What I am saying is correct. It is a retreat from the principle that has been established up until now. I fail to see by what miracle or legerdemain that 5 per cent, or an individual if you want to put it that way, can be expected to find a job in 30 weeks when they have not been able to find one in 51 weeks. I feel that is a reasonable and logical question.

I want to refer to the statement of the minister which I just quoted from page 2661 of Hansard:

> Many of these one-twentieth are married women and elderly people for whom alternative social security programs would seem to be more appropriate.

It sounds very nice, but it only sounds very nice. It does not point out that for a great many of these people there are not now any provincial or federal security measures to which they can turn if they are no longer eligible for unemployment insurance beyond the 30-week period. What are they supposed to do? If we had an over-all program, if there were provincial or municipal legislation to take care of them, I could understand the statement. But to make it when there is no program unless they are over the age of 65—

Mr. Gregg: Three years to go.

Mr. Winch: —the government is outlining a principle concerning those who can meet certain requirements now, but I am trying to look into the future and find out why they have that principle in mind. Is it because they contemplate having to change this act in the next three years? If so, why not introduce the coverage now to take care of those people in the future? I assume that if they cannot conform and are over the age of 65, then if they are destitute they can make application under the Old Age Assistance Act. But there is a big difference between the payment of $40 per month to married people under that act and the amount of $120 to which they would be entitled if the extended period which we have now remained in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

If these people are not 65, then where do they turn? The federal government does not assume responsibility for the employable unemployed if they are not covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act. In some instances provinces do, but on a far lower basis in total than the amount for which those people would be eligible under the Unemployment Insurance Act. There are many who move around, and as I stated in a previous speech there is no province that dares accept responsibility for such people who are not covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act and who have not been domiciled in their own province. In my estimation that is a serious problem now and will be for a long time to come.

I find it rather strange, Mr. Speaker, that here we have a principle that will take people off unemployment insurance after 30 weeks. I admit that only applies to 5 per cent if the same figures apply in the future as they have in the past, but such people cannot get provincial assistance if they are not domiciled in the province. There is a very strong mobile labour force in Canada. People who move around trying to get employment, and who cannot get it, are denied any security under any plan, provincial or national. Yet we find some reactionary employers or the spokesman for such reactionary employers such as the Financial Times, published in Montreal, stating that the biggest problem —I would almost say "curse"—in Canada is the policy of trying to get workers to own their own homes.

I was amazed to read this editorial, and may I just quote one section of it:

> There is, as a matter of fact, nothing that industry can do about it so long as the mass of workers refuse, as they are doing, to accept a job whenever and wherever it is offered. There is today considerably more unemployment than is necessary; due in large measure to the widespread "own your own home" movement throughout the country in recent years.
> For some time now the Financial Times has been warning that there are economic dangers in the universal trend towards home ownership;

Did you ever hear anything so fantastically reactionary and diabolical as the viewpoint that we have to have an itinerant labour force? It means, according to the Financial Times, that this government and the provincial governments have been doing wrong by encouraging, through free enterprise, the workers of Canada to own their own homes. While I have not seen any expression of opinion on that, if they do or do not own their own homes and have to travel Canada in search of work, or are doing their utmost to find employment away from their own domicile, they should be protected either by industry or by government unemployment insurance and other measures so that they will have some semblance of security.

I merely want to express the opinion at this time, Mr. Chairman, that there should not be any restriction on the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act at this time that will remove either now or in the future any probable or potential security which workers have been enjoying up to the present time. In view of the minister's statement that there should be some appropriate security measures to take care of those who may be affected by the new legislation, there is a responsibility on the minister and on the government, in view of his pronouncement and in view of his policy statement. If there is not now that provision of security, he should do his utmost to include it in this Unemployment Insurance Act. Failing that, he should fill the gap as speedily as possible in those sections of our economy where we do not now have security provision.

When I first rose to my feet I said that in view of the policy statement of the minister, since I know he was sincere in the statement he made as to his belief and desire, I was puzzled that there should not be an extension of coverage. If we can go by the information given to the house yesterday by the hon. member for Hamilton West, 38 per cent of the workers of Canada are still not covered by the provisions of unemployment insurance. I heard the minister yesterday and I reread his remarks in Hansard this morning. I could not find any intimation whatsoever that he was going to bring in any alterations that would mean an extension of coverage to workers of this country under the Unemployment Insurance Act. In view of the minister's emphatic statements, reiterated time after time, of the terrific advances, I am puzzled as to why there is nothing to indicate, in what he calls the terrific advance, that there are to be any changes made to bring, not all but at least a part of this 38 per cent under the security provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I sincerely hope that he will give us a little bit of clarification on that matter.

Personally, I find it very difficult to understand why it is that in Canada we should have these gaps in all the security measures of this country, as to why we should have so many people who can come up against varying degrees of insecurity because of old age, disability or unemployment. I fail to understand why in a country like Great Britain they can have an over-all security program. I can hardly think of any difficulty that a person in Britain can meet, over which they have no control, in which they are not covered by some security measure. Certainly if Great Britain can do it—she has done it for many years—so can we. We have heard a great deal this afternoon about Sir Winston Churchill. We noticed only two months ago that they increased the benefits of their over-all security program all down the line. If Great Britain can give 100 per cent coverage, then I fail to understand why this Liberal government, with all it says it stands for, administering the great economy of the Dominion of Canada, with all its resources and wealth, and if they are imbued, as I hope they are, with all the principles, as outlined by the minister in Hansard yesterday, cannot do it. I fail to understand why we should have so many gaps in our own program and why it is going to take time to fill those gaps. I fail to understand why, when the minister has this opportunity of amending and consolidating his present act, he cannot go a bit farther than he has to see that he does not retreat in any way but takes strides toward a greater coverage and a greater protection.

I want it to be understood that I am not criticizing. I am not trying to deprecate the worth-whileness and the great benefits that will accrue from many of the suggestions that have been brought in by the minister at this time. I most sincerely commend him for a vast number of his suggestions.

Now, sir, there are just two other items that I should like to draw to the attention of the minister, and I can do it very rapidly. I regret that there has been no intimation, at least in the speech of the minister, that he intends to take care of a very difficult situation that has been obvious for a number of years. Almost every province—as a matter of fact, every province—has its labour legislation. Under this labour legislation, if the workers get into a dispute with their employers, they have to go through a period of collective bargaining. If that fails, then there is mediation, conciliation and arbitration. If those fail, then a strike vote is taken. After that, under the terms of the provincial legislation, there is the right to strike. That occurs upon occasion in our country, unfortunately. When it does occur we often see workers who are not affected by the dispute itself, unemployed, because, as union men, they refuse to go through a picket line. On many occasions we also see workers in supply industries become unemployed. It is the history of the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act that when this occurs those who are not directly in the strike but are affected because they will not cross a picket line, or because they are employed in a supply industry which is affected by a strike in the main industry, have to wait days and weeks before it is decided as to whether or not they are entitled to unemployment insurance. To the best of my knowledge, in most cases at least, —I am not sure about all—eventually there is a decision that they are entitled to unemployment insurance. I think I am correct in saying that, sir, but because that principle has been established in instance after instance of the nature I have outlined, why is it still the situation that there has to be all of this negotiation, uproar, argument and a lapse of a considerable period of time before these people can be recognized as eligible for unemployment insurance?

It had been my hope that this very serious matter would be clarified. It affects thousands of people across the length and breadth of Canada when industrial disputes end in a strike. I wondered why we did not have some intimation that this matter was to be clarified by legislation? If it is not to be clarified by legislation, I do hope the minister will give us a statement on the position of his administration with regard to this matter in order to make it clear to the people of Canada, and perhaps bring about a greater speed-up in the handling of such instances under such circumstances.

Very briefly I want to add my word to that of the others who have spoken previously to request the Minister of Labour to take a second look at this matter of the eligibility of workers to receive unemployment insurance when they are ill. That is one of the things that puzzle me. If a person is unemployed and becomes sick on the seventh day of his unemployment he is eligible for unemployment insurance, but if he is laid off because of sickness he is not entitled to unemployment insurance.

This works a great hardship on a considerable number of people, especially when you put them together over a period of years. I hope that the minister will take a second look at this matter. I have heard it said that there is a constitutional issue involved but I fail to see where there is because if you can do the one I do not know why you cannot do the other.

This is all I wish to say at this time. I conclude by saying that I commend the minister for the changes he is bringing in as I know they will prove beneficial, but I do think that in his outline of the principles and details which he gave yesterday he did not come as close as I think he should, and perhaps as he might want to, to the fulfilment of the high principles he outlined in his policy statement. I hope that between now and the time when the bill is passed the minister will see his way clear to make the Unemployment Insurance Act a consolidated one which will grant greater security to the people of Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I intend to speak but briefly in connection with this matter. First I want to say that I agree with what was said yesterday by the hon. member for Hamilton West and by the hon. member for Cape Breton South with regard to regulation 5A which deals with married women. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South referred to it as a bear trap. It certainly is a booby trap which is giving a great deal of trouble and I think the regulation should be taken out entirely.

I sometimes wonder about the appeal procedure laid down by this act. I do not intend to go into the details at the moment, but I do think the department is most fortunate in the people it has administering the appeal procedure, especially in so far as the umpire in Ottawa is concerned. But here the government is setting up a court of its own, it chooses the personnel which is not known to the unemployed who may be claiming unemployment benefits. He has no voice in the selection of the personnel. He brings a claim before the board of referees and may obtain a favourable decision.

I wonder why the department should then appeal the decision of its own board to an umpire who may be two or three thousand miles away from the unemployed person. That person is faced with considerable delay and is sometimes put to additional expense in having the matter determined finally. Having appointed its own board of referees, having made its own selection of qualified men to make up that board, I submit that at least generally the government should accept its decision and not carry the appeal further. Certainly it should not carry the appeal further without advising the unemployed claimant of his rights and not merely suggesting to him that the matter is settled and he need not be worried about it because nothing is going to happen. Very often something does happen and the unemployed person does not know what it is all about until he gets a notification to the contrary.

My principal reason for rising is to refer briefly to a matter which was mentioned by the hon. member for Hamilton West and by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich earlier in the session, that is, the position of fishermen with respect to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I am the first to admit that there are difficulties in the way of including this industry within the act but I do not think they are insuperable. The men employed in this industry deserve every possible consideration. I know of no group who work harder, who risk their lives and health in the earning of a livelihood to the extent the fishermen do and who generally speaking are paid less for the work and sacrifice which is necessary in this type of employment.

Surely some system can be evolved whereby these men can benefit from at least a modified form of unemployment insurance. The department itself has made a study of this matter. I have here the report of a commission which made a survey of the fishing industry in 1951. This is a pretty analytical survey; it is informative and statistical and gives a fair summary of the problems confronting this industry. In the second paragraph of their conclusions, being paragraph No. 273, they state that the administrative difficulties, although appreciable, can be overcome.

I am suggesting that if the commission appointed by the department to consider this matter found, as they did quite frankly, that the administrative difficulties can be overcome, then the minister should submit to parliament machinery which would include this group of men within the framework of the act and overcome the difficulties which his officials have admitted can be overcome.

It is easy enough to say that this cannot be done, to paint a picture of the fisherman who is part labourer, partly self-employed or a share fisherman, a man who owns part of the boat, and then ask how it can be done. The simple answer is that it is done in Great Britain.

An hon. Member: And the United States.

Mr. Nowlan: And the United States. If it has been done in those countries I suggest that it should not be too difficult a problem for the minister to adopt a similar procedure here. It is true that at one time in Great Britain the fishing industry was not included. In 1944 or 1945 a commission was appointed to inquire into the matter and it recommended in favour of including this group. But it was not until 1949 that they passed a new unemployment insurance act in Great Britain directed particularly at the fishing business and including share fishermen, those who were working for wages and those who were self-employed provided they were employed on a boat of more than ten tons.

At one time in the United States it was thought that the constitution prevented the government from insuring marine workers or fishermen, but in 1942 or 1943 the supreme court of the United States gave a judgment that it was open to insure this type of worker. They now have a situation in the United States where these people are recognized not only by the federal government but also by all the American states which border on the sea coast or on the great lakes. They now have a wide system of unemployment insurance for fishermen in the United States.

With those two examples before him as lighthouses or beacons along which the minister can pilot his course and the fact that they are working successfully I do suggest and urge that he give this matter more careful consideration than has been given in the past and not allow it to be brushed off simply because there are difficulties. There are difficulties in the way of any program on which the government may wish to embark. I urge the minister to give this matter consideration and either later on this session, or if that is impossible, because we do not want to hold up the passing of this bill, at the next session of parliament, bring in amendments which will include the fishing business along the lines which have been worked out so successfully by the country to the south and by Great Britain.

Mr. McIvor: I will say just a few brief words. Like the hon. member for Vancouver East, I congratulate the minister on the good things which are in the bill. I just wonder what kind of bill the Minister of Labour would have to bring in in order that the hon. members could not find any fault with it? However, I am waiting with interest to hear the reply the minister will make to the criticism which has been made of this bill.

I remember becoming acquainted in the thirties with one who is now a cabinet minister and I am convinced that he found a cure for unemployment, although it cost him a penny. He called his own workers into his office and said, "There is no more work but you can come as usual and enjoy yourselves and your salary will be paid as usual". I would like to ask the minister if it would not be possible to have a check-up of all industries and employers of labour who expect to lay off some workers and have them get in touch with the Minister of Labour to see if the workers could be kept on.

I know that our employment officer in Fort William has done an outstanding job. As I said before, he organized a "do it now" campaign. Unemployment at Fort William is no higher than it was last year and in fact the latest report I have received indicates that it is going down. Instead of 175 to 200 calls there are only between 30 and 40 now. This shows that the local employment offices and the municipalities can do a great deal to help the situation when they dig into their jobs.

I would like to see the waiting time cancelled altogether. The minister sees fit to retain it but perhaps he will give some explanation for doing so. If an individual is earning only $1 an hour, his salary will be $8 a day or $40 a week if he works a five-day week. That appears to be a lot of money to a man who has a family and I would like to see the waiting time cancelled altogether.

I wish to congratulate the minister once again; he is doing a great job and when he is through with this you will see what it will mean to the workers.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the minister yesterday I concluded that this was exceptional legislation visualized by this resolution. I thought that the legislation would be in line with the advance publicity which was given the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act by the government. The more I study the legislation that is likely to be introduced in the light of the remarks made by the minister and by others, I begin to wonder just what is the primary purpose of the amendments that are to be introduced. I had thought that the primary purpose of these amendments was to make this act a more efficient measure for those who are unemployed. I am now beginning to wonder whether or not the main purpose of these amendments is to maintain the present level of the insurance fund at or around somewhere between $800 million and $900 million.

As I study the proposed amendments I am forced to conclude that certainly one important function of those amendments is to maintain the actuarial stability of the fund and I am inclined to think that more emphasis is being placed on the stabilization of this fund at the figure I mentioned than on meeting the actual needs of the people who are to be served by the unemployment insurance fund. It is true that those who experience short periods of unemployment will benefit by reason of the fact that their weekly payments will be increased both in the case of those with family responsibilities and those without. But to offset that, the maximum period of time for which these payments are to be made will be considerably decreased. Those who experience long extended periods of unemployment, as a great many do at the present time, are likely to suffer, especially if the time in which their regular unemployment insurance expires coincides with the 15th of April. A number of people have already interviewed me in this regard. Some of them interviewed me over the past week end. They were men whose regular unemployment insurance will expire on or about April 15. After that date these men will not be eligible for either regular or supplementary benefits. Therefore in some respects the legislation visualized by this resolution is disappointing, particularly in the light of present circumstances. It would offer no relief to those who are unemployed but are not now covered by unemployment insurance and there is a considerable sector of the working force not covered at all by unemployment insurance but who are unemployed at the present time and unable to receive any benefits.

It was to be hoped that, in view of the advance publicity given to this measure by the government and in view of the present unemployment situation, the area of those eligible for benefits would be extended and some categories not now covered by unemployment insurance would be brought under that umbrella. The amendments will be of little benefit—as a matter of fact, they will be of no benefit—to those who have exhausted their unemployment benefits. They will be of no benefit to those who have not had an opportunity to fulfil the requirements of the act. They will be of no assistance to the great many young people who are unemployed simply because they cannot find jobs and who have never had an opportunity of building up a fund on which they can draw. The amendments will not benefit those who now find their family responsibilities exceedingly high in relation to the unemployment benefits, those who are now finding it extremely difficult to provide shelter and food for their families with the present unemployment insurance benefits.

Then there are a few other ways in which the measure will be disappointing. The five-day waiting period against which labour has been protesting for some considerable time apparently is to be retained. There is no mention that the five-day waiting period is to be abolished. Regulation 5A under section 35 which the hon. member for Cape Breton South referred to as a bear trap is apparently to be retained. There has been no indication that there will be any change in that regulation. I did not hear from the minister anything to indicate that the employees of unemployment insurance offices are to receive any new consideration in the matter of wages or especially in the matter of accommodation.

I have been in many of the unemployment insurance offices in and around greater Toronto. As a matter of fact, I have been in most of them. Anyone visiting those offices at almost any time during the past months would realize how overcrowded they are and how inadequate is the accommodation in which those who administer this act are obliged to work. I had hoped that the minister would give consideration particularly to those who are the managers of those offices. I pointed out here previously the nature of the responsibility which these men assume and the qualifications which are required in those who are to manage efficiently some of these larger employment service offices.

These persons certainly warrant a much higher category of wages or salaries than those they are receiving at the present time.

Those are some of the shortcomings of the present amendments, as I see them, and the extent to which these amendments fail to measure up to the advance publicity which this act has received or to meet the present-day pressing needs. I know that in itself unemployment insurance cannot be expected to care for all those who may become unemployed and to do so indefinitely; certainly that is so if that fund is to remain actuarially sound. I suppose any unemployment insurance fund which was to provide for all the unemployed for indefinite periods of unemployment would have to be one that would make subsidies from the federal treasury from time to time a part of the fund. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre quoted the Minister of National Health and Welfare, when he was speaking at the time of the inauguration of the fund in 1940, as follows, as reported at page 2673 of Hansard:

> . . . unemployment insurance in itself is not sufficient to meet the needs presented by a situation of that sort and must be related to the question of unemployment relief, . . .

As a matter of fact, the maintenance of employment and protection against unemployment are both parts of the same problem. The present unemployment insurance is only a partial protection against unemployment. This revision of the act fails to meet that over-all problem. The over-all problem consists of both the maintenance of employment and protection against unemployment.

I realize that the federal government at the present time takes the position that the maintenance of employment or the maintenance of conditions favourable to employment is a federal responsibility and that the maintenance of the unemployment insurance fund is a federal responsibility but that it maintains that the residual problem, namely the protection of the employable unemployed who are without unemployment insurance benefits, is a provincial responsibility until such time as the provinces are unable to meet that responsibility. That appears to be the official position taken by the federal parliament at the present time.

For the life of me I fail to see by what logic or on what grounds the government has reached that conclusion. I fail to see how the government can possibly reach the conclusion that the most serious part of protection against unemployment must be left on the doorstep of the provincial government or the municipality. As a matter of fact, most of the inquiries which have been made into this problem—including the inquiry by the unemployment insurance commission, by the Sirois commission and by the government itself in 1945—all agree that this is a federal responsibility. The government itself in 1945 was agreed that not only were the maintenance of employment and the maintenance of the unemployment insurance fund federal responsibilities but that protection against unemployment was a federal responsibility.

When one considers the nature of that problem, one fails to see how any organization to deal with it can possibly be successfully administered by a provincial or a municipal government. If those who move from place to place in search of work are not to be penalized for so doing, we must have some uniform national system of unemployment protection. Otherwise those who move from one province to another or from one municipality to another are going to be penalized. If unemployed Canadians are to be treated in all the provinces by the same standards and are to receive the same treatment, this whole problem of protection against unemployment must be administered by some such organization as the unemployment insurance offices or some organization under federal direction which will give some uniformity of treatment to unemployed people, regardless of the province or the municipality in which they are. Certainly, whether or not the federal government admits it, the country today believes that responsibility for protection against unemployment is a federal matter, and we think that the major share of that responsibility, both in connection with financing and organizing for its administration, rests with the federal government. These facts were recognized by the government in 1940. I have before me a brief presented to the members of parliament from the Toronto district on Saturday morning by the Toronto branch of the Canadian association of social workers.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I know my hon. friend will not mind if I make a comment at this point. I feel that I have just as much concern about this problem as he has, but I think I should point out that the matters he is bringing up now are ones that were covered quite fully over the period of a month's debate. Furthermore, with respect to the special problem of the gap which exists amongst those to whom he has referred, and which has been admitted time and time again in the house, it is hoped and believed that matter will come up for discussion in a very short time by the heads of all the governments of Canada who I feel sure are keenly interested in it. Since this matter could under no circumstances be taken care of by the amendments that will be forthcoming, I wonder whether or not discussion of it might be deferred until some later date after we have seen what may happen later this month.

Mr. Noseworthy: If that is the minister's wish, I shall be very happy to accede to it. I merely want to make one more reference. There was a statement in the minister's speech to the effect that the present amendments will furnish a foundation for additional measures to be worked out at the forthcoming federal-provincial conference. I merely want to suggest to the minister at this point it is important that some agreement be sought at the conference to convene later this month as to responsibility and also with respect to some measure that will take care of the people who have been depending throughout the winter on supplementary unemployment insurance benefits and who are going to have them cut off on April 15.

Many of them are in age groups where they will not be able to secure employment. Many of them had nothing except the supplementary benefits. If the government has decided to cut off the supplementary benefits on April 15, then I suggest that every effort be made to reach an interim agreement with the provinces whereby these people can be given some form of protection as soon after April 15 as possible.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I take it I am expressing the sense of the committee that it would be desirable to have the resolution passed this afternoon so that copies of the bill can be made available before the Easter recess. I have followed very closely the interesting and helpful discussion that has gone on yesterday and today, and I appreciate it very much indeed. I know that all hon. members who took part would not want me, without the bill in front of them, to go fully at this stage into the various points raised. There are a few I should like to mention in some detail, particularly one referred to by practically every speaker, namely, the length of the period of winter seasonal benefits.

As the hon. member for Cape Breton South inferred last night, the reason I made such a long-winded statement yesterday on the presentation of the resolution was to attempt to put on the record in layman's language an interpretation of what must of course be in bill form the language of the lawyers, and I for one find the language of the lawyers, when incorporated in a bill, very difficult indeed to understand. Perhaps others are in the same category.

Mrs. Fairclough: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. Gregg: I was glad to see that the hon. member for Hamilton West maintained a position with regard to this plan that would give her mobility of action in the days to come. At the very outset she took up the cudgels on behalf of the fishermen, and as one who lives near the seashore I am delighted that an inlander like herself is on our side. I want to say two or three things about fishermen. I agree with what the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings said about their contribution to our economic life, the difficulties they face in earning their livelihood, and so on. For many months now we have had officials working on the problem of insurance coverage for them in the most serious and intensive fashion. I have not given up hope that we may find a solution. I know it will not be a perfect solution but I hope we can find a good solution somewhere, whether it comes within the field of unemployment insurance, under some special measure administered by the Department of Fisheries, or a combination of both.

But what I can say, as far as this measure is concerned, is that if, as and when a solution is found with respect to unemployment insurance, it will be possible for fishermen so recommended for inclusion to be brought within the legislation without any further amendment of the act. I shall see to it that the study proceeds. I should like to suggest that the officials responsible for the study be brought before the standing committee on industrial relations when it meets, and the hon. member for Hamilton West and all the other fishermen can then cross-examine them.

The hon. member for Hamilton West says that the coverage should be as wide as possible. That unquestionably continues to be the policy of the government, and that is why I did not mention it yesterday. Now, it is not as easy as it looks, and I am sure that hon. members realize that. I am going to take only one example. We live and work in a free economy and believe that our various organizations have a right to express themselves without our pushing them around and imposing something upon them. In the very mild and friendly discussion on the resolution that took place yesterday one hon. member said something to the effect that rumours had been heard that the Minister of Labour was going to bring hospital workers under unemployment insurance, and why in the world was the minister delaying so long?

I did not see that report in the press but it must have been somewhere because on my desk this morning I had wires from the chairmen of hospital boards saying in effect, "For heaven's sake, don't do it". I mention that as an example. You will recall that the former minister of finance introduced last year quite a mild little measure affecting the welfare of our federal civil servants on the assumption that it would apply 100 per cent to everybody. You will recall what happened under the banner of freedom with respect to that measure. What happened under the banner of freedom as to that measure would be small business compared with what would happen under the banner of freedom if the Minister of Labour were to say, without a good deal of prior spade work, if you like, that 100 per cent of federal civil servants were going to be brought under this legislation on this day in April, 1955. But I will say that we are from month to month bringing in any groups that can be brought in and we can always do it; we do not have to amend the act. Quite a number of members mentioned that point.

The point concerning supplementary benefits and their effect upon the period this year, I shall leave until the end of my remarks. I shall make a short reference now to two points that were mentioned by many, one of them concerning the women. This point is always forcibly put forward by the hon. member for Cape Breton South as well as the hon. member for Hamilton West. I will undertake now to have still another look at that regulation. It is a regulation, and I am confident it is one that has to be there in some form. It is not there because of discrimination, but simply because a woman is a different sort of individual from a man, with all the implications that go with that. It is the desire of the government, and the desire of the commission, that that regulation should only affect the few who might be tempted to take advantage of the situation to the detriment of the thousands of others who are paying into the insurance fund. But we will have another look at it this winter.

The other point mentioned by many members concerned the interesting item of the guaranteed annual wage, on which I shall only make two comments. One of them is that during the last five years I have been Minister of Labour I have learned one thing, and that is that while an item is in the process of discussion under collective bargaining, the federal government or Department of Labour should not interject itself. At the same time, I add quickly that the federal Department of Labour should not keep its eyes and ears closed but its officials, as they are doing, should keep the situation under review and know what is happening so they will at least be able to think intelligently about it. I shall touch upon the other points mentioned by the hon. member for Hamilton West as I come to them.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rather poked fun at me by saying that I was like Gaul. I was very much interested in following him as he traced areas of my own research in his historical review. I found it, as a matter of fact, a very interesting survey with which I take no exception at all. However, he did leave me rather up in the air in the speech I made to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association last summer. The facts of that are simply these. On invitation, I went out to Jasper and, after a good deal of sweat and walking in the mountains because of the flood, I talked to the association on seasonal unemployment. I did state that there were certain fixed charges, certain fixed things they would have anyhow and the moral of the speech was to the effect, why not use these fixed facilities that you have to have to make sure your employees work a full year rather than being seasonally unemployed in the wintertime. That was the essence of the message. It was not related to the guaranteed annual wage, but I will admit it was related to the same objective, namely, providing year-round work during the winter months.

I can say this this afternoon, that the experiments we have been carrying out in this regard are not going to be the entire cure of unemployment. However, long before next winter we shall learn how big a dent, if it can make a dent, this program can make in seasonal unemployment. If it is a reasonably sized dent, then what we can do federally we are going to do in co-operation with all the other forces. I do not know yet how far we can go, but in the experiments we have conducted this winter the great labour organizations and organized industry have co-operated in the fullest possible fashion.

The leader of the Social Credit party expressed his general approval of this measure, as did the representatives of that party who spoke when the resolution was introduced in 1940. I thank him for his kind words. I also wish to thank the hon. member for Welland for expressing his opinion that, by and large, what he sees coming forward in this legislation fulfils what he had in mind when he placed his resolution on the order paper some time last November.

Now, the hon. member for Broadview spoke, and I was glad to give him an opportunity to tell his Texas story concerning the grasshopper. In my opinion he took an extraordinary stand when he gave us the impression he was prepared to place no limit upon the extension of these benefits. I can tell you today, Mr. Chairman, that not only management but the national labour organizations of this country would look with the utmost concern upon an unlimited extension of these benefits. They, as well as the government, are anxious that this plan shall be on a sound financial basis, and it is easy to see the reason for that. During these 14 years, both of these groups have been making their contributions to this fund day after day and week after week. They have been making these contributions on the understanding that the fund is to be maintained financially sound. The government and any minister of labour must, therefore, to a degree, look upon this as a trust fund on behalf of the two parties concerned, as well as on behalf of the taxpayer. If any minister of labour, without going back and reviewing the whole ground once more, were to say that benefits may be given to a few people for an unlimited period from the money contributed by a great many who want to be sure when they become unemployed that assistance will be there, it would in my opinion be a violation of that trust.

Mrs. Fairclough: If the minister will permit an interjection, I did not get the same sense from the hon. member's remarks as he did. While he has been speaking I have looked at them again, and I am sure the minister has misunderstood the hon. member for Broadview. There is nothing in his remarks to indicate that it be unlimited.

Mr. Gregg: If I am mistaken, I will amend my remarks. I am sure, however, the hon. member for Broadview did indicate that we should extend the period, and I don't recall he suggested a limit.

Mrs. Fairclough: Beyond April 1.

Mr. Gregg: Yes, but without mentioning any limit.

The hon. member for Nanaimo also discussed the guaranteed annual wage. I believe I have covered the points put forward by all hon. members except those by the hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Among other things he said that the heads of our great industries were not using our national employment service. With all due respect I say that is not entirely true. However, it is true to say that many of them do maintain their own employment offices or, if you like, their own aptitude assessment offices. Great companies like General Motors at Oshawa, for one, do use our services in a big way; but since such companies, in this modern age, have so many technical jobs to carry out they quite naturally depend upon their own people to assess the qualifications for those jobs. This they can do more specifically than can our staff. I should like to go that far in correcting the record to show that a great many of our large industrial organizations do use the national employment service.

The hon. member said that unemployment insurance is no good to those who have exhausted their benefits 100 per cent. A good many other hon. members said the same thing. My hon. friend quoted two industries which have been very much to the fore in unemployment and very much in the minds of many of us, namely the soft coal industry and the textile industry. If ever there were examples of personnel exhausting their benefits 100 per cent they were in the two communities he mentioned, one at Westville, the soft coal industry, and one at Marysville, a cotton textile industry. I happen to have a very intimate knowledge of both, since both are near my home.

This afternoon I am going to say a word about Westville. A little over a year ago, on the recommendation of my colleagues the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and the cabinet minister representing Nova Scotia, the Minister of Public Works, and at the needling of the hon. member for Pictou, we recommended to our colleagues in the government that we take a step, in co-operation with the province of Nova Scotia, that was completely uneconomical, namely that certain subsidies should be continued for another six months if the province of Nova Scotia did certain things and if the management of the industry did certain things, with the definite and specific object of extending for another six months the life of the project in Westville to make employment possible for those who had been thrown out of work before they reached 100 per cent of their insurance benefits.

From time to time since then I have informed the three gentlemen I have mentioned of the progress made. Without going into details, it is the kind of thing you cannot transfer to Windsor, to Montreal, or to Sault Ste. Marie, but in pleasant, snug little places like Westville and Marysville, you can do something because it is much easier to encompass the situation. In co-operation with the provinces concerned, under schedule M of our Vocational Training Co-ordination Act which, as hon. members know, contains a provision for training at the same time one is receiving benefits, a great deal has been done in both places. In fact, in these places I am looking forward to the time within a very few months when the situation may be liquidated with the least possible hardship and the fewest possible number of people left unemployed, or older people left without some more appropriate means for their care.

I am referring not only to old age pensions for those over 70 and other pensions for those between 65 and 70 and not only to the rehabilitation program. The sort of thing I am referring to has to do with the older person who has lost his employment, who has used up his regular benefits and his supplementary benefits, and for whom a job cannot be found. Even though we are trying hard, and with some success, to find jobs for older workers, some other means must be provided. I agree with that entirely. Some other, as I said yesterday, more appropriate means should be provided.

So far as Westville is concerned, I have mentioned one of those means. Another which is not so clear is what is going to happen to those who never took advantage of the labour benefits and for whom there is no provision at all. Well, Mr. Chairman, that was recognized here. For those long-term unemployed it was recognized and that is the reason we provided for a three-year period of grace, in the hope that the gap might be filled before the three years were up. As far as I am concerned, if perchance I am minister of labour three years hence, I shall certainly want to look at the picture again, if no more appropriate means is provided for them than there is at the present time, though I think there will be.

The hon. member for Kootenay West agreed with my expression of policy but with respect to part 3, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre called it, he did not agree with the way in which it was put into effect. The main reason he did not agree with that was, if I followed him closely, on account of the point I have just been discussing. He said we were making a retreat because we were cutting down the long-term benefit period of the old act. I claim we are not making a retreat, because for the three years we are seeing to it that the people who are now insured shall receive just as good or better benefits in those three years as they would have received if the act had not been changed.

With respect to the point made by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, having to do with the appeal under the act, that he would like to see the matter settled on the decision of the local referees rather than having it finally go for appeal to the umpire, I was glad to hear his comments on the fairness and capacity of the local board of referees. The only reason the machinery set up a central umpire was to give, as in the veterans legislation and other legislation, the applicant one more opportunity to win his case by taking it to yet another appeal in the hope of getting more consideration. However, I shall be glad to have the point of view that he expressed presented to the committee when it meets.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that I have left a number of points unanswered, but I shall be glad to search Hansard during the Easter recess and try to rectify any omissions. But there is one point I have put off to the end, and that has to do with the extent of supplementary or seasonal benefits this year. From now on I shall call them seasonal benefits so as not to get it mixed.

Practically every hon. member who spoke referred to his concern about this winter. I can tell the committee that the government has also felt concern about this. I can remember that last year at this time many insured workers were on seasonal or supplementary benefits and were looking forward to April 15, realizing, as somebody put it, that there would be no more for them, that that would be the end. They were wondering what was going to happen.

I kept in close touch with things and to my surprise it worked out reasonably well. In other words the change-over was gradual, and apparently there was no serious hardship. I did not consider only what came to my attention; to some extent I went out to see if it was true. That was last year.

In the discussion yesterday some suggested that the supplementary period should start in December. Then I think someone suggested that the governor in council should be allowed to decide when it would end, based on the weather in any part of Canada. Others suggested that it should be extended beyond April 15 for longer or shorter periods.

I shall deal first with the suggestion that it start before the first of the year. I am sure that would be useful, but our experience has shown that the impact of summer and fall earnings carry over the Christmas holidays into a time after January 1, when for all unemployed some added resources are most useful. Therefore we believe that the first of the year is most appropriate as a starting point.

At this juncture I should like also to say that I am confident the dates of start and finish must be the same all across Canada. As Minister of Labour I would hate to be put into the position of having to recommend to the governor in council when each seasonal benefit period should end. I am sure there would be a great contest as to whether the storm which I believe happened the day before yesterday in Alberta was worse than the spring flood which probably will be coming along in a few weeks on the Grand river and the effect of each on spring employment. It would be an impossible position for the government to have to decide those things each spring, based on the weather or the length of the winter.

Mr. Rowe: It is a fair weather government.

Mr. Gregg: Quite true. Having set the time, I think you must be fairly rigid. We were rigid at the beginning. We set the period as January 1 to April 1. Then we went on with the one-cent business which worked out a lot better than we thought it would. Then we cautiously put on another couple of weeks to the seasonal benefit period and said we would make it go to the middle of April. But it is obvious from what I presented yesterday, that under the new arrangement and by mopping up that one cent and in the general revision proposed, we feel that we can do something much more useful now.

Back in 1950 the supplementary benefits were tailored especially for Canada, for our heavy winter and the unemployment resulting therefrom. It was felt that we should deliberately place the weight of our benefits on the winter months. If the over-all structure of the act was sound in 1950, then it was realized that any benefits we concentrated on the winter season would have to be taken away from the year-round benefits if this one cent did not make up the difference.

It is important to remember also that a great number of the insured workers are in employment which rides along through the year with winter, spring and summer, making very little difference in the amount of unemployment in those industries. We had to be careful as to what was happening during the winter. Back in 1950 an estimate was made of the concentration of full resources which would be aimed at the winter. That might be called X. It was then a question as to how that quantity X could be handled most usefully and equitably during any winter. After our first extension it became evident that this X was a much more buoyant amount than perhaps was anticipated.

A few weeks ago I took some of these suggestions home with me, and on looking through them I was greatly pleased with what appeared to me to be a surprising effect upon this winter and future winters. After all if our X is a good-sized amount and it is broken down into various shares for the purpose of a worker getting through a difficult winter, it does not matter whether that amount is spread over three or four months, or whether it comes in two or three months, or in 15, 20 or 25 weeks.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Here is the point I think we overlooked when we rushed through the supplementary benefits in January. Let us take a worker who this year and last year accumulated—we do not need to go into the background—exactly the same seasonal benefits each year. Take the worker who is in receipt of regular benefits of $24 per week. Last year the seasonal benefits were roughly 70 per cent of $24, which amounts to $17. Last year the minimum number of weeks a worker could have in the seasonal period was six. I will ask the hon. member for Hamilton West to check me on this, but I believe that six multiplied by $17 gives a total of $102. That is the amount of X that that man could have last year, and it did not matter how it was spread out. This year that same man can get seasonal benefits for 10 weeks at $24 a week, which gives a total of $240.

I think this provides a good answer to the demand to extend the period. We have nearly trebled the amount of money paid in the same period, and after all that is what counts. In case anyone thinks I am giving a distorted picture by taking the top man, let us consider the man in the lowest category and see what he will get this winter. Last winter under our old plan the lowest paid married man could get 70 per cent of $4.80 per week; that was all. Last year during the seasonal benefit period he could get 3 weeks, multiplied by $3.60, which is 70 per cent, or $10.80.

This year he can get 10 weeks multiplied by $4.80 or $48, which in this case is five times better than it was last year.

I wanted to mention these things because we do not intend to extend the seasonal benefit period this year. As a matter of fact we could not extend the period unless we rushed this bill through and made it law by tomorrow. As the 15th of the month comes during the Easter recess I felt the house should have that much reassurance on behalf of those who formally come to the end of their benefit period on the 15th of April but in reality, due to the working of the machine the receipt of the last cheques will be spread over the last half of April and in some cases extend into May. I join with hon. members in expressing the hope that we might move into the spring period without any serious hardship in that regard.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Gregg thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 328, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a second time; by leave, now?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Harris for committee of supply.

Mr. Speaker: May I go back a moment to the remarks I made which appear at pages 2523 and 2524 of Hansard of March 29. I would like to tell the hon. members for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that they are absolutely right in their contention that whenever amendments and subamendments have been moved on a motion to go into supply, members who have spoken to the amendment and the subamendment are entitled to speak again to the main motion. The citation I had in mind was No. 468 of Beauchesne, third edition, which referred to a ruling given away back in 1853, I think, in the British house and which perhaps applied at that time much more than it does now—certainly much more than it does now—because in those days there were hardly any amendments moved to go into supply. Now such amendments are moved, and since 1927 there have been even subamendments moved not only in this house but also over there.

If I had followed that line of reasoning I would have been hopelessly wrong; therefore I wish to straighten out the point. Theoretically the only four persons who have spoken to the main motion are the mover and seconder of the motion that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply, and the mover and the seconder of the amendment to the main motion. On that point the rules say the seconders of both these motions may be precluded from speaking, but the Chair has always been very lenient towards those two members, and generally speaking whenever they wanted to speak I think they have been allowed to do so.

We are now drawing close to five o'clock. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) had the floor when we concluded the last time. He is not precluded from speaking again if he so wishes because of the special circumstances which entered the debate on the last occasion, but if it is the wish of hon. members at the moment perhaps we might now start considering private bills.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 243, to incorporate Caledonian-Canadian Insurance Company.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 280, to incorporate Victoria Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Hunter.

Bill No. 281, to incorporate St. Mary's River Bridge Company.—Mr. Nixon.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO WATER POLLUTION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Diefenbaker for the second reading of Bill No. 186, to amend the Criminal Code (nuisance).

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is not in his seat this afternoon because I want to make a few comments with regard to what he said on March 18.

In the debate we had last year the minister made what I thought was a good move when he suggested that an interprovincial water board be given power to control interprovincial rivers, or to control the pollution in interprovincial rivers. The meeting was called, as was suggested, and the other day the minister gave a report of what took place at that meeting. The result was that the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba and the dominion government agreed to the setting up of this board, but the province of Alberta did not agree.

The minister, however, went on to give a report of what this meeting had done and the recommendations it had made. He said that the province of Alberta was controlling the situation at the present time. That is correct; that is the situation at the present time. But the people whom I represent are still worried. They wonder what would happen if at some time in the future the Alberta government should get a little bit careless, perhaps, and not look after this situation in the way it should. What have they to protect them from a recurrence of pollution? What protection have they? They simply have nothing, as far as I can see.

I want to support this amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert because, in spite of what the minister said, I think it clarifies section 165 of the Criminal Code. I think it makes it clearer to anybody—especially to a person like myself, an ordinary layman—that it is a crime to pollute the water of any interprovincial river. In speaking on March 18 the minister, as reported at page 2174 of Hansard, had this to say:

Having regard to the fact that in the Alberta provincial law and in the federal Fisheries Act there are provisions that prohibit the discharge of effluents and the placing of waste in the Saskatchewan river in Alberta—

I want to say something about the Fisheries Act because last year on February 5, I asked the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) this question, as reported at page 1812 of Hansard:

I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Will the minister have an inspection made of the fish life in the North Saskatchewan river to determine whether the pollution of the water in that river is killing or affecting the health of the fish in that river?

This is what the Minister of Fisheries said in answer to that question:

Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. There is no question that under the British North America Act legislative jurisdiction over fisheries rests with the federal government. However, by agreement with the government of Canada in 1930 the three prairie provinces took over the responsibility of administering their own natural resources, including fisheries. Since that date provincial officers enforce federal fisheries conservation laws. The federal government does not maintain any staff in those provinces for this purpose. Therefore the inspection of the alleged pollution of the North Saskatchewan river would primarily be the responsibility of the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

There is no question whatsoever about the fact that the Fisheries Act which is enforced in those provinces by the provincial authorities contains sufficient authority.

I agree with that statement. But I would point out that if one province causes pollution affecting another province, the province affected has no protection. It does not matter which province it is that does it. It might be the province of Saskatchewan next time which would cause pollution and harm the province of Manitoba. Under this act the province of Manitoba has absolutely no protection whatsoever. I continue with the quotation from the minister's answer:

Perhaps if I just read subsection 2 of section 33 of the Fisheries Act, it will be seen how wide the powers are. Subsection 2 of section 33 reads as follows:

"No person shall cause or knowingly permit to pass into, or put or knowingly permit to be put, lime, chemical substances or drugs, poisonous matter, dead or decaying fish, or remains thereof, mill rubbish or sawdust or any other deleterious substance or thing, whether the same is of a like character to the substances named in this section or not, in any water frequented by fish, or that flows into such water, nor on ice over either such waters."

[Mr. Campbell.]

I want to point out that the wording of the amendment is quite similar to that of the Fisheries Act. The amendment reads as follows:

Every owner, lessee, or person operating any industrial plant, oil refinery, chemical works, sawmill or other plant or works, or any other person, who discharges or throws or allows to be discharged or thrown any noxious waste product, raw sewage, oil, sawdust, chemical or other matter or thing into a river, stream or other water any part of which is interprovincial or which flows into any interprovincial water, which has the effect of endangering the lives, safety, health or comfort of the public is guilty of

(a) an indictable offence and is liable to a fine of ten thousand dollars for a first offence and of twenty thousand dollars for a second offence, or

(b) an offence punishable on summary conviction.

