, I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman if he does not think that is a modification of the contract. Will he say he did not give this House explicitly to understand in 1903 and 1904 that every dollar of that $25,000,000 of stock was to go into the building of the road, if it was necessary for the building of the road? The right hon. gentleman does not claim the right to reply. I will therefore take the liberty of giving the language he used on that occasion. He says, on page 11222 of the 'Hansard':

> My hon. friend from Hamilton says that the two companies are one, and that the stock is to be taken by the Grand Trunk Railway; and he asked, How is the value to be determined between them? Well, the value is to be determined by the means of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway will require money to carry on its enterprise.

It requires it now, according to the proposition before the House.

> If it needs the whole $25,000,000, the amount of this capital stock at par, it will have to get it, and it can only get it from the Grand Trunk Railway. In such a case, the value of that stock will be its par value, because that will be the amount which the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway requires in return for its stock and which the Grand Trunk Railway will have to pay. The value of the stock will be fixed by the needs of the company, and cannot be fixed in any other way.

Any modification of the contract? To-day we are told, if I understand the answers that are brought down, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company got that stock for a matter of $205,200, or got upwards of $24,000,000 of it. They have not put that $24,000,000 odd into this enterprise; the Prime Minister promised us that they would, if required, put it into this enterprise. Does he want to tell this committee and this country that there is no modification of the contract, when we are asked to-day to put this $10,000,000 more into this enterprise, and the Grand Trunk Railway Company has not guaranteed those bonds and has not accounted for that $24,000,000 of stock?

Mr. FOSTER. Yet holds it all.

Mr. LENNOX. Yet holds it all. It is not modification, but repudiation. It is an absolute denial of the contract. It is treating the members of this House as if they were a lot of children rather than treating them as if they were independent, reasonable men desirous of doing their duty to the people. I am amazed at the failure of the leading members of the government to appreciate the gravity of the situation we are confronted with at the present time. I need not read—my honoured leader read them this afternoon—the forty-second and forty-third sections of the contract by which it was expressly stipulated that, as a paramount consideration that we would obtain the development of Canadian ports and receive an absolute guarantee that the great products of the west would be shipped outwards by Canadian ports. I am amazed at the fact that in face of that condition of things the government have to come down and acknowledge that they have not taken the first step, that they have not uttered the first syllable in order to try and implement the promise made to the people by that agreement, the main plank in the proposition that the right hon. gentleman launched in this House in the summer of 1903. It was for the purpose of developing Canadian ports and seeing to it that Canadian products were carried entirely on Canadian soil and upon an all-Canadian line that we were asked to pledge our credit and enter into what was said to be, great enterprise. In face of the fact that it has become absolutely impossible that we can hold the 'Grand Trunk Pacific to their contract, as contained in section 20, which provided that they should take a lease of this line when it was entirely completed, and in face of the fact that it is manifest that until 1915 we cannot make the connection necessary to complete the line, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Finance Minister have not risen to the opportunity which they have now, and which they lost before. Having another opportunity presented to them, they have been recreant to their duty to the people. They have not seized the occasion to obtain a modification of the agreement. It is not for the Prime Minister to boast that there is no modification of the agreement, but he should have been proud to say: 'We have obtained a modification by which we secured the traffic down to Canadian ports, which otherwise, by reason of the disaster of the Quebec bridge, would necessarily have been diverted to Portland.' It was not only the duty of the government upon this occasion to have made it absolutely clear before we undertook to give this money that some arrangement would be made with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company by which substantially the original contract would be carried out; but it was the duty of the government to have done more than that. It was the duty of the government, when that bridge fell and when they realized that it would be years and years before it could be restored, to have taken steps to see that we would not have millions of money lying idle in that road for years to come, the road depreciating from year to year and the government and the people absolutely helpless to compel the Grand Trunk or the Grand Trunk Pacific to take over any portion of the line. As has been pointed out, it is manifest that subsection 3 of the new contract of 1904 is a jughandled arrangement, just like the British preference. It is all on one side—option to the company, an option which gives the government no power to compel the Grand Trunk Pacific to take over any portion of this line, unless they will it, until every part of the line is absolutely completed. I have no hesitation of charging the government in the most explicit and definite way with a neglect of duty not only on the present occasion, but 'neglect of duty' dating farther back than that, namely, to the time when they had the right to foresee that by reason of the fall of the Quebec bridge some new terms ought to be sought, and in the absence of the making of a satisfactory arrangement with the Grand Trunk Pacific the building of a portion of the line should have been suspended for such a time that its completion would be about coincident of the completion of the new bridge. To what purpose are we spending our millions on the extreme eastern portion of the line if until 1915 we cannot possible use it? Is it to the benefit of the country; is it to the benefit of the people of the maritime provinces, because if it were I would not complain? Is it to the benefit of any one that the line should, as the government practically propose now, absolutely remain idle for five years, paying large amounts of interest, not less than $10,000,000, during the time it is idle, or would it have been common sense, common prudence, for the government first to have seen what arrangement they could make with the Grand Trunk Pacific, and, failing this arrangement, to have said: 'It is idle for us to invest our money; we will not break faith with the maritime provinces, but we will suspend operations and so arrange the work that the completion of the bridge and the completion of the eastern end of the Transcontinental Railway shall be, as nearly as possible, coincident?' But for the fact that I want to emphasize that we should not be called upon to advance this money at this time, I do not like to quote what has been so often quoted in this House—the language of the Prime Minister and the Finance Minister in particular as to the position of the Grand Trunk in this matter. On second thought, and I think it is the best thought, I will not do it now. If I hear much more of this repudiation I will be compelled, in justice, to do so. Let me just say at this moment that I will only refer to the expression used a few moments ago by the Prime Minister when he said: 'What was the paramount duty of the government?' The paramount duty of the government was to see to the early completion of this line and of the prairie section so as to bring the grain from the west to enable it to be transported to the sea and then to the markets of the world. Yes, that is a duty, but the paramount duty in this case was to impress upon the Grand Trunk Company that they should keep their contract with parliament. By reason of the laxity of the government in not securing the transportation of this freight over the Intercolonial Railway, instead of having more western freight brought over an all-Canadian line to Canadian ports, more of it than ever will go through American channels, and the declaration which the Prime Minister made with such gusto in 1903 in that respect will be altogether falsified.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. How does the Minister of Finance reconcile the statement that the Grand Trunk are applying for this loan because they do not desire to place their bonds on the market, with the fact that $7,000,000 has already been raised and is owing by the Grand Trunk Pacific to the Grand Trunk Railway? I would further ask, if the Grand Trunk do not desire to place their bonds in the market at the present time, why is it that between the date of the letter written by Mr. Hays and the present time they have applied for power to borrow $12,000,000?

Mr. FIELDING. I have no doubt that the loan which they have obtained power to raise will not be placed on the market until a later date when the conditions will be deemed favourable. I do not know how the Grand Trunk Railway obtained the $7,000,000, but I would suppose it was either from the ordinary revenue of the Grand Trunk or through their bankers in the ordinary process. If that be the case, they would have to recoup the bankers by selling the bonds; and to do that they will have to place them on the market at a sacrifice. I do not see any difficulty in reconciling the two things.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I assume the company would not ask for power to borrow $12,000,000 more unless they were going to place that loan on the market in the near future.

Mr. FOSTER. There must have been some negotiations between the government, and the Grand Trunk, and the Grand Trunk Pacific, in reference to this $10,000,000 loan; it did not all happen on the same day and that day the 16th of November. In reading over the correspondence, one is struck by the absence of any surprise on the part of the Minister of Finance or of the government that such a request should be made. There is not a single word in the correspondence from the government to ask: 'Why do you need this; what do you need it for; why don't you carry out your contract?' Will the Prime Minister tell me how long before the 16th of November was there actually an understanding between the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Grand Trunk Railway, and the government that this legislation would be introduced?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The correspondence speaks for itself.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a reply which is open to the right hon. gentleman; and it is open to the House and to the country to interpret it and to draw their own inference.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is a free country.

Mr. FOSTER. The right hon. gentleman prides himself on his frankness, and the very fact that he is unable to say that the first intimation came on the 16th of November, tells its own tale. Will the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister be frank enough to answer this question—when the $10,000,000 loan was mooted between the parties, did the government know or did they try to find out how the money put into the construction before the 16th of November was raised by the Grand Trunk Company?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The Minister of Railways might be able to inform my hon. friend, but I certainly cannot.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a great pity the Minister of Railways is not here when we are discussing this very important question. Will the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance answer another question— did any member of the government or the government as a whole assist the Grand Trunk Railway Company in getting, as accommodation or as an advance, that large amoun of money from the bank to tide them over until this legislation could be put through?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think there was any such understanding. We were aware that the Grand Trunk Company, no being ready to issue the bonds, was advancing money to assist this enterprise. As to the particular method they took to raise the money I never had any information, nor did I think it necessary to inquire. I cannot answer in any other terms.

Mr. FOSTER. You cannot answer more explicitly?

Mr. FIELDING. No. If I could have done anything to help them I would have been very glad to do so, but there was no need. The Grand Trunk raised the money, but as to the particular manner in which they raised it I have no information. I would gladly assist the Grand Trunk if it were necessary, but so far as I know they got it on their own credit entirely.

Mr. FOSTER. Are we to understand then that the government, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, knew nothing about this, had entered into no arrangement and no agreement at an earlier date than is shown by this correspondence? The government know whether they did or not.

Mr. FIELDING. There was no obligation to raise this money and there is not yet; it is an absolutely open matter for parliament to determine whether we shall raise this money now or not. It was a subject of conversation between representatives of the Grand Trunk and ourselves, and we were aware that they were temporarily raising money and assisting in the prosecution of the work, and we understood they would have to issue bonds to raise the money. The question whether they should issue the bonds, going on the market themselves, or we should do it was discussed and it was decided to bring down this resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. How long before the 16th of November was that quasi-arrangement with the company made?

Mr. FIELDING. I would not consider it a quasi-arrangement. There is no obligation yet which is binding on any one. If this is not a good transaction we are free not to complete it.

Mr. FOSTER. Could the minister tell about what time the negotiations commenced which ended in this arrangement and the bringing before parliament of this legislation?

Mr. FIELDING. I could not tell.

Mr. FOSTER. The minister could not tell?

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Is money so small a thing, does the minister take so little stock of it and of the obligations which he is placing on the country that a $10,000,000 transaction slips out of his mind and that he does not remember when it was broached?

Mr. FIELDING. There has been no $10,000,000 transaction. Had we assumed an obligation for $10,000,000, there would certainly be some record of it, but that obligation does not yet exist.

Mr. FOSTER. If a neighbour came to my hon. friend and asked him for a loan of $1,000 or $10,000 it would have impressed itself on his memory sufficiently to make a mark and he would be able to tell a month afterwards about what time the friend asked him for the loan. Here comes another friend, a pampered friend, and asks for a $10,000,000 loan. Is he so accustomed to dealing with the country's millions that this made no impression on his great mind and that to-day he cannot tell when it occurred?

Mr. FIELDING. I have told my hon. friend all about it.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course if the Prime Minister had forgotten it is his duty to forget, but it is the duty of the man who has the finances of the country in his charge to remember.

Mr. FIELDING. We still have the money, so there is no harm done.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not say that that is quibbling, because the chairman might object, but it is mightly close to quibbling.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I notice in a letter of the manager of the Grand Trunk Pacific that he says the Grand Trunk has already guaranteed bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the extent of $30,000,000. Will the minister say whether or not the guaranty of the present loan will stand on the same footing as the guaranty by the Grand Trunk of the Grand Trunk Pacific bonds as against the Grand Trunk Pacific? Will we have a greater right to payment from the Grand Trunk Pacific than the Grand Trunk will have against the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not like to answer these questions off-hand, but my impression is it will stand in the same position as other guarantees by the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. So the position we are in so far as the Grand Trunk is concerned is that we have $121,000,000 of guaranteed bonds ahead of us, $19,000,000 of rentals capitalized at 4 per cent and $12,000,000, which we granted them power to issue this year, all of which will be prior to our guaranty, and after that we only stand in the same position as the Grand Trunk Pacific do in respect of their $30,000,000 which the Grand Trunk has guaranteed.

Mr. FIELDING. I presume my hon. friend's figures are correct. I have not made the additions.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I understand there are also some $6,000,000 equipment mortgage bonds outstanding against the Grand Trunk which are also a prior lien to the present loan or guaranty.

Mr. FIELDING. I think all these securities are included in the sum which I mentioned at a previous stage of the debate, as the amount which would come ahead of our guaranty and which will leave, as we claim, a surplus which will be ample to protect our guaranty.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I do not know whether the $121,000,000 will be sufficient to cover the bonds of the Grand Trunk or not but that certainly does not include the $19,000,000 of rentals capitalized nor the $12,000,000 we have allowed them to borrow this year. That makes $152,000,000 ahead of this guaranty and then we only stand to take our share of anything that remains with the other 30 million bonds that are guaranteed by the Grand Trunk.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I do not see why five years should be consumed in building even the great bridge at Quebec. I believe that bridge can be built in two years or perhaps less. Then other means can be adopted, a ferry can be built and it must be remembered that the Intercolonial is an important factor in the situation and that nothing must be done with the Intercolonial that will prevent it from being utilized. Then it may be possible to cross the river further to the west and so keep the traffic in this country. I would emphasize that we can never depend on private enterprise for the realizing of a great national policy. We have put ourselves, as I have said this afternoon, in the hands of a private corporation to realize a great national policy, a policy that is to build up our own ports and our own country, and to keep our own traffic in Canada. I repeat that this is bad policy, it is not a true national policy and yet this road was supposed to be built on national lines. The government must find a way to build this bridge in less than five years. Of course if you give it to a commission, and the commission wish to prolong their tenure of office they can extend it over for quite a while. But great bridges now are being built in a year and two years. The river at New York has been spanned twice now by enormous bridges costing $20,000,000 in a great deal less than two years and the same thing can be done in this case. It is imcumbent upon the government to find a way to overcome the situation in the shortest possible time.

Mr. GRAHAM. I fully agree with my hon. friend. In reference to the New York bridges I might suggest that one of them was built but has not yet been used, unless it was within the last week or two, as it was found to be defective.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. It was opened the other day.

Mr. GRAHAM. The investigation into the fall of the Quebec bridge led to investigations into that bridge, and it was not accepted, unless very recently. I may say that while I have not taken exception to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition as to the time for the building of the Quebec bridge, the building of the Quebec bridge is under the Railway Department and will be pushed with all possible speed, commensurate with getting a safe substantial bridge. We want a bridge that will stay there when constructed. If it can be completed in two years it will be.

Mr. BURRELL. Is the government aware of the currency of a story that a considerable proportion of the indebtedness of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the Grand Trunk Railway arises out of the fact that material is supplied by the latter to the former? I ask that because it has a bearing on the representations that we are to get a road of exceptionally high standard. But if 80 lb. rails have been taken off the line of the Grand Trunk Railway, to be replaced by 100 lb. rails, and if these old rails are placed on the Grand Trunk Pacific, of course we are being deceived as to the character of the road.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am glad my hon. friend has mentioned that. The only transaction that could give rise to that story is this: I believe that the Grand Trunk Pacific has taken for its sidings some 80 lb. rails, which are in good condition, from the Grand Trunk Railway. The 80 lb. rails are practically just as good as the others for the purposes of sidings. The Grand Trunk Railway is replacing its 80 lb. rails on its main line by 100 lb. rails, and is furnishing the Grand Trunk Pacific with these 80 lb. rails for the purposes of sidings only in a limited quantity.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Is any part of the purchase price a part of that $7,000,000?

Mr. FIELDING. I could not say that.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Has this reason been advanced to the government as a reason for making this loan, that the Grand Trunk Railway were embarrassed by the fact that they have undertaken to pay the government upon the cost of the Winnipeg and Moncton division 3 per cent per year, and that since this division is to cost a great deal more than twice the sum they were led to believe it would, their liability is now 6 per cent instead of three per cent on the sum originally estimated, and on which they depended owing to the confidence with which the government made that estimate. It would be impossible for any railway company to pay a rental of 6 per cent on a road when their expectation was that they would only have to pay 3 per cent, when there is no expectation that the traffic will be increased by one ton by this additional cost. Have they come to the government representing that that they are burdened by a liability which they foolishly assumed without knowing the actual cost, and so consequently do not wish to issue bonds upon their own responsibility, but want the government to issue bonds for them. This leads to the further supposition that it must be clear to the government that never will the Grand Trunk Pacific pay the 3 per cent that now stands as part of the contract. We ought to know definitely whether it is contemplated that at a future day we shall be asked to relieve the company of that three per cent.

Mr. FIELDING. No member of the government has ever heard any suggestion or proposal such as my hon. friend has indicated.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Is it the expectation of the government that the Grand Trunk Pacific will, at the proper time, commence the payment of the three per cent?

Mr FIELDING. That is what the contract calls for, and I have never heard them question their obligation. They entered into the contract; it was a pretty hard one. Hon. gentlemen opposite pretended that it was a most favourable contract for the Grand Trunk Railway, and I have never heard that company make any suggestion regarding shirking any obligation under it.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend the Finance Minister says that not a dollar will be paid for any work done until he has the certificate of his chief engineer. But how far back will the engineer go? Suppose a claim be made for $7,000,000, what kind of a certificate is the engineer going to give? Take the ties, for instance, that go into the road. The engineer is told that so many ties have gone into it and he satisfies himself that that number of ties has really gone into the road. The company say that these ties have cost, let us say 60 cents, and lay the vouchers before the engineer. Does the engineer go any further back or does he simply take these vouchers and base his certificate on them as regards the cost? It might happen that these ties went through three or four hands before being placed on the road. The first contractor might have got the contract at 60 cents. Then he sublets that contract say at 50 cents. The sub-contractor goes a little further down and gets them supplied at 40 cents. Then away down at the bottom, the man who takes them off the stump is paid, say 30 cents. Has the engineer the right to go back and find out what the ties cost from the stump?

Mr. FIELDING. I understand that the ties are obtained by public tender and contract. If tenders were advertised for and contracts awarded after public competition, it would not be the business of the engineer to follow the ties back to the woods. That which is obtained in open competition may fairly be taken as a standard price. Besides, the chief engineer has several assistants who live along the line of the railway and who watch its whole construction and report as often as is necessary. These would know and the chief engineer, even at this distance would, from his long experience, know the value of the ties. In the first place the company present their statement. Then there is an audit made of the vouchers and the books, and the auditor must be satisfied that these amounts are correct, as a mere matter of accounting. If there be an item which should not properly be charged to that service, the auditor from his experience and knowledge criticises that item, and certifies to what is correct. Then comes the question whether the charges are fair and reasonable. The chief engineer, through his general knowledge of railway construction and the information he is continually receiving from his assistant engineers, has to decide that point. He has to decide on the value of the ties, the cost of the rails, the cost of labour, the cost of moving so many yards of earth, and he certifies whether these charges are fair and reasonable. That is the method of auditing and certifying.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Did the hon. minister say that the sidings were being laid with old rails taken from the Grand Trunk Railway?

Mr. GRAHAM. The statement made was, as I understood, that a certain quantity had to be used in that way.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Second-hand rails?

Mr. GRAHAM. They might be second-hand rails, strictly speaking, and be absolutely as good for the sidings as new rails. They would have been used for many years if the Grand Trunk had not taken them up to make way for 100-pound rails. For all purposes, they will last longer on the sidings than new rails on the main line.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. But are they second-hand rails? And are they first-class second-hand rails, or what quality are they?

Mr. GRAHAM. I understand that they are rails in first-class condition.

Mr. LAKE. In connection with the statement made by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) just now when questioned as to whether the prices were fair and reasonable, I would remind the committee of a little matter that came before this House a couple of years ago in regard to one of the contracts made by one of the contractors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. During the discussion of the Robbins irrigation case, it was shown that an English company had taken over the assets of the company and also the assets of the Grand Forks Cattle Company. Amongst these assets appeared a contract for the supplying of meat to the contractors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. When the assets were valued, the valuator spoke of this contract in the following terms:

> I am prepared to say that a very moderate estimate of the value of this contract would be from $50,000 to $75,000.

And the Southern Alberta Land Company actually paid to the Grand Forks Cattle Company $50,000 for the benefit of this contract which they took over, and, I suppose, carried out. It seems to me that that shows that very extravagant prices were being paid at that time. The gentlemen who composed the Grand Forks Cattle Company were Messrs. J. D. McGregor, Brandon; D. A. Ross, Vancouver; A. E. Hitchcock, Moosejaw, and others.

Mr. FIELDING. Was this contract for the construction of a section of the road?

Mr. LAKE. It was for supplying meat to the contractors of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. FIELDING. It would not, then, touch the company itself. Assuming that the contract is let by tender, whether the contractor pays a high price or a low price for his supplies cannot affect the railway company. We are not concerned in following the case back to find out what the contractor paid for his supplies. The sum of $50,000 would not necessarily be a large amount of money to make out of a contract in connection with the construction of a railway. Everything would turn on the volume of the business done.

Mr. PERLEY. Have the government discussed with the Grand Trunk Pacific in any way the idea of transferring to the government the stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific to be held by the government until the loan is paid?

Mr. FIELDING. In my judgment, the taking of the stock as additional security would be of no value, as at present the stock has little or no commercial value itself. The common stock of a company building a railway that is only one-half, or less, completed can hardly be regarded as, at the moment, a very valuable security. It may become valuable in time. But should it become valuable, it can only be when the company's obligations have been met, and the meeting of the company's obligations would make our holding of the stock unnecessary. The fact that this stock has become valuable would be the best evidence that the obligations which the company have incurred were paid and the whole concern in a flourishing condition. Therefore, we should not get anything of value to us by taking the common stock.

Mr. PERLEY. I would not suggest that the common stock would now be any security to the government in connection with the loan. At the same time, I do not agree with the Minister of Finance in what he has said. This stock at present has no market value to the government in case these bonds are not paid, but we all know the difficulty there is when there is a default on the bonds of a railway. Proceedings would have to be gone through in order to get possession of the road. That case has arisen many times. The agreements made by parliament, especially in 1904, are very bad in that respect. That agreement provides that if the bonds guaranteed by the government are not paid, a receiver is to be appointed, and the receiver, if he has any money left after he pays the working expenses of the railway, simply has to divide that money pro rata between the holders of the first mortgage bonds and the holders of the second mortgage bonds so-called. In this case, the government is providing further money for this railway, and I do not suggest their taking this stock as security, but as a mere matter of proper care on the part of the government. The fact that, as the Minister of Finance said, the stock is of no present value is no reason, it seems to me, why it should not be transferred to the government to be held until the bonds are paid. Many not only in this House but in the country think that, as the people of Canada have to pay so much, they should have some of the stock of this company, to own it in perpetuity for themselves. That is one question that has been raised. But the question I raise is simply that of taking this stock and holding it until the debt is paid, so that, if there is a default the government may own the stock of the railway subject, of course, to the other liabilities, and may be able to administer it without going through the long course of litigation and trouble in case of default.

Mr. FIELDING. We are of opinion that the machinery to protect the government is all that is necessary, and that the proposition to take over the common stock is of no value to us.

Mr. PERLEY. Would the hon. minister argue that, in case there is default in the payment of these bonds, this $10,000,000 which the government is advancing, the government would not be in a better position to deal with the difficulties and to handle the road if it had this stock in its own name, rather than go through the process of law necessary to have the road foreclosed?

Mr. FIELDING. There are many interests involved in the road, and I think that if we take the usual method of protecting these respective classes of investors, we shall not go wrong. I think the hon. member magnifies the difficulties of enforcing the lien. I have no doubt that under the machinery provided, we can exercise as effective control as we could by the possession of the common stock. Anyhow, the Grand Trunk Company, by statute, is the owner of that stock. I do not think any advantage could come to us by asking the common stock to be put up as an additional security.

Mr. PERLEY. Is the minister right in saying that the Grand Trunk is by statute the owner of that stock ?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes. Originally we required the Grand Trunk to acquire and hold that stock, we stipulated that they should hold it. One criticism that was offered was that it was a scheme by which individuals could get possession of this common stock, and put it on the stock market and speculate in it to their own personal gain, and we stipulated that the Grand Trunk should acquire and hold that stock.

Mr. LENNOX. In 1904 we stipulated something else. The statute of 1904 provided that the Grand Trunk Railway Company could dispose, I think, of more than half of it.

Mr. FIELDING. I had forgotten that.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The agreement of 1904 modified that of 1903. That of 1904 merely required that they should hold a majority of the stock; therefore they could dispose of more than $12,000,000.

Mr. FIELDING. Would my hon. friend quote the section?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Section 9 of the agreement of 1904.

Mr. PERLEY. The intention at that time was that the Grand Trunk should pay for this stock. The Grand Trunk paid almost nothing for the stock. I submit that the minister should not endeavour to make the distinction between the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific in this matter. There is no difference, so far as we are concerned. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway undertakes to build this road, and the Grand Trunk undertakes to guarantee it and see it through. Whether this stock is in the hands of the Grand Trunk or the Grand Trunk Pacific, matters not, as we are doing a favour to both of these corporations. I may say that the taking of this stock in the name of the government, in the meantime, does no harm whatever to either the Grand Trunk or the Grand Trunk Pacific. It hurts nobody, because it could be transferred to the government, and at the same time the rights of the Grand Trunk Railway to vote on this stock would be protected, so they would have full control of the enterprise in the meantime. It seems to me therefore that if that stock were transferred to the government it would be a good thing for the government and do nobody any harm. If the government are not prepared to make some such arrangement, I give notice now that I propose to move an amendment on the third reading.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance with reference to that stock that the Grand Trunk was to pay for. A small portion of that has gone to the directors, and they have paid a percentage upon it, some $200 or $400 each on the shares they hold. The rest is held by three gentlemen in trust, I suppose, for the Grand Trunk Company. Now it has been stated that $205,000 has been paid. I see that $5,000 was paid by the directors in percentages on their total stock. But I see it stated in certain places that $205,000 has been paid on the bulk of the stock, the 249,000 shares. Does the Finance Minister know how that was paid, on what basis? Is it a percentage on the whole stock, and did that go into the road or into the treasury of the Grand Trunk Company? That is an important thing. The stock was not to go into the pockets of the Grand Trunk for nothing, its proceeds were to go into the road.

Mr. FIELDING. If any money was paid it would go into the treasury of the Grand Trunk Pacific for that purpose. We gave the House the information furnished us by the company, and I presume it is on that my hon. friend is speaking. But I could not tell by what process he reached that basis. It was not covered by the question, and I did not inquire closely into it.

Mr. FOSTER. Then will the Finance Minister, in the audit of what has gone into the road, include that sum?

Mr. FIELDING. Unless there was work to represent it we could not include it.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the minister does not know whether that $205,000 said to have been paid by the Grand Trunk for its stock, went into the construction of the road or not?

Mr. FIELDING. I could not say.

Mr. FOSTER. Should we not have that information?

Mr. FIELDING. It may have a bearing on the question; I have not thought of that.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like the Finance Minister to take that idea up, and have the certificate of the engineer if that $205,000 went into the actual construction of the road. For all we know, it may have gone into the coffers of the Grand Trunk, and we never made them take $25,000,000 of common stock to put into their own treasury, we gave them that stock to be used for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Then I think we have a perfect right to know whether that $205,000 represented so much cash, or so much material which absolutely went into the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I think we should have that information.

Mr. FIELDING. If the information is accessible. I did give all the information that seemed called for. If the information can be obtained I will be happy to get it.

Mr. FOSTER. The Finance Minister has laid down the principle that none of the money which is provided in the contract, from whatever source it came, was to be idly spent, it was all to go into the construction of the road.

Mr. FIELDING. And for other purposes in connection with it, whatever might be the general expenses of management.

Mr. FOSTER. They have not been managing the operation of the road, they have been constructing it. It is in accord with the legislation that whatever money was paid on that stock, realized from any portion of that stock, should go into the construction of the road. Now, does the government know that it did, or has it taken any means of finding out whether it did or not? Would the minister give instructions to the chief engineer to see whether that $205,000 went into the construction of the road or not?

Mr. FIELDING. The information I received I gave to the House. I will consider the matter.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. With respect to this common stock, what liability attaches to that stock in the possession of the Grand Trunk Railway Company? We are familiar with the ordinary conditions under which a joint stock company may hold its stock on which all the calls have not been paid. If the company get into financial difficulty their creditors can come back on them for the difference between what they paid and the face value. Now, parliament made this arrangement about the common stock on the solemn assurance of the Minister of Justice, as quoted by my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo yesterday, that this common stock should not be parted with except for value. We find it has passed from the Grand Trunk Pacific for no value. The question occurs to me: What would happen in future if the government or any other creditors wished to realize on their claims against the company, whether they could go back to the Grand Trunk as the owners of this stock and ask them to contribute the difference between what they have paid and the face value or whether they are exempt from that?

Mr. FIELDING. No, I think that if my hon. friend will turn to the Act of 1904, chap. 80, he will find that it is provided that the Grand Trunk shall receive that stock in return for certain services rendered and particularly for their guarantee. I have always thought that the guarantee which the Grand Trunk has given to the Grand Trunk Pacific is the chief service that it renders. The question which my hon. friend puts to me may be a legal one that I am not competent to answer, but my impression is that the stock would be held to be non-assessable and paid up and the chief consideration that the Grand Trunk gave for it was that they guaranteed the bonds of this subsidiary company. A man who undertakes to endorse his neighbour's notes for many millions of dollars, such as are involved in this transaction, renders a very valuable service. The Grand Trunk for the moment gets no advantage from that, because, as the hon. gentleman admits, there is no immediate value in the stock, but if in the process of time the stock should become valuable that is the compensation which the Grand Trunk will receive for the tremendous aid it is granting to the younger enterprise.

Mr. BURRELL. Surely the Finance Minister would regard it as singular that we, who have guaranteed three times the amount, cannot hold that stock as collateral.

Mr. FOSTER. The Grand Trunk like every other railway company is a soulless corporation and is looking not for glory but for dollars and cents like every other business man.

An hon. MEMBER. And they are getting them.

Mr. FIELDING. In reference to that criticism I would just say that no contract that was ever made for a great enterprise in the Dominion of Canada contains so many severe restrictions upon the contracting company as will be found in this contract. Instead of being of great profit to the company I do not hesitate to say that this is a contract which imposes a great burden upon them, and they will have to wait for the progress of years and the growth and prosperity of the country before they will find their reward. But, they are looking for their reward, as all corporations and financial men are looking for it, in the tangible form of profits, if not to-day, to-morrow or a future day. But, the government is not in this enterprise for the purpose of obtaining dividends. The government is in this enterprise for the purpose of aiding in the development of the country and the gain to the government representing the country is not to come in the form of a small percentage upon some common stock, but it is to come from the development and progress of the country.

Mr. FOSTER. That is all very eloquent.

Mr. FIELDING. I did not think it was; I thought it was very sensible.

Mr. FOSTER. I must pay my hon. friend the compliment of saying that it was very eloquent and, as it was intended, it brought a cheer from his followers and turned them away from the very pertinent question that my hon. friend asked. I want to ask the Prime Minister what he thinks of the statement made by the Finance Minister?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I thought it was very eloquent and very true.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree with my right hon. friend in saying that it was very eloquent but what did he think of it before the Finance Minister went on with his eloquent periods? What the Finance Minister seemed to say was that this stock belonged to the Grand Trunk and that they could do what they liked with it. They were given that stock because they guaranteed or promised to guarantee certain bonds. Having promised to guarantee certain bonds and having guaranteed certain bonds this was the reward, not now realizable, but at some time in the future. How does the Prime Minister reconcile that view of the case with his own solemn statement made to this House and reiterated everywhere, that every dollar of the stock was, if it were required, to go into the road for the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific ? Is there anything like consistency and business integrity and straightforwardness in making the investment of $180,000,000 to $200,000,000 in this property as to the basis upon which you induced the country to go into it? Was not that the very prime part of it? The Prime Minister himself, who is supposed to keep his word, who is supposed to have his government in control, who is supposed to be superior even to a corporation, pledges his word as the Prime Minister that every dollar of the stock would go into the building of the road if required, and then, a year, or two, or three years afterwards, we have the statement of the Finance Minister that the stock is not to go into the road but that it is simply the possession of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and that it was given to them in payment for their guarantees in certain directions. The Prime Minister must see that these two positions are diametrically opposed. What does he think about it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think they are at all.

Mr. FOSTER. I had supposed that.

Sir. WILFRID LAURIER. No, my hon. friend will agree with me. I stated in 1903 that this stock would go to the building of the road. The Grand Trunk would put it to the payment of the road. The Grand Trunk have been advancing money for the carrying on of the enterprise. My hon. friend knows that we are in stringent times financially and that it is difficult to finance the bonds. The company therefore have had to come here in order to do their financing. What took place in 1884? I remember the speech which was made a few days ago by my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro). He presented a very eloquent statement and he made a comparison of the securities of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in 1884 when they came here for a loan of $30,000,000 and the securities which are offered to-day by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. He stated that on that occasion the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had offered securities which he valued at $200,000.000, consisting of the land grant, 3,000 miles of railway completed, ships and subsidies. I do not think that my hon. friend exaggerated when he stated that in 1884 the Canadian Pacific Railway had securities to the value of $200,000,000 to offer to bankers and financial institutions in order to get the money necessary to complete that enterprise. Yet they could not get a dollar upon those securities. It is a matter of history that the Canadian Pacific Railway at that time went to the banks and financial institutions in Canada, to the banks and financial institutions in New York, London and Amsterdam, offered $200,000-000 of securities to get $30,000,000 and they could not get one dollar. It is a matter of history also that the men who were at the head of the enterprise, George Stephen and Donald Smith, offered their own personal notes to the banks and that they got money upon their own personal notes while the banks would not take the $200,000,000 of securities. Why was that?—because it is well known that the public will not invest in such big enterprises until they have reached a certain stage when they can command confidence. That is the position in which we are to-day. The Grand Trunk Pacific cannot without loss realize upon their bonds at present and that is why the government had to come to the aid of the company, exactly as the government came to the aid of another company in 1884. The Grand Trunk has that stock; it will become valuable, it will be worth more than par and then they will get their profit out of it, and it is only fair and reasonable they should have whatever profit may attach to the enterprise. Is it for profit or glory that men go into an enterprise of that kind? It is for profit, and therefore I see no contradiction between my statement and the statement of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. FOSTER. I thank the Prime Minister for his eloquent period, but what I wanted him to do was to reconcile his position with the position of the Minister of Finance. Now let him pay attention to the plain English of what he did say, and then let him ask himself whether he meant anything or whether he was simply getting off an eloquent period then as he has done to-night. It was at a time when he should have meant something and when he should not have let one word escape him which did not have its definite meaning and its pledge of the honour of the leader of the government behind it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Let me have your reading of it now.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; this is what the right hon. gentleman said:

> My hon. friend from Hamilton says that the two companies are one and that the stock is to be taken by the Grand Trunk Company, and he asked how is the value to be determined between the two companies. Well, the value is to be determined by the needs of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway will require money to carry on its enterprise. If it needs the whole $25,000,000 the amount of the capital stock at par, it will have to get it and can only get it from the Grand Trunk Railway. In such a case the value of the stock will be the par value because that will be the amount which the Grand Trunk Pacific requires in return for its stock, or which the Grand Trunk Railway would have to pay. The value of the stock will be fixed by the needs of the company and cannot be fixed in any other way.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think that was badly put at all.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it was very straightly put.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, Hear.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not that I quarrel with the right hon. gentleman that he has not put things straight; I quarrel with him because he does not keep straight to the straight way in which he puts things. That is what I have been trying to impress upon him for a great many years, but I have absolutely failed. The right hon. gentleman will get up to-day and he will put a thing as straight as the English language can put it, so that you can take but one meaning out of it, but he does not keep to that. There is no other meaning to be taken from this language than that this stock being in the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway its value was to be determined by the needs of the Grand Trunk Pacific; if the Grand Trunk Pacific needed $25,000,000, par was to be the rate, and it was to be given by the Grand Trunk Railway. The Grand Trunk Pacific needed $9,000,000 of that now. According to the statement of the right hon. gentleman who is the father of the scheme, when the Grand Trunk Pacific needed that money it was to go to the Grand Trunk Railway who had that stock, and on the basis of par it was to demand it. It got its $10,000,000, or nearly so, from the Grand Trunk Railway, but the Grand Trunk Railway has a halter round the neck of my right hon. friend, metaphorically speaking, and the Grand Trunk Railway proposes to keep this stock and to make the government do its financing, and so it pulled the string a little tight at a peculiarly opportune time, with the result that to-day we are finding the money and the Grand Trunk Railway keeps the stock. Why will not my right hon. friend, when he has such shining virtues of expression not add to them the still more sterling virtue of keeping to his word after he has pledged it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The Grand Trunk was to supply the money to the Grand Trunk Pacific I admit, but does the hon. gentleman believe that under present circumstances this stock could be placed on the market and its value realized? He knows it cannot.

Mr. FOSTER. I will answer my right hon. friend.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What is the answer?

Mr. FOSTER. The answer is this. Suppose you say to the Grand Trunk Company: 'Such was the basis on which you received the $25,000,000 stock, and now you must give to the Grand Trunk Pacific at par the $10,000,000 which it needs.' If the Grand Trunk Railway would say: 'We are not able at this time to do that and we would like you to do our banking,' then the answer of the Prime Minister should be : 'If you cannot put out par for that stock to the extent of the necessity of the Grand Trunk Pacific for this $10,000,000, we will put up the $10,000,000, but you must give us $10,000,000 of that stock.'

Mr. FIELDING. How much better off would we be when we had it?

Mr. FOSTER. How much better off?

Mr. FIELDING. Not a dollar.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Finance is magnificent in his utter disregard of the value of money and security when he is at work for those he wants to help—and who have helped him. In the second place the Minister of Finance is magnificent as a spender.

Mr. LENNOX. The Prime Minister has asked if we expected that the Grand Trunk Railway could realize upon this stock at the present time. I will read the language of the right hon. gentleman to be found at page 7688 of 'Hansard,' and then the committee can construe its meaning. The Prime Minister said:

It may be asked, if the aid of the government is to be given only to secure the construction of 75 per cent of the road, where is the company going to get the other 25 per cent. The answer to that is this: that it is provided in the contract that the company shall be authorized to issue a second series of bonds which are to be guaranteed not by the government by the old Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. May I read here to the House this section, which is an important one.

The Prime Minister read the covenant and followed with this exposition of it:

I need not dwell upon the importance of that covenant on the part of the company. It practically takes away from the guarantee of the government all risk. There is not a dollar to be advanced by the government. We give our credit and nothing else, and our guarantee of 75 cer cent of the construction of the road is to be supplemented by the credit and all the backing of the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself.

As the hon. member for North Toronto says, if they cannot turn that stock over to advantage, let them hand it over to the government or give the government half of it and let us turn it over.

Mr. FIELDING. To whom?

Mr. LENNOX. Let us guarantee it and sell it.

Mr. FIELDING. Guarantee the stock?

Mr. LENNOX. Yes, guarantee it and sell it. Don't we often guarantee the stock of railway companies? If you do not want to dispose of it and raise money on it, raise the money as is now proposed, but let us have a majority of this stock and so let us control the policy of the company so that we can direct the routing of freight as we cannot now. The Prime Minister pointed out then that not only had we the absolute contract that every dollar of that $25,000,000 would be available for constructing the road from time to time as required, but also that the Grand Trunk would guarantee all the bonds beyond the three-quarters guarantee that we were to give and that the country would not be called upon for one dollar.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to read to my right hon. friend another very clear passage, because line upon line and precept upon precept may impress these things on the right hon. gentleman's mind with some force. At page 2483 of the 'Hansard' of 1904, in regard to the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), he says:

> The reason for inserting this condition of the contract last year was that we wished to prevent speculation in the stock. Well, Mr. Chairman, the Grand Trunk Railway Company must raise money to carry out this enterprise. They cannot build the section from Winnipeg to the Pacific ocean simply upon the guarantee of the government, for that will cover only three-quarters of the cost of constructing this part of the road.

Remember that what the Prime Minister said was that the Grand Trunk Company must raise money to carry out this enterprise, not the Grand Trunk Pacific, but the Grand Trunk, which was in it and of it and the whole of it.

> And then the equipment of the road is also to be raised from the public, and there are only two manners in which that can be done, either by the issue of bonds, or raising money on their stock. The methods we have adopted will enable them to go into the money market and obtain some money with which to carry on the work. Unless we had done that we would have put them in a position in which they would encounter greater difficulties than they should have to encounter in carrying on an enterprise of this kind.

That carries out exactly the doctrine that was enunciated in the other extract I read to the House, and the country took it so. Now neither the House nor the country can take it so.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Why not?

Mr. BURRELL. I noticed that twice in this discussion to-day the Prime Minister has harked back to the parallel of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In his last remark he said it was a parallel case and he fully recognized the position of the member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) acknowledging that in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway all these securities were placed in the hands of the government, a first mortgage on the line, the equipment, the steamships, the land and everything they had. These securities were worth nothing in the world's market at that time, but the government advanced money on them. He claimed that this was a parallel case. Let me point out that it would be if his government had not put these most valuable securities, these very branch lines and terminals, out of our power to touch. Every one knows that the Lake Superior branch line and the terminals, and more especially the town sites and other things which this does not cover, would be good securities and that the Canadian Pacific Railway put up securities of that kind. But the right hon. gentleman's government has specifically, in the contract of 1903, exempted all these very things which made the securities put by the Canadian Pacific Railway a real and tangible asset. On his own admission the personal notes and security of the gentlemen interested in the Canadian Pacific Railway were placed at the disposal of the government, whereas here we have the Grand Trunk Townsite Company, formed of Mr. Hays, Mr. Chamberlin, Mr. Wainwright, Mr. Baker and Mr. McHugh, yet none of these gentlemen have offered notes or securities. If we had all these securities there would be no criticism from this side of the House, and, therefore, it becomes all the more necessary that we should at least press for a reasonable share of this stock which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House think is of no value, but which we think might be of some value.

Mr. MIDDLEBORO. The legislation of 1904, section 11, to which the Prime Minister referred, as as follows:

> The directors of the company elected by the shareholders may make and issue as paid up stock, shares of the common stock of the company, whether subscribed for or not, and may allot and hand over in payment for plant, rolling stock, docks, elevators, wharfs, warehouses, vessels or materials of any kind, or as considerations for rights, powers, guarantees and privileges acquired, or services rendered, other than promotion services, and also for the bona fide claims of contractors and engineers, such an amount of such common stock as is a fair and bona fide value for the propery purchased, or for the rights, powers, guarantees and privileges acquired.

I would point out that the whole section appears to be clouded purposely as though to lead us to assume that the Grand Trunk was going to give valuable consideration in the shape of plant, rolling stock, docks, elevators, wharfs, warehouses, vessels, materials of any kind for the $25,000,- 000 common stock which they got from the Grand Trunk Pacific and the only consideration they exacted for that was the guarantee. That is to say they cloud the whole situation by putting in all these words, when no doubt the only intention was to do as they subsequently did, take over the whole common stock in consideration of guarantees alone. That fully bears out the contention of the hon. member for North Toronto and since that company has got the whole of that common stock—because this section gives the right to transfer the whole of the common stock and I understand they have transferred it for the alleged consideration of $203,000—I would ask the Finance Minister whether or not he knows if that $203,000 includes any promotion services because this section expressly forbids promotion services being a consideration.

Mr. FIELDING. I gave the House the information I got from the company.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does the minister know?

Mr. FIELDING. I could not answer.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If there is, it is an express contravention of this section. I think the suggestion of the hon member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) is a very good one, especially in view of the fact that the company have paid at the most only $203,000 for this $25,000,000 worth of stock. The Finance Minister does not think that this is a valuable security but I point out that under the present arrangement, in case default is made in payment of the bonds which the government have guaranteed, the only remedy we have under that section is to take possession of the road, and when it becomes a paying concern hand it over to the Grand Trunk Pacific again. So soon as it becomes a bankrupt concern and does not pay its way, it is saddled upon the country. If we have the common stock we can pay the bonds of the company and being the owner of the common stock we would be the Grand Trunk Pacific and have control of the whole situation. In that way we could become the absolute owner of the road subject only to the payment of interest. If we become owners of the common stock and control the company we get a tangible security because we get rid of this onerous condition of having to hand over the road when it is paying. If we had the stock we would be masters of the situation, and if the road did not pay could become absolute owners of it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Could the Finance Minister give any definite knowledge of what the Grand Trunk Pacific were offered for these bonds which they could not sell?

Mr. FIELDING. A price offered by whom?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. By the brokers.

Mr. FIELDING. I expressed the opinion that the bonds could be placed at about 90, and did not base it on any actual transaction, but on my knowledge of the money market.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the sole purpose of this Bill is to relieve the money situation of the Grand Trunk Pacific to the extent of $10,000,000, why would not the Finance Minister take up $10,000,000 of their bonds as part security and give them the money?

Mr. FIELDING. I am happy to have that suggestion. That is the exact purpose of this legislation :

On section 3,

The issue of bonds to be made by the company hereunder shall be for a principal amount not exceeding ten million dollars, and shall be secured, subject to any prior lien or charge, by a mortgage or deed of trust by way of mortgage of the said prairie section and of the undertaking, equipment and property, tolls, rights and franchises of the company described in the said mortgage, and shall be guaranteed as to the payment of the principal and interest thereof by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada (hereinafter called the 'Grand Trunk Company').

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The security of that guarantee is a very remote one, as has already been pointed out more than once. The company has other securities which it might give. I shall not allude again to what has been said just now with regard to the advisability of securing stock of the company to be held until its loan is repaid; but there are other assets of the company which might very well be included in the mortgage. Let me allude to two of them. One is the interest of the Grand Trunk Pacific in a corporation which has secured a great number of town sites, namely, the Grand Trunk Pacific Townsite and Development Company. I understand that the Grand Trunk Pacific practically owns the whole of the stock in that company which has received very favourable terms from the government having been permitted to acquire a very large amount of land in western Canada at an exceedingly low rate. There is no reason why that stock, aggregating about $3,000,000, should not be pledged as security for this loan. Then there is another asset which might be very well pledged to the government, particularly in view of the discussion which we have had this evening, and that is the interest of the Grand Trunk Pacific in the Port Arthur branch. No doubt that branch is already covered by a mortgage and of course I would not suggest that we should do anything which would in the slightest degree displace the security of that mortgage. But the Grand Trunk Pacific has an equity in that branch as I understand it. It has an interest subject to that mortgage. Why should we not take security upon that branch? I understand it is practically completed. A lien upon it would be of the greatest possible benefit to the government. Why is it that these two items of very considerable value—more partcularly, perhaps, future than present value, although the interests in the town sites must be very valuable even at present,—are not included in the mortgage?

Mr. FIELDING. Our judgment is that that mortgage upon the property, remote though it may be, and the guarantee of the Grand Trunk Railway, which has an established value on the market, are adequate security for this loan, and additional securities are not required to protect the public interest.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. This is a fourth mortgage.

Mr. FIELDING. Not exactly a fourth mortgage, but a fourth lien. There is one intervening, but not in the form of a mortgage.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What will be the total value of the liens ahead of it?

Mr. FIELDING. I could not say now, but I gave it at an earlier stage, to the best of my judgment.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, in making a loan, it is desirable to have the security absolutely unquestioned. The pledging of these securities to make good this loan would be no detriment to the company and it would be of importance to the people.

On section 4,

4. The company, in addition to any powers which it now has in such behalf, is empowered to make such mortgage or deed of trust, and to create and issue the bonds contemplated by this Act, and the power of the company in such behalf shall not be deemed to be limited by the provisions of section 13 of chaper 122 of the statutes of 1903.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My hon. friend the Finance Minister referred to the enormous assistance which the Grand Trunk Railway had given this enterprise. We know that in consideration of that assistance, the Grand Trunk Pacific has handed over to the Grand Trunk Railway $25,000,000 in common stock. If the assistance given by the Grand Trunk Railway is large, that given by the country is enormously larger. My hon friend spoke of this contract as if it were somewhat an unfavourable one to the Grand Trunk Pacific. Let me point out that his own colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Sir Richard Cartwright, said in 1903, page 9361 of 'Hansard':

I believe that a really good bargain may be one which is to the advantage of both parties. I think this is undoubtedly an instance of that sort.

He thus makes the distinct statement that this contract was eminently to the advantage of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railway as well. In 1904 that contract was modified. Let me read what Mr. Alfred Smither who is a very able and influential member of the directorate of the Grand Trunk Railway, said:

Comparing the agreement of 1904 with that of 1902-3, that which we present to you to-day is a much more favourable agreement.

Therefore, the agreement of 1903, according to the declaration of the Minister of Trade and Commerce was one to the advantage of both parties, and the agreement of 1904, according to Mr. Smither, was still more favourable to the company. It cannot then be well said that this is a particularly burdensome agreement so far as the Grand Trunk Railway is concerned. The Grand Trunk Railway gets $25,000,000 of common stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific in consideration of the assistance which it gives to this enterprise. The country is giving to the same enterprise ten times as much assistance. Why not declare at this juncture that, in consideration of the assistance this country is contributing to the enterprise, we shall have an absolute transfer to the government, in trust for the people, of not less than $10,000,000 of the stock of that company. The common stock has already been issued, the preference stock still remains. One is more valuable for investment purposes, or will be in the future, and the other for purely speculative purposes. But, if the assistance given by the Grand Trunk Railway Company calls for a transfer to them of $25,000,000 of the common stock, why does not the assistance given by the country, which is tenfold greater, justify handing over to the country $10,000,000 of the preference stock? The Minister of Finance says it is of no value. Put on the market to-day it may be of no value. Twenty-five million dollars of the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway had no value in 1882 or 1884. But, if the government had, even with the conditions of the western country at that time, asked that in consideration of the assistance given, twenty or twenty-five million dollars of the common stock of the Canadian Pacific should be handed over to the government, cannot we see what a tremendous asset that would be in the coffers of the government at the present time? So, looking to the future, and not to the immediate present, and realizing that the security of the government in respect of this loan and these guarantees rests upon the success of this enterprise, realizing that we are taking so great a share of the risk, whatever it may be of this enterprise, are not the people of this country honestly entitled to some share in its success if it shall be, as we hope it may be, a great success in the no distant future.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. member is going over the same ground as my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster). I can only repeat the argument——

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That was with regard to pledging it, I understood.

Mr. FIELDING. It is as to the profit to be derived from this common stock. The hon. gentleman says that, as we are contributing much more than the Grand Trunk Railway Company, we should have an interest in the common stock. I think that the contribution of the Grand Trunk by way of aid is enormously greater than the proportion he has occasionally indicated. However, we need not dwell upon that now. Whatever the grant is, they get for it only a second mortgage, while the government, for every dollar it puts in by way of its own guarantee, gets a first mortgage and is entirely protected.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not understand that the Grand Trunk get a second mortgage.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The hon. minister is describing the case precisely as it was under the contract of 1903, but he has not described the conditions of the contract of 1904. Under the contracts of 1904, if default of interest shall be made, the government stand precisely on the same footing as the Grand Trunk. A receiver is to be put in charge, the road operated and the surplus earnings given to the government and to the Grand Trunk in proportion to the bonds they are guaranteeing.

Mr. FIELDING. The effect of the legislation of 1904 was not to vary our first mortgage, but to provide that we might postpone the remedy for a certain time. We have, as I understand it, a first mortgage, whereas the Grand Trunk has only a second mortgage.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The only remedy provided under the legislation of 1904 is to put a receiver in charge, operate the road and hand over the surplus earnings to the two parties according to the amount of bonds they have guaranteed. I am speaking of the condition in case of default of interest; but that is the essential point, for if the road is operated for fifty years, or whatever the term may be, without default of interest, there would be no question as to first or second mortgage. The essential feature is, what is to be done in case of default of interest? In that case, the Grand Trunk is on precisely the same footing as the government. So, while the government has nominally a first mortgage, it has not a first mortgage in fact.

Mr. FIELDING. For a limited time there would be that distribution. But I think the hon. member will find that, while reserving to ourselves a first mortgage, for a limited time the receiver is appointed and the net receipts distributed pro rata. But our first mortgage remains. The hon. member's argument is that our remedy is only in default of interest and that practically we do not have a first mortgage. But that is only for a limited time—we postpone foreclosure for the time. I speak from recollection.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The effect of the legislation is that, for the first seven years, they do not pay interest at all. For three years thereafter they are allowed to capitalize it, and then we are not allowed to do anything for a period of five years. All mortgages are alike until there is default. But, under the 1904 contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific on default, the road is put into the hands of a receiver and the net receipts are divided between the parties in proporton to their claims against the road—75 per cent to the government in respect of its guarantees and 25 per cent to the Grand Trunk. What does that mean? It means that we have no preference. If we had a first mortgage, we could take everything and the Grand Trunk get nothing. But as the net receipts are divided 'pari passu,' it is not a first mortgage because other mortgages would not be entitled to one cent until our claim was paid in full if it were a first mortgage.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What the minister (Mr. Fielding) has in mind is that for a period of five years no rights shall be exexercised—default for less than five years does not entitle the goverinment to take action. But, if there is default for over five years, then the government may enter into possession and a receiver be appointed, and, in that case, the government and the Grand Trunk stand upon the same footing.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think that, to a large extent, my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) is right. The other day, in discussing the matter, an hon. member left an impression on my mind that by the legislation of 1904 we placed ourselves in such a position that during the whole of these five years the holder of the second mortgage could practically step in and do anything he liked. I looked it up, and I find that that is an erroneous view. At no time can the second mortgagee step in ahead of our mortgage. But, after five years, the division will be on the basis of 75 per cent to the government and 25 per cent to the Grand Trunk.

Mr. LENNOX. Practically we were turned into trustees by the contract of 1904. We had an ordinary first mortgage, but in 1904 it was provided that, in default of interest, a receiver should be appointed who should distribute the proceeds in the way mentioned. As soon as they caught up on the interest, the property would go back into the possession of the company. As a matter of fact, we can never take possession of the road permanently.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like the Bill to remain in committee, in case we should have any further suggestions.

Progress reported.

REGISTRAR OF THE EXCHEQUER COURT.

Bill (No. 98) to amend the Exchequer Court Act—Mr. Aylesworth—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). The whole purpose of this Act is to define anew the status of the registrar of the Exchequer Court. Two years ago an Act was passed with regard to the salary of the registrar of the court, fixing the salary of the present incumbent of the office at $3,000 per annum. As that was a special piece of legislation, it has been considered in accordance with the ordinary rule of interpretation of statutes that the provisions of the special Act would have force and effect instead of the provisions of the general Act with regard to the Civil Service which was passed last session, and the result would be that the position of the registrar of the Exchequer Court would be defined by the terms of the special Act of 1907 instead of falling under the provisions of the general Act with regard to the Civil Service of 1908. The whole purpose of this Bill is to place the present registrar and any future registrar of the Exchequer Court, under the provisions of the general Civil Service Act of last session. It will be observed that in the second subsection of section 2, it is provided that the registrar shall rank as an officer of subdivision A of the first division of the inside service, in or under the Department of Justice. That would be the position to which, in virtue of his salary of $3,000 per annum, the registrar would have been placed in the classification under the Act of last session if that statute had applied to his case. The whole purpose of this legislation, as I say, is to accomplish that result, and have the general provisions of the Civil Service Act apply to the registrar of the Exchequer Court instead of the provisions of the special Act of two years ago.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to establish the Department of Labour as a separate department of the Civil Service of Canada, with a Minister of Labour in charge of such department, who shall be paid a salary of $7,000 per annum; and that the Governor in Council may appoint in addition to the present staff of the Department of Labour one aditional clerk in the said department at a salary of $1,000 per annum, and a private secretary to the minister at a salary of $600 per annum.—Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. moved:

That all the words after 'per annum' in the 3rd line be omitted.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. As this is merely preliminary to the Bill I have no objection in letting the resolution pass on the understanding that any discussion which might ordinarily take place will take place upon the Bill in committee.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times and agreed to.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 165) to establish the Department of Labour as a separate department of the government of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What may we expect on Monday if government orders are reached?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. On Monday, if we reach government orders, we will continue these Bills that are on the Order Paper, and I desire to move the House into Committee of Supply in order to give my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) an opportunity to speak upon the eight hour labour question.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, May 3, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

On the orders of the day being called.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I beg to move:

That a special committee of five members be appointed, composed of Messrs. Guthrie, Sproule, McIntyre (Perth), Haggart (Lanark), and Ethier, to consider the recommendations contained in the fourteenth report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, to amend rule 87 and 88 of this House, and that the said report be referred to the said committee.

The suggestions made by the Railway Committee are somewhat technical, referring to the practice on private Bills. They call for an amendment to the rules, and I think it better to have them considered by a special committee.

Motion agreed to.

TERM OF OFFICE OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As we approach the end of the session I have been asked by a number of hon. gentlemen if it was not the intention to have parliament pass an address to His Excellency Earl Grey and Her Excellency Countess Grey in recognition of their services to Canada and the manner in which they have discharged their official duties. I am happy to say there is no occasion for such an address because the term of His Excellency as Governor General will not come to an end this year.

WESTERN COAL STRIKE.

Mr. McCARTHY. I desire to call the attention of the government, and particularly of the Minister of Labour, to the serious conditions which are being created in the west by reason of the coal strike. I would refer him to an article in the Lethbridge 'Daily Herald.'

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member can only put a question at this stage.

Mr. McCARTHY. I shall simply read this article and ask a question of the minister. The article is as follows:

The closing of the Taber mines brings Alberta face to face with a practical tie-up of every domestic coal-producing mine in the southern part of the province. If the situation is allowed to continue without any effort at settlement, Lethbridge and Alberta will be hit hard. Industries may be compelled to close down for lack of coal and citizens will not be able to secure fuel except at famine prices. Farming operations will be given a serious setback, as the absence of a supply of cheap fuel will put the steam ploughs out of commission, and thousands of acres of land that would have been broken will be left untouched.

The Minister of Labour ought to get his Conciliation Act into operation. It is his duty to see that its provisions are enforced. If he allows the Act to become a dead letter in this trouble, he might as well expect it to be a dead letter for all time to come.

Has the minister seen this article and what does he intend to do to bring the Act into operation? I express no opinion on the merits of the claims of the operators and miners.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Minister of Labour). I have not read the article referred to. As to the situation in the west, the latest reports received by the Department of Labour are of a favourable nature. I communicated on Saturday to my friend the member for Leeds (Mr. G. Taylor) the statement sent me by the deputy minister, and I have nothing to take back from that statement. We expect that within a few days a board will be constituted and that there will be no necessity to prosecute those who have defied the law.

Mr. HERRON. I wish to add to what has been said by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. McCarthy) that a serious condition has been created on the prairies owing to this strike. From the prairies come reports that coal is very short, that steam ploughs are without coal and that it is feared the seeding operations will be greatly delayed in consequence. I would urge the minister to make inquiries in regard to this serious situation.

PRIVATE BILLS.

ONTARIO AND MICHIGAN POWER COMPANY.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 34) to incorporate the Ontario and Michigan Power Company.—Mr. Conmee.

Mr. BLAIN. Immediately after the discussion of this Bill in the House the other day I forwarded a copy of the original Bill —the correct copy together with the proposed amendments, to the Premier of Ontario. I have before me a letter acknowledging receipt and pointing out that this is a matter that ought not to be dealt with by this House but one coming within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Ontario legislature. The power question is very important in Ontario to-day; the development of power at Niagara and the outcome of the varied works now being undertaken are being watched with great interest by the people of the province. My hon. friend who introduced the Bill is well aware that matters of this kind properly come within the jurisdiction of the legislature of Ontario as he has had similar measures before that body when a member of it. He is also familiar with the feelings of the people of the province upon matters of this kind. I am sure the people of Ontario will be very much disappointed if this charter is granted, and I will be surprised if the Ontario members of this Cabinet consent to legislation of this kind passing the House. I need not discuss the reasons for opposing this measure as they have been fully discussed in the committee both this session and last. It is true that the Bill has been greatly modified. Originally the Bill declared that this was a work for the general advantage of Canada but it is not now so wide in its scope. Still I do not think this House should interfere in this matter. There are no just provisions in the Bill that could not be dealt with and dealt with more effectively by the Ontario legislature. I think it the duty of the House and the committee to refuse my hon. friend's Bill. Of course I have no feeling against my hon. friend (Mr. Conmee) for introducing such a Bill, my only point being that it is purely a matter for the Ontario legislature and that it should be dealt with by them.

Mr. CONMEE. I have no doubt my hon. friend has the letter to which he refers, but I would point out to the committee that because the hon. gentleman has written a letter which has drawn an answer from the Premier of Ontario adverse to the Bill, that is no reason why this House should consider the matter from that standpoint.

Mr. BLAIN. My letter was a plain, simple letter without any comment——

Mr. CONMEE. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. BLAIN——without any comment at all, and I would be quite willing to have my hon. friend write the Premier of Ontario for a copy of the letter.

Mr. CONMEE. I am not questioning the good faith of the hon. gentleman at all, but I am questioning the propriety of asking the Premier of Ontario in regard to a question of this kind. He is not exactly the governor of this House. He has passed legislation that has been vetoed; so he might go wrong as well as anybody else; and I think that when the Bill came to him with the name of the member for Thunder Bay and Rainy River on it, my hon. friend might expect something like the answer he has got. The hon. member says that I am pretty well acquainted with the conditons in Ontario. Well, I profess to have some knowledge of them and I do not believe that the people of any constituency in Ontario would favour the views of the hon. member. The Premier of Ontario, when leader of the opposition, shortly before he came into power went to the town of Niagara, where there was an issue on the water-power question. The government of that day were charging a rental for the power, and the contention of the opponents of the government was that there should not be any restriction placed on the water-power. Mr. Whitney's language was that water-power in this country should be as free as air; and I do not think he has receded from that. The statutes of the province show that the provincial legislature has incorporated company after company to develop water-power in this very district. They gave to the Current River Water Power Company an Act in 1907 enabling it to develop these same water-powers—any water-power in the district of Thunder bay. So that I do not think there is anything in that contention. But I have some information for the committee which I think will remove this question altogether from the contention that provincial interests are in any way involved. It has been contended, before these amendments were proposed and since, that this Bill in some way or other infringes on the rights or the property of the province. I contend that it does not infringe either upon the rights or the legislative jurisdiction of the province. Confined, as it is, to a boundary stream, where the construction must necessarily go into a foreign country, the Bill cannot be in the exclusive control of the legislature; it must come within the control of this parliament. But it is not alone within the federal control because the dams and other works must include the American portion of the Pigeon river as well as the Canadian, but because the company is asking power to connect its line with foreign lines in the United States and in other provinces. The judges of the Privy Council have pronounced, and it has been read to this committee, that the parliament of Canada alone could incorporate a company with these objects. So that that contention cannot be seriously held. In order to ascertain whether there was a chain reserve that would be interfered with by this development, I wired the registrar at Port Arthur, as follows:

Wire date land patented joining Pigeon river falls. Did purchaser get land to water's edge or was there a chain reserve?

In reply to that the registrar wires:

Date of patent Stewart location adjoining Pigeon river not in Port Arthur registry office. The location appears by maps in my office to go to water's edge.

That was not quite clear enough, and I wired to Toronto to have the records searched in order to get the date of the patent and to ascertain beyond all doubt whether there was a chain reserve when the Stewart locations mentioned in the telegram of the registrar of Port Arthur was purchased in 1856, when there was no regulation as to the area that might be taken, and this location is, I believe, about six miles square. This is the answer from Toronto:

Stewart patent dated September 13, 1856. No reservation at all except five per cent for roads. Conveyance includes land to water's edge. No chain reserve.

Mr. BLAIN. Who were the telegrams from?

Mr. CONMEE. The first telegram was from J. M. Munroe, registrar of Port Arthur and the second from Mr. Hunt, of Toronto.

Mr. MACDONELL. Is the hon. gentleman aware that the Crown has a right to lay out five per cent reserve as a chain reserve along the water's edge or otherwise?

Mr. CONMEE. I do not happen to know that. If my hon. friend knows it, I think he has knowledge that nobody else possesses. In the first place, it would be impossible to lay out a road allowance along the Pigeon river, because at that point the river is a cataract passing between two walls of rock. That was undertaken by Mr. Mowat in the case of the Kakabeka Falls Power Company. He refused to allow the company to go on because of that five per cent reservation, claiming that he could do as the hon. member suggests, take possession of the land adjoining the water's edge, and thereby become the riparian owner of the land under the water. But he abandoned that position, finding after looking into the matter that it was not tenable.

Mr. MACDONELL. Has the Crown not the right, in appropriating that five per cent, to locate it where it desires in the whole area of the grant?

Mr. CONMEE. The Crown has a right to lay out that five per cent in roads for public use, and I was just going to explain to my hon. friend that the Crown has exercised that right on the Pigeon river, so that there is no right in the Crown now existing. The circumstances were these. The owner of this location was an American Trust company, for the original owner had passed away, the Pigeon River Lumber Company, now the Arrow River and Tributaries Lumber Company were doing business there, and the agent of that company charged $500 a year for the privilege of using the roadway across this reservation, afterwards raising the price to $1,000 and again to $1,500, and they were getting it; but they wanted $2,000. This rather alarmed the other company, which was an American company, and they began to inquire. I happened to be the representative in the local legislature at the time and the matter came to my attention. I advised them to refer the case to the government of the day, and ask them to exercise their right of laying out these roads in order that the public might have the right to travel through this large location, which the reservation in the patent contemplated they should have, and the government did so. The government did so, an inspector was sent up, and two roads were laid out, a road running east and west and a road running north and south. So my hon. friend has not got even that shadow of a pretense to rely on. It has gone, and gone for ever.

Mr. MACDONELL. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has any other evidence with him of the correctness of the statement he is now making, namely, that the Crown has already appropriated this five per cent and exhausted its right, and that that five per cent is not appropriated along the river banks.

Mr. CONMEE. I have made the statement to the House of my own personal knowledge. I was told by the Commissioner of Crown Lands at the time, the Hon. Mr. Gibson, that they could not lay out any more roads through the location because they had exhausted the five per cent. I cannot give my hon. friend any better information than that. He will have to take my word for it or doubt it.

Mr. MACDONELL. Well, the matter rests there. Now the hon. gentleman has said, and correctly, I think, that the Premier of Ontario might regard with suspicion this measure because of the name that was placed upon it in promoting it. I believe in that respect, as in many other respects, the Premier of Ontario would be sustained by the same overwhelming majority he has behind him in other matters.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman appears to be casting doubt on the words of a member of this House. I may have misunderstood him, but if that was not his intention, then there is no breach of order.

Mr. MACDONELL. There was no such intention whatever. The hon. gentleman has dilated upon the fact that the province of Ontario has granted several charters for powers in that same district, with which I quite agree. That shows who is exercising power, namely, the province; the province has, without question by this government, been granting water-powers in that neighbourhood, and in that respect the province of Ontario has pursued very much the same policy that it has with regard to other public utilities and portions of the public domain, namely, that it will regulate and dispose of its powers and its assets as it pleases, and in such a way as to inure to the benefit of the people of the province. That is why they are dealing with these powers, why they are dealing with the power to grant these concessions; it is because they have the right to deal with them, and because they are dealing with them in accordance with a well conceived policy which is in the public interest. The hon. gentleman has said that the premier of the province has stated that these powers should be as free as air; precisely, as free as air to the people that own them. But the hon. gentleman proposes to chain these powers up entirely, and not leave them free to the people of the province. What do the people of the province get? If the hon. gentleman gets his Bill and gets a valuable concession, what do they get in return? What do the people of the Dominion get in return for this exploitation of a part of the public domain? They get nothing. Therefore the hon. gentleman is seeking to contravene that very policy.

Mr. CONMEE. If the hon. gentleman will look at clause 14 of the Bill he will see that if the company gets these powers and uses them, the province and the Dominion will get the development of resources that are now idle, and they will have perpetual control, through their parliament and through their representatives.

Mr. MACDONELL. This is the first time I have ever heard that public control over a utility brings a compensation to the people as a payment for it, and that is all the public domain has to yield.

Mr. CONMEE. There is no public domain. I have just shown that the land has passed out of the hands of the Crown in 1856. Under the patents of that day the right extended to the centre of the stream. If the hon. gentleman will show by some argument of some effect that the province has any right, even a shadow of a right, he would be making some point, which he has not yet done.

Mr. MACDONELL. The hon. gentleman has not established by any evidence that this part of this river has been granted, I do not understand the hon. gentleman's words even to mean it; because certainly the telegrams he has read contain no such statements. The bed of this river, as are the beds of all the rivers in the province of Ontario, is part of the public lands of the province, and as such is vested in the Crown, in the right of the province, and there has been no grant made of the bed of these rivers, from the statement of the hon. gentleman himself. Then the hon. gentleman says that it is because they are going to export this power that it becomes an international work. It becomes no more an international work than a factory that manufactures furniture, or boots and shoes, or anything else. I cannot see the difference. If it exports power, that is a particular reason why the people of this country should have some control over it. The Bill has been very much boiled down, and many of the notoriously objectionable features have been removed, but that does not touch the vital point of this Bill. I do not care how the hon. gentleman may pare it down, may take out a river here or a river there, or a power here or a power there to export; the fact remains that the hon. gentleman is seeking to obtain from this parliament a grant of what belongs to the people of the province of Ontario. The hon. gentleman argues that this is an international stream. Now with all due deference to the opinion of hon. gentlemen who differ with me, I venture to say that that does not alter the fact. The British North America Act, by section 109, vested in the province of Ontario, at confederation, all this public domain, with its lands, its minerals, its royalties, its mines, its water and so forth, and part of that public domain is the bed of the rivers, which are public lands.

Mr. CONMEE. Does the hon. member contend that the province of Ontario has ownership in the water?

Mr. MACDONELL. I am dealing with that; I say that all those assets formed part of the public domain at the time of confederation. Now the fact that a river divides two provinces, or divides this country from a neighbouring country, makes no difference in the ownership of the bed of the river. It makes only this difference, that in so far as the waters in rivers are concerned, they are international waters, but the province has the same rights over the Canadian portion of that river as it has over a stream in the highlands of Ontario. The province has to police all those waters, it has to regulate them municipally, and has the same control over them that it has over the inland waters.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I would like the hon. gentleman to say who he thinks owns the title of this Pigeon river. It is evident from these telegrams that the land next to the edge of the stream has been granted.

Mr. MACDONELL. No.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. Yes, that is what the telegram says.

Mr. MACDONELL. The hon. gentleman knows, and I will accept his word. He is very fair in these matters, as in all matters. The Crown has reserved a five per cent area out of this whole grant. Now the hon. gentleman tells us that he knows that the Crown has exercised a part of that right—I do not understand him to say the whole of it, by opening up highways. Now the Crown may apply or appropriate any right that it likes. The hon. member for Essex knows well that along all the navigable rivers and streams or lakes in the province of Ontario, the Crown has reserved one chain along the shore.

Mr. LANCASTER. By general statute?

Mr. MACDONELL. Yes. I will abandon my own argument for a moment and take the hon. gentleman's argument. I will say that the fee of half of the bed of the Pigeon river, that portion which lies in the province, is vested in Ontario. The objection that I am making is that this parliament is attempting to deal with something that belongs exclusively to the province of Ontario. The province of Ontario has asserted its claim. It is to-day, as it were, at the bar of this House claiming that this parliament should not exercise the rights of ownership that the province is lawfully entitled to under the constitution of the country, and appealing to this parliament not to make a grant of a part of the public domain of Ontario, to a band of commercial exploiters who are seeking to obtain, in defiance of the people of Ontario, that which belongs to the people, without paying any compensation therefor. The right hon. gentleman who leads the government, I understand, desires that clause 2 of the Bill should be dropped. That is the clause which declares the work to be for the general advantage of Canada. That very fact is an argument that this is not a Dominion undertaking, but that it is local and provincial in its nature. It is either one thing or the other; it is either a Dominion undertaking or a provincal undertaking. If it is a Dominion undertaking it is proper that it should be dignified as a work for the general advantage of Canada. But, if it is not, that is an argument that the Bill is before the wrong parliament and that the promoters are invoking the wrong jurisdiction. As such I think that logically the whole Bill should fall to the ground. It is shorn of many of its objectionable features because of the abandoning of the Nipigon river from the operation of the Bill. In what way have these rivers been dealt with in the past? Take, for example, the Niagara river, which affords the best precedent and in fact is the only precedent in dealing with international waters. The argument which has been made by those interested in this Bill is that the Pigeon river is navigable and international. The fact that it is navigable in no way vests in this government the fee in the waters or the lands under those waters. So far as navigation and shipping are concerned, under the British North America Act, the right is transferred to this parliament. It has the right to regulate navigation and shipping. That is right, that is admitted and there can be no two opinions about it. Now, we come to deal with the Niagara river. It is navigable from Fort Erie to Chippewa, above the falls, for some distance below the falls and then below that again from Queenston to Niagara-on-the-Lake, and it is international throughout its entire length and divides the province of Ontario and New York state. The first dealing with this water internationally was in 1882, when Lord Dufferin, the then Governor General, conceived the very praiseworthy scheme of forming an international park at Niagara Falls.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. 1882?

Mr. MACDONELL. Perhaps it was 1872. I think my right hon. friend is right in that. At that time Sir Oliver Mowat was the premier of Ontario, and negotiations were carried on between the government of Ontario and the state of New York.

Mr. CONMEE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I think the Bill is under discussion. I do not think the hon. gentleman is discussing the Bill before the committee. I do not think the question that the hon. gentleman is discussing is germane to the question. I understand we are discussing the first section of the Bill now.

Mr. LANCASTER. Before you rule, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am prepared to rule. The question as to the incorporation of this company involves a very broad view and I am not prepared as yet to rule that the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. MACDONELL. I was just showing the analogy between the dealings of this parliament and the provincial legislature with the Niagara river which is identical in all respects for the purposes of this argument, with the Bill before the committee. The province of Ontario, Sir Oliver Mowat being the Premier at that time, dealt with the state of New York and legislation of this parliament was not invoked at that time. They dealt with the riparian rights on both sides of the river and formed an international park. That was quite sufficient, and no one ever questioned the right of these parties to deal with that river and to dispose of the lands bordering upon it as they did. In 1892 the Niagara Power Company, then exploiting the power on the American side, came to this country and sought charter rights to utilize the power of the Niagara Falls on the Canadian side. It was then an experiment and the company, I presume, felt that if the experiment were successful on the American side they ought to get the benefit of their venture by having certain powers on the Canadian side. At that time the Canadian Niagara Power Company was incorporated by the province of Ontario and eminent counsel both in Ontario and in New York state passed opinions upon the legality and propriety of its charter rights. The New York state authorities gave the powers on the American side and the province of Ontario gave powers on the Canadian side. The company has been operated from 1892 to the present time under a provincial charter exclusively. That was the pioneer company at the Falls. The Niagara case is exactly similar to that of the Pigeon river. It is an international water and navigable above and below the falls just the same as the Pigeon river. Other companies have sought rights on the Canadian side since then, and I think I am correct in saying that only two companies have been incorporated. One is the Electrical Development Company, of comparatively recent organization, and the other is the Ontario Power Company. What did the companies do when they wanted charter rights? They went to the province of Ontario when, I think, Sir Oliver Mowat was still premier, and they made a bargain with the province for certain power rights. They entered into a solemn compact and agreement with the province and they legislated in Ontario upon that agreement and legalized it. Then they came down to this parliament and this government and Sir Aemilius Irving, as counsel for the province, came on both occasions and presented to this House and this government the joint agreement of the contracting parties, the Ontario government on one hand and the Power Company on the other. They presented their agreement and jointly asked this parliament to confirm that legislation and agreement. Presumably they came here because they wanted wider powers to help their bonding privileges. Any hon. gentleman can see that it was desirable and wise that they should have the legislation and agreement confirmed so that in case of a difference, or dispute, or disagreement at any future time they would have a tribunal to appeal to that had incorporated them and that was not a party to the bargain. That has been the practice in the past and this is an invasion. I do not see how the promoter can expect to have it carried. He has come to this House attempting to exploit the water-powers of the province of Ontario. The province of Ontario has a policy in regard to water-powers and is exacting royalties, as other provinces are, from those who use these water-powers. The provinces at confederation got little enough; the total budget of Ontario to-day is somewhat less than the budget of the city of Toronto, and I think the same thing applies to the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal. The provinces gave up most of their rights at confederation and I think they are entitled to the few rights they did retain, their rights of property, water-powers, &c. Other provinces have sold these powers and are to-day deriving revenues from them. What Ontario asks in this respect is that you keep your hands off her.

Mr. CONMEE. How would this Bill prevent the province from getting a revenue if it has rights? There is nothing in the Bill to that effect. The province of Ontario has to be applied to and has to agree.

Mr. MACDONELL. Then why is the hon. gentleman asking for this Bill here?

Mr. CONMEE. Because the powers cannot be obtained and the securities be dealt with unless they get Dominion legislation.

Mr. MACDONELL. To what clause in the Bill is the hon. gentleman referring?

Mr. CONMEE. Clause 19. Under that clause the province would have to be paid for any——

Mr. MACDONELL. There is no right of royalty or compensation there.

Mr. CONMEE. I beg to differ from the hon. gentleman on that point.

Mr. MACDONELL. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in that. The hon. gentleman said there was a right of royalty reserved in this Bill.

Mr. CONMEE. I did not say anything of the kind. I said if the province had rights they had to be paid for.

Mr. MACDONELL. I accept that, and if they have rights in the water-power and the bed of the river where are they to get compensation for them?

Mr. CONMEE. They cannot be taken without payment.

Mr. MACDONELL. To whom?

Mr. CONMEE. To them, to whoever the owners are.

Mr. MACDONELL. I can hardly believe the hon. gentleman is arguing what he says.

Mr. CONMEE. The government has no more powers to take property from a private individual or any one else than a railway company and a railway company cannot take property without paying for it. The hon. gentleman knows that much about the Bill.

Mr. MACDONELL. The hon. gentleman is asking permission to utilize a water-power. There is no provision for payment or compensation, direct or indirect. He is asking a perpetual franchise for something which the province is selling in other places, as other provinces are. Thus, although the Bill is whittled down, although it is not as fat a proposition as when it first came before the House, it is no less objectionable now than it was then, in principle and in fact. The hon. gentleman cannot point to any similar Bill passing this House. If we pass this no part of the public domain of any province is safe. water-power is as much a part of the property of the province of Ontario as the parliament buildings at Toronto, the model farm at Guelph or the timber reserves of the province. The question of value is of no consequence, it is a question of principle because if this parliament arrogates to itself the right to exploit the public domain of any province, it matters not how much you take on the first occasion, you admit the principle and we are told in every committee of this House now as a justification for passing Bills that a similar Bill passed last week, or last month or last session. Precedents are created and are followed, and I suppose that is only right and proper, but I warn the government and this committee against creating this precedent.

The premier of Ontario is as stoutly opposed to this legislation to-day as when the Bill was first brought in, and I ask the right hon. gentleman what compensation this House is going to get from openly defying the express wishes of a province in regard to a matter in which it has an absolute vested right. The government of Ontario sent counsel down to the committee and the matter was argued there. It is true that the committee by a large majority sustained the promoter of the Bill but the majority of that committee was not composed of gentlemen from Ontario. I do not think that this matter has been fairly dealt with. The right hon. gentleman and his ministers were not in that committee but they are here in this committee, in the tribunal to which the province of Ontario now appeals and the facts are before them. The province of Ontario is here at the bar of the House, demanding and asking that this legislation be not passed. They say: You are exploiting part of our public domain, of what belongs to the people of Ontario, and vesting it in a band of private exploiters for their own private commercial purposes. Staring that fact in the face, is it right or proper to grant the powers asked for in this Bill? No hon. gentleman can successfully argue that this is not a part of the public domain of Ontario. I trust that the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Clarke) who is a lawyer himself——

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. Will the hon. gentleman say how he distinguishes this from the case of the Winnipeg river at Kenora where it was held that the bed of the river had passed to the owners of the adjoining property? This case was recently dealt with by the Court of Appeals.

Mr. MACDONELL. I do not know anything about that case.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. That was held to be a navigable river.

Mr. MACDONELL. Here we are dealing with the case of this parliament giving to a private exploiter something that belongs to a province.

Mr. CONMEE. You are assuming that.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I think that in that case it was decided that where the land is granted to the water's edge the owners of that land take the ownership to the centre of the river.

Mr. MACDONELL. Not necessarily.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. That was held in that case.

Mr. MACDONELL. Granting all he says, what has that to do with water-power which is part of the public property just as timber or mines?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. If they own the bed of the river, do they not own the water over it?

Mr. MACDONELL. No, not necessarily, the Rivers and Streams Bill settled that, and according to the judgment of the Privy Council the water is not vested. The hon. gentleman who is promoting the Bill does not attempt to argue that, he says the waters are vested in the Dominion. The only proper way to dispose of this Bill is to have it withdrawn, and so free this House from the responsibility of raising a question that perhaps cannot be easily set at rest. The hon. gentleman who promotes the Bill says the premier of Ontario has sometimes had his acts disallowed. I would remind the hon. gentleman that the acts of this parliament have sometimes been held to be ultra vires, and I question if this Act is not in its essence ultra vires of the powers of this parliament. So why embark on troubled waters of that character? The proper thing to do is to send this Bill to the province of Ontario which is dealing with similar Bills and has the only just right to deal with them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Perhaps I may be allowed to interfere in this debate at this moment to endeavour to ascertain where we are and what are the questions before us. The first question is that of jurisdiction, has this parliament jurisdiction over this Bill or has it not? My hon. friend who has just addressed the House, (Mr. Macdonell), has stated emphatically that in his opinion this parliament has no jurisdiction over the matters which are now before us. I beg to take an altogether different view from my hon. friend and I think that on reflection he will agree that his opinion is erroneous. This Bill seeks to provide for the incorporation of a company to which power is to be given to develop water-power in a navigable stream, the Pigeon river, which is a part of the boundary line between Canada and the United States. That is what gives jurisdiction to this parliament.

Mr. MACDONELL. Why does the right hon. gentleman say that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is an international stream. This is a matter on which the Dominion alone has jurisdiction. On all matters of an international character this parliament and not the local legislature has power. The promoter of this Bill has truly stated that this Bill alone will not effect the object sought. Similar legislation must also be obtained from a foreign country. If there is no legislation from the American authorities my hon. friend will be powerless to go on whether he obtains power from this government or the legislature of Ontario, he would have no right to put dams across the river, he must have the joint control of the two legislatures, and this is the reason why this parliament and not the province of Ontario has jurisdiction in this matter. It is an international stream and even if there was a similar jurisdiction in this parliament and in the province of Ontario, for reasons of policy alone this parliament should assume the jurisdiction in all matters in which it is sought to interfere with navigable rivers which are of an international character. The Minister of Justice gave his opinion that we have power to deal with this matter, and for my part I am disposed to agree that not only have we power, but we alone, the parliament of Canada, have the right to legislate in matters of this kind.

That point being granted there was no difficulty in removing the second section of the Bill, which asserted that the works authorized were for the general advantage of Canada. If these words were necessary to give jurisdiction to this parliament, I would be opposed to these words, but in my humble opinion these words are absolutely unnecessary and do not add to the powers that we propose to give, I believe they are a useless encumbrance and I asked my hon. friend to remove them and he has done so.

Mr. LANCASTER. They do not make any difference if we do pass the Bill?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It does not make any difference whether they are in it or not. My opinion and the opinion of the Minister of Justice is that this parliament has jurisdiction to pass the legislation now before us. I stated on a former occasion that the whole point is on the question of expropriation. There would apparently be no objection to the passage of this Bill if the powers of expropriation were removed. This only strengthens the argument I make, that we are losing time in discussing the provisions of the Bill which are not essential. We should come at once to the power of expropriation and ascertain whether the powers of expropriation exceed the powers which we are competent to grant. The whole argument of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) has been directed not against the Bill, but against the powers of expropriation, as he says, taking powers from Ontario which belong to it. That will be discussed later on. When the Bill was before us on a former occasion I stated that the position of the government would be that we would not interfere with the legislative powers of the province of Ontario, and acting upon this opinion, expressed by the government, my hon. friend (Mr. Conmee) has agreed to remove from the powers of expropriation the Nipigon river and this is satisfactory to the gentlemen opposing the Bill. When we come to discuss the powers of expropriation which still remain on the Pigeon river, I said to my hon. friend, that I for one would reserve an open mind and I would see whether or not we were invading the powers of the province of Ontario. So it seems to me that all the objections of hon. gentlemen opposite will be met if we come at once to the powers of expropriation because that is the only difficulty there is in this Bill, and the clauses relating to expropriation could be amended or not amended according to their views, that would be a question to be debated later on. At this moment it seems to me we should expedite the business of the House. If we want to secure the blessing of an early prorogation we should come to the real difficulty in the case and not debate what is not in issue.

Mr. LENNOX. My hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) at a moment when the Prime Minister was engaged, called the attention of the committee to the fact that he had a communication from the Premier of Ontario. According to the notice of amendments in the Votes and Proceedings, the amended Bill was to come up for the first time to-day, so we could not expect that the Ontario government, having had an intimation as to the position which the government proposed to take when this matter was under discussion on April 19, would be prepared to present its case to-day for the consideration of the committee. If the rights of the province are to be reasonably safeguarded, it is at least essential that this Bill, being admittedly a measure that may invade provincial rights, the Ontario legislature should at least have an opportunity of presenting its views each time the Bill is presented in an altered form. I understood the position of the right hon. the Prime Minister as enunciated on April 19, in a somewhat broader sense than his suggestion of this morning, and I venture to say that the Ontario government and the members of this House interpreted it in the same way. I am quite prepared to take the view of the right hon. gentleman as he suggested this morning, possibly what he meant, but I think the language he used on April 19 is capable of a broader interpretation, and I shall read the right hon. gentleman's words in order to strengthen my request to him to allow this matter to stand until the province shall be in a position to properly present its views to the members of the House. The right hon. gentleman, on the occasion to which I refer, dealt with the decision of the Minister of Justice and concluded by saying that for his part, the Minister of Justice, having said that this parliament had jurisdiction, he would be prepared to accept the minister's views rather than the views of other gentlemen who had spoken. Then the right hon. gentleman continued. I understood at the time, as I think the House did, that that was virtually an end of this matter. That he had come to the conclusion that, although parliament had jurisdiction if it desired to exercise it, he wished the promoter of the Bill to understand that this was a matter of fair regard for the rights and interests of the province, and that the jurisdiction of this parliament was not going to be exercised in this case. This is what the right hon. gentleman said:

> But that is not the kernel of the discussion we have had at present. It matters not whether this parliament has jurisdiction, or whether the local legislature has jurisdiction, the point is this: Are there provisions in this Bill which affect the power of the local legislature and the local government? That is the only point which weighs with me. Section 2 of this Bill is a clause with which we are familiar—and it was not invented I may say to my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) by the Liberal party; it is a relic of former days, and, perhaps in the case of this as in the case of other relics, we may be wrong in not doing away with them. At all events, the hon. gentleman and I may agree that it ought to be eliminated from the Bill. But the whole discussion we have heard this afternoon has been directed to one point, and one point alone—and that is that the power of expropriation of water-powers belonging to the local government of Ontario contained in this Bill should be eliminated. I think if these two sections were amended, there would not be so much objection to the Bill. I would have some objections to another which I shall come to presently. I was struck by the argument put forward by the hon. members on either side—especially that of the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Boyce) that the local government of Ontario has a policy on this question reserving to themselves the exploitation of all water-powers, refusing to give them to private companies.

I may interject here that I understood that the right hon. gentleman subscribed to the doctrine that the policy of the local legislature having been enunciated, that policy would be respected on this occasion. The right hon. gentleman went on to say:

> If we pass this Bill we interfere directly with this principle; and under those circumstances, holding as I have held all my life, to the sacredness, if the word is not too strong, of provincial rights, while we have the brute power to override those powers, it is a question whether we should do so, and it is a question upon which I would invite the serious consideration of my hon. friend who is promoting this Bill.

The right hon. gentleman has always on such occasions, not only to members on his own side of the House, but to members on this side, expressed himself in the politest possible language; and I understood him to give a very definite intimation to the hon. gentleman, though in polite language, that he had better drop the Bill. My impression was that from that time the Bill was dead, as I think it ought to be. But whether that was a correct construction of the right hon. gentleman's remarks or not, the Ontario government are justified in so understanding them, and if we are to act in such a way as to have harmony among the various units which constitute the Dominion of Canada, we must pay some regard to the wishes of the provinces or at least give them an opportunity to present their views to the House before we adopt legislation which is contrary to their express opinion. In that view, with the greatest respect, I urge upon the Prime Minister that whatever may be the ultimate outcome, it is not advisable to press this matter at this time. I am quite prepared to assume that the Prime Minister is just as anxious to promote harmony as myself—probably more so, because he occupies a more responsible position; but I think I can appeal to his judgment and to that of the committee, that it is not wise to press this matter forward without giving the local government an opportunity to present its views in a concise and considered form. In doing that, I think that time will not be lost, but rather gained, and the Prime Minister will be enunciating, even more distinctly than he did on the previous occasion, his adhesion to the principle of provincial rights.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think my hon. friend and I are very far apart, but he misapplies what I stated the other day. I said then, and I repeat to-day, that the only difficulty I see in this matter is on the question of expropriation. On that question I feel very strongly. When this matter was before the Private Bills Committee, I understand that the Ontario government was represented there, and that its representative informed the committee that the whole objection of that government was to the expropriation clause. I do not understand that they questioned the jurisdiction of this parliament.

Mr. LANCASTER. I have been informed by members of the provincial government that while they referred to the expropriation clause as an illustration, they had strong objection to our dealing with the matter at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The question of jurisdiction is a question on which we have pronounced already. The Minister of Justice is of opinion that we have jurisdiction.

Mr. BRISTOL. Does the Minister of Justice contend that the parliament of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction or concurrent jurisdiction?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know just what he said, as I have not his remarks at hand; but I have no hesitation for my part in saying that if we had concurrent jurisdiction, in all international matters the parliament of Canada should have paramount jurisdiction. The matter of jurisdiction we have settled, rightly or wrongly; we think rightly. Then the whole argument is on the question of expropriation.

Mr. LENNOX. My right hon. friend does me the compliment of saying that we are not very far apart, but I think we are, on one point. On the question of expropriation the right hon. gentleman took strong ground. That is one important feature of the matter; but there has been put forward by the Ontario government a feature which is even of greater importance, and which touches a more vital principle; that is, that the province has the right to legislate on this matter, and has a formulated policy upon it. It was upon that branch of the question that I undertook particularly to address myself to the right hon. gentleman, and to his statement, in effect, that as regards these water-powers the Ontario legislature has adopted a policy which this government is prepared to respect. The Ontario government says: We want to conserve the rights of the province for the people, and therefore we have adopted a certain policy as to water-powers by which we hope to create a great source of revenue for the people and incidentally develop great industries for the province. The right hon. gentleman the other day put it forward as the paramount consideration that we should respect the policy of the Ontario government on this matter; and on that point we have more reason to stay our hand to-day than we had on the 19th of April, because the Bill has been modified since that time, and it was only on Saturday that the modifications were placed before the Ontario government. The Ontario government intimate to my hon. friend from Peel that they want to have a say in this matter. Are we going to proceed in their absence not only to ignore their policy and to deprive the province of its rights, but to refuse even to grant them the courtesy of a hearing through their representative? I have every faith that my right hon. friend will see the expediency of allowing this matter to stand, and of allowing the government of Ontario to present their views before the House.

Mr. BLAIN. I wish to point out that the gentlemen who are asking for this legislation are chiefly from the United States—Thomas Sturgis, of the city of New York, and J. C. Hunter, of the city of Duluth.

Mr. CONMEE. Read all the names. That is only two out of five.

Mr. BLAIN. I am quite aware that there are associated with these gentlemen some very prominent gentlemen from the west, not in the province of Ontario but in the province of Manitoba. I am not undervaluing these gentlemen, but I am pointing out that the chief promoters are gentlemen from the United States who have sharp eyes on the development of power in the province of Ontario. These gentlemen would not be here at all, neither would my hon. friend be promoting this Bill if the province of Ontario had not a clearly defined policy on this question. They were quite aware that they could not obtain all these large powers from the Ontario government, because that government has distinctly stated that none of these powers shall be given away, either to friend or foe, in the province or in any part of Canada or the United States. It regards these rights and privileges as matters of great value which should be retained for the people. Look at the powers asked for by this company:

(d) acquire, develop, improve, maintain and operate water-powers, use, supply and sell water-power for any purpose, by any means of application, generate, by means of water-power or otherwise, electricity, heat, light and any other form of energy, and transmit the same by any means to, and supply and sell the same for use in any manner at, any place in Canada and the United States;

(b) construct, maintain and operate all necessary works, dams, wing dams, canals, intakes, tail-races, channels, conduits, tunnels transmission lines, structures, buildings, machinery, plant, appliances, instruments and devices, and erect and maintain poles and towers, and lay and maintain pipes, cables, wires or other conductors, and connect them with similar lines in other provinces and in the United States;

(c) manufacture, buy, sell and deal in wood, pulp, paper and articles made therefrom, machinery, engines, motors, electrical apparatus and supplies, and engage in a general manufacturing business.

You cannot conceive of anything that these gentlemen do not wish to do. These are all provincial matters, and I do not agree with the Prime Minister when he says that if both this parliament and the provincial legislature have concurrent power to grant legislation of this kind, there is no difference between this side of the House and that side. I may say for myself that there is a difference, for I think that when both legislatures have this power, the provincial legislature should have the exclusive jurisdiction over provincial matters.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. gentleman is laying stress on the policy of the Ontario government, but he has not told the House what that policy is.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. member for South Toronto explained it.

Mr. CONMEE. I think I know the policy of the Ontario government as well as most men, and there is no such policy as has been presented to this House. The Ontario government is giving charter after charter to companies to develop water-powers. When the representative of the Ontario government was before the Private Bills Committee at the time this Bill was under consideration, and was asked by one of the members if he claimed that there was the same right in the province as to a boundary water and a stream wholly within the province, his reply was that in the case of a boundary stream the rights of the province were not necessarily ousted, but there was a difference between the Nipigon river and the Pigeon river. When he was asked by myself if the land had long previously passed from the Crown, and if the riparian rights of the river were vested in a private owner, would the provincial policy be in the same position, he said that of couse that would make a difference, but he had no evidence that that was the case. Now, I think this committee has evidence that that is the case. I have refrained all along from criticising or discussing the policy of the Ontario government; but if hon. gentlemen want to draw me into a discussion of the administration of the Ontario government, I do not shrink from the task.

Mr. MACDONELL. Go on.

Mr. CONMEE. I am not going further just now in that direction. My hon. friend laboured to show that there was something in the statement made by the right hon. leader of the House which indicated that the Bill in its present form conflicted with the policy of the Ontario government. That is perhaps correct; I am not going to contravene it just now. The right hon. leader of the House was perfectly justified in taking the view he did; but what I ask is, even if that view be held with regard to the Nipigon river, there is no question of provincial rights involved in the Nipigon river. The Privy Council has held that section 92, now section 5, of the Navigable Water Protection Act, was within the jurisdiction of this parliament. Our courts have held that this parliament, and this parliament alone, has the right to deal with navigable waters. The leader of the House himself, when this Bill was at its second reading, held that the legislature had not the right to create a company to exercise the powers asked by this Bill, much less to give the power to deal with works proposed. Let me point out that this question is entirely in the hands of the government, and that we on this side have confidence in the government. Section 18 provides that nothing can be done until the plans are approved of by the Governor in Council. What is the proceeding, supposing this Bill passes with powers of expropriation as to Pigeon river? Some lawyers tell me there are no powers of expropriation in this Bill, others tell me there are.

Mr. MACDONELL. Subsection (d) of section 8 gives ample powers of expropriation.

Mr. CONMEE. I will take the hon. gentleman's word for it, I am glad to be able to agree with him for once. What I say is this, that under section 18 the procedure is defined. This company must get its plans approved of by the Board of Railway Commissioners, and before it does that it must get them ratified by the Governor in Council. It must submit a book of reference showing who the owners are, and whose rights are affected, without which no ratification will take place, either by the Governor in Council or by the Board of Railway Commissioners. If, at that stage of the proceeding, it is shown that the province of Ontario has interests that are being interfered with in any undue sense, it is entirely in the power of the government of the day to refuse to ratify the plans.

Mr. BLAIN. Is that the time to contest it? Rather would not this be the time to contest it?

Mr. CONMEE. No hon. gentleman on that side of the House has given one tittle of evidence, or quoted any judgment of the courts from which a conclusion can be drawn to support their contention; on the contrary, evidence that should not be disputed, evidence that is palpable, has been produced to show that there can be no possible contention that there are any provincial interests or provincial rights involved.

Mr. LANCASTER. I will accept the hon. gentleman's challenge at once. But first I want to address myself to the Prime Minister in regard to this question of jurisdiction; I want to emphasize what I said on Friday night about the difference between having jurisdiction and the wisdom of exercising it. The Minister of Justice says that we would have power—power to do a wrong, I daresay, in this matter. But the question of power rightly exercised and the question of jurisdiction, are entirely different things, they are entirely opposite, so far as regards the expediency of our dealing with this matter. The Prime Minister says that if the objection as to expropriation were removed, where would be the reason for not dealing with this Bill? The reason is that we are dealing with a Bill with which we have no business to deal. We are not the judges of what should be the policy of those who are rightly concerned in exercising that policy. We cannot say here what we would do if we were in the provincial legislature, we do not look at this matter with the same responsibility to the people, and therefore we do not have the same rights that the legislature would have. Now my hon. friend who is supporting this Bill just let the cat out of the bag by telling us that he differs from the policy of the provincial government in regard to these matters. That of itself ought to be a reason why we should not interfere with the policy of the provincial government.

Mr. CONMEE. I did not put it in that way; what I said was that the Ontario government had no such policy as the hon. gentleman represented, and that I had refused to criticise them on that ground.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman is talking about a subsequent statement he made. Prior to the statement he has just repeated, he challenged us that if we wanted to discuss the propriety of the policy of the Ontario government in this matter he was prepared to show that it was not a good policy.

Mr. CONMEE. I did not say that.

Mr. LANCASTER. Well, to that effect, that the policy of the Ontario government was not a good policy, which caused me to interrupt him and to say: Is that not why you are here? It must be manifest that the promoters of this Bill are here because they cannot get what they are asking for from the provincial government; that must be patent to everybody who is not a mere child. They would not be here after this legislation if they were satisfied to take what the Ontario government would give them, and I think that is confirmed by what the hon. gentleman has said. Now as to the exercise of this jurisdiction. It is contended apparently, not only by hon. gentlemen supporting this Bill, but I fancy by the Prime Minister, that if this is a navigable stream no power but the Dominion government has control of that stream or any operations upon it for navigation. That is true, I think; and here comes an answer to the challence of the hon. gentleman that we could quote no authority to show that the province had any rights in a stream that was navigable. Let me give the hon. gentleman a couple of authorities that he can find in Cartwright's Cases on the British North America Act. Let him go to the library and look up volume 2, page 542, in the case of MacMillan versus Southwest Boom Company, where the decision is in these words:

Subsection 10, of section 91, of the British North America Act gives the right merely to prescribe rules and regulations for vessels navigating the waters of the Dominion, and not as excluding for all purposes provincial jurisdiction over navigable waters.

Mr. CONMEE. Does the hon. gentleman seriously wish to assert that I have set up any contention of that kind? My argument was that the Ontario legislature has not the power to deal with the question embodied in this Bill.

Mr. LANCASTER. Now, the question embodied in this Bill, so far as jurisdiction goes, is whether the Ontario government has power to deal with this stream, it being admitted to be a navigable stream.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is not the point.

Mr. LANCASTER. I think that is the point. If it is a navigable stream, this government has supreme jurisdiction in reference to navigation. But this case I have just quoted shows that section 91 of the British North America Act does not transfer a river to the Dominion jurisdiction merely because it is navigable, but only gives the right to prescribe rules and regulations for vessels navigating the waters of the Dominion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In my judgment the paramount consideration in this matter is not whether the Pigeon river is navigable—I do not know whether it is or not—but the paramount consideration is that it is an international stream.

Mr. LANCASTER. Before coming to that, I will give another authority to my hon. friend so that he may see there is evidence, and that he need not challenge anybody hereafter to produce it. In the case of the Central Vermont Railway vs. St. Johns, 4 Cartwright, page 331, it is held:

The control over navigation conferred on the Dominion parliament by the British North America Act does not prevent the provincial legislature from exercising municipal and police control on navigable waters.

The principle is the same; there is a certain amount of control and interest vested in the province in regard to any stream within the province, that is not required to be exercised in regard to the protection of it for navigation purposes. Let us be clear on this point. My hon. friend, or the promoters of this Bill, are not asking for anything that interferes with navigation, that is to say, in regard to the jurisdiction that this government possesses. He is not chartering a line of ships, or wanting to build wharfs or anything else affecting navigation and trade and commerce, things which are meant to be covered by the British North America Act. But he is giving a commercial company power to produce goods, to sell, to produce commodities, to make profits out of them, which he has a right to do, a commendable right to do, or his promoters have, if they go to the proper place for the power. Now it is not necessary for any one to have a Dominion charter to manufacture anything in this country and sell it in another country; it is no more necessary for him to have a Dominion charter to manufacture and sell one thing in this country than another.

The Canadian Niagara Power Company is doing business on the Niagara river to-day under provincial jurisdiction alone. It came to this parliament and asked for a charter but it finally withdrew the application when it found Dominion government legislation was not necessary. It did not want rights that the Ontario government would not give it and it is carrying on practically the same business as my hon. friend's incorporators want to carry on under the powers of this parliament. It is, I fancy, the largest concern there is in this line of business. It is operating solely under provincial charter, upon a navigable river and upon an international boundary —not navigable at the point where it is operating, but certainly international, and when the right hon. prime minister raises the point as to this river being navigable and international, both are covered by the case of the Niagara river. No one can say that the Niagara river is not an international boundary. This company is to-day doing the very kind of business on a very large scale under a provincial charter that the hon. gentleman's incorporators ask us to permit them to do by a Dominion charter. There is no necessity of this charter for the purpose of doing anything over which the Dominion has control, that is over navigation. I repeat that if this charter were being asked for in regard to marine matters, in regard to vessels, shipping or wharfs, or anything having to do with navigation, there might be some reason for saying that we should grant it. But this matter has nothing to do with navigation and therefore our powers in regard to navigation cannot be exercised. Even as the Prime Minister says, if this is an international stream, all they ask to do can be done under a provincial charter. They can manufacture their goods and export them the same as the Canadian Niagara Power Company is doing to-day. They are subject to no Dominion law but one and that is in regard to the exportation of power. They can manufacture it under a provincial charter just the same as any other man can manufacture clothing, or axes, or anything else that he has a charter from the provincial government to manufacture and he does not need to come to the Dominion. There seems to me to be no possible ground left for argument that there is any need to come to this parliament for a charter at all and, holding that view, I think that we ought not to pass even what we think is a harmless part of this Bill. I cannot see how we make it any better by passing clauses which we think do not do much harm. We are not the judges as to whether they do or do not. It is a question for the province as a matter of policy and of knowledge because they must be the best judges of their own affairs. In dealing with provincial assets, with provincial rights, with revenue from royalties and from other assets, the right of manufacturing electricity from water-power, which is certainly a valuable privilege each province has the right to decide those questions for itself and when we are asked to deal with them at all we ought to refuse to do so and not pass such a Bill as this on the simple asertion that it would appear that the clause is harmless.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The hon. member for Thunder Bay and Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) seems to be of the opinion that the proprietary interest in the Canadian side of the Pigeon river lies within the jurisdiction of the province. I would like to know if that is his opinion.

Mr. CONMEE. My answer to that would be that it belongs at present to the riparian owners of the land along the shore and that the government parted with any interest they ever had in 1856.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If the contention of the hon. gentleman is right then these riparian owners could prevent navigation and shipping. If the proprietary interest in the waters belongs to the riparian owners they might prevent navigation and shipping in any form.

Mr. CONMEE. I would answer that question by saying 'no,' that the riparian owners have not control over the waters. I am advised that there is no such thing as ownership in waters. The Privy Council, in a decision which has been read in this debate, decided that the parliament of Canada alone has the legislative jurisdiction over not only boundary streams but over navigable streams. I will read a sentence here from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada on that point. This was the case of the Queddy River Driving and Boom Company vs. Davidson, 1883, 3 Cartwright, page 243. Mr. Justice Strong in that case, at page 257 of the law reports, used this language:

No one can deny that by subsection 10 of section 91 of the British North America Act, exclusive power to legislate respecting navigation is conferred on the parliament of Canada, and as little is it open to any one to dispute that this power respecting navigation includes the exclusive right to legislate so as to authorize an obstruction in a navigable public river.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I thought that the hon. gentleman had come to a wrong conclusion. The hon. gentleman has apparently come to the conclusion, that, because the British North America Act gave the Dominion parliament certain power with respect to navigation and shipping, therefore it gave them a proprietary interest in the waters of the river. The reverse is held to be the case. The law, as I understand it, is that unless you can show a proprietary interest in rivers and waters which have been transferred from the ownership of the provincial legislature to that of the Dominion legislature by virtue of the British North America Act, the proprietary rights which the province formerly enjoyed still remain vested in the province, and that the only right that the Dominion government can assume is in respect of navigation and shipping. It has been held in many cases that under the words 'navigation and shipping' the Dominion does not acquire a proprietary interest in waters but has simply the right to regulate navigation and shipping in those waters. I would point to the case referred to by my hon. friend from Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) of the Vermont Central Railway vs. the town of St. Johns. In that case the town of St. Johns had passed a by-law extending its corporation limits to the centre of the Richelieu river. Across the Richelieu river there had been erected a bridge and the town claimed the right to assess one half of the bridge because they say it lay within the corporation of St. Johns. They did assess it and the company appealed against the assessment on the ground that it was a navigable river and also upon the ground that the corporation had no right to make that assessment. But the court upheld the contention of the town and held that the town was the owner of the river bed to the centre of the river. The Chief Justice in that case summed up as follows, and I would like my hon. friend to follow this:

Navigation and shipping are words used by the British North America Act. That does not mean the river at all. The river itself belongs to the local Crown domain.

That seems to put it quite clearly, that the river itself belongs to the local Crown domain. How do we apply that to the present case? That means that one half of the bed of the river belongs to the local Crown domain, the local Crown domain is the province of Ontario, and once you give this company proprietary or expropriation rights you are interfering with the rights of the province in one half of that river.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. If my hon. friend is right in saying that was granted by the Crown in 1856, how could it belong to the province in 1856?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. According to this decision the river itself belongs to the local Crown domain and my hon. friend says a private person can have no proprietary rights in water. That is quite true. Therefore, if private parties can have no proprietary rights in water it still remains that the river itself belongs to the local Crown domain under the decision I have referred to.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. Cannot the Crown grant it?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. But even if the right is granted against the province you could not take half of this river.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. But if the Crown granted it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. My hon. friend said the Crown had no right to grant what the individual had no right to own, a proprietary interest in a river.

Mr. CONMEE. Does the hon. member attribute that language to me?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I have to accept my hon. friend's explanation but I understood him to say that.

Mr. CONMEE. I never even thought of such an argument as that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I recollect quite distinctly that the other day the hon gentleman argued that because the river was a navigable river, authority over it was exclusively within the Dominion jurisdiction.

Mr. CONMEE. I argued that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Now he says that the river at the point where he wishes to exercise proprietary rights, is bounded on each side by rocky cliffs and therefore cannot be navigable. I thus fail to see how he can give this parliament jurisdiction because it is a navigable river.

Mr. CONMEE. The parliament of Canada in 1856 and 1857 laid out a canal and the levels, profiles, plans and everything in connection with building locks right along this very river are of record in the department here, so it is a navigable river in every sense.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Does the hon. gentleman raise any claim to jurisdiction of this parliament because of the Pigeon river being a navigable river?

Mr. CONMEE. My contention all along has been that this parliament, and this parliament alone, has legislative jurisdiction over boundary rivers, and in my judgment over navigable rivers. That has been my argument and I do not recede from it at all.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I do not think my hon. friend's contention is in line with the contention of the first minister, who a few minutes ago said he did not place any reliance upon this parliament having jurisdiction because it was a navigable river, he based his contention on its being an international river. With respect to the Pigeon river being an international river I fail to see yet, subject to conversion hereafter, why the mere fact that the Pigeon river is an international river gives this parliament exclusive jurisdiction. I would ask the hon. gentleman opposite if the province of Ontario could not give the promoter of this Bill just as great rights to build his plant to the boundary line between this country and the United States as this parliament can?

Mr. CONMEE. No.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. It has been done in other cases?

Mr. CONMEE. No.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Under the legislation of the province of Ontario my hon. friend could build his lines right to the boundary line, but if he wanted to go one inch further he would have to go to the government of a foreign country to obtain greater powers, just as if legislation was passed by this parliament, and he would then later come before this parliament. In order to give this parliament jurisdiction we have to insert the words 'for the general advantage of Canada,' and if that clause had been retained this parliament would have had jurisdiction; but I am glad to say that the Minister of Justice has seen fit to declare that the work is not for the general benefit of Canada, and not being for the general benefit of Canada we have the right to assume that the company is local in its undertaking. I do not think any hon. gentleman can undertake to say it is not local, and for this reason it cannot gain by authority of this parliament what the province of Ontario can not give it. I grant further that if the company were seeking power to carry lines from one province into another this parliament would have jurisdiction, because we have the right of jurisdiction to legislate and give power to a company to build lines into an adjoining province, but not to go beyond the international boundary. This company is confined exclusively to the province of Ontario, and its works not being declared for the general advantage of Canada why not relegate it entirely to the province of Ontario, to which they beong?

Leaving the question of jurisdiction, we have in Ontario a hydro-electric commission inaugurated for the very purpose of developing such natural resources as are proposed to be given to this company, and can any hon. gentleman say that the province of Ontario will not administer these assets more in the interests of Ontario than would the promoters and members of this company. I take the broad ground that it is beyond doubt more advantageous to the people of Ontario to have the hydro-electric commission administer these water-powers. I fail to see why we should interfere in this matter at all. When the Bill first came up owing to the strenuous objections of members on this side of the House some of the objectionable features were removed, but I contend that we should now leave the matter entirely in the hands of the local legislature and let them deal with it in accordance with their policy.

Mr. MAGRATH. I have a good deal of sympathy for the promoter of this Bill in his effort to hold up his end against legal men on this side. I would ask the leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if the Canadian section of the International Waterways Commission have been asked to pass upon this measure?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am not aware that they have.

Mr. CONMEE. The Bill provides that before anything is done the plans must be ratified by the Waterways Commission.

Mr. MAGRATH. We have the Waterways Commission which was called into existence by an Act of the Congress of the United States of June 13, 1902, which calls upon Canada to join in the appointment of a joint commissioner to deal with the waters which discharge into the Atlantic ocean by the St. Lawrence river. The waters dealt with in this Bill are covered by that Act of Congress. That commission has reported to the government from time to time as to the method of dealing with international waters. I find in a report addressed to the Minister of Public Works in 1906 this statement:

Diversions of international waters elsewhere than at Niagara river or the Niagara peninsula should only be permitted;

(a) For domestic purposes and for the service of locks in navigation canals;

(b) Temporary diversions, where the water taken is returned again, only on the recommendation of the joint commission.

Now that commission likewise in a report to the Minister of Public Works in March, 1908, used this language when dealing with the Niagara Falls situation:

While we think it should be a condition of the charters of all companies hereafter incorporated in Canada that the power generated should be distributed wholly in this country—

There is no misunderstanding that language. We are endeavouring in this Bill to dispose of some waters that belong to somebody. Some gentlemen claim that they belong to the province of Ontario; others claim that they should be dealt with by this House. Assuming that they should be dealt with by this government, I would like to know if there is any department of our government engaged in their administration. They are the most valuable asset we possess. They will last as long as the country lasts; they will furnish us with our power, light and heat in the future. These water-powers must have some value. To some minds they have a very great value; but it appears to me that the parliament of Canada, not only at present, but in the past, has been disposing too freely of the valuable assets of this country. As long as I have a seat in this House I am going to oppose that in every possible way. The waters of this country belong to the people of this country, and they should be conserved for the benefit of the people; and the waters which are within the boundaries of the province of Ontario should be handled by that province. For these reasons I am determinedly opposed to any Bill of this kind. The purpose of this company is to export this power. The government has an opinion from one of their own officials that that should not be done, and in view of that fact, why should the time of parliament be taken up in discussing this matter? The utmost ignorance exists with regard to the extent of this water-power, and I am decidedly opposed to it being handed over to a private company.

At one o'clock committee adjourned.

Committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. MACDONELL. We all agree in the Prime Minister's statement that a great deal of time has been taken up with the discussion of this Bill and that it should be disposed of as soon as possible, but the loss of time is the fault not of the committee but of the promoter of the Bill. The Prime Minister contended that because the Pigeon river is an international stream, its waters flowing between Canada and the state of Minnesota, this parliament is, ipso facto, given jurisdiction over it. I do not accede to that statement as there is no authority for such a proposition in either the British North America Act or any judicial decision of which I am aware. I take the view that if these are provincial waters, as I believe they are, the Dominion has no greater rights of an international nature than the provinces would have, that is that the British authority on this side of the line cannot invade the territorial waters or the jurisdiction of the state of Minnesota, and that the Crown in right of the province of Ontario is the proper tribunal to deal with these questions, if it is necessary to have dealings with the United States. The Canadian right in that respect is vested in the province just as it was before confederation, and by virtue of section 109 of the British North America Act the province is continued in its ownership of the land over which the water flows. It seems folly to say that this parliament has the right to grant the powers asked for by this Bill when it is evident upon the face of the legislation that the regulation of all such matters, the regulation of municipal and police matters and the enforcement of law, all fall within the provincial domain. I ask the right hon. gentleman to consider this matter in the same way. I again call his attention to the conditon on the Niagara river where we have the pioneer company, the Canadian Niagara Power Company, originally getting a charter in 1892 from the province of Ontario and operating under that charter ever since.

Mr. CONMEE. I am informed on very good authority that that company has come here and obtained a charter since then.

Mr. MACDONELL. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CONMEE. The evidence will show it has done that.

Mr. MACDONELL. There is no such legislation to be found in the statutes of Canada. The Canadian Electrical Development Company and the Ontario Company, which are the only other two companies operating on the Niagara river, went first to the Ontario government and made a bargain with that province before coming here and that is what we ask these promoters to do, to make their bargain with the province of Ontario and then come here as the other companies came to have their bargains ratified and incorporated in our statutes, then if any difference arises between the parties to the bargain, the province of Ontario and the company, the matter can come before a more or less independent tribunal, the parliament of Canada. The elimination of the Nipigon river modifies the intensity of the opposition to this Bill but in its relation to the Pigeon river it is still objectionable.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. gentleman says that all other companies have acquired agreements from the province of Ontario before coming here. I have here the Act of the Ontario and Erie Power Company, a company incorporated here, and there is not one word in that Act with regard to any agreement with the province.

Mr. LANCASTER. That company is not in operation at all.

Mr. CONMEE. But its charter was granted.

Mr. LANCASTER. It is not operating and never has operated.

Mr. CONMEE. And that charter has been renewed twice. The hon. gentleman allowed it to be renewed this year and did not say a word against it.

Mr. LANCASTER. It does not contain the same clause as this.

Mr. CONMEE. The same clause exactly from the Railway Act and it gives a great deal wider powers. It gives the company power to take the waters of the Welland river and the Jordan river and to divert them through to Lake Ontario, to widen these rivers and take them out of their regular course. It also gives the company power to take the waters of Lake Erie and to divert them into Lake Ontario. There is no comparison between the scope of their Act and the one now before the House.

Mr. MACDONELL. The Erie Bill passed this House some years ago but the company has never gone into operation. They propose to take water from a system of waters known as the Welland canal. The Welland river is part of the Welland canal waterway, which, as we all know, is a work not only within the jurisdiction of this parliament but constructed by this parliament and they had to come here to obtain power to use the waters of the Welland canal.

Mr. CONMEE. What about Lake Erie and the Jordan river?

Mr. MACDONELL. The Jordan river is practically part of the Welland canal system too.

Mr. LANCASTER. The canal is not only a Dominion work but a Dominion-owned work.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Admitting for the sake of argument—and of course we do not admit it—that this parliament has exclusive jurisdiction to deal with this question and that the provinces have no jurisdiction whatever, should not this government have some policy in regard to this and similar assets? We ought to have a declaration of policy from the govenment. Is it their policy to alienate to private companies these important assets, suppose they do belong to the Dominion? I have heard a great deal about the policy of the Ontario government in an opposite direction, and we ought to have some declaration with regard to the policy of this government. Is it their policy to alienate in perpetuity valuable public assets to private companies?

Mr. BARR. At this late stage of the session, when we are anxious to bring our work to a close, it is very unfortunate that this Bill should be brought up again. When the right hon. gentleman turned it down the other day, we thought we had heard the last of it for this session at least, but we have it popping up again like an irrepressible jack-in-the-box. The legal aspect of the question has been fully discussed, and I do not think it can be seriously pretended that this government has exclusive jurisdiction. Even if the British North America Act be strained to give it some jurisdiction, at least the Ontario government have rights in these water-powers within their own province, and ought to be left free to deal with them. We are told that the Bill passed the committee, but we must remember that it passed at a rather stormy meeting and contrary to the vote of the Ontario members, both Liberal and Conservative. It only passed by virtue of the vote of members from the other provinces who are not directly interested and who were drummed up for that purpose. I know that Ontario members on the Liberal side remained away and refused to vote for the Bill but did not like to appear and vote against it out of regard for my hon. friend the promoter of the Bill (Mr. Conmee). I hope that no one imagines that we on this side oppose the measure because my hon. friend is the promoter. We would oppose it just as strongly if it were put forward by an hon. member on this side. We are opposing it on principle, because we believe it is of vital importance to the province of Ontario that that province should have control in this matter, and if necessary we are prepared to oppose it from day to day and thus prolong this session which we all desire to see brought to an end. I think the right hon. the Prime Minister has been ill advised in giving his consent to have this Bill brought up again. We must remember that the company in question is largely controlled by American citizens, who will no doubt, in the working out of the measure place the interest of their own country first. Let me remind the House that when the Niagara Power Company Bill was brought in a year ago, we took the precaution to provide that only the surplus power should be sold on the other side of the line, but no such precaution is taken in this measure, and the company may sell the greater part of its power in the United States. Under the circumstances, the Bill is a most dangerous one. The Ontario government have appointed an electric commission which has done good work in the province of Ontario, and that policy has been endorsed by an overwhelming majority of the free and independent electors of that province. If there is one Act more than another of the Ontario government which the people appreciate it is their reserving of these powers for the province. Under the circumstances, it would be a blunder and a crime against the province of Ontario if we should pass this Bill. This House ought not to put itself in a hostile attitude to any province. We ought to remember that our water-powers are the greatest assets which our provinces possess. They are the white coal of the country, to which we look to take the place of the ordinary coal when that is exhausted. Under the circumstances we ought to be very careful not to give a perpetual franchise which will take this power out of the province altogether. This is one of the greatest water-powers we have in that part of the country. Without going into the legal question, it seems to me that the province is better fitted to deal with this asset than is the Dominion parliament. Charters of this kind are usually given by the Ontario government; and if this session be delayed on account of this Bill, the responsibility must rest on this government.

Mr. LENNOX. My hon. friend who is promoting the Bill made two propositions a moment ago, and I think only two mistakes. One of his statements was that the Canadian Niagara Power Company, although refused a charter in the first instance, had come to this parliament again and obtained one. If that is the case it would have been very easy for the hon. gentleman to have proved his statement. But let me point out that when that company applied for a charter the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) opposed its application, and after having pointed out that he had done so at the instance of a number of influential Liberals and others in his own riding and elsewhere in the province of Ontario, he succeeded in getting a few weeks adjournment, and the Bill never came forward again. The company withdrew its application and so the matter ended as it should have done. That was one of the hon. gentleman's propositions during his last speech. But it did not apply prejudicially to the company, a company carrying on business effectively and successfully, and the largest business of any of the development companies that exist on the Niagara river, and so far as I know, they are experiencing no difficulty. The hon. gentleman also referred to the Ontario Power Company. I think he should have left the Ontario Power Company alone, because we have before us the report of the commission appointed by this government to look after our water-powers and international streams. The commission is composed of Mr. Geo. C. Gibbins, Mr. Louis Coste, and Mr. Wm. J. Stewart. We have their supplemental report; and I would think that the members who support the government and the government would be prepared to abide in the main by the recommendations of their commission. They deal with this Ontario Power Company, and they point out how unfortunate it is that these three companies were incorporated and given such large powers before public attention had been directed to the importance of keeping these great sources of wealth in the control of the provinces. It is important that the government should pay some heed to the statements contained in this report, and I will take the liberty of referring to a few of them. Later on, if the government does not see fit to adhere to the proposition of the Prime Minister on the 19th of April last, and if he is disposed to recede from the position taken that evening, I shall have occasion to refer more at length to the contents of this report. In the meantime they say:

> It is manifest that some arrangement must be arrived at between the two countries with regard to the regulation and use of the boundary waters, otherwise chaos will prevail. At Niagara, on each side of the river, charters had been granted under which water in unlimited quantities could have been taken at points further up the river. On our side it was sought to use the Chippewa river to drain the waters of Niagara into a new outlet—a canal to be built to a point near St. David's. Another Canadian charter sought to divert the waters of Lake Erie to a point near Jordan.

That is the Ontario Power Company.

> On the New York side there was no limitation to the water which could be taken under several charters.

Now here is what these gentlemen say with reference to this matter:

> All these proposed developments would affect, more or less seriously, the level of Lake Erie, and all are objectionable on that account, and wholly opposed to the principle adopted by the commission.

What is the government going to do about it? Are they going to let the recommendations of this committee go for nothing, or are they going to abide by their recommendations? The committee say further:

> The diversion of 10,000 cubic feet per second would have a more serious effect upon the level of Lake Erie than the diversion from Lake Michigan, at Chicago, of a like amount. It would mean the reduction of the lake level by more than six inches.

So we are not here to justify the Ontario Power Company, we are here to show that before the attention of the people had been called to this question, three power companies had been incorporated in reference to the Niagara river, and it is a most unfortunate thing that these three power companies were incorporated at that time. But as they are incorporated, it is for the government to see to it that no further companies are incorporated with a like result. In reference to another proposition that the hon. gentleman and some other hon. gentlemen, have repeated, let me show what this commission says, after speaking of international waters:

> Neither company has any right of property, but only a right of user, in these flowing waters.

Further on they say:

> It, perhaps, would have been wise if development had been limited to the generation of electricity for distribution in Canada.

That is the position I took the other evening, that is the position I take now, and that I intend to maintain, namely: That it is not in the interest of Canada or the Canadian people that we should transmit power to the United States to help build up American industries at the expense of our own development. If, by a proper protective tariff, as has been shown, and I called the right hon. gentleman's attention to it the other day, 134 large firms in the United States have been compelled to plant large industries in Canada, if that is in the interest of Canada, and undoubtedly it is, is it not in the interest of Canada, where we have this God-given power in the great rivers and water falls we possess, that we should keep that power within our own hands, and compel people who want to benefit by the natural resources of Canada to come into our territory, and build up our markets and our country by establishing industries within our own limits? Now they say it would have been wise if development had been limited to the generation of electricity for distribution in Canada, and add:

> In that case we would most likely have had only one corporation up to this time, and, moreover, would have had the Canadian market fully supplied.

Now I particularly desire to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to this position taken by this commission. At page 15 they say:

> The control over one-half of the production would undoubtedly supply all the demands of our Canadian market for many years to come, and it would not be any great hardship upon the companies to compel them to jointly or severally build the necessary transmission lines to care for the same.

The commission is here dealing with the three companies that had already been incorporated, and they are pointing out that although certain rights have been conceded to these companies, it is inadvisable that they should be allowed to other companies making application, or to this company now making application, the first since this report has been brought in. The commission had knowledge of the fact that my hon. friend had a Bill of this class, and they point out that it is not advisable to have any further companies incorporated in Canada. They say:

> While we think it should be a condition of the charters of all companies hereafter incorporated in Canada that the power generated should be distributed wholly in this country, that principle cannot with fairness be applied to these corporations at Niagara Falls.