As I said before, this amendment is quite similar to the Fisheries Act. It is quite evident that the Department of Fisheries considered that it was necessary to have in the act something which would prevent the putting in the rivers of anything that would harm the fish. It seems to me that if we are interested in the welfare of fish we should certainly be equally interested in the welfare and health of our people.

This question is not dead. It is still quite a live question in my province. Only a few days ago—on March 31, to be exact—in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, which is a paper that usually supports the government, there appeared an editorial which is headed "Unsound Case" and which reads as follows:

Who is there that does not agree with Mr. Garson that the best way to deal with pollution in interprovincial rivers is through co-operation of health authorities in the various provinces? But can Mr. Garson suggest what is to be done if one of the provinces refuses to co-operate?

At this point I want to interject that I am not accusing the Alberta government at this time of not co-operating. They are not co-operating as part of an interprovincial board, but I believe they are making a pretty good job of controlling pollution at the present time. The editorial continues:

That is the situation now with regard to the North Saskatchewan river which was polluted a year ago, to the great inconvenience of residents living along it. Manitoba and Saskatchewan are agreed on a joint commission which would have advisory jurisdiction over interprovincial waters in the western provinces. Alberta so far has not agreed to co-operate fully, although that province has pledged to control pollution within its borders by unilateral action.

Such a pledge is better than no agreement at all; but it is not as good as a broader arrangement which would cover every situation, as a federal law would do. Mr. Garson has always countered this argument by noting that any law prohibiting pollution of interprovincial waters anywhere in Canada would complicate the situation in eastern Canada. We gather by implication that he is saying that many interprovincial rivers in eastern Canada are now being polluted, and that to forbid this would harass both industries and municipalities. If this is his point, then on this matter he is basing his argument on convenience rather than principle. Perhaps it does appear expedient to allow pollution of eastern waters to continue, but it is not wise in principle, as the future may demonstrate. The federal government would be on sounder ground if it faced up to this matter now, and undertook to control interprovincial waters with regard to pollution.

I do not believe the bill before us is a solution to the problem of pollution. Pollution has to be stopped before it starts if effective control is to be exercised. However, I believe the amendment might be a better deterrent than subsection 2 of section 165 of the Criminal Code. Perhaps, as the minister said, the penalty is too light; but I was sold on the suggestion made by the minister last year, as I have said before, that an interprovincial water board be given powers to prevent pollution. I think such a board could set up a licensing system that could control effectively what effluents and the amounts thereof could be discharged into an interprovincial river, and where pollution did take place such licences could be cancelled.

It is the feeling now of the provincial government and the people of the constituency I represent that the federal government should accept the responsibility of preventive control. This view is also held by many other people. Now that the Alberta government has refused to become a party to an interprovincial water board assuming control, where are we if that government falls down on the job? We in the province of Saskatchewan have to depend on the good offices of the Alberta government, and the people of Battleford are living in dread of a recurrence of last winter's pollution.

The Alberta government, while disagreeing with the idea of such a board, have stated that they will look after the problem themselves, and it would appear that they are doing so. But the people of Battleford remember the statement made to the delegation last spring by Dr. Somerville. I was a member of the delegation that went to the city of Edmonton. We interviewed Dr. Cross and Dr. Somerville and one of his engineers, and we also went to the plant. But one statement made by Dr. Somerville stood out and caused us considerable worry, and is still doing so. He said that the province of Alberta is being industrialized very rapidly. He said that industries are coming in at a tremendous rate, and it is going to be almost impossible to prevent pollution. He went on to suggest that the city of Prince Albert, the town of Battleford and the mental institution in North Battleford try to find a new source of water supply.

We were pretty much flabbergasted when Dr. Somerville made that statement, and that is the reason I am on my feet today. That is also the reason the people of my constituency are still worried. If industries continue to come into Alberta, and if an industry happens to be a borderline case—perhaps it will pollute the river and perhaps it will not—it may be that the Alberta government which, as I have already said, is doing a good job now, might be persuaded to take a chance and let that industry discharge effluents into the river, thus bringing about another period of pollution. I want to warn both the Alberta government and the federal government that the people along the North Saskatchewan river will not tolerate further pollution, and if it does take place strong pressure is going to be put on the federal government to take action. The federal government has now created a precedent by taking control under recent legislation of that portion of international rivers which lies within Canada. They can hardly refuse to accept the responsibility of looking after the pollution of interprovincial rivers and the health of the people of all the provinces concerned, especially the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, if the province of Alberta falls down on the job and does not see to it that pollution does not take place again.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, may I adjourn the debate?

On motion of Mr. Rowe the debate was adjourned.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PLACE POLITICAL AFFILIATION OF CANDIDATES ON BALLOT PAPERS

The house resumed, from Friday, April 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Thomas for the second reading of Bill No. 185, to amend the Canada Elections Act (ballot papers).

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I was dealing with the arguments raised by those opposed to the bill. One of them was that as members of parliament we had been elected as individuals rather than on a party basis. I did not spend any time dealing with the fact that all the election literature one finds floating around in an election year is concerned more with party policies than with individuals. I think that angle of the matter was dealt with very well by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

However, I did point out that after we are elected to the House of Commons and come here to sit as members we are segregated, so far as the seating plan is concerned, in political groups. In addition, each Wednesday Hansard contains a list of members together with their political affiliations, as does the alphabetical list of members which is published and distributed. I might also point out that the leaders are addressed quite frequently as the leader of the C.C.F. party, the leader of the Social Credit party, and so on, so there is no doubt there is recognition of the various political groups in the house.

When the Secretary of State (Mr. Pinard) was speaking the other day he dealt with the matter of the letter from the party leader stating which candidate was the official candidate of the party, and he said there would have to be a leader in order to have a candidate. Of course that is ridiculous, because if he had read the next two words, "if any", his argument would have been completely demolished. I might also point out that in practically all cases members of the House of Commons are nominated by fully authorized nominating conventions, and the leader's letter would simply ratify the decision of the convention. Therefore the argument that the leader himself would select the candidate seems to be pure nonsense, although the Secretary of State pointed out he was afraid that might be the case. He might be a bit worried about the dictatorial powers of the leader in his party, but we are not the least bit worried about that in ours.

Following the same line of argument, the minister said it would be impossible for an independent candidate to be elected to the house because of the letter required from the leader of a party. However, the bill contains a provision that if there is no letter forthcoming from a recognized leader, then the affiliation as set out in the nomination paper would suffice. I might say, too, that all the objections to the bill have been on the basis of technicalities or so-called errors. I assure hon. members that a great deal more consideration was given to the drafting of this bill than was shown in the arguments used against it. If it is a matter of technicalities, if it is a matter of wording, as has been pointed out by several hon. members opposing the bill, then I suggest we simply give this bill second reading and turn it over to the elections committee to make any minor changes they feel are necessary.

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) suggested that rather than have the political affiliation set out on the ballot paper it would be more proper if it were placed on the nomination paper. I have no objection to it going on the nomination paper, and undoubtedly if this bill were passed the political affiliation would eventually appear on the nomination paper. The fact the political affiliation was on the nomination paper does not mean that the public would be aware of the political affiliation of the various candidates in the same way they would if it appeared on the ballot paper.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would simply say this. It is quite possible that members of the Conservative party and of the Liberal party might have some qualms about having their political affiliations placed beside their names on the ballot paper. I should like to say that I not only do not mind having "Social Credit" placed opposite my name, but I am mighty proud to have it associated with my name.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Speaker, I was absent on duty. Had I been present, I would have voted right.

Mr. Speaker: The public and private bills having been disposed of, the house will now resume consideration of the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Harris for committee of supply.

LAW ENFORCEMENT

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, in rising to present a grievance to this house on the motion to go into supply, I should like to say first that in general law enforcement is not the direct concern of this house; it is primarily the concern of the provincial and municipal authorities. However when the action, or rather the inaction, of a federal department results in a set of conditions under which certain illegal activities are carried out by those who do not appear to be Canadian citizens, the time has arrived for the situation to be brought to the attention of the house so that some action may be taken.

Since my grievance concerns the continued presence in Canada of non-Canadians of questionable character it is obviously the responsibility of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. This department must accept the responsibility for not having dealt with United States gamblers and big-time bookies who have operated in Canada for the past two years without interference save by municipal authorities. Before I have finished this presentation I shall name names and cite cases to document this charge.

The basis of the invasion of Canada by these United States racketeers goes back to the Kefauver investigation in the United States. Following that investigation United States syndicates which had been there disclosed began to move into Canada and located themselves in Montreal in 1952, because the United States government had passed a law requiring all bookmakers to register, pay a fee of $50 and keep elaborate written records of all their transactions. Severe fines and penalties were provided for those who disobeyed these regulations.

Since it is obvious that operations of this kind do not flourish under any kind of regulation or restraint, and these conditions were making it most difficult for them to operate, the bookmakers in search of a more favourable climate turned to Canada. They could locate where they wished, because as far as convenience in carrying on their business is concerned it might be noted that the practice of bookmaking requires little more than a telephone and an office. A bookmaker operates on a split second schedule. In the United States his principal method of communication is the leased wire service, but here in Canada he depends upon the long distance telephone. In one case to which I shall refer subsequently it is stated that the long distance telephone bills of one organization which was uncovered amounted to something over $6,000 a month.

Since I am here making reference to telephone service in Canada I should point out in all fairness that it is almost impossible for the Bell Telephone Company to stop the illegal use of its lines and equipment unless that is reported upon by the police authorities. They are legally obliged to give these services wherever possible and whenever anyone requests them. In applying for the service the applicant must state that he proposes to use it for legal purposes. On February 22, 1955, I asked the following question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill):

Since Montreal police have confirmed that a large number of notorious American thugs have entered Canada illegally and are currently resident in and around Montreal, is there no process by which the Department of Citizenship and Immigration can locate and deal with such undesirables?

The minister replied as follows:

Mr. Speaker, just before I came into the house I received a notice from the hon. gentleman that he was going to ask the question he has just put in the house. I anticipated a question of this nature. Like the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace, I had advice of the report in the Montreal Star. I made immediate inquiries of the appropriate officials of the department.

Then later:

I am advised that somewhat similar reports were brought to the attention of the R.C.M.P. and the immigration branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and that an investigation has been under way for some time to see whether there has been any violation of the laws which the federal government has the responsibility of enforcing; and that, of course, includes the Immigration Act.

I do not think there is anything useful I can add to this answer until this investigation has been completed.

That was over five weeks ago. The fact that the minister could give an answer such as that at that point indicates almost unbelievable inefficiency in the way he operates his department. In the first place the men to whom I referred had at that time been in Canada for approximately two years, during the greater portion of which their presence in this country had been to say the least rumoured and discussed. Yet the minister made no inquiries whatsoever about them until I raised the point in this house; at least that was the purport of his answer.

The basic point at issue is whether or not the minister and his officials should have been aware of this illegal activity some considerable time before I raised the matter in the house. I submit that they certainly should. Besides having been a matter of discussion around Montreal for some two years the whole situation had been a matter of public record in Montreal for almost two months before the minister, prodded by my questioning, even said he would look into it. I should like now to present him with a little evidence in support of this complaint.

A raid by the Montreal police on January 1, 1955, at 1421 Bleury street revealed the existence of a gambling establishment with nine telephones, along with telephone bills, betting slips, racing publications and typewriters. This is the establishment to which I referred earlier with telephone bills averaging $6,000 a month. In its issue of January 5, 1955, the Montreal Herald, in addition to giving the previous information, had this to say:

Details of the operation have remained secret although the identity of many of the American gamblers handling the business is commonly known. The move to Montreal came largely as part of an attempt to avoid the attention of American federal law enforcement agencies where interstate transactions were involved.

The same story dealt at some length with a raid on Tuesday, January 4, 1955, on the offices of an organization called the Seaway Construction Company, located on Stanley street in Montreal. A Mr. Camille Joseph was arrested in this raid, and the story contains this interesting statement referring to Mr. Joseph:

Detectives said he claimed to come from San Antonio, Texas.

I have had somebody look further into this case and am informed that certain claims were made that this man is an American and certain claims were made that he is a Canadian. However, these reports identify him as an American. The January 6, 1955, issue of the Montreal Herald contains an article indicating that local gambling activities have been partly discontinued, but there is the following paragraph regarding those which have continued:

Main gambling activities here lately have been the American lay-off operations—underwriting the bets of American bookies by long distance telephone—and the chartered gambling clubs, legal as long as they observe certain rules.

We now see that some two months before my question in this house it became a matter of public record in Montreal that there had been American infiltration into this illegal field. Yet at the time of my asking my question it was obvious that the minister knew nothing about the situation, even though his department had been conducting an investigation for some time—and I quote from the minister's reply——to see whether there had been any violation of the laws which the federal government has the responsibility of enforcing; and that, of course, includes the Immigration Act.

I suggest that this is one case to start with, where if the minister and his officials were on their toes they would have dealt with the offender properly and been in a position to report to this house when the question was raised.

Let us now turn to the situation as it existed on February 22, when the question was raised in the house. Through a newspaper story which appeared in the Toronto Telegram of that date I propose to show that more than adequate information was available to permit the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to deal adequately with the situation either on or before that date. I use the newspaper story, first because it is a matter of public record and second because if a working newspaperman could procure the information contained in this story it could surely have been procured by the government through the extensive facilities and resources of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The story is headlined, "United States Gang Set Up Headquarters in Quebec" and it carries the byline of Jack Macbeth.

As I said, I propose to put this story on the record not so much to bolster my facts as to show in the first place the information which was available to the department, and second to show what an ordinary newspaperman—a working newspaperman, because no newspapermen are ordinary—could find out through his own efforts. The story reads—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, as this story was denied, I believe, by the chief of police in Montreal in the newspapers the following day, I wonder—

Mr. Rowe: How do you know; you have not heard the story?

Mr. Pickersgill: According to the newspaper reports the following day it was denied, and I am wondering if this is not a little irrelevant.

Mr. Rowe: You have not heard it yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: I read it.

Mr. Rowe: You are anticipating it.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The interjection of the minister, Mr. Speaker, will be dealt with in due course. I think he would be well advised to read the Montreal newspapers much more carefully both before and after any event.

Mr. Speaker: The minister rose on a point of order. An hon. member who is interrupted on a point of order may explain, and that is what I expected the hon. member to do. I feel, however, that I must now intervene to dispose of the point.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I can explain—

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member please explain?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Certainly. This is interesting, because I have a reference to it in my notes. The following day the Montreal Herald carried a follow-up on this particular story. Various newspapers carried different versions of statements of Mr. Pacifique Plante, assistant director of the Montreal police department. However, let it be said that the next day, that is February 23, the Herald story quoted Mr. Plante as saying:

> I had information—reliable information—weeks ago that five groups of American gamblers were operating in the suburbs.

Later on in the same story he is quoted as saying:

> On Bleury street they were doing a business of perhaps $1 million a week. That is my estimate. Perhaps I am wrong. Their phone bill alone was $10,000 a month.

I could go on and read one or two more quotations, Mr. Speaker. While the minister may feel he has a point, I have read the following story quite clearly and carefully and if I had it here, which I do not, I think I could say there is much uncertainty as to what Mr. Plante actually did say.

I might say further, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order is irrelevant to a degree because I was attempting to show what information was available and in the hands of the working press and those who investigated this situation.

Mr. Speaker: Well, the point obviously is this: that the hon. member, being entitled to make a speech, is supposed to express his own views, and in putting his case forward at the moment he is attempting to substantiate what he intends to argue by reading newspaper articles. The minister rose and said, "You quoted from one article but there is another one I know of which challenges what you are about to quote."

Now, what are we going to do in this house if one hon. member in making his speech is going to base his arguments on the views expressed by others in newspapers, if other members feel the need to quote from other newspapers in order to contradict the newspaper article which was used by the first member? If the hon. member wishes to put his own views forward I think he is quite entitled to do so and no one will stop him; but whenever he says, "I want to prove my point by what a newspaper said," he is bringing in an outside witness.

What facilities do we have to ascertain the accuracy of stories that are written in newspapers? There is no way of ascertaining their accuracy. The hon. member must put forward his own views and must take the responsibility for them. If he wishes to take the newspaper article as a basis for his argument he might make a passing reference to it and in that way take the newspaperman as an ally, but I suggest he should paraphrase what the newspaper said. If in attempting to advance his argument he is going to make a review of the press on that particular point, then contradictory articles will be introduced and we will have an argument between two members who are quoting newspapers one against the other. Argument in this house should be as between members and not as between newspapers despite the fact that newspapermen, as the hon. member has said, are not ordinary people.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In view of the hour, will you call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: As it is six o'clock we will adjourn, because we go into ways and means at eight o'clock and it might be preferred that the hon. member adjourn the debate now.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I shall adjourn the debate.

On motion of Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace) the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Before I proceed with my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I think I ought to draw attention to the fact that it was 81 years ago this week that the first Liberal finance minister presented his first budget. Since Sir Richard Cartwright there has been a long succession of distinguished predecessors of mine: Fielding, Robb, Dunning, Ilsley and my immediate predecessor, Mr. Abbott.

Mr. Rowe: There have been some others.

Mr. Harris: My hon. friends opposite have their traditions also. They have had distinguished gentlemen in this portfolio. I mention only a few: Tilley, Tupper, Foster and, more recently, Sir Thomas White. At this point I should like to pay my respects to the memory of Sir Thomas White who was, as everyone knows, the finance minister in the first world war. He has just recently passed from us full of years and honours which were richly deserved for the service he gave to his country.

[Mr. Speaker.]

In presenting the ninety-first budget since confederation, Mr. Speaker, I have followed the practice of the last few years in placing before hon. members a white paper which contains the facts and the figures with respect to the accounts of the past year. With this white paper before you it will not be necessary for me to go into any great detail about the accounts for the time being. However, I wish to make a general survey of the economic conditions of the country and of the accounts of last year. In doing so I crave the indulgence of hon. members, who may recall that on occasion I have expressed certain views about the length of speeches in the House of Commons, because I am now obliged to break the rule that I have heretofore tried to observe.

THE INTERNATIONAL POSITION

I should like to begin with a short review of the international scene as it affects our budgetary problems.

On the political side, 1954 was a year of constructive achievement, although our hopes of realizing a permanent and stable peace continued to be disappointed. In Europe there was some easing of tensions as further improvement was made in the political and military strength of the Atlantic alliance. Hostilities in Indo-China were brought to an end and a number of countries in south and southeast Asia made additional progress in their program of economic development. Despite these improvements, however, the world situation, particularly in the Far East, remains troubled and uneasy, and it is abundantly clear that the free world cannot yet afford to relax its efforts to build up their defences.

We must therefore continue to expect substantial expenditures for this purpose.

In economic matters abroad, 1954 was in most respects a good year. In the United States, economic activity, after receding from the peak level of 1953, began to turn up in the last quarter of the year and has continued to improve since that time. This progressive improvement in the United States has been a very heartening development, not only to us but to all friendly countries.

Another encouraging feature of the past year has been the continued expansion in production in most overseas countries of the free world, particularly the United Kingdom and western Europe. As post-war shortages have been overcome, most of the controls and restrictions which distort production and hinder basic adjustments have been abandoned. This has undoubtedly helped to bring about the improvement which has occurred both in productive investment and in living standards.

There has been a welcome easing of restrictions on international trade and payments. The United Kingdom has continued to give a constructive lead on these matters by relaxing quotas and licensing requirements, reducing discriminations against dollar imports, easing exchange restrictions and reopening commodity markets.

There is still, of course, a long way to go before the goal of full convertibility and truly liberal trade arrangements is attained. A number of countries still face formidable inflationary problems and balance of payments difficulties, and some succeed in balancing their external accounts only with the help of large amounts of United States offshore purchases and other forms of aid. However, substantial inroads have been made on entrenched restrictions and there is growing recognition that domestic inflationary pressures must be contained if international balance is to be achieved and maintained. In this connection, it is encouraging that the recent set-back in the steady progress made by the United Kingdom during the last few years in rebuilding her international reserves has not been dealt with by imposing new restrictions, but in other, and better, ways.

In helping countries to restore stability in the post-war years, to expand production and to increase their international trade, no nation has played a more constructive role than the United States. As every member of this house is aware, the success that has already been recorded is due largely to generous and farsighted American policies. In the past twelve months, however, while there was no basic change in American policies, there was a disappointing lack of progress toward actual reductions in trade barriers and there were disconcerting signs of a revival of protectionist feeling in response to the increase in competitive conditions.

I should remind the house that the United States administration has resisted proposals which, in our opinion, would not advance the cause of friendly and mutually advantageous trade. This resistance we welcome. On the other hand, it must be confessed that the resistance has not been uniformly successful. We all have our difficulties and it is not always possible to achieve ideal solutions. But it must be recognized that actions taken or even implied by the government of the United States may weaken support for liberal commercial policies and may impose upon those of us who are firm supporters of such policies a greater burden in defending them in our own countries. One country cannot attempt to get the maximum benefit at the cost of the minimum adjustments without creating a desire in other countries to achieve the same result. There must be a reasonable give and take in any durable trade relationships, whether under the GATT or under any other system.

It is of the utmost importance for the future of international economic co-operation that the United States should continue to give positive direction and leadership in reducing barriers to the free flow of world trade.

We in Canada will continue to play our part in any further steps that are taken to promote these objectives. As one of the world's great trading nations, it is clearly in our interest to encourage overseas countries to earn dollars in order that they may be able to buy our exports, which are the source of over one-fifth of our income. If we are to maintain our standard of living and use our resources and skills to best advantage, we must be prepared to permit other nations to do the same. Markets everywhere are becoming more competitive, but as an important exporting nation we must continue to look very carefully at all proposals involving government protection and aid. The effects of the higher costs resulting from artificial assistance in one form or another would have to be borne by the Canadian consumer in the form of higher taxes and higher prices and, even more important, by the Canadian producer for export in the form of lost markets overseas and lost employment here.

We should be particularly careful about impeding imports from countries whose trading position was impaired by the war, countries which are now dismantling their discriminatory restrictions against our exports and which can be expected to buy still more from us as long as we do not prevent them from earning the dollars with which to do so. With such considerations as these in mind, the government has studied the recent report of the tariff board relating to our tariff on British woollens. We have decided that even though sections of our own industry are experiencing difficulties it would not be wise to increase the tariff. While the relatively low level of our present rates may have contributed to the difficulties of certain sections of the industry, there are, as the report emphasizes, many other factors at work, including changes both of consumer preference and of technology. It seems clear that no change in the tariff, such as was proposed to the board by the industry as a minimum requirement, would solve the basic problems that currently beset the Canadian woollen and worsted manufacturer.

Our trade relations with most of the outside world continue to be governed by the general agreement on tariffs and trade. This agreement, I believe, serves our interests far better than a series of separate individual trade agreements with all the other contracting parties and it is, of course, infinitely better for us than the chaotic trade warfare that might take place if there were no trade agreements at all. The articles of the general agreement were the subject of close scrutiny during a long conference this winter in Geneva and a number of amendments were provisionally agreed upon there.

These negotiations were under the personal direction of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and I am sure we all agree that there is no one better qualified to conduct such negotiations on behalf of Canada. He has reported to the house that the revised GATT is greatly to be preferred to no agreement at all, and that it will continue to be in Canada's interest to adhere to it. In this connection I can now announce that we propose to join with others in the general rebinding of tariff schedules as from July 1 of this year.

DOMESTIC ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

I turn now to our own domestic circumstances and prospects. It is not an easy matter to generalize about the course of economic events last year, or about the probable trend for the immediate future.

In the fall of 1953 it began to be apparent that the year by year expansion of the Canadian economy which has been so conspicuous a feature of our post-war development was slowing down. Nevertheless it was felt at that time, and the record of 1954 shows that this belief was well founded, that the basic strength of our economy was not in question.

There were some people who feared a major economic downswing. This fear was based, I suppose, on the thought that the decline in production which was then taking place would inevitably spread from one industry to another by a sort of contagion of falling confidence exerting its adverse influences on wider and wider circles of the economy. In fact, no such contagion or acceleration of the forces making for weakness occurred.

By and large, the principal declines in the Canadian economy have stemmed from the small western grain crop, reductions in business spending on new machinery and equipment, and lower purchases by consumers of the more durable kinds of goods. All these reductions were from levels which had been unusually high by any standard of comparison. The lower expenditure on capital equipment and consumer durables was largely, but not wholly, offset by new records of production in our lumber, pulp and paper, mineral and petroleum industries. The net result was that our gross national product in 1954, estimated at $24 billion, was 2 per cent, or $400 million, below 1953.

In dollar terms the sharp decline in the grain crop was equal to the total decline in the gross national product, and in addition its effects permeated all other sectors of the economy. For example, loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, which are a good indicator of farm equipment sales, fell from $98 million in 1953 to $62 million in 1954. Retail sales on the prairies in the last half of 1954 were 7 per cent below the same period of 1953 while in the rest of the country they were slightly higher. The small western harvest thus contributed both directly and indirectly to our lower gross national product. Apart from the three prairie provinces, however, agriculture had a good year, and farm cash income was moderately higher than in 1953.

On the industrial side, it is necessary to remind ourselves that unevenness in the rate of growth, as well as adjustments within industries, are more characteristic of an expanding economy such as ours than of a mature or static economy. In recent years we have become so accustomed to big improvements in production that even a minor reversal of the trend is apt to cause more concern than the situation warrants. In a real sense, of course, such changes are partly the result of the very rapid expansion of earlier years, as well as the result of a changing external situation.

As I said a moment ago, the principal declines in the industrial sector were in capital equipment and consumer durables, and these, in turn, were reflected in reduced activity in the primary iron and steel industry. The output of metals and minerals, however, continued to grow, supported by strong markets at home and abroad. The output of oil and other petroleum products increased at an impressive rate, giving more employment and enabling us to reduce our dependence on external supplies. 1954 was also a record year for lumber, woodpulp and newsprint. Employment in trade, in finance and in other service industries also continued to grow. The improvement in this last group of industries is not featured in the headlines, but it employs about one-third of the total labour force of Canada.

Perhaps the principal sustaining factor behind the demand for goods and services in 1954 was consumer expenditures. The increase was from $15,100 million to nearly $15,600 million, or slightly more than 3 per cent. The continued confidence of consumers in their economic future is important since their decisions to spend or not to spend can spell the difference between expansion and contraction for many of our industries, and, of course, for the economy as a whole.

I should note at this point the important role played by our federal welfare and income maintenance policies. During the past year almost $1,200 million was paid out in veterans benefits, family allowances, pensions or assistance to the old, the disabled and the blind, and in unemployment benefits.

In 1954 more than 100,000 families decided to build or acquire new housing accommodation, involving an increase of 10 per cent in the number of housing starts during the year. The new provisions of the National Housing Act helped them to finance their plans. Of course this increase in consumer expenditures and in housing starts was supported by the growth in population and by an increase in the total of personal incomes, largely in wages and salaries.

The increase during 1954 of 405,000 in our population is especially worth noting. It is as if we had added one new Vancouver or 20 new Guelphs to our country. It may be that some small part of this increase in population had its reflection in our total unemployment; but I am certain that if we had not had this increase—both native born and immigrant—we would have had relatively less employment and been a poorer country.

Defence spending also remained high throughout 1954 although there was a decrease of about 8 per cent compared with the previous year. However, an increase in the non-defence expenditures of the federal, provincial and municipal governments almost exactly offset the defence decline in the total demand for goods and services.

New capital investment in plant and equipment continued at a high level and, if we include housing also, constituted nearly 20 per cent of the total national product. However, for the first time in the post-war period there was a small decline in total new investment, amounting to about $300 million or about 6 per cent. Investment in new plant and equipment declined by nearly $400 million, but the amount of new housing construction increased by about $100 million. I shall revert to this question of capital investment a little later.

Exports continued to support a high level of production and to give encouragement to plans for the further expansion of many of our primary industries. The experience of 1954 confirms the view that Canada has the potentialities for producing efficiently and cheaply a larger output of many of the basic commodities which the world needs. Although total exports were some 5 per cent below the level of the previous year the decline in the sales of wheat and flour is largely responsible for this change. Moreover, the past four months have seen an encouraging reversal in the trend of our total export sales. In these four months exports have been $107 million, or 8½ per cent, above the figures for the same four months a year ago. Wheat and flour exports have improved; pulp and paper were up 10 per cent; non-ferrous metals 25 per cent; lumber 40 per cent; and chemical products 50 per cent.

Imports fell by a little more than exports so that the small deficit on merchandise trade in 1953 was replaced by a small surplus last year. Taking the non-merchandise transactions into account as well, there was a deficit in Canada's international transactions on current account of $427 million, or about $12 million less than last year.

Large amounts of foreign capital, chiefly from the United States but also in good volume from British and European sources, continued to be invested in Canada in 1954. Direct investment inflows were down somewhat on the year, and new issues by Canadians on United States security markets fell quite noticeably after the first quarter of 1954. On the other hand, non-resident purchases of outstanding Canadian shares were distinctly higher.

Net capital movements, on balance, were more than sufficient to cover the current account deficit. Official reserves of gold and U.S. dollars rose during 1954 by $124 million to $1,942 million. The rate of exchange of the Canadian dollar was, on the average, slightly higher in 1954 than in the preceding year. As hon. members are aware, the Canadian dollar rate has declined again in recent months.

There has been no change in the policy of the government to allow the rate of exchange to be determined by the sum total of the forces operating in the exchange market, including of course the influence of fiscal and monetary conditions. The resources of the exchange fund are not used to reverse persistent trends but only to contribute to orderly conditions by limiting excessive short-run movements in either direction which might otherwise occur.

No appraisal of the economic situation could avoid some reference to the revival of international competition. So far as the basic industries are concerned, most of our producers have proved quite capable of maintaining and even increasing their markets at home and abroad. However, some of the secondary manufacturing industries have lost ground in export and domestic markets to their competitors. I mention this to illustrate the point that the difficulties which some industries are facing today are not the result of any general decline of demand, but of a new situation applicable to the industries concerned and in large measure capable of correction by those industries. Clearly these are situations which cannot be corrected by government. What is needed is resourceful efforts by management and labour to meet that competition by reduction in real costs and the improvement of quality and efficiency—all of which I firmly believe Canadian management and labour can provide.

Canadian production and employment last year was, of course, adversely influenced by the recession in the United States. Our economic relations with that country are too significant for Canada to remain unaffected when the American economy is going through a period of readjustment. Fortunately, those conditions are beginning to disappear.

In the United States the new year got off to a good start and I note that there is a widespread belief in that country that the present expansion of production will continue. This is already reflected in our exports to the United States. The continuation of prosperous conditions in western Europe and in commonwealth countries, together with better prices for many of the industrial raw materials which count so heavily in our exports to these areas, supports the belief that total exports will continue to expand in the year ahead.

The second important ingredient of further expansion exists in the program for the construction of new capital facilities. The present intentions of individuals, business and governments in this respect were summarized in a white paper tabled by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a few weeks ago, which indicates a 6 per cent increase in 1955 over 1954. Quite apart from the extension of capital facilities in the industrial and commercial sectors of the economy it is to be observed that new investment for the development of natural resources is going on apace, despite the completion of some of the more spectacular developments which have captured our imagination in recent years.

There should also be an increase in construction activity in the season now beginning. Indeed, it is clear to all of us that alongside the pushing back of the physical frontiers of our country there is also taking place an expansion of urban facilities which is simultaneously making Canada a land of large cities. This trend toward metropolitan development creates special problems of its own, but it is undoubtedly expanding the demands upon the products of industry and for the employment of our people.

Our fiscal and monetary policies will continue to be directed towards the encouragement of enterprise, investment and employment. I shall speak of fiscal policy in a moment. As for monetary policy, it has been definitely expansionist in character. Through 1954 the cash reserves of the chartered banks were more than sufficient to enable them to meet the demand for loans. The banks were therefore in a position to purchase government securities in the market on a substantial scale and thus add to the money holdings of the public. This and other influences brought about a considerable reduction of interest rates in Canada and rising security prices, which have made it easier to finance capital and other expenditures by borrowing or by converting securities into cash. I may add that interest rates in Canada have declined somewhat since the beginning of 1955 while rates were tending to rise in the United States and elsewhere.

Government expenditures will continue to provide a substantial support to production and employment in the year ahead. Total expenditures on defence will not differ much from last year. The construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power development will require large expenditures this year, and will stimulate production in other industries. In addition, of course, the so-called "built-in" supports to production and employment through government payments of pensions, family allowances and other welfare payments will continue to expand in line with the growth in population. Provincial and municipal expenditures are expected to increase. It is also reasonable to assume a normal grain crop this year, with a resultant stimulus to purchasing power in rural areas.

These estimates of future demand, imperfect and rough as they must be, confirm my feeling of confidence for the coming year. They indicate an active year for production, which will be reflected in increased incomes and employment, and a further increase in consumer demand can be confidently anticipated. All in all, then, I feel justified in counting upon an increase in the total national product in 1955 of something better than a normal rate of growth. Assuming normal crops, and if no unforeseen adverse events occur, I would expect our gross national production in 1955 to exceed 1954 by 5 or 6 per cent: that is, it should reach $25¼ billion or perhaps just a bit more, and on that figure I shall base my revenue forecasts.

I turn now to a brief survey of the government accounts for the fiscal year which ended last week. These are set out in considerable detail in the white paper. I should, of course, remind hon. members that our books of account will not be finally closed and audited for some time, and that the figures which I use tonight are subject to revision.

Subject to these qualifications, the results for the year can be stated briefly. Our total budgetary revenues were about $4,107 million, our expenditures about $4,255 million and the deficit for the year was about $148 million.

Revenues at $4,107 million were about $360 million or 8 per cent less than the forecast of a year ago and about $290 million less than we collected in 1953-54. Customs, sales, and excise duties and taxes, and non-tax revenues have all fallen slightly short of expectations. However, corporation income tax collections which were $190 million less than expected and personal income tax receipts which were $60 million less than expected were the two principal factors contributing to the over-all shortfall. Corporate profits were substantially lower than had been expected at the time of the last budget.

In his budget speech last year my predecessor projected a scale of expenditures and revenues that almost exactly balanced. He made it clear, however, that his projection was based upon two assumptions—normal crops and an early resumption of our normal rate of industrial expansion. He said explicitly that if these conditions did not materialize there would be a deficit of 2 or 3 per cent. Well, as hon. members know, we had a poor wheat crop, the poorest in 17 years, and the resumption of a normal rate of industrial expansion has been slower than we had hoped. As a consequence we have a deficit equal to 3½ per cent of our expenditures.

Expenditures last year amounted to $4,255 million. This was $205 million or 4½ per cent less than forecast and $95 million less than the total spent in the previous year. Expenditures for defence amounted to $1,700 million. Although this was $160 million or 8 per cent less than in 1953-54, it still constituted 40 per cent of the total budgetary outlay. Civil or non-defence expenditures amounted to about $2½ billion. About $775 million or 30 per cent of this was for family allowances and other health, welfare and social security services, and veterans' benefits. In addition, we paid out about $350 million from the old age security fund. Interest and other charges for servicing the public debt amounted to over $500 million or 20 per cent of the total, and subsidies and tax rental payments to provinces were $360 million or 15 per cent. In brief, two-thirds of all our civil expenditures were for welfare and social security services, public debt charges, and provincial subsidy and tax rental payments.

As usual, in addition to these expenditures for government services which are included in the budgetary accounts, we made substantial loans and advances and provided large sums for a variety of other authorized and essential purposes. I should like to say a word about these non-budgetary transactions and their effect on our cash position.

During the fiscal year non-budgetary disbursements amounted to $290 million. To meet them, $490 million was available from non-budgetary sources of which $205 million came from the various annuity, insurance and pension accounts which the government holds and administers, and $220 million from the repayment of loans and advances.

After taking into account the budgetary deficit of $148 million and the net balance of $200 million available from non-budgetary transactions, some $50 million was available for debt reduction. By using this amount and by drawing down about $150 million of the large cash balances we held at the beginning of the year, the funded debt in the hands of the public was reduced during the year by $200 million.

The government's public debt operations during the past year have again included the redemption or refinancing of a large volume of bonds. The redemption of the third and fourth victory loans, amounting to $2,000 million, involved the two largest refunding operations in our history. Net sales of Canada savings bond series 9 amounted to $767 million, and represented the largest net increase in savings bond holdings by the Canadian public in any year since this type of security was introduced nine years ago. During the year there was a net increase in the amount of treasury bills outstanding of $240 million reflecting the government's desire to develop a more active Canadian market for short-term securities. Apart from the refunding of treasury bills which matured periodically, the total of new securities issued was $4,610 million and we redeemed matured or called securities and acquired others for our sinking fund and securities investments accounts to a total of $4,810 million. In consequence, as I have pointed out, we were able to reduce our unmatured funded debt outstanding in the hands of the public by $200 million.

Interest rates declined during the year. Early in 1954, long-term government of Canada bonds were selling to yield about 3·75 per cent. During the past two months the rate has been under 3·20. Treasury bill rates also declined. A year ago the rate on three-month bills was around 1.60 per cent. Currently this rate is about 1.15 per cent. The average rate of interest on the government's entire funded debt was 2.86 per cent a year ago. Now it stands at 2.74.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Federal-provincial relations are currently a matter of particular interest and concern. They are one of the most important problems facing us as a nation today. I do not propose at this time to review them in detail, or to suggest any revisions or alternatives to our present arrangements. We will be meeting with the provincial representatives later this month, preliminary to a full federal-provincial fiscal conference later in the year. We, on our part, will be coming to these meetings with open minds, and I do not wish to prejudge the issues and the problems we shall then be discussing.

Government in a federal state is an extremely complex matter, and in no field is this truer than in federal-provincial financial relations. Various provincial spokesmen have from time to time expressed views on these questions. Some have proposed larger payments by the federal government to the provinces; others have asked that the federal government take on additional responsibilities, or contribute substantially to their cost. Some have pressed for a return to what they believe to be the original intentions of the framers of our constitution; others have advocated a formal reallocation of financial powers and responsibilities.

I find it difficult to envisage any reallocation of taxing powers or more precise definition of sources of revenue that is likely to meet all future contingencies. If that is the case, there is much to be said for medium-term agreements, freely entered into, and subject to renewal or reconsideration at regular intervals. I think we are more likely to reach sensible and acceptable solutions in that way.

No one, so far as I know, has ever claimed that the tax rental approach has been satisfactory in all respects; but it would be most unwise to undervalue the many advantages the country has gained from it. These agreements have been a unique and interesting experience in intergovernmental co-operation and the disagreements that have occurred from time to time should not lead us to overlook the substantial benefits that have accrued to the provincial governments and to the people of Canada through this co-operation.

In considering our future course of action we can hope and expect that the expansion of our economy will continue to provide a tax potential sufficient for all levels of government. I suggest that we should seek a scheme of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements that will provide the total revenues required with the greatest degree of equity and efficiency; that will impose as little duplication and confusion as possible on the common body of taxpayers; that will spend the revenues so acquired so as to afford the greatest measure of public service; and at the same time will fully preserve provincial autonomy as provided in our constitution. Our success in achieving the best possible blend of these will be the test of our collective statesmanship.

I have not considered it necessary at this time to refer in any detail to the solution reached in the matter of the credits for personal income tax levied by the province of Quebec. This was explained to this house by the Prime Minister on January 17 last. I need only say that no other province has indicated a desire to withdraw from its agreement in favour of terms similar to those made available to Quebec. Among the resolutions I shall be tabling this evening will be those giving effect to the arrangements announced by the Prime Minister last January.

May I say by way of interpolation that I am quite sure nearly all Canadians are extremely pleased that the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will be presiding over the conference with the provincial premiers.

TAX POLICY

I come now to the question of what should be the basic principles governing our tax policy this year.

I am sure that all will agree that when employment and incomes are high, and the economy expanding at a normally healthy rate, we should fully balance our budget, with a modest amount for the reduction of debt.

I think there will also be general agreement that, under boom conditions when abnormal demands are putting undue strain on our resources and inflationary pressures are building up, fiscal policy should play its part, along with other appropriate policies, in placing some restraint on such boom conditions. Conversely, when the rate of economic advance slackens, and the economy as a whole is not fully employed, a moderate budgetary deficit should be no cause for alarm.

Let me add at once that I do not think that fiscal policy is the only means of promoting economic stability and expansion. Fiscal policy is just one of several means to that end. Monetary policy, trade policy and policies relating to resource development and basic income maintenance are equally important, and in certain contexts may have considerably greater influence. The important thing is that all the useful tools and weapons at the disposal of the government should be used and directed toward that fundamental objective of all economic policy—the steady expansion of the wealth and welfare, the employment and incomes, of the Canadian people. Nor would I want to leave the impression that governments alone bear these responsibilities. The healthy expansion of the Canadian economy is everybody's business.

Fiscal policy, however, is one of several important means of promoting the expansion of wealth and welfare. I propose to recommend to the house a tax policy and a tax structure that would produce a balanced budget under conditions which represent a high level of output and employment.

There are various ways of describing what we mean by high levels of employment and incomes, and various ways of estimating what revenues a certain tax structure will produce from a given level of activity. This is not a simple exercise, but I shall put it in simple terms without adding all the qualifications—the "ifs" and "buts"—which perhaps ought to accompany it.

1953 was a good year, in fact the best we have ever had. The gross national product in that year was $24.4 billion. Our available labour force, our managerial and technical skills, and our stock of capital equipment should grow and improve. Consequently our capacity to produce goods and services should normally expand. Had we had this expansion during the past year our gross national product in 1954 would have been a bit over $25 billion. Actually it was only $24 billion.

If it were possible to pick up this slack and at the same time add a normal rate of growth, we would have a gross national product in 1955 of a little more than $26 billion. I propose, therefore, to recommend a tax structure which, as closely as I can estimate, would produce a balanced budget if we had a gross national product of about $26 billion.

As I said a moment ago, it is not a simple matter to forecast revenues under changing economic conditions. Our tax structure as a whole is progressive, that is, our tax yields tend to rise more rapidly and fall more rapidly than the national income as a whole. How rapidly our revenues rise or fall depends largely on the shifts in the various elements that make up the total national income.

After analysing all the relevant considerations, I have concluded that our present tax structure would produce revenues close to $4,550 million if we had a gross national product of $26 billion. I have already said that I do not expect that we shall average so high a rate for 1955 as a whole, but I am hopeful that we shall reach that rate before the end of our fiscal year. For the purpose of forecasting our actual revenues I shall assume, as I said earlier, a realized gross national product of $25¼ billion in this calendar year, and on that basis our federal revenues will be about $4,350 million.