So the whole result of the argument of the commission is that we cannot apply the proper principle to the three companies who have already acquired vested rights in regard to the export of power, but that to all future companies we should apply the principle that no export shall be permitted to the United States.

> It would be monstrous if all but 40,000 or 50,000 horse-power of the total 400,000 development should find a market in New York State. The public in western Ontario are thoroughly aroused against this threatened injustice.

I do not so much appeal to the right hon. first minister because naturally—and I do not say this offensively—I cannot get his ear to the same extent as can his loyal and faithful supporters. But, whilst I urge upon him most respectfully to take a broader view of this question I also protest against our acting in such a way as shall prevent any province from developing, for the benefit of its own people, the natural resources of that province.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I would like to press my question upon the first minister. Admitting, for the sake of argument, the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dominion, admitting, that the province has no power at all, is it wisdom on our part to alienate these water-powers to a company in perpetuity without providing for some compensation, or for the right to collect royalty, or without regulation of any kind except as provided in this Bill? What is the policy that should actuate us in dealing with these water-powers and other natural resources and in disposing of them to private companies?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have expressed more than once what the views of the government are on this matter and I am sorry if I have failed to make myself understood. As to the question of jurisdiction we claim that it is vested in this parliament. I have said again and again that I thought we had the power to deal with this Bill. The question which is in the mind of my hon. friend (Mr. S. Sharpe) is the question of the right of expropriation. Shall we allow this company to expropriate these water-powers or not? That is a matter which would not logically come up under this clause. I have stated to the promoter of the Bill that on this point I have an open mind and that I would not decide the matter one way or the other. Until we reach this point I do not think it is proper for me to offer any advice. I keep a perfectly open mind. The government have not formulated a policy upon this matter because we have had very little opportunity of dealing with such questions. It is admitted that in dealing with the Nipigon river, though a navigable stream, we should defer to the provincial government, but with regard to an international stream we certainly have the control in our own hands. Whether or not we should allow this company to take the power of expropriation is a matter as to which we should reserve our views until we come to the discussion of the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Mr. Chairman, the Bill before the committee has been discussed at very great length and I have no doubt that all that can be said on the subject has been said. The argument that is of compelling force, to my mind, has, however, not been put as expressly as I would hope to put it. If I can succeed in presenting it I shall be very brief and I trust that I shall have the ear of those who are closely concerned with this measure. I fancy the right hon. first minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) misapprehends, in to a very great degree, the basis upon which the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) founds his claim to exclusive jurisdiction in this parliament. The Minister of Justice founded his claim upon an asseveration that this Bill embodies in its form an assertion of power to export the product that the company proposes to manufacture; that is to say, that by virtue of the power embodied in the Bill to export power to other provinces and across the line, by virtue of that clause and that clause alone, this parliament has jurisdiction. If the first minister will look at the speech of the Minister of Justice he will find that it was on that ground that the Minister of Justice based his assertion and his conclusions that this parliament alone had jurisdiction. The Minister of Justice, in pressing that claim, admitted that if this company, promoted by the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Conmee), had gone to the provincial government of Ontario and had obtained a charter, leaving out entirely the clause which asks for power to export to other countries and other provinces, the company would, having obtained its charter, have, by virtue of what is called in the legal profession, the comity of nations, power to export to other provinces and other countries just the same as if the clause had been included. The position of the Minister of Justice then is that the inclusion of this clause in the Bill confers on us exclusive jurisdiction, but that if the clause were out and the Bill then went to the legislature of Ontario, which, in that event, would have the exclusive jurisdiction (because there is no such thing as concurrent jurisdiction), then the company would have the power which my hon. friend claims for it. Well, if that is so, if the argument of the Minister of Justice is right, the only reason for the inclusion in the Bill of this particular clause asking for power to export to other provinces and other countries is to confer upon this House exclusive jurisdiction. It is admitted that if that were not there those powers could be granted, aside entirely from what I might call the obiter dicta of the Minister of Justice in his remarks, by the Ontario legislature and they alone and the company would have all the powers they desired and could exercise them just the same as if this Bill had passed this House.

Now, the Minister of Justice, in opening his remarks, about two weeks ago, stated that in his opinion this work was not for the general advantage of Canada, and he said that in his opinion it was unwise and not right for this parliament to insert what was on its face incorrect, and consequently that he had advised the hon. member for Rainy River to leave that out. He deprecated the principle of importing into a Bill a fiction for the purpose of giving this parliament jurisdiction. I accept that principle in its entirety and I think all the members of this House will accept it as far as it goes. But, press it a litle farther and what is the effect of it? The hon. member for Rainy River brings exclusive jurisdiction into this parliament by includng in this Bill a clause asking for power to export to other countries and other provinces. Is not that a fiction? The Minister of Justice told us that we had no right, now that the Bill had passed the committee, to question the bona fides of the promoters of the Bill, to question the bona fides of their intention to export power to other countries and other provinces. I do not question their bona fides, but no matter what company comes here and asks for power it can, with equal bona fides, place in its Bill an application for power to export to other provinces and other countries. That can be put in with equal bona fides by all companies. Therefore, I say it amounts purely to a fiction. There is no necessity of giving any opinion whatever upon the admission of the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice and the government are quite willing to lay down the principle that it is not right, that it is bad policy for this House to import one fiction into a Bill for the purpose of giving it jurisdiction, but that it is all right to import another. I, as one member of this House, would wish to exercise no jurisdiction that is based upon such a flimsy excuse as that. It would simply amount to this: that we, by virtue of a clause which any company in the world would be justified, in all good faith, in inserting in its Bill, could, in every case, assert to ourselves exclusive jurisdiction and make that, not a reason because it would not be a reason, but simply an excuse for passing such Bill in this House.

Mr. CONMEE. How does the hon. member deal with the fact of the development being upon an international stream and that the works must extend from side to side of the river so that the water must be affected on the American as well as on the Canadian side.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I quite appreciate the point raised by my hon. friend, and I appreciate also his anxiety to get away from the point I am now discussing. The Minister of Justice did mention that, but at present I am simply arguing that the basis laid down by the Minister of Justice as bringing into this House the exclusive jurisdiction was not a basis on which it was within the domain of this House to act.

Mr. CONMEE. Where do you find that in 'Hansard ?'

Mr. MEIGHEN. The hon. gentleman has experience in questioning members on this side of the House as to what appears in 'Hansard' but he seems not to have profited by the experience. On page 4592 'Hansard,' April 19, the Minister of Justice stated:

I have not made my meaning clear to my hon. friend if he thinks my remarks do not apply to the Nipigon river. This Bill proposes, as I have pointed out, to incorporate a company to manufacture electric energy by water-power on the Pigeon river and on the Nipigon river, and the electric energy so manufactured, no matter whether on the Nipigon or on the Pigeon, this Bill proposes that the company shall have the power to transmit and sell for use at any place in the United States. There is no distinction, on the face of the Bill, between the power to be manufactured by the water of Pigeon river and that which is to be manufactured by the water of the Nipigon river. I speak without knowledge but my supposition is that the company do not intend to distinguish at all, in their operation, between the power manufactured at the one place and that manufactured at the other. The Nipigon is some 60 miles to the eastward of the cities of Port Arthur and Fort William, the Pigeon river is some 40 or 50 miles on the other side.

To abbreviate, the Minister of Justice goes on to argue that there is no distinction between one river and the other; basing his argument on the fact that the power to export is included, and, at page 4593 'Hansard,' in answer to a question by the member for West Algoma, the Minister of Justice said:

The hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Boyce) asks me if in my opinion the fact that this Bill empowers the company to sell its products beyond the boundaries of the province gives this parliament exclusive jurisdiction over it. If I am to answer that question exactly as it is put, I would say yes. At the same time it is a legal question by no means free from doubt and one which has been recently under consideration.

He goes on to argue that it will likely not be until it comes before the Privy Council in England that that question will be finally decided, although he gave his opinion without qualification to this House. It is true, as the hon. member (Mr. Conmee) has said and is just about to say again, that on the same page of 'Hansard' the Minister of Justice does state that because the Pigeon river is an international stream this House has exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. CONMEE. Does my hon. friend not see—without using any offensive language—that his argument is unfair. He is picking out from the remarks of the Minister of Justice a reply to a question put by the member for West Algoma with regard to the export of power. That is only incidental to the argument of the Minister of Justice and not a part of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN. It is the whole basis of his argument, and that is why the question was put by the member for West Algoma. In the body of his argument the Minister of Justice did state that the fact that the Pigeon river was an international stream gave exclusive jurisdiction to this parliament, but the hon. member (Mr. Conmee) will also see that in the body of that argument the Minister of Justice goes into no details. He gives nothing on which he bases that conclusion whereas in the other case he built up the entire construction of the speech he made to this House and goes into the most explicit details. But, supposing that we were to grant that this is an international stream and that consequently for certain purposes exclusive jurisdiction is in this parliament, will the Minister of Justice, or will any lawyer on the other side of the House deny that the province of Ontario would have power to incorporate a company that would build a dam, at least to the international boundary in the middle of the stream. Certainly, Ontario would have that power. Has this parliament of Canada any further power? Has this parliament of Canada any power to incorporate a company to build past the middle of the stream? Surely not. Surely there is jurisdiction in the province of Ontario in so far as the purposes of a purely local and commercial undertaking are concerned to go just as far as the Dominion of Canada in that respect. Now then, to get to the kernel of the contention of the hon. gentleman—if there is any kernel to his contention—if after this company has obtained from the province of Ontario power to build to the middle of the stream; after they have obtained from the adjoining states to the south power to build to the same point from the American boundary, then, if any power to connect so as to utilize the two together be necessary to come from this House, which I very much doubt, then doubtless this company can come to this House and get that power. In that way we will grant all the power that it is necessary for us to grant and we will not interfere with the policy of the Ontario or any other province. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Conmee) only wants to come to this House for power to connect, and that is all he can come to this House for without interfering with provincial rights; if he wants to come to this House for such legislation then probably he would succeed because the principle of provincial rights would be in no way impaired thereby. The company he wishes power for would get at least all the power that the province of Ontario under their well endorsed policy could give them and that is all this company has any right to have or that this parliament has any right to give them. I have said as much as I intend to say on that point. I have not perhaps gone into this question quite as fully as my hon. friend (Mr. Conmee) but sometimes by simply listening to his argument and by simply watching the very many beautiful manœuverings of my hon. friend (Mr. Conmee) one can come to a conclusion perhaps more quickly and just as sound as he could by going into the authorities for himself.

Mr. CARVELL. I have listened to this argument and have read pretty carefully the debate which took place on the 19th of April, and I am forced to the conclusion that this seems to be a dispute between the supporters of the Ontario government on the one side and the hon. member for Rainy River on the other. But there are other members in this House who are compelled to vote upon this question and we are therefore justified in giving our reasons for our belief. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has not done himself justice this afternoon, and I want to say that he is usually very fair and very logical in his arguments. He cited from the speech of the Minister of Justice, but he only cited from that speech the remarks in reference to the exportation of electricity. I do not think that was fair, because had he gone to the bottom of the same page he would have found the reason upon which the Minister of Justice had based his conclusion and which was this same subsection 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act, which contains certain exceptions as to the authority of the local legislatures, one of which exceptions is:

> Local works and undertakings, other than such as are of the following classes:—
> (a) Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province.

The Minister of Justice went on to explain this point, and in his judgment it came within the exceptions of subsection 10 of section 92, because it was a work extending beyond the limits of the province of Ontario, and therefore the jurisdiction could only be in this parliament. I will read his words:

> At all events that is the proposition on the face of the Bill, and the observations I have made apply as much to the water-power at Nipigon as to that on the Pigeon river. I cannot understand how water-power could be utilized on the Pigeon river otherwise than by the construction of a dam across that river, which would have one end necessarily on American soil, and this parliament alone would have the power to incorporate a company for that purpose.

Had my hon. friend quoted that portion——

Mr. MEIGHEN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I stated clearly that the minister had made that statement.

Mr. CARVELL. Well, I will leave the House to judge whether the hon. member read that as he started to do, or whether after he was challenged he made a statement somewhat along those lines. However, that is a small matter, the question is to get at the facts. We are told that the Pigeon river is about 300 feet across, and that there is a water-fall at that point; so that in order to develop power it would be necessary to erect a dam across the river. I cannot make the argument any stronger than the Minister of Justice made it. In view of the fact that to develop a water-power it would be necessary to build a dam across the river, it is certain that the legislature of Ontario has no jurisdiction and that this parliament alone has jurisdiction. I am content to take the ground taken by the right hon. first minister, that when we are dealing with international rivers, this parliament should have jurisdiction and it should not be relegated to any provincial legislature. I believe the underlying principle of our constitution is that certain rights are given to the provinces and the residue remains with the federal government; that is the distinction between our constitution and that of the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Does the hon. gentleman contend that this parliament can create a company to build a dam all the way across a navigable river?

Mr. CARVELL. Certainly not; but if this work can only be carried on by building a dam across the Pigeon river, it comes under subsection 10 of section 92, under which this parliament only has jurisdiction.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Just to connect the two ends.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend tries to get around that, because, if I understand his argument, it is that the incorporators should get power from the province of Ontario to build across the Ontario half of the river, and then get power from the State of Minnesota to build the other half, and then they would have to come here to get that ratified. He admits by his argument that the final jurisdiction over this work rests in this parliament. Then our friends say that we are interfering with the avowed policy of the province of Ontario. Personally I do not believe in public ownership. If the people of Ontario want their water-powers managed and controlled by the province, I have no quarrel with them; but I would like to know if the followers of the Ontario government go so far as to contend that all water-powers in the province, whether owned by the province or by private individuals, should be controlled and operated by the province. I cannot conceive that that is the policy of the Ontario government, otherwise they would be taking away vested rights that must have existed for a hundred years.

Mr. LANCASTER. Those powers must be under some parliamentary jurisdiction. What other than the province?

Mr. CARVELL. I imagine that there are hundreds of water-powers in the province of Ontario which are being managed without a charter from anybody. The owners got the powers because they owned the land on which those powers are situated.

Mr. LANCASTER. But the province could confiscate them.

Mr. CARVELL. Does my hon. friend say that the Ontario government has adopted as part of its policy the right to confiscate private property?

Mr. LANCASTER. No, I do not say that they ought to confiscate it, but I say they have power to confiscate it if they chose to possess it.

Mr. CARVELL. I admit that they have power to confiscate anybody's private property, but is that their policy?

Mr. CARVELL.

Mr. LANCASTER. No.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend says no, but they have done it.

Mr. BLAIN. When the Whitney government came into power, they found that a great many of these provincial rights had been given to private individuals, and they decided that they would reverse the policy of my hon. friend's party, and that in the future all these rights should be retained by the government for the people.

Mr. CONMEE. That policy was in vogue ten years before the Whitney government came into power.

Mr. CARVELL. I am discussing whether it is the policy of the Ontario government, I will not say to confiscate, which is a harsh term, but to expropriate or acquire the private property of persons who happen to own water-powers. I am not discussing what the Ontario government did in the past; I am discussing what is their policy at the present time. The hon. member for Lincoln says that he understands that it is not their policy to confiscate or expropriate the property of private parties. Then I understand that the whole burden of this discussion so far goes by the board, because it was based on the statement that there is a property here that belongs to the province of Ontario, and that this parliament ought not to interfere and take from the province a right which it enjoys. If we can believe the statements given by the hon. member and the telegrams read here this morning, we must conclude that the title to the six square miles, including this water-fall now under discussion, was granted in 1856 by a patent which extended down to the water's edge.

Mr. MACDONELL. Will the hon. gentleman state whether in the evidence submitted or in the statement of the promoter of this Bill there is language to the effect that a water-power has been granted to this individual? I did not hear it.

Mr. CARVELL. I stated that the land—and I used the word in its broadest sense—the land facing on this river was granted by the province of Ontario in the year 1856 to a man named Stewart down to the water's edge.

Mr. MACDONELL. That does not include the bed of the river.

Mr. CARVELL. It does include the bed of the river absolutely, and I am surprised that a gentleman of the legal attainments of the member for South Toronto should make such a statement in this House when he has before him the decision of the Court of Appeal of Ontario in 1908, in the case of the Keewatin Power Company versus Kenora. My hon. friend should have read this case. He would find that as late as 1908 the Court of Appeals of Ontario have in explicit terms decided that the grant to the water's edge carries with it the ground to the centre of the stream.

Mr. MACDONELL. It depends upon the stream.

Mr. CARVELL. I shall read the head note in this case. It applied to the Winnipeg river, which is a much larger river than the river under discussion. Here is the head note:

Where a grant of land is made bordering on a river, if a tidal river, the title to the bed is presumed to remain in the Crown, unless otherwise expressed in the grant; whereas if non-tidal, whether navigable or not, the title in the bed ad medium filum aquæ is presumed prima facie to be in the riparian proprietor.

Where, therefore, lands were granted by the Crown bounded by the Winnipeg river, a non-tidal river, the title to the bed of the river ad medium filum aquæ was held to have passed to the riparian owners by virtue of the grant to them, there being nothing in the grants, particulars of which are set out in the case, to rebut the presumption.

I do not think that my hon. friends will dispute that the Court of Appeal there held that in the case of the Winnipeg river the title went right to the centre of the stream and, therefore, I think the same Court of Appeal would hold that the grant of land to the edge of the water on the Pigeon river would go to the centre of the stream.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Who owned the water?

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend is not serious in that question.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Yes, I am quite serious. Who has the proprietary interest in the water?

Mr. CARVELL. It is an elementary principle of British common law, something the student learns before he takes his first examination, that the water belongs, for the time being, to the man over whose land it happens to be, subject to the rights of the public to navigation over it; and the owner, so long as he does not divert it and take it away, has a right to use it over his own land and turn it into the stream again so that the next riparian below him may have the use of it. Surely my hon. friend was not serious in asking for information on as elementary a matter of law as that. I contend that under this decision Stewart or his assignee is the absolute owner of that land out to the centre of the stream and the absolute owner of the use of that water so long as he does not divert it from the stream. If that is the case, the province of Ontario has no rights in this property or water-power, and, according to the admission of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), it is not the policy of the Ontario government to expropriate or take away from private parties the rights which they own, so they have not any intention of taking this water-power to themselves, and if they did they would have to pay the owners for it. Thus they have no right to say that we should not grant legislation allowing these people to utilize the water.

Coming to the question of expropriation, the amendments grant no right in regard to the Nipigon river beyond the right to establish pole lines. The right of expropriation is continued with regard to the Pigeon river. If I am correct in my assumption that this is not the property of the province of Ontario but of Stewart or his assigns the province of Ontario then has no legal right to come here and interfere unless this parliament lays down the principle that no man in Ontario has the right to own or look at a water-power except with the consent of the provincial government of Ontario. Coming from another province I am not prepared to assent to that, and I doubt if hon. gentlemen from other provinces are prepared. I am myself interested in a number of water-powers; my father was in the business before me and I presume other members in this House are similarly interested. I certainly will not subscribe to the doctrine that any province has a right to come in and take my property without my consent unless they pay me a pretty big fee. Considering that we have jurisdiction, considering that the province of Ontario does not own the land, considering that if this communicates with works going across the river we have the only jurisdiction, I think we are justified, not only justified but compelled if we are to be logical, to vote for this Bill and pass this legislation. Why should we go to Ontario and then in the end have this company come back here to have their works ratified?

Mr. MACDONELL. The hon. gentleman has taken a few liberties with the House that perhaps it would be as well if he had not taken. He says that the property where it is proposed to work this water-power or erect a dam in connection with the power is private property belonging to a man named Stewart, or granted to him at a certain time. There is not the slightest evidence before this committee of this fact. The hon. gentleman who promotes this Bill has read a telegram from a certain authority in the parliament buildings at Toronto that simply says that in connection with a certain part of this river a certain grant was made in 1854. There is no evidence that the particular spot in the river mentioned in the telegram is the place where this power plant is proposed to be erected. The Bill is wide open as to the right of selection which this company will have, as to where it will erect its power on this large stream. There is nothing in the Bill tying this company down to erecting its works at the point where it says it owns land. Now that the promoter says he proposes to erect the power works on the private property of this person Stewart, to whom it was granted in 1856, I assume that he will have no objection to having it specified in this Bill that his works are to be erected there and at no other place on this river. Then we will see where we are at and we will know that we are dealing with land owned by a private individual; but as a member of this committee I refuse to support or to allow to pass through unopposed, a noxious Bill that allows a company to make its own selection on the whole course of the river. I suppose my hon. friend who is promoting this Bill, will have no objection, in view of his own statement that the company are going to erect their works on this particular spot and not on Crown property or property expropriated from other people, to stipulate that in his Bill

Mr. CONMEE. Will my hon. friend accept the Bill provided I agree to his proposition? If he will, I will accept it.

Mr. LANCASTER. No doubt the hon. gentleman would be very glad to get his Bill through on any terms at all.

Mr. CONMEE. Will my hon. friend kindly answer me?

Mr. MACDONELL. If the hon. gentleman is going to get his Bill through—and it looks as if he were, from the attitude of the government—then it should specify where the works are to be erected. If we cannot get the Bill thrown out by the House, we must get for the people the best that we can.

Mr. LENNOX. My hon. friend who is promoting the Bill, must not ask us what we will do, in case he makes a certain proposition. Let him make his offer and then we will consider whether it is a proper one or not.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. member from Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) seems to think it would be a fair proposition to say that this development should take place in the location mentioned in the vicinity of Pigeon River falls, mentioned in this telegram. I am willing to agree that the company should be tied down to a specific place and that the Bill should name that place. I know the locality. My telegram was sent to the registrar at Port Arthur asking him for the date of the patent of the land adjoining Pigeon River falls.

His reply was that the date of the patent was not known in his office, but the locality was the Stewart location and the plans showed that the rights of the patentee went to the water's edge. Then I wired to Toronto to have the records searched, and I have a reply stating that the Stewart location was deeded in 1856, so that we have perfect identification of the land as being at the Pigeon River Falls where the intention is to develop the power. There is no other point in the minds of the promoters, and I am quite willing to have that defined in the Bill, if that will meet the views of the hon. gentlemen.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman is of course anxious to get some Bill, but the objection is that we have no right to interfere in this sort of legislation at all. The hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell) has shown the best reason why the Bill should be withdrawn; and as our advice has not been listened to, perhaps my hon. friend from Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) will accept the logical results of the argument of the hon. member from Carleton. That hon. gentleman argued that because the property is privately owned, therefore the Dominion must assume jurisdiction over it.

Mr. CARVELL. I object to being quoted as having said something I did not say.

Mr. LANCASTER. The logical result of the hon. member's argument was that we need not trouble any more about this, because the property, which runs to the water's edge, has passed into private hands, and therefore the province has no more control over it.

Mr. CARVELL. Yes.

Mr. LANCASTER. My hon. friend will revise that opinion if he thinks it over. According to that the property I own in St. Catharines, the province of Ontario has no control over.

Mr. CARVELL. Does my hon. friend understand me to have said that because the property had passed into private control, the province of Ontario had no control over it?

Mr. LANCASTER. That is what I understood.

Mr. CARVELL. The hon. gentleman is in error. The province of Ontario would have no legislative control over it unless they attempted to expropriate it or take it for their own use.

Mr. LANCASTER. But they have legislative control over it because if property has passed from the province of Ontario to a private owner, it does not follow that the province has still not the right to tax it or expropriate it.

Mr. CONMEE. How does this Bill interfere with any of those rights?

Mr. LANCASTER. One at a time. Has not the province of Ontario still jurisdiction over property and civil rights in the province? The very fact that the title to that land has come down—and I am not admitting that it has—to the present private owner and that these works are going to be built there, is the very reason why this Dominion parliament has no right to exercise jurisdiction in the matter. These parties propose to build on property which is subject to taxation and expropriation and every other power the province has the right to exercise with regard to it.

Mr. CARVELL. Does my hon. friend say that if this Bill were to pass, and this company were incorporated, we would be taking away from Ontario the civil rights reserved to the province under the British North America Act?

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not say so, but that would be the result of my hon. friend's argument. He said that because private people owned this land, the Dominion parliament can do no harm in allowing this charter to go through. But we do not know what rights the province of Ontario may choose to exercise over this property. The hon. gentleman says we are not concerned with the past, but only the present policy of the Ontario government. Well, we are concerned with its present policy and its future policy as well, and we have no right to tie up by our legislation the hands of the Ontario government. Because the province has done nothing which would be an obstacle to our passing this Bill, are we to assume that it might not do something in future to which the passage of this Bill might be a hindrance? I understand that the Ontario government has a policy which involves expropriation of these water-powers under certain conditions by a certain commission in compliance with certain rules, and we should not do anything here which would hamper the provincial government in the carrying out of that policy. I have not heard any one in this House declare what is the best policy for Ontario. What we have said is that the province of Ontario must be left alone to deal with this matter itself, and that we must not interfere with its power, past, present or future.

Mr. LENNOX. I think a word might be said with reference to the question interjected by the hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick, (Mr. Carvell) as to whether it would be possible, if this Act were passed, to interfere with the right of expropriation of the province of Ontario. I am inclined to think that it would materially effect all the rights of the province in reference to that matter. The province of Ontario has enunciated a policy.

Mr. CARVELL. Does my hon. friend contend that the passing of this Bill would affect the legal rights of Ontario as to expropriation, or simply affect the policy of the Ontario government?

Mr. LENNOX. I compliment myself that I have a habit of making reasonably clear what I intend to say. I am inclined to think that if we pass this legislation we entirely hamper the action of the Ontario legislature.

Mr. CARVELL. From a legal standpoint?

Mr. LENNOX. From a legal, a moral and a physical standpoint, or any other you like. The policy of the Ontario government is to control its water-powers.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What water-powers?

Mr. LENNOX. All water-powers in the province which are of advantage to the public in their locality. I do not think the word would apply to an ordinary mill pond. Any stream that is in the general interest of the public to develop, that would be a source of revenue to the province, of general advantage to the province, I think it is the policy of the Ontario government to control such rivers and streams. Now we have enunciated that policy, we have acted upon it, and in 1907 we passed an Act in reference to expropriations, where questions of this kind arise. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) asked, if we passed this legislation will it interfere with the right of the province to expropriate? Why, the foundation of expropriation is gone, we have given it to the member for Rainy River, instead of reserving it to the public.

Mr. CARVELL. After the member for Rainy River has exercised his rights of expropriation under this Bill, does my hon. friend then contend that the province of Ontario has not the right of expropriation?

Mr. LENNOX. I am going to show my hon. friend, if he will give me time. I was saying that in my opinion this Bill does interfere with the policy of the Ontario government, and with their right to expropriate. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten that this Bill, in its amended form, proposes to incorporate the provisions of the Electricity and Fluid Expropriation Act passed by this parliament in 1907? If we turn to the provisions of that Act we will find that not only is the export of electricity regulated by it, but if any one contravenes the provisions of that Act he is made subject to a penalty. The Ontario government find that on this river there is an opportunity to develop power for the benefit of the people. They inaugurate measures for the purpose of developing that power, and they have, as I said, taken to themselves, a year ago, the powers of expropriation. They propose, we will say, to import the surplus, and they come to our legislation and they find by section 7 :

Every person who exports any such power or fluid contrary to the provisions of this Act shall, for each day on which such export takes place, be liable to a penalty not exceeding $5,000 and not less than $1,000.

They are about to make regulations as to the manner in which the development is to be governed. And for you, by that provision, to usurp that jurisdiction, is to invite a conflict with the Dominion government the end of which no man can foretell. Turn further. They are about to license certain persons to act in a certain way, and they find this:

Every person who contrary to the provisions of this Act, constructs, places or lays in position any line of wire or other conductor for the exportation of power, or any pipe line or other like contrivance for the exportation of fluid, shall for each such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding $5,000 and not less than $1,000.

And they are about to make regulations under the authority of their Act, and they are about to expropriate under the provisions of their Act, but they are confronted by our Act, which says that the regulations and provisions of the Railway Act shall govern, and here we come into direct conflict with them. And still the hon. member for Carleton asks if there is any member on this side of the House who believes that the provisions of the grant to these gentlemen will interfere with the powers of expropriation, or a moral right or a legal right of the Ontario legislature. I do not believe any hon. gentleman on this side of the House is so dense as not to see that it is an entire infringement of the right of the Ontario legislature to expropriate. Then there are the regulations by the Governor in Council, a violation of which will subject to a penalty. Then there is a right to tax exports. This parliament can tax exports as they see fit. If the Ontario government develops this power, proposes to utilize it for the benefit of the people, does my hon. friend from Carleton contend that the rights which the Ontario government propose to exercise are not confined and controlled by the action of this parliament in granting this charter ? But I come back to the proposition I made this morning. It is not so much a matter of technicality as a matter of policy, a matter of propriety, a matter of justice, a matter of wisdom. What is the wise course of the federal parliament at this time, when we are all the time approaching the danger of creating a conflict between the provinces and the federal government? What is the wise policy? Is it a wise policy, using the words of the right hon. gentleman himself, to attempt by brute force to control the Ontario legislature? Is it wise, on the other hand, that we should not recognize that the province, in the interests of its people, have enunciated a policy, have set to work to carry out that policy, and in the development of that policy are now extending it year by year, and have done it in good faith, in the interest of the people? We are the federal head, and would it be wise for us to interfere with the rights of the province? For what? Why, the rights of the province for the sake of a speculative company, a company that does not profess to act in the interest of the people. If it did, I would have my doubts, I would have a mental reservation about it. But it does not profess to come here in the interests of the people. It comes year after year with dogged determination. Turned down two years ago, and turned down a year ago in the Senate, still this company crops up again with dogged pertinacity. Not in the interest of the people, but for the benefit of the speculator and the exploiter, not for the purpose of carrving power or light so much to the people of Ontario as for the purpose of exporting power, that great source of wealth, into a rival country, this company comes forward and asks for this right. Is it for that that we will invite a conflict between the elements of the Dominion, the provinces and the federal government, is it for that we will jeopardize the harmony that should prevail between the Dominion and the various provinces, is it for that that we shall say to a province: 'We will turn you down and ignore your rights, your interests and your wishes? I say it is not wisdom, it is not statesmanship, and I hope that it is not what, in the end, this government will do. I will be amazed and I will sincerely deplore it, entirely aside from political considerations, if the premier of this Dominion, at a time when he is finishing his work——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LENNOX——very nearly finishing it——

An hon. MEMBER. Not quite so soon.

Mr. LENNOX——should so far forget what is due to the provinces, what is due to himself, what is due to Canada, as to say that we will turn down a province for the sake of a speculative company. Surely there never was a better opportunity for the right hon. gentleman, who says that he has had several opportunities of distinguishing himself, to distinguish himself still more and to signalize his real adherence to what used to be a very old war cry of the Liberal party—provincial rights.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Notwithstanding the blandishments with which my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) has so kindly referred to me, I must tell him, as I have had occasion to say many times to my Conservative friends, that when they talk of provincial rights they talk of a subject upon which they have very little knowledge, and whatever love they have for it is of very recent importation. There was a time when they ignored provincial rights. I welcome their conversion and I rejoice that they now recognize the error of their ways. We are all at one upon the question of provincial rights. But if it is not fair, if it is not conducive to harmony that the Dominion government should invade the rights of the provinces, neither would it be conducive to harmony that the provinces should invade the rights of the Dominion. The province of Ontario have a policy, and it is the preservation of their water-powers. With regard to their water-powers what right can the province of Ontario claim? If I hold from the province of Ontario 200 acres of land in one of the northern townships, in Algoma or Thunder Bay, if there is a stream or a water-power upon that land have the province of Ontario power to take that away from me? I do not think they have. They have undoubtedly the right of eminent domain and could take it away from me by expropriation. But that is not what I understand to be the policy of the Ontario government today. Nor do I understand that the Ontario government contemplates taking away water-powers which may be on such land. What I understand the Ontario government want to do is to keep in their own hands water-powers on their own Crown lands. That is the policy which they adopted, and properly so. I commend them for it. My hon. friend says, however, that we want to control the rights of the provinces on navigable streams. Well, that is perhaps a doubtful power, but as far as I am concerned I said to my hon. friend the promoter of this Bill (Mr. Conmee) the other day that he should not attempt to exercise power on the Nipigon river, that there is a conflict between ourselves and the province of Ontario, and as I am a great believer in provincial rights, much more so than those recent converts on the other side of the House who seek to champion the rights of the provinces, I asked him to eliminate that portion of the Bill and he did so. But, when we come to the Pigeon river we have to deal with the case of an international stream. To whom should the power belong to control the waters of an international stream? I have not had the opportunity for a very long time of knowing personally the hon. member for Portage La Prairie (Mr. Meighen) but he seems to be endowed with a logical mind, although I believe he has not quite apprehended the argument of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice on this subject. He said that the Minister of Justice had imported into this debate an element which should, properly speaking, have nothing to do with it, that is to say that the Minister of Justice claimed that we had jurisdiction to deal with this Bill because it allowed the exportation of electrical energy to the other side of the border line. I have not read the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice to-day, but I would observe to my hon. friend from Portage La Prairie that the exportation of electrical energy is not carried on in the same way as would be the exportation of wheat, oats or any other commodity. There is only one way by which electrical energy can be exported from one country to another, and that is by works from one side of the boundary to the other.

Mr. SPROULE. What works are necessary?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There must be a wire from one part of the country to the other.

Mr. SPROULE. How do they distribute it all over Canada and attach it to houses?

Mr. CONMEE. By wires and cables.

Mr. SPROULE. No, in cans and by wagon loads.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If my hon. friend thinks that we export electrical energy in cans, I would tell him that that means of exportation is altogether inadequate.

Mr. SPROULE. What I said was in answer to the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister that there was only one way in which it could be exported.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. By this Bill?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly. I know my hon. friend from Rainy River too well to believe that he will undertake to export electrical energy by cans. He has bigger ideas than that. He wants to do a work of an international character. Upon that question the jurisdiction remains with this House, and my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) will surely agree with me that it is right, proper and conducive to harmony that the Dominion and not the province should exercise jurisdiction.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know whether I may touch on some questions that others have already dealt with——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Dear me, I thought everything had been touched upon in this debate.

Mr. SPROULE. But notwithstanding that, I have my views upon the question and therefore the right to present them. This is not the first time that there seems to have been a conflict of jurisdiction between the provinces and the federal authority. We have had many such conflicts in regard to which cases have been taken to the courts and carried to the highest court in the empire. In each case where a finality was reached there was a decision in favour of one side or the other. That has, to some extent, accentuated the feeling on this question in regard to who owns and who should control these rights. The provinces have become somewhat sensitive upon the question and are growing more and more so every year, especially in view of the fact that there are inroads being made upon their rights almost every year by legislation put through the federal parliament. We have had several contests between the provinces and the Dominion and invariably the provinces came off best. At one time it was claimed that the timber on certain lands belonged to the Dominion, but that claim failed before the tribunals of the land. At one time it was claimed that the federal authority had the right to control the minerals, but the decision was that all the minerals except gold and silver belonged to the provinces. Again, the Dominion asserted control over the fisheries, but the decision was that while the Dominion could control the mode of catching fish and declare what should be a close season and what should be an open season, yet the right in the fish themselves belonged to the provinces and that, while the province could not delimit where the license-holder should work, yet the province had power to issue licenses, and to-day the province of Ontario can issue licenses to fish in the Georgian bay, or in Lake Superior, or any of the inland waters. The question as to jurisdiction over streams was carried to the Privy Council, and the right of the provinces in the streams was established. Is it not the streams that make the water-powers, and I have no doubt the decisions of the courts will be that the water-powers should be controlled by the province. Up to the present time we have never had the contention raised that the water-powers belonged to any other authority than the provinces, but now it is said that this parliament has the power to incorporate a company to utilize these water-powers and to take their control away from the provinces. In future, it is to be laid down, that companies which get their entity from the federal parliament will be able to supplant the provinces in these rights. I venture to think that if the time should come when this question will be fought out in the highest court of the empire, the decision will be that the province of Ontario is supreme.

In pursuance of their undoubted right the province of Ontario has established a Hydro-electric Power Commission and that commission has entered into contracts to sell power to municipalities and to manufacturers and to others who desire to use electricity. The Ontario government hope to develop a large part of that electricity from the latent water-powers that belong to the province and which it is their intention to develop. It is said by those who have given the subject attention that there are water-powers enough in the province of Ontario to turn every spindle in every machine, to keep every factory running, to light every town and village and city, to supply every manufacturer with motive power and all the farmers with power to run their threshing machines and to light their residences and barns. The policy of the Ontario government is to utilize that power and to regulate it so that justice may be done to all and injustice to none. But the object of this company which we are asked now to incorporate is to invade the sacred rights of the province and to interfere with their policy in that respect. Is this parliament to be a party to allowing this company to dispoil the province of what belongs to it. This question of federal and provincial rights is a burning question in the different provinces, and if this government continues its policy of interfering with provincial rights the time may come and undoubtedly will come when a bitter fight will arise between the provinces and the federal authority. In the United States interference by the federal authority with state rights led to the secession of many of the states from the Union. Who knows that we will not bring about the same condition of affairs in this Dominion if this parliament year after year pursues the policy of invading the rights of the provinces. The present government by its improper interference, and I say it advisedly, with the rights of Manitoba, has almost driven Manitoba into revolt against federal authority. The province of Manitoba sent to this parliament a majority of members opposed to the government because the government has interfered with her undoubted rights.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. When was that ?

Mr. SPROULE. With regard to the extension of the provincial boundaries, with regard to the educational rights of the province, and with regard to other things, the result of which has been to create in Manitoba a distinctly unfriendly feeling against the Dominion government. The same thing has occurred in British Columbia. The absolute refusal of this government to submit the claims of that province to a competent and independent tribunal, and interference with the province on the question as to who shall have the right to occupy her territory, has almost driven British Columbia into a revolt against the federal authorities and a large majority of the representatives from that province have been sent here to oppose this government. Notwithstanding that experience in the case of these two very important provinces, this government seems anxious to invite the antagonism of the great province of Ontario by depriving her of authority which she has the right to exercise. I say that this government is driving Ontario as well into revolt, and if this insane policy is pursued it will not be long before the present government will find that Ontario will be as solidly arrayed against them as are British Columbia and Manitoba. The conduct of the government is inviting this contest. It is said that if you tread on a worm it will turn, and I say that this government is tramping on an authority that is too great and too powerful not to be reckoned with in the future. If the government continues this fatuous policy in the interest of speculators or spoilators, I do not care which you call them, there is a threatening day coming when rupture will result and when the Dominion of Canada as a federation will suffer. I warn them that they are treading upon dangerous ground, and the premier would be well advised if he would call off his friends who are driving this on regardless of all consequences, knowing that they are dealing with what the province believes to be its undoubted right.

Mr. MACDONELL. Just a word to put my hon. and learned friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) right on one or two points. Extreme zeal to advance the interests of his desk mate has carried him a little beyond the legal position he attempted to maintain. The hon. gentleman was not in his seat this morning, or he would have heard the answer I made to the statement that the fact that the ground came down to the water's edge gave this grantee the entire area, because, as I pointed out, in the grant from the Crown there is a reservation of at least five per cent for roads and highways, out of which the Crown could make its own selection anywhere it chose on this property.

Mr. CARVELL. Is my hon. friend aware that it has been stated by the hon. member for Rainy River that that option had been exercised and that the Surveyor General of Ontario told him that the Crown could not go any further?

Mr. MACDONELL. The hon. member for Rainy River made no statement further than this, that certain areas had been opened up on this property, but he did not make the statement that the Crown had exercised that five per cent provision.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. member evidently did not catch my words. I gave the circumstances under which the Crown was called upon to exercise its right of laying out public roads and utilizing the five per cent reserve in the patent, and I pointed out that they had made two main roads from which one or two branches went to the water's edge. They were requested to make other roads, and the answer of the Minister of Crown Lands, the Hon. Mr. Gibson, was that the Crown had exercised its right because it had utilized the five per cent reserve.

Mr. MACDONELL. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, but I would like to know if he has ever heard that it was not that five per cent that was used.

Mr. CONMEE. It could not be any other.

Mr. MACDONELL. In the second place, the hon. member for Carleton laid great emphasis on the case of the Keewatin Power Company against the town of Kenora; the hon. member for South Essex, (Mr. A. H. Clarke) also referred to that case. In reading the case carefully, both of these hon. gentlemen will observe that it merely decides that in the case of ordinary rivers flowing through the country, the presumption is that the bed of the stream to the middle of the stream is vested in the patentee from the Crown. That is only a presumption liable to be rebutted by evidence or practice. But it does not apply to the case of an international river. Chief Justice Moss, in giving his judgment, said :

> But in this case we are not dealing with the great lakes nor with a river forming part of the international boundary.

And so on through the whole case. Rivers forming the international boundary are especially excepted from the consideration of this case. So the whole argument of my hon. friend from Carleton is just as good as if it had never been made.

Mr. BLAIN. When this matter was before the Private Bills Committee, the Ontario government sent a special representative here to present their views. Notwithstanding the statement that was made on behalf of the Ontario government, the committee adopted the Bill as introduced, with all the objections which my hon. friend (Mr. Conmee) has since ventured to suggest should be removed. Therefore I think it only fair that the Ontario government should have another opportunity of appearing before the committee. Surely my hon. friend will not say, after having ignored altogether the representations of the Ontario government, as presented so well by Mr. Blackstock, that it is fair to the Ontario government that this Bill should be pressed through the House without that government having another opportunity to be heard. I appeal to the Prime Minister to say whether that is fair as a champion of provincial rights. Those of us who come from the province of Ontario are specially interested in this matter. We heard the right hon. gentleman's party for many years in the province of Ontario claiming to be the only champions of provincial rights. While they were doing that, they were taking care of the rights of their own supporters. While professing to fight for the rights of the people of Ontario, they were granting special rights to their own supporters in that province. They took the ground at one time that timber in the province of Ontario applied for by people in the United States could be taken across to the United States and cut into lumber there, and while doing that they were championing provincial rights. That matter was brought up in the legislature by the Liberal Conservative party while my hon. friend was there, and the Liberal Conservative party took the ground that the timber should not be taken out of the province and cut into lumber in the United States, but should be cut into lumber in Ontario, and my hon. friend voted against that resolution when it was introduced into the Ontario legislature. That question was fought out between the two parties in the province and when the people understood what the policy of the Liberal Conservative party was on that question, the legislature was compelled to adopt it, and the timber was no longer allowed to be taken to the United States to be cut into lumber, but was required to be cut into lumber in the province of Ontario. However, that is beside the question. I only point this out in answer to the Prime Minister and to remind the Minister of Railways who was then in the legislature and was also a noted champion of provincial rights.

Mr. GRAHAM. My hon. friend's history is all wrong.

Mr. BLAIN. Oh no, it is not. Will my hon. friend deny that the policy of compelling the manufacture of timber into lumber in Ontario was first introduced by the Conservative party.

Mr. CONMEE. What timber?

Mr. BLAIN. Crown timber. I challenge the Minister of Railways to deny that statement.

Mr. GRAHAM. If my hon. friend will study the case he will find that it was Mr. Miscampbell who under certain circumstances introduced a resolution in the legislature and not Mr. Meredith.

Mr. CONMEE. Long after Mr. Meredith left the House.

Mr. GRAHAM. It was a resolution introduced in the House under particular circumstances which was voted down as many others are. The Liberal party took up the question some time later and put on the statute-book an Act which compelled the sawing of logs in this country.

Mr. BLAIN. I will accept that statement. The Liberal party put it on the statute book, but year after year they allowed the timber to go out of the province, and according to the admission of the hon. gentleman it was a conservative and not a Liberal who first introduced that policy in the Ontario House. The policy was adopted by the Liberals of Ontario under pressure of the Conservatives.

Mr. GRAHAM. Nonsense.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend knows that very well.

Mr. CONMEE. No, I deny that. It was a subject of discussion for many years before that.

Mr. BLAIN. I suppose he will deny that his party were granting special rights to his friends, such as timber limits to Captain Sullivan.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. The clause before the committee is clause No. 1. It allows a great deal of latitude in discussion and I am not disposed to prevent that, but any argument used by the hon. gentleman must be applied to clause 1 in some way and matters brought before the House must not be discussed for themselves alone unless in relation to this clause.

Mr. BLAIN. I bow to the Chairman, I am only answering the right hon. gentleman.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In discussing Mr. Miscampbell you are missing the point.

Mr. BLAIN. The right hon. gentleman introduced the question of the policy of the two parties on provincial rights and I was answering that point.

Mr. GRAHAM. You did not answer it very well.

Mr. BLAIN. I do not wish to carry it further; my point is that it would be fair for this committee to return the corrected Bill to the Private Bills Committee for their consideration, so that the Ontario government might have an opportunity to have their representative present and give their views upon this Bill. This is undoubtedly an interference with the policy of the provincial government of Ontario. The very changes that have been made in the Bill since its first introduction show that. I am quite sure the Prime Minister wishes to be fair with this House and with the province of Ontario, and that he would not be a party to pressing through the House a Bill of this kind without first giving the province an opportunity to appear before the Private Bills Committee, for the amended Bill has not been before that committee. This House should not adopt a Bill of this kind which is taking away the rights of the people of Ontario and conferring them on a speculative concern.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. From the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite it appears that the claim of jurisdiction of this parliament to enact this legislation is based very largely on the theory that the power we are giving to this company to export their product to the United States, gives exclusive jurisdiction to this parliament. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), the Minister of Justice, and the Prime Minister have taken that view. As a matter of reason I do not think it was intended by the British North America Act that jurisdiction should be given to this parliament by the mere fact that we put into a Bill the right to do something which we ouselves cannot enforce, and which the persons to whom we give that right cannot do. Our saying that this company may export their power to the United States does not give them the right to go into the United States and carry on that exportation and we ourselves cannot compel them to do what they say they have the right to do. In other words we cannot give any more legal authority to this company to export into the United States than can the province of Ontario. The right hon. gentleman says that because this company may incidentally require to erect some poles and lines beyond the limits of Ontario and in a foreign country that fact in itself gives power to this parliament. The right hon. gentleman will agree that if a railroad company authorized by a provincial legislature to build a railway which is intended to go into the State of Maine can give that company authority to build that railway, that is a much stronger case than the case of simply allowing transportation lines to be built into the United States to export power. I quote a case on that point. In the province of New Brunswick some years ago power was given by the provincial legislature to a railway company to commence and build a railroad in the province of New Brunswick, the intention being that it would be extended on into the state of Maine. It was extended on into the state of Maine and the company obtained corporate authority from the legislative assembly of Maine to build and did build a section of that railway in that state. A shareholder, in an action, set up the plea that the provincial legislature had no right to grant that authority to that railway because it was a railway extending to a foreign country and the question came up on that direct issue: had the provincial legislature power to incorporate that company, knowing it was going to extend its railway into Maine. The Court answered the question in this way:

> The fact of the legislature of a foreign country authorizing the construction of a line of railway in that country for the purpose of connecting with a provincial railway does not in any way affect the authority of the legislature of the province to legislate with respect to the railway within the bounds of the province.

We cannot legislate for a foreign country, and the fact that authority to extend transmission lines in the United States of America, is mentioned in this Bill, would not prevent the parliament of Ontario from granting to this company all the rights, powers, and privileges which they could enjoy within the province of Ontario. If you are asking for the power to transmit your electricity from one province to another, the jurisdiction would be in this parliament, but we have not jurisdiction in the case of transmission from a province to a foreign country. If my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) will look at the wording of the subsection he quotes, namely, 'Local works of the provinces other than such, are of the following class,'—that is to say all local works are within the exclusive jurisdiction of Ontario except the following classes—

> Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other portions of the province or extending beyond the limits of the province.

The words 'extending beyond the limits of the province,' I take it, mean extending into some unorganized district, because this Act was passed in 1867 and there were other territories then within the Dominion, outside the provinces, so that the exception was intended to apply to cases where you would extend your railway into some unorganized district, but not into some foreign country. Take the next exception:

> Lines of steamships between the provinces and any British or foreign country.

That would apply to a line running into the United States, which the province would have no right to authorize.

Mr. LENNOX. There was a proposition made by hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) a few moments ago which has not received the attention it deserved, and that is that this is practically a new Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LENNOX. I know there are some people who do not realize what that means. If it were a new Bill, shorn of all its objectionable features, we could understand that it would not probably be necessary to give the Ontario government an opportunity of presenting their views upon it before a committee of this House. But this new Bill not only eliminates certain features, but is introducing others. According to the notice of the amendments which we had, it is provided that we shall incorporate the whole of this Electrical Expropriation Bill which was passed in 1897, and it is therefore just as important, as before, that the government of Ontario should have the opportunity of being heard with regard to it. It embodies provisions just as dangerous, even more so than those we had in the old Bill. The Ontario government are the best judges of what seriously affects that province. Whether our hon. friends opposite like it or not, people of Ontario have, by an overwhelming majority, committed their affairs to the keeping of Sir James Whitney and his cabinet; and these representatives have the right to be heard. When the first Bill was introduced the hon. gentleman who is promoting it, said it was all right in every particular, just as emphatically as he is now doing in the case of the present Bill. That first Bill having been bowled out on the 19th of last month, he now comes with an entirely new proposition, thereby admitting that he was wrong then. Well, I am strongly of the opinion that he is equally wrong now. We have the statement of the Prime Minister, not two weeks old, that he will respect the rights of the provinces, but he has abandoned that position to-day. Surely it is only right when the progressive policy of the Ontario government with respect to water-powers is being invaded, as it is by this measure, that the government should have the right to appear before this parliament or in committee and state its case. Ontario, besides being one of the old and large provinces, is the province which stood the brunt of the fight for provincial rights; and after having established its rights as a province through a long series of litigation; it comes now and asks that this parliament shall not, now pass a measure, such as this, which infringes on those rights. My hon. friend says he is a champion of provincial rights.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not wish to rob him of any of his laurels and I should be sorry to see him cast any shadow upon his reputation in that regard, but whoever may have fought most gallantly for provincial rights, it was the province of Ontario that waged the battle.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LENNOX. It was the province of Ontario that won the fight, and it is the province of Ontario, of which my hon. friend of Thunder Bay is a distinguished representative in this House, whose rights are threatened now. To-day it is Ontario, to-morrow it may be British Columbia or Quebec. Let the right hon. gentleman who leads this House recollect that this is a question in which both provincial and federal rights are concerned. Again I say that if we are going to develop Canada we can only do it by seeing that the rights of every portion of the Dominion are respected, not only their rights but their prejudices, and so far as possible, the will of every part of the Dominion. We are to-day at a critical point in our history. I am convinced that no more dangerous question comes before this House than the question of provincial rights. Look at the geographical position of this country, see how diverse are the interests of Canada, and do not shut your eyes to the fact that there is dissatisfaction in many of the provinces to-day at the action of the government. Day after day the friction increases, and some day it will reach such a point that the strain can no longer be endured, and we shall see some of the provinces wishing to get out of the confederation in which they cannot have due recognition of their rights. I do not think it will be Ontario. I do not think it will be Quebec; I think the greater danger is in regard to the western provinces. I urge again on the Prime Minister not to ignore the appeal of my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain). Do not throw this objection aside with a wave of the hand, saying, I have great respect for committees which send these Bills before us. In this case that argument does not apply. The Bill now before us is, practicaly, a new Bill, it is practically new legislation, adopting a new principle, and is it fair that the government and the people of Ontario should be excluded from an opportunity of appearing before this parliament and presenting their views?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is quite true that it was the province of Ontario which fought the battle of provincial rights, and it is quite true that my hon. friend did not help very much in that battle. It is also true that he and his friends were against us in that battle, and the glory of the victory belongs to the Liberals of the province of Ontario. But my hon. friend is welcome to his tardy conversion, and after delivering to us an eloquent speech he has ended with the old refrain, Ontario, Ontario. My hon. friend says that I should give some heed to the request made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain). If I did not heed the request of the hon.

member for Peel, it was not through discourtesy for that hon. member. My hon. friend says we have a new Bill to-day. It is true we have a new Bill, but the old Bill has been amended to meet the requests of the representatives of the Ontario government who were before the committee.

Mr. BLAIN. The Ontario government still objects to the Bill, notwithstanding the amendments and changes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Does the Ontario government object, for instance, to this second section of the Bill:

The works authorized by this Act are declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

I understand that Mr. Blackstock took strong objection to that. Does my hon. friend say that the government of Ontario want those clauses restored now?

Mr. BLAIN. No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Then the government of Ontario objected to the powers of expropriation being taken away in regard to the Nipigon river. Does my hon. friend want those to be restored also? In fact, the Bill has been amended in the line desired by the province in everything, and I am not sure that we shall not also agree to the request of the province when we come to consider the power of expropriation as regards the Pigeon river. This is the only question before us, and when we come to the power of expropriation on the Pigeon river, we shall see whether or not the rights of the province are being infringed upon. If the rights of the province in the Pigeon river are being infringed upon, we will consider that matter when we come to it, and I will see whether I am able to support my hon. friend.

Mr. BLAIN. The right hon. gentleman has asked whether I object to clause number two declaring that the work authorized by this Act are works for the general advantage of Canada. My right hon. friend states correctly that this was in the original Bill that was passed by the committee. But according to the amendment of my hon. friend who has introduced this Bill, that clause has been taken out of it. I will say on that point that it is certainly in accordance with the policy of the Ontario government, and for myself I am in accord with it. But my right hon. friend forgets the all important point—these others are all minor points—the all important point for the provincial government, the all important point in the discussion this afternoon as contended on this side of the House, is that this federal government is attempting to legislate on a matter that the Ontario government alone should legislate upon. That is the whole point.

Mr. CONMEE. I may remind the hon. member that the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Boyce) gave notice of an amendment, and I think it is fair to assume that that hon. member discussed this amendment with representatives of the Ontario government, and they were satisfied with it.

Mr. BARR. I submit that this is one of the most important measures that have been brought before the House this session, and I venture to say that the end is not for the general advantage of Canada that as soon as the iniquity was pointed out, the government consented to remedy it. We pointed out that this work was not for the general advantage of Canada from the fact that it was only a waterpower on one part of the river. The Minister of Justice declared that it might be for the general advantage of Canada, and it might not. The result was that that part was taken out. Why was it taken out?—because this side of the House fought it not only in committee but in the House. It was found to be a very glaring objection and the result was that the promoter of the Bill was willing to cut it out. The hon. member for Rainy River is satisfied to cut it down in any direction. All he wants is to get the Bill through and then he imagines that he can come forward next year and get just what he requires. If he can only get in the thin edge of the wedge and succeed in dividing the jurisdiction between this House and the province he will have accomplished his object. I am somewhat surprised to find the Prime Minister claiming that he has always been the champion of provincial rights. When I was in the provincial House and when we were fighting the question of provincial rights we always stood shoulder to shoulder with the government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BARR. There was never a time when the Mowat government were in the right that we were at variance with them. On every occasion we gave them all the assistance we could and we said to them: We want you to fight the question out in the highest tribunal not only in the Dominion but in the British empire. If the First Minister was then zealous of provincial rights he has certainly fallen from grace. Now, a fair offer has been made by my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain). He asks that this Bill go back to the committee in order that the government of Ontario may have the right to present their case. They have no right to be heard upon this Bill at the present time, and it is not one iota less objectionable than the old Bill which was rejected after a hard fight by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. By this new Bill we are usurping a power which we have no right to usurp.

We are endeavouring to pass one of the most important Bills that has ever been before this House without placing it before a committee in order that all parties outside of the House interested in it may have an opportunity of expressing their views, and, if necessary of opposing the Bill. Outside of the members of the House no person has any right to be heard on this question. It is a principle of our British institutions that all Bills before the House should be sent to a committee so that those whose rights are affected shall have an opportunity of going before that committee and of stating their objections. This right has been denied in this case. The proposition has been made but hon. gentlemen opposite say that they cannot accede to it. Why? Are they afraid of the people? Are they afraid of the Ontario government? Why should we depart from the usual custom? What is the urgency in connection with this Bill? If this Bill is allowed to pass, and if we accept the statement of the Prime Minister, any Bill affecting the water-powers or assets of the province of Ontario can be passed by the Dominion parliament so long as the incorporators join with some other company in the United States or other foreign land. If that is the case every water-power in Ontario can be taken over by the Dominion. We are anxious to preserve these water-powers. The Ontario government have accomplished more in the last two years in connection with the preservation of water-powers, by forming a commission for the purpose of developing these powers than any government has done since the days of confederation. If any person can bring in a Bill of this kind affecting any water-power in the province of Ontario the result will be that the hands of the Ontario government will be tied. The work of the last few years will be set aside and this House will be usurping a power which was never intended to be exercised by it. Under these circumstances we are quite justified in exerting our strength and power in the effort to enforce our rights. The promoter of this Bill tells us that there are no rights affected, that the government have exhausted their one fifth in connection with the road because they have made two roads, one going north and the other south. But, has he given us the evidence that they have exhausted their one-fifth? Have we not reason to believe that the government have yet in reserve much of that one-fifth? Have the government even put a road along the water's edge or any part of it? The result of the passage of this Bill will be an immediate conflict between the province and the Dominion. We do not know who is the owner of this property that we are handing over by this Bill. We are on clause 2.

Mr. BARR.

Mr. LENNOX. No, clause 1.

Mr. BARR. Well, we come next to clause 2. What do we find? There is only one of the incorporators who resides in Ontario. All the rest of them, or at least three of them, are from the United States and one from Manitoba. I submit that we would proceed much faster if the government would act in the way they do in connection with many other Bills. I submit that we would make much better progress if this Bill were to go back in accordance with the suggestion of my hon. friend from Peel so that we could discuss it in committee.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. BARR. Calling out 'carried' will not put this Bill through the House. There are two or three hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who seem to think that the object their constituents had in sending them here was to call out 'carried' If we were to inquire what they had accomplished in this House we would find that they had not done much more than call out 'carried'. This Bill is too important to be rushed through the house as hon. gentlemen are endeavouring to do. We have settled the question that the provincial government have all the power that is required to enable this company to unite with interests in the United States to operate a power plant. It is the provincial government which knows best whether or not it is in the interest of the country that such a Bill as this should pass. I appeal to hon. gentlemen from the other provinces to hesitate before supporting this Bill. The time may come when the rights of other provinces will be infringed upon and then they will require the assistance of the Ontario members who have always shown themselves ready to stand up for provincial rights. It must not be forgotten that Ontario is the banner province of this Dominion, that it is growing faster than any other province, and that it will demand its rights. When the Liberals were in power in the province of Ontario their boast was that they stood up for provincial rights and demanded justice for their province, but their friends in this House seem to have gone back on these principles.

Mr. BRISTOL. I understand that, rightly or wrongly, the province of Ontario object on principle to the passage of this Bill, and the Prime Minister tells us that very important changes have been made in the Bill since the authorities of that province had an opportunity to consider the measure. Now, I do not know anybody who is more anxious to have good feeling exist between himself and the various provinces than the right hon. the Prime Minister, and I really am at a loss to understand how it is that he, on a matter of such very considerable importance to the province of Ontario, should not at once have acceded to the suggestion to allow the Bill to stand for some days, when, by doing so, we might have been saved all this discussion. I would also remind the right hon. gentleman that no member of the House has a copy of the printed Bill as it appears before us to-day. Under these circumstances and in view of his own record and the dignity which attaches to his position as Prime Minister, I think the right hon. gentleman could very well afford to be even more than courteous to the province of Ontario. I do not argue on the question of jurisdiction; I am quite prepared to believe that there may be and there probably is concurrent jurisdiction, but I have felt very strongly on Bills of this kind which have from time to time been presented to this House and I have come to the conclusion that there should be some basic principle upon which this parliament should act. I have ventured the suggestion that that principle should be practically what is laid down in the British North America Act, namely, that undertakings which are local in their nature should be left to the local jurisdiction, except, if it should become necessary to render effective such local works, then they could come to this House for legislation to the extent that might be necessary to render them so effective. I would point out, however, to the Prime Minister that the legislation we are asked to pass here is a case of the tail wagging the dog, because the smallest part of this undertaking are the wires that would connect with the United States. The only possible suggestion in the Bill which would give this parliament authority to legislate under the British North America Act is subsection (b) of clause (a), which enables them to connect their cables, &c., with similar lines in other provinces and in the United States.

Mr. CONMEE. What about the construction of the works across an international stream?

Mr. BRISTOL. The real part of this undertaking are the buildings, works, dynamos, and machinery that will be constructed, and which will cost millions of dollars. They will all be located in Ontario. The most trifling part of the undertaking, and the only thing which brings it under the authority of this parliament, is the wire which carries power across to the United States, and that I now believe can be dealt with under the general Act passed in connection with the Niagara Power regarding the exportation of electricity. I would remind the Prime Minister that we are a young country, that we hope to have the best part of the British empire here in 100 years, and that this Dominion parliament should not want to be bothered with local undertakings. There are big enough questions before this parliament and before this country to last during the lifetime of the right hon. gentleman and the rest of us without bothering with local undertakings, beyond what we can avoid. I do not want to obstruct the progress of this country, and this is not a personal question with me; but it is a question of principle and a question as to what are the best interests of the Dominion. If you adopt the principle that the province of Ontario, the province of Quebec, the province of Nova Scotia and the other provinces shall deal with their electrical undertakings and water-powers, and that we should deal with the question of the export of power when it is to be exported, then I think you will be on safe ground. If the principle of provincial authority had been adopted with respect to many of the electrical railways which we have incorporated in this parliament, we would have been rid of a great deal of legislation that we do not want. That is the true principle of provincial rights as fought for by the right hon. gentleman and his political friends; and I compliment them on the fight and I am glad they won. If we proceed on that principle we will have harmony. If we adopt the principle of putting these local works and undertakings in the provinces and then giving them such legislation in this parliament as is necessary for the purpose of what I might call foreign relations we will be confining our legislation to what properly comes within the purview of this parliament, and we will be dealing with these questions in a broad and statesmanlike manner.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend (Mr. Bristol) was not here when this matter first came up, and when the province of Ontario was heard upon these questions. I sympathize with the object of the authorities of the province of Ontario in so far as they want to keep control over the water-powers of the province, but I must qualify that, if qualification is necessary, by saying that in the case of works of this kind which are to be constructed on international streams the jurisdiction belongs to the Dominion parliament, and I think my hon. friend (Mr. Bristol) will agree with me in that. I understood him to say that when it became a question of the export of power across the boundary, the jurisdiction must be in this parliament.