If I may have unanimous consent I would like to place in Hansard at this point a table showing my estimate of our revenues for the year just closed and of the revenues that would be received in the coming year if no changes in taxation were made.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister unanimous consent to place this on the record?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris: The table follows:

TABLE I

Revenues before Tax Changes

	Preliminary 1954-55	Forecast 1955-56
Personal income tax	$1,176	$1,235
Non-resident income tax	61	65
Corporation income tax	1,008	1,085
Succession duties	42	45
Customs duties	393	410
Excise duties	227	238
Sales tax	576	600
Other excise taxes	254	265
Miscellaneous taxes	16	17
Total tax revenues	3,753	3,960
Non-tax revenues and credits	354	390

The main estimates of expenditure have already been tabled in the amount of $4,360 million. The government has continued its efforts toward maximum economy and efficiency in government operations. With the co-operation of all my colleagues it has been possible this year to achieve a reduction in the main estimates—the first in seven years. Decreases from last year are shown for ten departments. The reduction in estimates has been achieved after providing for the automatic increase in social security payments arising from the growth of our population. In order to help maintain employment, there has been no curtailment in the planned program of useful and necessary public works. Indeed, if we include loans to government agencies, there is provision for a substantial increase in expenditures on public works during the present year. Also there is provision for the normal expansion of government services designed to promote the expansion of our economy. For this purpose, increases have been proposed in the outlays on research, on services which encourage the development of resources, and on the administration and development of our northern areas.

We have sought to reduce expenditures through economies in administration and overhead. In the coming year there will be substantial savings in interest charges resulting from refinancing of loans at lower interest rates. Additional steps have been taken to ensure proper economy in the use of staff in government departments. Administrative procedures are constantly being reviewed in order to eliminate waste and to increase efficiency. There will be no relaxation in these efforts. The more successful we are in the exercise of economy and efficiency in operating costs, the more possible it will be to provide necessary services and to undertake constructive projects which promote the growth and prosperity of our economy.

There will, of course, be the usual supplementaries. On the other hand, there will be the usual lapsings and underspending in many of the 500 separate items in the estimates. After a careful study of all these factors, I have reached the conclusion that a fair estimate of our actual spending during the coming year is $4,300 million. Thus on the basis of the accounting methods we have been using in the past I would expect a surplus of about $50 million at the present rates of taxation.

At this point, however, I should like to report on the operations of the old age security fund. Hon. members will recall that parliament set up this system and this fund in 1951, and it came into operation in stages during 1952. The revenue of the fund comes from a 2 per cent sales tax, a 2 per cent corporation income tax, and a 2 per cent personal income tax with a maximum individual payment of $60.

[Mr. Harris.]

The amount and the disposition of the annual deficit of this fund are shown in the following table which I ask leave to place upon Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris: The table follows:

TABLE II

Old Age Security Fund
(in millions of dollars)

Fiscal Years	Receipts	Payments	Deficit	Disposition of Deficit
1951-52	$26	$76	$50	Charged to current expenditure
1952-53	244	323	99	Written off to active asset reserve
1953-54	293	339	46	Carried as a temporary loan
1954-55*	291	353	62	Carried as a temporary loan

*Preliminary—final figures not available until final closing of the 1954-55 accounts.

The deficit in the fund for the year just closed is about $62 million and during the coming year I expect that it will be about the same.

We have now had three full years of experience with the operations of this fund, and I think we should now take steps to close out the deficit each year. I propose, therefore, to ask the authority of parliament to wipe out the temporary loan for the year 1953-54 by charging it to current expenditure in the year 1954-55. Similarly I shall ask parliament in the June supplementaries, when the exact deficit for 1954-55 is known, to charge the past year's deficit to this year's expenditure.

When this is done it will have the effect of increasing our budgetary deficit for the year just ended by $46 million; that is, instead of the $148 million I reported earlier, and also referred to in the white paper, the adjusted deficit will be $194 million. It will have the further effect of adjusting the current year's estimated expenditure from the $4,300 million I mentioned a moment ago to $4,362 million.

Having forecast the revenues, before any tax changes, at $4,350 million, and the expenditures at $4,362 million, I would face a deficit of $12 million this year. If, however, employment, incomes and business activity were at the desirable level—that is, such as to yield a gross national product of about $26 billion—our present tax structure would be generating a substantial surplus. I think in these circumstances it is good sense to anticipate this situation and make some moderate tax reductions now.

Apart from and outside the budget, we shall as usual be called upon to make a number of authorized loans and advances for which we must find cash. The Canadian National Railways capital requirements are financed initially by advances from the government. In 1955 these may amount to $150 million. Loans to the St. Lawrence seaway authority will be about $50 million and another $40 or $50 million will probably be required for advances to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In addition cash will be needed for other crown corporations and departmental working capital accounts, for loans to veterans and other authorized purposes. Moreover, I should expect that there will be substantial net disbursements from the defence equipment replacement account.

On the other hand, we shall have cash coming in from the repayment of various loans and advances and from various annuity, insurance and pension accounts which the government administers. Changes during the year in the exchange fund cannot be accurately forecast. However, all in all I should expect that apart from our funded debt and exchange fund operations and the net requirements of the Canadian National Railways, the non-budgetary accounts will be approximately in balance.

TAX AND TARIFF CHANGES

I turn now to specific tax proposals. The burden of our present taxes is, I believe, distributed pretty fairly and sensibly. My problem, therefore, is to spread such reductions as I am able to recommend as fairly as possible. However, in addition to wanting to be as fair as possible, it is desirable that the reductions be made where they will be helpful in encouraging business activity and promoting employment.

CORPORATION INCOME TAXES

It is well known that a great part of our post-war industrial development has been financed out of corporate earnings which have been retained to expand production and create more jobs. Our present rate of tax on corporate profits is very high. The standard rate takes away nearly half the earnings of business enterprise. I share my predecessor's view that in the interests of the future of Canada—and that means all of us—the rate should be lowered as circumstances permit. Sound and prudent government policies with respect to business enterprise encourage the growth and expansion of the whole country.

In the light of these considerations I propose to reduce the standard corporate rate from the present 49 per cent level to 47 per cent, effective January 1, 1955. On an annual basis this will reduce revenue by about $43 million and the revenue loss for this fiscal year will be about $28 million.

The personal income tax is our largest source of revenue. It is also a progressive tax, broadly based, and directly touches more than 3,800,000 individual taxpayers. It is a tax where changes in rates—up or down—are quickly reflected in the current stream of personal incomes. It is in this direction that I propose to apply the greater part of the relief available this year.

I am recommending a new schedule of rates which will reduce the tax payable by 12 to 13 per cent for 85 per cent of our taxpayers. The method by which this result will be reached is to reduce the rates of tax payable on each bracket of income by two percentage points. The maximum reduction in the tax payable will be 13.3 per cent. Every married taxpayer with an income up to about $5,000 will get at least a 12 per cent reduction. The rate of reduction beyond this point drops off gradually until it reaches 2.8 per cent at the highest income levels.

These changes, as is our regular practice, will be effective July 1, 1955. This means that for the great majority of taxpayers their tax reductions at the source will be reduced by 12 or 13 per cent commencing with their July pay cheques. For the calendar year 1955 the reduction in total tax payable will, of course, be just half that which I have mentioned, because every taxpayer will have paid during the first six months at the old rate, and the last six months at the new.

This reduction in personal income taxes will be confined to the regular income tax as calculated under the graduated schedule of rates and will not apply to that part of income tax levied under the Old Age Security Act nor to the special 4 per cent tax on investment income. The cost to the treasury of this abatement will be $128 million in a full year, or $85 million in this fiscal year.

With consent I should like to place on Hansard at this point the usual tables showing the tax payable at various income levels for the calendar year 1954, the calendar year 1955, and on a full year basis.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the minister has consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris: The tables are as follows:

There are a number of minor changes in the field of income tax that need to be made. Many of these will be found in the resolutions. I perhaps might explain some of them.

Our Income Tax Act imposes a special tax of 4 per cent on investment income. Profits from carrying on business are, of course, earned income and not subject to this tax. In the case of rental incomes derived from the ownership and management of real estate it has been found impossible to draw a consistent line defining the "carrying on of a business". I am proposing, therefore, that income in the form of rentals from real estate be excluded from the base to which the special 4 per cent tax on investment income applies. The revenue loss will be about $700,000 in a full year, and about $300,000 in this fiscal year.

An amendment will be introduced to allow as a business expense the costs incidental to borrowing money and issuing shares. This deduction will cover such items as professional fees, printing costs, and the like, but will not include bond discount or commissions on the sale of securities.

The amending bill will make provision for a tax on companies which in future pay dividends out of "designated" surplus to non-resident persons or to tax-exempt persons where control of the corporation has been acquired since December 31, 1954. The rate of tax on such companies will be 15 per cent and it will be computed by reference to the amount of dividends paid to the person controlling it.

For fiscal periods ending in 1956 and thereafter, income in the form of rentals in excess of 10 per cent of gross income will disqualify a company from the status of "non-resident owned investment corporation". Likewise, the receipt of income from operating ships or aircraft will debar a company from the status of "foreign business corporation".

Commencing tomorrow, payments for timber cut in Canada made to non-resident persons will be subject to our regular 15 per cent tax. This will close a gap in the existing law.

Our tax laws contain special incentive provisions for the oil, gas and mining industries. It has been the policy in the past few years to review these provisions each year and annually to grant an extension of them. There are certain advantages in this procedure but, on the other hand, it carries with it some uncertainty for the future. In the past few months I have been giving considerable thought to the operation of these incentives and to the importance of these two industries to the future of Canada. I believe these special tax provisions have clearly established their value in promoting expansion and I now propose to make them a permanent part of our law. There is one minor exception to the general statement I have made. The tax credits which are specially authorized under orders in council for deep test wells will not be continued beyond the present year.

In addition to the income tax changes which I have just mentioned the amending bill will contain numerous changes of a technical nature and less general in their application.

Now just a word about succession duties. The budget speech of last year indicated the intention of the government to undertake a complete revision of the act and invited representations regarding it. Useful briefs and comments have been received and the work of drafting and shaping a new structure is under way. The task has proved to be somewhat more difficult and time-consuming than was anticipated. The new bill will not be ready for introduction at the present session, but I hope it will be ready next year. In the meantime the present law will stand unchanged.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

The resolutions which I am placing before the house tonight contain a number of tariff changes; for the most part, however, these changes are of a familiar character. Many of them are essentially formal; but they serve to bring the wording of individual tariff items into line with changing trade practices and changing technology. Others make permanent certain temporary reductions in our tariffs on materials imported for use in Canadian manufacturing, reductions that were originally introduced by order in council in past years on a trial basis. Still others provide for new tariff reductions.

None of the proposed tariff changes affects items producing a substantial amount of revenue, and the aggregate effect of all the changes on revenues will not be significant. Nevertheless a number of the changes are of some general interest.

One of these relates to Canadians returning from abroad. Recently the tariff board ruled that returning Canadians are not entitled to bring in their personal and household goods as settlers' effects, and therefore some new provision has to be made for them. I am sure we do not want to put obstacles in the path of Canadians who, after working or studying abroad, decide to come home. Accordingly I propose to extend to all returning Canadians facilities similar to those at present available to members of the armed forces and government employees who have been posted abroad for more than one year.

In our effort to keep the tariff abreast of technical changes we have substantially rewritten two groups of items, one covering sugar syrups and molasses and the other covering aircraft parts. In the former field, apart from one deliberate reduction, no changes are intended from the rates in effect over past years. In the latter field there are a number of reductions.

A number of the reductions will benefit farmers, directly or indirectly. They include reduction or elimination of tariffs on brooders for farm animals, certain components of feedstuffs, sweet potato seedlings, poultry eviscerating equipment, and others.

Several items will be of interest to the fishing industry, in particular the elimination of duty on fishing vessels over 100 feet in length and the reduction of duty on fish meal plant and fish cooking equipment.

Two items in tonight's resolutions stem from reports of the tariff board. Some years ago the board reviewed the whole plastics schedule and recommended a series of adjustments in rates which parliament adopted in 1952. Naturally there have been changes since that time in the rapidly developing plastics industry. Some of these changes were in fact forecast in 1952, and I have recently received a supplementary report which my predecessor requested from the board on polyethylene and its products. This report recommends a change from free entry to a rate of 10 per cent for polyethylene resins, together with some consequential adjustments on manufactures of polyethylene. After considering this report I have decided to recommend a rate of 7½ per cent together with appropriate consequential adjustments. In addition, the duty on phenol-aldehyde resins is changed from free entry to 7½ per cent, except when used for the manufacture of plywood. The new rate is in line with those established in 1952.

This evening I am tabling two tariff board reports. One, which I have just mentioned, relates to polyethylene, and the decision to accept its recommendations in large measure is embodied in tonight's resolutions. The other, relating to ethylene glycol, recommends an increase in a rate bound under GATT. If it is decided to accept this recommendation, it will be necessary to renegotiate the rate under the provisions of GATT; otherwise the GATT countries affected might withdraw tariff concessions of value to our exporters. It may be necessary to introduce this item, and possibly one or two others, into the resolutions as an amendment at the time they are in committee.

It is my intention to continue the practice of my predecessors in referring individual tariff rates or sections of the tariff to the tariff board from time to time. This is one of the ways, and a very important way, of keeping our tariff abreast of technical and industrial change, and the newly revised GATT will allow us a little more flexibility than the old. However, I should like to emphasize that I am not implying any general change in our present commercial policy.

I am at present planning to refer to the tariff board two sections of the tariff that have become out of date: a section covering chemicals, and a section covering primary iron and steel products. The former section is, perhaps, the more urgently in need of review, because the chemical industry has been changing and developing so rapidly; but the primary iron and steel schedule was worked out many years ago and badly needs overhauling. I am also planning to refer to the tariff board the item covering potatoes. There have been many representations made to the government on this commodity. I am aware of the varied regional and seasonal aspects of this problem, and I believe the tariff board is the appropriate body to study and report upon it.

SALES AND EXCISE TAXES

Turning now to the field of domestic commodity taxes, I should say at once that I am not making any change in the general sales tax. I am proposing, however, a few additions to the schedule of exemptions. These include, among others, materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture or production of feeds for poultry, cattle and other livestock and fur-bearing animals; creosote oil and other wood preservatives when used exclusively in the treatment of timber; poles or lumber; perforated bituminous fibre pipe for drainage purposes not exceeding 4 inches in diameter; floor tile and wall paper. It is estimated that the cost of allowing sales tax exemption on these items will be about $1 million annually.

No changes will be made this year in the special class of taxes on liquor, beer, wines, cigarettes and tobacco products.

This leaves for consideration the so-called special excise taxes.

A few of these items bear a rate of 15 per cent. This higher rate still applies to automobiles and to radios and T.V. sets. In the case of radios and T.V. sets hon. members will recall that this tax replaces the former annual licence fee on all receiving sets.

In the case of automobiles, however, I think the rate should now be brought down to 10 per cent. Effective tomorrow, therefore, the rate of excise tax on automobiles will be reduced by five percentage points. It is estimated that on a full year's basis this reduction will cost the treasury $27 million and in the current fiscal year $26 million.

At the present the 10 per cent excise tax applies to tires and tubes; not merely to automobile tires but also to those used for trucks, buses, and aircraft. In these latter cases the special tax applies to items which enter into the cost of carrying on certain kinds of business. I have decided to repeal completely the excise tax on all tires and tubes regardless of their use. The revenue loss will be $8·5 million in a full year and $8 million in this fiscal year.

My colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) has asked me to give notice that in accordance with standard practice no claims for refunds arising out of tax reductions in respect of goods on which tax has been paid will be entertained.

Before leaving this subject of sales and excise taxes I want to say that my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, and I are concerned about the present statutory provisions with respect to the base on which the tax rate applies. The problem arises when manufacturers sell to customers at different levels in the marketing process. This and several related questions need careful examination. In view of the nature of the particular problems involved it seems desirable to seek some advice from persons outside the government service. We propose, therefore, to invite a small committee, including experienced persons in the business world, to study these technical problems with us and to make recommendations.

May I say at this point, Mr. Speaker, what I think all hon. members know, that the Minister of Finance imposes and receives taxes. It is the duty of the Minister of National Revenue and his department to collect them.

I should like to express my thanks to him and to his officials for the efficient and impartial manner in which this duty is discharged.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

I am now in a position to summarize my over-all budgetary position for the coming year. The total tax reductions I have proposed will reduce the revenue by about $207 million in a full year, and the actual revenues in this fiscal year by approximately $148 million. If I may have consent I shall insert here in Hansard the following table of expected annual revenues.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris: The table is as follows:

1955-56 Revenues Before and After Tax Changes
(in millions of dollars)

	Before	Reduction	After
Personal income tax	$1,235	$85	$1,150
Non-resident tax	65	–	65
Corporation income tax ..	1,085	28	1,057
Succession duties	45	–	45
Customs duties	410	–	410
Excise duties	238	–	238
Sales tax	600	1	599
Other excise taxes	265	34	231
Other taxes	17	–	17
Total tax revenue	3,960	148	3,812
Non-tax revenue	390	–	390
Total	$4,350	$148	$4,202

It will be seen that I estimate the total revenue to be $4,202 million. Since I have forecast expenditures, including the past year's deficit in the old age security fund, at $4,362 million, I shall expect a budgetary deficit this year of $160 million, as compared with the adjusted deficit for last year of $194 million.

But in line with my earlier analysis, as we reach a level of economic activity represented by a gross national product of $26 billion, I would expect our revenues, after making these tax changes, to be flowing in at an annual rate of about $4,350 million. Under these conditions our deficit in the old age security fund would be declining, and I would therefore expect our flow of total revenue and expenditure to be in very close balance.

I have one further matter I should like to mention.

I referred earlier in my speech to existing policies which are promoting steady economic expansion.

I have referred to monetary and trade policies and I have naturally dealt at some length with fiscal policy. I have also mentioned our policies relating to basic income maintenance and social security, unemployment insurance, family allowances, old age security, pensions to veterans, the disabled and the blind, agricultural and fisheries price supports.

I should like to say something more about the longer-run questions of economic expansion. The long-term economic outlook for Canada is extremely bright. It has changed tremendously in the past 25 or 30 years, and it will continue to change. The world we live in has changed too, and that process will go on.

To meet these changes, as a federal government we are spending many scores of millions of dollars on research, surveys and development, and we have been steadily increasing our expenditure in these directions year by year. The provinces are doing a good deal along these lines also. Several of them have research councils and industrial development councils, and recently I have been greatly interested to learn something of the regional development council set up co-operatively in the Atlantic provinces. I think we all agree that this money and these efforts have been paying us dividends and will continue to do so.

None of us has any doubts as to our great future, or of our capacity greatly to expand our population and our standards of living. I suppose that all of us in the house have, from time to time, made speeches about our great opportunities and our shining future. I think the time has come to spend a little time, thought and money on carefully documenting the reality underlying these after-dinner speeches.

The government intends, therefore, to appoint a royal commission with instructions to look ahead and examine carefully our future economic prospects. The sort of study we have in mind would include probable developments both in our productive capacities and in our external markets. It would include an examination of our population growth in both its regional and age distribution aspects. It would assemble information and speculate thoughtfully about the magnitude and nature of our future requirements for the great varieties of physical amenities which contribute to a steadily rising level of well-being. I am sure our provincial and municipal governments, our businessmen and producers, management and workers, would like to have comprehensive and carefully documented analyses of our various potentialities.

All Canadians will agree that a clear understanding of these matters is a first step in developing wise and practical policies.

Wise and practical policies are founded on knowledge, inspiration and courage. The Canadian people have always demonstrated that they have inspiration and courage. I suggest we improve our knowledge that we may not fail to take full and proper advantage of the heritage with which Providence has so richly endowed this nation.

What would emerge from the work of such a royal commission? Not a detailed blueprint of the Canadian economy 30 years hence; that would be impossible. Nor a long series of detailed policy recommendations—governments cannot abdicate their functions to royal commissions.

I think the work of this royal commission will do several things. It will focus public attention, here and abroad, in a rather specific and detailed way, on our prospects. It will gather together the considerable amount of material already in existence, but scattered in many different places, that throws light on these prospects. It will also promote and stimulate studies to fill the many gaps in essential factual material. It will sharpen our understanding of some of the problems we face, and will provide useful guides to governments and businessmen, and to leaders in all walks of life, in making plans and policies for the future.

This will be no short-run undertaking. The commission will probably take many months to complete its report. But in the light of such a report on our economic prospects, and the further and continuing studies it will inspire, we shall all of us be better able to review our current policies, revise or modify those which may have served us well in the past, but may not be so well adapted to the coming decades, and press forward those which seem likely best to serve our future.

That, Mr. Speaker, completes the contents of my budget for 1955. The financial policies of this government, I dare say, over the past two decades have won the respect and admiration of our friends in other countries and, if I can count, sir, seem to have met with the approval of our people at home.

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:

1. That for the 1956 and subsequent taxation years each of the graduated rates of tax at present applicable to individuals be reduced by two percentage points, and that for the 1955 taxation year each of the graduated rates of tax at present applicable to individuals be reduced by one percentage point.

2. That with respect to income of corporations earned on and after January 1, 1955, the 47 per cent rate of tax on income in excess of $20,000 be reduced to 45 per cent.

3. That for the 1954 taxation year an individual may deduct from the tax otherwise payable by him the amount of tax on income paid to the government of any province in which he resided, was employed or carried on business, not exceeding 10 per cent of the tax otherwise payable by him.

4. That for the 1955 and 1956 taxation years an individual who resided, was employed or carried on business in a province in which a tax on income was payable to the government of the province may deduct from the tax otherwise payable by him to Canada that proportion of 10 per cent of his tax otherwise payable that his income for the period during which he resided in the province or his income earned in the province is of his whole income.

5. That for the 1955 and subsequent taxation years rental income from real property shall not be included in income to which the additional 4 per cent tax on investment income applies.

6. That the right of an investment company at present to elect as regards its taxable status be repealed and that for the 1955 and subsequent taxation years an investment company be subject to a tax of 20 per cent on its taxable income.

7. That expenses incurred in the 1955 and subsequent taxation years by a taxpayer in the course of issuing or selling shares of its capital stock or in the course of borrowing money used in the taxpayer's business (other than amounts in respect of commissions, bonus payments or discounts) be allowed as a deduction in computing the income of the taxpayer.

8. That for the 1955 and subsequent taxation years proceeds of a sale or realization of inventory or accounts receivable of a taxpayer upon or after selling or ceasing to carry on a business be included in computing income, but that the taxpayer be given the option of paying tax in respect thereof at his average rate of tax for the three taxation years immediately preceding the year in which he sold or ceased to carry on the business.

9. That a corporation resident in Canada that pays a dividend out of its designated surplus to a non-resident corporation or a person exempt from tax, by whom the payer corporation was controlled, be subject to a tax of 15 per cent computed by reference to the amount of the dividend, where control of the payer corporation was acquired after December 31, 1954.

10. That for the 1956 and subsequent taxation years a corporation more than 10 per cent of whose gross revenue was derived from rents be disqualified from being treated for tax purposes as a non-resident-owned investment corporation.

11. That for the 1956 and subsequent taxation years a corporation any part of whose income was derived from leasing or operating ships or aircraft be disqualified from being treated for tax purposes as a foreign business corporation.

12. That payments made after April 5, 1955, to a non-resident, computed by reference to the amount of timber cut or taken from a timber limit in Canada be subjected to the 15 per cent tax on income from Canada of non-residents.

13. That the exemption of income from metalliferous or industrial mineral mines for the first three years of production be extended to mines coming into production at any time hereafter.

14. That the special deduction from income allowed for expenses of exploring or drilling for petroleum or natural gas in Canada and the special deduction from income allowed for expenses of searching for minerals in Canada be allowed for expenses incurred at any time hereafter.

15. That a deduction from income be allowed to a corporation whose principal business is production, refining or marketing of petroleum, petroleum products or natural gas or exploring or drilling for petroleum or natural gas, and to a corporation whose principal business is mining or exploring for minerals, for expenses incurred in the 1954 and subsequent calendar years in exploring or drilling for petroleum or natural gas in Canada or searching for minerals in Canada, if such expenditures were incurred otherwise than on its own account, in consideration for shares or an option or right to purchase shares of a corporation on whose account they were incurred.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:

1. That the excise tax on automobiles adapted or adaptable to passenger use be reduced from 15 per cent to 10 per cent.

2. That the excise tax on tires and tubes for automotive vehicles of all kinds be repealed.

3. That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed:

(a) materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture or production of feeds for poultry, cattle and other stock and fur-bearing animals;

(b) creosote oil and other wood preservatives when for use exclusively in the treatment of timber, poles or lumber;

(c) material to be used exclusively in the production of terrazzo flooring;

(d) perforated bituminized fibre pipe for drainage purposes not to exceed four inches in diameter;

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Enthusiasm, Mr. Speaker, is really a delightful thing. Further, it seems to me that the enthusiasm of those who sit around us has no relation whatever to what is said; it is just enthusiasm on its own. Last year, when the news was not so good, the enthusiasm was just as great, so far as I can remember, and the noise was just as loud. I seem to have stood here just as long tonight as I did then.

Tonight, of course, we have a change. I am sorry the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has to leave us but I wish him bon voyage. We have had a change of taskmasters, I might say of tax masters. Last year we had a swan song and this year we have a chicken breaking out of the shell. I am sure all hon. members across the way would wish me to say, "Some chicken". I was told not long ago that we might expect a change, that the budgets we had been having were St. James street budgets and now we would have a Grey-Bruce budget. I am not so sure. I think perhaps the people of St. James street may think it is a Grey-Bruce budget and the people of Grey-Bruce may think it is a St. James street budget. At any rate I will leave that without trying to decide.

We now have the answer to the minister's speech of last November in Montreal, which I heard. At that time he teased us along. He referred rather patronizingly to the timid attitude of the taxpayers who apparently were ready to be fleeced of all the money the government wanted to take out of them. At the end of the speech many people thought, and apparently they were right, that the minister had intended to indicate a tax reduction. I confess I was dizzy then, and I am a little dizzy now. But now we have the story. Whatever else can be said, I think we can regard this as a delightful excursion into optimism. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I am sorry he has gone, must have been green with envy to see the optimism of the Minister of Finance. I cannot help wondering if this is an election year, because under his predecessor, in spite of his winning ways, we did not always get tax reductions, even when things were rather good. Even when one of those surpluses built up on inflated money came along so unexpectedly, we did not always get tax relief. We usually had to wait for the election year.

As I say, the Minister of trade and Commerce must be green with envy, because this is really a big adventure in optimism. Let me give you one or two figures. In 1953, our record year, the gross national product, as we call it, was $24.4 billion. The year 1954 disappointed us and the gross national product was only $24 billion. Now, in 1955, I cannot quite make out what the minister is doing. He seems to waver between $25.25 billion and $26 billion. At one time I thought he was saying $25.25 billion, and in the next breath he seemed to be saying $26 billion. On the basis of $26 billion we would get a revenue which is estimated at $4,550 million. On the basis of $25.25 billion we would get $4,350 million. On the lower basis, then, we would have a deficit of $160 million, following one this year of $194 million.

Then the minister used a curious phrase. After outlining the $160 million he said "in line with my earlier analysis, as we reach a level of economic activity represented by $26 billion" not "if" we reach, but "as" we reach. I just point that out to show the delightful optimism on which this budget is based and which we may all hope is fully realized.

Mr. Sinclair: Belief in our country.

Mr. Macdonnell: Oh, yes.

Mr. Sinclair: We believe.

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes; so did the previous minister believe. Last year he was not quite so optimistic, though he was optimistic; and even then it did not quite work out.

Now, deficits are things we should fully understand. We should realize what happens when we have a deficit; we should realize what it means. It means that the minister, after wringing out of us every dollar that he feels he can, after scraping the barrel, or rather the pocket, then goes out and borrows money. This year we shall have to borrow $194 million in order to keep level, and that means you and I and all the other taxpayers will have to pay that money back.

In the coming year the minister, by allowing his imagination free vent, and allowing himself to think of $26 billion, which is a much higher figure than any economist I happen to know has given, is able to believe that this $160 million will be reduced, and we may well hope that it will.

I do not propose to go into the details of the tax reductions. That can come later. Tax reductions are always pleasant; but now, after this pleasant voyage of the imagination, I should like to come back and deal with a few of the facts of life because it seems to me the minister has ignored them entirely.

I was fascinated by some of his figures. Perhaps I did not hear every word of the speech but in general I think we can say that he dealt with the delightful things of life, optimism, the belief in billions and billions swelling and growing in taxes. They grow in his hands and enable him in a way to have optimism to make these tax reductions. But I want to come back and remind him that he has said nothing to comfort the people in this country who are suffering at the present time. There is nothing here for them. They might as well not exist so far as I can see.

We have really been on a pleasant voyage. I do not know whether or not it is a voyage of discovery, but we have been on a pleasant voyage. We have not had to bother about these unpleasant things which plague us. I must now ask the minister and the rest of us to come back to some of the realities of life. In the first place, I should like to point out that while tax reductions are pleasant things, they should not come out of deficits; they should not have to be borrowed. We should not have money given back to us which we shall have to pay back again, money which has been borrowed. We should get tax reductions from savings of expenditures, and of course that is what we have not got.

Another thing I should like to point out is that this is inflation. It is going counter to what wise nations such as Britain and United States are doing. They are turning away from inflation and we are going further into it. I also want to point out that though we are apt to forget these people, this is anoher blow to that great element in the community who are not able to keep pace with rising costs. We are also inclined to forget that they are still suffering from high costs. I refer to the people on fixed incomes.

After these pleasant boastings let us come back and, as I say, try to remind ourselves of some of the facts of life, try to remind ourselves of those people who, as I said, have not tasted the good things of life, and are not going to taste very much of these good things that we have now. I am going to remind you of some of the things that have not been done. We have been told tonight of the things we hope are going to be done if the pleasant future painted for us turns out to be a reality. But we have been told of nothing that is to be done for the people who at the present time are suffering, and we have been told nothing about the other neglects, of government neglect not only of the unemployed but neglect with regard to trade, because after all some of the things which are very real and which the minister did not refer to will have to be dealt with. As we all know, it has been a great disappointment to us that apparently nothing at all has been done with regard to improving the position of commonwealth trade. Yet, of course, we are still asked to believe that complete wisdom resides on the government benches.

We come now to the deficit, which is not a good thing. There is not a word to indicate any sense of uneasiness. There is not a suggestion that there is any chagrin. Certainly there is not a suggestion of any apology to the people of Canada. But after several years of booming times, of good times, they have not been able to organize the economy so people can get work. After all, in two general elections we were told that everything was going to be taken care of.

What do we find now? We find that in this community of ours there is unbalance. Is it natural, is it right that there should be 613,000 people applying for employment on February 15, or that there should be 379,000 out of jobs and seeking work? Both these figures are substantially greater than they were the month before. That does not sound like this pleasant excursion that we have been taking where everything in the garden was lovely. Yet is there any suggestion of any kind that anything could have been done better than it has been done? Not a word. The Government, like Louis XIV, have come to believe that they are the state, and that what they do is right. No long ago when I ask a question the Minister of Finance really answered by saying, "Have we not been in power 20 years?" That was an answer I did not expect to get from him. I have had that from other people. The minister laughs. He can look it up.

As we survey what has been done; as we ask questions about unemployment and what has been done about trade, and as we get no answer I am reminded—I think I used this illustration once before—of the French exercises we did. They were not very well constituted. They might have been done much better. They were always in the form of question and answer, and the answer never had anything to do with the question. The question would be, "Have you the axe of the butcher?" The answer would be, "No, but I have the pen of the Sunday school teacher." In the same way we ask the government, "Have you done anything to improve employment? Have you done anything in regard to trade?" The answer comes back, "No, but in the Historic Sites and Monuments Act we have provided stenographic assistance for the members of the board."

I want to say a word about unemployment tonight. It is an old topic. My remarks will not be very long. I want to say a word about the debate that took place because it seemed to me—and of course I may be a little prejudiced—that as we talked about it we were distressed, as the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) said, about cold bodies and empty stomachs. It seemed to me that on the other side they were talking about figures; they were talking about economic conditions. When we said there were hundreds of thousands of people unemployed the answer was "Well, there are millions employed." And that was true, of course. But what good did it do to those who were unemployed? That was the answer we got. As the hon. member for Hamilton West said, you cannot eat Kitimat; and you cannot eat this budget, either.

I just want to add a word to what I am saying about unemployment, because I think it is symptomatic. I did not take part in that debate but I watched it for a day and I was absoluely amazed by two things. I was amazed first of all that the government did not seem to be taking it seriously. The Prime Minister sat it out.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: I was surprised by that.

Mr. Speaker: It is not because at this particular moment the hon. member has happened to refer to the attitude of the Prime Minister in the last debate that I am interrupting him. I assure the hon. member that he may refer to the situation with respect to employment at this particular moment, but he cannot refer to a previous debate which has already been concluded. I ask him not to review the situation with respect to a debate which has been concluded. I thought he was merely going to make a passing reference to that and therefore did not interrupt him, but I find that at this moment he seems to be very much engaged in that direction and I must ask him to come back to an observance of the rules.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, as always I shall defer to your ruling. I shall change slightly what I was going to say. I am sure you will allow me to ask the Prime Minister a question. I should like to ask him whether he is happy about the employment conditions which exist in the province of Quebec, particularly in his own city. I am sorry the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) has gone, as I intended to ask him whether he is satisfied. I want to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) whether employment in New Brunswick and particularly in his own riding is good. I want to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) how things are in St. Lawrence-St. George.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Marler: Ask the hon. member from that riding.

Mr. Macdonnell: I feel confident that not one of these hon. gentlemen will answer that he is satisfied, nor will anyone else.

I hope I am within the rules when I say that I think these questions demand answers now, and we should not have to wait for these predictions which the minister hopes are going to turn out or which may turn out. There was a headline in one of the papers the other day with reference to what the Prime Minister had said, which read "Woes temporary". I would say in answer to that that life is also temporary. It will not help those who are unemployed to be told that their woes are temporary.

I have tried to indicate what seems to me to be the situation respecting this budget. We are going to be given some money which will be borrowed. The minister has taken a most optimistic view of our expectations for the year, far more optimistic than any I have seen. He is going to borrow this money and hopes that by the time the year is over it will turn out that he has not had to borrow much.

I contend that these tax reductions should have come through savings. I say that there are no thanks due to the government for them. The reason we have not had these reductions sooner is that there has been no true economy. A great deal is said about economy, but if you examine it you will find that we are to spend next year, apart from defence, approximately as much as we are spending this year. It was pointed out by Blair Fraser in Maclean's magazine the other day that our civil service list is up this year by about 9,000, and is going to be up another 8,000 next year. For example, there are 89 architects throughout the service.

While everyone in this chamber has the interests of the civil service at heart and wants to do everything he can for them, the very fact that their numbers are diluted by adding thousands weakens their position and makes it harded than ever to do what one would like to do for those who are there. Next year we will have a bill of something like $50 million for the additions to the civil service. That is the kind of thing we are entitled to expect this government to do something about.

This excursion in optimism, pleasant as it has been, is something like the flowers that bloom in the spring. I will not say that it has nothing to do with the case, but it does not cover the situation. There are other pressing things to be done about which we have heard nothing but about which we hope to hear much more later. The government has tried by means of this gratuity to spread things thin and give something to as many people as possible in order to create a good impression, but we shall see whether the taxpayers are taken in by this simple device.

On motion of Mr. Macdonnell the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: My understanding is that the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace was about to complete his remarks on the motion to go into supply, and as we have ten minutes we could probably carry that motion tonight if there were no other speakers and then have tomorrow free for the continuation of the debate on external affairs. I do not know whether there are other speakers, but I understand there are not.

Mr. Rowe: You have done pretty well today, and you had better call it a day.

Mr. Harris: If that were the case we could go on with that item.

Mr. Drew: I certainly wish to see the business of this house facilitated, but I believe it is a time-honoured practice for a partial answer to be given on behalf of the opposition to the budget speech and then for the house to adjourn. I think it would be well for that practice to be followed tonight.

Mr. Harris: I just make one caveat, that it has not been a time-honoured practice except in recent years. However, I have no objection, but I do hope hon. members will carry both motions tomorrow, because I think they should be completed before we leave. Therefore I move the adjournment of the house.

It is my understanding that the hon. member for Greenwood does not desire to resume his remarks until the Tuesday after we come back. Accordingly this debate will be continued on Tuesday for the balance of that week.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.50 p.m.

FOREWORD

The purpose of these Papers is twofold:

1. to present a general economic review of 1954, bringing together in one place and in convenient form some of the more comprehensive indicators of economic conditions prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and other Government Agencies, together with brief comments;

2. to present a preliminary review of the Government accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1955.

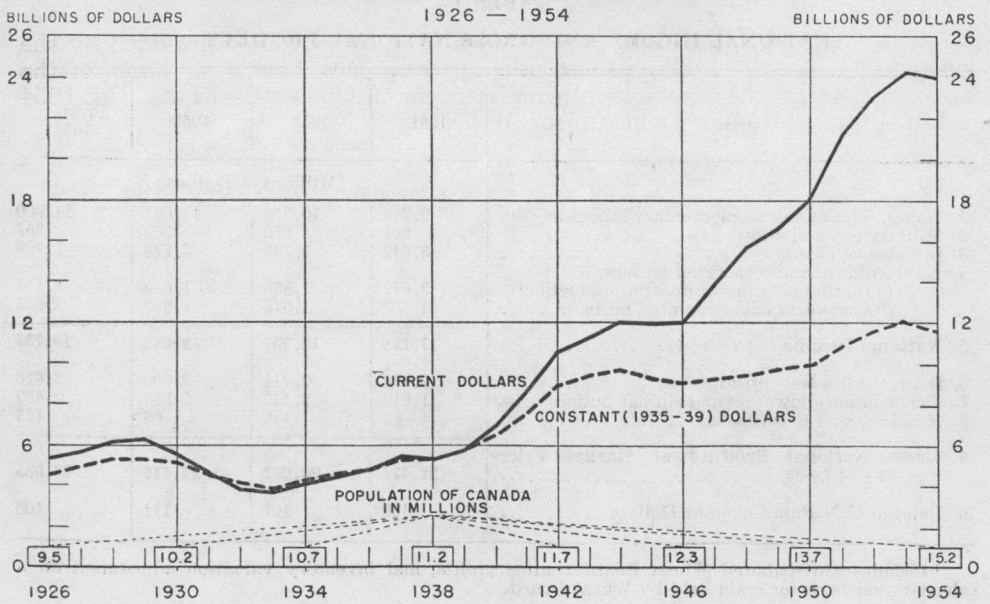
THE NATIONAL ACCOUNTS



National Income and Product

Gross national product for 1954 is estimated at $24·0 billion, a decline of $·4 billion from 1953. This indicates a reduction of 2 per cent in terms of value; but in terms of volume or real product the decline may have been slightly larger. The decline in production for 1954 is in sharp contrast with the large gains of the four years 1950 to 1953; and came about despite a further increase in the potential of the economy, because the effect of some slackening in aggregate demand was combined with a large and fortuitous reduction in the western grain crop. During the year population increased by 3 per cent. Despite an increase of 1 per cent in the civilian labour force, there was a small decrease in the number of people employed. Unemployment was in consequence substantially above the levels of 1953.

For the most part, the decline in production was confined to the goods producing industries, particularly agriculture and manufacturing. The reduction in agricultural output was itself equal to about 2 per cent of gross national product. But this decline was the result of natural and uncontrollable factors and its impact was partly offset by the existence of large inventories of grain. In this sense it was less significant than the shrinkage in manufacturing output which was a reflection of weakened demand. The largest offsets to these two major declines were provided by the continuing expansion of services and by increases in the primary industries other than agriculture, notably in mining. There was also some gain in the construction industry where increases in home building more than outweighed the decline in non-residential construction.

Although production in 1954 was lower for the year as a whole than in 1953, there was an upturn in the volume of production in the last quarter of the year. The fourth quarter estimate of gross national product exclusive of agriculture was higher on a seasonally adjusted basis than any previous quarter in either 1954 or 1953. At the same time the index of industrial production, which was consistently below 1953 throughout the first nine months of 1954, exceeded the 1953 level in the fourth quarter. This was partly the result of increased activity in mining, exaggerated in the year-to-year comparison because strikes adversely affected production in the latter part of 1953. Although non-durable manufactures showed some increase, manufacturing as a whole remained below the 1953 level largely because of continued slackness in the iron and steel and transportation equipment industries.

Salaries and wages, inclusive of military pay and allowances, increased by $297 million or 2 per cent in 1954 compared with an increase of 8 per cent in the previous year. All of the increase was accounted for by higher rates of pay since there was a decline of about 1 per cent in the number of paid workers. For the three-year period following 1951 labour income increased by $2,350 million, almost 1½ times the total increase in national income. Farm income and corporation profits were both at peak levels in 1951 and have declined in each year since then. As a result, labour income grew from 58 per cent of national income in 1951 to 65 per cent in 1954—the highest percentage in the last twenty years.

Net farm income declined by almost one-third from the previous year's level. Most of this decline was the result of the poor western grain crop. The reduction in farm cash income was considerably smaller than the reduction in farm net income and amounted to about 12 per cent. This was because the effect on cash income of a lower volume of production was partially offset by the running down of farm inventories. In areas other than the prairie provinces there was actually a modest gain in farm cash income. During the year there was a slight increase in the agricultural labour force, a change from the downward trend which has been noticeable for some time.

Net income of unincorporated businesses other than farming is estimated to have decreased by about 3 per cent. This decline was concentrated in manufacturing and retail trade.

Investment income is estimated to have declined by $66 million or 2 per cent in 1954. But within this total there were opposite tendencies. Corporation profits, the largest single component, fell for the third successive year; and this decline, estimated at 7 per cent, brought the total to about 15 per cent below the peak of 1951. The decline of 1954 reflects the weakening of demand as well as the generally more competitive conditions induced by growth in capacity and supply. Interest and rents, the other major part of investment income, are estimated to have increased by about 12 per cent under the combined influence of somewhat higher rents and increases in the stock of housing and the amount of interest-bearing securities outstanding.

National Expenditure

During 1954 gross national expenditure fell by 2 per cent. There was a sizeable decrease in the amount of capital expenditure; exports and defence spending were lower and the economy received no such stimulus as in 1953 from additions to inventories. But consumer expenditure continued to grow.

Consumer expenditure rose from $15,115 million in 1953 to $15,581 million in 1954, an increase of $466 million or 3 per cent compared with the increase of $752 million or 5 per cent in 1953. This increase in consumer spending together with increased expenditure for new housing was an important sustaining influence although its effect was outweighed by the cessation of investment in inventories and by the declines in exports, in capital formation and in outlays for defence. As in 1953, the increase in consumer expenditure was closely related to the growth in labour income noted above.

Government expenditure on goods and services remained relatively stable in 1954, the 9 per cent decrease in defence spending being offset by increases in non-defence spending at federal, provincial and municipal levels. Defence spending which had been a very powerful stimulant for the economy in 1952 and which had acted positively although with lesser strength in 1953, declined by $179 million in 1954 and this accounted for some of the reduction in aggregate demand.

[1] Minor adjustments have been made to the figures of current receipts and payments shown in Table 13 and in "The Canadian Balance of International Payments, 1951 to 1954", Dominion Bureau of Statistics, to achieve consistency with the other component series.