Mr. BRISTOL. What I said was that the company could obtain from the legislature of Ontario all the necessary legislation they required for the development of water-power unless they wished to export it. That was as far as I went.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. But I do not see how any power could be developed on the Pigeon river except by the joint authority of the United States and Canada, and that is why this Bill has come to us. The government of Ontario has been heard before the Committee on Private Bills, and I hope they agree with us on the question of jurisdiction; if not, I would have to take issue with them.

Mr. LANCASTER. How does the Prime Minister account for the fact, carefully not answered by the gentlemen supporting the Bill, that the Canadian Electric Company has been doing all that these people want to do on an international stream, and doing it for years, under a provincial charter? The right hon. gentleman says they could not do it, which is like the lawyer who told a man that they could not put him in jail for what he had done, and the man replied, 'But I am in jail.' So the Canadian Electric Company has been generating power on the Niagara river and exporting it under a provincial charter, for many years.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If the man was in jail, the lawyer should have tried to get him out. I do not want to be put in jail in this instance.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) knows that there is no comparison between the two cases. Assuming that the Canadian Electric Company is acting under a provincial charter, though my information is that it is not——

Mr. LANCASTER. I know that it is. It applied for a Dominion charter, and withdrew its application.

Mr. CONMEE. Assuming that the hon. gentleman is correct, there is no dam required in that case. There is no other stream in America on which power can be developed on the one side or the other by perpendicular shaft sinking such as there is at Niagara Falls. In its practical working out, this scheme is entirely different.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The right hon. the First Minister is aware that the premier of the province of Ontario has seriously objected to this Bill being passed in its present form. The Bill has been changed very materially, and I would like to ask what objection the First Minister has to allow it to remain over for a few days until we hear from the government of Ontario.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have heard that the Prime Minister of Ontario objected to the Bill as it was introduced. I have not heard that he objects to the Bill as it is now modified. I do not see how he can do so, because the modifications are all along the line he himself has advocated. If he objected to the jurisdiction of this parliament to pass the Bill, I would have to take issue with him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. BLAIN. I may say that I produced a letter this morning from the Prime Minister of the province of Ontario in which he objected to the Bill. I sent him the original Bill, a corrected copy and the proposed amendments, and he wrote in reply that he was altogether opposed to the Bill even with those changes.

Mr. SPROULE. The Prime Minister says that this parliament is the sole authority to authorize the company to export power from the country. Therefore we give them the right to take what belongs to the province, and assist them to carry it out of the country. Is that not very much like a man stealing something belonging to you, and not being able to get out of the country with it, you help him to do so?

At six o'clock committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am utterly opposed to this Bill in its present form and I believe it would be wise for the government to send it back to the committee and allow the premier of Ontario to send representatives here to place before the committee the ideas of the Provincial government. I am satisfied that the day is not far distant when the people of Canada will forbid the export of electrical power to the United States in any form, when they will realize that it is necessary for us to conserve that power for our own benefit instead of sending it across the line to help develop American factories and enable them to produce goods at a cheaper rate than our factories, so that they can undersell us. I would again ask the First Minister were he here what objections he has to allowing this Bill to remain over for a few days. I understood him to say that he did not know that the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) had a letter from the premier of Ontario opposing this measure. I cannot but feel, after listening to the debate this afternoon, that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are perfectly right and justified in their opposition to the Bill. The promoter of the Bill (Mr. Conmee) and the hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick, (Mr. Carvell) are practically the only government supporters who are upholding this measure. I am surprised that government supporters from Ontario are not defending it and cannot, but think, that the promoter must feel humiliated at not being able to obtain the support of government members to this measure. One would expect a number of prominent Liberals to defend the Bill but in the light of their action in this committee, I am forced to conclude that this measure does not receive the unanimous support of the Liberal members of the House.

Mr. CARVELL. I need not enter into an argument in reply to my hon. friend, because all his points have already been replied to. I merely rise to call the attention of my hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Claude Macdonell), and the committee to the case I cited this afternoon as found in the Ontario Law Reports for 1908, the Keewatin Power Company versus Kenora. I read the head note of the case but at that time I had not read the body of the judgment. My hon. friend said I was wrong in my assumption and claimed that the law as laid down in this case did not apply to a boundary or international river. During the recess I have had occasion to look at the case rather particularly, and I am satisfied that on consideration he will agree that he is in error in his conclusion. He read a sentence or two from the judgment of Chief Justice Moss at page 190 in which the learned chief justice says:

That is the case in many instances in England, occasionally in tidal streams and not infrequently in non-tidal navigable streams. Whichever prima facie presumption is applicable, it may yield to some extent or wholly to other circumstances. In this case we are not dealing with the great lakes nor with a river forming part of the international boundary. But in these instances the prima facie presumption would probably be not difficult of rebuttal.

Had my hon. friend read down he would have found:

I am not mindful of the fact that in a number of instances there are found expressions of very learned and able judges strongly favouring the view that the rule of the common law is inapplicable to the great lakes and rivers of this country. But, while there are these expressions, there has been no actual decision on the direct point.

He then enters into a discussion of two cases lately decided by the Court of Appeal and the Court of Chancery in England in which they laid down the law of England and on the next page Mr. Justice Moss says:

And apparently the rule applies as well to the Detroit river as to other navigable streams.

Mr. MACDONELL. The court there is stating the law of the State of Michigan with regard to the Detroit river.

Mr. CARVELL. No, I am not; I am giving the opinion of Mr. Justice Moss.

Indeed, as the learned trial judge mentions, it has been expressly held to apply to the St. Mary's river, a large navigable stream forming part of the international boundary.

And a little further on:

In my opinion, the rule of the common law as to the presumption of title in the beds of the streams, whether navigable or non-navigable, still prevails in this province, and is to be applied in the first instance. Whether there exist circumstances or conditions sufficient to repel the presumption is a question to be dealt with in the particular case.

I also call attention to the judgment of Mr. Justice Meredith as found at page 198. He says:

But in this case, as in all other cases in which the question is raised, we are confronted with two bogies, now so familiar that, if familiarity rightly breeds contempt, they ought not to be viewed with much awe. The one is international complications, the other the great lakes and rivers.

He goes on and refers to the fact that there are 1,000 miles of international boundary line and says:

The fact that in the great lakes the land line would be under water would hardly make it more inflammable. But if there were anything in the point, it would be a ground for legislation, or for taking the case out of the rule, not for the exclusion of the rule by adjudication, because incompatible with the circumstances of this continent.

He then enters into a discussion as to whether or not the Great Lakes are tidal. At page 200 Judge Meredith sums up his finding:

The law of England, therefore, is the rule for the decision of this case, the statute so requires, and the courts have no more right to endeavour to evade than they have to defy that enactment; and even if that were not so, and if the courts were at liberty to formulate any other general rule, I am not able to suggest a better one, nor have I heard of a better one suggested by any one else. Arguments based upon suggestions of inapplicability are but attempts to evade; so, too, arguments based upon the fact that in England, in one sense, only tidal rivers are navigable rivers. The rule has been adopted, and must be applied, for better or for worse, until legislation intervenes.

I think it only fair to the committee that I should cite this case in order to show that I am correct in my contention. Here is an authority which declares that the bed of this particular river, if granted to an individual, is beyond the control of the province.

Mr. MACDONELL. My opinion as to the interpretation of that decision is entirely at variance with that of my hon. friend. Nothing he has said or quoted can disturb the view which Mr. Chief Justice Moss took in his judgment, namely, that in so far as the great lakes and international streams are concerned, there is no property in the beds thereof in the owner of the riparian rights to the water's edge.

Mr. LENNOX. We ought to come to some arrangement regarding this matter. There ought to be some accommodation by one side to the other. This is not a question of a technical ruling but of paying reasonable deference to the expressed opinion of the government of the province. The right hon. the Prime Minister said at six o'clock that he had not understood that the Prime Minister of Ontario objected to this Bill in its present shape, but my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) told the House this morning that he received a letter from the Premier of Ontario, in reply to one sent him by my hon. friend inclosing a copy of the Bill as now reprinted with the amendments, saying that he was very much opposed to it. I would ask my hon. friend the Finance Minister, who is leading the House, to give an opportunity to the leader of the Ontario government to state his objections before the Bill passes. My hon. friend from Thunder Bay (Mr. Conmee) thundered at us this afternoon the statement that we are not governed by the Prime Minister of Ontario. Certainly not, but that ought not to prevent us giving him a hearing and doing what is right. I do not want to obstruct this measure, but I do not think any great calamity will result to the people of Ontario in particular or the Dominion as a whole if this Bill should stand over until another session. I am not at liberty to quote the language of the 'Globe' with regard to it.

An hon. MEMBER. Why not?

Mr. LENNOX. Because my hon. friend from Rainy River and others would not like it and would raise another point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not refer to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. LENNOX. I am not referring to or questioning the ruling of the Chair and have no reason to question it. I am merely saying that I cannot give some opinions I would like to quote. And there are other opinions in the press, which are equally pertinent, but which I am not at liberty to refer to as they are couched in language too strong, according to the ruling of the Chair. If we could get this matter disposed of in this amicable way, we could go on to another Bill which is exciting a good deal of interest. If the Finance Minister is prepared to announce that he sees the reasonableness of acceding to the very moderate proposition I make, namely, that we shall have a drawn battle for the time being and begin again in great amity to consider the various complicated conditions of the Bill, I think we would be expediting public business.

Mr. FIELDING. As we are not likely to make much progress on the present lines, and as I understand the suggestion to be that, in view of the objections raised by the Prime Minister of Ontario, there should be several days delay to enable him to present his views, I am prepared to accept that suggestion provided that assurance is given that the matter will then be dealt with without further difficulty according to the discretion of the House.

Mr. LENNOX. My hon. friend does not mean that we shall be precluded from legitimate discussion?

Mr. FIELDING. Provided that discussion be short and quite within reasonable limits. But if it shall be a discussion—I do not want to use the word obstruction—such as we have had to-day, I do not think the suggestion a fair one.

Mr. LENNOX. Speaking for myself and probably all the other members, I can assure the hon. minister that there will be nothing in the nature of obstruction.

Mr. BLAIN. It will be understood that a meeting of the Private Bills Committee will be convened.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. BLAIN. Well, yes. But how would it be possible for the representatives of Ontario to appear before the House.

Mr. FIELDING. I think that the gentlemen representing Ontario will have abundant opportunity of presenting their views through my hon. friend, or anybody else who might be interested in the matter.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I might also say that we reserve the right to divide the House upon it.

Mr. CONMEE. I understand, from what the Minister of Finance and other gentlemen have said, that it is not to be assumed that if the reply from the Ontario government is unfavourable, that is to be made a ground of still further opposition, similar to what we have had before.

Mr. BLAIN. Would not that be good ground?

Mr. CONMEE. It may be in the opinion of my hon. friend, but not in the opinion of other hon. gentlemen. I am merely saying that I do not understand the arrangement in that way, or that any reference to Ontario's power is to be set up, and I want to know if it is so understood across the House.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not so understand it. Hon. gentlemen might feel as strongly as they do now on the subject, but I do not understand they would consider it a ground for delaying the matter in order that it might be dealt with in a reasonable time.

Mr. LENNOX. I understand that we are to confine our discussion within reasonable limits. But I cannot absolutely say as to what lines we shall take. We shall present in the best way we can the views of the Ontario government.

Motion agreed to and progress reported.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 123) respecting certain letters patent of the American Barlock Company. —Mr. Macdonnell.

CANADA LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that this is a proper time to present a motion which I now desire to submit, as I could only do so while you were in the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. What Bill does the hon. gentleman refer to?

Mr. HENDERSON. I refer to order No. 4.

Mr. SPEAKER. We have not reached it yet.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand you are going to put a motion that you now leave the Chair. If you do, I wish to move an amendment.

Mr. CALVERT moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on private Bills.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is my desire at this stage to move the following motion, and I shall make my remarks after reading the motion:

That order No. 4 be discharged, and that Bill (No. 56) respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company as amended by the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders for further consideration and report as to the sufficiency of the notices given thereunder.

I make this motion because I understand that the notices that were last published by the Canada Life Assurance Company have never been before the Standing Orders Committee. I may briefly review the proceedings in order that hon. gentlemen who may not have followed that Bill may know exactly what has been done. On the 22nd of March the following motion was made by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Samuel Sharpe):

That the order made this day for the further consideration in Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 56) respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company, be discharged, and that the said Bill be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders for further consideration as to the sufficiency of the notices given therefor.

Now in obedience to that order of the House, the committee met, deliberated and considered the Bill in question, drafted their report, and presented it to the House in the following words:

Mr. McCraney, from the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, presented the third report of the said committee, which is as follows:—

Pursuant to the order of the House of the 22nd inst., your committee have considered Bill (No. 56) respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company, as reprinted and amended by the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and find: first, that sections 1 and 3 are clearly within the terms of the notice published; second, that the wording of the notice does not sufficiently indicate the nature of the orders to be granted under section 2; and third, that sections 4 and 5 are not mentioned in either the notice or the petition.

The effect of this report was that the notices given by the Canada Life Assurance Company for their purposes were, so far as clause 2, the important clause, was concerned, entirely sufficient. As a result, the promoter of the Bill, and those interested in the Bill, afterwards decided to publish new notices, which was done. Before the expiration of the five weeks allowed for publication of the notices, the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Clark), who is in charge of the Bill, moved:

That the order for further consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill (No. 56) respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company, be discharged, and that the said Bill be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders to inquire and report to this House what notice has been given to the public and to the policy-holders concerning said Bill.

Hon. gentlemen will observe that this resolution did not authorize the Committee on Standing Orders to make any inquiry as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the notices, but simply to report back to the House what notices had been published. The committee, therefore, in considering their report, simply named the notices that had been published, but expressed no opinion as to whether those notices were sufficient or not. I will read, for the information of the House, a portion of the report, and it will show clearly that what I have stated is contained in the report. The report was presented on the 27th April by Mr. McCoig, in the absence of the chairman, and it is as follows:

Mr. McCoig, from the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, presented the fourth report of the said committee, which is as follows:—

Pursuant to the order of the House of the 19th instant, your committee have inquired as to what notice has been given to the public and to policy-holders concerning the Bill (No. 56), and Act respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company, and find as follows, viz.:—

1. That the following notice was published in the 'Canada Gazette' on the 9th, 16th, 23rd, and 30th days of January and the 6th day of February, 1909; in the Toronto 'News' on the 22nd and 29th days of January, and on the 5th, 12th and 19th days of February, 1909; and in the Toronto 'Monetary Times' on the 23rd and 30th days of January, and on the 6th, 13th and 20th days of February, 1909, viz.—

Notice is hereby given that application will be made to the parliament of the Dominion of Canada, at the next session thereof, for an Act to amend the Acts relating to the Canada Life Assurance Company by changing the date of the annual meetings, and making necessary changes as to notice of meetings consequent thereon, and providing for any further changes in the date of such meeting, defining the provisions as to division of profits, extending the powers of the company as to holding real estate in Ontario, and for other purposes.

ALEXANDER BRUCE.

The House will observe that this notice was practically set aside by the Standing Orders Committee as being entirely insufficient, because, so far as the important clause of the Bill was concerned, it did not define distinctly and clearly the objects of the petition or of the Bill. Consequently, we are not called upon now to deal with that notice and we must rely upon a subsequent notice that was published. That notice was signed by Alexander Bruce, solicitor of the company. It is as follows:

Canada Life Building,
Toronto, Ontario.

Dated at Toronto, this 4th January, A.D. 1909. 28-5.

2. That the following additional notice was published in the 'Canada Gazette' and in the Toronto 'News' respectively, on the 27th day of March, and on the 3rd , 10th, 17th and 24th days of April, 1909, viz.:—

Additional Notice.

Notice is hereby given that application will be made to the parliament of the Dominion of Canada, at the present session thereof, for an Act to amend the Acts relating to the Canada Life Assurance Company (1) changing the date of the annual meeting and making necessary changes as to notices of meetings consequent thereon, and providing for any further changes in the date of such meeting; (2) declaring that, in accordance with the uniform practice of the company, the profits in which the participating policy-holders are entitled to share are those realized from the company's life assurance business exclusive of the interest earned on paid up capital and on other moneys at the credit of the shareholders arising from interest so earned or from the shareholders' proportion of profits; (3) extending the powers of the company as to holding real estate in Ontario ; (4) reducing the denomination of the shares of the capital stock of the company from one hundred pounds (Canadian currency) or four hundred dollars to the denomination of one hundred dollars each.

ALEX. BRUCE,
Solicitor for the Company,
Canada Life Building, Toronto.

Dated this 25th March, 1909. 39-5.

3. In addition to the foregoing notices, which were published in accordance with the requirements of rule 90, sections 1, B 2 and C 2, your committee find that the following circular as well as a copy of the Bill as amended by the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, were mailed to each of the participating policy-holders of the company in Canada, Newfoundland, Great Britain and Ireland and the United States, between the 29th day of March, 1909, and the 6th day of April, 1909, in the manner set forth in the declaration of Alexander Gillespie hereto attached.

Then the report gives a copy of a letter addressed to the participating policy-holders by John Hoskin, vice-president of the company, and also a copy of a letter or certificate by A. G. Ramsay in reference to the intention of the company when the Act of 1879 was being applied for. It also contained a declaration of Mr. Alexander Gillespie as to the mailing of the copies of the Bill and the copies of these letters. My reason for asking that this Bill be referred back to the Committee on Standing Orders is the fact that no declaration has yet been made, either by the examiner of private Bills or the Committee on Standing Orders, as to whether these notices were sufficient for the purpose or not. I need not read or refer to the rules of this House concerning the notices required io be given. All the members of this House are familiar with the fact that notice must be given and that a reference must be made either to the examiner of private Bills or the Committee on Standing Orders to inform this House whether or not these notices are sufficient for the purpose of the Bill. I might here remark that it is alleged that thirty years ago an error was made in the legislation that took place, and I submit that it would not be wise for this House now in dealing with this Bill to commit what I regard as a manifest error in overlooking the important requirements of the House in regard to the notice and the character of the notice. I submit that as a fair proposition, and I would say that it would be wise for us to refer the Bill back and get a report from the Standing Orders Committee as to whether these notices were sufficient or not.

But, I have another matter to which I desire to refer for a moment. We have this afternoon been discussing the question of provincial rights. There is no doubt that the provinces have a good deal to say with reference to policies of insurance. I believe that the Privy Council has held in a considered judgment, or perhaps in considered judgments, that an insurance policy comes within the words 'property and civil rights.' Property and civil rights, we must all admit, must be dealt with by the provincial legislatures, and therefore, in addition to any notices that have been given, I submit that notices should be sent to every province in the Dominion of Canada where policies of insurance are held. I desire now to read an order in council that was passed by the Ontario government only a few days ago. I regard it as a very important protest from that government, and I shall place it on 'Hansard' so that every member of the House will be able to read it for himself and have notice of its contents:

Copy of an order in council approved by His Honour the Lieutenant Governor the thirtieth day of April, A.D. 1909. The committee advise that the annexed report of the honourable the Attorney General with reference to the Bill respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company now before the Dominion parliament be approved of by Your Honour and that a despatch be forwarded to the Secretary of State, Ottawa, accompanied by a copy of the said report for the information of the government of the Dominion of Canada.

Certified, S. Lonsdale Capreol, clerk, Executive Council .

I am privately advised that a copy of this order in council was on Saturday last sent to a member of this government, presumedly the Secretary of State, so that I have no doubt the government are now in possession of it, and in all probability may have considered its contents. The order in council reads:

To His Honour the Lieutenant Governor in Council:—

The undersigned has had under consideration the Bill respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company now before the Dominion parliament and respectfully recommends that a despatch be forwarded to the Secretary of State, Ottawa, regarding the said Bill to the following effect:—

The Bill now before parliament regarding the Canada Life Assurance Company, if it becomes law will in effect alter the contract of every policy-holder on the participation plan and largely reduce the amount that he is legally entitled to out of the profits under the existing law. The extent to which such policy-holder will suffer if the Act is passed will be very greatly increased by the action of the directors and their shareholders in having unnecessarily increased the amount of the paid up capital stock from $125,000 to $1,000,000 (see the report of the Royal Commission as to this). An opinion with regard to the law has been obtained by some policy-holders from Sir Robert Findlay. It is his opinion that the payments of dividends to the shareholders since 1879 in excess of 10 per cent of the profits of the business of the company have been ultra vires, there being in his opinion no ground for the contention that the shareholders are entitled to interest on capital and also to ten per cent of the profits, or to a sufficient part thereof to make up $80,000 a year to be paid them as dividends. A large number of the policy-holders in the company reside in the province and their property and civil rights which are within the jurisdiction of this province would be interfered with by such legislation as is proposed in the present instance. The Bill having only recently passed the Standing Orders Committee, there is not sufficient time now that the session is approaching its close to fully consider the matter, and it is respectfully submitted that the government should procure the postponement of the consideration of the Bill until next session. The rights and the jurisdiction of the province are involved and ample time should be given to the provinces of the Dominion to consider the matter and decide what course should be adopted by them.

It also appears that many of the matters involved in another Bill (the Life Insurance Bill) now before the House of Commons deal with matters within the exclusive jurisdiction of the province, as it is respectfully submitted that this Bill should also not become law during the present session.

(Signed) J. J. FOY,
Attorney General.

Toronto, 30th April, 1909.

In view of what the Minister of Finance said only a few moments ago I think I can make an appeal to him to pursue in the case of this Bill a course similar to that which he advised in reference to the Michigan Power Company Bill. I submit that this Bill which we are now considering be deferred, that it should not be proceeded with hastily, and that an opportunity should be given to the government of Ontario to be heard. I do not know any better way to enable a representative of the Ontario government to be heard than to refer this Bill back to the Standing Orders Committee, to notify the Ontario government of the day on which that committee will meet, and allow its representative to appear and enter a protest along the lines of the order in council which I have read. I think this is a reasonable proposition. I therefore submit this motion to you, Mr. Speaker, in the confidence that the government will give it fair consideration, that they will permit all parties to be heard, and that they will not do anything hastily. I am only now dealing with the point as to referring the Bill back to the Committee on Standing Orders in order that it may be dealt with in the usual way.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I submit that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) has shown no reason why this Bill should be referred back to the Committee on Standing Orders. His argument that it should be so referred in order to have the question determined whether the province of Ontario or the Dominion has jurisdiction in the matter, is rather a strange one.

Mr. HENDERSON. I trust the hon. gentleman does not desire to misrepresent me. I certainly stated as plainly as I could that this Bill had only been dealt with by the Standing Order Committee to the extent of preparing a list of the notices. But the committee in no way gave an opinion as to the sufficiency of these notices and I asked that the Bill be sent back to enable the committee to deal with it in that respect.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. One reason given by my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) for referring back the Bill was that the committee might consider whether or not sufficient notice had been given, and the other reason given by him was that an order in council had been passed by the Ontario government in reference to the Bill. I now understand my hon. friend to say that he does not set up that order in council as a reason why the Bill should be referred back, and if that is so I will have nothing more to say on that point.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Ontario government or the policy-holders, or the members of this House, desired to say whether or not they had sufficient notice, it would give them that opportunity.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. No person knows better than my hon. friend whether or not the notice contemplated by the rules has been given or not, and I am surprised at this stage of the session, when every person wants to get away, when this Bill has already been twice referred to the Standing Orders Committee, and when it has been before this House for two months, that my hon. friend desired to again retard the passage of the Bill by having it referred back to the Standing Orders Committee. He has not pointed out a single irregularity in the notice. He is a member of the Standing Orders Committee, and he knows well whether or not the notice was sufficient. It seems to me that there has never been before the House a Bill in regard to which more care has been taken to give public notice, or in which the rules of the House have been more fully complied with.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the hon. member regard the rules of the House as having been complied with when the Standing Orders Committee has reported to this House without saying whether or not the notices were according to the requirements? They have not reported that they examined the Bill and find that the notices have been ample. So that their report is equivalent to no report at all.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. The Standing Orders Committee have reported exactly what this House asked them to report, nothing more nor less. It is not the duty of the Standing Orders Committee, in the first instance, to report whether or not the notices are sufficient.

Mr. SPROULE. It is the duty of that committee to report whether the notices are sufficient or not.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I would be very glad if my hon. friend, when he speaks of the duty of a committee, would refer to some authority other than his own ipse dixit. I do not find that the rules require that. Rule 95 says:

> Petitions for private Bills, when received by the House, are to be taken into consideration by the examiner, who shall report to the House in each case the extent to which the requirements of the rules regarding notices have been complied with.

When that is done in the case of any Private Bill, it is put on the Order Paper. A Bill does not go to the Standing Orders Committee at all unless the examiner finds that the rules have not been complied with. In this particular case, the examiner, who is an officer of great experience, found that the rules had been complied with, and so reported to the House. Therefore the Bill came properly before the House and was placed on the Order Paper. Some hon. gentlemen then said that in their opinion the notice was not sufficient, not because it was not inserted in a sufficient number of newspapers or a sufficient number of times, but because the notice relating to some section of the Bill was not sufficiently full to have made the policy-holders and others acquainted with the exact nature of the Bill. Therefore the House sent the Bill back to the Standing Orders Committee, and that committee reported that in their judgment the notice regarding a certain section of the Bill was not sufficient. Thereupon a new notice was given, and the Bill was then sent back to the Committee on Standing Orders to report what had been done. That committee has reported that the notice was inserted for five weeks in the 'Canada Gazette,' and in the newspapers, and was sent to every participating policy-holder in Canada, the United States and Newfoundland, and that copies of it were sent to England to be transmitted to every policy-holder there. I would like the hon. member for Halton to suggest what notice ought to have been given that has not been given.

Mr. HENDERSON. What I said was that the Standing Orders Committee has not reported to the House whether the notices have been sufficient or not. It has expressed no opinion to guide the House, and my own impression is that the notices have not been sufficient. I do not want to discuss that now, because I think the Committee on Standing Orders is the proper place to discuss it. But my hon. friend will find that if he is going to proceed with a Bill asking for retroactive legislation, there has been no notice to that effect.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. The committee has reported to this House what the House asked it to report. It did not ask the committee to report whether the notices were sufficient or not; it simply asked it to report what notices were given. The committee has done that. The rules of the House say what notice shall be required—five weeks in the 'Canada Gazette,' and one other newspaper at the place of the head office. The committee reports that that has been done. I do not understand that there is any complaint about the particularity of the notice in regard to clause 2 of the Bill which says:

Declaring that, in accordance with the uniform practice of the company, the profits in which the participating policy-holders are entitled to share are those realized from the company's life insurance business, exclusive of the interest earned on paid-up capital and on other moneys at the credit of the shareholders arising from interest so earned or from the shareholders' proportion of profits.

I think no hon. member will say that that is not full notice, indicating clearly what that particular section of the Bill was to be.

Mr. LANCASTER. Could my hon. friend give us the exact language of the House in referring the Bill to the Committee?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I have not the page before me, but I remember quite well what it was. It referred the Bill back to report what notice had been given. I submit that we have abundant evidence of ample notice having been given. Therefore it is child's play to refer the Bill back to the Committee at this stage.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not think the hon. member who is usually pretty fair, has correctly apprehended or presented what the hon. member for Halton contends for. It is this, if I understand him rightly, that a certain duty is cast upon the Standing Orders Committee, and that duty has not been discharged, and by reason of that the matter should be referred back in order that they should report in accordance with the standing rules and orders of the House. Incidentally and very properly the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) pointed out that the manner in which the Standing Orders Committee discharge their duty is not a trivial or unimportant matter but a matter of great importance to the people generally. I am not inquiring as to whether or not they are to blame, but I am rather inclined to think they are not. That is not of so much concern as whether everything has been done that will safeguard the interests of the policy-holders who are so extremely concerned in this matter. The rule as stated by Bourinot at page 749 is:

Under rule 53 of the Senate and Commons, 'petitions for private Bills, when received by the House, are to be taken into consideration (without special reference) by the Committee on Standing Orders, which is to report in each case whether the rule with regard to notice has been complied with.'

I am not losing sight of the fact that we have modified the rules since this was written. But under our present rules, when a matter of this kind is referred to that committee, then the rule as here laid down by Bourinot applies. Under the present rule these petitions do not go to the Standing Orders Committee if favourably reported on by the Examiner of Petitions for Private Bills, and in this case that officer reported that everything required for public safety in reference to a Bill of this kind had been complied with. In this way the Bill came before this House and was referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce where it was investigated. It was only when it came back to this House that attention was called to the inadequacy of the advertisement in reference to section 2 and the absence of advertisement with reference to sections 4 and 5. The House then referred the Bill back to the Standing Orders Committee on the 22nd of March. The item in the votes and proceedings is:

On motion of Mr. Sharpe (Ontario), it was ordered, that the order made this day for further consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill (No. 56) An Act respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company, be discharged, and that the said Bill be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders for further consideration as to the efficiency of the notices given therefor.

That is what the Standing Orders Committee is for, not to report to us as to the facts which come before it, because we can consider those facts as well as they can, but to consider whether or not, as a matter of procedure and of law and justice the notices, which have been given are sufficient. We were then beginning to get on the right track through the efforts and the astuteness of the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) and on March 25 we find this in the Votes and Proceedings:

Mr. McCraney, from the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, presented the third report of the said committee, which is as follows:—

Pursuant to the order of the House of the 22nd instant, your committee have considered Bill (No. 56) respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company, as reprinted and amended by the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and find:

Now you will see what the duty of the Standing Committee is, and they recognized it at this time when they reported back to the House.

That sections 1 and 3 are clearly within the terms of the notice as published.

That is they give their findings as a court, they give their judgment and find that sections 1 and 3 were within the notice.

2. That the wording of the notice does not sufficiently indicate the nature of the powers to be granted under section 2.

That was the important section, so that down to that point you have it that there had not been sufficient notice of what the company were applying for under their very important section No. 2, and

3. That sections 4 and 5 are not mentioned in either the notice or the petition.

Thus we have the rule I have read, we have the recognition of that rule in the order made on March 22, and again in the report made on March 25. Thus from the time that the hon. member for North Ontario took it in hand until March 25, the matter was regular, it was getting on the right track again but it went wrong again and the next proceeding, I am sorry to say, was on motion of my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. A. H. Clarke), and I must say that although it was not noticed at the time, probably this led to the difficulty we are in now, not of course intentionally, but I would suggest to my hon. friend that since he got us into this difficulty he is in duty bound to try and get us out of it again. His motion speaks for itself. We know that in the meantime certain advertisements had been printed and certain steps taken to publish what it was then said was the object of the company. I am not prepared to admit that this notice was in any shape sufficient. A colorable notice, a notice calculated to lull and deceive, a notice which could never have been intend to apprise the public of what was actually wanted by the company, was again issued and the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. A. H. Clarke) asked that the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders should deal with that question. We knew that we had to refer it to them. What ought we to do? We had practically a new Bill. Two provisions of that Bill had never been advertised before. One of them, the most important one, it was found had not been sufficiently advertised and so having come to this House it was necessary it should then go to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders. Why should it not go to that committee according to the rule I have referred to? It was not sent to them in that way and until it was sent to them in that way this House had not done its duty by the public.

Mr. TALBOT. That is all right.

Mr. LENNOX. I am glad to have for once concurrence of my hon. friend. On the motion of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Clarke), the order for the further consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill (No. 56) respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company was discharged and referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders to inquire and report to this House what notice had been given the public and policy-holders. The order was not to inquire and report on the sufficiency of the notice, but to tell us what we could have found out by going to any newspaper, what we knew before that order was made, namely, what had been advertised in the press. There was the beginning of the second difficulty and that is where we are now. The Select Standing Committee might have done better, but we cannot complain of them because probably they might have done worse. In fact, they did nothing. They reported to us, in the terms of that order, that certain advertisements had been made, giving the dates and a copy of the notice. I called the attention of the right hon. gentleman who leads the House to the fact that on the 25th of March the committee reported that no sufficient advertisement had been made. The matter was then at an end, so far as the progress of this Bill is concerned. It had to begin over again, if the Bill was to be dealt with. The Insurance Company then, of its own motion, began to advertise; and after they had done so this resolution was introduced, which does not comply with the rules of the House. The company did not present a new petition. They simply advertised, as they saw fit, and I can show to my right hon. friend that this second advertisement was no more honest than the first. Under these circumstances, there can be no doubt as to the duty of this House. Our duty is to send the Bill back to the Committee on Standing Orders and have that committee report to us regarding the sufficiency of the last notice issued.

Mr. PORTER. It occurs to me that if the House proceeds with the motion now before the Chair and goes into committee on this subject, it will be defeating the very object for which notice of this kind of legislation is given. The first notice was passed upon and found insufficient. The company then went on to give further notice. What is the object of the rule requiring notice to be given? It is that the parties interested should have an opportunity of being heard regarding the proposed legislation. There are two parties interested, the company and the policy holders. The company has been heard. But we are asked to move the House into committee to consider the Bill without giving the policy-holders any opportunity of giving their opinion upon it. If we are to proceed with this measure without giving that opportunity, we shall be defeating the very object of the notice. In all justice and fairness, the Bill ought to be referred back to the Committee on Standing Orders in order to give the policy-holders interested, or the provincial government on their behalf, an opportunity of discussing the provisions of the Bill. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) has offered a fair and reasonable opportunity to accomplish that object, by asking that the Bill be referred back to the Committee on Standing Orders, in order that that committee may report whether sufficient notice has been given, and if the provincial government or the policy-holders should see fit to appear before the committee and represent their case, a special report might be made, although that report would not be binding on this House.

Mr. SPROULE. I venture to suggest that, although this Bill was referred back to the Committee on Standing Orders, to ascertain whether the notices were sufficient or not, that committee has not reported. The duty of that committee was to report whether or not that notice was sufficient. Under our new rules, the first procedure is to present a petition and have that taken into consideration by the examiner of petitions, whose duty it is to report to the House in each case the extent to which the requirements of the rules regarding notice have been complied with. It transpires that the House was not satisfied that the proper notice had been given and that the rules had been complied with. After the consideration of that by the House it was referred back to the Standing Orders Committee for further examination. Now if the examiner of petitions were not satisfied the rule says:

> In every case where the notice is reported by the examiner to have been insufficient or otherwise defective, the petition shall be taken into consideration without special reference by the Committee on Standing Orders, who shall report to the House recommending the course to be taken in consequence of such insufficiency of notice or other defects therein.

Now did they do that? Did they recommend to the House what should be done in consequence of insufficiency of notice or other defects? They evidently did not. Then if they did not, the Standing Orders Committee did not do what the rule lays down that they should do, and therefore the House has a right to refer the Bill back to the same committee and ask them to report recommending the extent to which the requirements of the rules regarding notice have been complied with. Now it is quite clear, because they say so themselves, that the notice was not sufficient, that a proper notice was not given, but they did not recommend to the House what the House should do in consequence thereof. Now in view of the fact that we have not such a report recommending the House what to do, nor have they reported clearly that the proper notices were not sufficient, or partially sufficient, then I say we have a right to refer it back to them, and get a proper report. Bourinot says that the House shall appoint a standing orders committee whose duty it shall be:

> The said committee shall be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House.

All these petitions were referred to that committee by the House previously to the change in our rules. If that committee found these petitions defective in any way, the committee are to report from time to time their observations thereon. What observations? Whether the notice has been complied with or not? Did they give their opinion as to whether that rule had been complied with? Not at all. They gave us the report of their observations, and their observations were to the effect that the rule had not been complied with, because they referred to certain clauses of the Bill of which no notice whatever was given in the 'Gazette,' and they referred to other clauses where there was not a strict compliance with the rule. Therefore their observations and opinions thereon were not given fully to this House. It is therefore, in my opinion, the duty of the House to refer it back to that committee and ask them to make a proper report to the House as to their observations or findings, whether the rule requiring public notice to be given has been complied with in that second notice.

Mr. J. D. REID. I understand it is necessary under rule 90, subsection C, that all such notices, whether inserted in the 'Canada Gazette' or in a newspaper, shall be published at least once a week for a period of five consecutive weeks. But the five weeks was not allowed to elapse before the Bill was up before the Standing Orders Committee. I think this House should consider whether we are to allow Bills to go through in that way. I take it for granted that five weeks means that five full weeks must elapse before the Bill can be properly presented before the committee. The fifth week was only started, only one day had passed when the Bill was presented here. I think this Bill is a very important one. There are thousands and thousands of policy-holders throughout the Dominion to whom this notice was perhaps sent; but what time have they had to consider the importance of the Bill? One gentleman states that he never got a notice; at the same time where a Bill like this is going to affect so many policy-holders and so many heirs that might receive benefits from this, I think the Canada Life Assurance Company should have given the policy-holders longer time, should have given them some months in which they might thoroughly understand what it meant; let them get together and give them an opportunity of stating their position before a committee of the House. The whole thing has been rushed through. If we allow this Bill to go through without the full five weeks notice, I think we will be establishing a very dangerous precedent. I cannot see where the Canada Life are going to lose anything by letting it stand over until another session. By that time every policy-holder in the Dominion will understand exactly the situation, and know that at the next session of the House the matter may come up again and be threshed out after ample notice has been given to the policy-holders. I think the government should allow it to stand over until the House meets in November, and then every policy-holder in Canada will have had ample notice. I do not understand exactly how this Bill affects the policy-holder, but I judge from the opposition that is being made to this Bill, that it is unfair to rush it through at this late date in the session. I hope the government will accept the motion of the hon. member for Halton, and let the Bill be withdrawn.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. With regard to serving notices on every policy-holder. I may say that I am a policy-holder and I received no notice.

Mr. SAMUEL SHARPE. There are a number of gentlemen on both sides of the House who regard the additional notice as insufficient. But that question should not occupy the time of the House, that is particularly the function of the Standing Orders Committee to look into. Consequently I think that this motion is well put, and that the Bill should be referred back to the Committee on Standing Orders to consider the sufficiency or insufficiency of the notice. It is true, as the hon. member for South Essex says, that the committee reported all that the House ordered them to report, but the House did not order them to report enough. It was on the motion of the hon. member for South Essex that the specific reference was made to the Standing Orders Committee and that reference was not sufficient, because it did not ask the Standing Orders Committee to report upon the sufficiency or insufficiency of the notice. The time of the House should not be occupied with the consideration of the question of whether a notice is sufficient or not. We would have to examine the notice, we would have to examine the report of the committee brought down, and that might occupy some hours of the time of this House. I think the proper course to pursue is that which has been suggested by my hon. friend from Halton, that we send it back to the Standing Orders Committee to report upon. I venture to express the opinion that the promoter of the Bill would make more progress if he proceeds along the lines of least resistance, because, if he attempts to railroad this Bill through the House, he will find considerable opposition. This company has been the same as it is now for the past thirty years, and I do not see why there should be such undue haste in order to legislate the rights of 35,000 policy-holders away and transfer their profits into the pockets of the shareholders. I think the House should adopt the motion of my hon. friend from Halton and refer this Bill to the Standing Orders Committee for a proper report.

Amendment (Mr. Henderson) negatived.

Mr. LENNOX. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to move another motion.

Mr. TALBOT. He is not leaving it.

Mr. LENNOX. If hon. gentlemen desire to facilitate the business of the House they should try to observe some rules of decorum. It is all right to have a few jokes but there is business to be done. It would be just as well if some hon. gentlemen would behave themselves. I only desire to say a few words in support of the motion which I am about to make. It is an important one, and I think it is even more important than the one which was moved by my hon. friend from Halton a moment ago I propose to move that:

Order No. 4 be discharged and that Bill (No. 56) an Act respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company, as amended by the Committee on Banking and Commerce, be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for further consideration and report.

It will only be necessary to say a few words in support of this motion, although it is one that involves a good deal. A few weeks ago it was decided in this House that the advertisement had not been sufficient, that as regards the most important clause in the Bill no sufficient notice had been given and that, as regards two other clauses, no notice at all had been given. It is of the essence and fairness of a parliamentary contract, such as is now proposed, that every shareholder should have an opportunity of knowing exactly what the company propose and should have ample opportunity of presenting his views to the committee which has the matter in charge. That is the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. We know that in this House there is no opportunity for any per son to come and present his views, but that in the committee, now that certain notoriety has attached to this Bill, there will no doubt be a great number of people who will want to present their opposition to this proposed legislation. Be that as it may, I need not elaborate the argument, which is this. There would be no object in further advertising this Bill, no object in giving notice to the public, unless we gave the public an opportunity to be heard. It would be the veriest farce to insist upon the most elaborate advertisement and then give no opportunity to interested policy-holders to present their views. It is said that this is the most perfect advertisement that possibly could be given, although I find three hon. gentlemen in this House within reach of my hand who say that they received no notice, notwithstanding the fact that they are policy-holders. It is said that the most elaborate advertisement has been published in this case, but it would be idle to have that advertisement given if there were no opportunity given the public of coming before a select standing committee and enunciating their views. Only one word more in reference to this. I think my right hon. friend the leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will agree in the propriety of giving the policy-holders an opportunity of being heard. I think he will agree that now that the advertisement is said to have reached a great number of policy-holders, these policy-holders shall have an opportunity of coming before the Committee on Banking and Commerce and saying whether or not they think this legislation ought to pass. They have never had any opportunity.

I am sorry, inasmuch as we have rather forced the views of the Ontario government upon the House to-day, that I have to refer again to the attitude of the Ontario government in this regard. Why should not the Ontario govenment be the special guardian of the interests of the people of Ontario? They surely have a mandate to act in that capacity. They have a sufficient majority at their back to make them astute in endeavouring to safeguard the interests of the people whom they so abundantly represent. I will not read the whole of the order in council that has been referred to to-night, but I will read a clause or two that I specially wish to draw to the attention of the House. In the first part it is set out that it has been transmitted to the Dominion government. Therefore it is the less necessary that I should read the whole of it, but they say that:

The undersigned has had under consideration the Bill respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company now before the Dominion parliament, and respectfully recommends that a despatch be forwarded to the Secretary of State, Ottawa, regarding the Bill to the following effect:—

The Bill now before parliament regarding the Canada Life Assurance Company if it becomes law will in effect alter the contract of every policy-holder on the participation plan and largely reduce the amount that he is legally entitled to out of the profits under the existing law.

The extent to which such policy-holders will suffer if the Act is passed will be very greatly increased by the action of the directors and their shareholders in having unnecessarily increased the amount of the paid-up capital stock from $125,000 to $1,000,000 (see report of Royal Commission as to this). An opinion with regard to the law has been obtained by some policy-holders from Sir Robert Findlay.

They then proceed to set out in substance the opinion given, which I need not read to the House at this stage. The order continues as follows:

A large number of the policy-holders in the company reside in the province, and their property and civil rights which are within the jurisdiction of this province will be interfered with by such legislation as is proposed in the present instance.

Property and civil rights and provincial rights ! There is no more serious way in which we can invade the civil rights of a people than by saying that after a solemn contract has been entered into and has been sanctioned by parliament and has existed for thirty years, a few people may come before the House of Commons and before the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce and endeavour to put through a Bill which shall deprive these people of their rights and declare that which is known not to have been the law is the law.

Mr. SPROULE. Alter the contract?

Mr. LENNOX. Alter the contract.

The Bill having only recently passed the Standing Orders Committee, there is not sufficient time now that the session is approaching its close to fully consider the matter, and it is respectfully submitted that the government should procure the postponement of the consideration of the Bill until next session. The rights and the jurisdiction of the province are involved and ample time should be given to the provinces of the Dominion to consider the matter and decide what course should be adopted by them.

That order in council was passed on the 30th April and said to have been forwarded to the Dominion government, so that I presume the government is in receipt of it. Well, if I am to assume from the Prime Minister that the government has not received it that only emphasizes the extreme haste with which this legislation is being promoted. I shall take the liberty of sending this order in council over to the Prime Minister.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) has appealed to me I must tell him I am very sorry I cannot agree with any of his arguments. This Bill was referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee; it was examined by that committee and found satisfactory. When it came back to the House it was suggested by some members that the notice to the policy-holders had not been sufficient and that it was advisable to again refer the Bill to the Standing Orders Committee. I must say that it seemed to me that the original notices were amply satisfactory and quite sufficient for any intelligent man to ascertain what was the purpose of this Bill. However, some members of the House thought differently, and I did not interpose my own personal opinion to prevent the Bill being referred to the Standing Orders Committee. The last argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) is that the Ontario government has sent to us an order in council in which they say that this is a matter of provincial rights.

Mr. LENNOX. No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Then I do not understand it.

Mr. LENNOX. They represent that this Bill affects a large portion of the people of Ontario; it is a matter of civil rights.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes; it concerns a certain number of the people of Ontario and also a certain number of the people of Quebec, and of Nove Scotia, and of New Brunswick, and of all the provinces, but I do not concede that the Ontario government has any right at all or any reason or any power to interfere in this matter. The Ontario government has the right to look after the business of the province of Ontario, which is confided to it by the British North America Act. I have been a friend of provincial rights in Ontario, and I had to defend them in my own humble way with the support of my friends around me, against the aggressions of hon. gentlemen opposite. In this matter the Ontario government has no standing at all, and it seems to me that the appeal made by my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) cannot be entertained.

Mr. LANCASTER. Let me ask the right hon. gentleman if it was anything more than a farce to have fresh notices given to the public if the public were not to be allowed an opportunity to be heard on this Bill. If you advertise the sitting of a court you state where the court is to be held, in order that the parties may appear there, but in this case what was the use of advertising if the people affected were not to be given an opportunity to appear. The Prime Minister told us he did not consider it necessary to give new notices, but he was an assenting party to that procedure and being an assenting party he should now give the people an opportunity to be heard. The only place they can be heard is before the committee or at the bar of the House, and nobody suggests that. As to the standing of the provincial government in this matter, I apprehend that in the other provinces, as in Ontario, the provincial governments are the guardians of the infants in each province. The rights and claims of the widows and orphans against the Canada Life Assurance Company are naturally in the guardianship of the provincial governments, and in that aspect the provincial government has something to say as to the amount of insurance that should be recovered on the death of the bread winner of a family. What possible excuse can there be for saying that an opportunity should not be given to some one to represent before a committee of the House that large class of people who are interested in this matter. Notice was given for five weeks to the world at large, and the province of Ontario is a large part of the world at large, and the government of Ontario have taken action. Unless this Bill is referred back to committee, the whole procedure of ordering new notices to be given is ridiculous. I cordially support the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox).

Mr. TURRIFF. I am opposed to this Bill and to the principle of the Bill, and I am specially opposed to its being forced on the House at the present time when the policy-holders—the men who are most interested in the Bill—have not had an opportunity of coming before this House and presenting their views. The Bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, where it was dealt with to a certain extent; it came back to the House and it was found that no notice had been given, that any shareholder could become cognizant of, that it was proposed by the Canada Life Assurance Company to ask for legislation that would be retroactive and that would impair every contract that had been made with the 40,000 policy-holders during the last thirty years. It was decided that the Bill had not been properly advertised. It was sent back to the committee, and, as the last speaker has pointed out, it has been re-advertised; and if this Bill is not to be referred back to the Banking and Commerce Committee, why was it advertised? Simply as a farce to deceive the policy-holders? Is this government going to be responsible for that sort of thing—to advertise a Bill, and not give the men interested in it an opportunity to come before a committee of this House and lay their case before it? To my mind it is a most peculiar proceeding. What is the great haste to push this Bill through the House? It has been on the statute book for the last thirty years and the Canada Life has been doing business under it for that length of time. Will it hurt the Canada Life to wait six months more? In the ordinary course this House will be called together again in six months from now. We are in the dying days of the session. Why not let the Bill stand over till next session, and then give the policy-holders an opportunity to get together and organize and come before the Banking and Commerce Committee and present their views? If they are given that opportunity, and cannot put up a good case, I for one will not have any further opposition to offer to the Bill. But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the Bill is bad in itself. There are contracts that have been made by this company during the past thirty years. Is there one word in either the first or second advertisement that would give the ordinary policy-holder to understand that this legislation proposed to be retroactive and took away the rights he was supposed to have had during all those years? I have the word of the president of the company that there are about 40,000 policy-holders, and there are hundreds and thousands of these who believe that they are being robbed, that their profits are being switched from them and taken by the shareholders. I am not going to say that that view is correct. I am not going to say that the views I hold, and they are pretty strong views, are correct. But I am going to say that when there are thousands of men who believe that they have a grievance against the company, and this government comes in and says to those men that they shall not be allowed to come before a committee of this House and state their grievance, every one of those men will always bear in his mind the impression that he had a grievance. I have here a couple of policies of my own, and I believe the profits have been taken from those policies which should have come to them; and if this government passes this legislation this session without giving me and other policy-holders an opportunity to come before the Banking and Commerce Committee and place our views before it, there is no power on earth that will make me believe in the future that I have not been robbed. And I do not stand alone in this matter. During the last month, since my name has been to a certain extent connected with the opposition to this Bill, dozens of policy-holders of this company in this city have come to me and have presented their views. I do not say that all the policy-holders share these views. There may be many who are perfectly satisfied; but outside of the members of this House, I have not heard one man who is a policy-holder express himself as satisfied with the conditions—why? Because during the past fifteen years, since this company has come under the present management, the profits of the policy-holders have simply dwindled down year after year; and these policy-holders would like to have some proper explanation of why a policy which twenty or twenty-five or thirty or forty years ago would earn $25 of profits in a year can now earn only $10. That is something the company ought to explain. That is something that if not explained will always stick in the minds of the policy-holders; and if the government does not give the policy-holders an opportunity to present their side of the case, the government will come in for a great deal of very adverse criticism. Why should this company be given all the consideration and the policy-holders none? Is there any good reason why the 40,000 policy-holders should have no consideration at all at the hands of this government or this parliament and this company get all the consideration? Just let me contrast two cases. A few years ago we had a Royal Commission on insurance, which made a report and submitted a draft Bill. The government, some three sessions or two sessions ago, introduced that Bill into the House. What would you have thought if an attempt had been made to rush that Bill through the House without giving the insurance companies an opportunity to come before the Banking and Commerce Committee and present their side of the case? Are the 40,000 policy-holders of this company entitled to less consideration at the hands of the government than this company and other insurance companies? I hope that that will never be said. What consideration has been shown to these insurance companies? In compliance with their request, this insurance Bill has been put off from year to year. It has been before the Banking and Commerce Committee for weeks and months; we have spent the last two sessions working at it, and the company now under discussion has during this session had four men here for weeks and months working to get that Bill into proper shape. I quite agree that they are perfectly right, and I will be just as ready to oppose any idea of passing a measure by shutting them out as I am opposed to shutting out the policy-holders on this occasion. There is the treatment that has been accorded to the companies and why should less good treatment be accorded to the policy-holders? I think they are entitled to some consideration

If this legislation is passed this session without giving the policy-holders an opportunity to appear before the committee and represent their views, then so far as I am concerned politically, it will put me out of business. I have the honour or misfortune, whichever you like to call it, of representing a constituency that has a Conservative majority and I have no hopes in the future of helping it out by redistribution simply because I am bounded on one side by the United States and on the other by the province of Manitoba and with the increase of population all I can do is to have the Liberal end of my constituency cut off. I was offered another constituency but I preferred to take the hard end and take the hard fight and I did it. If this resolution is passed and hundreds of my supporters on both sides are done out of their right to come before this House and before the Banking and Commerce Committee and present their views, even if they are wrong, every one of these men will have a grievance against the government and will vote against me. That puts me out of business. That of course is a very small matter and I do not mention it as of any great importance but I wish to tell my hon. friends on this side of the House there are a good many others in the same position.

Mr. TALBOT. Not many.

Mr. TURRIFF. When the hon. member gets through I shall try to go on. There are a good many members in exactly the same position. A matter of a hundred votes makes a great difference and it is well to consider that phase of the question. We are piling up a grievance now that these men will remember, and I can assure you from what I have heard in the past month that this matter sinks far deeper into the minds of policy-holders of the Canada life than you have any idea of. I have men, men who did not wish their names mentioned, and you would be surprised at some of them, who have told me that they look on this Bill as a most iniquitous piece of legislation. One man told me that if this legislation passed he would want to sell his policy for what he could get for it, because he could have no confidence that this company would not come farward in ten years time asking for legislation and getting it that would deprive him perhaps of more than they are taking from him at this time. I think that is an extreme view and do not take that view, but it is held and I repeat that if you do not give these men an opportunity to present their claims they will have a just grievance and nothing will remove from their minds the feeling that they have been improperly dealt with. There can be only two reasons for pushing this through. One is that if it is not pushed through now it will be more difficult to get it through next session.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. Perhaps this is the dividend year.

Mr. TURRIFF. If that is the case it is a very good reason for delaying it. If the Bill is as good as the Canada Life people say it is, what is their objection to having it go before the Banking and Commerce Committee, and allowing the policy-holders to present their views. If their contention is right and fair and just, the Bill will go through, and there will be no difficulty, but if the Bill is such that a thorough investigation into it and a thorough presentation of the case of the policy-holders would prevent it going through, is the government justified in pushing it through in the dying days of this session, without giving the policy-holders a single opportunity to come before the committee and present their views? That is the strong ground I take, not on the merits of the Bill. I have no uncertain feeling on the merits of the Bill but it is not on that ground that I am opposing its passage. These policy-holders, 40,000 of them, are depending on these policies for their wives and their children when they have passed over the great divide. There will be 40,000 widows probably one day depending on these policies, and there will be over 100,000 orphans——

Mr. TALBOT. All on one day?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TURRIFF.—Depending on these policies. Surely in a matter of such importance it is not asking too much—and I appeal to the fairness and the good sense of my honoured leader that it is surely not asking too much to request that this particular Bill stand over until next session and that the policy-holders should be given an opportunity to come before the committee and present their views of the case. I have heard it said: If this Bill is not passed this session, why there will be litigation! The only logical conclusion you can come to from this is that if this company has been doing wrong, has been going contrary to the law for thirty years, then you should pass legislation to make their course right for the past thirty years, give them the right to do wrong for all time to come and prevent for ever anybody taking action to obtain redress of their wrongs. The Minister of Justice the other day dealt very fully with this question and either he or some other member stated, while we were discussing the Cobalt Mining Company's deal, that the government of Ontario had no right to step in and pass legislation to do away with litigation between two parties, and I heard the statement—I will not say by the Minister of Justice—that the provincial government had no more right to pass legislation that would prevent any man who felt aggrieved from going into litigation than to interfere in a case that had already been started. In this case litigation has already been started so if we apply the rule laid down by the Minister of Justice the government has no right to step in and prevent that litigation. If they have no right what right has this government or any government on earth to stand between me and the men who I believe have done me an injustice? I believe they have done me an injustice. Give me an opportunity next fall with other shareholders to place my views before the Banking and Commerce Committee and if I can be shown that no injustice is being done, that this is right, then I shall have nothing more to say. This is not the first time I have been up against this company in trying to get some information. For the last seven or eight years I have been trying to get some satisfactory answer to the question why the dividends on my policies have been cut down to almost nothing. I have never been able to get any satisfactory explanation. I could get a lot of smooth talk by insurance men who knew all about the subject while I did not know very much about it, but I never could get any reason that appealed to my sense of justice. I may be altogether wrong, but I want them to explain to me and their policy-holders how it is these profits have been so small. A great many of the policy-holders have made this complaint to me. Take the president of this company alone—and he is the president of half a dozen other companies and on the directorate of as many more—he draws a salary of $20,000 a year.

An hon. MEMBER. What has that to do with this Bill?

Mr. TURRIFF. I propose to discuss this Bill in my own way. That $20,000 comes out of the pockets of the policy-holders, who otherwise would get the benefit. That is what it has to do with this Bill. And the president has two sons in this company, one of whom draws $15,000 a year and the other $20,000, making $50,000 per year to one family. That is what many of the policy-holders object to. What would this country think of the Prime Minister, if he voted himself $20,000 a year and then gave his two nearest relatives $15,000 and $20,000 respectively, and our Prime Minister devotes all his time to the work and works hard. What would this side of the House say, if the leader of the opposition should come into power and immediately vote himself $20,000 a year and his two nearest relatives $15,000 and $20,000 per year? Would we not make the House resound with our denunciations? Why we would raise the roof off it and make every platform ring from the Atlantic to the Pacific. And remember there are over a million voters to pay those salaries, and those men to whom they would pay them give all their time to the work, whereas there are only 35 or 40 thousand policy-holders paying these other men who do not give up all their time to their particular offices. That is one reason given by policy-holders why their profits have been so small during the past fifteen years. There is a general feeling among the policy-holders of the Canada Life that things have been manipulated in a very nice, smooth way, but in such a manner that the profits that should go to the policy-holders do not go to them. That is the feeling abroad and that feeling will not down until those policy-holders are given the opportunity to organize and put their case before a committee of this House; and that they cannot do this session. They could not even do it properly if this Bill were referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee. There would be a small opportunity then to do something, but it would only be a makeshift. What I ask is that this legislation be allowed to stand over. If the Bill be a good one, as the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Clarke) says it is and as the government claim, there will be no trouble in putting it through then; but if it be forced through now there will be a great deal of dissatisfaction, as many of us will have reason to know before the next general elections. A good deal has been said about the increase of capital. In 1900, the capital was increased from $125,000 to $1,000,000. At that time there was no need of more capital. The company had millions to its credit, it has millions invested, and remember that all that money is the money of the policy-holders, and only 10 per cent of the profits really belongs to the company. There were millions to the credit of the company, and the shareholders had their $125,000 paid up and were drawing 30 per cent to 70 per cent per annum on it. Was that not good enough? Should they not have been satisfied with that? And remember that the men who are drawing these big salaries own over 50 per cent. of the stock. Surely they ought to have been satisfied, but no, they increased their capital. They claimed that it was necessary, not so much on account of the money, but to have a better standing in the old country and the United States. Possibly there was something in that claim, but at all events they paid in this extra money, and a good many policy-holders believe that was done to benefit the shareholders at the expense of the policy-holders. I am inclined to that belief myself, but I am not sure that I am right. If the case were put before the committee and explanations made, I might be easily convinced that in that respect I am altogether wrong. I feel strongly on this question because I have a large number of policy-holders in my constituency, and it is not individually or personally that I ask my right hon. leader to put this measure off until next fall, but on behalf of the 40,000 people I represent in this House. It is in their interest I ask that this legislation be delayed until next session. Remember this is a matter of vital importance to thousands of people in this country—men on salaries who have paid in all their savings of a life time, whose savings are locked up in policies in this company. They are the men who feel aggrieved and who want to be represented. Why treat the corporations with one kind of justice and the policy-holders with another? Why not give even-handed justice to both? This is just a little trouble between the policy-holders and the company, why should not the government leave us alone to settle our own difficulties without interfering? We will settle them and there will be very little trouble about it. All we want is a good explanation. I want to make that point as clear as possible. I am not discussing the Bill on its merits at all, but I am insisting on the right of the policy-holders —the men who have put up the $33,000,000 invested by the company—to be given a hearing before the committee. I leave it to the fairness of the Prime Minister to say whether or not this legislation should stand over for six months. The company have worked for 30 years under their present incorporation, why not let them work under it six months longer? I ask the right hon. the Prime Minister to consider this carefully and see whether he cannot let this legislation stand until six months, and I venture to say it will go through then with one-tenth part of the difficulty it will take to put it through now.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I have a few observations to make on this motion, and in so doing I purpose to keep religiously away from discussing the Bill on its merits. If the House will do me the credit of believing that I can for a moment discuss a question entirely apart from partisan consideration, I assure them that is my intention. If I understand the right hon. the Prime Minister correctly, and that he is determined to force this Bill on the consideration of this House, aside from the Banking and Commerce Committee, that is a course the most utterly inexplicable on the part of the government since I have been a member. Some few weeks ago when this Bill was before us and was referred back to the Standing Orders Committee, and when they reported the Bill had not been sufficiently advertised, who would have understood when a further advertisement was ordered by this House, that that advertisement had no purpose at all? There might have been some difference of opinion as to the last motion, it might have been of a technical character; but, surely, on this motion that, after this Bill had been advertised for the purpose of making its contents known to the public, surely on this motion that proposes to give them a chance to be heard, there should be no difference of opinion. No. hon. gentleman has ever attempted to answer the query as to what object there could have been in advertising this measure to the country if the country is not to be heard. The Prime Minister avoided that point in his speech. Now where does the government stand? The government of Ontario come before this House, and they present a protest against this Bill. I do not conceive the government of Ontario in doing so made any claim to this House by passing the legislation embodied in Bill 56 invaded at all provincial jurisdiction, but really acted on the principle of the government of Ontario is in a sense the custodian of the civil rights of the citizens of Ontario, and as such custodian it protests against this Bill, which they claim is an invasion of those civil rights. Now the Prime Minister says, we will not go before the Banking and Commerce Committee, we will not let the policy-holders be heard there. If that is the decision of this government, then by what method could the government of Ontario ever be heard before this House, except by the very method they have adopted? If we are to shut out all representatives before the Banking and Commerce Committee, which I understood was the medium by which the public could be heard before parliament, then the method adopted by the government of Ontario is the only method any government or any individual could adopt to make its or his opinions known in this House. Therefore the government are in this position: If a provincial government comes to us by petition asking that this legislation be not passed, we resent it and we also deny to the people represented by that government the right to come before us in any other way. Surely that is tyranny personified. I say the action of the government in this respect is inexplicable to me, and I hope some good reason will be given for it before this matter is disposed of.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I am glad to have heard the argument of my learned friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), and also of the other hon. gentlemen who are so strongly opposed to the Bill before the House. A good many speak of it as being inexplicable. From my understanding of the question, it is inexplicable to me that a Bill designed to do a simple and ordinary act of justice, as this Bill is designed to do, should be resisted in the vicious manner in which this Bill is being resisted by certain parties.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I did not say the Bill was inexplicable, I said the action of the government was inexplicable.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I was not referring to my hon. friend. I was saying that it appeared inexplicable to me that where people do understand the Bill, they are putting up such a strenuous opposition. I have not heard, even in the heated argument of the hon. member for Assiniboia, one cogent reason against the passing of this Bill. He has made many strong statements about what the policy-holders say; I have heard just as strong statements from the policy-holders saying the government would not do its duty, saying it would be a great loss to and undoing of the policy-holders, if the present Bill were not passed, and giving strong reasons why it should pass at this session. Now what is this Bill for? The object of the Bill is a simple one. The Canada Life Company come to this parliament, which created the company, the only legislature, the only tribunal which can deal with the matter, and say that in the legislation which was passed in 1879 at the instance of the company, words were used which, in the opinion of an eminent counsel in England, it is said, do not bear the interpretation which it was intended they should bear by the company who promoted it. Now if there was a mistake, if the interpretation of Sir Robert Findlay is correct, I entertain not the slightest doubt, I am positively convinced, that the interpretation which is sought to be put upon the Act of 1879 is absolutely foreign to the intention of any person present at the time, foreign to the understanding of the directors and of the policy-holders from that time to the present.

Mr. LANCASTER. Would not the courts so decide, and then what is the need of your Bill?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I will come to that point presently. I was saying that I am convinced that there is a mistake, and that to pass this Bill is to do an act of simple justice. If the legislation were not a statute, if it were a contract, the terms thereof could be reformed by the court, because in that case the court would have jurisdiction to reform. I am satisfied also, not only that it is an act of common justice to the shareholders, but it is an act of the greatest importance to the policy-holders of this company.

Mr. LANCASTER. If that is so, why not let the Banking and Commerce Committee hear the policy-holders say that for themselves?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. Will my hon. friend wait till I make my argument? I am satisfied that, however much this Act is in the interest of the shareholders of the Canada Life Company much more is it in the interest of the policy-holders; because if there is some temporary disarrangement in the dividends paid to the shareholders, that is a matter in which the shareholders can protect themselves and recoup themselves. But if the directors or shareholders refuse to exercise the rights which they have and decline to declare profits in the future, or if, having cut down the dividends, an incentive to make a successful company does not exist, then it is the policy-holders in respect of their profits that must suffer, because the amount of profits they receive is intimately bound up in the success of this company. Now, let us look at the history of the company in Canada.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I rise to a point of order. Is it pertinent to the question before the Chair for the hon. gentleman to give a history of the company?

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion before the Chair is to refer this Bill to the Select Committee on Banking and Commerce. The hon. member is giving reasons, I presume, why that should or should not be done. I do not think a detailed discussion of the Bill would be in order at this stage.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. It was my intention to adduce arguments why this Bill should be proceeded with at once. If I go too wide of the mark, of course I will be called to order. I did not hear my hon. friends, who were so enthusiastic when my hon. friend from Assiniboia spoke, call him to order.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. He did not discuss the merits of the Bill.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. When he was talking about the high salaries being paid, or about the paid-up capital stock, had that nothing to do with the Bill? There was no objection whatever at that time, and I am a little surprised that my hon. friend should be so partial to my hon. friend from Assiniboia that he will not listen to me with as much grace as he listened to him. I will not trouble the House very long. I think it is well, however, that we should have a thorough understanding of this Bill, because the opinion which has been expressed by a great many people is something so foreign to my understanding of the Bill that I cannot understand the opposition which is being offered to it. In 1847 this company was incorporated by a deed of settlement. In that deed of settlement there was a provision with respect to profits. It provided that for the first two years no profits should be paid to the policy-holders, but thereafter the directors were empowered—they were not compelled but empowered—to declare profits from the participating business only and the profits were to be declared in the proportion of 75 per cent to policy-holders and 25 per cent to the shareholders. In 1849 the first Act was passed. The company came to this parliament and got an Act of incorporation. When you speak about vested rights, if there has ever been any case of interference with vested rights in connection with this company, it was in 1849, because, prior to that time upon a division of profits, the policy-holders were entitled to 75 per cent, but by the Act of 1849, that limitation was removed and the directors were empowered to allot such a proportion of profits as, in their judgment, they saw best.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon gentleman has surely disclosed quite clearly the line that he is pursuing. If anything can be manifest it is that he is discussing the merits of the Bill on the motion that this matter be referred back to the Banking and Commerce Committee. This motion does not in any sense involve the question of the merits of the Bill pro or con. I submit that the hon. gentleman cannot delay the passage of the Bill or the adoption of the motion in this way. It is simply a matter of obstruction. Although I do not want to interfere unduly with the hon. gentleman I think he should be called to order. I ask for the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question before us is very plain. It is a motion to refer the Bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee. I am not the judge of the reasons that any hon. gentleman may give for or against this measure being adopted, but if the hon. gentleman proposes to discuss the details of the Bill upon this motion it is certainly out of order. The main motion is that the House go into committee on a number of Bills this one included.

Mr. BRODEUR. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that if there is a motion for the House to go into committee on a Bill you may discuss the merits of the Bill, and if some body else moves in amendment that the Bill should be referred to some committee it would not preclude the discussion of the general principle of the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. The difficulty is that the main motion asks me to leave the Chair so that the House may go into committee on a number of Bills not only upon this one. Of course, if the contention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is correct, all the other Bills could be discussed in the same way. The main motion is merely pro forma, because, under the new rules, it is generally adopted without discussion so that the House may immediately go into committee on these Bills. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. H. Clarke) had better limit himself to the motion before the Chair.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. Of course, I cannot make my argument complete unless I go into the merits of the Bill, because I want to lay the foundation for the argument I intend to close up with ; that is that so great a delay would be most dangerous to the interest of the policy-holders. I cannot do that properly unless I give the House my views on the merits of the Billl generally. Now, I was pointing out——

Mr. A. H. CLARKE.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. Certainly.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would the hon. member for Essex be good enough to tell the House in what way the opposing of this measure or allowing it to stand over would injure the policy-holders?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I am coming to that just as soon as I can and in logical order. I was saying, in giving a history of the legislation in regard to this company, that in the Act of 1849 there was no limitation whatever of the proportion of profits to be divided amongst the policy-holders and shareholders. The parliamentarians of that day did not think they were interfering very seriously with vested rights because prior to that Act the policy-holders were absolutely entitled to 75 per cent of the profits, which right was entirely taken away by the Act of 1849. After the Act of 1849 they could be allotted one per cent, or two per cent, or no per cent at all, if the company were so advised. So that we have the strongest precedent for the measure which is being brought in dealing with a distribution of profits between them. Notwithstanding the Act of 1849 the practice of the insurance company was to divide the profits in the proportion of 75 per cent to 25 per cent. This was continued down to 1879 when the Bill which is causing the present difficulty was brought before the House. What was the reason for bringing that Bill before the House? This is not a matter only between the company and the policy-holders. There is also a matter between the shareholders and the directors. Up to that time the directors had been——

Mr. LENNOX. Mr. Speaker, I rise again to a point of order. I am going to endeavour to see if we are to have any rules of procedure at all. The hon. gentleman, for ten minutes more, has gone on with the history of the legislation of this company. This has no reference whatever to the motion before the Chair. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rule, and to insist upon your ruling being observed.

Mr. SPEAKER. I can only repeat what I have said that the discussion of the Bill is at the present time, out of order. The question before the Chair is simply whether this Bill should be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. The main motion asks the House to go into committee on a number of Bills on the Order Paper.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would like to suggest that the House ought to be in possession of the facts that would enable hon. members to arrive at a conclusion whether or not we should go into committee on the Bill. The negative of the motion of the hon. member for Simcoe is quite as pertinent as the positive side of that motion. Those of us who want to know what are the facts in connection with this matter ought, on this motion, or on the motion of which my hon. friend has moved in amendment, to have ample opportunity to know what the merits of this Bill are and which motion should be adopted. It is perhaps germane to this question of order to point out that my hon. friend who quoted from a minute of the Attorney General of Ontario as to the interest of the policy-holders might perhaps consider the question as to the right of policy-holders who are members of this House to vote upon or discuss perhaps a measure in which they are personally interested.

Mr. LENNOX. The matter is simply this: It has been brought to the attention of the House that certain advertisements were issued, and if these advertisements are to be effective the matter should be referred now to the Banking and Commerce Committee to reconsider the question of whether this Bill should be passed or not or whether we should hear the parties who may come before the committee so that they can report the matter back to the House. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I submit that any discussion as to the history of the legislation, the history of the company, the merits of the Bill, is utterly irrelevant. The only question is should the Bill go back to the Banking and Commerce Committe or should it not?

Mr. SPEAKER. Bourinot says:

It has been frequently decided in the English House that on a motion for the Speaker to leave the chair a member is at liberty to discuss the main provisions but not to proceed in detail through the clauses in order to discuss amendments to the same, until the Bill is regularly in committee.

That is what I have held.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. That is precisely what I understood and what I was intending to do. My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) does not seem to like to hear me, but I have listened to a great many speeches from him to-day and I think he might return me the compliment for this one speech. In 1879 an Act was passed which the present Bill is intended to rectify.

Mr. SPROULE. Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Clarke) is an old member of the House; he understands what the ruling is and I am quite sure he will abide by it.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. The whole difficulty has been caused by the anxiety of the framers of the Bill of 1879 to include the profits of non-participating policies as well as of participating policies, and they use the words which, according to the opinion of Sir Robert Findlay, go beyond the intention and practice of every other insurance company doing business in Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. What words do you refer to?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. 'All the profits.' Up to 1879 the directors were not authorized directly by the statute then in force to divide among policy-holders the profits arising from anything but participating policies. That is to say, profits arising from annuities or from the non-participating branch. The directors were not authorized by the Act of 1849 to distribute amongst the participating policy-holders. That being so it was competent for any stockholder to find fault with the action of the directors for exceeding their authority. If the stockholders were not unanimous any one of them would have the right to say to the directors: You have no right to distribute these profits on non-participating policies amongst the participating policy-holders, but they should be paid in dividends to the stockholders. One of the objects of the Act of 1879 was to give authority to the directors to do what they had in practice been doing, although they were not expressly authorized to do it. In the preamble they use the words which are the vital point in this discussion. That preamble says:

Whereas, the Canada Life Assurance Company have by their petition represented that in carrying on their business heretofore the directors have allotted and divided among all persons assured upon the participation scale 75 per cent of all the profits.

That is the important part of it.

Realized from the entire business of the company.

Mr. SPROULE. It says 'all the profits from the entire business.' That means from every source.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. The recital says they have been doing that.

Mr. SPROULE. That is an allegation of fact, and upon that allegation policies were taken out.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. The allegation is that they have been dividing heretofore all the profits of the insurance business.

Mr. SPROULE. From the entire business; not from the insurance business That includes the capital as well as the insurance.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I will read it again:

All the profits realized from the entire business of the company.

The statement of fact in that Act of 1879 is that theretofore they had been dividing all the profits from the entire business of the company. If up to that time they had been dividing the profits derived from the investment of the capital stock then they would have no right to come here and say there is any mistake. But what they say is that that was not intended to mean what it is now said to mean, namely, that the interest on the capital stock should be treated as part of the profits of the business. The evidence is abundant and cannot be controverted, because every person who knows anything about it says that such was not the practice before 1879. Mr. Ramsay, who was president of the company at the time and who was president almost all his life; the actuaries who looked into it; Mr. Bruce who was the solicitor for many years——

Mr. S. SHARPE. Were these gentlemen called before the Banking and Commerce Committee to give their evidence?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. Mr. Bruce was there.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Did he make a statement before the committee?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I am not a member of the committee and do not know, but I have the certificate of Mr. Ramsay which was distributed to the policy-holders.

Mr. S. SHARPE. That is not a statutory declaration.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. Well, you can accept Mr. Ramsay's word just as well as you could a statutory declaration. Very well then, you have the statement of all these people that never in the whole history of this company have they distributed amongst the policy-holders any part of the interest on the capital stock, so that, if in the recital of the Act of 1879 you construe the words 'all the profits' as meaning the interest on the capital stock, then certainly the allegation is a mistake, because they never have been doing that at all. I find fault with the statement of the case which was submitted by Mr. Laidlaw, of Toronto, who has been very active in opposition to this Bill, to Sir Robert Findlay. Mr. Laidlaw says:

It is, therefore, not necessary for the purposes of the opinion to refer to any payment of dividends or allotment of profits before the passing of the Act of 1879. The company is bound by the recital in the preamble to the Act of 1879, and clause one of the Act, inclusive, of the said proviso.

That is the kernel of the whole matter. I would judge that in submitting to counsel a statement of facts it was of the utmost importance to have pointed out to Sir Robert Findlay that up to 1879, what the Act of 1879 calls 'all the profits' did not include the profits arising from the investment of the capital stock.

Mr. SPROULE. Whatever may have been the practice before the Act of 1879, when this Act was passed with that preamble in it, would not the parties who took out policies after that date be correct in understanding that the division of the profits was to be on the entire business, and that that entire business included the earnings on capital as well as the earnings on policies?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. If he did not know what the practice of the company was, I think it might be open to that construction.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. My hon. friends say 'hear, hear,' but if it were not for that fact we would not be here to-night. If it were not for the opinion given by Sir Robert Findlay we would not be here with this Bill; it was because of that opinion the doubt was raised. He has said, upon the statement rendered to him, that the meaning of the Act is not what every one intended it should mean, and so the company has come here to make the meaning plain.

Mr. LENNOX. Did my hon. friend hear the member for Hamilton state in committee that there was no doubt at all but that in a court of justice the opinion of Sir Robert Findlay would be sustained?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. If the opinion of Sir Robert Findlay is sustained, that is the best answer I can give for coming here before the high court of parliament. Hon gentlemen shake their heads, but I can refer to much higher legal authority than I am. If they look at the case of Richards vs. McBride, in England, they will find it decided that if the draftsman has made a mistake, it is for the legislature to rectify it.

Mr. LANCASTER. That mistake would have to be mutual; that is to say it must not deceive the policy-holders. You must not say that because you have made a mistake, the policy-holders must suffer for it.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I will come to that. The question I am discussing is, is this the proper tribunal to rectify a mistake? The difficulty here is that the courts have such a high opinion of parliament that they treat it as not making any mistakes. It is pointed out in one case that the legislators are ideal persons who never make a mistake, and we do not want to undeceive them on that point.

Mr. LANCASTER. Would not we make a mistake if we took away the rights of the policy-holders on the representations of other people?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. That is a question of opinion which each member of the House must decide for himself. Unless I have heard more than I have heard yet, I am of opinion that we would be doing a decided injury to the policy-holders if we did not pass this Bill. I have pointed out that the Act of 1879 has been asked for by the company. If there was anything in the history of that Act to show that the capital stock was to be invested for the benefit of the policy-holders, it was never suggested in the House. The Bill was introduced by Mr. Robertson, of Hamilton, in a very simple statement, which you will find in 'Hansard' of 1879:

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) explained that, according to the original Act of incorporation, the company had power to divide its profits between the participating policy-holders and the shareholders in the proportion of three-fourths to the policy-holders and one-fourth to the shareholders. This Bill proposed to extend this proportion to not less than ninety per cent to the participating policy-holders, and not to exceed ten per cent to shareholders. The only persons who could possibly object to this would be the stockholders, and they, at a general meeting called for the purpose, resolved to carry out the suggestion of the directors.

He did not suggest for a moment that the character of the profits that had been divided theretofore was to be altered, but simply that the proportion of the profits were to be altered. I have pointed out that those profits did not include the investments in the capital stock, and I have not heard in all the discussion on this Bill any person say that it would be just to the Canada Life Company to impose upon it the interpretation which it is said the Act of 1879 ought to bear.

Mr. LENNOX. We have not come to that yet.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. We have come to it in other Bills in this very session, which required the companies to do only what the Canada Life has done. The legislation put through this session requires the companies to divide amongst the participating policy-holders only the profits arising from the participating branch.

Mr. LANCASTER. They have not made any contract to the contrary.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. That has nothing to do with it. I venture to say that there is no company in Canada and no British company doing business in Canada that does what the Canada life has been doing during the last thirty years with respect to its profits. You will look through the Acts of incorporation of the different companies in vain to find one which provides that the company shall divide amongst the policy-holders both the participating and the non-participating profits. If you look over the report of the Royal Commission on Insurance, you will find that in every instance the companies have done precisely what the Canada Life has done, that is: First divide the interest on the capital stock among the shareholders before they make the division among the policy-holders. The Canada Life has gone further than other companies in this respect. Let us look at the Sun Life and see what it has done.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does not the hon. member think this discussion would be better in committee? The question before the House is whether this Bill shall be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, and on that motion the authorities say that a general allusion may be made to the measure, but the details cannot be discussed. All that the hon. gentleman has said could be said in committee.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I listened attentively to the authorities cited, and I understood the details there referred to the sections of a Bill and not to the argument.

Mr. SPROULE. The original motion is that the House go into committee on several Bills. This amendment refers to another Bill.

Mr. BRODEUR. As I understand the situation, the orders of the day are read, and the motion is made that these Bills be referred to the Committee on the whole. On this motion a general discussion might take place as to their general provisions, as stated by Bourinot and May. Then when an amendment is made that one of these Bills should be referred to the Committee of the Whole it will not preclude discussion on the general provisions of the Bill. That is what the hon. gentleman is doing now and Bourinot states further that the details of the Bill should not then be discussed. I interpret this provision of Bourinot to mean that it is not in order to discuss the special clauses of each Bill but that the general provisions can be discussed. The House has been discussing the merits of the Bill and the hon. member for Essex is now discussing its general provisions, without going into the details, the meaning of the special clauses or the drafting or special words included in each clause.

Mr. SPROULE. If that be held to be correct, there will be three or four Bills before the House at the same time and it will be equally the right of the House to go into the provisions of every one.

Mr. BRODEUR. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. It would be an utter absurdity. Therefore I do not think that is the intention in framing the rule.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is the way the rule is drafted.

Mr. LANCASTER. As I understand the authority which has just been read it refers to what can be spoken to on a motion to go into committee on the Bill. We have got past that motion, we have an amendment before the Chair that a certain Bill. embraced in the general motion, should go to a certain place for discussion, and I submit that the discussion must be limited to the amendment. Gentlemen on this side who have spoken, gave in very short language reasons why the Bill should go to committee.

Mr. BRODEUR. No. There is only one case where discussion is limited to the amendment, that is on the motion to go into Supply to which there is an amendment to discuss a special question. The authorities lay down the rule that we must then discuss only the subject of the amendment. In all other motions which come before the House, if an amendment is made, we have the right to discuss not only the amendment but also the main motion.

Mr. LANCASTER. Before the amendment is negatived?

Mr. BRODEUR. Certainly.

Mr. LANCASTER. I would like to see the authority.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is clear that in the case of any other motion to which an amenndment is moved, we have the right to discuss not only the amendment, but also the main motion.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not dispute you have a right to discuss both while the Speaker is in the chair, but you have not the right to discuss them together. The amendment is put and after it is negatived the main motion is discussed.

Mr. BRODEUR. My hon. friend is mistaken. He will see the rule is well laid down that when there is a main motion and an amendment we have a right to discuss both the main motion and the amendment. What have we in this case? We have a motion to go into committee on a certain Bill and an amendment is made that this Bill should be referred to a committee. On this motion and the amendment we have the right to discuss not only the amendment but also the main motion.

Mr. SPROULE. Which includes the Hudson Bay Railway, the Algoma Central Railway and the Canada Central Bill. Does not the hon. gentleman see the absurdity of this?

Mr. LENNOX. This has ceased to be a question of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. My ruling is plain. The main motion is that I should leave the Chair for the House to go into committee on eight Bills which are on the Order Paper. The amendment is that one Bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. We are not discussing the merits of that one Bill. I decide that on that question the hon. gentleman was out of order in discussing the details of the Bill. The hon. member sees clearly the position. It is whether the Bill should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. The hon. gentleman is not to discuss the merits of the Bill on this motion.

Mr. BRODEUR. How about the main motion?

Mr. SPEAKER. The main motion is put.

Mr. BRODEUR. No, the amendment is now before the House.

Mr. LANCASTER. Certainly.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have decided that way.

Mr. MACDONALD. Might I——

Mr. SPEAKER. The ruling cannot be discussed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MACDONALD. I merely wish to ascertain just what His Honour, Mr. Speaker, has ruled. Do I understand, Sir, that you have ruled that on a motion to send this Bill to a committee it is impossible to discuss the alternative of the proposition, namely, that this Bill should go to the Committee of the Whole House?

Mr. SPEAKER. I have decided that the hon. gentleman is not at liberty to discuss the details of this measure on this amendment.

Mr. BRODEUR. He may discuss the main provisions of the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is what he has been doing for some time.

Mr. BRODEUR. I suppose he may discuss the main provisions of the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have decided that the hon. gentleman may not discuss the details. That is what he has been doing. He can give reasons why the Bill should or should not be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. The reason I was going into the matter at considerable length was that my fellow members who had not studied the Bill carefully were anxious before voting on this motion to have a thorough understanding of the case. If I am precluded from explaining, of course, they will not have the benefit of the light I hope to shed around them and will have to vote without it. I will have to abandon a good deal of what I wish to say. My reason for opposing its being sent to the Banking and Commerce Committee is the urgency of having it passed this session. This is the year when the profits will have to be apportioned to the policy-holders if there are to be any profits this year. The custom of the company has been to divide these profits every five years. In 1904 the profits which had been earned in the five preceding years were divided amongst the policy-holders, some having them added to their policy, some having them go in the reduction of the premium and some receiving the benefit in cash. The time for another division comes this year. As a policy-holder, I have a very strong objection to putting this company in such a position that the profits on my policies will be cut off. The company has now got to a position when the profits ought to be very materially increased. Ten years ago they were very considerably decreased, because at that time they had to put up the main part of the reserve which was required by the government. Five years after that the profits were considerably increased, that is at the last quinquennial division. That reserve having been put up, it is reasonable to expect that this year there will be a considerable further increase in the profits. If we are to prevent the company from getting this legislation and they are left in a position of uncertainty, with the prospect of lawsuits. I think any sane directors will say: We will not declare any profits until we know what our position is. They are not bound to declare any profits, to be divided amongst policy-holders, they need not declare them from now until kingdom come. Many members have an entire misapprehension of what these profits mean. There is no law, by contract or statute, which requires the directors to give any profits to policy-holders.

Mr. TURRIFF. What would the company under these circumstances do with the profits?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. The company under these circumstances would accumulate the profits. The effect of this would I think be to ruin the company. If you are going to reduce the dividends from 8 per cent to less than 4 per cent, you will not find any directors enthusiastic about making the business profitable for the benefit of the policy-holders who put them in that position. It will be easy for them to say: we will quit business, let your policies expire, and settle with the policy-holders as their policies mature from time to time. This year, in the natural order of things, they would divide profits, but as business men, they are certainly not going to take the risk of dividing profits with this claim hanging over their heads. The result, therefore, would be that every policy-holder would be up in arms because he was not getting any profits at all. Those who are now getting $10 on small policies would get nothing; and those with large policies would suffer more still. You would then find that instead of the Canada Life asking for this Bill, the policy-holders would be swarming around us insisting that it should be passed. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr Turriff) talked of meeting these angry men. Well, I have met them—as good business men as you will find anywhere—in my own riding. They were not satisfied with everything. They thought that the directors paid up that reserve sooner than they needed, and that the salaries in some cases were too high, but that has nothing to do with the Bill. They realized that if the company were going to pay any profits, it must do a profitable business. But if you are going to cut the company down, so that it cannot do a profitable business, that may be a temporary inconvenience to the shareholders but the ultimate loss will come from the pockets of the policy-holders. Every argument that has been raised to-night, every argument that can be raised, was raised before the Banking and Commerce Committee, and it would not be complimentary to the policy-holders who were then heard, to say that others can present better arguments than they have been able to do.

Mr. SPROULE. With regard to the power of the company, to withhold a division of the profits is it not a portion of their contract and included in each policy that the company will divide the profits periodically?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. No, not a word of it, the company did not agree to anything of the sort. Let the hon. gentleman read his policy.

Mr. SPROULE. I have no policy in the company.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I have.

Mr. SPROULE. If that is not the case, is it not a fact that their agents represent to the people they try to induce to go into the company, that this was the invariable rule and would be done?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. No. I have been canvassed by as many agents as most people, and I know the contrary. The statute does not bind the company nor does the policy. The policy-holders will accept such profits as are allotted to them. There is nothing that compels the company to allot profits to the extent of one cent. If they do allot profits, the proportions are fixed but they are not bound to.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the interpretation of the word 'may?'

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. The directors are authorized by the shareholders. The statute says that the directors have the power to allot profits. Before 1879 they did not have that authority. This statute says: They may, and that shows the importance of proceeding at once. Surely everything that can be urged, has been urged, and it seems to me that the course we are asked to take would be absolutely the undoing of the policy-holders; and as a policy-holder myself I protest against people who claim to be our friends taking a course which is going to work mischief to our detriment. I submit that the Bill should not go back to the committee. It has been fully discussed and the Committee of the Whole is fully competent to deal with it.

Mr. SPROULE. I have a letter here from a policy-holder who has written me several times and who tells me he has entered suit to recover his rights under his contract.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. What is his name?

Mr. SPROULE. His name is Chadwick and he is from Toronto. His letter is dated the 27th of March, and in it he says that the writ was issued a few days ago and was served on the company yesterday. He says further that other writs are to follow and he intends to prosecute his suit until it reaches the highest court in the Dominion. Surely, he says, the government are not going to confiscate what belongs to me under the contract.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I have the writ before me. It is against the Canada Life Assurance Company and asks the company to pay back all those dividends which have been paid the shareholders. How do you expect the company to be able to pay any profit to anybody if they have to pay the back dividends?

Mr. SPROULE. The question is whether we should interfere with the civil right of any one to prosecute a suit for the purpose of compelling a delinquent to carry out his contract. That is where the provincial government comes in. This is part of the civil rights of the people. The province is charged with the responsibility of looking after the rights of infants and orphans not able to look after their own. This is part of the civil rights, and my correspondent says: Am I to be denied the right of going before the Banking and Commerce Committee and submitting my case? I replied that the only way was for him either to appear before the bar of the House or before a committee of the House, which method parliament has devised as the most convenient. I replied further that I believed this Bill would be sent back to the Banking and Commerce Committee, after it was considered by the Standing Orders Committee, that is, if it should be taken up again this session, and that then every policy-holder would have the opportunity of going before that committee and convincing parliament through it that his rights in that contract should not be taken away. But that now is denied, and the farce is to be perpetrated of having a notice published in the 'Gazette' and then not allowing the interested parties to whom that notice was given to appear before the committee and vindicate their grievances.

Mr. GOODEVE. The right hon. the Prime Minister in giving his reason for not allowing this Bill to go before the Banking and Commerce Committee, said that it had already gone before the Standing Orders Committee and that committee had said that the necessary advertising had been done. As a member of that committee, I wish to say that the ground there taken was that the committee was not authorized to adjudicate whether sufficient notice had been given, but only to report what notice had been published. One of the members of that committee cited cases to prove that the notices given were not sufficient, but the objection was taken and that objection prevailed that the committee was not empowered to consider that matter but only to report what notices had been given. I personally asked that a rider should be added to the report of the committee asking that the Bill be sent back to the Banking and Commerce Committee in order that the policy-holders might be heard. There is no necessity for me to reiterate the arguments which have been made to-night. There can be no doubt to my mind that it would be an absolute farce for this House as a Committee of the Whole to dispose of this Bill. The Bill was sent, as I have said, to the Standing Orders Committee. They reported the Bill back, not saying that the notice was sufficient, but merely saying what the notice was. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Clarke) said that the company had readvertised the Bill. Then I ask what was the object of readvertising that Bill if it were not that the policy-holders might be heard in regard to it. All we are asking here is that they may have the privilege and advantage of that readvertising, that all the parties may be heard. The hon. member for South Essex says that no argument has been advanced from this side of the House or by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) why this Bill should not be gone on with. Well, if they have not advanced any such argument, then I say it is impossible to understand any force in reason and logic. There was one particular point raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia which I think is of vital importance. He intimated that there is a general feeling abroad that when the interest of the people comes into conflict with the interest of corporations, it is the interest of the people that goes to the wall. If that is so, then I say that no more important question has been raised in this House since the session commenced. It is vitally important that the country at large should be satisfied that we are here as defenders of the public interest, and not of the interest of any corporation or individuals. I am not going to undertake to answer the arguments of the hon. member for South Essex, though I think they could be easily answered, but I want to keep within the ruling of the Speaker. I am now simply speaking to the question whether the amendment before the House should be adopted, or whether this Bill should be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee in order that the people may be heard. As a member of that standing committee I may say that they took the view they were not there to adjudicate on the merits of the Bill, but simply whether it should be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, and on that ground we reported it. I would ask that every member in this House, realizing the claims of the great public, should give them another chance to be heard. There is no doubt a feeling of unrest throughout the country, which is shown by the rise of socialism and other fads based on the contention that justice is not being done to the people in dealing with matters such as this. It is therefore of the utmost importance that we should give every opportunity to all the interests to be heard on this question, and on that ground I ask that this Bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce in order that every man and woman interested in it may feel that parliament is looking after their rights.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I would like to say a word in regard to the amendment that this Bill should be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I am opposed to that course, and for reasons which I believe are impartial. I have no interest in the matter, except that of a holder of a participating policy in the Canada Life Assurance Company. I was present during the discussion in the Banking and Commerce Committee, and I may say I think we had a very full and free discussion on the Bill without discussing whether it had been advertised as fully as it should have been or not. It was very fully and ably discussed by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), and to some extent by my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), and ably discussed by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Barker) and others. The company had its representatives there. Most of those who took part in the discussion were policy-holders and interested parties, and I think I am within the mark when I say that every man who saw fit to attend the sittings of that committee when this Bill was under discussion had every opportunity to come to a conclusion. After an unprejudiced and impartial discussion, without any partisanship, without any political feeling, the hon. member for Halton, who undertook the chief part of the discussion, did not see fit to divide the committee upon the question. Then it came back to the House. On the 22nd of March it was fairly well discussed in this House, until somebody took the point that insufficient notice had been given, or that the notice given was not sufficiently explicit. Then the Bill went back to the Standing Orders. We know what the Standing Orders Committee reported, and what they were authorized to report. What I fear now is that if this amendment carries this Bill will not be advanced this session. I do not doubt the bona fides of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) in his amendment, and certainly my hon. friend from Assiniboia has made it quite plain what his object is. He does not want the Bill advanced during the present session, but postponed until next fall. I take the ground as a policy-holder on the participating plan that that course will injure the policy-holders and injure the company, and that anything which is an injury to the company will be an injury to the policy-holders. It is idle to say that the policy-holders as interested parties cannot be heard in response to the notice which has recently been given. It is open to the policy-holders to be fully heard before the bar of this House, either in person or by counsel. All their grievances can be heard. It is open to them to be heard by petition, and they can be heard through their representatives.

Mr. LANCASTER. Why not in the usual way before the ordinary committee?

Mr. GUTHRIE. My only objection to that course is that a reference again to the Banking and Commerce Committee will involve delay and the defeat of this Bill for the present session. I am aware of the technicalities which are sometimes employed to delay a Bill. I do not, as I say, doubt the good faith of the hon. member who has moved this amendment, and the hon. member for Assiniboia has made his view quite plain. He says he and his friends want it put off until next fall. I think it would be disastrous to put it off. If the Bill goes to the Banking and Commerce Committee the discussion there may be interminable, and the Bill will not be advanced during the present session, if the present session is going to come to an end within a reasonable time.

Mr. LANCASTER. Who would suffer?

Mr. GUTHRIE. I think that probably chaos would follow. Actions would be brought against this company by the policy-holders, or by the company against the directors, and this would involve the credit of the company and would materially affect the profits. The policy-holders would suffer as a result of postponement. I believe it is in the interest of all parties that this Bill should be considered and considered now.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the hon. gentleman think it is the right and the duty of parliament to legislate men out of court?

Mr. GUTHRIE. No, I do not as a general rule think they should be legislated out of court, but I think it is the duty of this parliament, if a wrong has been done in the past by legislation, to put that wrong right at the earliest possible moment. I do not desire to discuss the merits of the Bill. I have examined it, I have considered it, and I have come to my own conclusion upon it. When the Bill comes up for discussion in the House I certainly intend to exercise my judgment in regard to it without expressing what that judgment shall be at the present time. But I think it is the duty of hon. members in the interest of the policy-holders and of the company to advance this measure and not retard it as they would by the adoption of the motion of the hon. member for South Simcoe.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the hon. gentleman realize that the course he advocates will prevent an investigation as to whether there is a wrong being done by this Bill or not?

Mr. GUTHRIE. No, I do not take that view of it. I think hon. members are quite capable of investigating that matter in this House. I think that forty or fifty per cent are policy-holders and interested parties and that they will take care of the interests of the policy-holders at large.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Following on the question asked the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), if the hon. gentleman believes as he does that it is not in the interest of the policy-holders to so embarrass the company by suits, does he think it is any part of the duty of this parliament to say to the policy-holders that it is not in their interest to sue the company or are not the policy-holders the best judges of that?

Mr. GUTHRIE. I think the House will be able to judge of that when the Bill is discussed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I assume that the House is anxious to divide upon this question and I shall only say a few words. I have not heard one substantial argument for refusing the motion which is before the House now. It is claimed by the promoter of the Bill (Mr. A. H. Clarke) that a mistake was made in 1879. It was claimed by the hon. gentleman who spoke last that a wrong had been done. I want to draw the attention of the House to these statements. These matters came before the committee and I want to explain why I think it is a proper thing that the Bill should go back to the committee again. It is on account of the very discussion that we had in the Banking and Commerce Committee before. It was alleged in the Banking and Commerce Committee that a mistake had been made. So strong was the assurance that many of us in the committee really thought that some mistake had been made. A letter was even produced from Mr. A. G. Ramsay, who had been manager of the company for a long time, and who had been a director on the board. That letter was read hurriedly and then stowed away in the valise of the solicitor and the committee were not able to see it again. When I inquired for it of the clerk of the committee on the following day I found that it had never been handed in. I was under the impression that Mr. Ramsay was responsible in some way for the statement that an error had been made. I am surprised now to find, since I have received a copy of that letter and have had an opportunity of reading it carefully, that Mr. Ramsay makes no such statement. There is no evidence whether such a mistake was made in 1879. I am satisfied that no person could contend that. The solicitor of the company present at the Banking and Commerce Committee meeting, to the best of my recollection and I think I am right; and there are many hon. members who were present, could not get up and say that there was a mistake made. I have never found that any such mistake was made in the legislation of 1879. I believe that Mr. Ramsay is the only living director at the present time, and I am surprised that this matter should have remained quiet so long until the men who knew all about it should have passed off the scene of action. I say advisedly that the committee was practically misled by the solicitor when he made the allegation that an error had occurred in the legislation of 1879 and that we were called upon to rectify that error. That was strongly impressed upon the committee and it very materially influenced the committee. A strong impression was made upon the committee that a mistake had been made in the legislation and that that mistake ought to be rectified. I am satisfied now, after having studied the whole question, that no mistake was made in the legislation of 1879, or yet in the preparation of the petition asking for that legislation. The matter having been pressed so strongly on the committee practically without evidence, but just on the statement of the solicitor, I say that and that alone is a strong reason why the Bill should go back to the Committee on Banking and Commerce in order that they may deal with it more intelligently, knowing the facts now which they did not know before. I am strongly in favour of sending it back, however, that any interested party, be he policy-holder or whatever he may be, if he has an interest in this legislation, may be given an opportunity of stating his case. I could not conscientiously refuse any man that right. I can hardly believe that this House is going to refuse any policy-holder that right. The argument advanced by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that if it goes back to the Banking and Commerce Committee it will defeat the Bill for this session is not justified. Why should it be so? I think there is perhaps power enough behind the Throne to put this Bill through even if it does not go through to-night. I am not afraid but that there will be a way found of putting this Bill through after a week's or a few day's delay. Therefore, I do not think that the argument will have any force or weight with any hon. member. I know it will have no force or weight with me. I am going to do justice to the policy-holders, although we have to delay the passing of the Bill for a whole week. I have many policy-holders in my own constituency. I am bound to protect their interests, and that practically is all the interest I have in it, because I am only a policy-holder in the company for a very small sum. It is my duty as well to protect the policy-holders all over the country wherever they are. I propose to remain here for the purpose of doing that, and I hope and trust the House will see the propriety of adopting the motion proposed by my hon. friend from South Simcoe and of giving the people who are entitled to it the right to say whether they have a grievance or not before we undertake to deal finally with this Bill.

Mr. NESBITT. As a member of the Banking and Commerce Committee I desire to say that this Bill was discussed when it was before the committee and we considered that the notice had been properly given. I consider now that the notice, as printed in the Votes and Proceedings, was properly given in the first instance. If we sent the Bill back to the Banking and Commerce Committee, we would only quarrel over it for two or three days more and we would only arrive at the same conclusion that we arrived at the other day. I would not like the members of the House to be carried away by sensational statements about high salaries and the rights of policy-holders. I represent a section of the country where, in proportion to its population there live as many policy-holders of the Canada Life as in any other section of Canada. The company has been well represented there for a great number of years and there are a great many policy-holders in the district. This agitation has been going on now for three months; it has been published in the papers, and the gentleman from Toronto who is at the back of it has been active. There was no discussion by the policy-holders before the Banking and Commerce Committee and the probability is that unless you go out and seek for it there will be no discussion there if the Bill is referred back. I was home for seven or eight days during the Easter recess and recently from Saturday morning until Sunday morning, and although the papers were full of this thing there was only one man among all the policy-holders in my section of the country who asked me anything about the Bill. He telphoned and asked me what it meant and I told him and he was perfectly satisfied. I am sorry to have to say it, but it is true, that many of the statements that have been made here to-night are pure sensationalism. There must be some reason for the opposition that does not appear on the surface because what the Canada Life asks in this Bill is to do what every insurance company doing business on the stock principle in Canada is doing to-day. I state here that the Canada Life Company has paid as good profits ever since its inception as any company doing business in Canada. That is a broad statement but I challenge any man to get up on the floor of this House and deny it, and if he does I can prove the truth of my statement. I think it would be ridiculous to send this Bill back to the Banking and Commerce Committee to have a reiteration of the same discussion that was carried on for two days already in that committee.

House divided on the amendment. (Mr. Lennox).

(Pairs on this division not a party vote.)

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Centre York has not voted.

Mr. NESBITT. I am paired with the hon. member for North Wellington. If I had not been, I would have voted for the amendment.

Amendment negatived, motion agreed to and House went into committee.

CANADA LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

On the order for the consideration of Bill (No. 56) respecting the Canada Life Assurance Company.—Mr. A. H. Clarke.

Mr. LENNOX. I submit that we ought not to go on with this Bill at this hour of the night. It is a very important Bill, the merits of which have not been discussed at all on this side of the House. It is a Bill that is vital to the interest of 40,000 policy-holders, representing about 200,000 people. We have been sitting here almost continuously since eleven o'clock this morning, it is now past twelve o'clock, we must meet again at eleven, some of us have work at ten, and it is not fair to ask us to take up this Bill at this hour of the night. If the government insists on going on, we will have to discuss it as well as we can. It will take some time. I submit to the First Minister that although we could probably clear the Order Paper of most of the other private Bills, we ought not to be asked to take up this Bill now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think the sense of the House is certainly in favour of this Bill. I think my hon. friend will admit that. We do not want to press the matter unduly. My hon. friend says that he wants to have discussion of the Bill. If the Bill is not unfairly dealt with, we certainly will endeavour to meet his wishes; but if we want to have prorogation soon, the business of the House must be proceeded with, and as the House has decided in favour of this Bill, I think it ought to go on.

Mr. LENNOX. The probability is that the First Minister is right in saying that the sense of the House is in favour of the Bill, in the sense that the majority are inclined at present to put it through. It may be that our discussion of the matter will be ineffective; but we will not assume that for the present. There are a number of gentleman on this side of the House who feel that it will be their duty to discuss this matter somewhat fully. I do not think there is any desire to prolong the discussion beyond what is necessary. Speaking for myself, I will only say what I believe to be in the interests of the public; but the Prime Minister must recognize that although the majority may be in favour of the Bill, yet the minority have a right to have a reasonable opportunity of expressing their views as forcibly as they possibly can.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Might I suggest to the Prime Minister that there are a great many Private Bills on the Order Paper that ought to be put through, and these could be run through in a very few moments. There will be an hour for private Bills to-morrow evening, when Mr. Conmee's Bill and this Bill could be dealt with, and we can clear the Order Paper with the exception of these two Bills.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I do not care to give way to other Bills. There is no reason why a Bill that has been discussed as much as this has been should stand over.

Mr. TURRIFF. I think better progress will be made with the Bill if it is allowed to stand over.

Mr. TAYLOR. We on this side of the House want to do everything we can to bring the session to a close at the time stated; but my right hon. friend knows that if we get up a little fight, it might last all night, and we would make no progress. I suggest to him to accept the suggestion on this side of the House to clear the Order Paper of the other Bills, and let the two Bills referred to stand over.

Mr. LANCASTER. The very negativing of the motion just voted on has forced upon us on this side of the House the necessity of taking a great deal more care before we let this Bill pass. We have prevented the public at large from coming before the ordinary committee of the House to present their views, and therefore it devolves upon us to be all the more careful to sav everything they could possibly have said before the committee. Personally, I feel it incumbent upon me to investigate this Bill very thoroughly on the floor of this House, seeing that we have prevented the ordinary public from going before the Banking and Commerce Committee. We will now have to take the whole responsibility and of necessity we must discuss it at greater length. More time will therefore be consumed than would otherwise be required, and I do not think that in the long run we will gain anything by proceeding to-night.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I appeal to my hon. friends on the other side. I would not press the Bill unduly; it is not a government Bill, but it is in charge of a private member. If it were a government Bill I know the course I would take, but as it is not I cannot do anything.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. If my hon. friend who has charge of this Bill desires to meet the wishes of the House on both sides and does not want to sit until 6 o'clock in the morning, he will consent to have this Bill stand. We have an hour for private Bills to-morrow night, when the leader of the opposition will be here, and then it can come up again on Friday night.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Can we conclude this Bill on Friday?

Mr. G. TAYLOR. I will not say that, but the leader of the opposition will be here then and there will be a better chance of concluding it if we do not get into any trouble over it.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. If it goes over until Monday the Senate will have no time to discuss it.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. They will have a week and a half. Our friends on this side are as anxious to conclude the session as hon. gentlemen opposite, but unless this course is adopted we will not get through on the 19th.

Some hon. MEMBERS. We don't care.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. We don't care on this side either; I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. I think it is unreasonable to press the Bill now. I appeal to the Prime Minister to prevail on his friends to accept this reasonable proposition, clear the Order Paper of all these Bills, some of which are important, and let them go to the Senate. This Bill should not delay all the others, and it is not reasonable to expect members to remain here from 11 in the morning until after 12 at night. We have not yet made a start on this Bill and the chances are we will not.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I want to be reasonable also. This is not a government Bill but a private Bill, and the promoter of the Bill is the best judge of his own interests. If my hon. friend were to accede to the suggestion I made that we could dispose of this Bill during the present week, I would advise my hon. friend to agree to that, but I am met with a negative. If hon. gentlemen would say that we will dispose of it this week, I would advise my hon. friend (Mr. A. H. Clarke) to agree.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the Prime Minister should be content to accept the assurance of members on this side that we have no desire to delay the Bill beyond a reasonable and fair discussion, and in all human probability it seems to me most likely it would get through this week, at the latest it will certainly get through next Monday. If the leader of the House would exercise his influence over one of his followers there would be little difficulty in controlling him to the extent of having the Bill delayed to-night

If, on the other hand, it is forced on against the wish of a large number of members who desire to have rest and to assist the leader of the House in closing the session, the experience of the past has been that we do not under such circumstances make the headway we ought.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend and I are old parliamentarians and we know that we can make progress and dispose of a matter in an hour's time or we can consume a great deal of time without making any progress. If he will say that the Bill will be put through this week I would say to agree.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. On Friday night there will be an hour. If we do not finish tomorrow with a motion to complete the private Bills on Friday night.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Very good, we will do that.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. You might take all Friday night.

Progress reported.

MANITOBA RADIAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 141), respecting the Manitoba Radial Railway Company.—Mr. Molloy.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I did not understand that motion to carry. I think the majority was here.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the hon. member had asked for a division I would have granted it. I gave ample time before declaring the motion to report progress carried.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I never heard it. I ask for a vote on it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I cannot grant a vote on that. My hon. friend understands that I have declared it carried.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I ask five hon. members to stand up and ask a vote.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is too late.

Mr. SPROULE. I appeal to you for your ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I gave ample time after asking whether it was carried, and I declared the motion carried. I cannot at this time when I have called the title of a new Bill reopen the question.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE THESSALON AND NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 104) respecting the Thessalon and Northern Railway Company.—Mr. Smith.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. CONMEE. There are some questions with regard to this Bill which I would like to discuss and I do not want to discuss them to-night. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

THE PRUDENTIAL TRUST COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 91) to incorporate the Prudential Trust Company. —Mr. Macdonell.

Mr. CONMEE. This is a contentious Bill, and I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. LANCASTER. It appears that only Bills are allowed to go through which stand in the name of the hon. gentlemen on the other side. This is the second Bill from this side which is objected to. We ought to know where we stand. Both can play that game. We came to an understanding to clear the paper provided the Canada Life Bill were held over. But now it seems that that understanding is not to apply to Bills from this side of the House. Bills standing in the name of supporters of the government are to pass, but those promoted by members of the opposition are to stand. We are certainly not going to submit to that sort of thing.

Mr. CONMEE. This is a Bill incorporating a trust company. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to it, and I do not feel disposed to discuss it at this late hour. I was not aware that it was the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) who was promoting this Bill, and I am objecting to it on that account.

Mr. LANCASTER. What is your objection?

Mr. MILLER. This Bill was before the Banking and Commerce Committee and was referred to a special committee and is probably the most contentious Bill that has come before a committee this session. Some of us have to meet at ten o'clock tomorrow morning for other business, and it seems too bad that we should have to take up a contentious Bill.

Mr. LANCASTER. Some fifteen or twenty minutes ago the hon. gentleman was one of those who sang out the most loudly to rush through the Canada Life Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD. What were you saying ten minutes ago?

Mr. LANCASTER. I was saying that we should not deprive the policy-holders in the Canada Life of an opportunity of being heard against the Bill. But in the present, case there can be no objection of that kind. This Bill was thrashed out in committee and all heard. The hon. member from Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) does not want to deal with this Bill to-night. Well, we shall play the game all along the line. The hon. gentleman is breaking the arrangement made with the Prime Minister.

Mr. LENNOX. We came to an understanding with the Prime Minister that every Bill on the Order Paper was to be cleared except the Canada Life. If any hon. gentleman was not content with the arrangement he should have said so at the time. If we are not to be kept faith with, we shall know what to do. We have passed several Bills on that clear understanding, and it is absolutely unfair that the hon. member for Rainy River should act as he is doing. He first took objection to the Bill in the name of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Smith). This hon. gentleman who is so anxious to get his own Bill through moves that the committee rise. Then we come to another Bill, we do not know who is promoting it. Does the Prime Minister think we are going down through all the other Bills after that? We are going to do nothing of the kind.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend puts the case in a manner which is not warranted by the facts. I suggested to the promoter of the Canada Life to postpone it until Friday evening, and to allow the Order Paper to be proceeded with. That does not mean that every Bill on the Order Paper must be taken up.

Mr. LENNOX. The proposition was not made by the First Minister, in so many words, to clear the Order Paper; but the proposition of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) was that we should proceed and clear the Order Paper, and that was assented to so far as silence could give consent, and I presumed that was the understanding. The leader of the government did not express dissent, nor was any dissent expressed by any member of the House. If these Bills require considerable discussion, I can see a good reason why they should stand over.

Mr. GRAHAM. Personally I think it is a good reason, when the chairman of such an important committee tells us this is a contentious Bill, and the promoter is absent as well, that it should stand over. Now, my hon. friend has asked on several occasions, when the promoter was absent, that we should not proceed with the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

CANADIAN NORTHERN QUEBEC RAILWAY.

Mr. GEOFFRION moved that amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 38) respecting the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company be concurred in.

Mr. LANCASTER. I would like to know what the recommendation is here. The Order Paper says the Bill is reported with a recomendation.

Mr. GRAHAM. The amendment proposed by the Senate is this:

The Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company may construct a line of railway from a point on its line at or near Hedleyville, thence in a generally easterly direction to a point on the Montmorency river near the mouth of the River Laval.

4. The limit to the amount of the securities which the Canadian Northern Quebec Railway Company may issue and secure under sections 136 and 146 of the Railway Act, both inclusive, should be a total of $30,000 per mile of the line hereby authorized and of all lines heretofore authorized to be constructed, or constructed by the company or its predecessors by amalgamation, including the amount of securities heretofore authorized; and such securities may be issued only in proportion to the length of such lines of railway constructed or under contract to be constructed.

Mr. LANCASTER. That provides for an additional line and it may not have been covered by the notice which came before the Standing Orders Committee. It is a pretty serious thing to increase a line of railway in the Senate. without a new notice.

Mr. DUBEAU. This Bill was referred to the Standing Orders Committee, the committee made a report to the House, then the Bill was referred to the Railway Committee and the Standing Orders Committee reported that the notice was sufficient. The representatives of a company who were opposing the Bill before the Railway Committee did not object to this provision.

Mr. LANCASTER. This seems to be an additional line of railway added by the Senate that was not provided for in the Bill as it passed the House of Commons. Did it come back to the House of Commons for consideration after the Senate assumed to make an amendment?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, it came before the Railway Committee after the Senate had approved of it.

Motion agreed to.

MANITOBA AND NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF CANADA.

Consideration of amendment made by the Senate to Bill (No. 81) respecting the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway Company of Canada.

Mr. CASH. I am opposed to this amendment. The amendment provides that ten miles shall be constructed this summer.

This is contrary to what has been done with other Bills and I do not see any use of it. This is a Bill of the Canadian Pacific Railway and they are asking to construct ten miles.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stands.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 157) for the relief of John Denison Smith.—Mr. A. K. Maclean.

Bill (No. 158) respecting the Bank of Winnipeg.—Mr. Molloy.

Bill (No. 160) to incorporate the Canadian Red Cross Society.—Mr. Macdonell.

Bill (No. 161) to incorporate the Equity Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Macdonell.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 140) respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company.—Mr. Turriff.

Bill (No. 124) respecting the Ontario, Hudson Bay and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Schell.

Bill (No. 125) respecting the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Mr. Schell.

Bill (No. 138) respecting the Quebec Oriental Railway Company.—Mr. Geoffrion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The Grand Trunk Pacific Bill.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.55 a.m. Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, May 4, 1909.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eleven o'clock.

REPORT OF CENTRAL RAILWAY COMMISSION.

On orders of the day being called.

Mr. FOSTER. If my right hon. friend would allow me, I intended to make a motion. I move for leave to lay on the table of the House a copy of the findings of the Royal Commission appointed by the government of New Brunswick to look into the Central Railway affairs and report thereon.

Mr. CASH.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not think that is in order. That is not in order; this is not a public document.

Mr. FOSTER. It could be moved by the unanimous consent of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is not in order.

Mr. FOSTER. If there is any objection, I will let it go as a notice of motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am informed that notice must be given of a motion of that kind.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall let it go as a notice of motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. A couple of days ago a private member on the other side of the House was permitted to make a motion without notice.

Mr. FOSTER. It depends on whose ox is gored.

Mr. SPEAKER. Would the hon. gentleman kindly state what motion was made without notice?

Mr. HENDERSON. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) was allowed to move to drop an order from the Order Paper.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. He was allowed not to add to the load on the Order Paper, but to remove an item from it.

Mr. HENDERSON. The motion was out of order without notice.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It depends on the object.

Mr. SPEAKER. I asked if the hon. member had the consent of the House to make the motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not objecting to your action, Mr. Speaker; I think you were quite right. What I say is, that the right hon. gentleman should not give consent in one case and not in another.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It depends on the object altogether.

Mr. J. D. REID. And the man.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC LOAN.

House again in Committee on Bill (No. 128), to authorize a loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific.—Mr. Fielding.

On the preamble.

Mr. FOSTER. I asked several questions of the Minister of Finance when we were last in committee, and he said he would endeavour to get the information. I asked whether the $205,000 which is mentioned as having been paid on the Grand Trunk Pacific stock went into the actual construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and how it was paid.

Mr. FIELDING. While reference was made in the debate to a number of points, I do not recall that any specific question was put on which I was expected to procure additional statements, but I shall have the matter looked into further.

Mr. FOSTER. Several questions were asked about the $9,000,000 said to have been invested in the railway by the Grand Trunk Pacific, and whether that included the $9,000,000 invested in equipment or rolling stock? The minister was not sure, but he was of the opinion that the rolling stock could only be provided for by an issue of equipment bonds, and that, therefore, it could not be called an investment.

Mr. FIELDING. I did not understand I was to get further information. I gave my hon. friend the information I had, and thought with that he was content; that is to say, that the rolling stock was provided by an issue of equipment bonds, and that, therefore, it could not refer to the item which he mentioned. The chief engineer of the government informs me that is his idea of the matter also. I would not consider that an investment by the company of the company's funds; it is an investment by the people who purchased the bonds.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, the $9,000,000 would be the amount of money invested by the Grand Trunk Pacific in the construction of the road. Does that $9,000,000 invested in the construction of the road include the advance of the Grand Trunk Pacific of more than $7,000,000, and when this Bill is passed and the loan got, and the Grand Trunk is repaid by the Grand Trunk Pacific, will the Grand Trunk Pacific then have $9,000,000 of an investment, or will it own $9,000,000 minus this $7,000,000, which may be simply in there as an advance they have got from the Grand Trunk? It makes a great deal of difference. We want to know what this Grand Trunk Pacific, with its moneyed men, its immense influence and its great resources, has actually put into this road, and we do not know that at present.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not understand that the Grand Trunk corporation—we are not dealing with individuals, but with the corporation—are expected to put in, out of the Grand Trunk treasury, a single dollar. What they agreed to do was to guarantee the Grand Trunk Pacific Company's bonds, to assist the subsidiary company in raising money. If they have in the meantime advanced any money out of their treasury, as would seem to be indicated by the papers, I would regard that as a temporary advance, and not as a contribution of the Grand Trunk to the enterprise. All the Grand Trunk agreed to do was to guarantee the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, within certain limitations. That is what they have been doing, that is what they are still doing under this legislation, and therefore, I would not consider that in the sense I understand my hon. friend's question, they have contemplated any investment at all.

The investment they are to make is not an investment of funds of the treasury of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It is the credit of the Grand Trunk Company which they pledge by way of guarantee, and the proceeds of that guarantee go into the railway. I do not understand that the Grand Trunk Railway Company ever intend or propose to aid the railway in any other way.

Mr. FOSTER. The Finance Minister has hardly caught the drift of my question. We have incorporated the Grand Trunk Pacific Company—I am not now talking of the Grand Trunk Company at all; they have their directors, their shareholders, their influence. The statement is made that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company have invested $9,000,000. Now what I wanted to know is whether they have invested $9,000,000 outside of the advance which the Grand Trunk Railway Company made to them of over $7,000,000, or if, when this loan Bill is passed, and when the money is paid over to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and the Grand Trunk Company gets back its advance of $7,000,000, the minister will be able to say that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company has invested $9,000,000 in it, or whether he will have to say that they have invested $9,000,000 minus this advance which they will have paid back to the Grand Trunk Railway Company; that is, will their investment then be $9,000,000 or less.

Mr. FIELDING. The investment of which company?

Mr. FOSTER. Of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not understand that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company have any $9,000,000 invested except the money that was raised by issue of public securities. Certainly I have had no such understanding.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister's answer says that the Grand Trunk Pacific have invested $9,000,000.

Mr. FIELDING. No, I think not. I think the investment my hon. friend mentions must refer to the Grand Trunk Company itself and not to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company moneys are derived almost entirely, except as respects a moderate sum, from the issue of public securities, one set being guaranteed by the Dominion and one set by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I do not understand there are any other funds available. My hon. friends opposite asked a number of questions which did not seem to me to be of very great importance; nevertheless I have brought down the information as desired. I do not in every case admit that it is essential to the discussion of this question, but I thought it desirable to meet so far as I could the questions of my hon. friend. I think he will find that it has relation to the investment of the Grand Trunk Company. But I have sent for my officer, and I will have the papers in a moment.

Mr. FOSTER. The company, as I understand it, is the National Transcontinental Railway Company, and the answers must be in reference to that company. I find in this statement one of the answers is as follows:

Mr. FIELDING. Is that an answer to one of the questions asked?

Mr. FOSTER. No, not in this case. But there was a question on the Order Paper, and those two answers were given. There is an answer about the investment of rolling stock; the amount expended in rolling stock by the Grand Trunk Pacific was said to be $8,273,000. But I am quite certain that the question with reference to the total investment was as to the investment of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. I am quoting now the answer to one of these questions from the statement brought down by the minister on page 2. Now, the minister says that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company has made no investment in it. Money has been raised for the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and paid over to that company, and that becomes the Grand Trunk Pacific Company's investment, though raised by bonds guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Company. They are primarily Grand Trunk Pacific bonds, they are therefore Grand Trunk Pacific bonds when guaranteed after they have on them the endorsement of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and when the bonds are transmuted into cash it is the cash of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and therefore it is an investment of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I want to know whether the $9,000,000 the minister said the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company had invested, includes the advance of the $7,000,000 made to them by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which advance has been paid back.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend's question now would have relation rather to the amount of the bonds that have been issued by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and in this sense I think the question was last framed. If he will turn to page 2 of the information, he will see a statement of the bonds issued. The first item, 3 per cent government guaranteed bonds outstanding, does not bear the guarantee of the Grand Trunk Company. The next two items, however, are the Grand Trunk Company's guaranteed 4 per cent series 'A' bonds outstanding, £2,100,000; and the 4 per cent series 'B' bonds, outstanding £1,354,000; amount owing to Grand Trunk Railway, $7,094,044.30. Now the $9,000,000 to which my hon. friend refers would cover the $7,000,000 which the Grand Trunk Pacific Company have invested, in the sense that they have borrowed it from the parent company. They owe to the parent company this indebtedness, and in the sense that a man borrows money and pays it somewhere it is an investment, but it is money borrowed from the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which in due course the Grand Trunk Railway Company will receive back. But the obligations which the senior company have incurred are shown in this information on page 2. As I stated before, the 4 per cent 'A' bonds outstanding amount to £2,100,000, and the 4 per cent 'B' bonds to £1,354,000. This information was correct on the date at which it was given; but I think some additional bonds have been issued.

Mr. FOSTER. The question was asked by the leader of the opposition and answered by the minister. I find it quoted on page 5406 of the 'Hansard' by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro):

> Mr. MIDDLEBRO. In reply to a question put by the leader of the opposition the following answer was given by the government:—
> The company state that the total amount invested by the promoters in the undertaking is $9,597,149, and that the total amount invested in the rolling stock is $8,273,454.

Now, what I desired to know was whether that $9,597,149 invested by the promoters in the undertaking includes the advance of over $7,000,000 made by the Grand Trunk Railway. I imagine that it does.

Mr. FIELDING. The question is: Does the $9,700,000 odd include the $7,000,000 advanced by the Grand Trunk Company? I understand that it does. Now, on the rolling stock I desire to confirm my previous statement that the rolling stock is purchased by a separate issue of bonds, and I do not understand that it is referred to in that item at all.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I took it to be. We have that answered satisfactorily.

Now, can the minister give me any more satisfaction than he has heretofore as to the amount invested in the rolling stock, which is $8,273,000? That is raised by equipment bonds and that is the rolling stock which has been loaned or leased to the Grand Trunk on the conditions which have been named? I suppose that is a fact?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes. My hon. friend's present question relates entirely to the rolling stock?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. FIELDING. The Grand Trunk Pacific Company have issued the following equipment stock:

'A' first issue, £1,000,000 in May and July, 1907.
'B' second issue, £1,000,000 early part of 1908.
'C' third issue, £1,000,000 February, 1908.

There have been £3,000,000 issued for this purpose. They state that there has been expended up to December 11, 1908, out of the proceeds of the two former of these issues $8,273,454.80. So that the issue of stock for that one purpose represents £3,000,000 out of which, up to the date mentioned, they had expended $8,273,454.80.

Mr. FOSTER. That is satisfactory. Now, if the minister can tell me equally satisfactorily how that $205,000 is got at I would be very glad. I understood before that there are certain directors who got a certain amount of stock and paid up a small percentage upon it—$5,000 odd being the total amount paid, while $249,000 worth of shares stands in the name of Smithers and some others. I suppose that is held in trust?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. The statement is made somewhere that on that $205,000 has been paid. How has that $205,000 been paid? Has any portion of the stock been sold or has any portion of it been given as security on which $205,000 has been raised? How has the $205,000 been got and once it was got where did it go to?

Mr. FIELDING. I find that my officer has asked one of the officers of the company for information which would enable us to answer that as far as possible and that he has not received their reply. I would hope to have it during the day.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask the Finance Minister if he can supply the committee, either to-day, or at some early day, with a list of the directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and of the other companies that are connected with this undertaking? There are four or five companies.

Mr. FIELDING. It would help me very much to get the information if the hon. gentleman would kindly enumerate the companies the names of whose directors he desires to know. As to the directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific we have that information before us. The names of the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company can easily be found. There was an annual meeting a few days ago and the directors were chosen. I could get it from the public press if my hon. friend has not seen it. What others does he desire?

Mr. BLAIN. The Grand Trunk Pacific Townsite Company?

Mr. FIELDING. I am informed that information has already been given in the House in answer to a question. The directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Townsite Company are Chas. M. Hays, E. J. Chamberlin, Wm. Wainwright, W. H. Biggar and E. H. Fitzhugh. These are all officials of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. BLAIN. Now the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company?

Mr. FIELDING. I presume the Act incorporating them would give the provisional directors. I really do not know what steps have been taken in that respect. If my hon. friend regards it as important I will ask the company to give the names of the directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company. I would expect to find these companies composed of the principal officials of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Are there any other companies in regard to which my hon. friend desires information?

Mr. BLAIN. Yes, the Grand Trunk Pacific Construction Company, whose directors are members of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. FIELDING. I will be glad to get them, but I am sure my hon. friend will find that they are composed of the principal officials of the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. We also desire to know who are the directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific Telegraph Company.