For the first time in the post-war period, investment in non-residential construction and machinery and equipment declined. The major decrease was in machinery and equipment although there was a decline of about 2 per cent in non-residential construction. Investment in housing on the other hand continued to increase and was 9 per cent higher than in the previous year.

Inventories of farm grain and livestock and grain in commercial channels declined by $157 million in 1954, a change of $353 million from 1953 when there had been heavy accumulation. This was largely the result of the poor western grain crop. The change in business inventories was also quite different than in 1953 as lower levels of sales and expectations reduced the willingness to hold inventories. In the first three quarters of 1953 there had been continuous inventory accumulation and despite some decline in the fourth quarter, the effect for the year as a whole was positive and substantial. The change from moderately heavy additions to inventory in 1953 to a slight reduction in 1954 as a whole had the effect of withdrawing demand from the Canadian economy; and this withdrawal was greater than the whole increase in consumer spending. The effect of this inventory movement was greatest in the second and third quarters when there was heavy liquidation and new demands were to this extent met from stocks instead of setting production in motion. In the fourth quarter of 1954, however, the inventory decline appears to have been less than the normal seasonal movement and this suggests that growth factors have reasserted their influence.

Personal Income and its Disposition

Personal income differs from national income in a number of ways although the components of these two totals are for the most part similar or identical. While national income is the total of the annual earnings of Canadian residents from the production of goods and services, personal income is the sum of the current receipts of income regardless of whether these receipts are earnings from production. For example, personal income includes only that part of corporation profits which is actually received by Canadian persons as dividends.

[1] Excludes undistributed profits of the Wheat Board and an inventory valuation adjustment on a calendar year basis for grain held by the Wheat Board.
[2] Includes all government debt interest paid to persons.

On the other hand, transfer payments such as family allowances, old age pensions, veterans' benefits and charitable contributions of corporations, are part of personal income although they are not payments for services and, therefore, do not form part of national income.

For the first time in the post-war period there was during 1954 very little increase in personal income. A modest gain in labour income and increases in investment income and transfer payments were more or less offset by a large decline in net farm income.

Because of the great similarity in their composition, national income and personal income normally change in the same direction. In 1954, however, differences in their composition account for the fact that personal income rose slightly while national income declined by $351 million. Thus, national income was affected by the decline of $170 million in corporation profits, whereas personal income excludes this item but includes instead dividends paid out which rose by $31 million. Similarly, national income does not include government transfer payments but the $140 million increase in this item was reflected in personal income. Most of the increase in transfer payments was the result of a rise of approximately 50 per cent in unemployment insurance benefits and the normal growth in the numbers receiving family allowances and old age pensions.

The pattern of the disposition of personal income differed somewhat from 1953. With comparative stability in both personal income and personal direct taxes the growth of about 3 per cent in consumer expenditure resulted in some decline in the rate of personal saving. Thus personal saving, or the amount set aside from current personal income, constituted 6·8 per cent of disposable income in 1954 compared with 9·2 per cent in 1953. In absolute terms personal saving fell from $1,539 million in 1953 to $1,137 million in 1954, a decline of $402 million, of which about half represented a reduction in saving in the form of farm inventories. The growth in personal assets was even more sharply reduced in 1954 than the $402 million reduction in personal saving would indicate; for personal saving takes many forms and involves changes in both assets and liabilities.

During 1954 personal assets and personal liabilities both increased, but by very much smaller amounts than in 1953. The growth in liquid assets was much slower, the heavy liquidation of Government of Canada market securities being only partially offset by an increase above 1953 levels in additions to bank deposits and to holdings of Canada Savings bonds and other bonds and stocks. Direct investment was also lower since the drop in farm investment in machinery and equipment more than offset increased investment in housing. On the liability side, consumer debt is estimated to have increased by $125 million compared with the much larger increase of $314 million in 1953. The increase in mortgage debt, on the other hand, was greater than in the previous year.

The increase in consumer spending was confined to non-durable goods and to services. The largest percentage increase was in services, which rose by more than 6 per cent. However, somewhat more than half of this increase was attributable to higher prices. There was an increase of 3 per cent in expenditure on non-durable goods and with prices relatively unchanged this represented a volume increase of like amount. There was a sizeable decline of 6 per cent in spending on durable goods and with prices slightly lower than in the previous year the volume decline was probably about 5 per cent. The largest factor in the decline in durable goods was the reduction in purchases of automobiles.

Examination of the quarterly trends in consumer expenditure indicates that 1954 expenditures were consistently above those of 1953 and that the rate of advance was uniform. Thus, each quarter of 1954 was about 3 per cent above the comparable quarter of 1953. After allowing for price changes, the volume of total consumer expenditure rose by about 2 per cent for the year.

Source and Disposition of Saving

Saving is the source from which investment expenditure is financed. In addition to personal saving, which is discussed in the preceding section, there is business saving and government saving.

It is estimated that during 1954 the nation as a whole saved $895 million less than in 1953, a decline of 18 per cent. The decline was confined for the most part to the personal and government sectors. Thus, business saving, which declined only slightly, became relatively more important in 1954 and constituted 75 per cent of the nation's total saving compared with 63 per cent in 1953, 59 per cent in 1952 and 52 per cent in 1951.

Throughout the post-war period 1947 to 1953 the combined total of revenues for all levels of government had exceeded the combined total of expenditures both capital and current. That is, there had been government saving of substantial amount. In 1954, however, the surplus for all levels of government combined all but disappeared. This was almost wholly the result of the change in the federal accounts from a moderate surplus in calendar year 1953 to a slight deficit in calendar year 1954; but there was also a small reduction in the combined surplus of provincial and municipal governments.

Business saving is comprised for the most part of amounts set aside by corporations for depreciation allowances and of undistributed profits. During 1954 these two major components of business saving behaved differently. It is estimated that there was a further increase of about 5 per cent in depreciation allowances. Undistributed profits, on the other hand, declined substantially, largely because of the decline in corporation profits after taxes but to some extent because of the modest increase in dividends paid out. The estimated increase in business savings through depreciation allowances was not quite as large as the decline in undistributed profits and a slight reduction in business saving out of current income for 1954 is therefore indicated. It is interesting to note the very large extent to which capital investment of the post-war period has been financed by business saving; that is, the extent to which business has been able to provide the funds for its own expansion.

It is estimated that Canada's total payments abroad on current account exceeded total receipts by $425 million and there was, therefore, an increase of like amount in net foreign liabilities. Thus, capital inflows from abroad were almost unchanged from 1953 and because of the lower level of domestic investment, slightly more important in the nation's financing. Some of the capital inflow was the result of Canadian borrowing abroad; but the greater part was initiated outside the country as capital flowed into Canada in response to opportunities for direct investment, thus contributing to the deficit on current account while furnishing the funds to finance it. These transactions are treated more fully in the section on the Balance of International Payments.

Investment and Capital Expenditure

It is estimated that investment in plant, equipment and housing amounted to $4,546 million, a decline of $294 million or 6 per cent from 1953. This is the first decline of the post-war period. Most of the reduction was in machinery and equipment which was 17 per cent lower than in 1953 but there was also a reduction of 2 per cent in non-residential construction. Investment in housing, on the other hand, continued to increase, stimulated by easier financing under the National Housing Act and aided by the increased availability of mortgage funds after the chartered banks were authorized to invest in insured loans on residential real estate. The gain of 9 per cent was less striking than the 35 per cent expansion of 1953. However, the 1954 increase marked a movement beyond an already high level whereas the rapid growth in 1953 must be considered in part as a recovery from lower levels.

Despite the decline in capital investment during 1954, it was still high in absolute and relative terms and constituted 19 per cent of gross national expenditure compared with 20 per cent in 1953. As mentioned previously, in explaining the lower aggregate demand of 1954, the cessation of growth in business inventories is an even more important factor than the decline in capital investment. Together they would account for a drop of 3 per cent in the nation's product.

Table 9 gives an industrial distribution of business capital expenditures and brings them together with public capital outlays included under government expenditure in Table 2. The total of public and private capital expenditure is estimated to have declined by $343 million or 6 per cent. As mentioned above, this is in contrast with the continued advances of the post-war period. The original forecast of capital investment for 1954 indicated that it would be about 3 per cent above the 1953 level. It was expected that there would be some declines in heavy manufacturing and in goods producing industries generally, and that these would be more than offset by an increase in the service industries and in housing. As it turned out, the expansion in the service industries and housing was not sufficient to offset the declines in the goods producing industries. Some of these declines followed the completion of projects set in motion by the post-Korean defence demands. Others were an indication of the inevitable unevenness in investment which results from the completion of individual large scale projects such as the Labrador iron ore development and Kitimat. In some instances, the bad weather of the early part of the year delayed the start of construction, and investment plans were not fully realized within the year. At any rate, the decline of 1954 does not appear to mark the beginning of a new trend since the capital forecast for 1955 indicates a further increase of about 6 per cent.

The greatest percentage decline was in agriculture and fishing which fell by $153 million or 28 per cent from 1953 to 1954. This was almost wholly the result of reduced purchases of machinery and equipment.

In the manufacturing group, there was a large overall decline of $174 million but there were also many increases. There was a large decline of $83 million in the chemical products group and this followed completion of large plants such as those at Edmonton and Sarnia. Transportation equipment declined by $29 million largely because of the completion of Ford and General Motors expansion in 1953; iron and steel products declined by $30 million, paper products by $22 million, and clothing by $6 million. On the other hand, investment in food and beverage industries increased by $13 million, printing, publishing and allied industries by $12 million, non-metallic mineral products by $10 million, and products of petroleum and coal by $14 million.

In the utilities group, there was a decline of about 8 per cent in which the drop in machinery and equipment was about equal to the drop in construction. Within this total, central electric stations and steam railways provided the major declines, while the continued expansion of telephone facilities provided a sizeable offset. The railways continued to increase their expenditure for machinery and equipment but new construction was reduced by almost a half with the completion of the Quebec North Shore railway. Part of the decline in central electric stations can be attributed to the completion of a phase of the Adam Beck development at Niagara.

In 1954, as in 1953, the largest growth was in the trade, finance and commercial services group where the increase was about 10 per cent. This was largely the product of continued urban growth. There was also a substantial increase in investment in institutions, the growth being particularly marked in schools. The growing urbanization of the war and post-war periods has been placing increasing strains on school facilities and on municipal services generally. There was some decline in capital investment of government departments but only at the federal level where there were sizeable reductions in defence construction and capital assistance.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

Revenue and Expenditure of All Governments

In Table 10 "Government Transactions Related to the National Accounts" an attempt is made to bring together in one statement and under uniform headings, the activities of all governments in Canada on a calendar year basis.

The table is designed to include only those transactions which have relevance for the National Accounts, and consequently the surpluses or deficits shown here differ from those shown in the various public accounts. It has been necessary to adjust the governments' accounting statements of fiscal year revenue and expenditure to exclude certain transactions such as those relating to reserves, write-offs, amortization, and other similar items, as well as the purchase and sale of existing capital assets; and to include the transactions of extra-budgetary funds such as unemployment insurance, old age security, workmen's compensation and government pension funds. Total expenditure includes both current and capital expenditure but government loans and investments and debt retirement are excluded. Municipalities are for the most part on a calendar year basis but the provincial and federal fiscal year figures are adjusted to the calendar year basis. Some of the more substantial adjustments to the federal accounts are shown in the reconciliation statement appended to Table 10.

On the national accounts basis it is estimated that the revenue and expenditure of all levels of government combined were in approximate balance for the calendar year 1954 compared with the surplus of about 3 per cent indicated for 1953. Thus, viewing the operations of Canadian governments as a unit, their fiscal effect was approximately neutral in 1954; whereas they had in 1953 exerted some mild negative or restraining influence on economic activity by taking about 3 per cent more in revenue than they spent on current and capital account. Apart from disparate tendencies within these three levels of government, this broad effect was the result of comparative stability in revenues which declined by less than 1 per cent, and an increase of a little more than 2 per cent in expenditures altogether accounted for by the growth of transfer payments. In terms of specific levels of government, however, there was a moderate rise in both revenues and expenditures of provincial and municipal governments with a relatively small change in surplus. The change in the combined surplus was, therefore, almost wholly the result of the movement in the federal accounts from a moderate surplus of about 4 per cent in the calendar year 1953 to a slight deficit for the calendar year 1954. And this change in federal surplus was produced by a decline of 3 to 4 per cent in revenue coupled with a rise of less than 1 per cent in expenditure.

The fiscal effects of government operations are not, of course, confined to revenues and expenditures since cash outlays are affected also by changes in loans, advances and investments. In this sphere too the overall effect of federal government operations was moderately on the side of stimulation.

Expenditure on goods and services by all levels of government combined was practically unchanged between 1953 and 1954. This was the result of a decline in federal expenditure on goods and services and increases in provincial and municipal expenditure. The federal government's expenditure on goods and services declined by $114 million or 5 per cent compared with an increase of $56 million or 2 per cent in 1953. This change came about because of the decline of $179 million or 9 per cent in defence spending for the calendar year 1954. Although federal defence expenditure accounted for a significant part of the withdrawal of demand in 1954, it remained an important element in the overall use of goods and services comprising about 7 per cent of total gross national expenditure and providing 72 per cent of the federal government's total demand for goods and services. Federal government non-defence spending, exclusive of inventory change, increased by about 7 per cent, a considerable part of which was the result of increases in the rates of pay to government employees.

The increase in provincial and municipal expenditure on goods and services is estimated at $112 million, an increase of 6 per cent. About two-thirds of this increase was in municipal expenditure where the growth of cities continued to raise the requirements for schools and municipal facilities generally. The cost of municipal services also rose with generally higher rates of pay. In provincial governments the increase is mainly attributable to an expansion in highways expenditure and some increase in the general level of salaries and wages.

Transfer payments were substantially higher in 1954 than in 1953. The largest increases were in the federal sphere and amounted to $158 million. About half of this increase was the result of a rise in unemployment insurance benefits but there was also a substantial increase in cost as a result of the growth in the numbers receiving old age pensions and family allowances. The largest increase in provincial and municipal transfer payments was in grants to private non-commercial institutions including hospitals.

Total revenue was down very slightly by something less than 1 per cent and this decrease was in direct taxes rather than in indirect taxes. Revenue from direct taxes, which is predominantly federal, declined by 2 per cent. Receipts from the federal personal income tax are estimated to have declined very slightly, the effect of the lower rates introduced in mid-1953 being more or less offset by an increase in personal taxable income. The yield of the corporation tax on an accrual basis was down about 5 per cent for the calendar year and this is a direct reflection of the estimated decline in corporation profits.

The stability in the yield of indirect taxes came about because the decrease of about 5 per cent in federal indirect taxes was offset by an increase of about 6 per cent in provincial and municipal taxes. In the federal accounts, receipts from customs duties were less because of the fall in imports. The yield of the sales tax and of a number of excise taxes shrank with the somewhat lower level of retail sales. The special excise tax on automobiles, tires and tubes, for example, yielded almost 20 per cent less than in 1953 when automobile sales were at their peak. In addition, certain excise taxes were removed and the rates for others were reduced in the 1954 budget and this led to lower revenues. These changes included the removal of the 15 per cent special excise tax on furs, electrical household appliances, cameras, etc. and the reduction of the tax rate from 15 per cent to 10 per cent in the case of candy, soft drinks, smokers' accessories, watches, jewellery, etc. At the time of the 1954 budget the revenue loss from these reductions was estimated at $33 million. Of the increase of $77 million in provincial and municipal indirect taxes, a little more than half was in the municipal sphere and consisted in the main of an increase in real property taxes. In the provincial governments there was some increase in the yield of the gasoline tax but the increased yield resulting from the higher rate of sales tax in British Columbia was even more important.

MONETARY AND CREDIT DEVELOPMENTS

Monetary and credit conditions in 1954 were characterized by a noticeable decline in interest rates, by a rise in security prices, and by a generally easier availability of credit in Canada. These conditions considerably facilitated capital and consumer expenditures financed by borrowing or by converting securities into cash, and brought about a substantial increase in the bank deposits and currency holdings of the general public.

The decline in Canadian interest rates in 1954 represented a continuation of the trend which had become evident in the last quarter of the previous year. The main fall in rates on long-term government bonds occurred in the first quarter, but short-term yields continued to decline throughout the year. In the early part of the year particularly, declining interest rates in the United States had important direct and psychological effects on yields in Canada. In the second half of the year, the Canadian chartered banks were active buyers of securities and were a major factor in the change of interest yields. The 1954 revision of The Bank Act had the effect of increasing the amount of cash reserves which the chartered banks felt free to employ in expanding their earning assets. Prior to this revision, which took effect on July the first, the banks had been required to maintain a daily cash ratio of not less than 5 per cent, although they had in practice worked to a figure of about 10 per cent. The revised Act set the new minimum reserve ratio at a monthly average of 8 per cent. The chartered banks immediately began to work towards lower ratios and their average reserve declined to 8·7 per cent at the year end compared to 10·2 per cent at the end of 1953. In consequence, the chartered banks were in a position to add substantially to their assets during the second half of 1954.

As the demand for loans had levelled off, the banks employed their free reserves in the purchase of government bonds, treasury bills and other types of securities. At the same time, an increase in day-to-day loans made by the banks enabled dealers to increase their demand for short-term securities. These factors, together with a reduction in the outstanding supply of short-term maturities, contributed to the decline in medium and short term interest rates. The importance of chartered bank purchases is indicated by the fact that during the year as a whole they added $553 million of all types of Government of Canada securities to their portfolios, while the total outstanding declined by $175 million due to government redemptions. In the early part of 1955, the banks again added to their security holdings, thereby contributing to a further decline in interest rates, which in some cases reached levels below those prevailing in the United States.

The small increase in bank loans in 1954 was in contrast to 1953 when bank loans increased substantially, and reflects among other things the decline of business inventories, and the reduced rate of growth in consumer credit. The new day-to-day loans and insured residential mortgages which were introduced during the year more than accounted for the modest over-all increase, as there was a slight decline in the combined total of other categories of loans. Day-to-day loans were $68 million at the year-end while net disbursements under residential mortgage loans were $74 million, with commitments totalling a further $86 million, involving in all some 17,000 housing units. On balance, the net effect of the activities of the chartered banks in 1954 on the public's holdings of liquid assets was small in comparison to the previous year, the increase being $19 million compared to $466 million in 1953.

The public's holdings of currency, bank deposits, and Government of Canada securities increased in 1954 by $232 million, compared to $264 million in 1953 and stood at the record year-end level of $18,860 million. The main factor leading to this increase was the excess of $227 million of cash outlays over receipts in the federal government sector. This was the result of both budgetary and non-budgetary transactions, as well as of changes in government loans and advances and the operations of the Unemployment Insurance Fund and other government accounts. These net disbursements in 1954 were in sharp contrast to the experience of 1953 when there was an overall surplus of receipts over disbursements of $220 million which partially offset the increase of $466 million in the public's liquid assets stemming from the operations of the chartered banks.

The increase of $232 million in the public's quick assets differed in composition, as well as in origin, from the increase in 1953. There was a pronounced shift into bank deposits in 1954 with active deposits increasing $272 million compared to a decrease of $91 million in 1953, and inactive notice deposits rising $501 million compared to a rise of $82 million in the previous year. At the same time public holdings of Government of Canada securities, which had increased by $221 million in the previous year, decreased by $570 million despite an increase in holdings of non-market securities, mainly Canada Savings Bonds. There was also a shift towards the more liquid types of market securities such as treasury bills. The sharply increased liquidity of the general public as a result of the shift from government securities to bank deposits was effected mainly through the chartered bank purchases of securities discussed above. The redemption operations of the Government of Canada also played some part in this development.

The increased supply of money in the hands of the public, together with the lower interest rates and security yields prevailing during the year created a favourable climate for new provincial, municipal and corporate borrowing. Net new issues rose by about 12 per cent to an estimated $1,132 million in 1954, with borrowings abroad being substantially reduced after the first quarter of the year. Consumer credit also continued to rise, although at a slower rate than in the previous year, the increase being of the order of $125 million compared to $314 million in 1953. Mortgage credit also expanded further, with the main supply coming from resident life insurance companies who sold about $110 million of government securities compared to $49 million in 1953 in order to finance their increased volume of new investments. As indicated above, the chartered banks were also an important source of credit in the field of new residential construction. Although non-residents continued to be sellers of Government of Canada securities, there was, on balance, a net inflow of funds for all types of outstanding Canadian securities of $55 million, and this development, together with the net inflow of capital for investment in new issues, contributed to the buoyancy of Canadian security markets in 1954.

BALANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

Canada's international payments and receipts reflected in 1954 the somewhat lower level of domestic economic activity and the maintenance of relatively firm international markets. Merchandise exports and imports were both lower than in 1953. The decline of 5 per cent in the value of exports was the result of a volume reduction of 3 per cent combined with a decline of 2 per cent in export prices; while the 7 per cent decline in the value of imports was wholly the result of a volume reduction. The terms of trade, or the ratio of export prices to import prices, were therefore slightly less favourable to Canada and consequently the greater volume decline in imports was not fully reflected in an improvement in the balance on merchandise account. Nevertheless, there was a small surplus of $9 million in merchandise trade in 1954 compared with the deficit of $57 million in 1953. Taking into account non-merchandise trade as well, the current account deficit of $427 million in 1954 was only slightly changed from the $439 million deficit of 1953.

The total value of merchandise exports in 1954 was $3,929 million, down by $223 million from 1953. The decline resulted for the most part from special situations and was concentrated in a few commodities such as wheat and other grains, motor vehicles, primary iron and steel, and items related to defence needs such as aircraft and parts and electrical apparatus. Wheat exports showed the greatest single decline. Part of this was the result of better crops in other parts of the world but there was in addition some running down of stocks in anticipation of lower prices. In addition, there was a decline in the value of wheat flour and coarse grain exports, bringing the fall in grain exports as a whole to almost $300 million or considerably more than the total decline in exports. It is apparent, therefore, that apart from grain exports and the other commodities mentioned above, Canadian exports maintained their 1953 levels or showed substantial gains. The most marked increase was in exports of forestry products with newsprint reaching the highest value ever recorded for a single commodity in a calendar year. Fishery products, chemicals and base metals, particularly nickel, also recorded substantial gains over 1953.

Despite a decline of 7 per cent in 1954, imports remained at relatively high levels. Imports amounted to $3,920 million in 1954 compared with $4,209 million in 1953, a drop of $289 million. In contrast to exports, the decline in imports was fairly general with agricultural products as a group showing the only significant increase. The moderately lower level of economic activity in Canada during 1954 reduced requirements for both industrial materials and many finished consumer goods. Poor weather in the early part of the year also reduced the demand for materials and equipment used in construction. In addition, a more cautious inventory policy on the part of business contributed to the lower level of imports. This last factor was especially important in the case of textiles which were also affected by a weaker Canadian market for products using textiles in their manufacture. Imports of farm implements also showed a substantial decline as a result of lower farm income. Other major decreases occurred in the import of automobile parts because of the lower output of automobiles, and in coal as a result of the substitution of oil for fuel uses.

The customary deficit on non-merchandise account widened from $382 million in 1953 to an estimated $436 million in 1954, an increase of $54 million. Both payments and receipts fell below their 1953 levels with the greatest declines taking place in the freight account. This was a reflection of lower levels of trade in 1954 and further transfers of ships from Canadian registry. Interest and dividend receipts also showed a decline while payments showed a marked increase reflecting rising payments on earlier direct investment by foreigners in Canada and on Canadian issues held abroad. Travel expenditures by Canadians abroad were higher while receipts on this account were slightly lower than in the previous year. There was some drop in payments because of the large non-recurring military expenditures in 1953. The net result of these movements was that non-merchandise receipts declined from $1,360 million in 1953 to $1,296 million in 1954, a drop of $64 million. Payments fell by only $10 million from $1,742 million in 1953 to $1,732 million in 1954.

There were no significant changes in the direction of Canadian exports and imports in 1954. The decline in total exports was widely distributed. The lower value of exports to the United States was partly a consequence of reduced economic activity in that country in the early part of the year. On the other hand, the decline in exports to Commonwealth countries, including the United Kingdom, and to other overseas countries can be attributed almost entirely to lower exports of wheat and, to a lesser extent, motor vehicles. Apart from these items most other Canadian exports to these markets showed a strong upward trend. This was particularly true of the United Kingdom and Europe and is related to high levels of industrial activity as well as to increased liberalization of dollar trade and payments in those countries.

BALANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

The decline in imports was concentrated in trade with the United States and the United Kingdom. The declines were mainly in consumer durable goods and machinery from the United States, in fibres and textiles from the United Kingdom and in iron and steel imports from both countries. Imports from the rest of the sterling area, Europe and all other overseas countries showed an increase, with the exception of imports from Latin America which declined fractionally from the previous year's level.

Excluding the movement in official reserves, the net inflow of capital into Canada in 1954 was considerably larger than in 1953. There were as well some changes in the components of the capital account. Direct investment was slightly lower, reflecting the somewhat lower level of activity and the effect of bad weather in hampering development of the western oil fields. The total value of new Canadian securities issued abroad was also lower as a result of the decline of Canadian rates of interest relative to rates in the United States. The net proceeds from these issues were further reduced by large capital retirements. In contrast to 1953, there was however a substantial net inflow of capital arising from dealings in outstanding Canadian issues. The outflow resulting from repatriation of government securities was somewhat larger than in 1953, but this was more than offset by an increase of $100 million in non-resident net purchases of common and preferred stocks of Canadian corporations. The operations of United States investment funds played an important part in this latter development. Other capital movements also resulted in a small inflow in 1954 compared with the large outflows of 1952 and 1953.

The total net inward movement of capital was more than sufficient to cover the deficit on current account and official exchange reserves rose by $124 million during the year and the Canadian dollar remained at a premium over the United States dollar. Official reserves of gold and United States dollars were $1,942 million at December 31, 1954, as compared with $1,818 million at December 31, 1953. At the same dates, the United States dollar was $.96 19/32 and $.97 3/8, respectively, in terms of the Canadian dollar. In recent weeks the premium on the Canadian dollar has been somewhat less and the noon rate of exchange on the United States dollar in Canadian funds was $98\frac{9}{32}$ on March 29, 1955.

EMPLOYMENT AND EARNINGS

Employment in 1954 reflected the weakening of demand and the more competitive conditions which became evident in some sections of the economy in the latter part of 1953. The growth in the labour force was accompanied by a decline in employment and there was consequently some increase in unemployment. The number of persons without jobs and seeking work rose from an average of 137,000 in 1953 to 232,000 in 1954. The average number of persons employed in 1954 was 5,194,000 compared with 5,246,000 in 1953.

Although the demand for labour was stronger in 1953 than in 1954, this was less true of the last quarter of the year. Thus, in 1953 employment was relatively high for the first three quarters of the year but conditions deteriorated noticeably in the last quarter. This deterioration continued into 1954 and each month from January to September showed lower employment than the comparable month of the preceding year. However, at the beginning of the fourth quarter of 1954 the number of people with jobs was approximately equal to the number at the same time in 1953; and in December of 1954 employment was considerably above the level of December 1953 although because of the expansion of the labour force the number without jobs and seeking work was also higher. Total industrial employment increased slightly in the last quarter of 1954 and the decline relative to 1953 was less pronounced than for the first three quarters of the year. Employment in non-durable manufactures and in construction showed a similar pattern. In forestry and mining the level of employment was actually higher than had prevailed in the last quarter of 1953. In the service sector the first three quarters of the year had shown a gain over the comparable period of 1953; and this gain was continued into the fourth quarter.

The number of persons without jobs and seeking work averaged 4.3 per cent of the labour force in 1954 compared with 2·5 per cent in 1953. The highest unemployment was reached in March of 1954 when there were 321,000 persons without jobs and seeking work or 147,000 more than the number for the same month in 1953. The point of lowest unemployment was reached in September 1954 with 168,000 jobless persons looking for work or 83,000 more than in September 1953. In January 1955 the number of persons without jobs and seeking work was 363,000 or 80,000 above the level of the comparable month in 1954; and in February 1955 the number of persons without jobs and looking for work was 379,000 or 64,000 more than in February 1954.

Despite the fact that employment averaged a little less in 1954 than in 1953 there was an increase of about 2 per cent in total labour income. Thus, the higher rates of pay in 1954 more than offset the combined effect of reduced employment and a slightly shorter working week. The average annual earnings per paid worker rose from $2,940 in 1953 to $3,034 in 1954, an increase of 3 per cent. Since 1951 average earnings per paid worker have risen by almost 17 per cent. Most of this increase represents a gain in real income, for the upward movement in prices, as indicated by the consumer price index, has only amounted to 2 per cent.

The greater part of the 8 per cent increase in labour income for 1953 was concentrated in the first half of the year. There was very little growth for the last half of the year and the seasonally adjusted figures indicate a slight decline in total earnings between the fourth quarter of 1953 and the first quarter of 1954. The moderate rise in total labour income for 1954 was distributed fairly evenly over the last three quarters of the year.

Finance and other services was the only industrial group in which the total of wages and salaries advanced at a faster rate in 1954 than in 1953 and this increase amounted to 9 per cent. The total of wages and salaries paid in the primary industries rose by 2 per cent during 1954. In public utilities, transportation, storage and trade there was a moderate increase slightly greater than for labour income as a whole. In both manufacturing and construction on the other hand there was a small decline in aggregate earnings.

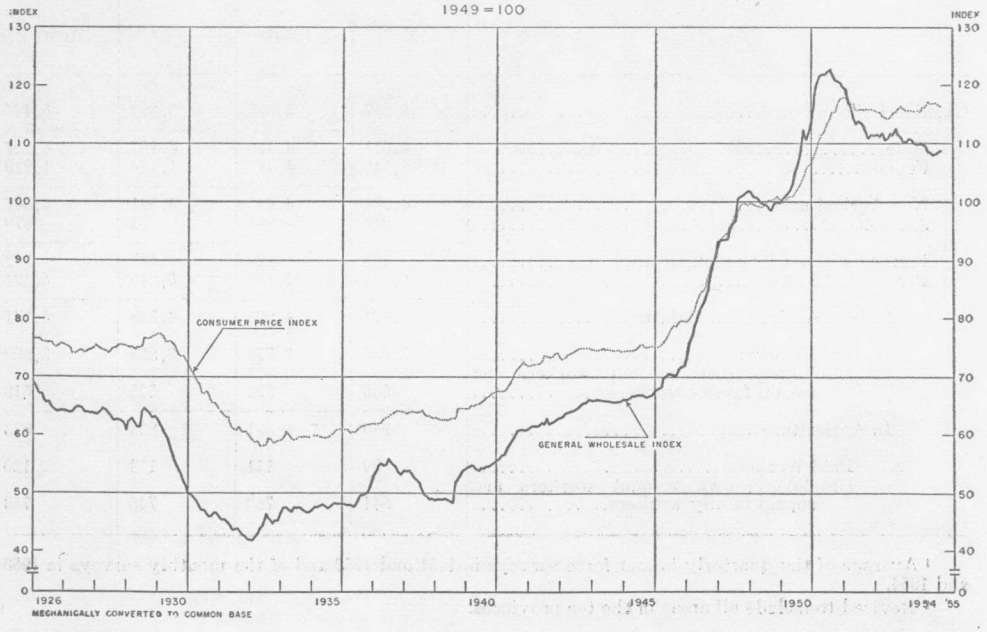
[2] Revised to include all areas in the ten provinces.

The civilian labour force, which includes both the employed and the unemployed, averaged 5,426,000 for 1954 and accounted for 52·7 per cent of the non-institutional civilian population over 14 years of age. This compares with 53·1 per cent in 1953. The agricultural labour force increased from 862,000 in 1953 to 879,000 in 1954. This increase of 17,000 is in contrast to the trend of recent years when there has been a marked shift from rural to urban occupations.



In addition to the civilian labour force, there were 115,000 men and women in the armed forces in 1954 compared with 106,000 in 1953.

PRICE TRENDS

Canadian prices were relatively stable during 1954. The consumer price index varied little more than ½ per cent from its yearly average and ended the year less than 1 per cent above the January level. The general wholesale index declined slowly but more or less steadily throughout the year and was about 2 per cent lower in December than in January. The consumer price index has been almost unchanged for about three years and the wholesale price index has declined less than 3 per cent since September 1952.

The consumer price index moved fractionally upward from an average of 115·5 in 1953 to 116·2 in 1954. This was the result of moderate increases in the price of services. The largest increase was the 2 per cent rise in the shelter index. During the year the variations in the consumer price index followed closely the variations in food prices. The food index reached a low of 110·2 in May and a high of 114·4 in August. It was half a point higher at December 1954 than at December 1953, but the average of food prices for 1954 was slightly lower than for 1953. Clothing was the only other group in which prices averaged less than in 1953. There was a fairly steady decline throughout the year and clothing prices were about 2 per cent lower at the end of the year than at the beginning and about 6 per cent lower than they had been in December 1951.

CANADIAN WHOLESALE AND CONSUMER PRICE INDEXES

The United States consumer price index also averaged a little more for 1954 than for 1953. However, in the United States the movement throughout 1954 was slightly downward both in the total index and in the food component. In Canada, as has been pointed out, the movement was slightly upward.

The Canadian index of wholesale prices declined for the third successive year. The average for the year was 2 per cent below the average of 1953; and the moderate downward course throughout the year brought the index at year-end to a point only 3 per cent above the level of June 1950. Since wholesale prices reached their peak in July 1951, following the outbreak of war in Korea, the decline in the index has amounted to 12 per cent. The slight downward movement of the wholesale index in 1954 reflected the trend for the majority of goods. In general, raw materials declined somewhat less than manufactured products. The larger decreases took place in wholesale prices for farm products and textile and iron products. However, the decline in the price of farm and textile products was considerably less than in 1953. The fall in the wholesale price for iron products was about 4 per cent compared with an increase of 1 per cent in the previous year. Exceptions to the general downward trend occurred in the case of non-metallic minerals and chemicals which moved fractionally above 1953 levels.

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS

1. INTRODUCTION

The figures which are presented in this Part must be regarded as preliminary and subject to revision. Although the Government's fiscal year ended on March 31, the books must remain open for several weeks in order to record various adjusting entries and to take into account all payments up to and including April 30 made on account of expenditures originating in and properly chargeable to the fiscal year 1954-55. Consequently the final figures when they become available next August may show some variations from those given in the following pages.

2. HIGHLIGHTS OF GOVERNMENTAL FINANCIAL OPERATIONS DURING 1954-55

The budgetary revenues of the government for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1955 are now estimated at $4,107 million. This is $357 million or about 8 per cent less than the amount of $4,464 million forecast in last year's budget speech and approximately $289 million less than the total collected in the preceding year.

Budgetary expenditures are estimated at $4,255 million which is $205 million or 4½ per cent less than the budget forecast and about $95 million less than the total spent in 1953-54.

On the basis of these figures the indicated deficit is about $148 million compared with the budget forecast of a nominal surplus of $4 million and a surplus of $46 million for 1953-54.

On the revenue side of the government's budgetary operations the most significant feature was the decline of $251 million in tax revenues. Corporation income taxes declined by $183 million, excise taxes by $53 million, customs import duties by $14 million and personal income taxes by $12 million, but these were only slightly offset by increases of $7 million in taxes on dividends, interest, rents and royalties going abroad, and $3 million in succession duties.

On the expenditure side, the most significant feature was the continued importance of defence in the government's expenditure programme. Although defence expenditures at $1,697 million were $157 million or about 8 per cent less than those of the previous year, they still constituted 40 per cent of the government's total budgetary outlay. In 1953-54, defence expenditures represented 42·6 per cent of the total.

Although the budgetary deficit was $148 million, the government made loans, advances and other non-budgetary disbursements of about $292 million and at the same time reduced the amount of its unmatured funded debt outstanding in the hands of the public by approximately $202 million. This was achieved by using the $488 million available from insurance, pension and annuity accounts receipts, the repayment of loans and advances and other non-budgetary receipts and credits, and by letting cash balances run down by $154 million.

The following table summarizes the budgetary and non-budgetary transactions and changes in cash position for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1955:

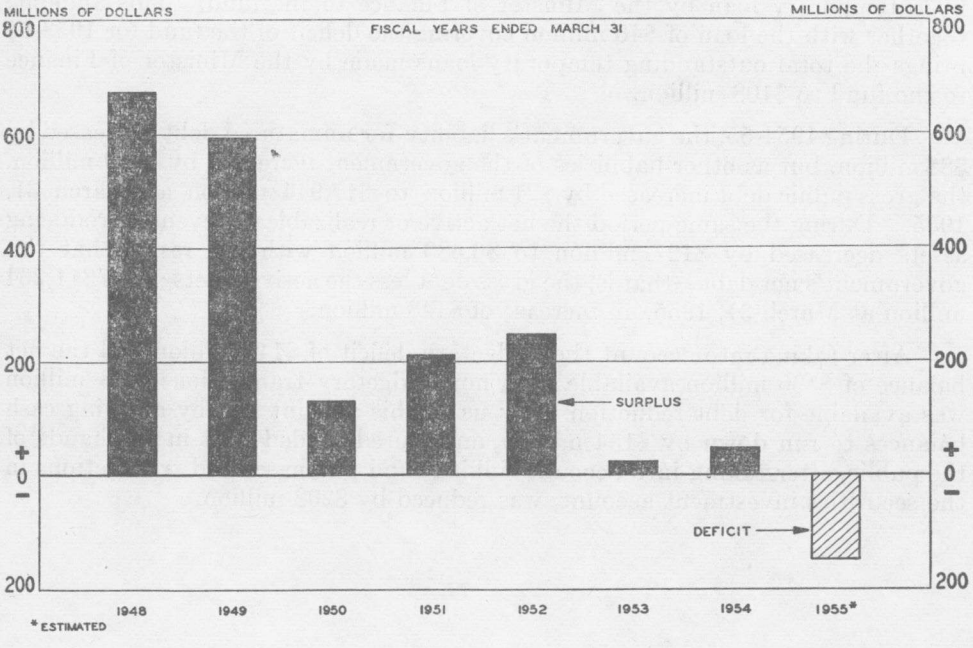
Pension payments from the old age security fund amounted to $353 million in 1954-55 and tax receipts credited to the fund amounted to $291 million with the result that there was a deficit for the year of $62 million which was covered by a temporary loan by the Minister of Finance to the fund. This amount, together with the loan of $46 million covering the deficit of the fund for 1953-54 brings the total outstanding temporary loans made by the Minister of Finance to the fund to $108 million.



During 1954-55, the government's liability for unmatured debt decreased by $88 million, but as other liabilities of the government increased by $109 million, the gross public debt increased by $21 million to $17,944 million at March 31, 1955. During the same period the net active or realizable or revenue-producing assets decreased by $127 million to $6,680 million with the result that the government's net debt—that is, the gross debt less the active assets—was $11,264 million at March 31, 1955, an increase of $148 million.

After taking into account the budgetary deficit of $148 million and the net balance of $196 million available from non-budgetary transactions, $48 million was available for debt reduction. By using this amount and by allowing cash balances to run down by $154 million, unmatured funded debt in the hands of the public, after taking into account sinking fund purchases and transactions in the securities investment account, was reduced by $202 million.

BUDGETARY REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES

BUDGETARY SURPLUS OR DEFICIT

3. THE BUDGETARY ACCOUNTS

Total revenues, at $4,107 million for 1954-55, were $289 million less than the total for 1953-54. Total expenditures at $4,255 million were $95 million less than in the previous fiscal year. The deficit for the fiscal year was $148 million compared with a surplus of $46 million for 1953-54.

A summarized statement of the estimated revenues and expenditures and deficit for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1955, with the actual figures for the fiscal years ended March 31, 1948 to 1954, inclusive, is given in the following table:

A. Revenues

Budgetary revenues amounted to $4,107 million for the fiscal year 1954-55. This is $289 million or 6·6 per cent less than the record amount of $4,396 million received in the previous year. Of the total for the year $3,753 million or 91·4 per cent was derived from taxes and $354 million or 8·6 per cent from non-tax revenues and special receipts and credits.

A statement of estimated revenues for 1954-55 classified by major categories, and the corresponding actual figures for 1953-54 is given in Table III.

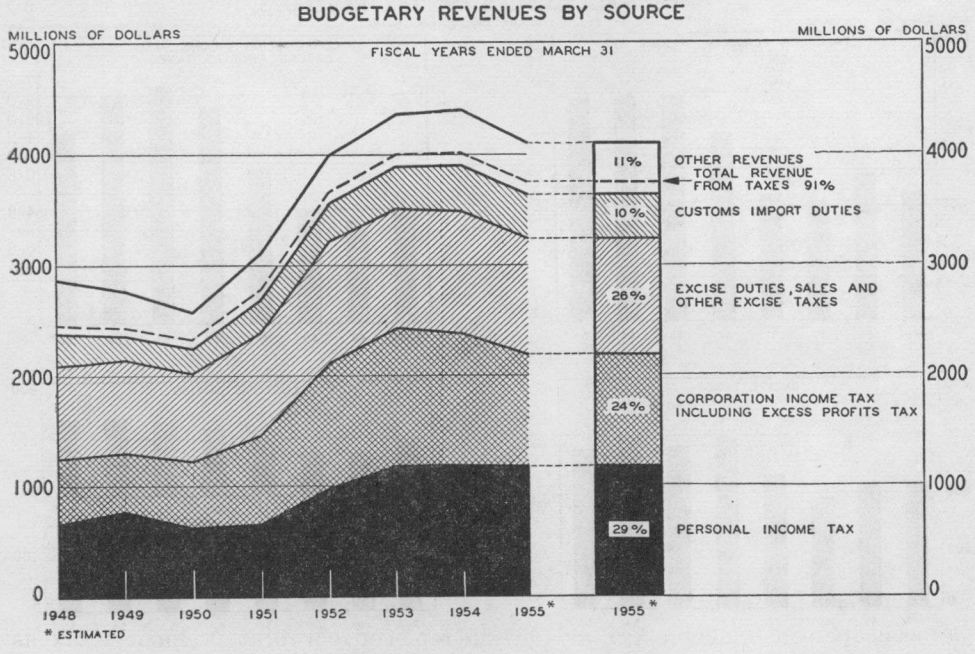
(1) Tax Revenue

Tax on Personal Incomes



The personal income tax in 1954-55 replaced corporation income tax as the largest class of government revenues. The yield (excluding the old age security tax) for the year was $1,176 million, a decrease of $12 million or 1 per cent from 1953-54. This decrease is due to the continuing effect of the 1953 tax reductions and the introduction of a personal income tax in the Province of Quebec. Tax rates on personal incomes were reduced about 11 per cent on July 1, 1953. Consequently these lower rates were in operation for only three quarters of 1953-54 but applied through all of 1954-55. The fact that the tax rates for 1954 were on the average about 6 per cent below those for 1953 was reflected in lower quarterly instalments and balances of tax paid with returns in the fiscal year 1954-55. The allowance of a credit for the Quebec income tax up to 10 per cent of the federal tax resulted in lower quarterly instalment payments of federal tax during the year for some taxpayers in Quebec and refunds to some taxpayers in that province who filed their 1954 returns before the end of the fiscal year. The influence of these factors more than offset the small increase in the total of personal incomes that took place in 1954.