Mr. FIELDING. All right.

Mr. BLAIN. I suppose we might expect to have these names brought down before the third reading of the Bill?

Mr. FIELDING. If I do not get the information before the third reading I will promise to give it to my hon. friend afterwards. I do not suppose the point is of sufficient importance to delay the measure.

Mr. BLAIN. No.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If there are any other Grand Trunk Pacific companies my hon. friend the Minister of Finance might bring down the names of the directors of these companies as well.

Mr. FIELDING. I am afraid my hon. friend will have to give me the names.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART. I do not clearly understand the financing of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway as stated by the Minister of Finance. All the assets of the Grand Trunk Pacific, as I understand it, must be derived from the sale of bonds or stock. The total amount that has been realized and belongs to the Grand Trunk Pacific, according to the returns brought down, is about $9,000,000. The sale of the bonds alone amounts to nearly $9,000,000. How could the $9,000,000 include the $7,000,000 which is owing to the Grand Trunk Railway?

Mr. FIELDING. The seven million dollars do not represent bonds.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I understand that perfectly well. The $9,000,000 includes, the minister states, $7,000,000.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. J. HAGGART. If it includes the $7,000,000 the Grand Trunk Pacific do not get credit for the amount of bonds they have sold.

Mr. FIELDING. That is a separate account.

Mr. J. HAGGART. But you say they are the same.

Mr. FIELDING. I have given my hon. friend the particulars of it.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Yes, but I cannot understand it. The whole of the assets of the Grand Trunk Pacific must come either from the sale of stock or of bonds?

Mr. FIELDING. Surely.

Mr. J. HAGGART. The total amount realized by the sale of bonds amounted to about $9,000,000. The amount sold for the purpose of building the prairie section and a part of the mountain section realized in the neighbourhood of $9,000,000.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, for one section.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Then the total amount that the Grand Trunk Pacific have put into the construction must be the amount of bonds they have sold, plus the amount that they got from the sale of stock, which is a small amount.

Mr. FIELDING. That is shown in the information.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Yes, but the minister stated, in answer to my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), that the $9,000,000 of bonds includes the $7,000,000. It cannot possibly include it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend is mistaken; there are two sums mentioned in these papers which each happen to be about $9,000,000 but they are not the same sum at all. The $9,000,000 referred to under the issue of bonds is shown on the first page and it certainly does not represent the same sum as the $9,000,000 shown farther on. They are two different things although they happen to be about the same amount of money.

Mr. FOSTER. That brings us to another query. What other resources has the Grand Trunk Pacific out of which it has realized $2,000,000? If the $9,500,000 are investments of the Grand Trunk Pacific, not including the proceeds of the bonds, and if the $9,500,000 include the $7,000,000 of an advance, that means that $2,500,000 have been invested by the promoters and that this money has been got from some other source. What other source?

Mr. FIELDING. I would naturally assume it was got by borrowing on the credit of the Grand Trunk Pacific for the various forms of its work. That is the most natural explanation. It is an investment in the sense that the company has raised the money and owes it. We know that they have no sources for deriving money except those mentioned by the member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) but in the meantime, like any other business enterprise, can raise money through banks and financial arrangements.

Mr. FOSTER. Does it seem reasonable that the Grand Trunk Pacific, having no securities, has been able to raise $2,500,000 as a loan? What securities can it give? Is that also an advance from the Grand Trunk Railway which has to be paid out of the $10,000,000?

Mr. FIELDING. The information, of course is not in the possession of the government; it had to be obtained from the company. As we were not asked to cross-examine them and find out the details which my hon. friend asks, I am not able to give the information. I give my hon. friend my own impression of how they would raise it, by the ordinary commercial methods.

Bill reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Bill is read the third time I desire to make a few remarks, not having said much on the Bill during its progress through committee but having tried from close attention to the questions and answers to find out from the government the exact position of affairs. It seems to me, speaking generally, that the government shelters itself in certain ways from criticism in this House and in the country. It shelters itself first behind the name of a Transcontinental Railway and in answer to criticisms of great expense or any cognate criticism it simply gives the general answer: 'Oh, we are engaged in building a great transcontinental railway.' That appeals to the imagination of the people and stifles the proper voice of the people and to a certain extent their criticism as to the ways and means by which the Transcontinental Railway is being built. Then again, I think the government shelters itself behind what they call the 'on all-fours' position with the loan made to the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1883 and 1884. It needs nothing but a mere statement of the facts to show that there is no all-fours comparison between the loan made to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway in the year 1908-9 and the loan made to the Canadian Pacific Railway in the year 1883-4. Not only is there no parallel in the conditions prevailing then and now, but there is no parallel between the securities that were given by the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1884 and the securities given by the Grand Trunk Pacific in 1909. It seems sufficient to say: 'Oh, the Conservatives made a loan of $30,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway and we are only making a loan of $10,000,000 to the Grand Trunk Pacific.' That disarms criticism and shuts the mouth willing to be shut, of the partisan, and confounds to a certain extent the criticisms of the man who is not a partisan. Then the government shields itself behind the argument of national necessity. The Minister of Railways took a leaf in a humble way, from the book of the Prime Minister in 1903 and in 1909 he urged as a condonation of the offence, if offence it be, that there was a great national necessity. He even went so far as to employ the argument made by an hon. gentleman in this House not long ago that it was an instrument of national defence. I think some one in the House calculated the $180,000,000 of our country's contribution to this road, divided it by ten and came to the conclusion that it is equal to building eighteen 'Dreadnoughts' and putting them on the North sea as a first line of defence, against any attacks that might be made on British supremacy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. So the Minister of Railways at this late hour revamped the argument of the necessity of this road on the ground of defence. I think it well to let in a little light on that. I suppose that if a line of railway is to be of value as a means of defence it must be from some pre-eminent conditions inherent in it which are not inherent in the lines we now have. Let us see what these are? In the first place, the Grand Trunk Pacific road commences at Halifax, at St. John or at Moncton, as you please. It passes again at Quebec, if you please; it touches the great city of Winnipeg and then goes to Edmonton, and so through. If a road is to be of value as a line of defence it must be partly because it possesses some advantages in the way of the seaports with which it connects, but the very same seaports of Halifax, St. John and Quebec and a similar seaport on the Pacific coast, in a similar condition of lack of defence or ability for defence, are connected by the Intercolonial, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern. These railways in their branches and connections commence at the same ports on the Atlantic and end at similar undefended ports upon the western shore. Then a railway might have value as a means of defence, owing to its being situated in the interior of the country, remote from the frontier. If the minister will take the outline map of the Grand Trunk Pacific he will find that it is not the northernmost railway, that from Moncton to Quebec the Intercolonial lies further north than west of Winnipeg, the Canadian Northern is really the railway which goes farthest north, so that whichever way you look at it, as a line of defence there is no force in the argument of the Minister of Railways that it is of sufficient national value to justify this House in criticising it lightly, or to lead the people to bear the burden of this heavy debt without repining. But the great defence of the government and their followers is silence. No matter what criticism is made, they meet it by silence or calling: Carried. No matter what extravagance is shown, they meet it by silence or crying: Carried—the more active ones being the ones who cry: Carried. No matter what argument is advanced with reference to the carrying out of the project, they meet it by utter and absolute silence. Show the Prime Minister that the statement he made in 1903 was as absolutely outside of the mark as a statement could be, he meets it with silence. There is not even the poor penance of repentance, even although it be tardy, made by the minister who deceived this House in 1903 and 1904 by making a representation of conditions which have been proved to be absolutely unreliable. And so silence in the last is the resort. But the Prime Minister and the government must believe themselves that in respect to all these things it is the duty of the opposition and of the country to criticise the methods by which this great scheme has been put on to the country, the methods by which it has been carried on and the ultimate result which we see in part now, but only in part, which every year reveals to us as something more grievous, more burdensome and more menacing. Thus the duty of the House and the country is not to be misled by the glamour of a great railway or statements as to lines of defence and the like of that. their duty is not to be diverted from the proper and healthy and sane criticism of the methods by which it was conceived and the methods by which it has been carried on, and the ruinous result in some respects in the ultimate fulfilment of the project.

Let me draw the attention of the government and of the House to one thing. Suppose that in 1903 the government, or the Prime Minister representing it, had stated to the House the whole facts of the case as they are to-day deployed in the public light and a matter of record. Does my hon. friend the Prime Minister think that the country would have taken that scheme from him at that time and would have put it through? If the Prime Minister had stated at that time that a simple business proposition had been made to him and this government to aid the construction to a reasonable extent of a railway from the Great Lakes up to Winnipeg and out through a portion of the Northwest, already more or less settled and more or less served by existing and constructing railways, and if he had stated all the facts connected with the scheme which he introduced, the difficulties to be overcome, the unproductive nature of a large portion of the district to be traversed, would he have received the acclaim of the House and the support of the country? I do not think he can convince himself that this would have been the case. The fact is simply this: The first statement of a proposition is apt to carry the mind of the country. Once that is made and the country fully imbued with that statement, you can afterwards undermine that first statement until there is scarcely a vestige of the original scheme left and you cannot overtake the first impression that was made. It was under the glamour of that first impression that the Prime Minister carried his scheme. Neither this parliament nor the country would have given adhesion to it if he had stated it in all its bare nakedness in 1903 and 1904 when he brought this proposition before the House. Would he have received support if he had stated, for instance, not only that a business proposition had been made to him which could have been carried out with the minimum of public investment and with but a small amount of obligation by the country, which would have done everything that this costly project has done or can do for many years? Would he have received support if he had said in addition that although some man might rise and declare that $13,000,000 would measure the amount the country would have to expend, he must dissent from that statement as being 300 per cent too small? Here is the Prime Minister's own statement on that point:

> The sum total of the money to be paid by the government for the construction of the line from Moncton to the Pacific will be in the neighbourhood of twelve millions of dollars or thirteen millions of dollars and not a cent more.

He went to the country with that statement and he meant that statement to go to the country for in the hand-book of the Liberal party, on which they ran the elections of 1904, we find:

> A Transcontinental Railway for $13,000,000.

And in the text this authorized publication says:

> It is an actual fact, an indisputable fact, that $13,000,000 will cover every cent of the country's expenditure in connection with the railway.

That is the statement made first by the responsible minister to the House, and made known by the minister's assent to the country on the eve of a general election, in each case positive, in neither case qualified, in each case an absolute pledge to the country that that road would be built and cost the country not one cent more than $13,000,000. Suppose that the Prime Minister in 1903 had said: 'Any man who says that it would cost this country only $13,000,000 to build this road is either a lunatic or an ignorant man; it will cost this country before we are through with it, not $13,000,000 but $180,000,000 or $200,000,000; if the man's statement is that this $13,000,000 will not be the whole advance and amount but only the balance of cash that the country will have to pay, it is equally absurd, for the balance the country will put up in the end will be nearer $50,000,000 than $13,000,000.' Suppose that the Prime Minister had stated that in 1903, would he have been able to put his scheme through as easily? But look at it again. In support of this scheme the Prime Minister took an unusual course; he went behind the responsible Minister of Railways, he hatched this scheme without the knowledge of that minister. After it had been hatched and the chicken was able to run about and make itself visible, it was introduced to the notice of the then Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), whereupon that minister declared that the product was too costly, that the undertaking would cost this country $139,000,000, and he took the course—the course of a man who knew his responsibility as Minister of Railways in my right hon. friend's cabinet—of resigning from the cabinet and going back to his seat as a private member. If the Prime Minister had not deceived the House at that time, if he had made it apparent as his Minister of Railways did, that this scheme would cost $139,000,000 at least, would he have got his scheme through so easily?

My right hon. friend had another argument. He declared that this country was under the imminency of dire peril. The United States, our powerful neighbour to the South, were threatening us, he said, with the extinction of the bonding system. We were not safe, and he prayed God that we might not have delayed too long in taking action, because even then, we had delayed almost too long. If he had stated what he knew to be the truth that there was not the slightest vestige in existence of any threat or menace from the United States in that respect, and no ground for our anticipating any national peril or calamity from that quarter, he would have been lacking in another of his strong arguments in favour of his scheme.

Another plea which he made use of was that it would open up a new route through our rich prairie regions in the Northwest, He said this knowing quite well or he should have known the contrary to be the case. There can be no doubt about his having used that argument. The impression he left, the impression he meant to leave, on the members of this House, the impression he intended to create in the country, was that this railway would give us an entrance into an undeveloped portion of our great heritage in the Northwest and open to settlement an immense area of virgin territory. But if he had told the truth, he would have told parliament and the country that that railway, starting from Winnipeg, lay in and out along the lines of existing railways, for every mile of its course, until it reaches Battle river. But in that case, he would not have got through his scheme on the glamour created by this prospect of opening up a new great prairie region. Take the map lately published by the Railway Department, take the railway map issued by the Department of the Interior, and follow the course of this railway after it touches Winnipeg. When it goes into the Northwest from Winnipeg, it runs thence to Portage la Prairie, from Portage to Saskatoon, and from Saskatoon to Battle river and along every mile it is cheek by jowl with railways already built. It is not the opener up of a new country. The road which opens up the new country north of the River Saskatchewan is the Canadian Northern. But the statement of the Prime Minister was that we were undertaking this burden in order to open up a new zone in the Northwest. My right hon. friend cannot shelter himself behind the statement that this railway scheme of his has opened up a new country in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. It was not launched on that ground. The main thing it was to do was to open up new territory to provide homes for thousands of new settlers in the west. Its main object was to open up new wheat fields in remote and unutilized portions of our western territories. which would contribute to the wealth, progress, and prosperity of this country. But had he stated exactly what was going to happen, he would have been bereft of that very strong position which he took before the House and the country.

So much with reference to the inception of the scheme. But when we come to its working out, let us look at the Laurier work in that respect. All through the late campaign the cry raised by the right hon. gentleman's supporters was that Laurier should be allowed to finish his work. What was that work? It was the construction of a National Transcontinental Railway. That was the monument which my right hon. friend was building for himself and which he desired to finish. Let us then look at the work of the right hon. gentleman, not only in its inception, but in its carrying out. I have shown that every bit of the edifice built so far is built upon a false foundation. Let us come now to the working out of his scheme. My right hon. friend told this House and the country over and over again that the liability of Canada would be protected, that the advances of Canada would be secured, and that the security would be a first guarantee upon the undertaking. That was to be one of the first things provided for in the legislative work. To a certain extent that was provided for in the first contract. But the first contract was not signed by the Grand Trunk Pacific. It was signed only by the government; and in 1904 the chief work of my right hon. friend, the builder of this great monument, was to undermine and lessen the securities of Canada for her advances and increase the advances she was to make. There can be no doubt about that. The first mortgage we were to have had was entirely taken out. The second mortgage is now on a parity with the first. The preference of the first mortgagee was entirely eliminated from the Bill, yet my right hon. friend had gained the support of the House and the country on the ground that we were to be protected as first mortgagee and not as second. What was done? Our liabilities were raised by subsequent legislation. At first we were only to guarantee three-quarters of the actual cost in the mountains beyond the prairies, and that actual cost was limited by a maximum sum, but the legislation introduced later raised our liabilities to three-quarters of the actual cost, unlimited by any maximum sum, with the exception of the prairie section. It raised our liabilities by millions of dollars in both the prairie and mountain sections as well. Not only were they raised in that way, but in addition, the rights we had as first mortgagee were postponed and depreciated until they became virtually of no effect. Under the legislation, as it exists to-day, this is the condition of Canada. In the first place we pay interest on the mountain section for seven years. In the second place, the Grand Trunk Pacific can make default of interest three years after that seven years have expired, and that can be capitalized and added to their indebtedness. That makes ten years, and then, after that ten years is over, they have a period of five years during which, if they are in default, we cannot take over the road. The only recourse we have is to put in a manager to administer it; and if there be not sufficient income to pay for the management, the people have to foot the deficit. We can put in a receiver, it is inconceivable that we can allow that road to stop, and if the income be not sufficient to operate it, who pays the difference? The Dominion government. It is the people who are responsible. But if it should pay a surplus, then we have to divide that surplus between ourselves and the Grand Trunk Railway bond-holders. If it should become paying, then our receiver hands it back to the Grand Trunk Pacific. And so on ad infinitum until every vestige of our rights as mortgagee has passed away entirely under the constructive policy in the legislative line of my right hon. friend the Prime Minster. Every step of that policy adds to the responsibility of Canada and takes away from the security which Canada in the first instance had. Again, by the legislation of my right hon. friend, we are bound to build the eastern section, and when we had built that section, professedly in connection with one great transcontinental line, that legislation failed to provide that the Grand Trunk Pacific should lease that eastern section which we built. And I contend to-day, as I have always done, that if after this eastern section is built, the Grand Trunk Pacific do not choose to exercise their option of leasing and operating the road and paying us three per cent on its cost, there is no power in that legislation to compel the Grand Trunk Pacific to exercise its option and to enter into a lease of that eastern section or any part of it. They are given the option to take out any portion they please and run that portion and leave any portion they please. That is the position in which my right hon. friend, in his constructive work as a legislator, has left this country after we have built the eastern section from Winnipeg to Moncton.

Let us go a step further. If the right hon. gentleman was strong in anything, he was strong, in his inception of the legislation and in his canvass before the country on this point, that what he wanted to do was to open up the Northwest and bring the great traffic of the country down through Canadian channels to our own seaports. That was a good drawing card. That was a very mesmeric policy to lay before the people. We have been spending many of our precious millions on east and west lines of communication with the idea of ultimately building up our seaports and our Canadian merchant marine; and my right hon. friend said to the House and the country: 'Here is a scheme by which we propose to tap the great Northwest and bring its rich products through Canadian channels and through Canadian seaports, to the benefit of our own people and our Canadian marine.' He there stuck a good cord which sounded sweet music to the people. But how has he carried that policy out? Why, he absolutely refused to complete that idea by the legislation necessary. Although this side of the House urged him to do so, he brought his political support to the point of refusing any legislation which would make it certain that that stated principle, upon which he founded his scheme and the immense burden the country was to assume in regard to it, would be fairly carried out. What happened? He entered into a contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific that, with the exception of freight routed by the shippers of their own stuff, the Grand Trunk Pacific was, to the best of its ability, to see that western freight should go through Canadian channels and Canadian ports. But then what happened? No provision was made to meet the very important position taken by the Grand Trunk Railway. The Grand Trunk Railway taps the Grand Trunk Pacific at the junction north of Lake Superior 220 miles. Every ounce of freight which is gathered up in the Northwest and which is unrouted when it comes down to Lake Superior junction, goes directly over the Grand Trunk Railway to that company's terminals, and ports, on the lakes. Every ounce of it. The moment it leaves the Grand Trunk Pacific line and goes into the transportation system of the Grand Trunk Railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific is not of the slightest account as regards the direction of that traffic. There is no provision against that in the present legislation. Will my right hon. friend hazard, in the light of his preceding statements, the further assertion that in the years to come the greater part of the products of the Northwest will go over the Grand Trunk Pacific system on its long overland route through the north of Ontario and the north of Quebec and the portion of New Brunswick which it traverses? Will he hazard the statement that such products will take that route? Will it not, on the contrary, the moment it reaches the Lake Superior junction, take the short cut off to the water, and thereafter be in the hands of and at the will of freight carriers over whom we have no influence whatever. The Prime Minister was asked by us to make good his original proposition by binding the Grand Trunk Railway under the same conditions as the Grand Trunk Pacific, so that when the Grand Trunk Railway received its rich freights from the west at Lake Superior junction, it should be bound to send all, except the routed freights, through Canadian channels to Canadian ports. He refused to do this. This year he was given another opportunity to do the same thing. This year he is granting a favour to the Grand Trunk Railway. The Grand Trunk Railway, according to his statement, was to receive $25,000,000 as capital stock from the Grand Trunk Pacific. According to his statement, that stock was to be used for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, so that when the Grand Trunk Pacific wanted money, it could call upon the proceeds of that stock at par for the money it needed.

My right hon. friend stated that, he adhered to that, he went to the country on that. and got his election on that, in connection with other things. Now he comes into the House, and his Finance Minister states in so many plain words: 'Not a dollar of that stock need be called upon, or ought in equity to be called upon, to supply money to build the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway; that stock belongs to the Grand Trunk Railway, and is a payment for guaranteeing the bonds which, under contract, it has agreed to guarantee.' Now what can be made of a position so diametrically opposed to the position of pre-election times? And what becomes of the solemn statement of the Prime Minister when, a few years afterwards, he has the absolute contradiction made to it by his own Finance Minister, and he himself by his legislation coincides with that contradiction of the Finance Minister? So that to-day he is doing for the Grand Trunk Railway a favour by becoming their banker, under that condition of things loading up the country with $10,000,000 more, because he repeatedly stated in this House that we would not be called upon for another cent, that the Grand Trunk Railway was a responsible company, the Grand Trunk Railway got the stock, and got it for the purpose of financial aid, and our liabilities were limited by the contract, and whatever other money was necessary would have to be provided by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which was able, responsible and bound by the contract to carry it out. To-day he nullifies his statement by his legislation, he loads the country in the interest of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Now when he comes to-dav with a favour to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and is asked again: 'Will you put in a clause now by which the Grand Trunk Railway Company will be bound to forward all unrouted freight through Canadian channels and through Canadian seaports,' what is the answer of my right hon. friend? Mr. Speaker, will I be out of order if I say, a quibble, and nothing better than a quibble? He says, 'Oh, this is not the time to do it.' Is it not a time at which it could be done? Are we not doing a favour to the Grand Trunk Railway Company over and above everything we were bound to do? When a $10,000,000 loan is made as a favour, when the invitation is held out to the same company, by the Minister of Railways and Canals and by the Minister of Finance: 'Come again next year if you are in difficulties, and we will do the same,' is it not an opportune time when, if my hon. friend were honest in his desire to assure the passage of the great west products through Canadian territory and out of Canadian ports, he could make that certain in the only way in which he could make it certain? But he will not do it, this is not the opportunity.

Then he went one step beyond what was necessary, a case of a witness volunteering more than the simple answer to his question, and he said, 'There will be an opportunity.' When? When the lease is made by the Grand Trunk Pacific for the entire portion of the eastern section. But when a lease is made for the entire portion of the eastern section, with whom is that lease made ? With the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and not with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. And though you duplicate the present arrangement when you make that lease with the Grand Trunk Pacific, what power have you got over the distributor of this freight, which is the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself? So he knew, if he knew the law, that when that opportunity came he would be absolutely powerless to tack on any condition binding the Grand Trunk Railway Company. He will be making a lease with the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the only thing he could do would be to try to modify their contract. But their contract is plain in that respect now, and he could not make it any stronger than it is at present. So that an apparent answer was really deceptive to the people of this country and to the House. That is the condition in which we are to-day, and to-day I charge upon the right hon. gentleman that his main argument that the rich products of the west should be directed through our own seaports and our own Canadian channels, is not guarded or guaranteed by any legislation to that effect, and the right hon. gentleman refuses to guarantee it, now when he has the opportunity of his life for attaching a condition to the great favour we are giving to the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Let me go a step farther and let me ask my right hon. friend, as he has been asked by the leader of the opposition, to view the situation of things in the east, and my right hon. friend did not deign to answer. It was put up to him as specifically, as categorically, as any man could put it. What did he propose to do in view of the condition of things in the east, with the Quebec bridge nowhere, not to be finished until 1915, a part of the eastern section almost entirely built, and which will be finished within a year's time—what did he propose to do in that condition of things? What was my right hon. friend's answer? 'It must not surprise the House,' he said, 'if I inform them that I and my colleagues have been thinking that matter over.' Well, perhaps it might not surprise the unthinking portion of the House, but even that might surprise some of the members in the House who are cognizant of the haphazard way in which my right hon. friend entered into this great scheme, and into cognate schemes in reference to it. He has been considering it. But when he came to give a definite idea as to what would be done, the right hon. gentleman had not an idea; he simply said, 'I do not know what can be done; somebody has mentioned a ferry—' and he stopped there. Nobody had mentioned anything else, but somebody had mentioned a ferry, but he did not know what could be done about it, and in the end he took the ground of non-possumus: 'I cannot say what we will do, I have not any plans, I can only say that we have been considering it.' But it does not strike my right hon. friend that there is trouble in store for him there? Would it not have been the part of a cautious man, of a man who was husbanding the resources of this country, to have been very careful as to how he spent thirty-five million dollars of the people's money on that end of the road from Quebec down to the city of Moncton? What was the condition of things? You had a government road into which we had put $80,000,000 or $90,000,000 of the people's money; you had a road which was under almost annual deficits. due to lack of trade, or lack of management, and it would be clemency to my right hon. friend to say that it was due to lack of traffic. $80,000,000 or $90,000,000 of the peopl'es money invested in a road from Levis down to Moncton, St. John and Halifax. Would it not have been the part of caution to go very slow, not duplicating that road until a necessity had been shown therefor? But my hon. friend would not wait, would not be cautious, would not consider the matter at all, and the thing was carried through. Start it, build it, think about it, ponder about it afterwards. Now what did my right hon. friend do? When it was objected that that ought not to be duplicated, he said: 'Distance is the essence of the matter, we will save from 120 to 140 miles from Levis to Moncton.' Did my hon. friend say that?—no doubt about it. Did it go to the country with his impress?—no doubt about it. Did it help to elect him?—no doubt about it, in connection with other things. My right hon. friend had not even the reasonableness to take time enough to put a tape line over the country before he involved the country in an expense which is now amounting to $35,000,000. How does it come out after a tape line has been put on? What did you want to get? You wanted to get a four-tenths grade. The whole argument was—no good without a four-tenths grade. Will my right hon. friend be surprised if I tell him two things? First, that, as the road has been decided upon, he does not save 120 to 140 miles, but he saves only 29 miles. Will he take the other fact that if he had carried out his provision of having a four-tenths grade his road would have been two miles longer than the present Intercolonial Railway? How did he avoid the making it two miles longer? How did he save his 29 miles? He saved it by the device of murdering the grade. He has no road and never will have with a four-tenths grade, for the accomplishment of which he pledged his word and pledged the money of this people. An arithmetical calculation will have to take place. You have saved 29 miles, you have sacrificed your grade, you have to have two pusher grades of 10 and 12 miles and you have the permanent and perpetual cost of the operation of the pusher grades. Just the mere precaution of laying the tape over the ground would have told my hon. friend that he could not have saved 140 miles. But, he refused to wait for that. Now, what have we?—just what I have stated. I will put a question which was put before and to which we have had no reply. Would it not have been wise, when my right hon. friend saw the immense expenditure which was being put upon this country, to have gone slow upon that Quebec and Moncton end? Has he gone slow? When the Quebec bridge fell and he knew that it would be five, six or seven years before it could be built and of no use to him or to the road, would it not have been reasonable then to have gone slow? But my right hon. friend did not go slow. Up to this date he has spent $28,000,000 on that end. He told this House that it would not cost more than $10,000,000; yet, when it is finished, it will cost $35,000,000. In a year's time my right hon. friend, who is constructing a monument for himself, will have a disconnected end of a road through a locality which will give little or no local traffic, and a road which will compete with and starve to the extent that it gets traffic the government railway, into which we have put $80,000,000, and he will have it there at a cost of $35,000,000 more of this people's money. What will he do with it? Well, there are different kinds of monuments, but that is a kind of monument that I would not like to have pressing down on my remains. At the end of next year it will be built. Does my right hon. friend propose to put rolling stock upon it? That will be another great expense to the country. Does he propose to run it and have another parallel Intercolonial railway with another parallel and still greater deficit in proportion to its length? So then we will have this delightful alternative, either to let it remain there silent, useless and depreciating or to work it at a loss, find the rolling stock, make all the expenditure and add again by deficits to the burden of the country. That is the simple alternative. Why, a man of business instinct and of business methods would have stopped that great expense even although a few millions had been spent, until the road had been brought within the reach and purview of practical operation. However, there my right hon. friend is. Just a little while ago a deputation waited upon him asking for aid for the Georgian Bay canal. Other deputations have asked for great public improvements which would have done good to the country. That section of territory had the Intercolonial Railway through it. My right hon. friend is only saving 29 miles and that at the expense of two costly pusher grades. He has taken $35,000,000 of the people's money, tied it up there forever, and he has to turn the cold face and the cold hand to propositions for the real and active development of this country in useful ways. There it stands. What is my right hon. friend going to do about it? How much better would it have been if he had taken a few millions of money and made the Intercolonial Railway just as good a road for freight hauling as he is making that new road from Levis down to Moncton. Why was not that done? That was our road, we had $90,000,000 or $100,000,000 in it, it was a burden upon us and a source of deficits, and it was that because of the lack of traffic and the difficulty of transport over it. Why would it not have been the part of prudence to have made it for all time to come a road, in grades and curves, which would compare with any Canadian railway and so utilize it, feed it and fatten it by the product of the west, which would be trained over the 500, 600, or 700 miles of our own road? Why would not that have been the part of prudence? But instead of that my right hon. friend has got what he has got. Now, I must hurry on, but I want to call the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) to an argument that the Minister of Railways and Canals made and which was incidentally made by my right hon. friend as well. The Minister of Railways and Canals says that the paramount thing is to get the products out from the west. The Minister of Railways and Canals made a fine and flowery argument just about as near to the point as Timbuctoo is to the capital of this country. He said: 'Look at the homesteads which have been taken up in the Northwest; 13,000—15,000 homesteads have been taken up. Look at the people who are going into the Northwest; look at the grain that they will be raising for the sometimes starving peoples of the world in keeping with the advancing rate of wheat bread consumption.' It did not occur—or did it?—to my genial friend the Minister of Railways and Canals to inquire if there would have been one single homestead less taken up in the territory traversed by the Grand Trunk Pacific if never a dollar had been expended upon the eastern extension from Superior down to Moncton, which has involved us in $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 of absolute expenditure. Has a single homesteader gone in there because the country is spending $35,000,000 to parallel the Intercolonial Railway in the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick? Not a single one. Will a single bushel of wheat be raised other than is raised now by the fact that we are building that road there at enormous expense? It all comes back to the fatal error, the error was this, that when a business man put before the Prime Minister a business proposition, the political instinct got the better of the business instinct and a political rather than a business railway was built.

A few million dollars in cash, maybe only a few million dollars of guarantee, would have built every mile of that line from the Great Lakes through to Winnipeg and through to the Pacific ocean, would have built every mile of it and we would have had everything that we have to-day with reference to the development of the west and the carriage of freight. This vast burden of $150,000,000 or more which was then assumed lightly and without forethought, to-day weighs upon us and burdens us, with no benefit commensurate with the expense. These northern regions of Ontario and Quebec might have been opened up but they might have been opened up later and gradually, and to the great benefit of Canada. For what happpens to-day? To-day the Prime Minister has put clogs on the free feet of this Dominion—and heavy clogs they are. The Prime Minister went into this with a statement that $13,000,000 would build the road and yet before it is completed he will have added $180,000,000 to the debt of this country, he will strain the credit of this country, he puts himself and the country into this position that in order to carry out such a wild goose scheme he is sealing up the coffers, paralyzing the power of the Dominion of Canada to go on in other and useful ways of development. For many years to come there will knock at the gates of the Cabinet propositions which would be of the utmost benefit to us, demanding aid, and the Prime Minister's answer will have to be: 'Impossible. We have incurred such an enormous expenditure with reference to this eastern section that we cannot aid you, we cannot aid you.'

Suppose that the alternative had been something like this: Take a few millions and make your Intercolonial Railway a good road. Take a few millions more if you like and subsidize the Grand Trunk Pacific from the lakes to the Pacific ocean —guarantees would have done it, there is not a foot of soil after that road leaves Winnipeg until it reaches almost the Rocky Mountains, there is not a mile of country which it passes through that will not, the moment it is opened, give the road its paying commerce. Hon. members talk about this loan being on all fours with the loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why, you have put this line right in between two great lines of communication from Winnipeg west. The road is built through a country which in the main would have been served and served well by existing lines. But the point I wish to make now is that you put it through a country which was rich and which would offer traffic the moment that the transport was ready for it. A few millions of dollars would have done both of these things, a scratch of the pen on Mr. Hays' proposition to you would have put the traffic, when it came out of the Northwest, at the disposal of your Intercolonial Railway. Is there any doubt about that? There is Mr. Hays' proposition, there is what the Grand Trunk was willing to do, and to pledge itself to. That is what the hon. gentleman refused to have done. By adopting that plan you would have had the traffic secured, a line secured from the waters of the Great Lakes out to the Pacific and you would have it secured with very little pressure upon this country financially. Then if the Georgian Bay canal is a great economic and national undertaking, which would redound to the great benefit of this country in opening up deep water carriage from the west down to the sea, if that is admitted, and if $100,000,000 would have built that canal, put that amount on one side. Then there is a demand that the Welland canal shall be deepened to a proper depth so as to accommodate the commerce on these lower lakes. That would cost somewhere about $40,000,000 and the two $140,000,000 against $180,000,000 or $200,000,000 that the government have bound around the neck of this country and for what outside of the great western branch of that line? You would have been able to contemplate that great line of internal canal transportation by the Georgian Bay canal and the southern line by the Welland canal, and you would still have been $40,000,000 better off than you are with neither of them completed, and with this burden of the eastern section upon the shoulders of this country. Can any one doubt as to which would inure most to the development and the benefit of Canada. The cheapening of the transport of the products of the great west, in this time of world-wide competition, which makes a cent a bushel almost the consideration which shall impel trade and which shall make the profits for the people who produce the grain, is a problem of the greatest national importance. But instead of that you have this useless burden.

Let me make clear before I sit down, one point. Let no man say that my argument is an argument against the building of this line into and through the great Northwest and to the Pacific ocean. That is a matter about which there was no difference of opinion. It was the political ends that were tacked on to the project that we have objected to. They entailed great expense and were ahead of their time, they were not productive and will not be productive. What local products, from Moncton up to Quebec, will feed a railway? What local products from Quebec up to Lake Superior Junction will feed a great railway which in its maintenance and operation will be the most costly of any of the great railways of the Dominion? All that has been gained in the opening up of the great Northwest, in providing means of transportation and increased markets for Canadian products, would have gained by the alternative project of which I have spoken. Later on these adjuncts might have been built, but the country will ponder, more and more as the years pass on, the question whether it was necessary that this costly addition, this costly duplication, should have been made at this time. One word more and it is this. If my hon. friend had not the privilege of being a member of this House and were carrying on this enterprise outside, if he were simply the promoter of a great company to build this road, and if, in his prospectus, he had stated the alleged facts that he has put forth with reference to this great national undertaking, and had signed his name to that prospectus as he signed his name and gave his imprimatur to the public measure before the House, and had induced people to invest their money to the tune of $200,000,000, he would have found himself in the clutches of the law for issuing a prospectus entirely falsified by the facts. There are some advantages in being a member of parliament and, my right hon. friend will never have occasion to cease thanking his stars that he launched that scheme under the shelter of the privileges of parliament instead of outside parliament as a director and promoter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The course taken by my hon. friends opposite is not at all a cause of surprise to me, nor, do I believe, to any body else. It is in keeping with their attitude from the first towards the great work in which we are now engaged. That attitude has been one of hostility and blind hostility, and it is manifest that the results of two elections have not yet opened the eyes of these hon. gentlemen. When in 1903 we brought into this House a Bill for the construction of another transcontinental railway, the object of which was to connect the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific, every inch of which would be on Canadian ground, we were met from the other side with a storm of objections — objections to the terms granted, objections to the route selected, objections to the expenditure, objections to everything. They objected to the spirit and the letter of the Bill, to every line and every word of it, from the first to the last syllable. These objections were urged on this House, but they failed to make any impression. We were then told, however, that if we only dissolved the House and consulted the people, our project would be torn to pieces by an indignant electorate. When that legislation was completed in 1904, we thought that, in a project of this magnitude, it was due to the country that we should, before entry upon it, ask the opinion of the people. We dissolved parliament and then we had the question fought over again on the hustings as it had been on the floor of this House. All the arguments which had been urged in parliament against the project were urged on the hustings and with no greater success than before parliament. All the objections were thrust aside, and the public answer came clear, decisive and emphatic: go on with the work. With this high sanction, we started the enterprise; but as the work progressed, we found that we would have to revise our estimates. We found that our calculations had been too low and that the obstacles were greater even than we anticipated. The matter came up more than once in the House. It has been this session the subject of more than one debate, and my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) frankly admitted that the cost would be much greater than we expected. Again we dissolved parliament and went before the people. Again the subject was discussed. Again all the new calculations were made before the public; and with all these facts before them, the electors gave the emphatic, decided answer: go on and finish the work. We thus have a double verdict. That verdict, twice given, ought to convince my hon. friends opposite that the people believe as we do and as we asserted in 1903, that this road is a political and a commercial necessity. And my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Foster), and who has put the case in as false a colour as he could, has not been able to say that our scheme was ill conceived, that it is not a good commercial enterprise. All he could say was that it was premature, that there was no immediate necessity for the line from Moncton to Quebec or from Quebec to Winnipeg. He did not say that it should not be built. On the contrary, if his argument amounted to anything, he said that it must be built. And in concluding his remarks he said: 'Let me be understood as not hostile to the enterprise; all I say is that it came too early; we might have put our money into building railways more likely to pay dividends and later on build the line from Quebec to Winnipeg.' His whole argument was to that effect. If we had come, he said, to the House with a scheme for a continuation of the Grand Trunk Railway system from North Bay across the prairies to the foot of the Rockies, or across the Rockies to the Pacific ocean, the opposition would have gladly supported it. Well, I have only this to observe, that this mongrel idea of his was not the spontaneous inspiration of the moment. It came at a time when the opposition realized how deeply our scheme had gone into the minds and hearts of the people, and my hon. friends had to suggest something to save their faces. It was not the spontaneous act of the moment, but whether it came late or early, we would not accept the proposition. The proposition was made by the Grand Trunk Railway that we should favour a scheme to extend their railway from North Bay to the Pacific ocean. But we were opposed to that idea. Must I point out that the Grand Trunk Railway was built some 60 years ago, and built, not with regard to the future, but simply the needs of the moment. If we had adopted that suggestion, we would have had, not a national railway, but a hybrid railway, half Canadian and half American. The Grand Trunk Railway was built some 60 years ago simply for the needs of the day without any thought of the morrow, and we are told that we should be as blind to-day as they were 60 years ago and commit the same grave errors. If that be the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is not ours. Our policy is to have a national railway all through Canadian territory from the Atlantic to the Pacific. That was the idea we put before the people, and that is a policy which should appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite. Our policy is to bind the east and the west — the east, which was the cradle of the nation, and the west, which is now the hope of the nation—by means of that tie which commercial relations always create. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not favour that policy. Why? Because, in their opinion, a part of the route to be traversed by this road is not as good land as the prairies, because a part is barren, uninviting, unfit for settlement and incapable of maintaining a population. But, even if it were, would that be an argument against the scheme? In that case you never would have a national railway crossing the continent because the continent is not all fertile prairie. There are mountains, morasses and swamps, but the national idea is to have a Canadian railway from one ocean to the other. At all events that is our policy.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

House resumed at three o'clock.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I may be pardoned if I repeat the last thought to which I gave utterance before the recess, to the effect that the argument put forward by the opposition against the building of the Transcontinental Railway is no argument whatever. I stated that if it were an argument we never should have built a transcontinental railway; if it were a valid argument it was a mistake to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, since the section of that railway around Lake Superior runs for hundreds of miles upon a bed of granite rock upon which, as every body knows, there is not soil enough for grain to germinate or for trees to obtain firm root. If this were an argument we would have to consent submissively and impotently to take a position subordinate to and dependent on a foreign country. In the face of all this, I repeat that the policy which we adopted six years ago for the building of a transcontinental railway, is a commercial and a national necessity and if it suits the convenience of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to contest and deny this proposition they are welcome to do so, and the more they deny it the more welcome they are to it. Is it true, as a matter of fact, that the whole section of country between the valley of the St. Lawrence and the prairies of the west, is, as has been represented, barren, uninviting, unfit for settlement, unable to maintain a population? We have heard this before, this position was taken a few years ago when we first discussed the project we have now in hand. The answer to this question runs in the streets, everybody knows to-day that in the northern section of the country, north of the Laurentian ridge where the road has been located, there is a vast section known as the clay belt which for soil and fertility is equal to the valley of Lake St. John or of the St. Lawrence. Perhaps my words will not make any impression on hon. gentlemen opposite and I may remove their doubts if I quote to them from a report which has been laid before the House, coming from the Transcontinental Railway Commission, describing the character of the country through which that section of the road runs. The report is to this effect:

I may state that from time to time I have received reports from district and other engineers in regard to the nature of the country and timber along our line in western Quebec and northeastern Ontario. I have had these summarized, and a map explanatory of same prepared, which I attach. The land fit for cultivation in district 'C' commences at a point about 4 miles east of the Bell river, and extends westerly to the Ontario boundary. The extent of this land north and south is shown on the accompanying map. Most of this land will be fit for cultivation, being a good clay soil easily drained. No doubt this arable land extends much farther north than shown on the map, but we only report on the country as far as explored by our engineers. On this tract, as shown on the map of district 'C,' there are about 5,800 square miles, or 3,712,000 acres, and of this amount it is said 2,500,000 acres will make good farming land, and most of the rest can probably be drained afterwards.

The timber from the Bell river to the Hurricanaw river is principally spruce, balsam and jackpine, running from 6 to 18 inches in diameter. From the Hurricanaw to the Ontario boundary it is second growth, principally of balsam, birch and spruce, though there is some good spruce in the southern part of the tract as marked.

On the Hurricanaw there is good navigable water for steamboats 60 or 70 miles in a southerly direction towards the height of land. All this country is well watered, and interspersed with fine lakes and rivers.

District 'D.' In district 'D,' commencing at the Ontario boundary, or the 114th mile on the attached map, to the 185th mile, there are about 2,100 square miles, or 1,344,000 acres of land. The percentage of arable land fit for cultivation upon clearing may go up to sixty per cent, although there are long swamps near the line between the 155th and the 175th miles, but these can be easily drained, as they are not deep. Timber is small, except in the valleys.

From mile 185 to 285, there is an immense tract equal to any agricultural land in Canada, being a succession of long ridges, interspersed with swamps which can be easily drained. The country is well watered, and has an abundance of water-power.

There are 7,500 square miles, 6,000 of which, or 3,800,000 acres, can be considered good arable land.

The timber is small, consisting of spruce, balsam and white birch, except on the southern end of Ground Hog river, where there is some white and red pine. From the 285th mile to the 325th, the soil is of a more sandy nature, though the valley of the Missinabie river contains some excellent land. The area would be about 2,000 square miles, containing probably 500,000 acres of good arable land, 300,000 acres of medium quality, and the balance of pasture and rocky land well wooded. The green tinted area south of the 170th mile to the 190th mile is also good land, but would require more drainage. The country here is very flat, covered with moss swamps, with low clay ridges, but all with a good substratum of clay. According to reports this clay belt extends much further north than shown on the map, bct the area shown has been put in from personal observation and reports of the engineers.

District 'E.' From the 325th to the 355th mile, there is a good wide range of agricultural land which would make an area of about 2,000 square miles or 1,000,000 acres. This is a good sandy loam, well watered and timbered with small spruce, birch and balsam.

From the 355th mile west to mile 475 the area of arable land is much more restricted as far as our reports go, being confined more to the valleys of large rivers. There are probably 1,000 square miles or 600,000 acres in this tract. West of the 470th mile there is very little land fit for cultivation.

This report ought to be satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite and should prove to them that the impression they had that this country was absolutely barren and unfit for settlement is entirely erroneous. I can scarcely hope that I can satisfy my hon. friends on the other side if they will persist in their heresy. They are skeptics upon almost everything. Skepticism is perhaps the least of their many faults and I will not quarrel with them over that because after all they are not alone, there have been many skeptics in this land. Is there, for instance, an inch of our country, even the most fertile portion of it, which has not been at some time or other, derided and decried, I will not say by its enemies, but by its friends, its well meaning though misguided and short-sighted friends? In the olden time, in the early days of the colony, its progress was long retarded because the early voyageurs, the early settlers who came here, finding climatic conditions so different from those of their native land, believed it was not possible that there could be a country as fertile as we know it to be under climatic conditions such as they found here. It is on record that Sully, the first minister of Henry IV. of France, and one of the ablest men of his generation, gave it as his opinion that the continent of North America, north of the 40th parallel, was unfit for white men. This would include not only Quebec, Ontario and the maritime provinces, but even New York, Illinois, and the northern tier of the American Union. Without going so far back as that, if we go to days almost within our personal recollection, we find similar expressions. For instance, when the Grand Trunk Railway was commenced in 1852 or 1853, we find that the same kind of hostile criticism was urged against the project as is to-day urged against the Grand Trunk Pacific project.

I have asked a friend to look up for me the literature of that day as it appeared in the newspapers, and it certainly makes very strange reading. One critic said he was violently opposed to the extension of the railway from Toronto to Sarnia because, not only was it his opinion, but he was certain there would be no wheat for export from that section; whereas, we know that for 30 years that section of the country was the granary of Canada. Another critic was violently opposed to the extension of the railway to Georgian Bay because, to use his own language, that country was an impenetrable and barren desert. Now, I say that if the early pioneers of Canada, the early settlers who hewed out the forests in Quebec and Ontario, were to come back and see the present condition of things, they could not credit the testimony of their own eyes. Instead of the forests with which they were familiar in their days, they would now find golden harvests of wheat, they would now find the land given over to fruit, to dairy and other similar products. They would find wheat grown in a section of the Northwest which, in their youth, was supposed to be forever ice bound in the frozen north. Only as late as 1869 Archbishop Taché, who was certainly a man of great intellect and beautiful character, a man who had 20 years experience in the Northwest, who had roamed over the whole continent from the Lake of the Woods to the Rocky Mountains, from the American boundary up to Lake Athabaska, and who knew the country as well as any one could know it, as late as 1869 Archbishop Taché wrote a pamphlet wherein he asserted that what is now Alberta, what is now Saskatchewan, what is now Manitoba, was absolutely unfit for agriculture. He gave it as his opinion, over his own signature, that the valley of the Red River, the valley of the Saskatchewan, the valley of the Assiniboine never could produce wheat, whereas, we know that only last year those plains produced no less than 100,000,000 bushels of wheat. Archbishop Taché lived long enough to know how far he had been mistaken, and he frankly acknowledged his error, like the true man he was. And, Sir, I venture to predict, though I very seldom predict, and never in election time, that the day is not far distant when the skeptics whom I see before me will also have to acknowledge the error of their way; but I am not certain whether they will do so or not.

But, Sir, even since we have started this project the events which have taken place amply justify the policy which we introduced nearly six years ago. Since 1903, when we introduced the grand project of building a transcontinental railway which should pass north of the Laurentian mountains, there has been, in those very mountains at Gowganda and at Cobalt, a discovery of minerals the like of which has never been found perhaps in any other part of the world. We have been accustomed to hear of the wonderful silver mines of Mexico, of Colorado, of Nevada, but what are they compared with the silver mines of Cobalt and Gowganda? And is it to be supposed that nature has exhausted her efforts in Gowganda and Cobalt? Is it to be supposed that she has not in her womb other Gowgandas and other Cobalts. Why Sir, the geological formation in which Gowganda and Cobalt are situated extends for hundreds of miles in all directions, and it is certain that we shall find other similarly rich districts. Already you have railways built or contemplated to reach those mineral claims, already you have railways running south and north to reach those valuable deposits. Suppose we had no transcontinental railway, those mines would have no permanence, they would have no outlet; but now they will be connected by railway communication with the Grand Trunk Pacific which runs east and northeast, and the cycle will be completed.

All these remarks apply in a like manner to other sections of the road, the section between the St. Lawrence and the maritime provinces, or to put it in exact words, the section between Quebec and Moncton. This is the section that has been made the special point of attack as absolutely useless, as a waste of money. I confess to some disappointment in the abbreviation of the distance over the existing railway; it is not as large as I had expected, it is not as large as I had believed. Looking over the map, which my hon. friend referred to this morning, I confess to some disappointment in that direction. Although the abbreviation is not as large as we had expected, still there is no reason to regret our enterprise. It is beyond doubt that the section of country which is to be covered by this railway is of the same character as the section of country which I have described. It is not all good, but there is in it some very valuable land. All this section which is in the counties of Levis, Dorchester, Bellechasse, Montmagny, L'Islet and part of Kamouraska, is a character equally as good as the best part of the eastern townships. It has the same formation, it has the same range of mountains, the Alleghanies, which traverse the eastern townships; and what you have to-day in the eastern townships you will have in that section of the country, that is to say, fruit, dairy and cereal products, and valuable timber, everything which an agricultural community requires. In the counties of Kamouraska and Temiscouata, I understand, the country is rougher. In New Brunswick the country is fairly good. I cannot do better at this point than to give you the testimony of the engineer, which the chairman of the Transcontinental Railway Commission has kindly furnished me at my request. Mr. Foss, one of the engineers, writes as follows:

Report of the nature of the country and soil through that part of New Brunswick traversed by the Transcontinental Railway.

Generally the soil is fairly good and the country well fitted for agriculture.

From Moncton to Chipman, mile 0 to 59, about 10 miles, is through a cultivated region, and the balance is fairly well wooded, with a mixed growth of soft and hard wood, soil for the most part fairly good. From Chipman to the crossing of the Canada Eastern Branch of the Intercolonial Railway, mile 57 to 97, about 10 miles, through a cultivated country, the balance fairly well wooded with a mixed growth of soft and hard wood, soil for the most part fairly good.

From the Canada Eastern Railway to the Tobique, mile 97 to 165, through a heavily wooded country, with soft wood in the low lands and heavy hard wood on the ridges. These ridges are good farming land, and the hard wood of value as soon as the railway is built. From the Tobique to Grand Falls, mile 165 to 197, about 12 miles, through farming lands or skirting along the edges of farms, the balance through heavy timber and land of mixed growth, the most of it excellent farming and grazing land.

From Grand Falls to the boundary of Quebec, mile 197 to 266, mostly in the St. John river valley, through a well settled country, with good soil.

This report is based on the personal knowledge of the writer, who has travelled over nearly every foot of the line in New Brunswick.

Very respectfully submitted,

(Signed) C. O. FOSS,
District Engineer, District A.

This is as satisfactory as it can be. This is not, however, the reason why we built that section of the line, it was not for the development of that section that we built it. We built it rather for commercial and national reasons, because we believed, as I said, that this transcontinental railway, to be effective, must extend from one Canadian water to the other Canadian water. I gave some of these reasons when I introduced this project in 1903, and one of the reasons which I gave at that time was that we wanted to become absolutely independent of the bonding privilege, which at the present time makes us dependent upon the United States. This reason then put forward by myself has been strongly attacked; it was attacked this morning by the hon. member for North Toronto, it was attacked the other day by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, who no doubt thought he had demolished my statement, at least to his satisfaction. In order to do him no injustice I will quote the very language which he made use of. I will give it just as it is in all its pointedness:

Six years have passed, and in the interim, as the right hon. gentleman well knows, we have not heard the slightest whisper or word about the repeal of the bonding privilege, and so it is that two-thirds of the speech which the right hon. gentleman then made before this parliament in reference to this matter stands as mere idle wind, designed as an excuse for undertaking this enterprise with such haste and such want of consideration.

It is very true that during the past six years there has been nothing to mar our good relations with the United States, but, is that a reason why we should not guard against the danger always existing, even although it is not always imminent? I might go much farther than the language of my hon. friend. It is very true that we have not had any trouble with our neighbours in the last six years. It is even truer, and I am glad of it, that our relations never were more cordial or more friendly than they have been in the last six years. It is also true, and I am proud of it, that since we have been in office we have had no difficulty with our neighbours. We have had sometimes small bickerings, which will occur occasionally in the best families, but we have had no serious conflict. We have had no serious quarrel with any one, and yet we are spending every year millions of dollars to defend our territory against a possible invasion. We spent $6,000,000 last year, and we have been spending $6,000,000 a year for some years past. I never heard this policy challenged by anybody. If I may refer to a past debate for a moment I might remind the House that my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) spoke against the frills and feathers but, as to the substance of the expenditure no one has ever ventured to crititcise it. More than this, the hon. member for North Toronto, who, this morning, repeated this argument, introduced a motion into this House in order to induce us—to compel us—if possible, not only to provide for our defence on land but for our defence on sea as well. I agree with him that it is part of the duty of the nation to provide for its defence both by land and on sea. But, is it any less a duty that we should secure our commercial independence against any possible interference with it? That is the motive which has impelled this course, and if my hon. friend takes issue with me upon this question, all I can say is so much the worse for my hon. friend.

Then, another reason why my hon. friend challenged our action in this respect was, that, in his estimation—at all events this was the statement which was made by him, this was the position which was taken by him and his friends when we introduced this project, the line which we are building between Moncton and Quebec will be absolutely barren of results, that it will be absolutely useless, that when the trade from the west had reached Quebec it would be as near Portland as it would be St. John. This sentiment was also shared by my gallant friend from Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes). I would have expected that sentiment from anybody else but himself, but I am sure that I was shocked and scandalized when I beheld the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton taking such an unpatriotic attitude. I would have hoped that he would have stood by Canada and that he would have insisted that Canada should have an independent line to the sea.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the right hon. gentleman be good enough to show where, either directly or indirectly, I have ever failed to stand by Canada? I have never gone to Washington and been kicked out.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will show why, I think, the hon. member put the question he did a moment ago.

Mr. HUGHES. I was admiring the attitude of the Prime Minister.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. But, it has been stated that this line would be of no avail because the Grand Trunk would turn away the trade from Quebec towards Portland. The Grand Trunk Railway Company, like everybody else, is animated by interest, and if we make it to the interest of the Grand Trunk, if we have a better railway than it can have from Quebec to Portland, I am sure that it will not prefer the inferior road. It is true that the railway does not come up to the standard that we had expected, but we are building from Quebec to Moncton a railway which generally will have a 4-10ths of one per cent grade. There is a pusher grade one way and a pusher grade the other way, but a train would be able to ascend the ridge with the help of one more engine—that is all—it is only for a short distance. So, on the the whole, we have a better road. But, is that the only way we can force trade through our own territory? We have already taken measures to have trade pushed in our own territory. Two years ago this House pass ed a resolution unanimously, with the concurrence of the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), with the concurrence of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and the concurrence of everybody who had a seat in this House, to this effect:

That on and after a date to be mentioned by the Governor in Council the British preference shall apply only to goods brought into Canada if shipped through a Canadian port.

That is a measure we have taken to compel trade to come to our own ports. Parliament has not exhausted its powers in this respect, and all I have to say upon this point is that the question of confederation has not been dealt with on geographical lines. It has been dealt with in a manner to give effect to the national idea, the political idea, the idea being to found upon this zone of the American continent a new nation endowed with British institutions, and everything that stands in the way of a realization of that idea must be overcome. That is the policy of this government.

Another objection which I did not hear to-day but which I heard some few years ago from my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was that we did not make use of the Intercolonial Railway. Yes, I also heard it from my hon. friend from North Toronto to-day, He asked: Why did you not make use of the Intercolonial Railway in order to extend the Transcontinental Railway to the maritime provinces? Why did we not make use of the Intercolonial Railway? For the same reason that the Conservative government of that day refused to make use of the Intercolonial Railway to extend the Canadian Pacific Railway to the maritime provinces? It is a matter of history as well that when the Canadian Pacific Railway had been extended from Callandar to Ottawa, from Ottawa to Montreal and from Montreal to Quebec, great pressure was brought to bear upon the government of that day to have the new National Railway extended from Quebec to the maritime provinces. The pressure was strong upon the government of the day and a legitimate pressure it was. They had to give way to it but did they take advantage of the Intercolonial Railway to carry out this extension of the National Railway to the waters of the Atlantic in Canadian territory? No, instead of that they subsidized a new line from Montreal to a maritime province port and subsidized it through the state of Maine. Why did they do that? Because it was found that the Intercolonial Railway was unsuited to the purpose of the Canadian Pacific Railway. What existed then exists to-day, and what was a good condition for the Canadian Pacific Railway is an equally good consideration for the Grand Trunk Pacific. Now, Sir, this is the justification of our policy, and I believe it is a sufficient and reasonable answer to all the objections which have been raised under this head.

A new objection is now brought to our attention. We are told: 'You are giving a favour to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, you are modifying the contract which you entered into with them in 1903 and 1904, and therefore it is legitimate that you should ask a price, that you should ask a compensation from the company for what you are giving to them. I have to repeat here what I stated a few days ago: that by this loan which we contemplate granting, we have made no modification whatever of the contract. We have not in any way modified the terms which were granted to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in 1903 and 1904. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition stated that it was not a formal but it was a practical modification of the contract, and my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) went further—he never does anything by halves—and he stated it was not only a modification of the contract but a repudiation of the contract.

Mr. LENNOX. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend adheres to his opinion?

Mr. LENNOX. That is what I say.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Well, if the idea which my hon. friend has in his mind, but which he has not given utterance to be correct; and if this be a clear gift to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, then my hon. friend is right that this would be a modification or a repudiation of the contract. But if it be not a gift but a loan; if the money is repaid, as I feel sure it will be repaid, what modification or repudiation of the contract will there be? I know my hon. friend's argument; he has stated that there is a repudiation of the contract because the Grand Trunk Pacific Company has not undertaken to provide for the building of the railway out of their stock. He says they have $25,000,000 worth of stock, that they do not use that stock for the carrying out of the enterprise and that therefore it is a repudiation of the contract. But, as I said in 1903 I say now: time will not wait; we must go on with the enterprise. Does my hon. friend believe that in the present state of the money market the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company would be able to raise a great deal of money upon that $25,000,000 of stock? Does he believe that if they were to put it on the market now they would be able to raise sufficient capital to carry on the enterprise? Why, the hon. gentleman knows that at the present time the stock would possibly not be saleable, and therefore the company has to wait until the market has sufficiently appreciated to make it to its interest and to the interest of the country to realize upon it. Under such circumstances, and in view of the existing financial crisis the only manner in which the company could carry on the enterprise upon fair terms was to do what was done by the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1884 and come to the government and ask for the credit of the country to raise the necessary money. My hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) stated this morning that this operation was not on all fours with the operation in 1884. What is the difference, let me ask him? In 1884 the Canadian Pacific Railway Company found themselves in exactly the same position that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company find themselves in to-day. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company could not raise the money on the market and it therefore had to come to the government and to ask the credit of the government to carry on their project. I was struck with the argument used the other day by my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), and I shall refer to that argument now. By way of showing how much better were the terms that the government in 1884 made with the Canadian Pacific Railway than the government of to-day is making with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, he went on to give the value of the securities which were placed in the hands of the government at that time by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and he used these words:

In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, we had a first mortgage on 3,393 miles of railway, at, $50,000 a mile equal to $170,000,000; we had 21,000,000 acres of land, at $1.50 an acre, $31,500,000, a total of $201,500,000. Against that there was only a mortgage in respect of the Canada Central and other branch lines of $5,333,000; and land bonds outstanding to the net amount of $1,123,000; making a total encumbrance of $6,456,000. Deducting this from the total value of the security received, leaves $195,044,000 of clear absolute security for the loan of $30,000,000. In addition to that, we had a first lien on the company's postal subsidies, on their steamships, on their after-acquired land, on the branch lines that they might thereafter build, and Dominion, provincial, or municipal subsidies, and upon all the property that they owned. So I think I am safe in saying that we had a security valued at $200,000,000 on which we proposed to lend $30,000,000.

I have not a word to say against that statement; I have not the slightest exception to take to what the hon. gentleman says there; I believe that the securities which were offered to the Canadian government at that time are fully worth $200,000,000 to-day. But what were the conditions that faced the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in 1884? It was a young company composed of able and active men, and yet it was offering $200,000,000 in securities in order to borrow $30,000,000, and notwithstanding that company sought in vain to borrow one dollar from all the financial institutions of the world. It is a matter of history that in Montreal they exhausted their credit, that they went to New York without avail, that they went to the money markets of London and Amsterdam without success, and that having exhausted all their efforts they had to come to the government of Canada, and Canada had to lend them its credit to extricate them from the difficulty in which they found themselves. Is it extraordinary, therefore, that if in 1884 the Canadian Pacific Railway Company could not raise $30,000,000 upon securities valued at six times that amount, that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company should to-day find it better financing and better business to come to the government and ask the credit of the govenment rather than to put their securities on the market at a very substantial loss. It seems to me that this is an argument which will appeal to the fairness and the common sense, even of my hon. friend from North Grey, and I feel sure he will apologize to the House for the very bad argument he made upon one point, even though he made a good argument on another point. It is true that we have not from the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company the same amount of securities that the government obtained from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Well, if we had been as generous to the Grand Trunk Pacific as the government of that day was to the Canadian Pacific Railway we might also have lots of securities to take as a pledge. If we had given to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company 25,000,000 acres of land; if we had given to the Grand Trunk Pacific some hundreds of miles of railway already built; if we had built for them the mountain section and the section along the north shore of Lake Superior, then we could have had from the Grand Trunk Pacific Company far better security than they are able to give us to-day. But, nevertheless, though they cannot give us their own security they give us an endorser in the person of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, which I think is quite solvent and quite able to answer for the amount which we are going to loan. I have heard this matter discussed; I know that there are skeptics on the other side of the House—I stated a moment ago that bad as it is, skepticism is the least of all the faults of hon. gentlemen opposite. For instance, my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) is satisfied that this loan will never be repaid, although it is guaranteed by both the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself. Does my hon. friend believe for one moment that the Grand Trunk Railway Company will make default on these bonds? They will be honoured, every cent of them.

Mr. LENNOX. I did not assert in any shape or by any inference that this loan would never be repaid; but if my right hon. friend asks me the question, I say, judging from the experience of the past, that there is great doubt whether it will ever be paid or not.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is exactly what I meant. I was sure my hon. friend would say that. I do not pretend to be a mind reader, but it is not difficult to read his mind. We know his way of thinking, and therefore the conclusion is not difficult to reach.