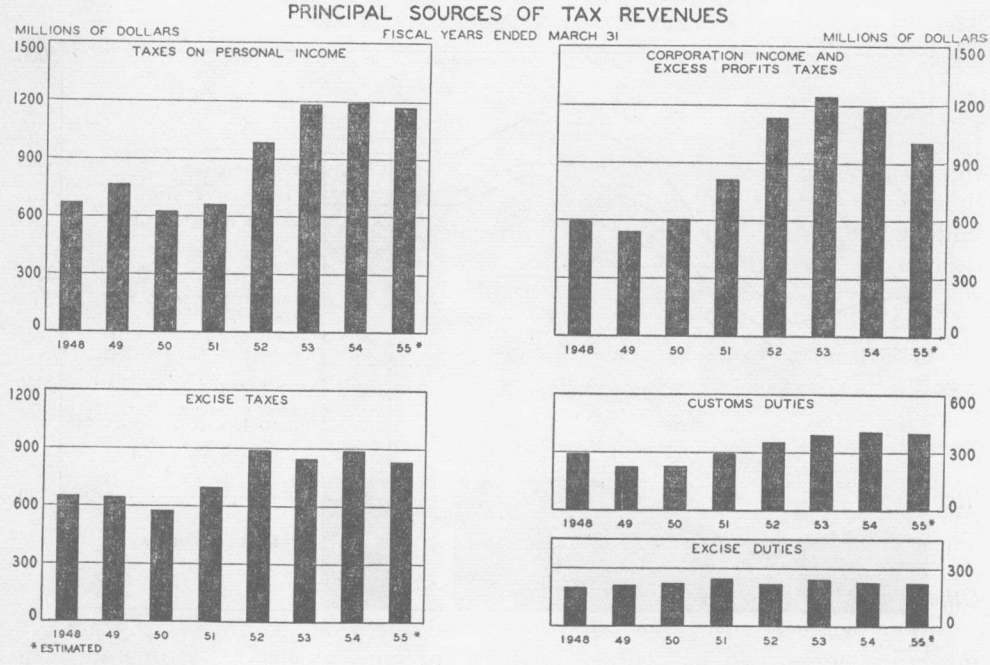
In addition the 2 per cent tax on personal incomes levied under the Old Age Security Act yielded an estimated amount of $101 million during 1954-55 compared with $91 million in 1953-54. The apparent increase in revenue from this tax during the period when the revenue from the personal income tax declined is due to the fact that the yield from this tax in 1953-54 did not represent a full year's return at the 2 per cent rate. This revenue was credited to the Old Age Security Fund.

Taxes on Interest, Dividends, Rents and Royalties Going Abroad

These revenues are derived from taxes withheld on payments of interest, dividends, rents, royalties, alimony and income from estates and trusts made to non-residents. The total of $61 million in 1954-55 is $7 million greater than in the previous year reflecting increased dividend payments during the year.

Corporation Income Tax

Corporation income tax was the second largest class of government revenue in 1954-55, being replaced as the largest revenue producer by the personal income tax. Collections (excluding the old age security tax) amounted to $1,008 million, a decrease of $183 million or 15 per cent from the previous year's total of $1,191 million. Most of this decrease is due to the lower corporation profits in 1954. However, the continuing effect of the reduction in rates announced in the 1953 budget also influenced the comparison of revenue in 1954-55 with that of the previous year because some of the collections in 1953-54 were based on the higher rates of tax in force before January 1, 1953.



The total revenue from corporation income tax includes $6·5 million paid by corporations paying the 15 per cent tax on their undistributed income. This compares with $8·8 million collected from this source in 1953-54.

In addition the 2 per cent tax levied on corporate profits under the Old Age Security Act yielded $46 million during 1954-55 compared with $56 million collected from this source in 1953-54. These collections were credited to the Old Age Security Fund.

Succession Duties

Revenues from succession duties were $42 million in 1954-55, an increase of $3 million or 7 per cent over the previous year.

PRINCIPAL SOURCES OF TAX REVENUES

Customs Import Duties

Revenue from customs import duties amounted to $393 million, a decrease of $14 million or 3½ per cent from 1953-54. This decrease in revenue reflects the decrease in the total value of imports.

Excise Duties

Excise duties are levied exclusively on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products. (Additional taxes on tobacco products are levied under the Excise Tax Act). The revenue from excise duties for the year was $227 million, only $0.3 million less than in the previous year. The receipts from the tax on alcoholic beverages, before deducting refunds, showed a decline of $2 million from the previous year but gross receipts from tobacco products were $2 million higher.

Excise Taxes

Included under this heading are the revenues from the general sales tax and the special excise taxes levied on a wide range of manufactured products. Total net collections for the year are estimated at $830 million, a decrease from 1953-54 of $53 million or 6 per cent.

The sales tax, which from the standpoint of revenue is the most important tax levied under the Excise Tax Act, yielded an estimated net revenue of $576 million in 1954-55 (excluding the 2 per cent old age security sales tax). This is $11 million or 2 per cent less than the amount of $587 million received from this source in the previous year. About $3 million of this reduction may be attributed to the exemption of certain items from tax following the 1954 budget. The remaining part of the reduction in revenue was due to the slight decrease in sales of taxable goods during the year.

Excise taxes other than sales tax yielded approximately $254 million or $42 million less than 1953-54. Approximately $33 million of this reduction in revenue is due to the reduction of the tax rate from 15 per cent to 10 per cent for a wide range of items and the repeal of the tax on certain other items such as household electrical applicances, furs, cameras and luggage following the 1954 budget. The rest of the reduction in revenue is more than accounted for by the decline in passenger automobile production during the year. The combined revenue from the tax on automobiles and tires and tubes in the year was $84 million. This was $22 million less than in the previous year.

The item showing the largest increase in revenue over the previous year was the tax on television sets, radios and tubes, which yielded $22 million or $5 million more than in 1953-54. Small increases in revenue were also realized from the tax on tobacco products and the tax on wines.

In addition the 2 per cent tax on sales levied under the Old Age Security Act yielded $144 million during 1954-55 compared with $147 million in 1953-54. These collections were credited to the Old Age Security Fund.

Other Taxes

The principal tax under this heading is the tax on the premium income of insurance companies which produced $15 million in 1954-55 compared with $14 million in the previous year. Small amounts of revenue were also received from the tax on the export of electrical energy from Canada and the tax on the export of furs from the Northwest Territories.

(2) Non-Tax Revenues

Non-tax revenues for 1954-55 are estimated at $321 million, an increase of $2·4 million over the total for 1953-54. The following table presents a comparative summary of revenues under this heading for the past two years:

TABLE IV

Post Office

Gross Post Office receipts for 1954-55 are expected to amount to $151 million. After making authorized disbursements from revenue of $21 million for salaries and rent allowances at semi-staff and revenue offices, commissions at sub-offices, transit charges on Canadian mail forwarded through or delivered in foreign countries, etc., net post office receipts credited to budgetary revenues are estimated at $130 million. The increase of $21 million in gross receipts over the corresponding amount received in 1953-54, due mainly to the increase in postal rates, is offset in part by an increase of $2 million in disbursements from revenue, chiefly on account of an increase in remuneration paid to revenue postmasters and their assistants.

As costs of operating the Post Office during 1954-55 (excluding the $21 million charged to revenue) are expected to total $124 million, net revenue will exceed net costs by approximately $6 million. However, in making this comparison it is to be noted that the total shown for post office revenues does not reflect any payment for the franking privilege covering parliamentary and departmental mail or for certain miscellaneous services provided for other government departments and agencies, nor does the total shown for operating expenses reflect any charges for premises occupied by the Post Office Department or for certain accounting and miscellaneous services provided by other departments.

Return on Investments

Return on investments is expected to yield $134 million, a decrease of $18 million from the total of $152 million received in 1953-54. The largest decrease was in the surplus of Canadian Arsenals Limited which for 1954-55 is expected to total $6 million compared with $12 million received in 1953-54. There was a decrease in profits in the Exchange Fund account of $5 million and in the profits received from the Bank of Canada of $3 million. Interest received on loans to the Canadian National Railways decreased by $4 million while interest received from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation increased by $2 million.

A comparative summary of receipts during 1954-55 and 1953-54 under this heading is given in the following table:

Premium, Discount and Exchange

Accounting adjustments with respect to premium, discount and exchange in the year under review are expected to result in a net expenditure of $1 million compared with a net revenue of $0·8 million in 1953-54. This is due mainly to exchange deficiencies resulting from the revaluation of the government's holdings of its own securities payable in United States dollars.

(3) Special Receipts and Credits

Special receipts and credits are estimated at $34 million for the fiscal year 1954-55. This is a decrease of $41 million from the total of $75 million received in the previous year. A comparative summary of the sources of special receipts and other credits for the last two years is presented in the following table:

TABLE VI

Special Receipts and Credits	Fiscal Year Ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1955 (Estimated)	1954

Miscellaneous special receipts	3·5	2·5	1·0
	33·7	74·5	−40·8

It will be noted from the table that the transfer to revenue in 1953-54 of the balance of provincial corporation income taxes transferred to the Receiver General pursuant to the 1952 tax rental agreements more than accounts for the decrease in receipts in 1954-55.

A total of $29 million was received during the fiscal year from the sale of Crown assets. Of this amount $7 million was received from the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation representing the amount realized from the disposal of surplus Crown assets; $16 million represented receipts from sales of Crown lands, buildings and equipment under agreements of sale; $1 million was received from the sale of Government telegraph and telephone facilities in British Columbia; and $5 million was received from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation representing the proceeds from the sale of wartime housing properties including depreciation provisions set aside in previous years by the corporation on properties that have now been sold.

An amount of $1 million was transferred from Defence Production suspense account to revenue. This amount represented royalties and license fees on the use of patents in connection with war production.

(4) Comparison of Actual Revenue with Budget Forecast

Total budgetary revenues for 1954-55, excluding revenue from the old age security taxes, as now estimated were $357 million less than the forecast made in the budget speech of April 6, 1954. This represents a shortfall of about 8 per cent. Revenue from all sources except the tax on non-residents, succession duties and miscellaneous taxes were less than expected and revenues from these three sources exceeded expectations by only small amounts. This failure of revenues to come up to the amounts forecast reflects the fact that the general level of economic activity and production throughout the year was somewhat less than the level which formed the basis for the budget forecast.

The following table shows the extent to which actual revenues for 1954-55 as now estimated, differ from the budget forecast:

TABLE VII

COMPARISON OF BUDGET FORECAST WITH ACTUAL REVENUES FOR FISCAL YEAR ENDED MARCH 31, 1955

Source of Revenues	Budget Forecast of Revenues	Actual Revenues (Estimated)	Increase or Decrease(−) compared with Budget Forecast
Personal income tax	1,235·0	1,176·0	−59·0

Non-tax revenues	340·0	320·6	−19·4
Total budgetary revenues	4,464·0	4,107·1	−356·9

The revenue from the personal income tax was $59 million or about 5 per cent less than the budget forecast. About $3 million of this deficiency is due to the increased credit now allowed for the Quebec personal income tax but most of the shortfall occurred because the total of personal incomes did not rise as much as had been expected.

Revenue from the tax on income going to non-residents exceeded expectations because of a sharp increase in the dividend payments going from companies in Canada to persons abroad.

Corporation income tax revenue was approximately $192 million less than the budget forecast which was based on the assumption that 1954 corporate profits would be slightly better than in 1953. Preliminary estimates are that 1954 profits were nearly 7 per cent below those for 1953.

Revenue from customs duties, sales tax and other excise taxes and duties fell from 5 to 6 per cent below the budget forecast. The deficiency in the sales and other excise tax revenue occurred in part because of the unexpected drop in automobile production during the year.

The shortfall of $19 million in non-tax revenues from the budget forecast is attributable largely to return on investments being lower than anticipated.

Special receipts and credits are extremely difficult to estimate and the total of $34 million fell short of the budget forecast by $16 million.

National Defence and Defence Production

Defence expenditures, comprising the expenditures of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production, constituted 40 per cent of all government expenditures in 1954-55 and were consequently the largest category of government expenditure. Expenditures of the Department of National Defence were $1,677 million, a decrease of $129 million from the previous year, while those of the Department of Defence Production were $20 million, a decrease of $28 million. The combined expenditures of $1,697 million for these two departments in 1954-55 were $157 million less than the total of $1,854 million for 1953-54.

A comparative summary of expenditures for the two departments for the last two fiscal years is presented in the table which follows:

	1,696·9	1,853·8	−156·9

While expenditures for naval service showed an increase of $18 million, expenditures for army and air services were below the 1953-54 level by $19 million and $96 million respectively, with the result that total expenditures for the three services were $97 million less than in the previous year. Expenditures on defence research and development were $44 million, or $4 million more than in 1953-54.

The Government makes a contribution to the permanent services pension account of an amount equal to $1\frac{2}{3}$ times the contributions by permanent services personnel. During 1954-55 this contribution amounted to $37 million, or $2 million more than the amount of $35 million contributed in 1953-54. Of the 1954-55 expenditures $34 million related to current contributions and $3 million to contributions for arrears. The corresponding amounts in 1953-54 were $30 million and $5 million respectively.

Expenditures under the Mutual Aid programme, which are authorized under Section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, were $257 million in 1954-55, a decrease of $32 million from 1953-54. Under the provisions of this section of the Act, defence equipment and supplies are transferred from Canadian stocks to other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. The value of equipment and supplies acquired by the services prior to March 31, 1950, and transferred as Mutual Aid, is charged to this appropriation and credited to a special defence equipment replacement account. The equipment is valued on the basis of its estimated replacement value. In accordance with the provisions of Vote 239 of the Appropriation Act, No. 4, 1954, where equipment and supplies acquired for the services since March 31, 1950, are transferred as Mutual Aid, the estimated replacement value is credited to the appropriate service allotment instead of being paid into the replacement account, and may be expended during the current fiscal year for the purposes of the Canadian forces. The expenditure of $257 million from the replacement account in 1954-55 consists of approximately $46 million for equipment and supplies transferred from Canadian stocks to North Atlantic Treaty countries and $211 million for direct cash outlays for Mutual Aid by the Government of Canada, representing costs incurred in acquiring and supplying new military equipment to parties to the North Atlantic Treaty and in training in Canada aircrews from allied countries. In 1953-54, stock transfers totalled $68 million and direct aid, $222 million.

Contributions are also made from National Defence appropriations towards the military costs of NATO, on account of Canada's share of the NATO military budgets and infrastructure costs. The percentage share borne by each nation is established in the North Atlantic Council and is subject to ratification by the respective member governments. Expenditures for 1954-55 for this purpose are estimated at $7 million, compared with payments of $10·5 million during 1953-54.

As the capital assistance programme, which reached its peak in 1952-53, drew closer to completion, expenditures for the Department of Defence Production decreased in 1954-55; the total of $20 million for the year represented a decrease of $28 million from the amount of $48 million spent in 1953-54. Capital assistance to private contractors, Crown plants operated on a management fee basis, and Crown corporations undertaking contracts essential to the defence programme, totalled $10 million in 1954-55, compared with $38 million for the preceding year. Administration and general expenditures, at $10 million, decreased slightly from the total for 1953-54.

In addition to its budgetary expenditures the Department of Defence Production made cash outlays from the defence production revolving fund for the procurement of materials to be billed to the Department of National Defence or sold to defence contractors for use in the manufacture of defence equipment. It is estimated that the net asset holdings of the fund decreased by $5 million in 1954-55, as compared with a decrease of $22 million in 1953-54.

The replacement of equipment and supplies acquired by the Department of National Defence prior to March 31, 1950, and subsequently transferred to parties to the North Atlantic Treaty, also involved cash outlays that were not reflected as budgetary expenditures. The cost of such replacement is charged to the defence equipment replacement account, which is credited with the estimated value of the defence equipment and supplies when these are transferred from Canadian stocks to NATO countries. Transfers to this account during 1954-55 were $47 million, and $79 million was disbursed for the purchase of replacement equipment and supplies. The balance of the account at March 31, 1954, was $306 million, and as a result of the year's operations there was a net disbursement of $32 million from the account bringing the balance to $274 million as of March 31, 1955.

In addition, credits were made to the replacement of materiel account in the amount of $3·8 million and disbursements from the account totalled $20 million. This account was established under the authority of section 11 of the National Defence Act to record the sale of materiel not immediately required for the use of the Canadian forces or the Defence Research Board to such countries and upon such terms as the Governor in Council may determine. The proceeds of the sale are credited to this account to be used for the procurement of replacement materiel.

By consolidating the net cash outlays from the defence equipment replacement account, the replacement of materiel account and the defence production revolving fund, with the net cash budgetary expenditures of the Departments of National Defence and Defence Production, the net effect of the defence programme upon the Canadian economy can be seen. In 1954-55 cash outlays for defence amounted to $1,740 million a decrease of $58 million from the corresponding total in 1953-54.

A summary of cash disbursements for defence for the last two fiscal years is presented in the following table:

Public Debt Charges

Public debt charges in 1954-55 are estimated at $503 million or 12 per cent of aggregate budgetary expenditures, an increase of $7 million compared with a total of $496 million or 11 per cent for the previous year. In 1954-55, as in 1953-54, public debt charges comprise the second largest item of Government expense.

Interest on public debt amounted to $478 million, or $2 million more than the total spent in the previous year. A decrease of $6 million in interest on unmatured debt was more than offset by an increase of $8 million in interest on insurance, pension and guaranty accounts.

Interest on unmatured debt payable in Canada, London and New York amounted to $406 million compared with $412 million in 1953-54. The decrease of $6 million is due in part to a decrease of approximately $88 million in unmatured debt payable in Canada and in part to lower rates of interest on new and renewal issues. Interest payable in London and New York reflect only minor changes due to slight changes in rates of exchange.

Interest on deposit and trust accounts decreased by $0·1 million while interest on insurance, pension and guaranty accounts at $69 million increased by $8 million over the total of $61 million in 1953-54. Of this increase, $6 million relates to the superannuation account; $2 million to the Government annuities account and $2 million is in respect of the permanent services pension account; but these are partially offset by a decrease of $2 million in respect of the civil service insurance fund, on which the crediting of interest was discontinued at the close of 1953-54.

Other public debt charges in 1954-55 are estimated at $25 million compared with $20 million in the previous year. The increase of $5 million is attributable largely to higher annual amortization charges for discounts and commissions on previous bond issues.

The following table presents a comparative summary of public debt charges for 1954-55 and for the previous year:

Subsidies and Tax Rental Payments to Provinces

Payments to the provinces during 1954-55 for statutory subsidies, rentals under the tax rental agreements, the transitional grant to Newfoundland, and the transfer of a portion of income tax receipts from certain public utility companies were $358 million compared with $341 million in 1953-54.

A comparative summary of the payments for the two years is given in the following table:

TABLE XII

Sec. 6, c. 49, Statutes of 1952	6·8	.....	6·8

The payments under the tax rental agreements in 1954-55 were $18 million greater than in the previous year reflecting the increases in provincial populations and gross national product per capita in 1953 over the base year 1948.

Statutory subsidies in 1954-55 were $0·3 million greater than in 1953-54 because of the upward adjustment of the subsidies to the three prairie provinces based on the estimated increases in their population at the mid-point between the quinquennial census of 1951 and 1956.

The amount of public utility tax receipts transferred to the provinces in 1954-55 is expected to be the same as in the previous year. Section 7 of the Dominion-Provincial Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1947, and section 6 of the Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1952 authorize the payment to the provinces, whether participating in the agreements or not, of a portion of the income tax collected from corporations whose main business was the distribution to, or the generation for distribution to, the public of electrical energy, gas or steam.

Government contribution with respect to the Superannuation Account

The Government's contribution to the superannuation account was $37 million in 1954-55 or $17 million less than its contribution in 1953-54. Approximately one-half of this sum was required to match amounts transferred from the retirement fund in respect of contributors coming under the new Act. The balance is the Government's matching contributions in respect of current and prior service contributions of individuals. Of the $54 million contributed in the previous year, $38 million was in respect of the additional liability created by the general salary increases to civil servants effective December 1, 1953, and $16 million representing the Government's contribution of an amount equal to the current and prior service payments of individuals.

Provision for Reserve for Possible Losses on Ultimate Realization of Active Assets

No charge to expenditures was included in the Government's accounts during 1954-55 for an addition to the general reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets. In 1953-54, $50 million was added to the reserve and charged to expenditures. The balance of the reserve at March 31, 1955 was $496 million which is equivalent to 7 per cent of the aggregate active assets.

Family Allowances

Family allowances are payable in respect of all children under sixteen resident in Canada, with minor exceptions such as in the case of children of immigrants who must reside in Canada a year before an allowance is payable.

The monthly allowance is $5 if the child is less than six; $6 in the age group 6 to 9; $7 in the age group 10 to 12; and $8 in the age group 13 to 15. There is no limit to the number of children in a family that may be eligible.

Payments for family allowances are estimated at $366 million for 1954-55 representing 9 per cent of total expenditures compared with $350 million or 8 per cent in the previous year. The increase of $16 million reflects the increase in the number of children in the eligible age groups.

The following table presents a comparative summary of family allowance payments by provinces for the last two fiscal years:

Unemployment Insurance Act Administration and Government's Contribution

Expenditures relating to the Unemployment Insurance Act (excluding the Government's payment as an employer) are estimated at $60 million for 1954-55, an increase of $2 million over the total of $58 million spent in 1953-54.

Unemployment insurance benefit payments are not charged directly to budgetary expenditures. The Unemployment Insurance Fund, from which such benefits are paid, is financed by contributions from employers and employees, by interest earned on investments, and by the government's contribution of an amount equal to one-fifth of combined employer-employee payments.

The Government's contribution to the fund for 1954-55 is estimated at $32 million, about the same amount as contributed in the previous year. Administration costs are estimated at $28 million, or $2 million more than the total of $26 million for 1953-54.

Agriculture

Expenditures of the Department of Agriculture are estimated at $83 million for 1954-55, a decrease of $25 million from the previous year. Operating losses of the agricultural prices support board decreased by $35 million, and rehabilitation and reclamation project expenditures, at $13 million, are $2 million less than in the previous year. However, these decreases are offset in part by increases of $5 million in marketing service $2 million in freight assistance on western feed grains, $1 million in experimental farms, and $4 million in other services. The increase in marketing services is due in large part to payments of $5 million in 1954-55 under the Agricultural Products Co-Operative Marketing Act, c.5, R.S. 1952, the purpose of which is to assist and encourage the co-operative marketing of agricultural products by primary producers.

The following table presents a comparative summary of the expenditures of the department for the last two years:

Atomic Energy Control Board and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited

Expenditures of the Atomic Energy Control Board and payments to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited are estimated at $15·4 million for 1954-55 compared with $12·7 million in 1953-54, an increase of $2·7 million.

Administration expenses of the Atomic Energy Control Board and grants for researches and investigations with respect to atomic energy were $0·3 million for the past two fiscal years.

Expenditures of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited under its research programmes are estimated at $15·1 million compared with $12·4 million in 1953-54.

In addition, $15 million was advanced to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited during the fiscal year to finance the construction of the new reactor and other buildings and works at Chalk River and Deep River. The Government's investment in the company was increased further by a net amount of $1·4 million reflecting a write-up of $2·8 million on the books of the Government and the company in respect of the value of housing accommodation at Deep River previously written off to research less a write-off of $1·4 million on account of an adjustment in the proportion of the costs of the new reactor chargeable to the company's research programme. This brings the total of loans to the company to $32·4 million to be covered by the issue of obligations or shares of the company.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation

Payments by the Government of Canada to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation were $30 million in 1954-55 compared with $25 million in 1953-54, an increase of $5 million. Payments to the corporation of an amount equivalent to the collections of the 15 per cent special tax imposed on radio and television sets and tubes are estimated at $22 million in 1954-55 compared with $17 million in the previous year. For the current fiscal year $17 million is in respect of television and $5 million in respect of radio. In 1953-54, payments were $12 million and $5 million respectively.

The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures for 1954-55 and the previous year:

External Affairs

Expenditures of the Department of External Affairs were $44 million in 1954-55, a decrease of $2 million compared with $46 million in the previous year. Assistance to other countries directly or through international organizations was $27 million compared with $32 million in 1953-54. The principal item in this category is an amount of $25 million for grants to assist in the economic development of countries in South and South-east Asia. A similar amount was provided in 1953-54. The decrease of $5 million is attributable mainly to the fact that there was no item in 1954-55 comparable to the gift of $5 million for wheat in 1953-54 as a contribution towards the relief of famine in Pakistan. Expenditure on representation abroad including construction, acquisition or improvement of buildings, works, and land, and outlay on new equipment and furnishings is estimated at $8 million compared with $6 million for 1953-54.

Finance

The major items of expenditure during 1954-55 of the Department of Finance have been dealt with under the headings "Public Debt Charges", "Subsidies and Tax Rental Payments to Provinces", "Provision for reserve for possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets" and "Government contributions in respect of the Superannuation Account".

In addition, other expenditures of the department for 1954-55 are estimated at $33 million compared with $30 million in 1953-54, an increase of $3 million of which $1 million is due to the federal contribution to the Government of the province of Ontario for assistance in meeting costs resulting from floods arising out of hurricane "Hazel".

Mines and Technical Surveys

Expenditures of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are estimated at $43 million for 1954-55 compared with $39 million in 1953-54. Of this increase of $4 million, $1 million is attributable to the increased expenses in connection with the movement of coal under the Dominion Coal Board and $2 million to increased outlays on surveys and mapping services.

A comparative summary of expenditures for the last two fiscal years is shown in the following table:

National Health and Welfare

Family allowance payments constitute a major item of expenditure of the Department of National Health and Welfare and, because of their importance in relation to the total government expenditures, have been dealt with under a separate heading in preceding paragraphs. Other expenditures of the department are estimated at $86 million for 1954-55, an increase of $6 million compared with $80 million in 1953-54.

The following table presents a comparative summary of these other expenditures of the department for the last two years:

General health grants to assist the provinces in hospital construction, general health services and the control of diseases are estimated at $32 million for 1954-55 compared with $29 million in the previous year.

Under the Old Age Assistance Act, the federal government reimburses the provinces by paying 50 per cent of the lesser of $40 monthly or the amount of assistance given by the provinces in the form of monthly pensions to eligible persons in need who are in the age group of 65 to 69. (Under the Old Age Security Act, all persons 70 years and over who satisfy the residence requirements may receive a pension of $40 per month from the federal government out of the Old Age Security Fund.) Similarly, under the Blind Persons Act, the federal government reimburses the provinces for allowances paid to eligible blind persons in need over the age of 21, but under this Act, the federal reimbursement is 75 per cent of the total payments.

Payments by the federal government in respect of old age assistance were $21 million in 1954-55 compared with $20 million in 1953-54. Payments on account of allowances to blind persons amounting to $3 million for 1954-55 are unchanged from the previous year.

The following table presents an estimated distribution of these payments by provinces for the fiscal year 1954-55:

Expenditures relating to Indian and Eskimo health services are estimated at $16 million for 1954-55 compared with $14 million in the previous year. Expenditures for other health services at $6 million were slightly greater than the total spent in 1953-54.

Civil defence programme expenditures at $4 million were also practically the same as for the previous fiscal year.

National Research Council

Expenditures of the National Research Council are estimated at $16 million for 1954-55, only slightly higher than in 1953-54. Salaries and other expenses at $14 million are $1 million greater than the total of $13 million for 1953-54, while the cost of construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment was $2 million in 1954-55, a decrease of $1 million from the total of $3 million in the previous year.

National Revenue

Expenditures for the Department of National Revenue are estimated at $55 million compared with $50 million for 1953-54. Increases of $2 million for the customs and excise division and $3 million for the taxation division account for the $5 million increase.

The following table presents a comparative summary of the expenditures for 1954-55 and 1953-54:

Northern Affairs and National Resources

Expenditures in 1954-55 for the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources are estimated at $20 million, an increase of $1 million over the total of $19 million in the previous year. Of this net increase, $1 million is attributable largely to expenditures for the national parks and historic sites services of the National Parks Branch. A small increase in the northern administration and lands branch services is offset by a similar decrease in the forestry branch services.

Post Office

Gross expenditures of the Post Office Department for 1954-55, including payments from revenue, are estimated at $145 million, an increase of $13 million over the total of $132 million for 1953-54. Remuneration of postmasters and staffs at revenue and semi-staff offices, commissions at sub-offices and certain other authorized disbursements, are paid from revenue. These payments, included in the total of $145 million, are estimated at $21 million for 1954-55 compared with $19 million for the previous year. Disbursements charged to budgetary expenditures are estimated at $124 million for 1954-55, an increase of $11 million over the previous fiscal year.

Public Works

Expenditures for the Department of Public Works for 1954-55 are estimated to total $138 million compared with $115 million in 1953-54, an increase of $23 million.

In 1954-55, expenditures of the architectural branch were $79 million or $17 million greater than the total of $62 million for the previous year. Of this increase, $14 million is attributable to the acquisition and construction of and improvements to public buildings while the operation and maintenance of public buildings and grounds accounted for a further increase amounting to $3 million. Expenditures of the engineering branch are expected to show a decrease of $1 million.

The Government's contribution to the provinces in connection with the Trans-Canada Highway Act is estimated at $20 million for 1954-55, an increase of $7 million compared with $13 million for 1953-54.

Expenditures under housing legislation are estimated at $3 million for 1954-55 compared with $2 million for the previous year. The increase of $1 million is attributable mainly to payments in 1954-55 relating to grants to municipalities for slum clearance.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police

Expenditures for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are estimated at $36 million for 1954-55 compared with the total of $34 million for 1953-54. The increase of $2 million is due mainly to an increase in land and air services. These amounts represent gross expenditures; payments received from the provinces for police services are credited to revenue.

Expenditures of the Department of Transport are estimated at $159 million for 1954-55 compared with $118 million in 1953-54, an increase of $41 million as shown in the following table:

Expenditures of $45 million in 1954-55 for air services are $4 million higher than in 1953-54. Of this increase, $3 million relates to the civil aviation division, $2 million of which is attributable to the cost of construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment in connection with airways and airports.

Expenditures for marine services were $22 million in 1954-55. The increase of $2 million is due largely to an increase of $1 million in expenditures for the administration, operation and maintenance of marine service steamers and $1 million for the construction or acquisition of vessels and equipment.

Railway services expenditures were $37 million compared with $31 million in 1953-54. Of this increase of $6 million, $4 million is on account of Strait of Canso transportation improvements and facilities; $1 million relates to the construction of new dock and terminal facilities at Port-aux-Basques, Newfoundland, and $1 million to the construction or acquisition of auto-ferry vessels. Payments covering net operating deficits of and non-active loans and advances to certain government owned enterprises were $37 million in 1954-55 compared with $9 million in the previous year. The increase of $28 million is more than accounted for by the operating deficit of the Canadian National Railways which was $28·8 million for the calendar year 1954. In 1953 the Railway had an operating surplus of $244,000.

Veterans Affairs

Expenditures for the Department of Veterans Affairs for 1954-55 are estimated at $242 million, an increase of $3 million compared with the total spent in the previous year. Increases of $1 million in pensions, $1 million in treatment services, $2 million in war veterans allowances and other benefits are partially offset by a decrease of $3 million in war service gratuities and re-establishment credits.

Expenditures relating to the administration of the Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Acts reflect an increase of $1 million while the provision for the reserve for conditional benefits under the Veterans' Land Act at $9 million for 1954-55 is slightly greater than the provision of $8·5 million for 1953-54. These conditional grants are made to veterans who enter into agreements with the director for sales of land and chattels provided they fulfil the terms of the agreements for a period of ten years. The amount charged to expenditures during 1954-55 under this heading covers one-tenth of the conditional benefits included in sales to veterans prior to April 1955.

The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures for the department for the past two years:

All Other Departments

Expenditures of the departments not dealt with in the preceding sections amounted to $61·3 million in 1954-55 compared with $61 million in 1953-54. The table which follows presents a comparative summary of the expenditures for the past two years:

Decreases of $5 million in the expenses of the Chief Electoral Officer (the 1953-54 accounts included the costs of the 1953 federal election) and $0·6 million for the Department of Secretary of State are more than offset by increases in expenditures of other departments, chief of which are $2 million for the Department of Fisheries; $1·7 million for the Office of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries and $1 million for legislation reflecting increased sessional indemnities to members of the Senate and the House of Commons.

Liabilities

The gross liabilities of the Government as at March 31, 1955, are estimated at $17,944 million, an increase of $21 million over the total of $17,923 million at the close of the previous fiscal year.

Unmatured debt outstanding, including bonds and treasury bills, amounted to $14,488 million at March 31, 1955, or approximately 81 per cent of all liabilities. Of the total outstanding unmatured debt, $14,096 million or 97 per cent was payable in Canada and the balance of $392 million was payable in foreign currencies—$341 million in United States dollars and $51 million in pounds sterling. A complete statement in tabular form of the Government's unmatured debt as at March 31, 1955 with details of interest rates, dates of maturity, annual interest charges and amounts of principal outstanding for each loan is presented at the end of this Part.

The Government's liability as at March 31, 1955 in respect of insurance, pension and guaranty accounts is estimated at $1,978 million. Floating debt, including outstanding cheques, miscellaneous accounts payable (cheques issued in April, 1955, in payment of accounts relating to the fiscal year 1954-55) and notes and other obligations payable on demand, is expected to total $826 million.

The other liability items are: sundry suspense accounts (where some uncertainty as to disposal exists), $293 million; deposit and trust accounts (consisting of moneys deposited with or held by the Receiver General for various purposes), $202 million; deferred credits (consisting of balances whose ultimate accounting treatment is known, but which are held until certain conditions are fulfilled), $146 million; and province debt accounts (representing settlements arising out of agreements at the time of Confederation), $11·9 million.

Active Assets

Offsetting the liabilities, and to some extent explaining their existence—as a substantial part of the total debt has been incurred on account of them—are the Government's active assets. For the most part these consist of assets which yield interest, profits or dividends, liquid assets such as cash and departmental working funds together with certain prepaid expenses and sundry suspense accounts.

The total active assets at March 31, 1955, are estimated at $7,176 million, a decrease of $127 million from the total at the end of the previous year. The totals of the various active asset categories as at March 31, 1955, were: cash and other current assets, $2,416 million; loans to, and investments in, Crown agencies, $1,777 million; other loans and investments, (consisting of loans to provincial, municipal and national governments, subscriptions to international organizations and advances to veterans and others) $2,332 million; deferred charges, $256 million; sundry suspense accounts, $206 million; sinking fund and other investments held for the retirement of debt, $187 million and province debt accounts $2·3 million.

The reserve for possible losses on ultimate realization of active assets amounting to $496 million, is shown on the statement of assets and liabilities as a deduction from the total active assets, bringing the net active assets total to $6,680 million.

A. Changes in Principal Liability Classifications During 1954-55

The gross liabilities of the Government are expected to show an increase of $21 million over the total at the close of the previous fiscal year. An increase of $205 million in insurance, pension and guaranty accounts is partially offset by decreases of $88 million in unmatured debt, $45 million in sundry suspense accounts, $43 million in floating debt, $6 million in deferred credits and $2 million in deposit and trust accounts.

Floating Debt

It is estimated that floating debt decreased $42 million during the fiscal year. Increases of $9 million in miscellaneous accounts payable and $13 million in outstanding cheques and warrants are partially offset by decreases of $43 million in notes and other obligations payable on demand, $20 million in matured debt outstanding, $1 million in interest due and outstanding and $0·2 million in post office account.

The estimated changes in floating debt during the fiscal year 1954-55 are shown in the following table.

TABLE XXXIII

Floating Debt	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1955 (Estimated)	1954

Post Office (net liability for money orders, etc.)	23·5	23·7	−0·2
	825·8	868·5	−42·7

Deposit and Trust Accounts

Deposit and trust accounts decreased by $2 million during the year. The major changes in this category were an increase of $13 million in the Colombo plan fund, representing the difference between the amount of $25 million credited to the fund out of moneys voted by Parliament for assistance to countries in South and South-east Asia and disbursements from the fund, and a decrease of $14 million in the prairie farm emergency fund, representing the difference between the total of $20 million paid as awards under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and $6 million collected as levies.

Insurance Pension and Guaranty Accounts

The increase in insurance, pension and guaranty accounts during the fiscal year is estimated at $205 million. The changes in the various accounts for the fiscal year are shown in the following table.

TABLE XXXIV

Insurance, Pension and Guaranty Accounts	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1955 (Estimated)	1954
Unemployment insurance fund	853·0	892·3	−39·3
Less: Investment in bonds and accrued interest	838·0	878·7	−40·7

Permanent services pension account	278·5	217·2	61·3
Other	89·0	86·9	2·1
	1,977·7	1,772·9	204·8

The decrease of $39 million in the unemployment insurance fund, representing the amount by which benefit payments totalling $255 million during 1954-55 exceeded contributions by employers, employees and the government, income from investments, and other miscellaneous revenue credited to the fund is reflected in a reduction in the investments of the fund; the cash balances held for the fund by the Receiver General at March 31, 1955 increased $1 million from March 31, 1954.

The increase of $76 million in the superannuation account is attributable mainly to the Government's contribution of $37 million equal to the estimated current and prior service payments of individuals in 1953-54, and $28 million interest credited to the account. The remainder of the increase is due to the excess of employees' current and prior service contributions over benefit payments.

The Government annuities account is expected to show an increase of $64 million and the permanent services pension account an increase of $61 million. The increase in the permanent services pension account represents the Government's contribution of $37 million (which is made at the rate of one and two third times the current contributions and contributions for arrears), interest on the account $9 million and contributions by permanent services personnel for current service and arrears, less the payments from the account.

Other insurance, pension and guaranty accounts show an increase of $2 million for the year.

Old Age Security Fund

Under the Old Age Security Act pensions of $40 per month are paid to all eligible persons seventy years of age and over without a means test from the old age security fund. During the fiscal year payments from the fund amounted to $353 million while credits to the fund from the proceeds of the 2 per cent tax on personal incomes, the 2 per cent tax on corporation profits and the 2 per cent sales tax totalled $291 million. Under the authority of section 11 of the Old Age Security Act, the Minister of Finance made a temporary loan of $62 million to the fund to cover the deficit resulting from these transactions during 1954-55. This amount, together with the loan of $46 million covering the deficit of the fund for 1953-54, brings the temporary loans made by the Minister of Finance to the fund to $108 million.

The following table shows the transactions in the old age security fund for the last two years:

Deferred Credits

The decrease in deferred credits is estimated to be $6 million. The more important changes in this category are decreases of $5 million in accrued interest on public debt and $1 million in balances receivable under agreements of sale of Crown assets, set up as a contra account to an account under the same name in other loans and investments.

The decrease in balances receivable under agreements of sale of Crown assets reflects the repayment by A. V. Roe Canada Limited of $8 million of the amount due by them under an agreement of sale offset by certain new balances of agreements of sale totalling $7 million, including $2·6 million with Canadian Pratt and Whitney Aircraft Limited and $1·9 million with English Electric Company Limited.

Sundry Suspense Accounts

Sundry suspense accounts show a decrease of $45 million. The major changes in the accounts in this category are decreases of $32 million in the defence equipment replacement account and of $16 million in the replacement of materiel account and an increase of $3 million on account of the railway grade crossing fund. The transactions in the defence equipment replacement account reflect a reduction in the undisbursed balance in the account which was established under section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and subsequent votes of Parliament for the same purpose. Under the terms of the Act, the value of defence materials and supplies acquired prior to March 31, 1950, and transferred to members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization may be credited to the account and these credits may be used in subsequent years to purchase equipment or supplies for the naval, army or air services of the Canadian forces. Disbursements from the account are estimated at $79 million, and credits for equipment transferred at $47 million.

The replacement of materiel account established by section 11 of the National Defence Act is credited with amounts realized from the sale of materiel that has not been declared surplus to requirements but has been authorized by the Governor in Council to be sold to other countries. The account is debited with disbursements representing amounts paid for the procurement of replacement materiel. During 1954-55 disbursements from the account exceeded credits by $16 million.

The amount of $3 million for the railway grade crossing fund reflects the setting up in the accounts of the undisbursed balance of moneys appropriated by the Railway Act for the purposes of the railway grade crossing fund up to the close of the fiscal year 1954-55.

Province Debt Accounts

There were no changes in the province debt accounts during the fiscal year. The amounts have remained unchanged for many years.

Unmatured Debt

The unmatured debt outstanding at the close of 1954-55 was $14,488 million, a reduction of $88 million for the year, all of which is reflected in debt payable in Canada. The details of the various loan redemptions, flotations and adjustments resulting in this net decrease are described more fully in the section on "The Public Debt".

B.—Changes in the Principal Active Asset Classifications During 1954-55

It is estimated that active assets decreased by $127 million during 1954-55. Decreases of $106 million in other loans and investments, $98 million in cash and other current assets, $18 million in loans to, and investments in, Crown agencies and $4 million in deferred charges were offset in part by increases of $85 million in sinking fund and other investments held for the retirement of debt and $14 million in sundry suspense accounts. There was no change during the fiscal year in the reserve for possible losses on ultimate realization of active assets which stood at $496 million at March 31, 1955.

Cash and Other Current Assets

The changes in the various accounts in this category are shown in the following table:

TABLE XXXVII

Cash and Other Current Assets	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1955 (Estimated)	1954

Other current assets	18·5	22·5	−4·0
	2,416·1	2,514·3	−98·2

The principal changes in this category were decreases of $154 million in cash in current and special deposits, $28 million in cash in hands of collectors and in transit and increases of $6 million in the exchange fund account, $62 million in the temporary loan by the Minister of Finance to the old age security fund, and $9 million in departmental working capital advances.

Advances to the exchange fund amounted to $158 million while repayments were $138 million. However, the fund's revaluation deficit which stood at $191 million at December 31, 1953 and $205 million at December 31, 1954, is recorded under sundry suspense accounts. Consequently the net increase for the fiscal year was $6 million, reflecting additional advances of $20 million less the transfer of $14 million to the revaluation deficit account.

The decrease of $5 million in the Defence Production revolving fund represents the amount by which credits to the account from the sale of essential materials and defence supplies exceeded the cost of acquiring, storing, maintaining and transporting such materials.

Departmental working capital advances increased by $9 million, the chief of which is the increase of $9 million in the agricultural prices support account reflecting the difference between the credit to the account of $3 million, representing the loss on operations for 1954-55, which is included in the year's expenditures, and the net debit of $12 million to the account representing the excess of purchases over sales during the year by the Agricultural Prices Support Board.

The increase of $62 million in the temporary loan to the old age security fund represents the advance made by the Minister of Finance to cover the deficit of the fund for the year 1954-55. This advance together with the advance of $46 million to cover the deficit of the previous year brings the total temporary loan to $108 million at March 31, 1955.