There is only one question as to which I think we can have reasonable discussion: it is as to the cost of the road. As to this there may also be some unreasonable criticism. The road is far more expensive than for my part I had calculated; but I will ask hon. gentlemen to name one of the great enterprises that go beyond the ordinary business of every day, in regard to which the estimates of the engineers have not been exceeded. It seems as if these gigantic enterprises, in the immensity and variety of their details, are never fully conceived in the minds of engineers, and almost invariably experience shows that there have been obstacles which were not thought of at their inception. The last century has been prolific in great enterprises, and I think I am safe in saying that it is not possible to single out one of them in which the estimate of the engineers has not been greatly exceeded. Perhaps the greatest work conceived during the last century was the digging of the Suez canal. The estimate of the engineers was that it would cost $20,000,000, and the canal was commenced in 1859 and was to be completed in 1864. It was not completed until 1869, and its cost turned out to be $80,000,000. In England one of the great works of the country was the building of the bridge over the Firth of Forth, which was built by two of the most eminent engineers of England, which of all countries is perhaps the most eminent in engineering science—I refer to Sir John Fowler and Sir Benjamin Baker. The estimate of the cost in our money was $6,400,000, and the cost of the work when completed exceeded $10,000,000. Coming to the United States, we find that the bridge over the East river between New York and Brooklyn cost 47½ per cent more than the original estimate. If we come to Canada, the Victoria bridge is a monument of scientific engineering, a work of which we have reason to be proud, built by that eminent engineer, Robert Stevenson, and its cost was 35 per cent more than the original estimate. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, in discussing this matter the other day, referred to the Panama canal; he also alluded to it a moment ago. It so happens that there is in the current issue of 'McClure's' magazine an article on the Panama canal from the pen of no less a person than President Taft himself, who, as we know, had a good deal to do with that great work; and this is what he has to say as to its cost:

> The second circumstance is with reference to the cost of the work. The estimate of the cost of the canal, exclusive of the interest during construction, sanitation, and expense of zone government, and the $50,000,000 paid Panama and the French Company, was $139,705,200. The present estimate of the cost of the canal as now projected, exclusive of the same items, is $297,766,000, or a grand total of $375,000,000.

So that the present estimate of the cost of the canal is over 100 per cent more than the original, and the canal is not built. When it is built, we shall know its real cost.

As I have said, the cost of the Transcontinental Railway has been in excess of what we had anticipated, but my hon. friend the Minister of Railways has given to the House what I think is the paramount reason for this. This road has been built upon a different plan altogether from the plan on which such roads are usually built. Railroads have usually been built first of all in as cheap a manner as possible—with heavy grades, inferior curves, wooden trestles and light rails; and afterwards the road is built and rebuilt. In this case the company has thought it better, and I believe it is wise economy on their part, instead of building a cheap road at first, to build at once a solid permanent road, instead of rebuilding the road three or four times over as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has done. That is the reason the cost of the road has been greater than the estimate. I do not say this as an excuse, for whatever the cost of the road is, we must go on with the enterprise; but I am glad to say that there has been no extravagance, that every dollar of the money has been honestly expended. If we compare the cost of this road with the cost of similar enterprises, we find after all that the cost has not been excessive, but absolutely normal. A friend of mine, an engineer, has collated for me the following figures as to some other great roads:

Railway.	Mileage.	Total cost.	Average cost per mile.
Southern Pacific Railway	9,834	711,000,000	$72,400
Southern Railway	6,051	293,000,000	48,900
St. Louis and San Francisco Railway	6,000	280,000,000	46,600
Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway	9,430	534,176,000	56,600
Great Northern Railway	6,636	319,000,000	48,000
Northern Pacific Railway	6,284	500,000,000	79,000

I understand, however, that the cost of this railway, as finally adjusted, will not be $79,000 a mile, but about $60,000 a mile.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. That includes watered stock, I presume.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have deducted the watered stock when I say that the cost will be $60,000 per mile instead of $79,000. Comparing the figures on our road with those, there is no reason why we should not be satisfied. These figures show that it compares very favourably with the standard railways.

Before I sit down, I wish to allude once and for all to the statement, which has been repeated for the thousandth time, that when I introduced this scheme I said all the road would cost would be $13,000,000.

Some hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There are men who assert in all seriousness that I said we were going to build a railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific, on the western section of which we were to contribute a guarantee for three-quarters of the cost, and build the eastern section from Winnipeg to Moncton, and that all this would be done for $13,000,000. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) repeated that this morning without a blush or a smile. He was quite serious; well, if he did not deceive anybody, perhaps he deceived himself, and I am not sure of that either. I said in laying the project before the House that we were going to build the eastern section ourselves and lease it to the Grand Trunk Pacific for 3 per cent of the cost; we were going to assist in the western to the extent of three-quarters of the cost and for this also we were going to receive 3 per cent, but that on the two sections, we would give the company an abatement of interest for seven years, and that would represent the amount which would eventually come out of the Canadian people. Let me read the words once more to my hon. friends, not that I expect that they will change their tune, but to see if there be any sense of decency left in them:

> When completed the company will lease the road and pay us a rental at the rate of 3 per cent per annum upon the cost of construction, whatever that may be. The same abatement of rent is provided also as in the case of interest on the western section. During seven years the company will be exempt from the payment of rent. For three years the company will be bound to pay the revenues and the tolls of the road if they amount to 3 per cent, and if they fail to amount to 3 per cent, then the difference between the revenues gathered and the 3 per cent will be capitalized and added to the cost of construction, and the company will pay interest upon it. So that here again the whole of the liability which is incurred by the government for the building of that section from Moncton to Winnipeg is simply seven years of interest.

We had to advance the money but all the treasury would be mulcted for in the end would be the seven years' interest, and I estimated that at $13,000,000. I agree that this was a mistake because the road will cost much more; but to pretend that I said we would build the railway for $13,000,000 is something which would never come out of the brains of any one though it has come very often from the mouth of some. On this point, however, I claim no vindication. The facts are there, and I leave them once more with all confidence to the judgment of the Canadian people.

My hon. friend was kind enough to say that this railway would be a monument to my memory. I confess that I feel deeply upon it, I did my best to have the project accepted, not only by my colleagues but by parliament and the people, but I never heralded it as a monument to myself, though some people say I did. But I say the time will come when that policy will be vindicated to its fullest extent and to the very letter. The Canadian people little realize at this moment what is the future of this great enterprise. Is there a man, in or out of the House, who does not believe that it has a great future, or that it is not only a commercial but an absolute actual necessity.

Mr. CROTHERS. Like every other hon. gentleman in this House, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the eloquent address delivered by the right hon. the Prime Minister. During his remarks he accused hon. gentlemen on this side of skepticism. I can only say that, having regard not only to the address we have just heard but to other statements made by the right hon. gentleman, I for one must plead guilty to the charge of being skeptical with regard to any statements made by him respecting this transaction. His charming language and fascinating manner would almost persuade one to become a skeptic, even if he were to rely upon that address alone. But this is not the first eloquent speech the right hon. gentleman has delivered on this question. He has delivered several on the question of the Transcontinental Railway and on many other subjects, and I do not propose to follow him through his somewhat lengthy utterances, but to touch merely on one or two points which he endeavoured to make at the opening of his remarks. One was that he was very anxious the products of this country should reach the sea-board wholly through Canadian territory. Let me congratulate the hon. gentleman upon his conversion to that doctrine. Only a few years ago he nailed the colours of unrestricted reciprocity to the ship of state. At that time he was not only in favour of sending a portion of our products to the United States, but waxed eloquent in favour of sending all of them. I am very glad the right hon. gentleman has returned to the fold and recanted those opinions, and congratulate him on having become a convert to the east and west lines of communication. But we always have some skepticism when listening to the eloquence of a new convert. We know that he is apt to be more enthusiastic than those who have borne the heat and burden of the day and are inclined to take what he said with more than a grain of salt. It is not surprising therefore that we should be a little skeptical.

The next position he took was that this transaction had on two or three different occasions received the endorsation, not only of this House, but of the country. Let me say that, in my humble opinion, neither the representatives of the people in this House nor the people themselves have had an opportunity of expressing an unprejudiced opinion on this scheme of the national transcontinental railway. What was the modus operandi? A contract was entered into at first with the Grand Trunk Pacific by the government, subject to the ratification of this House. The leader of the House came down here with a signed contract, and the question with his followers was whether they should support that contract and have the government remain in office or reject it and have the government resign from office. It was a question of confidence or non-confidence, and the followers of the government voted, not on the merits of the case, but in order that their party might remain in power. But, Mr. Speaker, when the matter first came before this House for ratification, did the right hon. gentleman present the facts, or anything within reasonable distance of the facts regarding this contract? I remember the eloquent speeches that he delivered in those days. We remember him telling the people of this country that we had mountains of information. At page 7680 of 'Hansard' of 1903, he said.

> In that year, 1872, the Canadian government undertook a systematic and scientific exploration of the whole northern region from Lake Abitibi westward to the Pacific ocean. From the year 1872 to the year 1880 no less than twenty-eight expeditions were organized to visit, explore, and report upon that country. . . . Mr. Marcus Smith, Mr. Cambie, Mr. Hunter, Mr. Gordon, Mr. Horetzky, and several others, all engineers of eminence, crossed and recrossed that territory and became as familiar with it as they were with the streets of Ottawa.

We are all proud of the Prime Minister, proud that we have a poet as Prime Minister, as is evident in this very sentence:

> 'Crossed and recrossed that territory and became as familiar with it as they were with the streets of Ottawa.' And his followers behind him cheered him to the echo.

> Any one who to-day would care to look into the reports now accumulated in the archives of the Railway Department will know that country, just as he may know his own home.

So the right hon. gentleman knew this country and he was speaking of that portion of the road. He spoke of the portion east of Lake Abitibi in the province of Quebec which he said had been explored several times. Now with all that information touching that road, knowing it as he knew his own home, or the streets of Ottawa, he told the people of Canada that this road would cost us only $13,000,000. That, of course, was not to be the total cost of constructing this road, but the sum that the people of Canada would have to pay by way of interest. I understood that at the time and I do not think the people of Canada were misled on that point.

Mr. PATERSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. CROTHERS. The Prime Minister took the position that if the people of Canada were to borrow hundreds of millions to put into this road, they would only be required to pay that amount of interest. I am only surprised that with his eloquence, with his ingenuity, with his capacity, the Prime Minister did not go a little further and prove to the people of Canada not only that it would only cost $12,000,000 or $13,000,000, but that it would not cost them a cent to construct the road. Why? Because the minister proposed to go to England and borrow the money. He might have gone a step farther and have said to the people of Canada: 'It will not cost you a cent because at the end of each year, when the interest comes due, I will go to England and borrow the money. The Prime Minister based his statement that it would not cost the country more than $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 upon figures supplied to him by the Minister of Finance, who estimated that the eastern section of the road would cost $51,300,000. That estimate was arrived at after very close calculation on the part of that great financier, the Finance Minister of Canada. He knew then, as he knows now, that these great enterprises always cost two or tree times as much as the original estimate, but he made that statement and it was repeated by every one of his followers throughout the country. Yet the Prime Minister has the courage to announce in this House that he received the endorsation of the people of Canada. I do not wish to say anything offensive or to accuse the Prime Minister of intentionally making a statement that was not true or of intentional misrepresentation, but I do say that when these statements were made to parliament and through parliament to the people, parliament and the people of Canada were both grossly misled. I am surprised at the courage of the Prime Minister, after admitting to-day that that section will cost at the least $150,000,000, in saying that in 1904 he received the approval of the people of Canada with regard to this measure.

Coming down to the election campaign of 1908, the right hon. gentleman visited the province of Ontario and he was apparently so busy there in satisfying the people of Ontario that he was a straight Grit, that he had no time to discuss the Grand Trunk Pacific. He said, as reported in the 'Globe':

I am a straight Grit. Not an independent Grit (cheers), but a Grit out and out, and the man who is nearest my heart is the man who is a Grit like myself and it is as a Grit that I ask you all, ladies and gentlemen, to give your support to my friend Mr. Smith.

Mr. Speaker, statesmanship, elegance, dignity and patriotism: No appeal to intelligence, no appeal to the judgment of the people, no appeal to conscience, no appeal to patriotism, no argument in favour of constructing the Transcontinental Railroad, but: 'I am a straight Grit, not an independent Grit, but a Grit out and out.' The right hon. gentleman's experience satisfied him that this was the most effective style of argument. He might have said not only that he was a straight Grit, but that he was a fossilized Grit and that he appealed to fossilized Grits in the province of Ontario, not that he appealed to their judgment, to their conscience, or that he appealed to them on high national principles for their votes. Then he went down to the province of Quebec. Did he there tell anything about the cost of the Transcontinental Railway? Did he give such an eloquent description of what it will do for the country as he has done to-day? Did he appeal to the conscience, the independence, the patriotism of the people of Quebec? What was his appeal?

The same blood flows through my veins that flows through yours.

And, Mr. Speaker, when he came to Ottawa, he saw a report of a speech delivered by his colleague and the only thing that struck him in that speech was the opinion of his colleague touching the increase in the salaries of the Civil Service in Ottawa. He wrote a letter to his colleague saying: 'I quite endorse your opinion touching the increase of the salaries of the Civil Service, and you have my permission to say so.'

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada, the man standing at the head of the nation, the man whose office we all admire and respect and esteem and revere, might have been expected to have appealed to the people on a higher plane than that. We would have expected the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada, if his colleague in Ottawa had suggested to him the propriety of writing such a letter to the people of Ottawa, we would have expected him to say, 'No, Mr. McGiverin, I am not running this election on a peanut policy. I am at the head of the government of Canada. The interest of Canada, the great transactions in which we are engaged, are of more importance than your success or mine. I do not propose to discuss with you at this time such a small question as the salaries of the civil servants at Ottawa. There are great national questions at issue. My sentiments, my interest in the people of this country, my patriotism, force me to say to you that I will not descend to these insignificant questions.'

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we had that campaign in Quebec, when we had that campaign in Ontario, when we had that campaign in Ottawa, does it not require considerable courage on the part of the Prime Minister to stand up before us and boast of the people of Canada having on several occasions approved of what he has done in regard to the Transcontinental Railway? Now with these mountains of information, we had the right hon. gentleman telling us in eloquent terms—because he is always eloquent, we are always delighted to hear him, we are always proud of him. His charming language and his fascinating manner, as I said a moment ago, almost convert those who are sitting opposite to him—but with all this information, with the knowledge he then had of the different parts of this country, equal to the knowledge he had of his own home, as familiar with these different sections as he is with the streets of Ottawa, he told the people of Canada that the eastern division would only cost $51,300,000. He has cited two or three other cases here to-day where the actual cost was a great deal more than the first estimate. I think the largest difference he mentioned was 100 per cent. Now we have it admitted that this eastern division will cost $150,000,000. 50 in 150 goes three times. How much percentage is that? 300 per cent. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that he is not able to find a parallel in the whole railway history, in all modern engineering, where the real cost so far exceeded the estimates. We were told also that we were going to save from 120 to 140 miles by the construction of this road through New Brunswick; and to-day it is admitted that we are saving about 29 miles. The right hon. gentleman was familiar, from the explorations, from the documents in the archives, as familiar with the whole road across to the Pacific as he was, he told us, with his own home, with the streets of Ottawa. The right hon. gentleman told us that the mountain section was about 600 miles in length, and his colleague the Finance Minister put it at 480 miles. What have we now? It is now stated by the Finance Minister that the mountain section is 839 miles, and in a letter which Mr. Hays wrote to the Finance Minister on the 16th of November last, this prairie section has been extended 130 miles further west than it was contemplated at the time the agreement was made; 839 and 130 will give you 969 miles as the length of that mountain section at that time. And yet we have the right hon. gentleman putting it at 600 miles, with his mountains of information; and we had the Finance Minister putting it at 480 miles, with his mountains of information. So, Mr. Speaker, what is one of the most discouraging and humiliating features of this whole transaction, is the utter unreliability of the statements that are made by hon. gentlemen opposite, not only the unreliability with reference to the original statements they made but the unreliability of the statements they have recently made. I do not see, Mr. Speaker, how hon. gentlemen in this House can vote on this question, and vote intelligently, how they can be otherwise than in the condition in which the right hon. gentleman describes us, that of skeptics. Why, no longer ago than the 13th day of April, 1908, just one year ago, the Minister of Railways brought down a return to this House stating that the prairie section would cost $21,873,000—only one year ago. What have we now? We have it stated now that the $11,000,000 we raised has all been expended except I think $1,000,000; the $10,000,000 raised by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company on guarantees given by the Grand Trunk Railway Company will make you over $20,000,000; the Grand Trunk is to get back $7,000,000 now of this sum we are advancing, and that makes up about $27,000,000, and there are about 600 miles of it constructed. When I saw this letter that was sent to the Finance Minister on the 16th day of November, I supposed in my innocence, and I think the people supposed, that that $10,000,000 was asked for to enable the company to continue the construction of the prairie section on to the mountain section. I will read a sentence or two from that letter:

> By reason of the extension of the prairie section 130 miles further west than was contemplated, it is found that an additional sum of $10,000,000 will be needed to complete the section to Wolf Creek which is the dividing line between the prairie and mountain sections. To raise this additional sum it will be necessary to make a further issue of bonds as contemplated by section 34 of the agreement of the 29th July, 1903. . . . Further legislation will be required to enable the company to fully carry out what was contemplated by these agreements respecting the issue of bonds to provide the balance re-
> To provide the balance required.
> —(above the proceeds of the government guarantee) for the completion of the prairie section of the western division, and we desire to have an assurance that your government will, at the forthcoming session of parliament, introduce and support such legislation at the earliest date practicable. . . . Under such circumstances and in view of the urgent desire of the government that the enterprise shall be prosecuted without any delay, we ask the government to assist us in the utilizing of these bonds.

And so on. Near the end of the letter he says, speaking of this sum required for the completion of the prairie section:

> I would therefore urge that such measures of immediate relief be given as will enable us to do this and avoid the disastrous effect on the credit of both the railways and the country which would necessarily result from a stoppage of the work.

Now, Mr. Speaker, reading that letter any one would come to the conclusion that the work already done had been paid for, and that $10,000,000 was required to continue the construction work. I submit that that was a misleading statement to make, misleading to members of this House and misleading to the people of this country. We all understood at that time that the $10,000,000 was required to continue the work on to the mountains. And what are we told now? We are told that about $7,000,000 of the $10,000,000 is already expended, and that there will be only $3,000,000 left. Then, Mr. Speaker, it has been in substance admitted by the right hon. gentleman and by the Minister of Finance, that negotiations were afoot with the officers of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company prior to the 26th of October last. Why did not the right hon. gentleman and why did not the Finance Minister mention that in discussing these matters or in discussing any other matters with the people of Canada? Was the little sum of $10,000,000 too small and too insignificant for them to submit to the people of Canada? Why did they withhold it? Is it not in keeping with their whole conduct in regard to this matter? Does it not appear to have been the well settled policy that this government should humbug the people in reference to this Transcontinental Railway? The Minister of Finance was up in our province during the elections. These negotiations were going on with the president of the Grand Trunk Pacific, but he never uttered a sentence to the people of Ontario with respect to them. He was too busy telling the people of Ontario, why he had expended such large sums of money. He told them that he had expended these large sums of money because he had them to expend. The most reckless spendthrift in the country might say: 'I have spent all

I had because I had it to spend.' The prodigal son might have said: 'I have squandered the substance which my father gave me, in riotous living because I had it to spend.' But the time came when he fain would have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat, and no man gave unto him. Yet, in the face of this we find the right hon. gentleman coming to this House, and, through this House, saying to the people of Canada that they should approve of this loan of $10,000,000, that they have already approved of it two or three times, that his soul is so lofty that he is thinking only now of keeping our products out of the United States and that he has reformed since; a few years ago, he nailed the colours of unrestricted reciprocity to the mast and declared that he would never tear them down until they waved triumphant. As far as I am concerned I confess that I plead guilty to being a skeptic. I also submit that the conduct and the statements of these hon. gentlemen in 1903 and 1904, and often and often repeated since, would convert the firmest believer into the most pronounced skeptic.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker before the Bill is read a third time I desire very briefly to present some considerations to the House in connection with the proposal. The right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has referred to the supposed skepticism of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House with regard to the resources of this country and he has repeated the parrot-like cry that has resounded throughout this country from one end of it to the other, whenever a Liberal orator ascended a Grit platform, that the Conservative party, in 1903 and 1904, opposed the project of the Transcontinental Railway. I take issue with the right hon. gentleman on that point as I take issue with him on some other points and I say that we declared then, as we declare now, that the Conservative party which carried to a triumphant issue the proposition to build a transcontinental railway across this continent in days gone by, have always shown that they had and have the courage, the faith and the belief in the resources of this country that should characterize every patriotic citizen of Canada. I was a little surprised at the audacity of the right hon. gentleman in reference to the skepticism of the Conservative party in regard to the resources of Canada. I think that it indicated that the right hon. gentleman's nervous system is increasing in force and vitality as the years go by.

Mr. PATERSON. That is good.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is good, but some other things were not so good in days gone by, namely, that the two hon. gentlemen who sit on the front benches to-day were crying out to the people of Canada that the western country was worthless and that it would be a waste of public money to build a transcontinental railway through it. My hon. frend the Minister of Customs shakes his head. Did he ever rise and take issue with his leaders who were shouting that? I do not think so. Did the right hon. gentleman ever rise and take issue with his leader who was shouting that in this House and on every platform throughout the country? For gentlemen of this calibre to tell us in these days that we are skeptics in regard to the resources of Canada partakes of a bravado which does not seem to be accompanied by very much discretion accompanying it.

We did take issue, Mr. Speaker, with the precipitate character of their entrance into this project. They told us that they had mountains of information. To-day we find that they have not mountains of information. The right hon. gentleman says that he must fain admit to-day that his calculations as to the cost of this road have not been borne out and he has endeavoured to support himself in that regard by references to the Panama canal, the Suez canal and various railways in the United States. I want to tell the right hon. gentleman that alongside of this Grand Trunk Pacific Railway in the western part of Canada there is another railway supplying the same country, serving the same people. I refer to the Canadian Northern Railway and I have very good reason to believe that that road was built for less than half the amount that has been reported to this House as the cost of this railway. Does he wish to go to the United States of America for a comparison? Has he ever heard of the Pennsylvania Railway system? I am not speaking of watered stock and we are not discussing watered stock. We are discussing the actual stock of railways throughout this country. Let me point out to him the report—a report which has been placed in my hands by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie)—of the Commissioners of the British Iron Trade Association in respect to American industrial conditions and competition published in 1902 in which they go more or less into the cost of some railways in the United States and in which they deal especially with the Pennsylvania system of railways which is, as everyone knows, one of the greatest, if not the greatest railway system in the world and probably the most perfectly constructed and up-to-date system that is known on this continent. They find that the cost of this road was £3,300 per mile or less than $16,500 and that the cost of land per mile was £1,155. Everyone knows that so far as the construction of this Transcontinental Railway is concerned, the cost of the right-of-way is an infinitely smaller consideration because from beginning to end the right of way has cost practically nothing at all. Then, the cost of equipment of the Pennsylvania Railway was £2,400 per mile. It is true that the capitalization of that road is excessive being something like £18,000 per mile, but cost not capitalization is what we are discussing to-day.

Mr. CONMEE. Will the hon. gentleman state the date of that report?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. 1902. My right hon. friend has referred to the speech of my hon. friend from North Toronto and has said that he spoke of some hybrid scheme. As far as I can understand the only hybrid scheme to which he has alluded was the proposition of the Grand Trunk Pacific in the first instance. The Prime Minister said that that scheme was half Canadian and half American. What do you think of a scheme for a national transcontinental railway upon which this country has paid out, or will contribute in cash and credit, perhaps $225,000,000 or $250,000,000, and which has its winter port, as far as we can understand at the present time, in the United States of America and not within the limits of Canada at all, a point to which I will direct attention again and to which I will ask the consideration of the House by a resolution I shall move.

But my right hon. friend excelled himself when he came to deal with the bonding privilege. The chief consideration placed before the House by the right hon. gentleman in 1903 was the imminence of danger by reason of the possible or probable abrogation of the bonding privilege by the government of the United States. He admitted to-day that we have not heard much about the abrogation of the bonding privilege since he made that famous speech in 1903, but he still persists in asserting that Canada has been saved from some great impending danger by the course he took at that time. Let me ask the right hon. gentleman three questions. Did or did not the Intercolonial Railway exist before the 30th day of July, 1903? Is or is not the Intercolonial Railway built wholly upon Canadian territory? Does or does not the Intercolonial Railway connect at Montreal with the Canadian Pacific Railway system? These are three pertinent questions which I have the rght to put to the right hon. gentleman, and which touch the very essence of his argument that the $30,000,000 or $35,000,000 expended on the National Transcontinental Railway from Quebec to Moncton has been of any real service to Canada with respect to the bonding privilege. And, Sir, the net result of it all is that Canada has been saved from this tremendous danger in connection with the bonding prvilege by the construction of a railway line at an expense of $30,000,000, which saves 29 miles of distance between Quebec and Moncton. It is thus that in the mind of the right hon. gentleman Canada has been saved from such dangers as he pointed out in 1903, and reaffirmed this afternoon. Can absurdity go farther? The Intercolonial Railway is upon Canadian territory. The Intercolonial Railway, according to the statement of the Minister of Railways this very session, desires and requires all the further traffic that can be placed upon it, but the right hon. gentleman persists in saying that we have been saved from some awful danger by the mere fact that we have shortened the line between Quebec and Moncton by 29 miles.

My right hon. friend further stated that in 1903, I declared that the line from Quebec to Moncton was absolutely absurd and useless. I did not make any such declaration. I did not then have sufficient information to enable me to judge one way or the other, nor, as the results have shown, did the right hon. gentleman possess any such information at that time. What I said then and what I repeat now is :

As to my attitude with regard to the Quebec-Moncton line, I say that if there is to be found a better and shorter line between Rivière du Loup, or any other point on the Intercolonial, and Moncton, a line which will give to Halifax and St. John, and the maritime provinces generally, a better fighting chance for western traffic than that which they have at present, I will support its construction. But I will not support it with the object for which this Bill provides. I will support the construction of that line as part of the Intercolonial Railway. I do not believe in constructing that better and shorter line for the purpose of handing it over to the Grand Trunk Pacific or any other railway company, but I do believe in constructing it and keeping it for the people's railway. That is my position, and it is a position which I am ready to discuss in the maritime provinces or anywhere else.

I went on to elaborate the argument, but I will not weary the House by quoting further. My right hon. friend also referred to a resolution passed by this House some sessions ago with respect to goods admitted to Canada, and claiming the British preference, but I would point out to him that if the statement of his own Minister of Railways is to be taken at its face value, and if the Intercolonial Railway requires all the traffic it can get, it is rather singular that the right hon. gentleman does not put that policy into force at once and give to the Intercolonial Railway a better chance of getting traffic than it enjoys to-day.

The right hon. gentleman told us that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company could not raise anything upon its stock ; but I would point out that if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in 1882, in view of the denunciation of the scheme by the Liberal party of that day, at a time when that western country was unknown, when the land was inaccessible, when the people of Canada and of the world at large had not that faith and confidence in it which they have to-day; if the Canadian Pacific Railway at that time could induce the promoters of the enterprise to take its stock at 25 cents on the dollar and afterwards at 50 cents on the dollar, it is to say the least peculiar that in these later days when that country has been populated to a very considerable extent, when immigration is pouring into it, when this enterprise is declared to be a paying enterprise from the very moment it commences to carry freight; it is I say a remarkable thing that the promoters of that enterprise have not put a dollar of their money into the road, but are depending absolutely upon bond issues, moneys raised by the guarantee of the government and of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Then the right hon. gentleman referred to the 250,000,000 acres of land granted by the government of Canada to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but he very discreetly omitted to mention that the government of which he was a member offered a very much larger quantity of land for the purpose of constructing that railway and were not able to get it constructed.

Leaving the speech of my right hon. friend for a moment and coming to what I have more immediately in mind, I recognize, as I have already said, that this enterprise upon which so much money has been spent both in eastern and western Canada, must be carried to a conclusion, and that it would be a misfortune that any stoppage of the work should take place. But we have to consider the object of this enterprise, and that object is set forth in the agreement of 1903 as follows:

> Whereas it is in the interest of Canada that a line of railway, designed to secure the most direct and economical interchange of traffic between eastern Canada and the provinces and territories west of the great lakes, to open up and develop the northern zone of the Dominion, to promote the internal and foreign trade of Canada, and to develop commerce through Canadian ports, should be constructed and operated as a common railway highway across the Dominion, from ocean to ocean, and wholly within Canadian territory.

I need not again allude to the fact that paragraphs 42 and 43 of this agreement declare specifically that aid was granted to the enterprise by the government of Canada for the express purpose of encouraging the development of Canadian trade and transportation of goods through Canadian channels to Canadian ports. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company was pledged to the fulfilment of that condition and to use its best efforts for the purpose of carrying it out. But, in the first place the method by which the government sought to accomplish this was by selecting a company which had its chief winter port in the United States. That was an extraordinary feature of the whole enterprise. The object of this enormous public aid being that we should build up our own Canadian ports both in summer and winter, it does seem remarkable that a company was selected which has its winter ports altogether in the United States. I say that with no desire to cast any discredit upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company. It has its own commercial interests to serve; it has built up Portland, it has enormous interests there, it has expended enormous sums of money at that port, and I am not blaming the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company for endeavouring to make the best bargain it could with this government or with any one else with respect to its business enterprises. But the initial difficulty, a difficulty from which this government and this country can never get away, was that the company selected to assist the government in carrying out this enterprise was a company that had its winter port in the United States and not in Canada.

The next feature of the enterprise to which attention may be directed is that the undertaking was not to be carried out by means of a contract with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. If that company had been a party to this contract, it would have been forced by the voice of the Canadian people, as any government entering into such a contract would have been found to accept effective stipulations to use Candian ports during the winter months. But that was not done. It was the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company alone which entered into the stipulations in regard to the development of Canadian trade through Canadian channels.

Another feature was that the promoters were not required to put any money into the enterprise themselves, but were allowed to build it by bond issues—I am speaking of the western division—guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company and by the government, while the government undertook the entire financing of the construction of the eastern division. There has been an enormous drain upon the resources of our country for this work. Its purpose is to bring the enormously increasing traffic of the west to Canadian ports instead of leaving it to be diverted to ports in the United States; and yet what will be the inevitable result of the conditions which I have presented to the House?

My right hon. friend said he presented this enterprise to the people of this country with a firm heart. Does he present to-day with a firm heart the imminent danger that all that traffic will be carried in the winter to Portland instead of to St. John and Halifax? Is it for this purpose that the people of this country have supplied their cash and pledged their credit to the extent of $250,000,000? What was my right hon. friend's answer when I put this question to him in the most pointed manner a few days ago? What was his answer when the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) put it to him to-day and asked him what he was going to do about it? His answer to me was that the clause should be carried; and his answer to the hon. member for West Toronto was a complete avoidance of the question. There will be a lease of the section from Winnipeg to the Port Arthur branch and western traffic will be delivered to the Grand Trunk Railway, which, under the conditions as they stand at present, will be at liberty during the winter months to carry it to Portland instead of to St. John or Halifax. My right hon. friend tells us that he will select a more favourable occasion—when the lease will be granted to this company of the line from Winnipeg to the Port Arthur branch—for dealing with this question. I have already pointed out that the terms of the lease are already settled—that any lease of a portion of the line must, so far as the company is concerned, be on terms not more onerous to them than those of the lease of the entire line. I have pointed out further that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company has the option of taking or not taking a lease of any portion of the line. Is there any answer to my argument that under these conditions the traffic is bound to go to Portland in the winter months? My right hon. friend says that the insertion of any necessary stipulation binding upon the Grand Trunk would be a modification of the contract. On that matter there may be a legitimate difference of opinon; but I adhere to my view that although there has been no formal modification of the contract, there is by the proposal of the government a practical modification of the contract. But if I accept my right hon. friend's assurance in that regard, then he is open to this retort, that if his proposal is not a modification of the contract, no more would it be a modification of the contract to insist that the Grand Trunk Railway Company should bind itself by some effective stipulation. It is not a party to the contract, and therefore to insist that it shall enter into some stipulation of that kind would be, according to the reasoning of my right hon. friend, no modification of the contract, and there is no reason why it should not be done. Therefore it seems to me that this is a time for action by the government; and, as they do not seem disposed to take any action in behalf of the maritime ports of Canada, I propose to make a suggestion by the terms of a resolution which I shall offer. Mr. Blair in this House, in 1903, pointed out, and with good reason, that in days to come the expenditure, which he put at that time at $15,000,000, now swollen to $30,000,000 or $35,000,000, would be taken into consideration as an expenditure for the transportation requirements of the maritime provinces in the future. But the feeling in the minds of the people of the maritime provinces will be that this expenditure should not be placed against them in the records of the country's expenditure when they find that this great national transcontinental highway will be utilized for carrying the trade of Canada to Portland instead of to the ports of the maritime provinces. That will be the net result, and is it a result to which my right hon. friend looks forward with a firm heart? I do not believe that the people of the maritime provinces will look forward to it with a firm heart, or with a rejoicing heart, but I think they will be firm in heart against proposals which look to a continuance of any such condition. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the order for the third reading be discharged and that the said Bill be referred back to Committee of the Whole House with power to amend the same by adding effective provisions binding the Grand Trunk Railway Company as well as the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to fulfil the conditions upon which aid has been granted to this enterprise, namely, the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports and forbidding the diversion of Canadian traffic to foreign ports except when specifically routed thereto by the shipper.

Mr. J. CONMEE (Thunder Bay). Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to have taken any part in this debate, but some observations have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite which are quite contrary to my conception of this enterprise and to the advisability of making the loan under the circumstances which have been presented to the House. It has been argued that the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Canadian Northern offers as great security, from a military point of view, for connections between the west and the east as does the Grand Trunk Pacific. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) said that the Grand Trunk Pacific was not the most northerly road, that there were other lines extending farther north, and that consequently it was not as well located as regards military use or that it would be of as much advantage to the country in case of need as some of the existing lines. Well, while the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) is usually very logical and very well informed on any subject he discusses, I do not think he did himself justice in dealing with this matter, because I cannot but think that if he had made himself fully acquainted with the positions of the several lines of railway to which he referred, he would not have contended that there is any comparison, from a military point of view, between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the National Transcontinental. What are the conditions? It was said, why, the Transcontinental starts at Halifax, at Quebec, at Winnipeg, and so on from point to point across the country. That is true, but it is also true that from Quebec to Winnipeg its line is much more northerly situated than the Canadian Pacific Railway, and also that in this section it is a trunk line of communication between the east and west. That is to say it is the heart of the connection between the east and the west, and cannot be left out of the calculations if you have any regard for maintaining connection between the east and the west, assuming that we might unfortunately be involved in a contest with our neighbours to the south. The conditions are these: The Canadian Pacific Railway skirts for 250 miles the north shore of Lake Superior. I am not posing here as a military expert by any means, but I know sufficiently of military tactics, and national defence, to make this assertion, that, as a means of maintaining communication between the west and the east, in the event of trouble, the Canadian Pacific Railway is almost valueless. With anything like a powerful enemy, that line would be almost impossible to defend. It could be attacked at a hundred points during any night at all, whether bright or dark, with certainly, so far as the attacking force might be concerned, and with uncertainty so far as regards the defence, so that, from a military point of view, it would be particularly vulnerable. The Canadian Northern is not yet constructed in that section. It will be further inland than the Canadian Pacific Railway, but, after all, if it follows the line already located, it will be within very easy striking distance of the lake shore, whereas the Transcontinental runs 200 miles north, and at no point much less than 150 miles north. In my opinion this government would be justified in spending every dollar that this line will cost, if for no other reason than that they will thereby make Canada more capable of defending her liberty and national rights in case of attack. But that is not the object altogether of building the road. The hon. gentleman from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) said that the railway started from Quebec. Let me submit that Quebec is a pretty safe point to start from. There is not a stronger fortification on the continent and therefore it may be taken as a very good point to start from, regarded in the light of national defence. Then between Quebec and Winnipeg, when we consider the rugged character of the country and its local conditions, there is no nation on this globe that could dislodge the Canadian people from that position if they chose to defend it.

There are other features of the debate in which I cannot agree. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) have pointed out on several occasions that, in their opinion, there is a weakness in the agreement because there is a connection from Fort William and Port Arthur by a branch line to a junction with the Transcontinental of some 200 miles, and they represented that traffic routed to Fort William, and delivered at the head of the lakes and by the Transcontinental, will be routed from there over the Grand Trunk Railway system to American ports. I cannot agree in that contention. When traffic reaches Port Arthur and Fort William, it is not necessarily the traffic of the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Grand Trunk Railway. It is everybody's traffic.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CONMEE. It is the traffic of the common carriers of the country, and they will take part in it. The Canadian Pacific Railway does not carry through its own line, by any means, all the traffic it delivers at these ports today, and neither will the Grand Trunk Pacific after it is built. Let me contrast that position with the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. They say it would have been better had the Grand Trunk Railway been permitted to build from North Bay to the western prairie and thus carry out the scheme to which these hon. gentlemen say they are still wedded. But where would the traffic go then? If the Grand Trunk Pacific carried it over its trunk line, to its connection with the eastern system, at North Bay, we would not have as much power of preventing the routing of that traffic through American ports in the interests of their own line as we now have in the case to which I have referred. There is the other alternative, that during the winter months freight may go, not to the head of the lake, but over the line to Montreal or Qeubec or other points in Canada through the Grand Trunk Railway system, and that therefore it may possibly be routed to American ports. I do not agree in that. There may be something in it, I do not say it is a thing to which we should shut our eyes by any means, but let me ask hon. gentlemen how they can contend that even in these circumstances it would be more likely to be carried through or routed to an American port than it would be if the connection was made at North Bay instead of at Quebec or Montreal. I cannot understand that logic, I do not think the conditions of traffic lend themselves to that argument by any means.

The prediction in regard to the eastern section of the line has been discussed on former occasions. Hon. gentlemen opposite predict that there will be a deficit, that the eastern section of the line will not pay. We have heard similar predictions on former occasions. I remember that when the Canadian Pacific Railway proposed to build a line from Toronto to Montreal, many people predicted that the road would be bankrupt, that it would never pay; but we have seen that it has paid, it is doing a good business to-day and it has not destroyed the Grand Trunk Railway. The contention was that to build a parallel line was unjust to the Grand Trunk and that both lines would be unremunerative to the shareholders and deter capital from coming to this country. I heard those arguments upon the political platform then, but those gloomy predictions have not been fulfilled. That line has done a good business from the time of its construction. The history of railway construction and of transportation is that these lines of railway not only beget traffic, but they create such prosperity, such development, such increase in the product and in the ability to travel on the part of the people in the adjoining country, that the building of one line even paralleling another line, assists the line whch it parallels. Let me give a case in point. The best paying railway on this continent, or for that matter on the continent of Europe, is the line of railway that parallels the cheapest line of transportation, I refer to the New York Central, which, for 440 miles, parallels the Erie canal, practically from the shores of the great lakes to the city of New York. Why is it the best paying line? It is not a single track line, it has four tracts and is doing the greatest business in relation to its mileage of any road in the world. It competes with the Erie canal, which is the cheapest means of transportation to the ocean port of New York. The people in its vicinity are able to make more money out of their energies owing to the existence of that cheap transportation, and therefore they are able to pay greater sums in travel, in commerce and in all that goes to support a system of railways.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would my hon. friend then disagree with the argument which has been put forward by more than one Minister of Railways in my hearing that the bad results on the Intercolonial Railway are in part due to the fact that it has to contend with competition by water carriage?

Mr. CONMEE. I would not agree with that if the line of railway paralleled for any great distance the line of water communication, for instance from a terminal point, a competitive point. If there was a circuitous water route the population along which did not contribute to the traffic of the railway, then the water-traffic would no doubt come into competition with the railway and perhaps injure it; but if the railway parallels a water route anywhere close, where the same community can contribute to both systems, I contend that the world's history shows that such railways are the best paying railways. It is so in Europe. The railways paralleling the Danube, which is the cheapest water channel of carriage in Europe, are the best paying systems of railway on the European continent. A very eminent authority in the United States, Mr. Lyman E. Cooley, one of the most eminent engineers in that country, stated in my hearing that the people of the United States would be paid for the investment they made in the improvement of the Mississippi river, even if not a pound of freight was carried on the Mississippi. It may be that the railway is a more convenient means of transportation, a more convenient utility than the vessel route, but he made this statement, and I think it was fully justified, that the river was there as a regulator to bring down the combination of the railways in case they charged too much, and he said it was not alone the interest upon the capital that was to be considered, but that the improvements saved to the producers of the Mississippi valley $100,000,000 a year in their freight and passenger traffic. I do not think the argument advanced this afternoon as to the possibility of the line between Moncton and Quebec being unremunerative is one that can be well maintained. It has not been borne out by history. I do not know of any case in which the building of a new line has been unremunerative, either to the company or to the people of the district traversed by the railway. Generally speaking, these lines of railway have proved successful.

My hon. friend asked about the Intercolonial Railway. I have my own view about the Intercolonial Railway. My opinion is that in the early days of the Intercolonial Railway and during the term of office of the political party to which he belongs that party was not faithful to the Intercolonial Railway. They allowed other systems of railway to rob it of the traffic which it should naturally have. Instead of reaching out for that traffic as a business firm would do if managing the railway, they allowed other systems of railway to tap its territory and draw away from it that traffic which should have been secured for it and brought to it by the business management of the government of the day. I am not saying that either of the two Liberal governments have been absolutely right in all their policy in reference to the Intercolonial Railways, but I do say that the loss and the deficits upon the Intercolonial Railway to-day and throughout its entire history lie entirely at the door of the Conservative party under the leadership of Sir John

A. Macdonald. That is my opinion, I give it for what it is worth. They did not manage it as it should be managed. It is said: 'Why could not the government manage a railway as well as a company?' Where has any government managed a railway as well as a company? It has not been our experience. Neither political party has been able to make a success of the Intercolonial, and I think for very obvious reasons. We did not carry out the scheme to its full extent. It should have been extended to competitive points, it should have been started from a business standpoint and not from a political standpoint. We have not reached the millenium yet; and I am afraid that even if my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was in power, surrounded by the best men he could choose, and he was still operating the Intercolonial, he would have to adopt a much more radical policy than any government has yet adopted, or he would find the Intercolonial pretty near as unremunerative as it is to-day. Of course the country is developing, and it may do better. But I want to point out that a railway at the distance which the Transcontinental runs from the Intercolonial, will not be, strictly speaking, a competitive line. It will assist and not damage the Intercolonial. That has been the history of other lines in this country. We have had evidence to-day of the character of the country, its value in timber, its value in agricultural lands and in general resources. There is no doubt that these resources will be utilized and give prosperity to that section of the country.

Now, let me give my hon. friend a little bit of history. Both political parties I think were mistaken in their views as to the result of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite will say that the Liberals were mistaken in their policy in regard to that great enterprise. Well, I am not going to say they were not mistaken in some respects, because I think they were; but I do say that the Conservatives were mistaken, and very grievously mistaken. Let me remind the hon. gentleman of the contention of his leader in the past. During this and other debates a great deal of importance has been attached to a branch line from the junction to the head of the lakes. It was pointed out that that line would take from the Transcontinental Railway a great portion of the traffic and divert it at the junction and carry it down to the head of the lake. There is no doubt that it will carry down a great deal of traffic from the west to the head of the lake. I admit that, that is what it is built for. Nature has given to Canada a great waterway, the greatest inland water system of any country in the world; of course, our American friends enjoy the same system. But no other nation, or no other set of nations, enjoy as great inland waterways as these two countries enjoy. Therefore, it is quite natural that there should be a great deal of traffic to and from the head of navigation. Now, when the government of hon. Alexander Mackenzie proposed to build the Thunder Bay branch, that is the line between Port Arthur and Winnipeg, it was opposed by the Conservatives, it was opposed by the leaders of the hon. gentleman. I am not sure whether the hon. gentleman was then a member of this House. But I propose to make a quotation from the debates of that time. A strong attack was made on the government because of the proposition to build what is now the Canadian Pacific Railway between the head of the lakes and Winnipeg, and the country was asked to turn the Liberals out of power because they were squandering the people's money in building a portion of the line then called the Thunder Bay branch. But to-day we find our hon. friends calling attention to the great value of the line which this company are allowed to build from the junction to the head of the lakes, the very reverse of their policy at that time. Sir Charles Tupper moved a resolution of want of confidence in the government on that very question. In the debate he decried the expense, he decried the character of the country, and he pointed out that the line if built would be of no value. Their contention was that the traffic from eastern Canada to the west would go through the United States by way of Duluth. Here are the words of Sir Charles Tupper:

> But suppose the works to be built, what then? Does any one assume that with a railway from Duluth to Red river a single ton of freight would be carried by that route?

That is the Thunder Bay branch. Now, that was the prediction of a great political leader, a man of a great deal of force, one of the men whom hon. gentlemen opposite look up to, and one of the men, I say, that bears a high reputation for ability, for good judgment, for public enterprise throughout the whole country.

Mr. WRIGHT. Was not the proposition of the Mackenzie government a line part rail and part steamboat, being a different proposition altogether from an all-rail route?

Mr. CONMEE. No, that was not the proposition. In the discussion to which I refer there was such an issue as my hon. friend mentions, but it had no reference to that proposition. Sir Charles Tupper was contending for a main line running away north, nearly where the Transcontinental line now runs practically in the same section of country, and would not go to the head of the lakes at all. When a business company got hold of the enterprise in connection with the Transcontinental line, the first thing they undertook to do was to build a branch line from the main trunk line to the head of the lakes, and that is what the Mackenzie government undertook to do, to build a branch line to the Trunk line. The hon. gentleman shakes his head; if he will look up the history of the matter he will find I am correct. Now that prophecy has been entirely disapproved. We have today, not only the Canadian Pacific Railway but the Canadian Northern Railway, from the head of the lakes to the prairies of the west. In my judgment the chief justification for the building of this road will be the control it will afford over the rates between the east and the west. What were the conditions? We have a railway commission that regulates the traffic of our railways, they have control over the rates of every railway in this country except the Canadian Pacific Railway, because the leaders of the hon. gentleman, when in power made an improvident bargain. Sir, I am surprised that any hon. gentleman, having knowledge of his own political party and of its record, would attempt to make a comparison between the Canadian Pacific Railway bargain and the bargain that was made in regard to the Transcontinental Railway. It seems to me that instead of being bold enough to attempt to make such a contrast hon. gentlemen ought to hide their heads in shame, because if ever a political party betrayed a weakness—I will not use stronger language—if ever a political party were recreant to the trust of the people of this country it was that party when they made the bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company by which they gave them more than sufficient to build the line of railway of the people's money and the people's assets and still never protected the people in regard to rates by any clause in their contract. When our Railway Commission undertake to impose a rate on railways they find that if the Canadian Pacific Railway choose to assert their position under the contract, their rates cannot be controlled and every other railway in competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway can say and say truly: 'It is unfair to impose these onerous conditions, these lesser charges, upon our system if you do not impose them upon the system with which we have to compete.' I do not think any hon. gentleman can question that. It is quite plain. I say, Sir, that if the government never did anything else in building the Transcontinental Railway, if we were to ignore all other conditions of advantage to the country, that alone is sufficient to more than warrant the position they have taken. Why? Because, Sir, we cannot to-day control the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the west to the east and from the east to the west except that we can show that they are earning a profit of more than 10 per cent. But, it is difficult to show that because they keep the books. This government has never undertaken to do it and no other government have undertaken to do it or will undertake to do it for many years to come. But, we do control the rates on the Transcontinental Railway we control the rates on other roads. We not only control the rates on the Transcontinental Railway between Winnipeg and the Atlantic, but we own the road. True, we lease it on conditions, and one of the conditions of the lease is that we can control the rates. We can say what rates and what service that carrying line shall give to the traffic between the east and the west, between the manufacturing cities of Canada and the grain producing centres of the west. It is essential that these two sections shall be built up and cemented together if Canada is to become a nation such as we hope it will be in future. We control the rates not only on that system but on every other system competing with it between the east and the west, because the moment we fix the rates on the Transcontinental Railway that moment the Canadian Pacific Railway must meet those rates. They cannot charge more; they will not charge more. That has been proved. Everybody who knows anything about railway traffic and railway management will admit that at once. The evidence is so plain even now that every one understands it.

My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals has pointed out the great advantage incidental to this undertaking in the impetus which has been and will be given to the construction of branch lines not only by the Grand Trunk Pacific but by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern in order to put themselves in a position to compete for the traffic and to maintain all the main trunk lines by bringing the traffic to them from the sections of country which are adjacent to their system. Already it has been a great advantage to the west and to other sections of the country as well. To-day we see the Canadian Pacific Railway double tracking their line between Winnipeg and Port Arthur. For what reason? Sir, there is no answer to that except one. The Canadian Pacific Railway directors are business men. They see the inevitable coming. They know that when the rates are fixed on the Transcontinental Railway they must meet those rates and they are spending $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 in double tracking and improving the grades on their system to meet that competition. To a certain extent the Canadian Northern are doing the same thing. They have to-day, between Port Arthur and Winnipeg, just half the grades that the Canadian Pacific Railway had. They have a ·5 per cent as against a 1·10 per cent minimum on the Canadian Pacific Railway. So that we see the great advantage to the country that is brought about in an incidental way by the construction of this Transcontinental Railway. I am quite certain that that position cannot very well be contradicted. It must be admitted that this is the great force that is driving the Canadian Pacific Railway to better their grades and spend large sums of money in order that they may be able to meet the competition that the Transcontinental Railway will bring about once it goes into general operation.

The hon. member told us about the cost of the Pennsylvania Railway and I asked the date of the report to which he was referring. The answer was 1902. Let me point out that the Pennsylvania Railway was, like a great many other railways in the United States and Canada, built as cheaply as it could be under the circumstances, but the Pennsylvania Railway Company have since made enormous expenditures upon betterments. I have a knowledge of that matter because I happened to be building a piece of railway from Lake Superior to the Helen Mine of which a number of the owners were Pennsylvania Railway managers. They were at that time expending, or just beginning to expend, immense sums of money in bettering their grades on the Pennsylvania system. I was invited to take part in the work there if I could agree upon prices, which, unfortunately, I could not because they found men who could do the work cheaper than I could. But, I happen to know that they have spent some $150,000,000 since that period in the betterment of their grades, and curvatures, in more permanent work and in the extension of the line. If my information is not wrong they have spent over $200,000,000. But, I had the information in 1906 that up to that time they had expended $150,000,000 in the improvement and building up of their system. So, I venture the assertion that if to-day the cost of the Pennsylvania system is computed it will be nearly if not more than double what it was in the estimate to which the hon. member refers. That, of course, would not justify an unnecessary expenditure upon this line if there was an unnecessary expenditure. My hon. friend is not a position and I do not believe any hon. member of this House is in a position to say to-day, with the information that we have, that there has been any extra cost. There will come a time when the matter can be tested, but at the outset of the construction of any railway, even the best railway, I submit that you cannot tell the exact cost of the line or anything like it.

All they can do is to give an approximate estimate. Why, I could prove beyond a doubt that the Canadian Pacific Railway, in some sections, cost more than double, the estimate of the engineers. On section A in which I had a part myself, I know that the actual cost was more than double the estimate. It is very easy for any one to predict that there may be defects here or there or that this or the other section of the line may not work out well, but the answer to all that is that the National Transcontinental Railway line is being built inland far from the system of railways which now exist and far from the older settled portions of the country. It is carrying, as has been said by the leader of the House the map of Canada 100 miles or 200 miles to the north. If there was a weak spot in our country from a national or a military standpoint or from any other standpoint, it was that geographically Canada was a narrow strip extending between Lake Superior and the Hudson bay. But, Sir, no longer is that the case when you have a line of railway penetrating through that strip along the best possible route for military and commercial purposes between eastern and western Canada. Take the loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway and compare it with this loan. The Conservative government gave the Canadian Pacific Railway 15,000,000 acres of land and on some sections $25,000 a mile in money. They gave them a completed railway of 440 miles between Port Arthur and Winnipeg on which the company never spent a dollar; they gave them more than 100 miles from St. Vincent to Winnipeg and another 100 miles to Portage la Prairie on which the company never spent a dollar. They gave them from the town of Pembroke westerly another section on which the company never spent a dollar. They gave them on the Pacific coast 250 or 300 miles completed railway. In all they gave them 1,000 miles of completed railway in addition to money and land subsidies, and yet the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had to come to the government for a loan of $30,000,000. Did any of these hon. gentlemen who are now talking about imposing conditions rise in their place then and say: we have given you all these great advantages; we have given you more than sufficient to build your system but you now want a loan and we shall have something to say about controlling your rates. Oh, no, these gentlemen did not have that idea then. I repeat that the Conservative party stands to-day and will for ever stand—and I don't blame hon. gentlemen who have seats on the opposition side of the House for many of them are not responsible——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. CONMEE. I mean that they are not responsible for the actions of their party in the past. During my late election this very question came up, and as I say now I said to the people in the good city of Fort William: If there is a Conservative in this city that will stand up in this meeting and show his face to his fellow townsmen and endorse the policy of the Conservative party as regards the bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway, I will buy him a new hat. I gave the history of the Conservative government in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway and how they failed to protect the rights of the people in controlling rates and there was not a man there who would stand up and endorse that policy. I believe there is to-day not a man on the opposite side of the House, except perhaps one or two, who will stand up and approve of the policy of his leaders in the past. He must condemn them for the improvident bargain they made, and when that bargain is compared with the bargain made by this government which retains not only the ownership of the railway, but the control of the rates on the main trunk system, still further clinches the advantages of that system to the people of Canada by connecting it with the Grand Trunk and its branch lines, and its lines extending to every important city and town in the land and to every manufacturing centre, and building up the prosperity of the country—when, I say, the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway as compared with this contract, the contract the Conservatives made with the Canadian Pacific Railway is a poor thing indeed.

Mr. BLAIN. Did not the Hon. G. W. Ross, now senator, approve of the policy of the Conservative party and compliment them on their foresight in constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. CONMEE. He may have done so. I have myself congratulated Sir John Macdonald upon some of his policies. I think he was a great Canadian, I think he did some good things for the country, but I say that in the bargain he made on behalf of the people of Canada with the Canadian Pacific Railway he was not faithful to his trust, or he had not that business capacity which he should have had in the position he occupied. If Senator Ross congratulated the Conservatves, I am sure he did it upon some other ground than the matter we are discussing here to-day. Now, I have nothing more to say further than that there will be no hesitation on my part in giving my hearty support to the policy of the government in this regard. We on this side of the House are not filled up with suspicion; we have confidence that this government is anxious to make the very best bargain it can for Canada, and, that while not imposing impossible or too onerous conditions upon the company they will at the same time protect the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou). There can be no doubt that the leader of the opposition, since he has once more obtained a seat in the maritime provinces, has been anxious to let the House and the country feel that he is somewhat interested in the development of trade through our national ports. But the solicitude of the hon. gentleman on that point is worthy of a short examination. I think my hon. friend the leader of the opposition would have done much better service for the eastern provinces if he and the gentlemen who support him had seen to it, that in the course of these debates they had not on every possible occasion intimated that the construction of the eastern section was a fatal mistake. If the policy of the opposition party to-day is that the eastern section of the Transcontinental Railway should not be built, then it is wholly inconsistent and beside the question for the hon. leader of the opposition to attempt to mislead the people down by the sea by saying to them that though they opposed the construction of this railway altogether, they have offered a resolution which means nothing in particular so far as creating further obligations upon this company when they operate the road. If my hon. friend and his party were sincerely desirous of adopting a Canadian policy which would enable the eastern provinces to share in the progress of this Dominion as the years go by, and become more and more the means by which the developed trade of western Canada is to flow to the nations across the sea, then my hon. friend and his party would be standing strongly by the proposition that the eastern section of the Transcontinental Railway should be built. My hon. friend knows the provisions contained in the contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. All that was threshed out in this House some six years ago when the proposal was first brought to the attention of parliament. My hon. friend knows, and the country knows, that as a result of the views which the government held, and which led them to consider this proposition for the development of Canadian trade through Canadian channels, the government incorporated in the agreement which they made with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company conditions so ample, definite and clear that my hon. friend has not been able to improve upon them in the slightest degree by any resolution which he has submitted to this House then or since. Conditions were embodied in the contract, which bind the company, once the railway is operated by them, to carry out the intent of the government in relation to this important project; and it might be well to place on record just where this government stood on this question six years ago, and where they stand to-day by those conditions. Section 42 of the agreement provides:

It is hereby declared and agreed between the parties to this agreement that the aid herein provided for is granted by the government of Canada for the express purpose of encouraging the development of Canadian trade and the transportation of goods through Canadian channels. The company accepts the aid on these conditions, and agrees that all freight originating on the line of railway, or its branches, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall, when destined for points in Canada, be carried entirely on Canadian territory, or between Canadian inland ports, and that the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports that via United States ports, and that all such traffic, not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall be carried to Canadian ocean ports.

That is the kernel of the proposition which led to the incorporation of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, the making of this agreement, and this whole programme. If my hon. friend's policy had been adopted we would have had no line of railway touching Canadian Atlantic seaports at all. We would have a line of railway built from North Bay to Manitoba and westward, which would bring the grain trade of the western country down to Lake Superior. Not a pound of grain nor a dollar's worth of the trade developed in western Canada would reach the Atlantic ocean if my hon. friend's policy of 1903 had prevailed, and if his policy of to-day were carried into effect, and my hon. friend knows it. Therefore, what is the use of misleading the people in this matter? I desire to emphasize the disparity between the hon. gentleman's policy and that of the government on this question. My hon. friend's resolution proposes that there should be effective provision by the Grand Trunk Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Company to fulfil the conditions of the agreement. My hon. friend does not venture to submit to the House what he understands as effective provision. I submit that there is in the agreement an express and definite covenant, which is so clear that there could be no difficulty about its enforcement in a court of law. It binds the Grand Trunk Pacific Company to see that all traffic not specifically routed otherwise by the shipper, shall be carried to Canadian ocean ports. But that is not all. The next section of the agreement renders this condition still more definite and more clear, because it provides:

The company further agrees that it shall not, in any matter within its power, directly or indirectly advise or encourage the transportation of such freight by routes other than those provided, but shall, in all respects, in good faith, use its utmost endeavours to fulfil the conditions upon which the public aid is granted, namely, the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports.

Now, our friends opposite who have discussed the proposition before the House have a very peculiar attitude. After lamenting and bewailing the necessity for the aid which this government is to give to this company, after decrying the enterprise, after intimating that a colossal debt has been placed on this country as the result of carrying on this enterprise, after endeavouring to lead Canadians everywhere to believe that because the government entered into this project they have placed on the necks of Canadians a burden which is going to bear them down for many years to come, these hon. gentlemen will tell you that they are not opposed to the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. Why do they say that? They say that because they have gone to the country twice in the attitude of opposition to this project. They went in 1904, talking about this government going into a reckless enterprise, building a railway through a country about which nobody knew anything, and injuring the credit of Canada by pledging her to millions of expenditure, without any knowledge or proper investigation of the subject. They received the answer of the people in 1904, and they received it again last year. My hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Crothers) digressed a little this afternoon to indicate that the people of this country did not know what they were voting on. If they did not know what they were voting on in 1904, then our hon. friends who sit on the left of the Speaker must admit that they made a very poor attempt at presenting what they called a great big issue when they went before the people at that time. All over this country they had but the one song to sing. More especially was this the fact in the central provinces. They declared that this government was engaging recklessly in the enterprise and asked the people to turn them out, and we had a statement to the effect that if the Conservative party had come in power in 1904, they would have cancelled the contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific. Yet the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Crothers) has the termerity to say that the Canadian people never voted confidence in this government or project. We heard the same remark last year. Whenever an enthusiastic Conservative supporter or orator was tired talking scandal, he reverted to the theory that this government was perpetrating a tremendous wrong in building this eastern section, that they should only have built from North Bay to the west; and my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, with his friends who sit behind him, coming from the smaller provinces by the sea, were willing to forego all the hopes and aspirations of these provinces to share in the great development which is bound to follow the completion of this railway, if they could obtain some other portions of Canada to support the theory that the Transcontinental should begin at North Bay and go to the west and never reach either Quebec or the eastern provinces at all.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

ONTARIO AND MICHIGAN POWER COMPANY.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 34) to incorporate the Ontario and Michigan Power Company.—Mr. Conmee.

Mr. LENNOX. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Why?

Mr. CONMEE. This measure was allowed to stand over upon an understanding. The Minister of Finance was here and he stated to me that it was agreed by hon. gentlemen on the other side that if the Bill was then allowed to stand over there would be no particular discussion on it when it next came up, beyond what would be necessary if hon. gentlemen wanted to press the question to a vote. That was mentioned by the minister and assented to by the principal whip of the opposition and other gentlemen on that side of the House, so I do not think there can be any question as to the Bill going on now.

Mr. BLAIN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, that was not the agreement at all; the Bill was allowed to stand over so that communication could be had with the Ontario government to ascertain their view upon the proposed amendments. My hon. friend could not expect that we should have received any communication from the Ontario government in one day.

Mr. CONMEE. That was mentioned. The discussion that took place is on 'Hansard.' There could be no pretense that it is necessary to have a communication from the Ontario government for the hon. member himself stated last evening that he had sent to the Ontario government a copy of the reprinted Bill with the proposed amendments and that he had a letter from the premier of Ontario still objecting to the Bill. Under these circumstances I do not think there is anything to be gained or any good purpose to be served by holding this Bill back until the premier of Ontario sees fit to send some further communication. There was no such understanding, I deny that most emphatically.

Mr. BLAIN. On what pretense was the Bill left over if that was not it?

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. gentleman is perhaps better able to answer that than I am, I do not know exactly. The hon. gentleman made a request and pledged their honour that if the Bill stood over then when it came up again in regular order it should go through without factious opposition.

Mr. BLAIN. No.

Mr. CONMEE. I say, yes.

Mr. HENDERSON. There need not be any particular dispute about this; it is all in 'Hansard.' Mr. Lennox said:

> My hon. friend does not mean that we shall be precluded from any legitimate discussion?
> Mr. FIELDING. Provided that discussion be short and quite within reasonable limits.

That is the way we always act, always within reasonable limits. The minister surely does not mean to say that we are unreasonable——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly not.