Loans to, and Investments in, Crown Agencies

It is estimated that loans to, and investments in, Crown agencies decreased by $18 million during the year. The more important changes during the year are a decrease of $93 million in loans and advances to the Canadian National Railways and increases of $49 million in loans to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and $16 million in advances to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. The changes in this category are shown in the following table:

In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1955, the government advanced $119 million to the Canadian National Railway Company for capital purposes and the retirement of funded debt in the hands of the public. A portion of the proceeds of a $250 million 2¾ per cent bond issue sold to the public in December 1954, was used to repay $219 million of government advances then outstanding. In addition, a temporary loan of $12 million outstanding at the beginning of the year together with $16 million advanced during the year for income deficit was paid off from an appropriation in the Further Supplementary Estimates. The consequence of all these transactions was a net reduction of $112 million during the fiscal year in advances to the Company.

In addition, the government purchased $19·3 million of 4 per cent preferred stock of the Canadian National Railway Company in order to assist the Company to finance additional capital expenditures. This stock is issued under the authority of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1952, in an amount equal to three per cent of the gross operating revenues of the Company.

Loans to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation during the fiscal year amounted to $53 million, of which $45 million was for lending purposes, $1 million for construction and $7 million for federal-provincial housing projects. Repayments of $3 million on account of house construction and $1 million on federal-provincial housing projects bring the net increase for the fiscal year in loans to the Corporation to $49 million.

Other increases in loans and advances to Crown agencies during the year were; $16 million to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, $4 million to the Canadian Farm Loan Board, $3·6 million to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, $3 million to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, $1 million to the National Harbours Board, and $1·3 million to The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority.

Polymer Corporation Limited reduced its indebtedness to the government by $4 million during the year and Northwest Territories Power Commission by $0·3 million.

Other Loans and Investments

Other loans and investments decreased by $106 million during the year. The balances of the main accounts in this category together with the changes during the year are shown in the following table:

TABLE XXXIX

During the year the Government of the United Kingdom reduced the balance of the $700 million interest free loan granted under the provisions of the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, by $30 million as arranged under the terms of an agreement entered into on August 13, 1953 between the Governments of the United Kingdom and Canada. The balance outstanding at March 31, 1955 was $112 million. Under the terms of the agreement the loan is to continue to be free of interest until December 1958.

The Government of the United Kingdom also repaid $15 million on account of the $1,185 million loan made under the $1,250 million credit authorized by United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, reducing the unpaid balance to $1,127 million at the close of the fiscal year.

Advances under Part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act to certain foreign countries to assist them in purchasing goods and services in Canada were reduced by $24 million during the year. Repayments by the various countries during the year are shown in the preceding table. All payments of principal due during the fiscal year 1954-55 were made in accordance with the agreements entered into by the Governments of the various countries and the Government of Canada with the exception of those owing by the Governments of China and Czechoslovakia.

Miscellaneous loans and advances to foreign governments were reduced by $3 million, of which $1·8 million was received from the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The subscription to the capital of the International Monetary Fund was reduced by $29 million during the year. This decrease represents adjustments occasioned by the increased value in terms of Canadian dollars of Canada's subscription to the fund.

Loans to provincial and municipal governments decreased by $3·8 million during the year. Repayments by provinces amounted to $3·4 million and by municipalities to $0·4 million.

Advances under the Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Acts increased by $9·1 million, However, as $8·5 million was added to the reserve for conditional benefits under the Veterans' Land Act, the net increase was only $0·6 million.

Miscellaneous loans and investments decreased by $2 million during the year. A decrease of $3 million in balances receivable under agreements of sale of Crown assets was offset by increases in other items in this category totalling $1 million.

Sinking Fund and Other Investments Held for the Retirement of Unmatured Debt.

There was an increase of $85 million in these assets during the fiscal year 1954-55 due mainly to the purchase of bonds of various Government of Canada issues payable in United States dollars.

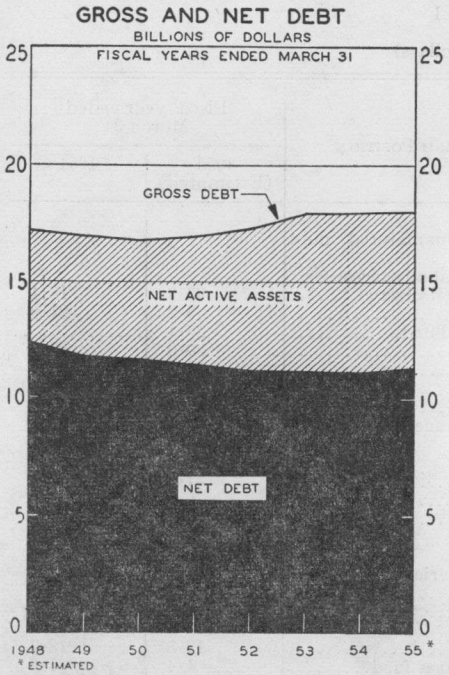
Province Debt Accounts

There were no changes in the province debt accounts during the fiscal year. The amount resulting from financial adjustments with certain of the provinces at Confederation have remained unchanged for many years.

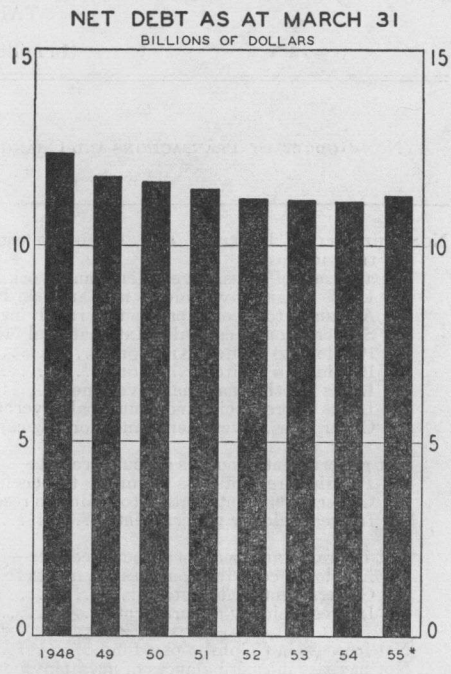
Deferred Charges

Deferred charges decreased by $4 million during the fiscal year. There was no change in the unamortized portion of the superannuation account liability during the year but payments of $19 million for commissions and discounts on new loans were more than offset by the annual amortization charges of $23 million applicable to 1954-55 included in the year's expenditures.

Sundry Suspense Accounts



The increase of $14 million in sundry suspense accounts during the year is mainly due to the fact that the deficit arising from exchange revaluations of the assets and liabilities of the exchange fund was $205 million at December 31, 1954, compared with $191 million at December 31, 1953.



Reserve for Possible Losses on Ultimate Realization of Active Assets

There was no charge or credit to the reserve for possible losses on ultimate realization of active assets during the year. It is shown on the statement of assets and liabilities as at March 31, 1955, as $496 million, unchanged from the end of the previous year.

C. Increase in Net Debt

The estimated deficit for the fiscal year of $148 million resulted in a corresponding increase in the net debt of Canada, increasing it from $11,116 million at March 31, 1954 to $11,264 million at March 31, 1955.

5. THE CASH POSITION

While a substantial part of all government activities is directly reflected in the budgetary accounts, it is important to note that in addition to collecting revenues and making expenditures in the strict budgetary sense the government's financial operations include many transactions which involve the receipt and disbursement of large sums of cash which lie outside the budget proper.

In preceding sections of this survey the budgetary revenues and expenditures for the fiscal year 1954-55 have been described and analyzed in some detail. Although these budgetary transactions resulted in a deficit of $148 million, unmatured debt in the hands of the public was reduced by $202 million while cash balances declined by only $154 million. It is apparent that in considering the full scope of the government's financial operations and measuring their impact upon the nation's economy, non-budgetary as well as budgetary transactions must be taken into account.

The non-budgetary transactions are those which result in increases or decreases in the government's assets and liabilities. They do not appear in the government's income account nor do they enter into the calculation of the annual budgetary surplus or deficit.

On the assets side, they consist, for the most part, of loans and advances to, and repayments by, Crown corporations and other government agencies and funds (including the old age security fund), national, provincial and municipal governments and other borrowers, and investments in government securities.

On the liabilities side, the transactions relate mainly to receipts and payments in connection with the numerous deposit and trust, and annuity, insurance and pension funds held or administered by the government.

The following statement summarizes these non-budgetary transactions for 1954-55 and indicates how, together with the budgetary transactions, they affected the government's funded debt and cash position. For purposes of comparison, the corresponding figures for 1953-54 are also shown:

As the table indicates, non-budgetary receipts and credits (excluding unmatured debt transactions) were $488 million while non-budgetary disbursements and charges (also excluding unmatured debt transactions) were $292 million resulting in a net amount available from non-budgetary transactions of $196 million. This latter amount less the budgetary deficit of $148 million made $48 million available for debt reduction. In 1953-54, the excess of non-budgetary disbursements over receipts made $325 million available which, with the budgetary surplus of $46 million, made a total of $371 million available for debt reduction.

Non-budgetary receipts and credits for 1954-55 amounted to $488 million. Repayments of loans, investments and working capital advances totalled $222 million due mainly to net repayments of $93 million by Canadian National Railways (loans of $154 million during the fiscal year were more than offset by repayments totalling $247 million), a reduction of $29 million in Canada's subscription to the capital of the International Monetary Fund, and repayments of $72 million by the United Kingdom and other national governments. Other non-budgetary receipts and credits included $64 million on government annuities account, $139 million in respect of the several insurance and pension accounts which the government administers, $13 million representing the excess of credits over disbursements from the Colombo plan fund, and $49 million in respect of various other accounts.

Non-budgetary disbursements and charges amounted to $292 million during 1954-55. Loans, investments and working capital advances amounted to $180 million and included $49 million loaned to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for housing construction and loans, $62 million in temporary loans to the old age security fund to finance the amount by which pension payments exceeded tax receipts, $16 million advanced to Atomic Energy of Canada, Limited, for working capital and to finance the construction of the new reactor and other buildings and works at Chalk River and Deep River, $20 million to the exchange fund for the acquisition of gold and foreign exchange and $32 million for miscellaneous loans, investments and working capital advances (including $9 million for loans to veterans). In addition, $154 million was loaned during the year to Canadian National Railways for additions and betterments, the acquisition of new rolling stock and equipment and for additional working capital but these loans were more than offset by repayments totalling $247 million. Other non-budgetary disbursements and charges amounting to $113 million, include net disbursements of $48 million from the defence equipment and materiel replacement accounts, $14 million from the prairie farm emergency fund and $51 million from various other accounts.

By using the amount of $48 million available from budgetary and non-budgetary transactions and by allowing cash balances to run down by $154 million, unmatured debt in the hands of the public, after taking into account sinking fund purchases and transactions in the securities investment account, was reduced by $202 million during 1954-55.

6. THE PUBLIC DEBT

While the unmatured funded debt of Canada decreased by $88 million during the fiscal year, other liabilities increased by $109 million. Consequently, the gross public debt of Canada increased by $21 million from $17,923 million at March 31, 1954 to an estimated total of $17,944 million at March 31, 1955. During the same period the net active assets decreased by $127 million, with the result that the net debt—which is the gross debt less the active or revenue producing assets—was increased by $148 million.

The Budget—Appendix

The following table shows the relationship between the gross public debt, the unmatured funded debt and the net debt at the end of each fiscal year, March 31, 1948 to 1955 inclusive:

Unmatured Funded Debt

It is estimated that the unmatured funded debt of Canada totalled $14,488 million at March 31, 1955. This is $88 million less than at the close of the previous fiscal year and $1,470 million less than at March 31, 1948. However, during the same eight year period while interest charges declined by approximately 6 per cent from $432 million in 1947-48 to $406 million in 1954-55 the gross national product rose from $13,768 million in 1947 to $23,985 million in 1954, an increase of approximately 74 per cent. Consequently, the relative burden of the funded debt, measured in terms of interest charges as a percentage of the gross national product, declined from 3·1 per cent in 1947-48 to 1·7 per cent in 1954-55.

Summary of Security Issues and Redemptions during the year

During the fiscal year 1954-55 the Government issued securities payable in Canadian dollars in the principal amount of $4,607 million (excluding the refunding of treasury bills which mature periodically) and redeemed maturing issues in the amount of $4,695 million, all of which was payable in Canadian dollars. There were no issues or redemptions in foreign currencies.

The redemption of the Third and Fourth Victory Loans, which together were outstanding in the amount of $1,967 million, involved the two largest refunding operations in Canadian financial history. Net sales of $767 million of Canada Savings Bonds Series 9, while lower than those of Series 8 by nearly $100 million, were nonetheless the second highest ever recorded for issues of this type.

The amount of treasury bills outstanding at the end of the fiscal year was $890 million, $240 million greater than on March 31, 1954. This amount was equally divided between three-month bills and nine-month bills. Since March 31, 1952 treasury bills outstanding have risen by $440 million, a growth which reflects in part the Government's increasing interest in developing an active Canadian market for short-term securities.

The financing of redemptions was effected as follows:

By proceeds of new issues:
Canada Savings Bonds Series 9 (net)	766·5
Three month, Twenty-Three day Loan	200·0
Increase in Treasury Bills	240·0
		1,206·5
By refunding or conversion into new issues		3,400·0
By available cash (payable in Canada)		88·3
		4,694·8

As a result of these transactions the net decrease in funded debt is estimated at $88 million.

Interest Rates

The average interest rate on the Government's outstanding unmatured funded debt as at March 31, 1955 was 2·74 per cent a slight decrease from the rate of 2·86 per cent at the end of the previous fiscal year. This is the first decrease recorded since the fiscal year 1949-50, when the rate was 2·60 per cent.

Interest rates generally fell sharply during the year. The last public issue during the year with a term of more than 10 years, the Canada Savings Bonds Series 9, was sold to yield 3·25 per cent, while the yield on a similar issue in the previous fiscal year was 3·75 per cent.

Treasury bill yields also declined noticeably. On the three-month bills the average yield on the issue sold March 25, 1955 was 1·130 per cent against 1·585 per cent for the last issue sold in the previous fiscal year. The average yield on the issue of nine-month bills made March 25, 1955 was 1·342 per cent compared to 1·903 per cent for the last issue sold in the fiscal year 1953-54.

AVERAGE INTEREST RATE ON FUNDED DEBT

Details of redemptions and new issues of securities during the fiscal year are set out in the following tables.

Contingent Liabilities

In addition to the direct debt set out in the statement of assets and liabilities, the Government has certain contingent liabilities. These consist of securities issued by various Government owned enterprises (such as the Canadian National Railways), guaranteed as to principal and interest or as to interest only, and a number of other miscellaneous guarantees, the chief of which are the guarantee of deposits maintained by the chartered banks in the Bank of Canada, insured loans made by chartered banks and other approved lending institutions under the National Housing Act, 1954, and bank advances to the Canadian Wheat Board; the guarantees of certain loans made by chartered banks to veterans or farmers for certain authorized purposes; guarantees under The Export Credits Insurance Act and certain commitments under housing legislation.

The following tables give details of the bonds and debenture stocks guaranteed by the Government, and also indicate the nature and approximate extent of the Government's other guarantees and contingent liabilities. The most significant change during the fiscal year was the sale of $250,000,000 2¾ per cent guaranteed bonds of the Canadian National Railway Company. The proceeds were used to repay interest-bearing capital advances from the Government of Canada and for capital expenditures of the Company.

TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT—VICKERS VISCOUNT PLANE

2. If so, what is the cost of such an aircraft, and what functions will it perform?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. Yes.

introduced into service by Trans-Canada Air Lines. The department is responsible for the regulation of civil aviation and for air traffic control of both military and civil flying. The increasing use by the military and the introduction for civil purposes of turbine-engined aircraft gives rise to new problems which the department can meet only by obtaining direct experience in the flying of such aircraft.

The aircraft will be used by the department to obtain experience in this field and also to serve for calibration of aids to navigation; field inspection and development of airways and airports; tests with air traffic control; training of departmental personnel to deal with problems arising from new speeds, higher altitudes, flight control, operation and maintenance of aircraft of this type; and for general transportation purposes.

NEVADA BOMB TESTS

Mr. Goode:

What are the true facts in regard to radioactive fall-out in connection with the Nevada bomb tests?

Mr. Martin: The facts in regard to radioactive fall-out as a result of the Nevada bomb tests were given in a report released by the United States atomic energy commission on February 15, 1955. These effects are described in paragraph 31 of the report which reads as follows:

"31. Only relatively small nuclear test explosions are conducted at the Nevada test site, in contrast to the tests of high yield thermonuclear devices at the Pacific proving grounds. In Nevada, as well as in the Pacific, all tests are planned for times when forecast weather conditions minimize the possibility of fall-out hazard. Methods of forecasting weather patterns in these areas are improving steadily. High air bursts at the Nevada testing grounds have produced no significant fall-out and heavy fall-out from near surface explosions has extended only a few miles from the point of burst. The hazard has been successfully confined to the controlled area of the test site. The highest actual dose of radiation at an off-site community has been estimated to be less than one-third of the greatest amount of radiation which atomic energy workers are permitted to receive each year under the atomic energy commission's conservative safety standards."

DENTAL CARE FOR CHILDREN, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Kickham:

What assistance has been provided under the national health program towards the improvement of dental care for children in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Martin:

Federal funds amounting to $92,426 have been provided since the inauguration of the national health program for the establishment of a division of dental health within the

(2) Dental clinics have been set up in the health centre in Summerside, and in Charlottetown.

(3) Dental hygienists are being employed to carry on an educational program in dental health in the rural schools of the province.

2. $1,000 per bed for active treatment beds;

3. $500 per bed for nurses' beds;

4. $1,000 for each 300 square feet of floor space devoted to those services that provide diagnostic and treatment services to outpatients as well as inpatients; and to combined laboratories;

2. If so, when were such payments resumed?

3. How much has been paid to date?

4. How much has been paid since payments were resumed?

5. How much has been paid to date to all provincial governments who have signed the agreement?

Mr. Bourget:

Inquiries of the Ministry

"PARLIAMENT AT WORK"

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many man hours were expended in shooting and preparing the documentary production entitled "Parliament at Work"?
2. What is the estimated cost of the production, including a proportionate share of the annual salaries of the officials for the time engaged in its production?
3. When did the minister first become aware of the shooting of the film?
4. Did the minister order the production to be discontinued as unsuitable for presentation? If so, on what date?

Mr. Pickersgill:

1 and 2. The preparation of a documentary production on "Parliament at Work" was begun on February 15, 1955. Four hundred and seventy-nine man hours were expended on this project at an estimated cost, which includes everything used in computing government costs, of $3,430.65. Material photographed will not be scrapped but will be kept in the stock library for whatever use can be made of it in future.

3. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration first became aware that this film was being prepared about mid-day of March 10, 1955.

4. The minister did not order the production to be discontinued at any time. He attended a viewing of the sequences in company with the Speaker and a number of other members on March 14, 1955, and indicated that one or two of the sequences did not seem very suitable for presentation in a film on parliament at work. The film board officials in charge of the project themselves came to the conclusion that the material they had available would not make a satisfactory picture and that the project should be suspended and the material kept available in case it was decided, at a later date, to make a film on parliament at work. The minister concurred in this decision.

2. How many of these are owned by the government?
3. How many are held on a rental basis?
4. What is the amount of rent for each?

HEALTH INSURANCE

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MINISTER OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Was the minister trying to emulate the late Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King's famous five cent speech—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hees: —in Kitchener the other evening when he said, and I quote—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking the type of question which certainly is not going to give him the kind of information for the supplying of which this period has been set aside. The hon. member would have to make his own deduction as to what the minister was trying to say when he made a certain speech. I would ask the hon. member to put his question as directly as possible without comments which are not allowed.

Mr. Hees: —when he said in Kitchener the other evening—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hees: —that the province of Ontario could only receive a hospitalization plan if it changed the government in the province?

Mr. Speaker: Again I will have to ask the hon. member to put his question.

An hon. Member: He does not know.

Mr. Hees: Then I would ask what the minister meant when he said as quoted in the Globe and Mail that Ontario would only receive a hospitalization plan when there was a change of government in that province.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think I was perhaps the most astonished person in Canada when I read the remarks attributed to me in the Globe and Mail. I do not think I have ever said before that I was misquoted; I was not misquoted in this case, I was not quoted at all. I actually did say something like the following words—

An hon. Member: Something like this?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the following words represent pretty accurately what I said, although it is not exactly word for word, as I did not have a text. I cannot vouch for the individual words exactly or say that they were precisely in this order, but the sense is exactly and precisely as follows.

Mr. Hees: Approximately so.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I said was this. Health is constitutionally a provincial matter but the policy of the federal Liberal party is to assist in provincially administered hospital insurance when the provinces generally are in accord, and that could not happen until the Ontario government adopted a new attitude.

An hon. Member: Come clean now.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CAMP ALDERSHOT—USE OF TRAINING FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. Will the parliamentary assistant indicate what long-term plans his department has for Camp Aldershot, Nova Scotia, and will he assure the house that the maximum use will be made of this excellent training site and facilities?

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. When Camp Gagetown is completed, regular army units will not be stationed at Camp Aldershot except in the event of an emergency. A small permanent caretaking staff will remain at the camp. It is intended, however, that the camp will continue to be used for the training of units of the militia and the Royal Canadian army cadets.

FERRY SERVICE

YARMOUTH-BAR HARBOR—USE OF FERRY "BLUENOSE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to make a progress report on the Bluenose, indicating an approximate launching date as well as when she is now scheduled to start regular runs between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all I can say at the moment is that it is hoped it will be possible to launch this vessel toward the end of the month of May next in order to carry out trials during the month of June and in the early part of July. It is hoped it will be possible to put it into service by the end of July next.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, April 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Harris for committee of supply.

LAW ENFORCEMENT

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock last night we were discussing the question of whether or not I should quote directly from a newspaper story in connection with my remarks. Without in any way admitting the validity of the arguments that were introduced against that quotation, I am quite prepared to save the house time by paraphrasing the story as you suggested. In general this story indicates—

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member for one moment because of his remark that he does not admit the validity of the argument that was advanced. It is not a question of argument that was advanced; it is a ruling that was given and the hon. member must accept it unless he wishes to appeal it.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In general the story indicates that big-time United States gangsters are operating in Montreal but they failed in their first attempt to make Montreal the underworld capital of North America. Five syndicates, we are told, are operating in the general area commanded by a man who was formerly aide to a New York gang boss, Frank Costello. Reference is made in the article to another 25 United States gangsters of United States underworld fame. These men are said in the article to have come to Canada during the last three or four years, none through official immigration channels.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a point of order. The hon. gentleman is paraphrasing newspaper stories about a police investigation that is being carried on at the present time by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I think we are entitled to know whether the hon. gentleman is taking the responsibility for these statements, and if he has any knowledge about this subject that is not available to the government, whether he will give it to the police to facilitate the carrying on of the investigation that has been under way for some considerable time.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is paraphrasing he is, of course, taking the responsibility for the words he is saying. It is up to the hon. member whether or not he will follow the request that the minister has made of him.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The Minister of Justice is in the house, Mr. Speaker, and I take it he has taken note of this and will see that this information is transmitted to the proper authorities. I will also remind the house, Mr. Speaker, that the purpose in bringing this newspaper story into the picture which I am now paraphrasing is to demonstrate to the house the type of information which should have caused the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to instigate an investigation of the situation at the time I raised the point in the house in order to obtain some information for us since most of this information had been bandied about as common knowledge for a good many months previous. Having said that, I will continue with the story.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow me just one short question?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Certainly.

Mr. Lesage: Is the hon. member taking responsibility for the accuracy of the newspaper reports he is now paraphrasing?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In answering that question, Mr. Speaker, I will perhaps have the same view in that regard as did Mr. St. Laurent in this house after he made his famous remark in Seoul on the question of the Chinese government: the information was published in the newspapers. That is the statement I make and I am telling you what information was available in the newspapers to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I take full responsibility for paraphrasing this article and for giving you the information which is contained in the newspapers.

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order then, Mr. Speaker, I understood Your Honour to rule a few minutes ago that when the hon. member was paraphrasing the article which he has in his hands he was taking the responsibility for the accuracy of the facts related in the article. If he does not take that responsibility, I do not believe, sir, in view of what you have said, that he should be allowed to continue.

Mr. Speaker: Let us agree on this point. The hon. member is taking the responsibility for whatever he says. He could be paraphrasing a newspaper story without informing us that he is doing so. He is speaking as a member in this house and whatever he says he is responsible for. Now, it is precisely the objection which was raised by the minister the other day in which I supported him, that he could not be allowed to quote directly from the newspaper because other hon. members would perhaps quote directly from newspapers contradicting what the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace has been quoting. Therefore, instead of having an argument as between hon. members, we would have an argument as between newspapers and would have no facilities, as far as we are concerned, of ascertaining the accuracy of the stories which appeared therein. If the hon. member is making a statement and refers to some information which he has found somewhere he can espouse the information in his own words and make it his own. I mean, an hon. member may make a charge which is not necessarily well founded. But if he wants to make it upon his general responsibility as a member of this house I think we ought to let him do it.

Mr. Lesage: With all due deference to Your Honour, may I point out, sir, that the hon. member is not being argumentative. He is relating facts, and I believe that you just said, sir, that in doing so, he is taking the responsibility for what he is relating. He just refused to take that responsibility.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we could not get it cleared up as to whether the hon. member is really infringing upon any rule of this house. Citation 265 of Beauchesne's third edition reads:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

I wonder whether the newspaper articles which the hon. member is attempting to read or to paraphrase come under the ban of that citation. If Your Honour will look in the concluding paragraph of the immediately preceding citation you will find that it reads:

> Bourinot, page 335, refers to these objections when he says a member may read extracts from documents, books, or other printed publications as part of his speech, provided in so doing he does not infringe upon any point of order.

In the light of that, I wonder whether Your Honour could indicate what other points of order or ruling there might be that the hon. member is infringing upon. It seems to me that he is not out of order.

Mr. Speaker: When the point was raised yesterday I was careful not to quote the two citations that the hon. member has referred to because they are not the two citations on which I anchored my decision. I look at the rule which says that a member must not read his speech. He must advance in support of it whatever he has to say, his own arguments, and not those of others, and no one will question that. What he was attempting to do was to support his views by what he said appeared in a newspaper. He went on to say that if a newspaper reporter should find certain things and report them in the detailed fashion that he has, he felt that the Department of Citizenship and Immigration could have done likewise. At that moment the minister rose and said: In another newspaper someone else has contradicted the story referred to by the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace. It was at that moment that I rose and said: Let us have the hon. member's own words and his own facts. If he wants to refer to information appearing elsewhere he may paraphrase it and take the responsibility for it. Let us not have an argument as between newspapers but as between members.

If the hon. member says: Here is a situation that exists. My own knowledge of this matter is very frail but I have here a newspaper story; that is my bible as far as the situation is concerned. An hon. member on the other side says: I have another newspaper and as far as I am concerned, this is the story. Where do we stand? Then we come to the question of the two citations to which the hon. member has referred. We have long citations from newspaper reports contradicting each other and not very much by way of what the hon. member himself should be saying when he addresses this house, namely, his own arguments, his own views and his own facts, facts within his own knowledge.

The reason I told the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources that it was difficult for me to go beyond what I have already said was this. Citation 262 of Beauchesne's third edition says:

> The practice of reading extracts from newspapers to support an argument in debate has been followed in the British house since 1840, when Speaker Peel, with the acquiescence of the house, allowed a member to proceed to read passages from a newspaper. In 1856, when a member was called to order for reading an extract from a newspaper, the Speaker stated that on former occasions when he had attempted to enforce this rule, he had been overruled by the house. A similar statement was made by the chairman in committee on March 9, 1857.

Now, I take this as an indication—and we know from our own experience here—that it has always been rather difficult to have this rule observed whereby an hon. member will not quote from newspapers in support of his own argument or whatever information he wants to supply to the house. If I am to err I would rather in this instance err on the side of generosity. I think that situation is one which the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace understands, and perhaps we might let him proceed a little further to find out if later on he will be exactly in order. If we find that he is going beyond what the rules allow, we can intervene again. At this moment I will let him go on.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Many of us on all sides of the house would be in difficulties if we were not allowed from time to time to quote from and back our opinions with certain material of this sort.

Mr. Dickey: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): By the way, I am speaking for myself.

Mr. Dickey: Very definitely.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): To return to the paraphrase of the newspaper article, it states that the specialty of those people operating in Montreal was the bookmaking business. It has reference to their doing a business of $5 million a week.

Finally—and this will conclude the paraphrase of the article—they are claimed to have been driven from the city proper by the new city administration and have located in the suburbs. The article continues and indicates that the police of the suburbs deny their existence.

Last night, Mr. Speaker, knowing that it might be argued against this information having been available to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and that it had been denied by the police chief of Montreal, I moved somewhat ahead of myself in answer to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and put on the record a couple of quotations from the police chief of Montreal as reported in the press. That should be emphasized, because some attempts may be made at some time in this debate to claim that the information set forth in this newspaper story was subsequently denied by those in authority. There is no doubt that the deputy director of police of Montreal, Pacifique Plante, on the following day, said one or two different things. But the point is, Mr. Speaker, that never at any time, so far as I can find out, did he categorically deny the truth of those allegations. For example, he is quoted in the Montreal Herald of February 23 as saying:

> I had information—reliable information—weeks ago that five groups of American gamblers were operating in the suburbs. I haven't heard any more since. Frankly, I can't understand what all the present ballyhoo is about.

Subsequently in the story the following appeared:

> A French-language newspaper quoted him as saying the Toronto story was "pure fantasy". Another afternoon paper quoted him as saying the "syndicates" have been driven out of the city and now were operating in the suburbs.
> The same paper claimed Plante said the suburban operations were a "threat" to Montreal.

Plante subsequently denied that.

> In an interview with the Herald Plante declared:—

This is the deputy director of the police department of Montreal speaking.

> "I would consider these men as gamblers or shady characters, not necessarily gangsters. I cannot say whether the operation is still going on in the suburbs. I am not keeping any police there. In Montreal, we are policing the city to the best of our ability and I think we are successful."

Then there is the following:

Plante said that at one point there were perhaps as many as 100 United States gamblers involved in the local operations.

Mr. Bourque: I rise on a question of privilege as mayor of the city of Outremont, a suburb of Montreal. My friend said that the houses of ill fame and gambling houses had all been sent to the suburbs.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: Do not be so sensitive.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has no question of privilege there.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I did not mean to imply by any manner of means that they had all moved into Outremont or the other suburbs. I was doing my best, in spite of interruptions, to establish their existence.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask him one question. Has he any personal knowledge about this subject whatsoever? Does he know of a single person who has entered this country illegally and, if so, why has he not laid an information?

Mr. Dickey: All he knows is what he reads in the newspapers.

Mr. Hees: You do not even know that. That was a sharp one, wasn't it?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Let me say at this point, because I propose to introduce it later, that I know of at least one man with a criminal record in the United States who entered Canada, who subsequently was convicted of an offence in Canada and who has definitely remained in Canada with the blessing and the support of the previous minister of citizenship and immigration.

An hon. Member: Give the name.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): His name is Harold C. Banks. Having disposed of that—

Mr. Hees: Any more questions, Jack?

Mr. Pickersgill: What about my question?

Mr. Dickey: Is he one of the gamblers?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): There is one other bit of information. In the same story there is another statement, although not made by Mr. Plante. The article reads:

Superintendent Edward Brakefield-Moore of the R.C.M.P. said yesterday his men had been investigating the men "for at least two months" in co-operation with Montreal police. He said the information was being turned over to the immigration department. Asked whether prosecution was expected, the R.C.M.P. official replied the matter would be decided in Ottawa. He indicated that present publicity may alter the course of events.

I come now to the part played by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in this affair. It has already been indicated that undesirable aliens have been operating in the bookmaking business in Canada for something over two years and that for several months indications of such activities have been a matter of record through the press. I may say further that the names of many of these men are known—I am going to put some of them on the record in a few minutes—and are a matter of record in certain police forces in Canada. It is equally clear that the department has the power to inquire into and order the deportation of undesirable aliens who have entered Canada. Yet what has the department done? Nothing.

I want to know, for example, what the minister has done regarding the statement in the Toronto Telegram of February 22 which I paraphrased a little while ago, a statement that refers specifically to these people entering Canada by other means than through official immigration channels. These statements are not idle chatter. They are statements made by responsible newspapermen after considerable effort on their part which I, before coming here, have sincerely attempted to verify, and to the best of my knowledge and belief I have verified that these conditions exist. To give some idea of the type of men we are dealing with, let me tell you something about one of the men who has been operating in Montreal. He is Carmine Galenti, alias Galento, alias John Lelo, the name by which he is most commonly known in Montreal, alias John Surro. He is American born and has been in and around Montreal for most of the last three years and has been known, perhaps rightly, perhaps wrongly, as part owner of a certain restaurant which forms one of the hang-outs for the entire gang of thugs.

He was tried for murder, convicted of manslaughter in the second degree and sentenced to five to ten years. Subsequently he was paroled and later was picked up and served the rest of his sentence. He was convicted of felonious assault on a police officer, sentenced to 12½ years and apparently served it all. There are other charges against him in the United States. There are others, many of them, who have been engaged in this operation. The information is available, and I tell the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) that it is available no farther away from him than the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police if he would only ask him for it, on at least 25 of these individuals, a number of whom may be easily identified as Americans with extremely questionable backgrounds and checkered careers both in Canada and the United States.

I have given the house the record of Galenti. Another who is well known is Camille Salim Joseph, alias Jacobs, who was actually convicted recently of keeping a bookmaking establishment. Then there are Michael Joseph Consolo, better known as Big Mike, Gilbert Beckley, Leo Schaeffer, Gino Campo, Jack Keithley and D. Geigerman. These are names which are on record with the police department, and apparently the Department of Citizenship and Immigration has done nothing about them. If one is sincere, and I am sincere, one does not get these names and satisfy oneself sufficiently to be able to stand up and make such charges in the house without a tremendous amount of personal effort and a genuine attempt to establish the facts to one's satisfaction.

I want the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to stand up and tell us why he has not looked into this situation because I do not think he can tell us he did not have some of this information over a period of a great many months. I want to know what relationship exists between one of these men and one with a very similar name who was investigated most thoroughly by the Kefauver inquiry in the United States. There is yet another with the same name and initials as a man who was identified during the Kefauver inquiry as the brother-in-law of Frank Costello, perhaps the most notorious witness before that inquiry and commonly accepted as one of the two top men in the United States underworld and racketeering organization.

For two years at least this group of people has been operating in and around Montreal. Particularly in later months the Montreal police department has done outstanding work in hampering their activities. May I say here that the remarks I am making are not a criticism in any way, shape or form of the Montreal police department. It is not the local police departments or the local municipal authorities who are at fault, and I think the mayor of Outremont will agree with me in that statement. It is not the fault of the local organizations that these racketeers have chosen to move into their centres and concentrate their activities there. The police departments of the area are outstanding and they are doing everything they can to break up the group and drive these men away. But it is not part of their job to pick up and prosecute undesirable aliens and drive them out of Canada.

The sort of thing these American racketeers and gangsters are doing in Canada is like a cancer. Once it is established it spreads, grows and extends its tentacles all over the country. A little while ago these men were firmly established in Montreal. Perhaps knowing that my investigation was being carried on, and certainly as a result of the work of the Montreal police department, they seem to have been temporarily driven underground. But we can be sure, I think, that they will come up again. I think they will come up in Canada, Mr. Speaker, because of conditions previously outlined, unless we drive them right out of this country. I referred previously to Mr. Banks, and I just emphasize that as one indication again of the attitude that this citizenship and immigration department is prepared to take on occasion towards people who have known criminal records.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to sum up very briefly. First, organized crime, and that I think of as crime based on bookmaking and betting, is a serious danger to any community in which it exists. Secondly, such organized crime has been operating in and around Montreal for a number of years. Third, most of the key people in this operation have been United States gangsters, thugs and racketeers. Fourth, this has been a matter of general knowledge throughout most of the period, and police records exist with the R.C.M.P. and local police on most, if not all, of these men. Fifth, it has been possible for working newspapermen to establish these facts and make them a matter of public record. Sixth, despite all this the Department of Citizenship and Immigration has remained quiescent and has not taken steps to rid Canada of these undesirable aliens. Seventh, there has been no indication to this house some six weeks afterwards, nor any report, that the Department of Citizenship and Immigration has taken official steps to remedy the situation or even investigate the charges made on February 22, both in the newspapers and in this house.

I appreciate the fact, Mr. Speaker, that with the cutting into my time of the arguments on points of order, I have gone a few minutes over my time. I close with this one sentence. For the reasons that I have set forth here, Mr. Speaker, with the information I have given, I find that I have no words strong enough which could be used in this House of Commons to condemn the performance of the present and former ministers of citizenship and immigration in connection with this matter. I feel that their inaction aids, condones and abets organized crime in Canada.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I feel it is absolutely essential, Mr. Speaker, that something be said in reply to this anthology of hearsay that we have had over two days. The hon. gentleman was very careful not to answer my question when I asked him if he had any personal knowledge of these matters or any sure knowledge of any kind. All he has done has been to read to us bits and pieces from various articles in various newspapers, and to talk about "common knowledge". I do not believe he would get very far in the courts prosecuting people on the basis of "common knowledge".

Now, when the hon. gentleman brought this subject up on February 22 by asking a question, I answered that I was advised that reports somewhat similar to the one he attempted to read—in fact, I believe it was the identical one—were brought to the attention of the R.C.M.P. and the immigration branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I said that an investigation had been under way for some time to ascertain whether or not there had been any violation of the laws which the federal government has responsibility for enforcing, and that of course included the Immigration Act. When I said that the R.C.M.P. were investigating reports similar to these, I meant precisely what I said.

The latest information I have is that that police investigation is still continuing. I do not think any reasonable person would expect a minister of citizenship and immigration to get up and give a progress report while a police investigation into some alleged crime was still going on. I can assure the hon. gentleman that as soon as the police or the hon. gentleman or anybody else puts in our hands information upon which we can take action in the courts with any reasonable chance of success, or on which we can deport any undesirable person who is here contrary to the law, there will be no time lost in doing that.

[Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace).]

Mr. Speaker: Since this question of quoting newspapers is one that often arises in debate, and about which certain points of order are quite often raised, I have looked into Beauchesne's third edition further, and I find that on page 123, citation 303 refers to the responsibility a member must accept if he is quoting from a newspaper and basing his arguments on those quotations. The reference is to a question which is being asked on the orders of the day, as to whether or not the statement appearing in the press is true.

I am referring more particularly to the second paragraph of citation 303, and it seems to me there is a certain analogy there. The paragraph reads:

> It is not in order to ask merely whether certain statements made in a newspaper are true; but attention may be drawn to such statements, if the member who puts the question makes himself responsible for their accuracy.

There is a certain analogy there between the principle advanced in this citation having to do with questions being asked of ministers and the situation with which we were confronted a moment ago. Whenever we base ourselves on a report in the newspaper or even paraphrase a document, I do not think one can avoid taking full responsibility as a member of this house for whatever one says.

ACADIAN BICENTENARY

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I will only take a few minutes of the valuable time of the house to voice a grievance. The house is already aware of the fact that on the occasion of the bicentenary of the deportation of the Acadians, a number of commemorative ceremonies will be held in various centres of the maritimes, of the province of Quebec and also in Louisiana where, as a matter of fact, some celebrations have already been held.

These observances, which have been organized in Canada as well as in the United States as a tribute to the survival and rebirth of the Acadian people, are of interest to over a million Canadians and Americans of Acadian descent.

They are also of interest to English-speaking Canadians from the maritimes, particularly those from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, who are generously co-operating in the organization of these celebrations.

There is an hon. member of the other place, for instance, a resident of Halifax, who has been enthusiastically taking part in this organizational work. Most of the maritime members of this house, in fact,

English as well as French-speaking, have extended to the organizers their kindest support. We know too that the state of Louisiana has already contributed a substantial amount to the fund set up by our Acadian cousins of that part of the United States for the purpose of these celebrations.

Next summer hundreds, even thousands, of visitors from Louisiana will come to this country, particularly to the maritimes. The conseil de la vie française, under the skilled leadership of its secretary, Father Paul-Emile Gosselin, has already organized a useful tour of Louisiana by Canadians. It is also preparing several other friendship tours to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

This year, then, a continuous flow of tourists will bear down upon the maritime provinces. These friendship tours, these pilgrimages made by Canadians from central Canada to the maritimes, and particularly to Nova Scotia, will no doubt continue from year to year. In that province, formerly called Acadia, there are several historical sites particularly dear to the hearts of Canadians and Americans of Acadian descent.

This constitutes for Nova Scotia a source of income that is hardly tapped and that the Canadian government should help to develop, if only from a strict touristic point of view.

We just learned, through the provincial treasurer, Hon. Mr. Fielding, that the government of Nova Scotia has just decided to grant a generous subscription to the fund for the organization of the Acadian celebrations which will be held this year in that province.

Moreover, the government of Nova Scotia, through its information office, just issued a fine stamp, with inscriptions in both official languages, to commemorate the bicentenary of the deportation of the Acadians. Both decisions, bespeaking broad-mindedness and generosity, are well calculated to promote national unity in this country and certainly deserve to be called to the attention of this house. They deeply stir those who, by reason of their Acadian origin, have maintained the love of tradition.

On behalf of the electors of Bonaventure county, whom I have the honour to represent in this house, about thirty thousand of whom are of Acadian origin, I wish to express deep gratitude to the premier of Nova Scotia and to his government for what they just did for the descendants of the first French pioneers who settled on the banks of the bays of Fundy and Chignecto.

The New Brunswick legislature, we have been assured, is about to subscribe, in turn, a substantial amount for the organization of these Acadian celebrations. Prince Edward Island also expressed its intention to contribute.

No doubt the government of the province of Quebec, which counts 350,000 people of Acadian descent, of whom about 100,000 settled there recently, will also wish to do its share.

We know indeed that the Canadian government already has done a great deal to help in the organization of these Acadian celebrations.

They have fortunately implemented several recommendations made by our colleagues from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and by those of us who represent constituencies comprising large groups of people of Acadian origin. We are grateful for what they have done.

Moreover, the Canadian government was officially represented at the ceremonies in Louisiana last January and on March 24 last. I believe, our ambassador at Washington went to New Orleans and made a moving speech, in French and English, which deeply touched the hearts of all Louisianians.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has not yet shown any intention of contributing financially to the organization of those commemorative celebrations of the Acadian festivities which will take place in various parts of the maritime provinces and in the province of Quebec during the year, or of issuing a postage stamp to commemorate the event. That is the grievance I wished to lay before the house.

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, as member for Magdalen islands where 90 per cent of the electors are of Acadian origin, I take great pleasure in supporting the speech just made by my colleague, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault), in connection with the grievance he has just stated.

As I have already spoken on this matter, it is not my intention to dwell upon it at length today. I wish to recall to the house that I spoke of the Acadian festivities in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I then stated that the organization of those ceremonies entailed heavy expenses and I suggested that the federal government should help pay the cost.

I shall not say any more, Mr. Speaker, and will limit my remarks to supporting what the hon. member for Bonaventure has just said. But I want to express my firm belief that the federal government should help pay the cost of these Acadian celebrations.