Mr. HENDERSON—in advocating anything that is in the public interest. Mr. Fielding continued:

> But if it be a discussion—I do not want to use the word obstruction——

The minister was wrong, there was no obstruction.

> Mr. LENNOX. Speaking for myself and probably all the other members, I can assure the hon. minister that there will be nothing in the nature of obstruction.
> Mr. BLAIN. It will be understood that a meeting of the Private Bills Committee will be convened.
> Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.
> Mr. BLAIN. Well, yes. But how would it be possible for the representatives of Ontario to appear before the House.
> Mr. FIELDING. I think that the gentlemen representing Ontario will have abundant opportunity of presenting their views through my hon. friend, or anybody else who might be interested in the matter.
> Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I might also say that we reserve the right to divide the House upon it.
> Mr. CONMEE. I understand, from what the Minister of Finance and other gentlemen have said, that it is not to be assumed that if the reply from the Ontario government is unfavourable, that is to be made a ground of still further opposition, similar to what we have had before.

Now we must await Mr. Whitney's reply and see whether it is favourable or unfavourable. I think the Bill should not go on to-night until we receive that reply, in accordance with that understanding.

Mr. LENNOX. At one time I would have been amazed at the remarks made by the hon. member for Thunder Bay and Rainy River (Mr. Conmee). With the qualifications that have been read by the hon. member for Halton we accepted the proposition of the hon. Minister of Finance. We had a little obstruction I will admit for about five minutes yesterday.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Only five?

Mr. LENNOX. I do not think it would exceed five. I hate to take up time, but we were allowing a discussion to take place between the hon. member for Rainy River and the hon. Minister of Finance, and during that time I undertook to interest the House with a few pertinent remarks for five minutes or so. I was talking to keep the ball rolling. Then the Minister of Finance said:

As we are not likely to make much progress on the present lines, and as I understand the suggestion to be that, in view of the objections raised by the Prime Minister of Ontario, there should be several days delay to enable him to present his views, I am prepared to accept that suggestion provided that assurance is given that the matter will then be dealt with without further difficulty according to the discretion of the House.

And then I made the remarks already read. My point is that the suggestion of the Finance Minister was that there should be a delay of several days, not until to-night, because that of course would serve no useful purpose, and as soon as the reply comes from the Ontario government. I have no desire it should be delayed. I do not think there will be any undue opposition, and we will endeavour to present our views when the time comes in as concise a way as we possibly can. It would be idle to think of discussing this matter to-night. We could discuss it but it would not be in accordance with the agreement come to and would be only waste of time.

Mr. CONMEE. I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that this Bill has stood over on many occasions. It has stood over now nearly all session. The session is drawing to a close and if the Bill is to become law it has to go to the Senate. I do not think any good purpose can be served by making any further pretense that the Bill is to stand over on the understanding of last evening, because I made this remark after the remarks that have been read by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). Mr. Blain had asked:

Would not that be good ground?

Meaning that if the Ontario government objected it would be good ground. My reply was:

It may be in the opinion of my hon. friend, but not in the opinion of other hon. gentlemen. I am merely saying that I do not understand the arrangement in that way, and I want to know if it is so understood across the House.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not so understand it. Hon. gentlemen might feel as strongly as they do now on the subject, but I do not understand they would consider it a ground for delaying the matter in order that it might be dealt with in a reasonable time.

Then the discussion was continued. I spoke particularly to the Minister of Finance and asked him if any objection would be taken to the Bill when the next order for private Bills came up on Tuesday and his answer to me was that unless hon. gentlemen permitted this Bill to go through without unnecessary discussion or delay they would be breaking faith with him. That was his reply to me, and that is my reply to the request for delay to-night.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask my hon. friend to explain the paragraph immediately above the first paragraph, the one that was read by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson).

Mr. CONMEE. I did say in that paragraph:

I understand from what the Minister of Finance and other gentlemen have said that it is not to be assumed that if the reply from the Ontario government is unfavourable that is to be made a ground for further opposition.

Mr. BLAIN. What does that mean?

Mr. CONMEE. That simply means that there would be no misunderstanding, that if hon. gentlemen chose to say that because the Ontario government is not favourable to this Bill, we are bound in honour not to allow it to go through.

Mr. BLAIN. Does not that answer by my hon. friend mean that we are to wait until the reply from the Ontario government has reached us?

Mr. CONMEE. Not at all. What a piece of humbug that would be, with the letter of the Ontario government in the hon. gentleman's possession. We had this answer from the leader of the House last night, stating that if the Ontario government had taken that ground, after knowing the amendments to be made, he would take issue with them. Let me ask the hon. gentleman what good purpose is to be served by this procedure. They cannot expect me to give way further, I think I have done all that is reasonable. They cannot expect me to allow the Order Paper to be cleared and put myself in a worse position than I am now. We have had a discussion, hon. gentlemen have put themselves on record, there is no mistake about thir position. I think they have said all they are able to say. Let me remind them that the system of our government is that the majority rules. Hon. gentlemen cannot serve any good purpose, either for themselves or for any other interest they choose to champion, by going further than they have gone. If they consider that this measure is not in the public interest they have a right to challenge it by vote. I do not think they have any doubt but that a majority of this House is in favour of it.

Mr. BLAIN. I wish to make my position clear, and I think the position generally on this side of the House. There was a distinct understanding between the two parties that this Bill was to be left over in order that communication could be had with the Ontario government. My hon. friend made his own statement in the House when this matter was up for discussion, and he has qualified it by saying that, no matter what the reply of the Ontario government would be, it would not be a ground for delaying the Bill unnecessarily when it came up again for discussion. I am not going to plead with my hon. friend or with the House not to take up the Bill, if the hon. gentleman wishes to press it. If he thinks it is in the interest of his Bill and in the interest of an early prorogation, to press the matter to-night, he has that privilege, and from this side there will be no complaint. But I want my hon. friend and the House to understand that when we make an agreement between the two sides of the House, we intend to live up to it. Communication was made with the Ontario government by the first mail after this understanding was reached, and there has been no time to get an answer. As my hon. friend from South Simcoe has said, as soon as that answer is received in respect to the proposed amendment, then on this side of the House we will be prepared to discuss the question, and to finish the discussion, and my hon. friend can divide the House on the Bill if he wishes. But if he presses the matter now, I shall appeal to the Finance Minister to look over the record of the discussion, and he will say whether his record does not prove that it was fairly understood by both sides, including the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill, that this matter was to stand over until an answer was received from the Ontario government.

Mr. CONMEE. I see the Finance Minister now in his place, and I repeat what I stated a few moments ago, that I did not understand it in that way; and I tried to make it clear by calling attention to the fact that even if the Ontario government did disapprove, that should not be a cause for delay. But my hon. friend is not at liberty to put his own conclusions upon what I said, and tell me that I agreed to wait until we received a reply from the Ontario government. I am not so innocent as that. If they had any idea that I would agree to a proposition of that kind, I am sorry they have that opinion of me.

Mr. LENNOX. The Finance Minister discussed the matter, as we see by the record, with the promoter of the Bill, and then made an announcement of what he proposed, and this is what he said—I read it again because he was not present when I read it at first:

> We are not likely to make much progress on present lines, and as I understand the suggestion to be that, in view of the objections raised by the Prime Minister of Ontario, there should be several days delay to enable him to present his views, I am prepared to accept that suggestion provided that assurance is given that the matter will then be dealt with without further difficulty, according to the discretion of the House.

Then I got up and made some suggestions. But it is not a question of what I said or any other hon. member said, it is the understanding that was come to across the floor of the House, and that understanding must be lived up to. I appeal to the Finance Minister; I submit that it is his duty to see that this agreement is lived up to.

Mr. FIELDING. The quotation which my hon. friend has made from my remarks appears to be substantially correct. At the time the conversation occurred I did not have it in my mind that the next time for calling this Bill would be to-night. I did understand that hon. gentlemen opposite wished for a day or two, no particular date was mentioned; they asked for a short postponement to afford an opportunity to communicate with the Prime Minister of Ontario. Then my hon friend interposed the very natural remark that he did not propose to be bound by any conclusion of the Prime Minister of Ontario, that we were not to postpone the matter and to make it dependent on the will of the Prime Minister of Ontario, but merely that he was to have reasonable time to communicate his views to hon. gentlemen and to others. But if it be contended on the basis of that understanding that the Bill should not go on to-night, I cannot say that from my point of view that would be a breach of faith.

Mr. LENNOX. I think the Minister of Finance said several days, and we replied that we did not want any longer time than was necessary. But it would be idle to postpone it last night for the purpose of having it come up to-night.

Mr. CONMEE. I do not agree with that. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) stated last night that he had sent to the Ontario Premier the Bill as approved by the committee and the proposed amendment on the subject; and he had the premier's letter in reply stating that he was still opposed. I do not think anybody expects the premier of Ontario to take any different position from that. We had a case since that time, we had a case last night, in which the premier of Ontario, not only opposed by a letter to a friend but by an order in council, the Bill that was under discussion last night. That did not prevent the Bill from going on and it did not make any changes. I cannot agree that any good purpose would be served by this sort of delay. Hon. gentlemen, now that they have had ample opportunity of consulting the Ontario government, must agree that it is unfair to ask me to put myself in a worse position than I am in to-night and under the circumstances they should allow the Bill to go on.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am surprised to hear the hon member for Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) make the assertion that he does. I was present during the last hour of the discussion and I distinctly remember the statement of the Minister of Finance and the anxiety with which he went about and adjusted matters as they were finally arranged. The hon. member for Thunder Bay and Rainy River knows full well that it is impossible for my hon. friend from Peel to have communication with the premier of Ontario inside of twenty-four hours.

Mr. CONMEE. Could not the hon. member for Peel have called him up on the phone? Could not he have wired him? He has had ample time to have communication with him the same as I had. I got a telegram.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. gentleman may have his own way of doing things but he will understand that we stated distinctly yesterday, that it was necessary for some representative of the Ontario government to meet with members of parliament, to discuss this question and to lay before them the views which they intended to take in regard to it.

Mr. GRAHAM. In order not to have any misunderstanding as to the arrangement made by the Prime Minister with the chief whip of the party to the left of Mr. Speaker, I have turned up 'Hansard' and I see the Prime Minister is reported as saying that 'The Canada Life Bill will be taken up on Friday night.' This Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. Conmee) is on the Order Paper ahead of the Canada Life Bill. There certainly would be sufficient time, if any reply is to come from the Ontario government, to take it up before Friday night.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes, that is a reasonable time.

Mr. GRAHAM. The next night we have private Bills is Friday night?

Mr. CONMEE. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. It is understood that Friday night will be a sufficient length of time?

Mr. LENNOX. Quite sufficient.

Mr. GRAHAM. We might take the Bill up then on Friday night?

Mr. LENNOX. We might go beyond the hour.

Mr. GRAHAM. We could go beyond the hour perhaps and get through all these Bills.

Mr. CONMEE. I cannot very well consent.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not asking my hon. friend to, but I am just pointing out what was said in regard to it.

Mr. CONMEE. I know. I cannot consent to being put in a worse position than I am now. I want to be agreeable. I do not want to take a course which hon. gentlemen will think unfair or that would indicate a breach of faith on my part—far from that. But, I am satisfied that hon. gentlemen will agree with me when I say that there was nothing further from my mind than that they should set up the contention which has been set up here to-night, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance must agree with me in that because I discussed it with him. It must be quite clear to him that I had no idea of it. I would not have consented if it had dawned upon me in that way. Under these circumstances I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will not press the position they take now. What difference does it make whether this Bill goes through to-night or some other time? If these hon. gentlemen are going to challenge a vote on it why not have it now? It will have to go to the Senate. If the views of the Ontario government are to prevail they are not going to make any difference here, in my opinion. The opponents of this Bill will have an opportunity of challenging it in the Senate. Nobody is being shut out, there is no good purpose being served by the delay and I think hon. members ought to permit the Bill to go through.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the hon. gentleman see that he does not stand to gain anything for his Bill by not living up to the agreement that was made in good faith by the Minister of Finance? He must not think that he can go against that agreement and hope to make any progress with his Bill to-night. He is simply taking up that much of the time which cannot do any good to him and which will preclude something else being done to-night. I certainly think it would be advisable for him, for the sake of his Bill, even though he did not quite approve of the agreement with the Minister of Finance, not to press it to-night. The Minister of Finance did make the arrangement, the arrangement held, and there is a good deal to be gained by having these arrangements and carrying them out.

Mr. CONMEE. I would be perfectly willing that the committee rise now and that we suspend private Bills for this evening, but I am not willing to agree that some other Bills should be advanced and this one held back.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not seem reasonable.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend (Mr. Conmee) is naturally apprehensive that if his Bill is put over to next Friday and if there is only one hour on Friday for the consideration of private Bills it will have a poor chance of being put through during that time. We already have an understanding in regard to another Bill which is to come up on Friday and it was suggested that if the hour was not sufficient for that Bill we might extend it. So, I propose to move that instead of limiting the consideration of private Bills to an hour on Friday we take up the consideration of private Bills and continue it until the Order Paper is exhausted. I will move that to-morrow. That will give my hon. friend his opportunity on Friday night.

Mr. CONMEE. Does that mean that the committee now rise and that no other private Bills will be gone on with to-night?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, it means that your Bill stands over, that the other Bills will be proceeded with and I will move on Thursday that on Friday, instead of having an hour, we will take the whole night if necessary. We shall have the whole Order Paper exhausted before we take up other business. Your Bill will have its place.

Mr. CONMEE. I will have to agree to it, of course, but I cannot help but think that it is unfair to me because notwithstanding that we may have the whole of Friday night it must be remembered that this is a contentious Bill. If hon. gentlemen will say that they will allow this Bill to go to a vote within an hour——

Mr. TAYLOR. You are ahead of the Canada Life Bill.

Mr. CONMEE. Perhaps that is all the worse for me. If you want to delay the Canada Life Bill you will perhaps delay my Bill.

Mr. LENNOX. No, we think yours is the worse.

Mr. CONMEE. Well, I do not know about that. Unless the leader of the House insists upon his view I would be rather inclined to hold to the position that I now occupy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not insist on my view. My hon. friend may take his choice. I will move that on Friday night we go through with private Bills before we take up any other matter.

Mr. HENDERSON. I might remind the right hon. First Minister that as it was understood that the Canada Life Bill was to go through before the end of this week it may not be well to put anything in its way because I apprehend that there will be a very extended discussion on that Bill yet, and if the hon. gentleman's Bill comes before it it may mean that we will be sitting here until Sunday morning.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It has been agreed that we shall have a legitimate discussion and nothing else and that the sense of the House shall be taken thereafter.

Mr. HENDERSON. I can assure the right hon. gentleman that the discussion will be perfectly legitimate. We gave up a night on the understanding that we would have an opportunity again. We have certain views to present and we do not want to be restricted but we are quite willing to be restricted within the arrangement that the Bill was to go through before the end of the week.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I assume that if the discussion upon this Bill and upon the other is legitimate they will be disposed of one way or the other long before Sunday morning.

Mr. LENNOX. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. MILLER. Perhaps it might be arranged that private Bills could be taken up at eleven o'clock on Friday morning

Mr. CONMEE. I cannot agree to that motion. Let me again suggest that all the private Bills stand over for to-night.

Mr. LENNOX. We will do nothing of the kind; we won't play dog in the manger.

Mr. CONMEE. I don't know where the dog in the manger is, but he is not on this side of the House.

Mr. BARR. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should take a vote on it.

Mr. CONMEE. That is just what I want.

Mr. BLAIN. I do not think there has been such a case as this before the House for many years. Here is the hon. gentleman pressing a Bill that has not been printed and distributed among the members.

Mr. CONMEE. Oh.

Mr. BLAIN. My hon. friend wants to press this Bill through without it being printed or circulated, and although the amendments are in the Votes and Proceedings, a number of hon. gentlemen have asked me where they are to be found, as they cannot be found in the Bill, where they ought to be printed. But, as the hon. gentleman will not take the advice of his own leader and the Minister of Railways I cannot hope to convince him.

Mr. FIELDING. It is quite evident there was some little misunderstanding between the promoter of the Bill and myself last night. I have nothing to find fault with in the hon. gentleman's attitude to-day. It is quite evident he did not catch the expression that I used, that this matter would have to stand over for a day or two or for several days. If his attention had been drawn to these words he would probably have taken exception, but he did not notice them and probably I must take the blame. My hon. friend, however, cannot make progress in the next twenty minutes, and I should think that in the interest of his own Bill he had better take the suggestion of the Prime Minister. I hope he may get it through in that way, but he certainly cannot get it through to-night.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. We would not have time to hear from the Ontario government. My hon. friend from Peel sent them a copy and we expect to hear from them.

Mr CONMEE. May I repeat the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Miller) that private Bills be taken up at eleven o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MILLER. Why not?

Mr. CONMEE. Hon. gentlemen ought to be fair.

Mr. BARR. If the hon. gentleman does not see that the Bill is printed by Friday night there may be trouble.

Mr. CONMEE. The Bill is perfectly in order as to printing. The rules of the House are strictly complied with so far as that is concerned. However, under the circumstances, I am willing to accept the suggestion made by the premier.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Is the motion of the hon. gentleman to report progress on all the Bills or simply on this Bill?

Mr. LENNOX. This Bill.

Mr. CONMEE. I assume that this Bill will retain its place on the Order Paper.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I draw attention to the fact that there was an understanding last night, implied if not expressed, that the Canada Life Bill would be the first order on Friday night. We should not be asked to sit here discussing this Bill until midnight and then take the Canada Life Bill afterwards. I am quite sure that the words of the Prime Minister in 'Hansard' would carry out that idea and that good faith is to be kept between both sides. I trust that the First Minister will see that there will be nothing in the way of going on with the Canada Life Bill at eight o'clock on Friday night.

Mr. FIELDING. I will not say anything as to the Canada Life Bill, because the Prime Minister has dealt with that. It was understood with regard to this Bill that at the moment we should reach it—I will not say whether it was meant for to-night or some other night—there would be a moderate amount of discussion and a division would thereupon take place. I am, therefore, quite sure that on that Bill there would not be any protracted discussion so as to seriously interfere with the progress of the other Bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. There will be several amendments moved.

Mr. FIELDING On which Bill?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Canada Life Bill.

Mr. FIELDING. I am speaking of what is commonly called the Conmee Bill, and the understanding was that when that Bill was reached there should be legitimate discussion on it and a division taken. If that is carried out there will then be abundant time to take up the Canada Life Bill.

Mr. TALBOT. Perhaps they won't agree to carry that out.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Talbot) need not make any nasty insinuations; we are just as liable to keep good faith as he is. I do not think there is any misunderstanding between the Minister of Finance and ourselves. The understanding is that when this Bill comes up there will be honest discussion on it and no intention to unduly delay its progress.

Mr. TALBOT. How will that be proved?

Mr. LENNOX. I am not going to talk across the floor of the House to you.

Mr. BOYCE. I desire to draw attention to a statement made in my absence with regard to some supposed arrangement on this Bill between the hon. member (Mr. Conmee) and myself. For the purpose of bringing the matter more fully before the committee I quote from 'Hansard,' page 5428:

Mr. BLAIN. Since my hon. friend (Mr. Conmee) has given us a very full explanation of the Bill and the proposed amendments, I would suggest that he allow it to stand for further consideration, particularly as my hon. friend from Algoma West (Mr. Boyce), who took such an active part in the discussion of this Bill when it was before the House some time ago, is absent.

Mr. CONMEE. If the hon. gentleman will allow me. I met the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyce) yesterday and showed him my amendments and discussed them with him. I understood him to say that he was satisfied. There is only one point of difference.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Louder.

Mr. BOYCE. I might repeat what was said by my hon. friend from Cape Breton, that these gentlemen who are calling 'louder' have such very long ears that they might have heard the first time. Now, although it has been stated emphatically in 'Hansard' by the contradiction made by my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) on the authority of a memorandum which I had the foresight, having an intimate knowledge of the hon. member from Rainy River——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The words of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyce) convey an insinuation that is not allowed by the rules of the House.

Mr. BOYCE. With the utmost deference to your ruling, I do not think there is anything unparliamentary in my words.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman will please resume his seat. The hon. gentleman must accept the ruling of the Chair unless he appeals to the House; he is not at liberty to comment on the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BOYCE. May I ask what words of mine are out of order?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. He has the right to know what words of his are out of order.

Mr. BOYCE. I desire to know what words I have spoken are out of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have ruled that the words the hon. gentleman used with regard to the member for Rainy River —I cannot at this moment recall the exact words——

Mr. BOYCE. I should like to know what they are.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Unfortunately I cannot recall at this moment the exact words as some conversation intervened, but I ruled at the moment that the words conveyed an insinuation that appeared to my mind not to be within the rules of parliament. They reflected, I believed, upon the honour of one of the members of this House. That is not permissible.

Mr. BOYCE. I will repeat, Mr. Chairman, in order to refresh your memory. You have stated that you are unable to recall my words, although you have made a ruling upon them. I desire to submit with the utmost respect to any ruling you make; but, at the same time, I desire to point out that the words upon which you ruled were these, that I had the foresight— when you, Sir, interrupted me with the ruling that I was out of order——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think the words of the hon. gentleman were clear enough in their intent. If I did not properly interpret his meaning, then his words would not be out of order. They did convey to my mind the impression that the hon. gentleman expected that the hon. member for Rainy River would do some act not in consonance with an hon. member's proper method of conducting himself in this House, and therefore I felt it my duty to state that that language did not appear to be in order. The hon. gentleman is at liberty to explain his words, and if they were not intended to convey such an impression, they would not be out of order.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Chairman, I had not risen to that height of hypothesis, and did not venture a possibility upon a possibility. All I ventured to assert was that having had a discussion with my hon. friend, and having been obliged to leave the House, knowing that I could not be present when the Bill was again under discussion, I had the foresight—that was all I said—to place in a memorandum for my hon. friend from South Simcoe what my exact understanding of the conversation with my hon. friend from Thunder Bay and Rainy River was. That, Sir, was what I was proceeding to explain when you ruled that I was out of order. I am now in the judgment of the chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. With the explanation that the hon. member gives, I will not further delay his remarks. He is at liberty to proceed.

Mr. BOYCE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that my hon. friend has placed me in rather an unfortunate position. I was not in the House when my hon. friend said that there was an agreement between himself and me with regard to the provisions of this Bill.

Mr. CONMEE. No, I did not.

Mr. BOYCE. I have read from 'Hansard' at page 5428, where the hon. gentleman says:

I met the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyce) yesterday and showed him my amendments and discussed them with him. I understood him to say that he was satisfied. There is only one point of difference.

I desire to say that there was never any agreement about any provision of this Bill between my hon. friend and myself, no matter what idea he may have derived from any conversation that took place between himself and me. My hon. friend came to me and desired to hold out the olive branch in regard to this Bill. He found himself in rather a difficult position, sandwiched between the opposition and his leader, and he said that he desired to suggest some amendments to me. I did not assent to anything, did not say there was only one point of difference remaining between us, but I said that what suggestions he made should receive the consideration of myself and my colleagues, and I have not seen or heard from the hon. gentleman since.

Mr. CONMEE. I am quite positive that I made no statement that the hon. gentleman had agreed to anything, and he is quite mistaken if he thinks that I approached him with any view of olive-branching. I met him on the street and had a discussion with him on the Bill and showed him the amendments which were practically adopting the amendment of which he had given notice, and I said to him that I did not think any good purpose would be served by his pressing again for two years instead of three years.

Mr. BOYCE. My hon. friend would not like me to say what he did say, would he?

Mr. CONMEE. I am quite willing that the hon. gentleman should state anything he ever heard me say. I did not say last night that the hon. gentleman had agreed to that. Even if it is not correct in 'Hansard', I have a right to correct it. This is the language which the hon. gentleman refers to:

> If the hon. gentleman will allow me. I met the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyce) yesterday and showed him my amendments and discussed them with him. I understood him to say he was satisfied. There is only one point of difference, and that is on this point—I will be fair about it. The hon. member's amendment would strike out the word 'three' in section 8 and substitute the word 'two.' That would mean that the company shall commence operations within two years instead of within three years. I pointed out that this company had to get legislation from Washington before it could proceed with its works —it had to go to another country to obtain the privilege of carrying on these works on the Pigeon river. I pointed out that it was more or less a difficult undertaking and that the company ought not to be hampered by narrow conditions, but ought to be allowed a reasonable time, and I do not think that three years is unreasonable. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he would not press that point.

I do not say that the hon. gentleman agreed. I quite admit that he did not agree. What I say is that I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he was satisfied with the amendment in regard to cutting out the Nipigon river and retaining the Pigeon river.

Mr. BOYCE. Did my hon. friend understand that there was only one point of difference between us, and that was as to whether there were to be two years or three years for the commencement of the work?

Mr. CONMEE. That is a lawyer's quibble. My hon. friend only gets the better of me on those little side issues. I cannot draw as fine a distinction as my hon. friend can. If my hon. friend will tell me what difference there is between his amendment, so far as the Nipigon river is concerned, and my notice of amendment given by me then probably I shall be able to explain in my simple way but not having a legal training, I assumed that there was no difference. Because I happened to say in the heat of the discussion—not being on my guard and not supposing that a different construction would be put on my words—that there was one point of difference, I am now brought to book for it. I think I was right. There was one point, and that was the main point, as I understood it. What is the difference between this motion as regards the Nipigon river and my proposed amendment, if I do not accept the hon. gentleman's amendment?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Motion agreed to.

Progress reported.

Mr. CONMEE. I have asked the hon. gentleman a question; and having regard to the courtesy due the House, I think he ought to answer.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have declared the motion carried.

THE THESSALON AND NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 104) respecting the Thessalon and Northern Railway Company.—Mr. Smyth.

On section 1,

Mr. CONMEE. I would like to get an explanation from the promoter. The company was originally incorporated in 1895 by Act of the Ontario legislature for a railway line starting near the shore of the Georgian bay or the Soo river and extending northerly by way of Thessalon, entirely within the limits of the province of Ontario. The present Bill provides that the company may extend that line, following the same course, to a connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it contains the declaration that this work is for the general advantage of Canada. I profess to be a consistent advocate of provincial rights as I understand them and it sems to me that hon. gentlemen opposite, who have been strongly professing and advocating that principle, cannot possibly support this Bill with that declaration in it.

Mr. MACDONELL. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman who is promoting the Bill is not present. I understand it is not to be gone on with, and therefore it is out of order to discuss it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is not a point of order. The hon. gentleman is in order.

Mr. CONMEE. This puts the consistency of hon. gentlemen opposite, who have have been professing and advocating provincial rights, to the test, and they ought, every man of them, to oppose the Bill. That is not the worst feature about it. Here is a Bill that invades provincial rights, which takes away from the province its control over a railway wholly within that province, and you have no intimation from the premier of Ontario regarding it. I submit that this Bill should stand until there is a declaration from the premier of the province of Ontario as to whether this legislation infringes on provincial rights. Hon. gentlemen who are members of the Railway Committee know that the province of Ontario had a legal representative at that committee who objected to this Bill on the ground that it is an infringement on provincial rights; yet, without a line from the premier of the province of Ontario, without an order in council, without a letter, without a telegram, without any permission whatever, hon. gentlemen opposite want to go on with this Bill, in defiance of the views of the Prime Minister of Ontario. I am surprised at their attitude.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC LOAN.

House resumed debate on motion for the third reading of Bill (No. 128) to authorise a loan to the Grand Trunk Pacific.—Mr. Fielding.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou). When the House rose at six o'clock, I was endeavouring to point out the very anomalous position occupied by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, in the amendment he has proposed on the third reading of this Bill. I ventured to point out some reasons why, without being at all unfair or unkind to that gentleman, every man who would like to see the commercial independence of Canada established might well be suspicious of the motives which actuate that hon. gentleman. When one recalls that six years ago the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite was opposed to building a railway from one end of the country to the other or constructing a transcontinental line which would have connections with the sea-board at both ends of Canada, when we recall that hon. gentlemen opposite proposed to build, not a transcontinental line, but a line beginning at North Bay and stretching from the western country to the Pacific ocean, thereby absolutely excluding any ocean ports on our Atlantic coast, I repeat that those who want to see the commercial independence of this country asserted might well be suspicious of the motives of the mover of the resolution we are now discussing. Do you find that these hon. gentlemen, after the lessons they must have learned from the two last elections as to what are the views and aspirations of the Canadian people, have abandoned the position they took six years ago and accept the policy that we should have a national line from sea to sea. Is that their position to-day? If it were, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, might be supposed to have some faith in the proposition he submits. But that is not their position. They stand to-day where they stood six years ago. They still declaim against the absurdity of building what is known as the eastern section and talk about the tremendous burden placed on the people as a result of its construction. Every word they utter is a direct protest against our providing on the Atlantic coast of Canada railway connection by the transcontinental with these ocean ports which we desire to build up and make prosperous. Yet, in the face of that well known opposition of his party, the leader of the opposition, simply because he happens now to represent a constituency down by the sea, endeavours to lead the people to believe, by this resolution, that he is in favour of some effective provision which will aid in the development of our maritime ports.

The policy of my hon. friends opposite in 1903 and 1904 and again in 1909 is a policy of developing trade only and solely through the ocean ports on the Pacific coast. The truth of that position is so clear that it cannot be questioned. Only to-day the hon. gentleman from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) lamented the premature burdening of the people of this country by the debt which was being incurred in the construction of the eastern section of the Transcontinental Railway, without which section none of the traffic of this railway would touch Canadian Atlantic ports. Another reason why I think we have a right to be suspicious of the candour of hon. gentlemen opposite upon this question is that we have heard them sneer at the position taken by the Prime Minister that it had become imperatively necessary for Canada to protect herself by having an all-Canadian line in order that our trade might not be dependent upon the bonding privileges accorded to our railways through the United States, privileges which might be withdrawn at any moment with great loss to Canadian interests. The Prime Minister in 1903 asserted that if Canada desired to maintain a position of commecial independence she should at once free her trade fom its condition of dependence by having a line entirely within Canadian territory. Hon. gentlemen sneered at the leader of this government on that account and only two years ago, during the discussion of the resolution submitted by the then member for Cumberland, that the advantages of the preferential tariff should be accorded only to imports that came into this country through Canadian ports, the hon. member for East Toronto, a not unimportant member of the opposition declared that the bonding privilege was of the greatest possible advantage to Canada, and that Canada should do everything in her power to preserve that privilege, thus taking the position, to which no objection was raised by the hon. gentlemen around him, that it was right and proper for Canada always to sit under the control of the United States in relation to transcontinental traffic. My hon. friends holding that belief can hardly be deemed to be serious or candid when they talk about providing for the development of trade through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports. They are perfectly satisfied to continue a condition under which our trade relations will remain under the direct control of the United States so far as the bonding privilege is concerned. The words of the premier six years ago, that time would not wait in relation to removing Canadian trade from that position of dependency and placing Canada in a position of commercial independence were absolutely true and we are beginning to realize that to-day. Hon. gentlemen who study the position and who recognize the commercial conditions of the country must come to the conclusion that if Canada is to have a future, her commercial independence from the United States in relation to transportation must be asserted, attained and maintained.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have been accustomed to attribute to the right hon. the premier, especially in their partisan newspapers and on occasions when they are free from contradiction, the statement that the Transcontinental would cost Canada only $13,000,000. It was rather refreshing to hon. gentlemen on this side who knew the attitude of some Conservative members and newspapers, and I know it was not pleasant to hon. gentlemen around him, to hear the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers) this afternoon frankly and honestly declare there was nothing in the assertion that the leader of this House had said that the Transcontinental Railway could be built for $13,000,000. I am reminded that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) reiterated that statement to-day. I can fairly leave my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Crothers) to determine which of them is accurate in his interpretation of the Prime Minister's words.

I submit that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite six years ago and their policy to-day being not to build a transcontinental line but to stop half way across the continent, it is an anomaly for the leader of the opposition to make this motion because if my hon. friends had their way no modicum of trade would ever trickle its way down from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic seaports with such a railway as they proposed. A little might find its way by barge to Montreal or Quebec in summer but for the rest of the year not a pound would reach the Atlantic seaports of Canada. We know their policy in regard to the bonding privilege and we know that the government have wisely provided in the most absolute terms by sections 42 and 43 of the original contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific for the routing of freight by Canadian ports and when we find them asking to have this Bill sent back to the committee to add 'effective provisions' to the Bill binding these companies to the very thing they were bound to do effectively, certainly and surely by the agreement of six years ago we are reminded of the phrase used by the hon. gentleman in his trade policy, 'adequate protection'. I read this afternoon these two sections of the agreement which showed what the government had done upon this question. It is a fair and definite statement. The very basis of the policy out of which grew this transcontinental line was the theory that Canada should develop her trade through her own channels and ocean ports. That is why this government entered into this agreement, that is why the Grand Trunk Pacific was conceived, that is why aid was given to this line and that is why this agreement was made, an agreement which this government propose to carry out. Let me say as one ambitious to see the commercial independence of this country from sea to sea, that that commercial independence would not be secured by hon. gentlemen opposite who, by a policy of constructing a railway only half way across the continent, would make the great development of our western country contributory to the interests of the country to the south for all time to come. I submit further that those of us who are interested in seeing our trade go through Canadian channels and seaports have a right to suspect these Trojan oppositionists who come bearing their gifts. This proposition of our hon. friends might almost be said to have all the signs of a death-bed repentance. After six years of opposition to a transcontinental line intended to develop trade through Canadian channels and Canadian seaports, only one construction can be placed on the resolution of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition if he is candid and honest in proposing it to this House and that is that notwithstanding the declarations made by hon. gentlemen who sit behind and around him, notwithstanding the position adopted by the party during the last six years he has at last come to recognize the merit of the proposition made by the leader of the Liberal party six years ago and to believe that this transcontinental scheme was intended to and will provide for the development of trade through Canadian channels and through Canadian ocean ports. I wish to say in conclusion that I believe that those who have faith in this enterprise, faith in the ideas which prompted it, and faith in its ultimate success, will look to the men who proposed it to implement the promise which is contained in this agreement. To them they will look to see that the conditions in the agreement with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway will be carried out. We will expect more from them than we would from hon. gentlemen opposite who, if they had their way, would never have built a railway touching any of the Atlantic seaports. I believe that where ocean ports are to be developed, where men expect to reap an advantage in the great development which Canada has made, and will make in the next few years, all those interests will regard with suspicion the resolution of the leader of the opposition, and will rely on the leader of this government and the hon. gentlemen who sit around him, believing that their policy will lead to the fruition of the idea which lies at the very basis of this new transcontinental railway.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.) As a maritime member of this House I do not feel like giving a silent vote on this question, which is considered of so much importance. I am bound to say that I think I am justified in concluding that the object of this proposed amendment is not to benefit the Grand Trunk Pacific, is not to benefit the transportation interests of Canada, but it is a catch vote with the object of making some political capital in the maritime provinces. We listened this morning to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in an impassioned speech of nearly two hours duration, when he came out flat footed against the scheme in its entirety, that is, against the construction of the eastern section of the Transcontinental. He pointed out how easily it would have been for this government to accomplish all they require by making the grant of a small subsidy of a few million dollars to the Grand Trunk Railway to get across the prairies to the Pacific ocean. He pointed out how they would have money left to construct the Georgian Bay canal. Why, the hon. gentleman was willing to go into anything except to build the Transcontinental from Winnipeg to the east. But my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, now that he represents a maritime constituency, is not so bold as the member for North Toronto. The leader of the opposition says the Conservative party take issue with the Prime Minister when he says they are opposed to the construction of a Transcontinental Railway. What a reformation, what a conversion there has been in the mind of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition in the last three or four years, yes, I may say in the last one year? The member for North Toronto pointed out the barrenness of the country through which this road would run from Moncton to Quebec, and he asked in his own peculiar tones: 'What local products are there from Moncton to Quebec to feed a great railway?' Then he asked the same question: 'What local products from Quebec to Winnipeg will feed a great railway system?' Forgetting apparently that the object of this great work was not local at all, although it will do local business to some extent. Its chief object is to carry the products of the prairie provinces to the east, to make us independent of our neighbours to the south, to place us in the position which the dignity and importance of Canada demand.

Well, there has been a great deal of discussion in this House during the past few weeks over the cost of this road, and today it has been pointed out by some hon. gentlemen that this road is going to cost $130,000,000 or $135,000,000. But my hon. friends have not stated that when we spend this $130,000,000 we are not giving it away to some corporation in the form of a subsidy; we are not doing as the Conservative government did when they assisted the Canadian Pacific Railway; we are not giving this road hundreds of millions of dollars of assets in land and money to put into their own pockets, and then give them the privilege of taxing the people whatever they choose in the way of freight rates. No, we are building a road which, it is true, may possibly cost $135,000,000, but we own the road, we own every foot of it, every rail in it, and after the first seven years we are going to get three per cent interest on the total cost of construction, and at the end of fifty years the road comes back to us, and is our own absolutely without a dollar against it.

But some one will say: 'What is the good of that portion which runs from Quebec to Winnipeg?' Does he mean to say that 50 years hence a road running through this great country, through 1,000 miles of virgin forest, tapping the great prairies, will not be worth the $135,000,000 we are putting into it? Sir, if I had no more faith in the future of this country than to believe this road would not be worth what we are putting into it at the end of 50 years, I would get out of the country on the very first train. We have heard about the great difficulties we are going to labour under on account of the bond guarantee. It has also been stated here to-night by the hon. member for North Toronto that this road passes through a portion of the great northwest country, probably 1,000 miles from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains, which is the most fertile 1,000 miles in one continuous stretch on the whole American continent; and does anybody mean to say that a road going through a country like that will not pay interest on the cost of construction? They forget that the road from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean possesses grades which no other transcontinental has ever dreamed of possessing. We are getting grades of less than one per cent over the Rocky Mountains, a road over which you can haul heavy freight per ton per mile at a less cost than you can over the Intercolonial. And yet they say this road won't pay the interest on the investment. I think the best evidence any one can offer of the wisdom of the government in going into this scheme, is the fact that even hon. gentlemen opposite are bound to admit that the road goes through this magnificent country; that fact I say is a sufficient guarantee that it will pay all expenses.

Now, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, while he has been converted, or is compelled to be converted, to the idea of building a transcontinental, finds fault with the construction of that portion of the road between Quebec and Moncton, and I wish to devote a few minutes to that portion of this great work. The leader of the opposition states that we are spending $35,000,000 in order to get a road which is only 29 miles shorter than the Intercolonial. But my hon. friend fails to conceive the idea that while possibly, in actual mileage, this road is only 29 miles shorter than the Intercolonial, it is not 29 miles, but it is 100 miles, yes, 200 miles shorter from a transportation standpoint. And when you are talking transportation it is simply a question of dollars and cents, it is simply a question of what it will cost to transport a ton of freight from one given point to another given point. If my hon. friend wants to discuss what it will cost to transport a ton of freight from Quebec to Moncton by the Intercolonial or by the new road, then I submit it is two or three hundred miles shorter by the new road than by the Intercolonial. We are told by competent engineers that the same engine and the same train crew that will haul 35 or 40 loaded cars, as engines are built to-day, from Quebec to Moncton by the Intercolonial, will haul 60 or 70 loaded cars by the Transcontinental, practically double the weight. In addition to that, you have an average increase in speed of about ten miles per hour. I think I am safe in saying that for all practical transportation purposes, the Transcontinental between Quebec and Moncton will be almost one-half the distance, or not much more than one-half the distance of what it is by the Intercolonial. My hon. friend forgets another thing, that after you strike what is called Grand Falls in New Brunswick, there are immense possibilities in store for transportation. They can go down the St. John river to St. John or they can go to the Canada Eastern Crossing and from there to St. John, and in either of these cases it is 70 or 80 miles shorter to tidewater than by going by way of Moncton. View this question from any engineering standpoint and you are forced to the conclusion that the government, in building this road, have not only shortened the distance but they have made it possible to keep the business on Canadian territory and to direct it through Canadian ports.

Now, I want to say briefly that the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) to the third reading of this Bill this afternoon is not one which should commend itself to the judgment of this House. I stated earlier in my remarks that, in my opinion, it was open to the suspicion that it had been moved for political purposes and not for the benefit of maritime ports. If my hon. friend had been as sincere as he would like us to believe he is, there are several propositions which he could have made with which we would not have quarrelled and which we would have been only too happy to have consulted with him about. For instance, suppose he had told us that in case the division from Levis to Moncton is constructed before the line from Winnipeg to Quebec an arrangement should be made by which the Grand Trunk Pacific would be compelled to route freight, not specifically routed by the shipper, by way of the Transcontinental Railway from Levis to Moncton and on to the sea coast, we would have been willing to have discussed that with him.

Or, if he had proposed that when the line is constructed from Winnipeg to Quebec and from Levis to Moncton a grant should be made by the government, or some means should be taken in order to provide a ferry across the river so as to put the Grand Trunk Pacific in the same position that it would be in if the Quebec bridge were completed, then again we would have been happy to have discussed it with him, because these would have been practical measures which in the end would have inured to the benefit of the maritime ports. But, what did he propose? He proposed that in some way we shall compel the Grand Trunk Pacific to route their freight through Canadian sea-ports. Now, let us see what that means. It means that when you get the freight down to Montreal it has to diverge in one of two directions, that it has either to go by the Canadian Pacific Railway, or perhaps by the Grand Trunk to Sherbrooke and then by the Canadian Pacific Railway from Sherbrooke to St. John, or it has to go from Montreal to St. John or Halifax by the Intercolonial Railway. Take either of these propositions and see the absolute ridiculousness of them when you analyse them from the railway standpoint. When a car load of freight from the Rocky mountains or Edmonton, shipped to the sea coast, arrives at Montreal it is handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway, or to the Intercolonial Railway, and then the Canadian Pacific Railway, or the Intercolonial Railway only get their proportionate charge according to the mileage of the whole route. If the Grand Trunk Pacific brought a car load of freight from Edmonton to Montreal and then asked the Canadian Pacific Railway to transport it from there to St. John on the proportionate mileage, which would figure out according to railway arrangements, why, the Canadian Pacific Railway would laugh at them. To make it worse, if you asked the Intercolonial Railway to carry that to the sea-board at that rate, and if that went on for five years, which time might elapse before the Quebec bridge would be available, instead of having an annual deficit of $300,000 or $400,000, you would have a deficit of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 every year. Yet, that is the proposition which, for political purposes, the hon. gentleman wants this House to adopt. As far as I am concerned, and I speak with a full sense of the responsibility of the position which I occupy in this House as a maritime member, I have no hesitation in saying that I purpose voting against this amendment. I have no hesitation in saying that, according to my judgment, it does not appear to be a proposition that we should accept, either from the standpoint of common sense or from the railway or any other standpoint. It is only advanced with a political object. It is only put up as a scheme by which my hon. friend thinks he can obtain some political support in the maritime provinces, but I want to tell him that the people of the maritime provinces have listened to this bogey of the Grand Trunk Pacific too long to be caught by such a shadow as he puts before us to-day. In 1904 the campaign in the maritime provinces was fought upon the question of the Grand Trunk Pacific and nothing else. Then the Conservative party did not take the ground which my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) takes now that the road should not be built, but they said that the trouble was that the eastern section from Quebec to Moncton would not be built. They said that it would stop at Quebec, that the government never intended to build the road from Quebec or that they were building the road to Quebec in order to build up the port of Portland. Cartoons were published in the papers and circulated all over Canada showing how Portland was to benefit at the expense of Canada. The scheme, according to their contents, never intended to go beyond Quebec. An hon. friend of mine here says that they declared it was not intended to go beyond Gravenhurst. They asked the people to vote for them because the government did not intend to carry out their promise when they said they were going to build the road to Moncton. Now, they have built the road to Moncton. They have built a road the like of which does not exist in Canada to-day. If some of my hon. friends would go over that work, as I have gone over a large portion of it, and look at the character of the work and the grades which they have adopted, they would come to the conclusion that the government at least meant business when they told the people of the maritime provinces that they intended to build the road. The people of the maritime provinces know that it has been built to the ports of St. John and Halifax. They know who have been their friends and who are trying to assist them. The people of the maritime provinces know that the majority of the members of this House who have forced this Grand Trunk Pacific scheme through, notwithstanding the violent opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite, will continue to force it through and will take whatever means are necessary and wise in order to see that this railway scheme is carried out as it was intended to be carried out, and that Canadian freight is transported over Canadian routes and through Canadian seaports and no others. Having this faith in the Prime Minister—and I am satisfied that the people of the maritime provinces have faith in him and his government—I have no hesitation in voting against this proposition, and I am satisfied that I will be justified by the great majority of the voters of the maritime provinces in voting against an amendment which is put up simply as a political scheme and not with any honest desire to promote the interests of the people of the maritime provinces.

Mr. A. B. CROSBY (Halifax). I did not intend to say a word on the motion before the House to-night, but, having listened to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and the references made to Nova Scotia I think it would not be fair to the constituency that I represent to give a silent vote on this question. The matter of this transcontinental railway has been well threshed out, particularly in 1904, when the people of the maritime provinces were instructed to believe that within a very limited time indeed, long before 1908, we would have the transcontinental railway right down to the city of Halifax and that the province of Nova Scotia would benefit by the road. There was an alternative proposition but I do not propose to delay the House to-night by going into that. The whole province of Nova Scotia was carried in 1904 in the interest of the government and why? Because of the grand and glowing pictures that were painted by the Liberal leaders and candidates as to what was going to happen to the province when that scheme was carried out. The people were deceived to a certain extent and they supported these hon. gentlemen. The result was that we did not have a Liberal Conservative returned in Nova Scotia. In 1904 the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) carried Pictou by 432 of a majority; in 1908 he carried it by 309, and when he goes back again there is very good evidence that he will not be returned at all, particularly when the people hear the story of the manner in which the Grand Trunk Railway Company has treated the Intercolonial Railway. The Minister of Railways will find that in the maritime provinces the Grand Trunk Railway Company is not looked upon with very great favour. The hon. minister made a statement not very long ago to this House that the Grand Trunk Railway had not treated the Intercolonial Railway very well. He knows that when that notable agreement was made by Mr. Blair between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway great things were expected, but I would ask any hon. member in this House whether these great things have been accomplished, or whether the Intercolonial Railway is not in a worse position now than it was when that agreement was made. The people of the province of Nova Scotia do not look with any great hope to what may come to them through the Grand Trunk Railway Company unless the government will undertake to make provision by which the province of Nova Scotia and the port of Halifax will get a fair share of the trade. I believe that there is sufficient trade in Canada for St. John, Halifax, and Sydney if you like, if we can only get it brought to the east. In 1904 the city of Halifax returned two Liberals and Mr. Roche was elected by 600 majority, but in 1908 Mr. Borden was returned by the handsome majority of 750. Does that indicate that the people of Nova Scotia have very much confidence in this scheme or in the Grand Trunk Railway Company? It certainly does not tend to show that the people of Halifax, who are an intelligent people and who know their own interests, have much faith in the scheme. In 1904, Colchester returned a Liberal with 190 majority, but in 1908 a Conservative was elected with about the same majority. The county of Cumberland in 1904 sent a Liberal to this House with upwards of 700 majority, but in 1908 it returned a Conservative with nearly 500 majority. Does that look as if the peple of Nova Scotia were right in line with this proposition? I have listened to the debates here and there is no doubt in the world that after all the Grand Trunk Railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific are one and the same thing; the only difference being that the Grand Trunk Company dominates the whole business and what the Grand Trunk desires to be done will be done unless the government undertakes to insert such a clause in the agreement as is asked for by this side of the House to-night. In the county of Lunenburg in 1904 the member sitting for that constituency was returned with 451 majority, but in 1908 he could only get 200 majority. The county of Antigonish was represented in the last parliament by a Liberal who had 800 majority but the gentleman representing that constituency at the present time could only get about 20 majority. In Cape Breton South a Conservative was returned in 1908 with a substantial majority, but in 1904 the county was represented by a Liberal whose majority was upwards of 300. The sitting Liberal member for Cape Breton North comes here with a very much reduced majority. A very strong effort was made to get a recount in that constituency and it is now claimed that had a recount been allowed the possibilties are that the gentleman who now represents that county would not be here to-night. In the last parliament Digby was represented by a Liberal who had 800 majority but a Conservative represents it in this parliament and his majority was 200.

Mr. BLACK. What about Inverness?

Mr. CROSBY. The sitting member for Inverness represents that county as much by the Conservative vote as he does by the Liberal vote, and perhaps if things had not happened as they did happen there might be another story to tell about Inverness, as the hon. member for Inverness knows.

Mr. LAW. What about Yarmouth?

Mr. CROSBY. Well, Yarmouth is an annexationist county and it naturally belongs to the Liberal side of the House.

Mr. BLACK. What about Hants?

Mr. CROSBY. My hon. friend (Mr. Black) knows what saved him in Hants and it is not likely he will ever be saved again in the same way. He has nothing to boast about in Hants; his majority is not worth speaking about any how.

Mr. BLACK. I got the largest majority ever given since confederation.

Mr. CROSBY. Your turn over from the Conservatives to the Liberals was so quick that some of them did not know you were a Liberal. I want to say, sir, that the people of Nova Scotia and of the maritime provinces generally have no other desire than to see the Transcontinental Railway built. We are not, as the hon. member for Pictou tries to make out, opposing the construction of another transcontinental railway, but we are opposing the extravagant manner in which it is being constructed. We are here to suggest other methods of giving accommodation, and less extravagant methods than the one by which this government is constructing this road. Even though this government may build this road, we demand that it shall be a road for Canada, and Canada alone, not a road that shall have its terminus in the city of Portland. We demand that this government will insert a clause in the agreement that will compel, not the Grand Trunk Pacific, but the Grand Trunk Railway to carry the products of the west down to St. John and Halifax and the other Atlantic ports. What we want is fair play, Canada for the Canadians. That cry is taken up so much by hon. gentlemen opposite that we can hardly get it out first now. There was a time when we did not hear it so often from them; but now we have to get up pretty early before we can get ahead of some of the men on the other side of the House. That is, when they are voicing the sentiment; when it comes to dealing with the facts and seeing that Canadian products shall go out through Canadian ports, and that foreign goods coming to Canada shall come in through Canadian ports, that is a different proposition. I want to say in conclusion that we in the eastern part of Canada have done all we could, and are willing to do more, to build up the west; we have always sent men to parliament who have been ready to stand behind the great propositions in the interest of Canada. We are to-day as strong as ever in that desire. If Canadian goods are exported through Canadian Atlantic ports and imported goods are brought in through Canadian Atlantic ports, the Intercolonial Railway will be benefited as well as the whole country. The trouble with the Intercolonial Railway to-day is that it does not get goods either from the east or the west, because it is in a very awkward position, and I am afraid it will continue in that position if the present course is continued. But if we are to have two roads, let us be sure that the trade originating in the west shall come down to Canadian Atlantic ports, so that we shall be getting a fair share of that trade.

Mr. W. S. LOGGIE (Northumberland, New Brunswick). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Crosby) seems to have wandered very far from the proposition before the House, carrying us through the political issues in the late contest in many of the counties of his province; but he has not placed before the House any good reason why the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition should be adopted. I wish to make a few remarks on that motion One of its propositions is that we should compel the Grand Trunk Railway Company to route traffic through Canadian channels and Canadian ocean ports, and forbid the diversion routed thereto by the shipper. He has not given us one fraction of evidence to show what power we have over the Grand Trunk Railway Company. We are not, as I understand the present proposition, lending one dollar to the Grand Trunk Railway Company and if the Grand Trunk Railway Company is not receiving anything from this parliament, why should we seek to bind it to do something for us? The hon. gentleman does, however, hold that we should bind the Grand Trunk Pacific Company to carry the traffic through Canadian channels. It is scarcely necessary to remind the hon. gentleman that the Grand Trunk Pacific is already bound by a signed and sealed contract to do so, and therefore it seems to me that placing this amendment before the House on this occasion is, as one hon. gentleman already said, a catch-vote and a vote of want of confidence in the administration. As I understand it, if the principle of the contract, or the amended contract of 1904, had been applied to the prairie section as it was to the mountain section, the Grand Trunk Pacific Company would not be here to-day asking us for a loan. When this project was presented to us, it was expected that the company would bear 25 per cent of the cost of construction; but unfortunately for them, they estimated the cost of the prairie section at about $19,000 per mile, and therfeore asked for a maximum of $13,000 per mile. A good reason has been given why the cost has been more than was anticipated, but because of that limitation to $13,000 per mile instead of 75 per cent of the actual cost, they are here to-day asking us practically to put the prairie section on the basis of 75 per cent of the actual cost. We have been told to-day by the hon. leader of the opposition that there is imminent danger of the wheat traffic arising in the western provinces being carried to the American seaports, suggesting that it will be diverted at Superior Junction and taken to Port Arthur, thence by water to Midland, and over the Grand Trunk Railway to American ports. To my mind that is the most effective answer to the hon. gentleman's original proposition, that we should aid in building a road to North Bay, and then hand the traffic over to the Grand Trunk Railway. If there is danger to-day of the traffic that goes to Midland being carried on to Portland, would there not be danger of all the traffic that the Grand Trunk Pacific handled for all time to come being handed over at North Bay to the Grand Trunk Railway? Under such circumstances the Intercolonial Railway would become a commercial impossibility, for there would be good reason to fear that all the traffic would go to American seaports instead of to maritime province seaports. Was it not the part of wisdom for this government, when such a proposition was presented to it, to turn it down? My hon. friend is very much concerned about the traffic going temporarily to American seaports because of the unfortunate happening to the Quebec bridge or the non-completion of the road from Lake Superior to the seaboard. The hon. gentleman puts this question to us, but does he show us how that can be done except the Intercolonial Railway forsooth should haul the grain for nothing? He talks about its hauling wheat at two cents a bushel from Montreal to Halifax. But when we realize that two cents a bushel is about four cents per 100 pounds, or $16 for a 40,000 car, we can understand that we cannot successfully manage any great railway with such rates.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I was quoting from the answer given by the government. It is not my statement.

Mr. LOGGIE. The hon. gentleman was quoting from the answer given by the government, but he must realize that at such rates, we could not carry very much traffic and come out on the right side of the ledger. It is not practical. How could we haul grain 800 miles as against 150 miles? And that would have been exactly the result if the railway had originally gone to North Bay and then have the freight go over the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway to our maritime seaports. The very dangers which my hon. friend speaks about is the best answer why the government were wise in not adopting the policy he advocates, and we ought to congratulate the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues on the fact that they were sufficiently astute politicians and businessmen not to consent to any such project as was proposed by the Grand Trunk Pacific, namely, to build to North Bay.

Let me now give one or two reasons why it was wise to build the road through the northern portion of Ontario and Quebec, in order that the wheat from our western field should go to our maritime ports. Leaving Winnipeg, we have a railway practically level. A four-tenths grade, I understand, is such that an engine which can start a train on the level will haul it with the same power over a four-tenths grade. Therefore we have a road from Winnipeg to Quebec practically level. We can therefore have grain from the west hauled by rail from Winnipeg to Quebec at practically as low a cost as to Superior Junction and thence to Port Arthur, as you can have it hauled by water to Midland and thence by rail to Montreal. We can deliver it to Quebec by rail at practically as low a rate as we can haul it by the other route and deliver it in the port of Montreal. Again after we get the grain to Quebec, we can send it to our maritime ports. The distance, I admit, is greater than between Quebec and Portland, but what have we to offset that? And that is the pertinent point in having that wheat hauled over the level from Winnipeg to Quebec. When you get it to Quebec, you have placed it very much nearer our maritime ports than if you brought it to Montreal and handed it over to the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Intercolonal Railway. How do you offset the difference as compared with the route between Quebec and Portland? The distance between Quebec and Portland is very much less than between Quebec and our Atlantic sea-board. But we have this to compensate for that difference. Let me give you the words of Mr. Butler, who was at the time the chief engineer of the Transcontinental Commission. In the sessional papers of 1905, we find he tells us that you can haul ten fully loaded trains each way per day on the Transcontinental Railway 486 miles for $2,970,864.54. To do this same business on the Intercolonial Railway with the 1 per cent grade costs how much? It will cost $5,128,409.06, a difference of $2,157,554 in the operating in one year of ten loaded trains each way per day, and then there will be the difference besides on the passenger freight. What does that mean? We have heard to-day unfavourable criticism on the cost of the division between Quebec and Moncton. I thought that the cost was $30,000,000. but the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) says it will reach $35,000,000. Is not that a profitable investment for the Grand Trunk Pacific? If they have to pay interest at 3 per cent on $35,000,000, that will amount to about $1,050,000, and they save in operating expenses over $2,000,000, so that they could, by the building of the division between Quebec and Moncton, save $1,000,000 a year over what it would cost them to ship by the Intercolonial Railway, even if they got it for nothing. So that they will save on operating expenses the interest on the actual cost of the road between Quebec and Moncton.

The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) said to-day, had we not better go slow and not invest quite so much in the section between Quebec and Moncton? I say no, we should hurry along that section and also the section between Winnipeg and Quebec. My right hon. friend, the leader of the government, says it is our duty at present to hurry on the prairie section. So far as I can see, I say we ought to hurry on every mile of the whole line from Moncton west, and the sooner that is done the better for the transportation interests of this country.

It is not my purpose to take up much of the time of the House, but I thought it my duty to speak on this important matter affecting the maritime provinces. No doubt this resolution of the leader of the opposition will be in the press to-morrow in great headings such as the Conservative party conserving the interests of the maritime provinces and the government opposing them. The hon. gentleman is no more earnest in his desire to have the wheat from the western provinces shipped through Canadian Atlantic ports than I and every other hon. gentleman from the maritime provinces. The scheme which he has presented, for the transporting of wheat refers only to that which is held over at Midland because it cannot be transported to Montreal before the close of navigation. The question of transport by a martime province port or an American port arises only in connection with winter transportation, and the quantity involved cannot be large, but the benefit that will accrue to our ocean ports when the Transcontinental Railway is completed is incalculable. It is true that a large amount of money is invested in the construction of this road. The leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said that the net cost of the road to the country on account of interest would be about $13,000,000. As he explained to us to-day, that estimate was based on the cost of the road as then estimated by the engineers, it was not an estimate of cost by the minister but by the engineers in charge. According to the revised estimates we will have a railway of the highest standard from ocean to ocean for a subsidy of about $40,000,000. On all other money which we invest in this road we receive interest, it is as if we got our money back, put in the bank and drew out interest on it. Comparing this bargain with the bargain for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, this seems to me far the better bargain in the interest of the country.

I hope that the hon. gentleman opposite who has proposed this amendment will see his way clear to withdraw it as he could well afford to do under the circumstances. I would commend that suggestion to his consideration.

House divided on amendment (Mr. R. L. Borden).

Amendment negatived.

Mr. CALVERT. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) has not voted.

Mr. TALBOT. I was paired with the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Rhodes). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. Shall the main motion now be adopted?

Mr. H. B. AMES (Montreal, St. Antoine). Before the motion is put I desire to submit another amendment of so simple and reasonable a character that it will take but a very few minutes to explain it. This Bill which stands for a third reading provides in its first clause that a loan of $10,000,000 shall be granted to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and that the same shall bear interest at the rate of four per cent per annum. Now I desire to submit to the House an amendment that will provide:

That the rate of interest and charges payable by the company to the government upon and in respect of said loan, should not be less than the rate of interest and charges which the government should pay in obtaining funds for the purpose of said loan.

As I have said, the proposition I now submit is I think a simple and reasonable one. The Minister of Finance has stated in his introduction that we are to act in the capacity of a banker towards the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and that we are to make them a loan at a stipulated rate of interest. Now if we are to act as their banker, unfortunately we shall ourselves have to borrow before we shall have the money to lend them, and as is well known, when we are borrowing the nominal rate of interest is not all that it costs to secure money. There are other charges as well, and these other charges add no inconsiderable amount to the cost we have to pay to secure the money. So what is known as the average effective rate of interest per unit which takes into consideration all these various costs, is always somewhat above the nominal amount of the loan. I think that if we are to act as banker for this company, and if we must go into the money markets of the world to secure this money, we certainly should ask those who borrow from us to pay us what we have to pay to get that money.

Now the Finance Minister has stated that he expects to be able to borrow this money at a rate sufficiently below four per cent to cover the cost, so that there will be no money lost on this transaction. If that be the case, then there can be no possible harm in accepting the amendment suggested, and there certainly will be some advantage in passing such an amendment and putting it into the Bill as a precautionary measure. As is stipulated in the Bill, the company will have to pay interest semi-annually, and they will not be called upon to pay the first semi-annual instalment until at least six months from the time when the first payment of funds is made to them, and during that period we will obtain the money which we intend to loan to them and we shall have had ample time to calculate what that money will cost us. So by the time the company is first called upon to pay interest there will be no difficulty on our part to ascertain just what that money has cost us, and consequently no difficulty in billing them for exactly the same amount.

Now if we should give them a portion of the last loan we made, the £6,000,000 loan of the 27th of January, we should be giving them money at four per cent which we ourselves have borrowed at an effective rate of interest of 4⅛ per cent; that is to say, we would be paying $412,500 per annum for that $10,000,000, and we should be receiving from them $400,000 per annum; that is, we should be lending them at a loss of $12,500 per annum, or, if spread over the ten years, we would make a total loss of $125,000. Now I do not think it is right or necessary that we should make that loss, I do not think the people of Canada are called upon to make that loss on this loan. If we are, as I know we are, in this particular case coming to the relief of this company very much to the advantage of the company, then it seems to me that the company should certainly reimburse us what we are called upon to pay to obtain the money.

The other day the Finance Minister endeavoured to prove that this should not be the course pursued, and he pointed out that money was lost when the country loaned $30,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1884. It was then shown that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company paid the government at the rate of four per cent, but the government had to pay considerably over four per cent in order to obtain that money. Mr. Speaker, I consider that the government of that day, in lending money at a rate of interest lower than they paid for it, made a miscalculation, and I think they afterwards felt they had made a mistake. If they made a mistake in their calculation in that case, should not we in this case take the precaution to prevent any such error from being repeated? The very experience of that day when men endeavoured to safeguard the future as best they could, but in their endeavour were not entirely successful, the very experience of that day should be a lesson to us, and should cause us in this particular loan to take good care that their mistake be not repeated.