As I said in the other debate, people talk about the French survival in Canada, they admire the accomplishments of the French Canadian people, as distinct from the Acadian people. But, Mr. Speaker, I say that the Acadians are even more deserving than the French Canadians, for not only were they conquered but they were dispersed and they had to overcome a great many obstacles before they could come back to their country. Therefore they deserve that the government help them celebrate this second centenary.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate, and if I do so, it will be only for a few moments.

Very few members know that part of the constituency I have the honour of representing here is called Little Acadia; several parishes of my riding of Nicolet-Yamaska were indeed formed, developed and settled by the descendants of Acadians and that is why they are known today as Little Acadia.

I do not know what the federal government could do, or what it should do. I can, however, assure the hon. members that if it took part in the anniversary celebrations that are being prepared in various places throughout eastern Canada, the Acadian population of my constituency would be grateful to this house and the government.

(Text):

RADIO RECEPTION, ARROW LAKES DISTRICT

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise very briefly to bring a grievance to the attention of the house, and I do so after a special request from many of my constituents who will not be able to hear the Easter programs on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation network. I am sorry the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) is not in his seat, but I am somewhat comforted by the fact that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) is listening to what I have to say.

Mr. Sinclair: As usual.

Mr. Herridge: I know the Minister of Fisheries takes a very motherly interest in all things that occur in the interior of British Columbia.

The fact I wish to bring to the attention of the house is that there are still thousands of my constituents who are unable to hear Canadian stations or Canadian programs, or to listen to the C.B.C., while at the same time millions of dollars are being spent on television in other parts of Canada. And we support that expenditure, of course.

For years chambers of commerce, farmers' institutes, labour organizations, the Canadian Legion and other organizations have passed resolutions asking that something be done to remedy this situation. As recently as last December a meeting was held in the Arrow lakes area which was attended by over 300 people from the Arrow-Slocan lakes. That meeting dealt with this question and passed a resolution urging the government to do something about improving radio reception at points where no programs, with the exception of those from the United States, are received.

During the last year low power relay transmitters have been established at Castlegar and at Kaslo and I wish to say they are very much appreciated by the people in those districts. The very fact that these people are now able to receive C.B.C. programs from early morning until late in the evening has stimulated interest in these stations and strengthened the demand that something be done to serve the rest of the area. I have been told by officials of the C.B.C. that this can be done and I cannot understand why something has not been done to date.

It may be said to be a question of population but I do not think that that argument can hold because I know that low power relay transmitters have been established at points where the population is under 300 people, whereas these various organizations suggest that a transmitter at Nakusp would serve from 2,000 to 3,000 people; the station at Rosebery would serve some 2,000 to 3,000 people and the station at Balfour would serve from 3,000 to 4,000 people. So I contend that as far as population is concerned we should qualify for some attention in this regard.

I am told that it is also a matter of funds, but I would direct the attention of the minister and the officials to the fact that we are spending large sums of money to provide television service to the great majority of Canadians and I think it only right that pioneering people in the outlying districts should have a chance to listen to Canadian radio programs.

In that connection I have this year's report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in which low power relay stations are dealt with on page 52 as follows:

These are satellite transmitters of low power which are attached to the wire line networks at repeater points. These stations are able to relay programs only and are not able to originate live broadcasts. Communities serviced are those unable due to topography to receive any adequate signal from a Canadian radio station and yet not large enough to support their own local station.

That is exactly the situation in the parts of my constituency that I have mentioned and I think the size of the population fully justifies the installation of these stations. I have made inquiries about this and I am not altogether convinced that the reason is the reluctance of the C.B.C. to establish these stations. I would direct the attention of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and the house to the fact that already there are either telephone or telegraph wire services to these communities. From the information which I have gathered from various sources I am rather under the impression that the Canadian Pacific does not want to have to prop up its old poles in order to carry the two more wires that would be required to provide this service.

I do not think that the reluctance of any company, whether telephone or telegraph, to spend money to improve its lines should prevent communities having radio reception. These communities are producing considerable wealth. For example, last year over a million dollars worth of lumber products were shipped out of Nakusp, and other communities are producing minerals in a similar ratio. I bring this to the attention of the house at the request of the people of my constituency and of a number of organizations who direct my attention to the fact that they will not be able to hear the Easter programs sent out by Canadian stations.

These Canadians in Kootenay West are unable to enjoy Canadian programs while a great majority of Canadians are able to enjoy television. In fairness to these people I contend that serious consideration should be given regardless of the difficulties. The expense is not too great especially in relation to the expensive services which are rendered to other Canadians. Low power relay transmitters should be installed at the two or three points necessary so that these good people may be able to enjoy the C.B.C. and Canadian programs rather than to be forced to listen day after day, week after week, month after month and year after year to United States programs and newscasts.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—REPORTED LAY-OFFS AT ORENDA ENGINE PLANT

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, the grievance to which I should like to refer this afternoon arises out of an announcement made the day before yesterday that 1,000 workers would be laid off at the Orenda engine plant. This would be in addition to the 2,000 which it was announced would be laid off by A. V. Roe company.

This will affect the unemployment situation considerably. The announcement has been made that certain steps will be taken to reallocate these people in other industries. I suggest that this recent announcement will have a most serious effect on the whole Canadian aircraft situation and it is for that reason that I bring it to the attention of the house.

We have in the Canadian aircraft industry the finest designers in the world who have been capable of designing civilian aircraft capable of competing with any aircraft in the world. As the result of government direction, civilian production of these designs has to be set aside to provide for the production of military aircraft. As a result of recent government orders cutting back military production we have had the laying off of aircraft workers who are skilled in their trade. These workers will be lost to the industry, their earnings and standard of living will be reduced.

The encouragement by the government for the design of civilian aircraft has been absolutely nil and the result of this policy will be that there will be nothing to replace the man hours lost in these aeroplane plants because of the reduction in military orders. I suggest that either a policy should be adopted of continuing production at the present level in order to keep these aircraft workers busy until the designers can get their civilian production going, or the announcement should be made by the government that they will not interfere with civilian production. The industry could then run a civilian production line parallel with the military production line.

We have had three separate lay-offs of 1,000 each directly due to government interference, and we do not know what the end will be. Each time we have had some assurance that there will be no further lay-offs. I consider this a serious grievance to lay before the house and I submit there should be some definite announcement as to when there will be an end to this piecemeal separation of the aircraft industry.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) and his parliamentary assistant, I cannot add anything to what I said the other day except to reassure my hon. friend that the step which I suggested then is being taken by the national employment service looking toward a replacement of these workers. Perhaps he would defer an answer to the longer-term production question till after the recess.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—USE OF OFFICIAL STATIONERY

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): The matter I rise to speak about is not one of great importance, but I think it reflects on the dignity of the house to a certain extent.

I received in the mail this morning a copy of the circular of the World Wide Gum Company of Granby, Quebec. It is over the signature of a member of parliament and what I take exception to is the fact that the circular which was sent to the Georgian Bay Tourist Company was sent in a House of Commons envelope. I do not think it is in keeping with the dignity of the house that gum advertisements should be sent in official House of Commons stationery. I see that the Acting Postmaster General is in the house, and I hope he will take it up with the hon. member concerned and see that this practice is discontinued.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman may have seen a letter I addressed a year ago to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) when I once before was Acting Postmaster General. Of course, letters that are sealed are sacrosanct to the post office and the responsibility for the proper use of the frank and the official stationery is the responsibility of each one of us as a member of parliament and it is not the responsibility of the post office.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. Before this matter goes any further I am going to suggest to the house—it caught me by surprise—that grievances which can be raised before supply is voted to Her Majesty are grievances, naturally, against the government of the country or over which the government of the country might be said to have some jurisdiction. Although I am not suggesting it is out of order, I think the point raised by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) is perhaps more in the nature of a question dealing with the privileges of the House of Commons, over which we all hope the government of the country does not have authority. Therefore I am suggesting that the members might be agreeable that the matter should be left at this stage.

WINNIPEG GENERAL HOSPITAL—FINANCIAL POSITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to speak more than a few minutes at this stage but there is a crisis in my constituency of Winnipeg North Centre, in my city of Winnipeg and in my province of Manitoba, which I feel I should publicly draw to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). It is a crisis which in my view could have been avoided if this government had acted long ago. It is a crisis the like of which may occur in other provinces throughout this country during the months and years that lie ahead, but again I say it can be avoided if the government will take action on one of its own promises.

I refer to the crisis that has developed with respect to the operation of the Winnipeg general hospital in the city of Winnipeg. That hospital finds itself faced with a terrific bank overdraft that the newspapers have headlined as a cash crisis, on the basis of which the board of trustees has given what is referred to as an ultimatum to the public authorities that unless the money is made available they will have to turn the hospital over to the public authorities.

The reason I raise the matter here, Mr. Speaker, and the reason I call it to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare is, I think, as obvious to him as it is to everyone else. This kind of crisis—

Mr. Harris: May I interrupt only to ask the fairly obvious question, can this not be debated on the estimates and, if so, is it not out of order at this time?

Mr. Knowles: I question the statement of the Minister of Finance that anything that can be debated on the estimates is out of order at this time. I would also point out that one of the features that is supposed to be basic to a grievance is that there is some element of urgency, and I suggest there is an element of very real urgency in this matter so far as the people who are affected are concerned.

My point to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, which as I have said should be obvious, is that a crisis like this could have been prevented if he had long ago brought in a nation-wide plan of health insurance, and I tell him that unless he acts on that important matter there will be other crises like this throughout the country.

I said I would be brief, and I have only another sentence or two to say. I call upon the minister and upon the government to quit making a joke out of the fact that they have had health insurance in their platform since 1919, and to act on that question soon before more people suffer as a result of crises such as this one that now confronts us in Manitoba.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Friday, April 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items numbered 92 to 111 inclusive of the main estimates, 1955-56, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I think it was with considerable regret that yesterday the right hon. Prime Minister informed us that Sir Winston Churchill had resigned his portfolio as Prime Minister of Great Britain. I do not think any of us here would for a moment disagree that Mr. Churchill is deserving of his rest and retirement. He has been recognized not only as probably the greatest leader Great Britain has ever had—and some would even go as far as to say that the world has had—but certainly he has been the greatest leader the commonwealth has had.

Because Mr. Churchill has always taken such a great interest in what is now the commonwealth of nations I would like for the next few moments to direct my remarks to this association of nations. If not in years at least in sequence of events it has been a long time since the Pax Britannica of the last half of the last century stabilized the world. As all of us know only too well, the events of the first 50 years of this century have so changed the political aspects of our planet that such a picture would have been completely unforeseeable at the turn of the century. Great powers have risen and fallen; new waves of violent nationalisms have sprung up and are running their course, and the struggle for men's minds is presently continuing between two great political and economic ideologies.

The great British Empire, which has contributed so much to mankind in the science of government, law, fields of literature, the natural sciences and in human standards of decency and morality, has survived two great world wars and has been a victor in both. But what was once the British Empire has now so altered its original form, and is continuing to do so to such an extent, that it has become almost unrecognizable when compared with what it was when Sir Winston Churchill started his political career 50 years ago.

As all of us know, in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries the industrial revolution in Great Britain, together with her resources of iron and coal—and what is more important, the stability, perseverance and determination of her people—made Britain by far the most powerful country in the world and extended her territorial possessions, culture, language and government to every corner of the globe. Beginning in the last century, and almost completed in this century, a peaceful evolution has taken place and is continuing to run its course in the various territorial parts of what once constituted this great empire which was originally ruled from England. Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India,

Pakistan and Ceylon have all become, largely in an orderly and peaceful manner, completely independent countries. Other sections such as Burma and the southern part of Ireland have not only become independent but have withdrawn from even a nominal association with the other countries that now form what we know as the British commonwealth of nations.

It is toward this arrangement known as the commonwealth of nations that I should like to direct my remarks for the next few moments. The commonwealth is a type of political arrangement that was previously unknown in recorded history, although in its earlier stages the Delian confederacy of classic Greece was in some ways similar. These independent countries forming the present commonwealth all have various and diverse nationalistic aims which frequently cause members of the commonwealth to come at least into diplomatic conflict with each other. For instance, India and Pakistan have certainly had some diplomatic conflict with each other over Kashmir. India and South Africa are not exactly upon the friendliest terms with each other. Also, these various independent units of the commonwealth compete with each other economically as, for instance, Canada and New Zealand with respect to the export of cheese. Yet despite all this, all these countries, whether they be kingdoms or republics, recognize Her Majesty as the titular head of the commonwealth.

People in other lands outside of the commonwealth find this paradoxical arrangement very difficult to understand. They ask, in the light of present conditions, what is the commonwealth? The units are independent and there is certainly no unanimity as far as foreign policy is concerned. They say "You struggle against each other for world markets, yet you call yourselves members of a family of nations with a queen as its head, although you are racially and culturally totally different groups".

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that as things stand at the moment, and as far as the present trend of the commonwealth is concerned, I find myself among this group of inquiring people wondering what the commonwealth really is at the present time. We all know that at the present time various members of the commonwealth act as liaison officers and interpreters between the two great power blocs of the world, namely the United States on the one hand and the Russo-Chinese bloc on the other. We know that Canada often is called upon to interpret and possibly even mediate difficulties and differences of opinion between the United States and England, and we have heard that India has a somewhat more direct pipe line to Peking than have some other members of the commonwealth. In that respect the liaison is created between communist China and the western world, a liaison that of course is becoming increasingly important at the present time.

We know that in most cases there is more than the usual friendly association between the governments of the commonwealth countries; we know that occasionally conferences are held to discuss undisclosed problems, whatever they may be. But what else is there to this association which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and others have described as a friendly and easy-going association?

I should like to ask what is the basic difference between our association with commonwealth countries and say the republic of France or Brazil? Do we not have a friendly and easy-going association with these countries? What is the basic difference between the commonwealth and the United Nations? That is the question I have been wondering about, and I think a great many of us have been wondering about. I hope the Prime Minister or more probably the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he sums up the debate on this resolution will enlighten us a little further.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that if at all possible something should be done toward strengthening the relationship between various units of the commonwealth. There is no doubt that the present trend of commonwealth countries is to become less and less associated with each other, and the inevitable result will be the complete dissolution of the commonwealth.

This trend has become most marked and greatly accelerated since the end of world war II. As we all know, new power blocs and new nationalisms have sprung up around the world since then. Canada and England are members of NATO, whereas India, Australia and Pakistan are not. Australia and New Zealand are members of ANZUS and Canada is not. India apparently has aspirations to remain completely neutral and become the leader of the new nationalism in Asia. Pakistan seems to be more favourably inclined toward the west. We have all seen in the past that the break-up of great empires leaves a power vacuum, and in this world of ours some other power group will inevitably move into such a vacuum.

We do not have to go back very far in history to see this. The Austro-Hungarian empire, which had kept middle Europe unified for centuries and which acted as an effective block to the territorial ambitions of other states for many years, was dismembered after world war I. This was a well-meant dismemberment, I do not doubt, and brings to mind Woodrow Wilson and his doctrine of self-determination of nations, a very commendable doctrine which has resulted in something that I am afraid Mr. Woodrow Wilson did not foresee. We all know that the only result of this dismemberment was a group of weak states in central Europe forming alliances with different power blocs, and in the end they were independently too weak to resist German aggression under the late unlamented Adolf Hitler.

For many years prior to world war II the press and others in the United States continually advocated the break-up of the British Empire, and accused England of repressing subject peoples. This attitude was even reflected by the late President Roosevelt on different occasions during world war II. Well, since world war II this group have had their wish. It would seem to me that these same persons are now perhaps wishing they had not been so anxious to see the British Empire dismembered, because this resulting power vacuum has already been created in places like Burma and India, with consequent alarm to the United States in its new role of world leader.

Oddly enough, Mr. Speaker, in India, Pakistan and elsewhere I understand from personal knowledge at the present time this group of Americans who so earnestly advocated freedom for these countries are by no means popular, and in India and Pakistan the British people are by no means unpopular. It is a rather strange result, but I suppose it points the moral that sometimes we should keep our noses out of other people's business.

However, to continue, if this same situation should ultimately result in a different way with the other nations of the commonwealth the whole course of history will undoubtedly be changed, and I am afraid not for the better. It is quite true that we have the United Nations, and that if open aggression were to take place against a country such as India the United Nations would come to India's aid, as some members of the United Nations did in the case of South Korea. However, in the world of today there are various ways of committing aggression, as we all know. For example country A, let us call it, may instigate and be completely responsible for aggression, yet sit blandly back and be like Caesar's wife, above reproach.

What I meant by this is that it is possible for country A, by promoting internal revolution and similar methods in country B, to be responsible for setting up a government in country B that will acquiesce and make that country a satellite of country A. One of the most recent examples I can think of is the situation that developed between Russia and Czechoslovakia, and it is not inconceivable that a similar situation could happen in India, Indonesia or Burma at the present time, or in many other places. Undoubtedly the United Nations under such circumstances would find it theoretically very difficult to interfere in what would apparently be the internal affairs of a member nation.

This is just an example to show that it is not always wise to rely entirely upon the United Nations. I think it further shows that countries should develop their own defence forces or join in mutual aid pacts, as has been well illustrated throughout the world in cases such as NATO, ANZUS, SEATO to a lesser extent, and so forth. I think it might be wise—and I shall deal with this in a moment or two—if some consideration were given to forming some sort of commonwealth defence pact, not so much as a bulwark against world war III, although I think it would help in that respect, as against limited aggression on the periphery of the Soviet-controlled empire.

The type of war and aggression we have had almost constantly since 1945 has not been major war but limited aggression here and there using conventional weapons. All of us fear the possibility of a major holocaust with hydrogen bombs. But because of the very danger of such bombs, as has been pointed out to the house many times, we may never get that; but we may have constant pressure and piecemeal wars using conventional weapons and a constant whittling away at territories on the edge of the communist world. Some of the members of the commonwealth are not able to defend themselves, but by the formation of a pact with the other members of the commonwealth I think this type of aggression could be effectively resisted.

I fully realize that the problems would be very great in attempting to arrest the present trend among commonwealth countries. As I have already mentioned, the units of the commonwealth have different political aspirations, and often opposing economic aims and different cultural and racial backgrounds. However, I do feel that if some member of the commonwealth took the lead in this matter a much stronger relationship could somehow be worked out among the commonwealth countries. I think this strengthening of the bonds among the commonwealth countries is necessary as an added assurance for world peace and the ultimate prevention of world war III.

At present the two great armed giants of the world, the United States and Russia, sit scowling at each other on opposite sides of the world. There is no other country or group of countries at the present time that could even hope to challenge the might of either of these countries. If, however, the relationship between the commonwealth countries were strengthened it might conceivably lead to a third power bloc which would be powerful enough to act as a counterbalance to the United States and Russia. This, of course, is probably only a fond hope, but I do not think there is any harm in trying. I am not suggesting for one moment that at the present time the commonwealth countries should act with one voice in the matter of foreign affairs, because that is a practical impossibility; but I do feel that if steps were taken to strengthen the commonwealth relationship this one voice in foreign affairs might not, some time in the future, be as practically impossible as it is now.

I understand that efforts have been made by at least one member of the commonwealth to set up an intercommonwealth defence force, but that these efforts came to naught since the suggestion received a lukewarm reception on the part of two of the members of the commonwealth who participated in the talks, and I understand that Canada was one of them. However, it may be that the effort made was not strong enough or that the ground for the proposal was not properly prepared. As I mentioned earlier, we all know the great value of the commonwealth in acting as interpreter between the American and Russian blocs, but surely it could be something more than just that.

I should like to see Canada take the lead and openly make a determined effort to greatly strengthen the political bonds between the various units of the commonwealth. I suggest Canada because if England were to try to do it undoubtedly it would make countries that are newly independent, such as India, Pakistan and Ceylon, suspicious; but I do not think these countries would be suspicious of Canada or of our motives or intentions. Everyone knows we have no desire for territorial gain or any wish to dominate any other country either directly or indirectly.

Our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), as a result of his past work in the United Nations, is widely respected throughout the entire world, and I might say, properly so. I feel that he might be the man, if the government felt so inclined, to do the job of strengthening the commonwealth and arresting the present trend toward dissolution. A strengthened commonwealth which would make it quite clear to the world that in a great emergency it would act as a unit to resist aggression could certainly be a decisive factor in preserving world peace. As I mentioned before, I think this is necessary because in the light of the events of the past few years I do not think the United Nations could be relied upon entirely to prevent armed aggression either openly or indirectly by subversion and internal revolution.

It is only a suggestion, but I feel the first step that might be taken toward closer commonwealth association would be to set up a central secretariat, possibly located in Canada or even in some other country if necessary. I know full well there is a close relationship between commonwealth countries through the high commissioners' offices. I am quite aware of that, but the psychological effect of having a central secretariat for the commonwealth would be very great, and from then on I am sure other steps might well follow toward closer association.

Another suggestion would be that the prime ministers of the various commonwealth units might have meetings, more often if necessary but at least annual meetings. These would be just preliminary steps along the road in the opposite direction to which the commonwealth is going at the moment. As I mentioned earlier, I think if an effort were made by this country, with the ground properly prepared, there might be a stronger possibility of having some intercommonwealth defence force, which might well be the answer for reasons I have already pointed out and shall not repeat. Such a step is probably impractical at the moment, but I feel it could be worked out.

Nationalism can sometimes be a strong force for good but misguided nationalism—and we see evidence of it in nearly every commonwealth country, even here—is just the opposite. If each member of the commonwealth continues to be determined to be its own little empire builder and is not prepared to give up, in some small respect, any of its national sovereignty we shall, as the old expression goes, "all hang separately since we won't hang together." However, if we bind ourselves closer together the commonwealth family may yet be the deciding factor in saving the world from annihilation.

All through the world we hear the argument that every country must give up some of its national sovereignty for the purpose of some form of world government or international control, and I think the commonwealth, because of our past associations, would be a good place to start and set an example to others. I think it can be done if someone makes a determined effort and gives strong leadership; and again, and finally, I think Canada is the nation to do it.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise to support as strongly as I can, Mr. Speaker, the position taken by my leader the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he spoke in this debate on March 24. As the minister and members of the house will recall, my leader made it crystal clear on that occasion, as he has on other occasions, that we feel the people of Canada do not want to get involved in United States policy with respect to Formosa, Quemoy, Matsu and other areas in the Far East. He made it clear also that we feel Canadian foreign policy should be made here in Ottawa, not in Washington.

In that position, Mr. Speaker, we find ourselves in agreement with statements that have been made on earlier occasions by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). In fact until fairly recently, perhaps until his recent speech before the Canadian Club in Toronto, we were satisfied with the position taken by the minister in that he said many times that Canada has no commitments in that part of the world other than any commitments that might arise because of our membership in the United Nations.

However, we feel from the statement made by the minister in his Toronto speech and from the explanation of that statement which he made in this house on March 24, that that position has been qualified. It seems to us that the position of the government now is that Canada does not agree with the attitude Mr. Dulles takes towards the possible defence of Quemoy or Matsu. It is the policy of the Canadian government that we do not intend to get involved in any war over the defence of these islands. Indeed, we are not committed to take part in any war with respect to the defence of Formosa. However, the minister goes on and suggests that what might start out as a small war could become a big war and if the United States found itself in a big war, no matter how it started, Canada would find itself involved.

Now, if the minister were merely saying that if a world-wide conflagration breaks out, particularly bearing in mind the power blocs that exist in the world today, because of our geographical position, to put it in the vernacular, we would have had it, one could hardly argue with him. But it seems to us that the kind of statement he has made—I refer to his statement in Toronto before the Canadian Club and his explanation of that statement in this house—weakens his position with regard to any further representations he might make to Washington.

We feel the result is that Canada has said that we regard ourselves as quite free to make any decisions we want with regard to foreign policy, so long as they are agreed to by Washington. In our view the minister should take another look at the statements he has made and try to repair the damage that we feel was done. He should try to make it clear again to the United States that Canada does not believe it is a good idea to get involved in a war over Quemoy or Matsu; indeed, that we should not be a party to United States attempts to keep the Chinese civil war going.

If there is a difference between the approach of the United States to the situation in the Far East and the approach of the United Kingdom, I think it was well put in an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen last night. I have not the editorial before me, but as I recall its content it went something like this. The United States seems anxious to keep that civil war going in the hope that it may eventually result in Chiang Kai-shek getting control of the mainland again. On the other hand, the United Kingdom feels that it is time that civil war was liquidated and brought to a conclusion.

No one in this house can say of the former prime minister of the United Kingdom, Sir Winston Churchill, or of the new Prime Minister, Sir Anthony Eden, that either of these gentlemen is an appeaser, that either of these gentlemen would follow a policy of weakness. Yet we all know that it was the policy of Sir Winston Churchill's government, and we have every reason to believe it is the policy of Sir Anthony Eden's government, that the United Kingdom should not do anything to keep the Chinese civil war going.

We feel that our interests in this matter, despite our geographical proximity to the United States, are closer to the interests of the United Kingdom than they are to the interests of the United States. As I see it, United States foreign policy, particularly under the direction of Mr. Dulles, is built not so much on a diplomatic basis, not so much on a basis designed to avoid war itself, as it is in terms of military strategy. The United Kingdom on the other hand realizes that if a world war breaks out, those islands have had it.

I suggest we are in the same position. Geographically we are close to the United States; but if there should be a conflict between the two great powers in the world today it is now a trite statement to say that we are in the position of a Belgium, and we have had it.

In that sense I feel that our interests are very close to those of the United Kingdom. Both of us have a tremendous stake in avoiding the outbreak of war of any kind because our two countries know that if that happens there will be devastation of our lands. For that reason, apart from the other connections we have with the United Kingdom, I feel that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should be ranging himself and his policy with respect to the Far East more along the lines advocated by the government of the United Kingdom than along the lines advocated by the government of the United States as set out by Mr. Dulles.

I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs should take another look at Mr. Dulles' foreign policy. It is clear. He has spelled it out time and again. It is there for all to read. In my opinion it is not correct to call it a foreign policy; it is a military policy. When he speaks one feels he is not a diplomat who is trying to save the peace of the world, but rather a military strategist planning his moves on the assumption there is going to be an armed conflict in which the United States will be involved.

Mr. Dulles likes to draw that line we have heard him draw, starting from the Aleutians. I am going to describe the line he draws, but for obvious reasons I shall start at the other end. He draws a line from New Zealand up through Australia, the Philippines, Formosa, the Pescadores, Japan, Korea and the Aleutian islands. Does he stop there? No; in his mind that line goes on through northern Canada.

What is that line? Is it a line he has drawn because he is interested in the people on the Pescadores or the people in New Zealand or the people in Churchill, Manitoba? No; it is a defence line for continental United States. In other words all these countries through which that line is drawn by Mr. Dulles are pawns in American military defence strategy.

We should recognize that is what it is, and try to say to Mr. Dulles that we do not appreciate and do not approve of that kind of policy, because our interests appear to be different from the interests of people in the United States, under their present leadership. They seem to have the idea that there can be a war, and that if they have a line of defence around the world other people may perish and other lands may be devastated —whether it be Formosa, northern Manitoba or New Zealand—but that somehow or other the United States will remain intact.

I am sure we in Canada do not look at it in that way, any more than do the people of the United Kingdom. The people of the United Kingdom know that their only defence is in the maintenance of peace, and I suggest that we in Canada know the same thing. We realize that, despite this grandiose Maginot line that Mr. Dulles would draw from New Zealand right around to Newfoundland, if war broke out there would be devastation and suffering in all the countries through which that line goes.

So I say that this policy on the part of Mr. Dulles is there for all to see and to observe. He spells it out clearly enough. But I repeat that, as I see it, it is not a diplomatic policy. It is not a position arrived at by a foreign minister. It is a position arrived at by a minister of war. It is a matter of military strategy. And I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that, as I have known him across the years, I do not believe he thinks in those terms at all. He thinks rather of his job in terms of the maintenance of peace. He thinks of his job as concerned with getting at the causes of war. He has made many speeches along that line which I would have been very proud to have made myself, and I am satisfied that is his approach—the approach of a foreign minister rather than that of a minister of defence or a minister of war.

I strongly appeal to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as did my leader on March 24, to take another look at this United States policy in which we are involved as just another pawn along with the Pescadores, along with Korea, along with the Aleutians, along with New Zealand and Australia, for the defence of continental United States, on what I say is a false premise, the notion that if you have a strong enough Maginot line some people somewhere can be protected.

Our interests, I repeat, are like those of the United Kingdom. We know, with them, that our only real defence is in the avoidance of war; and we in this group feel that we are expressing the views of many Canadians when we say we do not think the present policy of Mr. Dulles contributes to the avoidance of war as much as would policies which I am satisfied our Secretary of State for External Affairs could advocate, if he would stand up a little straighter on his own two feet and express his own views, as Canadian views, rather than always defending the views put forward by Mr. Dulles.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he not feel that it is the purpose of Mr. Dulles in his policy, whatever my hon. friend may call it, to avoid war?

Mr. Knowles: I think it is Mr. Dulles' primary purpose to keep war away from the United States, but I am not convinced that Mr. Dulles is as concerned with avoiding war completely as I believe the minister is. If he can keep war away from the United States—if he can keep it in the Pescadores, in Quemoy, in Matsu or in northern Canada —his aim is met. His aim is to keep war away from continental United States.

I think my hon. friend across the way would like to see the whole world spared the holocaust and tragedy of another war. I am sorry that my hon. friend, even while I am asking him to stand on his own two feet and talk plainly to Mr. Dulles, chooses rather to stand up and defend him. Mr. Dulles does not feel the need of any defence so far as his position is concerned. He stands up and speaks out very clearly and very plainly, and I think our foreign minister should do the same thing, and advocate more clearly a strong Canadian policy.

In connection with this whole business of the defence line, the line for the defence of the United States which Mr. Dulles draws, I have said that while I have heard him draw it, starting from the Aleutians and going around and down to New Zealand, we all know that in his mind it goes across northern Canada; certainly through the distant early warning line, as well as perhaps through the McGill fence and also through "Pinetree". But this does raise some interesting questions. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that we are not necessarily committed to any war the United States may get into, but that we could not help getting involved in the consequences. I think some attention might be paid to the question that was—

Mr. Martin: He did not say we would be; he said we might be.

Mr. Pearson: I never said we could not help being involved, in any context in which my hon. friend has used the expression.

Mr. Knowles: The minister said where the United States was involved—and if there is any difference I would be glad to have it corrected—we might—

Mr. Pearson: That is an important difference.

Mr. Knowles: I do not wish to do my hon. friend any injustice. I would tell him that I think he has it in him to enunciate the kind of policy that would ease world tension if he would stand up and express his own views, instead of feeling that he has to go along so easily and so readily with the views of the United States secretary of state.

Mr. Pearson: I have no such feeling.

Mr. Knowles: I think at some point the minister should deal with the question to which I started to refer, and that was discussed a while ago in Saturday Night, as to what Canada's position would be with respect to United States troops—air force or others—in this country, if the United States should get into one of these smaller wars that we would not regard as a Canadian war. As he knows, it is pretty generally remembered that one of the reasons Mr. King did not want to go ahead in 1938 with the British commonwealth air training plan was this very point as to what would happen if we had British troops in Canada at a time when Great Britain became involved in a war into which Canada had not gone. Would we have to intern those troops in order to assert our neutrality, or would failure to do that automatically place us in the position that we were at war?

That is a question which can arise under the present situation, particularly in view of the minister's statement that if the United States got into a small war over Quemoy or Matsu we would not be in it.

Mr. Martin: Would my hon. friend apply that argument to our troops in Europe?

Mr. Knowles: I am asking the question, and I think it should be dealt with by the minister. He should deal with the question asked by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) as well as the question I have asked. Surely our primary concern is as to our position regarding troops of another nation in our country, particularly in view of the minister's uncertain statement. I think I am justified in using that word describing what our position would be if the United States gets into a war.

We in this house are proud of our Canadian sovereignty. If I may refer to the remarks of the last speaker, we are proud of our position within the commonwealth of nations. We are proud of that association, but we are proud of the fact that within that association we have sovereignty and autonomy. One of the things which took a long while to develop was our own voice as distinguished from that of Westminster in foreign affairs. It is a matter of regret to some of us that the parroting of the foreign policy of the United Kingdom seems to have been exchanged for the same thing with respect to Washington. There is a touch of irony about it in that we seem to have reached this state of affairs at a time when by a process of juxtaposition we now find our interests much closer to those of the United Kingdom in world politics and in foreign policy than used to be the case.

I do not advocate that we should go back to the former position of having our foreign policy written for us at Westminster, but I suggest that the views being held over there at the present time have an element of wisdom in them which is lacking in some of the views being advocated in the country to the south.

There are just one or two other things I want to say in support of the position taken by my leader when he spoke on March 24. We should be giving serious thought, in so far as we have any influence at all, to the continuing policy of the United States in making these atomic and hydrogen bomb tests. We have been able to get a little information out of the government by questions on the orders of the day or on the order paper, but it is precious little. Some of us feel that there is a conspiracy of silence, an unwillingness to tell the people all that is known by scientists and those in the ranks of government with regard to radioactive precipitation. There seems to be such a tendency to rely on atomic and nuclear weapons as a means of defence that we do not know whether as part of our desire to build up that defence we are doing irreparable damage to future generations.

It seems to me that the Canadian people should be treated as grown-ups and that this conspiracy of silence should be broken. We should be told whether any knowledge is available on the matter, and if knowledge is available we should be told what the level of radioactivity is and whether it is doing any present or permanent damage to human life upon this earth.

Mr. Martin: In fairness I think my hon. friend should refer to the statement given on Monday, when there certainly was not a reluctance to give all the information available at this time as far as this country is concerned.

Mr. Knowles: That is the minister's view, but I have had three questions on the subject on the order paper since March 25 and they have not yet been answered. Several of us have asked questions on the orders of the day to which we have not been able to get satisfactory answers. I read with interest the statement the Minister of National Health and Welfare put on Monday's Hansard, but it seems to me that that statement did not answer the fundamental question as to what the level of radioactivity now is as a result of these test explosions, and how far away that level is from the level that could do damage to the human race. Let us not run the risk of doing irreparable damage to future generations, in the name of secrecy, or in the name of defence that might not be defence at all.

I have here a copy of the department's publication External Affairs which deals with the matter, in which it is indicated it is no use our asking the United States to cut down on these tests unless the U.S.S.R. will cut down on them as well. I agree that both these great powers should be asked to withhold these test explosions, but if you cannot persuade the other side are we not being a bit foolish to have both sides running off these explosions if by that result we double the amount of radioactive fall-out with the possibility of going beyond the danger point? This is another one of the fields in which we feel that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should speak strongly on Canada's behalf, if not to the United States authorities at Washington at least within the councils of the United Nations.

I do not want to take up time unduly in this debate, so I shall just refer in passing to two other subjects upon which I had intended to comment. First of all I want to say that I am glad to note that the press of the country for the most part is beginning to accept as being not a bad idea an exchange of parliamentary delegations between the Soviet union and other countries. Statements made in this house on the part of the government so far have been guarded, but at least it does seem to be recognized by some of the newspapers that if such a project were carried through it could not do any harm.

I want to support that idea. Surely an exchange of opinions, surely getting to know what life is like in different parts of the world, cannot do any harm. I do not know whether I can say this without getting a retort of the kind that one gets here in parliament, but I do not think it did me any harm when I had the opportunity of spending a week or so in Moscow back in 1946. I think I learned a few things about the people there. I was interested in the fact that I did have some conversations with people there, some at a semi-official level, and on occasion with people on the street. I do not think it would do others harm to have such a visit, and I am equally sure it would not do any harm from our point of view to invite delegates from that country to come and spend some time freely in our country. It might not do all the good that some might hope, but it certainly would not do any harm. It might help to ease tension if there were a flow of understanding, and I hope we will go ahead with the idea.

The only other comment I wish to make before I resume my seat is something I have commented on before. In fact I feel that I could not partake in a debate on external affairs without saying it. I urge even greater participation by Canada in economic aid and technical assistance programs. Some of the best speeches on this general subject have been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I was sorry that on March 24 he found it necessary to try to deflate the idea that economic aid could play as important a part in easing tension and building up world peace as some of us think it could. I will be fair to him by admitting that in that speech he said it was important, but he also said—and I quote from page 2338 of Hansard—

—it is easy to lapse into the comfortable belief that we can save Asia—and that is how it is often put—with economic aid alone; that we can buy off communism and purchase peace for ourselves merely by stepping up our economic assistance.

That, as I see it, is unhappily nothing but a comforting illusion; and in saying that I do not minimize the importance of such economic assistance.

Mr. Speaker, none of us would claim that economic assistance, particularly if it is handing out aid on a relief basis, can itself buy off communism or save the peace. But what I do not like about statements such as that is that they seem to be excuses for keeping the program down to the rather low proportions of Canada's participation in this field.

There is a great deal that could be done along the lines that have been set out by the minister on a number of occasions. Much could be done by greater support to organizations like the world health organization. There is much that could be done by greater support of training programs, bringing people from other countries to Canada, training and educating them here so they could go back to help put their own countries on a better economic footing. There is much to be done in teaching these people the ways of democracy and the way of life we have found.

I submit that until we have gone all out, until we have increased many times what we are doing now in terms of economic aid, there is no room for saying this will not do the trick. We have not yet tried it to a worthwhile extent; we have just scratched the surface. In my view there is a tremendous opportunity for the easing of world tensions, for the removal of the causes of war and building the foundations for a better world in a vast program of economic aid. I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who in his heart is, I think, just as sold on this type of program as any of us, will not make these statements in which he detracts from the value of economic aid but will push for an even greater program as part of an over-all aim to save the peace and make for a future that instead of bringing war will hold a better life for all mankind.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I wish to disagree strongly with the opinion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre of Mr. Dulles' efforts to keep the United States and the world out of war. I think that Mr. Dulles makes mistakes—we all do—but I believe he is certainly intent on keeping the world out of war just as much as his own United States. I think it is rather unfair to imply that he would sacrifice other countries in a war as long as the United States remained out.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs made very clear the other day that Canada could not remain neutral if the United States became involved in a major war. I feel sure that the great majority of Canadians agree with that statement; and because we are so closely linked to the United States in both peace and war I think we are entitled to point out any actions which we believe are not in the best interests of our mutual safety and well-being.

The latest instance when I think a protest should have been made was at the time of the publication of the Yalta papers. This action, together with the pressure which has been brought to bear by Senator Knowland to publish the Tehran and Potsdam papers, has, I believe, made future high-level secret diplomacy almost impossible. I believe that our chances of avoiding another world war have decreased accordingly. In the past many wars have been avoided because representatives of both sides met in private and, in off the record discussions, ironed out the matters in dispute. This requires give and take on both sides, and it would often have been impossible for either side to give way and come to an agreement if the participants had thought their conversations would be made public in a relatively short space of time.

I believe that in recent years the ineffectiveness of so-called open diplomacy has been demonstrated time and again, both in the security council and in the big four conferences which have been held during the past ten years. It has always been recognized by those engaged in diplomatic work that effective diplomacy can only be carried on in private, and in the knowledge that records of the discussions will not be made public. I feel sure that the professionals of the United States state department recognize this fact; but despite this, those in charge of the political strategy of the Republican party have chosen to greatly reduce the effectiveness of any future diplomatic discussions between the United States and other powers with whom they may be negotiating.

After the publication of the Yalta papers, and the demands of Senator Knowland that the Tehran and Potsdam papers should be published as well, diplomatic discussions participated in by the United States in the future will be no more effective than other open discussions have been in the past.

I believe the only explanation for this extraordinary action is purely political. It seems to me that the Republican party is so anxious to try to discredit the Democratic party as communist sympathizers that the secretary of state saw fit to authorize the publication of the Yalta papers. The world is required to pay a very high price for a doubtful political game by the party in power in the world's most powerful nation.

The only explanation I can find for the Canadian government not vigorously protesting against this action is that this government understands so well the practice of saying anything which they think will gain votes for them at election time. For example, for 36 years now they have been promising health insurance before every election, with not the slightest intention of ever implementing that promise. So this action of the Republican party in this instance does not appear to the Canadian government to be anything more than routine political practice.

I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that President Eisenhower will soon make it clear that the Tehran and Potsdam papers will not be published, and that the records of all future secret conferences participated in by the United States will remain secret. I believe that only by doing so can high-level diplomacy return to any degree of effectiveness, and our chances of avoiding another world war remain good.

We have told the United States that we will back her 100 per cent if she becomes involved in a major war, and all we are saying to her now in criticizing this action is, "For heaven's sake don't destroy the best known means of avoiding war." I think if the Canadian government had shown more courage in the past in voicing our objections to United States actions which adversely affected us, and with which we disagreed, we would not find ourselves today treated as poor relations in matters affecting trade between the two countries.

I am referring, of course, to the practice of the United States imposing artificial trade restrictions on Canadian products whenever pressure is brought to bear by United States producers. Because the Canadian government has always meekly submitted to the imposition of any trade restrictions the United States government saw fit to impose, they have imposed restrictions whenever and wherever it suited them to do so, and additional restrictions are being considered today.

The United States has always treated Canada as a happy dumping ground for surplus production, and they have kept their factories open and workers employed when Canadian factories were being closed or going half time, and men were being laid off. This, of course, is not the fault of the United States government. They have simply taken advantage of our easy-going regulations, which have not made this kind of thing impossible.

I think the time is long overdue, Mr. Speaker, for Canada to speak a lot more forcibly and strongly to our neighbours about things which adversely affect us, and with which we disagree and believe unreasonable. Until we do we can only expect to go on being treated as poor relations in matters of trade and other questions which affect our welfare.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Like other hon. members who have spoken in this debate I intend to confine myself mainly to the Far Eastern situation. However, I should like to say I was rather disappointed when the minister made his statement that he did not make greater reference to the trouble spots in the Middle East.

It would appear to me that with the Arab nations in an uneasy peace with Israel we are apt to have a major conflagration break out at any time. It is about time the United Nations got down to facts and placed the issue squarely before the opposing sides with respect to the trouble they are having there, telling them it is about time they settled down to a definite peace treaty so we can get away from these various border incidents, brought about mainly by the buffer zones between the two factions.

I think, too, it is about time that we told them that unless the United Nations rehabilitation contributions to the Arab refugees are used for rehabilitation they will be stopped. I believe these payments have gone on long enough for the maintenance of those people in the refugee camps. It is about time they were forced to get out and make their own way somehow. It should be made perfectly clear to them that any further rehabilitation grants for the refugees will be used for rehabilitation only and not for maintenance within the camps.

I am going to agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on one thing only, namely that we should increase our financial assistance to the underdeveloped countries of southeast Asia. Because of the small amount of assistance that is going into those countries we are losing the propaganda battle for the souls and the minds of those people. It is quite easy for a communist to walk in there and preach his theories of equality and have those poor downtrodden people believe them, because they cannot realize that the equality that is being preached is equality of oppression rather than equality of opportunity.

However, they tell us that a person who is underprivileged will always listen to big promises before he will accept and be influenced by a small measure of assistance. Rather than have this half-hearted help go into the south Asian countries we should do everything in our power to see that the suffering of those poor people is alleviated. We should go as far as we can in this assistance. But here is where I differ with the members of the C.C.F. party. I do not think we should at any time grant assistance at the expense of our own preparedness program, because that is of the utmost importance.

As far as Viet Nam and Indo-China are concerned, I think the Canadian delegation on the truce team there is doing a good job. I should like to offer my congratulations at this time to those people who are there doing the best they can, but they have a tremendous job. There is a lot of subterfuge. The so-called troubles that are cropping up among the people are communist inspired, merely put forward as a means of screening the true activities of the communists in Viet Nam.

I would appreciate very much if the minister would make some sort of statement in his rebuttal about the troubles they are having in Saigon at this time. I should like him to tell us whether or not it is an honest difference of opinion among the Viet Nam peoples themselves, or whether it is more or less communist inspired trouble that is being stirred up there at this time.

Peace in Indo-China was brought about with the proviso that general elections will be held in July of 1956. Consultations are supposed to be held between the respective authorities of the two zones from July 20 of this year onward. I wonder whether, when drafting the proviso—I am not too conversant with the details—it was definitely laid down who those competent authorities were to be. If so, who are they, and are they to be trusted? It would appear from our past experience with the communists in Formosa, Korea and elsewhere, that they are not to be trusted. They are not too willing to give up anything they have or to allow free elections to be held which might mean they would lose some area they already hold. For example, under the Korean set-up there were to be free elections held in Korea in 1947. When 1947 rolled around the North Korean reds refused to allow free elections to be held. We do not have to go back that far, because the same thing holds true in East Germany. I do not know when we are to reach any sort of settlement between the two Germanys and have free elections, because it is quite apparent that the communists are unwilling to relinquish anything they have.

I think, too, that we are going to have to be very careful this same thing does not happen in Burma, in Thailand and in some of the other countries of southeast Asia. For example, the prime minister of Thailand, when speaking at the SEATO meeting not long ago, stated that there were something like 20,000 so-called free Thailand troops assembled in Yunan province of red China, which could be used for a jumping off place for an invasion against Thailand itself. I understand the Burmese premier also stated that they had the same state of affairs on the northern Burma border. There they have a bunch of Burmese communists waiting for an opportunity to invade northern Burma and possibly divide that country in the same way that Korea and Indo-China have been divided.

There is one other point that has nothing to do with the communist element in southeast Asia, but can the minister indicate whether or not any progress has been made in the withdrawal of the nationalist troops in northern Burma? He will recollect that a year ago last fall a formal protest was lodged with the United Nations by the Burmese government, and it was suggested at that time that the Chinese nationalists should do everything in their power to convince these people that they should go back to Formosa. That was quite a sore spot as far as the Burmese government was concerned, and we have not heard too much about the matter since. I should like the minister to tell us in his rebuttal whether or not there has been any mass withdrawal or whether subsequent withdrawals have only been on a piecemeal basis.

Mr. Pearson: As I may not have much, if any, time for rebuttal, perhaps I could answer that question at once by saying that a good proportion of these so-called Chinese troops have been moved back to Formosa from Burma.

Mr. Thomas: I am glad the minister has made that statement, because there is no doubt that was one factor that could possibly turn Burma against the western world in the event of warfare commencing in Asia.

As to the islands of Quemoy and Matsu, I am not sure whether they are too strategic. I do not have the information, and it is a matter for military opinion. But as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) mentioned the other day, they can have quite a value from the point of view of morale as far as the Chinese nationalists are concerned. Canada has no commitment there consequent upon actual invasion of the islands, but I suggest that they certainly are a matter of great interest to the Asiatic peoples and stand as a symbol of whether or not we are going to retreat any further. There is no doubt that the Chinese reds are going to take everything they can get. They are going to keep walking ahead just as long as they can do so without hindrance. We must also remember that since the Chinese communists came into power in 1949 they have simply led the world from one crisis to another, in Korea, Indo-China and Tibet. All the time they have been gradually working their way into the other countries of Asia, and it is about time they were stopped.

We have to lay down a certain line and say they are not going to be allowed to go beyond it. We have to make sure they do not go beyond it. Whether or not the islands of Matsu and Quemoy should constitute that line I do not know. That depends entirely on the tactical situation, and that is a matter for the military authorities to decide. As to the Chinese reds having good intentions, in my opinion their intentions are in no way honourable. I do not think their only aim in Asia is to regain Chinese territory, including Formosa and the Pescadores, because in my view they intend to proceed farther and farther into Asia and spread their tentacles as far as they can.

It has been said in the house from time to time that the ultimate aim of the communists is world domination. That applies not only to the Moscow reds but to the Chinese reds as well. Not long ago Mr. Khrushchev, when speaking at a meeting between the Chinese and the Russians, said:

> The Chinese people's republic has transformed itself into a powerful factor in the liberation struggle of all oppressed peoples against the forces of imperialist reaction and colonial enslavement for their freedom and national independence. The Chinese people's republic has entered the world arena as a great power and has become a mighty force in the general struggle of the freedom-loving peoples for international security and peace throughout the world.

This means only one thing, that the Chinese reds have joined with their Russian brothers in an effort to spread communism throughout the world and to free all the peoples of the world, whether or not they want to be free. I also doubt—and here is where I differ very strongly with the members of the C.C.F. group—whether or not withdrawal from Matsu, Quemoy or any other place would serve the interests of peace. Rather, I think it would work the other way. If we give up without a struggle here, there and everywhere, it is going to encourage them to take one more little piece of land. It is all too reminiscent of Munich and the peaceful overtures made to Hitler prior to 1939 when he took everything he could get and kept on going until he forced us into war.

I think the only possibility is to serve notice on the Chinese reds now that they have gone as far as they can go, and we should threaten them with retaliation if they go any farther. I do not think that would be anything to start a world war. Peace and security cannot be promoted by indefinitely piling up one-sided concessions to the reds. For example, may I refer to the radio comment from Peking on the withdrawal from the Tachen islands. They said:

> The liberation of these islands has created favourable conditions for our people's liberation army in the liberation of Formosa.

That is plain enough. They are going ahead unless we put our foot down. I forget the exact words the Secretary of State for External Affairs used, but when he was making his statement the other day he said that it was significant there was no resistance to the withdrawal from the Tachen islands. I do not think there is anything significant in that because nobody is going to fight for something they are going to get anyway. In my opinion that withdrawal did more to hurt the prestige of the western nations in the east than anything else could have done.

I think one outcome of our withdrawal from time to time is the present attitude of the Chinese reds. They are actually contemptuous now. When they were asked in 1951 to join in a conference respecting Korea they accepted, but when they were recently asked to confer with the security council of the United Nations they simply said they would not unless they could come there on their own terms, which meant removing the Chinese nationalists from the United Nations and giving the Chinese communists their seat. That indicates they are becoming more and more contemptuous and more and more sure of themselves as our withdrawals become more general. I believe another result of all these withdrawals is that the non-communist peoples are beginning to become a bit more afraid that maybe we are not going to back up our statements of policy and our threats against the communists. The free nations, particularly the United States, did a lot of big talking about what they were going to do before the fall of Dien Bien Phu, and it certainly did not help our prestige in southeast Asia one bit.

As I said a few moments ago, we also aided in the evacuation of the Tachen islands, and that did not do any good. I think any further withdrawal by the western nations could quite easily be interpreted as a sign of weakness by the southeast Asian countries, and it would certainly weaken our bargaining powers as far as any cease-fire is concerned.

The reason I believe a stand now would not cause any world war is that I do not think the communists are ready for it yet. I do not think Russia is going to allow the Chinese to throw her into a war at this time because she is not in any position to back up China to the extent she would like, so far as arms and munitions are concerned.

The Soviet goals, as we all know, are to advance the Soviet sphere of influence so far as they can into Europe, Asia, the Middle East and so on, and at the same time retain the predominant position which they attained in 1950 in eastern Europe, Mongolia and North Korea. I think Russia realizes that so far as Mongolia and Korea are concerned she has lost a lot of ground, because the Chinese reds have taken a lot away from her. Russia feels also that she has to protect her own people within the Soviet union, at least to an extent which would stop them from engaging in out and out revolution. Russia is not going to go beyond that point in assisting the Chinese reds.

Communist China, of course, has the ultimate aim of spreading not only the communist influence but the Chinese communist influence all through Asia. It is significant to note that the Asiatic communists are turning now to Mao and his government rather than to the Kremlin. As a result, I think by holding these people back at the moment, eventually their disagreements are going to become so great that they are going to have a little scrap among themselves. As long as everything is going their way and they are walking ahead without any trouble at all there certainly is not any hope of breaking up that agreement and friendship which they now have. We have to stand firm. I think the differences in aims between the two peoples, and the places where they conflict, are going to do a great deal toward breaking down the communist influence throughout the world. I do not think they can get along among themselves.

I have just one more point, Mr. Speaker. This debate has been very interesting, in that at least it has shown the difference in viewpoints between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the C.C.F. party. I should like to quote from Time magazine of about three weeks ago under the heading "Ontario" and the subheading "Ousted Editor". It says:

> The seven money-making newspapers of the Southam group cover a wide arc of the political spectrum, but none edges farther leftward—on the editorial page, if not in the news columns—than the lively and unpredictable Ottawa Citizen. Even after cautiously conservative Robert Southam, 40, took over as publisher two years ago, editor Charles James Woodsworth, 45, crusading son of J. S. Woodsworth, founder of the C.C.F. (socialist) party, continued to pursue his vigorously left of Liberal policy. But when Woodsworth came out against the rearmament of West Germany, publisher Southam got fed up. Word leaked out last week that he had quietly sacked his editor.

> Woodsworth was admired in Ottawa for his biting wit, sharp writing and occasional Donald Duck editorial rages. His portside politics evidently never troubled Canada's ruling Liberals. Last year, the department of defence flew him on a two-months junket through the Far East and invited him to lecture on Asian problems to troops of the 25th brigade in Korea. He was also a frequent lecturer at Department of External Affairs briefing sessions. With some lecture and television dates ahead—

And so on. It would seem to me that with the at least apparent opposite viewpoints of the minister and the C.C.F. party, the last thing the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) or the Secretary of State for External Affairs would want spread among the troops would be the idea of compromise that has been put forward by a follower and advocate of the C.C.F. socialist policies.

Mr. Coldwell: May I just make a correction, Mr. Speaker? Mr. Charles Woodsworth is not and never has been a member of the C.C.F. party. In addition to that, I imagine the minister believes in freedom of speech.

Mr. Pearson: I might add that he is not a lecturer in the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Winch: What is left now?

Mr. Coldwell: Apparently they want nobody to speak except those who express their viewpoint. What a tragedy it would be if they came to power.

Mr. Thomas: I assure hon. members that if they do not like it, it is quite all right. I am quoting from Time magazine and at no time did I make any statement as to what I thought his policies were. What I want to know is, if his policies are as stated in this article, then why is he lecturing to either Canadian troops or the Department of External Affairs? Mind you, I have nothing against the beliefs of my socialist friends. I do not like their beliefs, but they certainly have had every opportunity to express themselves, and so they should. But it would seem strange to me that the government would want people briefing their employees and speaking to the army when the apparent beliefs of the speaker are actually the opposite of those of the government.

Mr. Coldwell: That would be dictatorship, which I do not think the Liberal party believes in any more than we do.

Mr. Thomas: I cannot see it in that way, because I would hate to see the armed forces of this country being taught a compromise attitude to the point where they do not know whether they are standing on their feet or their heads, or what they are fighting for. We know what we are fighting for and we do not believe in compromise with the communists if it means we are going to be rushed into slavery. So the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) can say what he likes—

Mr. Coldwell: I shall, too.

Mr. Thomas: Quite, and he often has. I disagree with him heartily in most of his policies, particularly his socialistic policy. I do not like the idea of having the young men of our armed forces taught compromise when the last thing on earth we need in this country is a compromise attitude toward communism. Time and time again they have told us what they are going to do. They are going to conquer us by one means or another, and we have to fight that in spite of the compromise policies of the C.C.F.

Mr. Coldwell: They are not compromise policies, by any means.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate I would open my remarks by making a very brief reference to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas), who has just taken his seat. He has taken us through a remarkable tour de force. In a matter of 30 minutes he has expressed his views on Germany, Israel, Egypt, Mongolia, Indo-China, Korea, Quemoy, the Matsus, and communism, and made reference to other political parties. Is that not something? Is it not extraordinary when any man can execute such a tour de force in a period of 30 minutes, when speaking in a debate on external affairs?

It is not my intention to follow the example of the hon. member. As a matter of fact I am not going to speak on any of the phases of external affairs mentioned by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, nor do I intend to mention communism, nor do I intend to imply anything about any political parties in the House of Commons. There is only one phase of external affairs about which I wish to express my opinion, and that is the position and policy of Canada in this age of thermonuclear accomplishments and developments, a matter which is of major concern to all of us irrespective of party, and irrespective of whether we support the government or the opposition.

I feel very deeply on the matter. I have no hesitation in saying that perhaps the limitations of my vocabulary and eloquence will not permit me to express the thoughts that arise in me. To the best of my ability, however, I am going to put them forward and, unusual as it may be for me, I shall quote at some length from certain references I have before me.

I have said that I am going to discuss only one issue, and that I shall discuss it on a strictly non-political basis. All will agree that Canada is a wonderful country, a country with a population in the neighbourhood of 15 million, and that with this comparatively small population it is one of the outstanding countries of the world. If I remember correctly we are the third trading nation. In his budget speech last night the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) said that other countries look with envy at our fiscal policy. I believe I am safe in saying that at times of world conflict, on a per capita basis this country ranks very close to the top in matters of contributions of manpower and financial assistance. I believe I am also safe in saying that in respect of all various aspects of the work of the United Nations, next to the great powers—the United States, Great Britain and the U.S.S.R.—Canada stands at the top in its work on the committees.

What I am building up to is this. We can all take pride in our country and its accomplishments. Because of our status and our influence among the nations, although a nation of only 15 million people, can we not give consideration now to providing a lead in matters of policy and program in this trying age and these troubled times resulting from the development of thermonuclear weapons? In other words can we not be more emphatic and serve as a leader rather than a follower in international affairs? I am not for one moment attempting to detract from the stand Canada has taken, or from the statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs; but I do believe we can go further and do more. I believe Canada can make an outstanding contribution if we are firmer, more deliberate and more emphatic, and if we give a lead.

There can be no question but that we live in trying times. I would not like to have the job held by the Secretary of State for External Affairs; I would not want it for any money. It must be a terrible responsibility. I am sorry the house has not had a full report as to what went on at the recent commonwealth conference. Indeed we are almost in the dark as to the discussions and the conclusions. I have never set myself up as a prophet, but if I were to do a little guessing, and if the procedure followed at the last conference was that followed at previous ones, I would be reasonably sure that on the final day, at the conclusion of the meetings, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent), in his position of priority, would have made a concluding address. And, sir, if we could be told what he said, I believe it would go like this:

> We have met at a time when events from week to week, sometimes from day to day have brought vividly home to us the tension of the European situation, the difficulties that beset those who are striving to bring stability out of unrest and confidence out of fear. Fortunately also we have seen how patient and unremitting are the efforts to repair the torn fabric of European unity, how widespread is the desire and the determination to ensure peace, how deep the reluctance to incur the incalculable hazards of war.
> At this time of grave international unrest and anxiety we have sought throughout to avoid, in phrase or gesture, anything which might add to existing difficulties.
> Indeed, we have reason to hope that the principles which we have reaffirmed, and the views to which we have given expression, may contribute not a little to a better understanding among all nations, and to a more fruitful collaboration between them.

I do not think I would be far wrong if I said that might indicate what was said by the Prime Minister of Canada and the other prime ministers at the recent commonwealth conference. I would agree with those expressions. But what I have said, as being possibly what was said by our own Prime Minister at the commonwealth conference, is actually what was said by the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King at the conclusion of the imperial conference in 1937. Two years later we were faced with the holocaust of another world war.

Since that time science has developed the atomic bomb, the hydrogen bomb, the cobalt bomb and other thermonuclear weapons. I understand that the reactor which Canada has at Chalk River is the second largest in the world, and it is devoted to the development of nuclear fission for peace purposes. Are we therefore not in position to go further than we have gone in the past, in view of the fact that today on the floor of this House of Commons, in the parliaments of the world we hear from the political leaders of the world expressions exactly the same as were made back in 1937. We should realize that someone has to give leadership so we would deal not with generalities and platitudes but with definite policies and programs.

I do a great deal of reading, and I think the wishful thinking and the actual desire and belief of leaders in the parliaments of the western world, truthful as they are, are in line with the expressions which were used just before the second world war. Today we need something more than platitudes and generalities, and I cannot think of a country better able than Canada to take the lead.

We hear and read almost every day statements by scientists as to the probable effects of the detonation of thermonuclear weapons. There seems to be some doubt as to what might happen. Only recently we were given some assurance by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) as to the genetic results, but do we have to wait until there is human evidence before action is taken?

The position is made clear by the scientists, but no matter what we are told the fact remains that they cannot take action; only parliaments can take action. It is my request that Canada give a lead. First of all Canada should recognize the statements made by the scientists and appreciate the worries of these men who are in a position to know what may happen. Political action should be taken to further investigation and to further a policy which will guarantee that we do not have to face what may happen to human beings or to nature itself because of these explosions of a thermonuclear nature.

I think attention should be paid to what has been said by Dr. O. M. Solandt, chairman of our defence research board. Dr. Solandt made an address to the Canadian Club of Toronto. This was considered to be so important that the information division of the Department of External Affairs saw fit to issue it as a release. Dr. Solandt is one of our great Canadian scientists, and I should like to place on record some of the statements he made because I think they are important and should be heard not only by members of parliament but by the people of Canada. He said:

> When the history of this century comes to be written I am sure that it will then be clear that we are living in the midst of one of the greatest periods of transition in human history.

And again:

> Nonetheless I think that it is particularly important for us to try to comprehend the significance of the developments in nuclear science that are taking place and try to control and direct their use. Should we fail in this task there seems to be a fair chance that the history of our era will never be written.

And again:

> The scientific discoveries that underlie the thermonuclear weapons demonstrated in 1954 open possibilities for the unlimited increase of the destructive power of weapons and consequently face mankind with the ultimate possibility of self-destruction.
> The A.E.C. announcement also emphasized the fact that bombs of this kind produce huge amounts of radioactive fission products which fall out over a vast area which may cover many thousands of square miles.

The reference there is to the United States atomic energy commission. I emphasize that this is a statement by one of our leading scientists. I continue:

> Man is therefore faced with a dilemma of a magnitude which he never faced before. The whole history of civilization is a history of wars. Man has never solved the problem of living without fighting. In the past these wars have wiped out individuals, families, tribes, and even small nations, but the destructive power of the weapons available was never sufficient to destroy the race. We have now reached a stage in history where we can foresee the possibility of having weapons available in the world in numbers capable of destroying our civilization and of rendering large parts or even the whole of the world uninhabitable by man. This means that our attitude toward war must be fundamentally changed if we are to ensure survival.

The last quotation I want to give is I think perhaps the most important for this House of Commons.

We must hasten to solve our ancient problems of living together if we are to survive. We are now at last faced with the desperate alternative of one world or none.

That, sir, is an expression of opinion from one of our great Canadian scientists. It is so important that the minister of external affairs had it printed by his department of information. That scientist and others can go no further than to make statements. Action can only be taken by parliament on the recommendation of the government. It is not only the scientists who speak on this theme; it is also spoken of by men in politics. I wish to quote only two such statements made by men of political power. They recognize the danger, but I am afraid they do not follow through or use their political power to back their knowledge. This statement is, I think, important:

Nowhere on this planet today is there an impregnable fortress, a continent or island so distant that it can ignore all the outer world. If this is not to be the age of atomic hysteria and horror, we must make it the age of international understanding and co-operative peace.

That, sir, was a statement made by the President of the United States before the American newspaper publishers' association in New York on April 22, 1954. In the same speech he also said:

Free men do not lose their patience, their courage, their faith because the obstacles are mountainous, the path uncharted. Given understanding, they invariably rise to the challenge. Never, then, has there been a more compelling and rewarding time to work for international understanding, to labor for a co-operative peace.

That is an expression of opinion by the President of the United States.

I have not hesitated in the past to criticize what I thought were the wrong policies of Mr. Dulles, secretary of state of the United States, because I thought they were wrong, often basically wrong. However, I wish to admit that I do believe he has in mind a vision of what could happen at this time if we had a thermonuclear war. I wish to quote two statements which Mr. Dulles made in a speech delivered before the Y.W.C.A. at their centennial inaugural luncheon at New York on January 11 of this year. He said:

There will never be permanent peace so long as men and nations reserve for war their greatest effort, their most sacrificial endeavour.

He also said:

But also, peace cannot be won by truculence or by intolerance, either toward our allies or toward our citizenry. Peace has to be planned as a campaign in which many factors are weighed. It is a campaign in which it may be necessary to strive even when success may be improbable.

As I said, I have been critical of some of the policies which I see being followed throughout the world and of policies which have been enunciated by the President of the United States and Mr. Dulles, but I most sincerely agree with the principle expressed in the quotations I have read. I most sincerely believe that we have reached a stage in the development of our civilization and our scientific knowledge when we can no longer rest content with platitudes and generalities. I am convinced that the world is waiting for leadership, and I do believe quite honestly that the status and the influence of Canada is such that if this House of Commons—and that means this government and to a great extent the minister of external affairs—could come forth with a dynamic program and more forthright statements they would receive a great deal more support than is anticipated, and it would be an encouragement not only to the people of the Dominion of Canada but to the free peoples of the world.

I wish to add my remarks to those which have already been expressed on this subject. Not only should this government give more leadership; it should also be prepared not to just accept the position that there are doubts about the effects in peacetime of the explosion of thermonuclear weapons, but the government should give leadership through its position in NATO in demanding a more comprehensive, thorough and collective study of this problem.

I do not wish to take up much more time of the house. I have tried to express my inner thoughts and to base my address to a great extent on the quotations which I have read. I have made recommendations to the minister of external affairs because I have confidence in the position Canada holds in the world and in the fact that a statement made by the hon. member that is by nature definite, emphatic, dynamic and visionary will be listened to. Let us not forget that it was reported by a Washington correspondent in the newspapers only two days ago that a member of the congress of the United States, one of the best known men in that country, said in discussing the policy concerning Quemoy and Matsu, that if they came up with a policy that even their greatest ally, Canada, could not accept, what a policy it must be. That indicates the attention that is given to the views of this country and the policies of this government.

In concluding I wish to emphasize the thinking and the principles that are being expressed by the political leaders and scientists of the democratic world, that now is a time of decision, and unless we are careful no history will be written of this day and age because mankind will have ceased to exist on this earth. All, in the expression of their desire for peace, say we must not take a position of antagonism, truculence or suspicion; we must not be held back by obstacles, setbacks and disillusionments, because the future of the world depends upon carrying on our search for peace; because the maintenance of mankind and of civilization depends upon our living together. Otherwise we are going to die together. Yes, we have had and still have suspicions. We have great worries. Without doubt we have had a great many disillusionments and a great many setbacks. But, as even Mr. Dulles said, we have to carry on for a brotherhood of peace.

You know, Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to have been a public servant in opposition for some 22 years now. I can assure you that one sometimes reaches a point of frustration. You believe you are right; you know you are right, but you do not seem to be able to make any progress. I have discovered on occasions like that that I can go back to some of the best writers in the world and get the inspiration and the courage to carry on. One of the writers I sometimes go back to—and I commend him to the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he has not read the book to which I am going to refer—is Lloyd C. Douglas and his famous book entitled "Green Light". It is strictly a work of fiction. In that book there is a statement by one of the leading characters, Dean Harcourt, who said in effect: "In my lifetime I, too, have faced obstacles, setbacks, dissillusionments and frustration, but I know that my goal is right; I know that destiny is on my side; I know that eventually I am going to get the green light, and then I am going to go on through."

In all this struggle for peace, Mr. Speaker, in all the trials and tribulations of today, there have been frustrations, I know, to the Secretary of State for External Affairs; there have been setbacks and disillusionment. Very often we are suspicious. May I say, sir, and I conclude as I started, in this age of thermonuclear discoveries and accomplishments I feel that if the minister, as our spokesman on foreign affairs, will give greater leadership, be more emphatic, more progressive, and will not be set back by disillusionments and frustrations, Canada will give a great lead to the world and eventually we will get the green light that opens the road to a lasting peace.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): I have listened with intense interest to the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. If he could only go to Russia and get them to believe just what he has said; if he could only go to China and get them to believe what he said, then probably there would be some sense in what he said because we are all ready to believe it and the people of the free world are ready to believe it, if only the people of the communist world would ease their aggression. But the people of the communist world are determined to continue their aggression until there exists no anti-communist world. I hope the hon. member takes time to think that through before he rises in his place and gives us any more alarming speeches. Our problem is to know what is the calm, sane, sensible thing to do to preserve our freedom in these troubled times.

It is my purpose to give some attention to the remarks made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on March 24. The hon. member made a statement which could be easily interpreted as meaning that the Chinese people drove Chiang Kai-shek from China. That statement, if I have interpreted it correctly, is just as false as a falsehood can be, because Chiang Kai-shek was not driven from China by the Chinese people but by the people of the United States. There is no time remaining for me to establish the position that I have to establish in order to make good that statement, but I shall be right here when this debate resumes.

Let me point out meanwhile that in February, 1945, President Roosevelt, the president of the United States, threw Chiang Kai-shek to the dogs by simply agreeing to allow Russia to have Manchuria, which is the source of most of the industrial strength of China, and north China, which is the source of the rest of the industrial strength of China. To that statement there is positively no answer.

I propose to quote in the few moments that remain to me one statement which comes from an important United States newspaper, based on what had been divulged in the Yalta papers. This paper says in so many words—

Mr. Castleden: What is the paper?

Mr. Blackmore: I shall give it to you in a minute.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Mr. Blackmore: I shall give it to the hon. member when we resume the debate, along with a great deal of other information, for apparently he has not done enough homework to be familiar with it.

I move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, on Monday, when we resume, we shall take the legislation in the following order: item No. 3, Bill No. 187, respecting the New Westminster harbour commissioners; item No. 12, Bill No. 259, to amend the Railway Act; item No. 13, Bill No. 260, to amend the Radio Act; item No. 15, Bill No. 262, respecting the Toronto harbour commissioners, the Toronto Terminals Railway Company, and so forth; item No. 17, Bill No. 263, to implement the convention on damage caused by foreign aircraft to third parties on the surface, and item No. 7, a resolution with respect to amendments to the Blind Persons Act.

Mr. Speaker: Before the house adjourns, may I wish the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and all hon. members a restful recess and a very happy Easter.

At six o'clock the house adjourned until Monday, April 18, 1955, at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 18, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE LATE J. G. BOUCHER

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all hon. members were shocked as I was to learn of the death earlier today of one of our number, Mr. Gaspard Boucher, who represented the constituency of Restigouche-Madawaska in this house.

Mr. Boucher was elected to the House of Commons for the first time on August 10, 1953, after a long and distinguished career in his native province of New Brunswick. A printer and publisher by profession, he was president of the Madawaska Printing Office and Bookstore Limited, and editor of the weekly newspaper Le Madawaska or The Madawaska, published in both languages. During his career as a newspaperman, he was always keenly devoted to the interests of the residents of his county and of his province.

In 1935 he was elected to the legislature of New Brunswick and was given renewed votes of confidence during the succeeding elections of 1939, 1944 and 1948. From 1936 to 1939 he served as deputy speaker of the legislature. From 1940 to 1949 he was chairman of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission and from 1949 to 1952 secretary-treasurer in the provincial government.

Although his career as a member of this parliament was regrettably brief, Mr. Boucher made a substantial contribution to several of the committees of this house. As was natural because of his background and experience in those fields, his views were very helpful to the committees on printing, public accounts, and banking and commerce. He was also an effective member of other committees, including that on railways, canals and telegraph lines and the committee on mines, forests and waters. Unfortunately, his failing health did not permit him to take the active part in our debates which he would have liked.

I feel confident that all members will join with me, Mr. Speaker, in expressing our sincere regret at the loss of a member whose knowledge and experience we all appreciated and in extending our sincere condolences to Mrs. Boucher and the other members of the family in their bereavement.

(Translation):

Our friend Gaspard Boucher, who for many years was prominent in the field of public affairs, was also particularly devoted to the interests of the French-speaking citizens of his province. He will be remembered as a Canadian who faithfully and worthily represented his fellow citizens both in the New Brunswick legislature and in this house where, unfortunately, his failing health these past few years prevented him from being as active as he had been.

May we again extend to his wife and his family our deepest sympathy on the occasion of their bereavement.

(Text):

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with the Prime Minister and the other members of this house in expressing heartfelt sympathy to the widow and children of Mr. Boucher in the sad loss they have suffered. It does come home to us on an occasion of this kind that, with whatever political opinions we may seek to express our services in this house, there is a close and intimate association amongst the members, which finds very clear and deep expression at this time. Like so many of the other members in the house, Mr. Boucher was a man of wide and long experience, not only in the provincial legislature, but in the many local activities which contribute so much to the strength of the life of the whole nation. He was very active in those local enterprises which advance the health and strength and interest of young people, as well as in those social organizations which play their important part in the building of the character of every community. On an occasion like this it seems that it is extremely difficult to use words which in themselves convey to those who have been bereaved the sentiments we feel. I feel sure that in joining with the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and in extending to him and his colleagues our sympathy in their loss, we may also express the hope that for Mrs. Boucher and his children there will be some real measure of comfort in the knowledge that those who have been associated with him in the House of Commons are thinking of them at this time.

The late J. G. Boucher

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, it was only just as I came into the building a few minutes ago that I learned the sad news of Mr. Boucher's passing. I want to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in expressing to Mrs. Boucher and her family our sympathy in their sorrow. I would also couple with that remark our sympathy to the Prime Minister and the members of the party with which Mr. Boucher was associated in the loss of a colleague.

I did not know Mr. Boucher well. He has been here, of course, for only a year and a half and in that time one does not get to know all of the members of the house. But from what I know of him—and I met him casually two or three times—I thought he was a fine gentleman who would have made a real contribution in this parliament had he been permitted to do so.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is always a matter of great regret when members of our association here in parliament pass on. Especially is that so when members with such broad experience as that of Mr. Boucher are called prematurely, it seems, into the next phase of existence. We join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in expressing sympathy to the wife and the family of Mr. Boucher. While I did not know Mr. Boucher too well, I was associated with him in the banking and commerce committee. If he had been privileged to live longer, I think he would have made a real contribution in this house, in view of his sincerity and the great background of experience that he had had in his native province of New Brunswick. We also express our sympathy to the Prime Minister and his party in the loss of a devoted follower.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, those who have spoken with reference to the passing of our good friend Gaspard Boucher have paid him a fine tribute; but on behalf of the Liberal members from the province of New Brunswick I should just like to add a few words. I have known Gaspard Boucher for about thirty years, and I can say that few men in the province of New Brunswick have given more of their life for the benefit of their fellow men than has Gaspard Boucher. He was a most valued member of our provincial legislature for many years. As has been said, he was deputy speaker. He was then chairman of the New Brunswick hydro commission. For the last few years he was a provincial member he was our provincial secretary treasurer. On behalf of the members from New Brunswick I should like to extend sincere sympathy to Mrs. Boucher and her family. We realize at this time that the counties and the province which he represented have lost a fine citizen.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DREW—REFERENCE TO SPEECH MADE BY MINISTER OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I would express the hope that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) will avail himself of the opportunity afforded at this time to explain to the house if the sharp drop in immigration in the past few months is the administrative expression of the new immigration policy which he enunciated in Victoria last Tuesday.

Mr. Speaker: This matter really does not come within the realm of privilege. I would hope that an opportunity will be given soon for both the Leader of the Opposition and the minister to air their opinions on this question.

[Later:]

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I wish to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if it is his intention to amplify and to explain to the house the surprising statement of policy he made last week in Victoria.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if I have your permission, I think the easiest way I can do it would be to read a letter I addressed this morning to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), which I hope he has received. It reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Hees:

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): The mails are not that fast.

Mr. Pickersgill:

Judging from the attention you have given to reports of a speech I made in Victoria last week, I assume the extract you cited is going to find a place in the literature of the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Ferguson: It does not need to be; it is all over Canada now. You made a perfect mess of it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps if the hon. gentleman would listen, I could complete the reading of this letter.

If that is correct, I am sure you will want to quote the full sentence, from which the extract was taken.

It went like this:

An hon. Member: Music. Let us have the first bar.

Mr. Ferguson: The first stanza.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, this is the second stanza.

"We all want to increase the population of this country—"

Mr. Ferguson: I agree with that.

Mr. Pickersgill:

—and for that purpose if they are equally good people—

And I think I might repeat that phrase: "If they are equally good people"—

—I don't believe that any immigrant, no matter where he comes from or how good he is, is as good as another Canadian baby, because the immigrant has to learn to be a Canadian and the baby is a Canadian to start with."

Now, sir, the Leader of the Opposition asked me to amplify what I had said. I think I can illustrate my point very well by saying that I have no doubt the hon. member for Broadview was a beautiful baby, but I would never think of comparing him favourably with my hon. friend from Victoria, British Columbia (Mr. Fairey), whose guest I was when I made this statement, and who is an immigrant, and a very good Canadian.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do regret that in a matter of such importance as this the minister should have seen fit to answer the question by quoting a letter in which he chose to put this on a strictly political ground.

This subject, after all, is one which relates to the feelings toward Canada of a great many people in this country. I feel sure the minister will recognize that there has been no attempt to deal unfairly with a statement which obviously was contracted in the reporting. I would have hoped that a statement which can only give concern to so many people who have chosen this country as their home would have received a more adequate explanation from the minister, and would not have been reduced to the basis upon which the minister has put it. However, since he has reduced it to that position, I would hope that he would remember that Sir John A. Macdonald was an immigrant to this country.

Mr. Michener: Would the minister consider the desirability of changing the name of his portfolio to that of minister of citizenship and propagation?

MR. COLDWELL—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORTS OF SPEECH BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on what amounts to a question of personal privilege. The radio and the press over the week end have carried a story that the Minister of Finance, when speaking in Toronto on Saturday night, made what is a serious allegation. In discussing the expulsion of certain Trotskyites from the C.C.F.—may I say that no organization in Canada has been more careful to expel communists when we discovered them within the C.C.F.—he said similar charges could be laid against some C.C.F. federal members. I am a C.C.F. federal member. I ask the minister to name the federal members to whom he refers.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, speaking on the question of privilege, may I say that what my hon. friend read from, of course, was a report of a meeting but it was a report without any quotation marks around it. Had he asked me to say here what I said there, I would have obliged him. The report is not accurate in saying that I said that any members of his party in this house were Trotskyites.

Mr. Coldwell: The press phoned me yesterday and told me that.

Mr. Harris: I am not saying that the press did not attempt to quote what I said. I merely say that in the report there are no quotation marks whatever. If my hon. friend wants a short explanation of what I said, I should be glad to oblige. I regret that the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) is not in his place. My remarks were prompted by a letter which he wrote on the subject of the expulsion of these people. If my hon. friends in the house will permit me to do so, I should like to read extracts from the letter which appeared in the press.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister had better read the whole letter.

Mr. Harris: I am sorry, but I am not able to do so. I can read only the part of the letter which appeared in the press. I will read exactly what appeared in the press. It appeared in two different newspapers. I quote first from the Star of April 7:

Paddy Stanton, one of the purged, produced as evidence in his favour a letter from Colin Cameron, M.P. for Nanaimo . . .

Mr. Cameron said he viewed with alarm attempts to rid the C.C.F. of—

And these words are in quotation marks:

—"those difficult persons who ask awkward questions; those exasperating people who play the role of watchdog and bark at our heels whenever in their view we tend to stray too far from the socialist path on which we set our feet twenty years ago".

That is the end of the quotation. Then in the Telegram of the same day there is a somewhat extended report which reads as follows:

Colin Cameron, M.P. Nanaimo, urged the convention to—

And these words are in quotation marks:

—"consider very carefully before depriving the C.C.F. of Stanton's talents".

That is the end of the quotation. The article continues:

In a letter he said—

And the following is within quotation marks:

—"I do not for one moment deny that he can be the most exasperating creature. Nor do I deny that he has very little of what most of us would call practical political sense.

But that is not the function of the Paddy Stantons of this world. Theirs is the role of goads, spurs, prickly thorns in the flesh of our complacency".

That is the end of the quotation. The story goes on as follows:

He numbered Stanton among those people who—

And the following is within quotation marks:

—"play the role of watchdog and bark at our heels whenever in their view we tend to stray too far from the socialist path." He said Stanton was "an agitator, a rabble rouser and an embarrassment to all respectable conventional people" but he had a socialist message "delivered in terms that the man in the factory can understand and appreciate".

With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, on reading it over, it occurred to me that that was a rather fair description of the man who wrote the letter. That is the implication I had in mind in what I said.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I say that is entirely different, that the man to whom the hon. member for Nanaimo referred had not yet been labelled as a Trotskyite, and that the inference against the hon. member for Nanaimo is one with which I think he himself will have to deal. I am extremely sorry—as is the minister, I am sure—that he is not in the house at this time. The thing that surprised me is that a minister for whom I had a great deal of respect should stoop to the level of smearing.

The draft text of the agreement is appended to the resolution.

QUESTIONS

ARMED SERVICES—THEFTS

Mr. Argue:

1. Are any investigations into thefts in the armed services presently being conducted? If so, how many?

2. What is the nature of each such investigation?

Mr. Campney:

1. Yes. Aside from petty thefts, there are 11 investigations in progress.

2. Service police are co-operating with other law enforcement agencies in the following investigations: Provincial and municipal police are investigating the theft of a projector, a typewriter and socks from the mess office at St. Eustache, Quebec. Provincial police are investigating the theft of clothing from quartermaster stores at Barriefield, Ontario. Vancouver police are investigating the theft of bedding from barracks in North Jericho, British Columbia. Provincial and municipal police are investigating the thefts of blankets from a storeroom in London, Ontario. Toronto police are investigating the theft of a camera stolen from a naval photographer while on duty in that city. The R.C.M.P. are investigating the theft of stores, including hand tools, from No. 11 works company in the British Columbia area. At Halifax, the R.C.M.P. are investigating the theft of paint brushes at the dockyard. The R.C.M.P. are investigating the theft of cable from a compound in Fredericton, New Brunswick. Montreal police are investigating the theft of a movie projector belonging to a C.O.T.C. unit from the Y.M.C.A. checkroom in Montreal. R.C.A.F. police are investigating the theft of tools at Claresholm, Alberta. The R.C.M.P. is investigating the theft of wheel assemblies from a maintenance lot in Abbotsford, British Columbia.

ARMED SERVICES—IRREGULARITIES

Mr. Argue:

1. How many complaints, if any, have been received concerning irregularities or thefts in any branch of the armed services?
2. Have any investigations been completed into such irregularities?
3. If so, what was the nature of the report made following each investigation?

Mr. Campney:

1. Since November 26, 1952, 23 complaints alleging irregularities have been received.

2. Yes, 22.

3. With respect to 18 of these complaints, the following observations may be made. As far as could be determined from thorough investigations by service police and, in some instances, civil police, R.C.M.P. and the chief auditor, 13 complaints were found to be without foundation; four of these complaints indicated a possible malicious intent. Investigation into an additional four complaints revealed that, in fact, these complaints were not warranted; two of them appear to have been made by eccentrics. One complaint received was not sufficiently specific to make an investigation possible.

With respect to the remaining four complaints of the 22 complaints in which investigations have been completed:

(1) Following an R.C.M.P. investigation into a complaint alleging discrimination in the letting of trucking business at Hagersville, Ontario, an officer and a warrant officer were brought before the civil criminal courts; the charges were subsequently dismissed by the supreme court of Ontario.

(2) Following an R.M.C.P. investigation into a complaint about the handling of trucking tenders at Camp Shilo, Manitoba, a report was submitted to the attorney general of the province of Manitoba, who found that there was insufficient evidence on which to prosecute. A warrant officer was removed from his position.

(3) Following an R.C.M.P. investigation into a complaint of irregularities at Moncton, New Brunswick, a flight sergeant and two civilians were charged with obtaining the sum of $1,066 by forging invoices. The flight sergeant was sentenced to three months imprisonment and released from the service. The two civilians were given five years suspended sentence. The sum of $807 was restored to the crown.

(4) Following an investigation by service authorities into a complaint alleging irregularities at Camp Petawawa, Ontario, three officers were disciplined for misuse of transport on two occasions. An allegation that civilian labourers were being asked to work too much overtime was substantiated in only one case since overtime is the normal practice during the summer training period. Other allegations were thoroughly investigated and no evidence was found to substantiate them.

ARMED FORCES IDENTIFICATION BUREAU

Mr. Harkness:

1. How long has the Canadian armed forces identification bureau been in operation?
2. How many persons have been employed in it each year since its inception?
3. What has been the total cost of this bureau to date?
4. What backlog of unclassified fingerprints exists and, if this backlog is increasing, what is the rate of increase?
5. How many men would be required, and how long would it take to catch up with the backlog and to put the identification bureau on an efficient and useful basis?

Mr. Campney:

1. The Canadian armed forces identification bureau has been in operation since 1947.

2. 1947, 13; 1948, 13; 1949, 16; 1950, 40; 1951, 40; 1952, 40; 1953, 41; 1954, 45; 1955, 47.

3. Approximately $988,000.

4 and 5. The Canadian armed forces identification bureau is responsible for the provision of identification cards and assisting with security checks. Existing staff is carrying out these functions satisfactorily and is keeping abreast of current demands.

In October 1954 the bureau adopted the R.C.M.P. system of fingerprint formula classification. Since that time all fingerprints have been classified according to this system. Fingerprint records made before October 1954, which include all wartime fingerprint records, are not classified according to the R.C.M.P. system. To reclassify previous records would require the present staff to be multiplied several times over and would take perhaps a year. However, it has not yet been determined that a complete reclassification would be warranted in the light of the costs involved.

C.N.R. ACCOUNTING DEPARTMENT

Mr. Hodgson:

1. Were any new jobs created in the accounting department of the Canadian National Railways in the years 1953 and 1954?
2. If so, how many?
3. What is the monthly rate of pay for each of these jobs?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. The Canadian National Railways advise that the organization of any department of the railway is a matter of internal operation, and it is not the policy of the management to make public such information.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

WHEAT MARKETING POINTS, WESTERN PROVINCES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many wheat marketing points are there in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta?
2. In how many of these shipping points in each of the provinces does the car order book operate?

Mr. Dickey:

1. There are 378 points in Manitoba, 1,106 points in Saskatchewan, and 590 points in Alberta from which western grain may be shipped.

2. Section 61 of the Canada Grain Act provides that all railway companies furnish car order books to their agents at each point from which western grain may be shipped. Car order books become operative when applications are made in them for cars under section 62 of the Canada Grain Act. They may be in operation for a short period and then cease to operate when all applications are filled. No record is kept, therefore, of points where car order books are in operation.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Bell:

What is the total of all immigrants landed in Canada since January 1, 1950, at (a) Saint John, New Brunswick; (b) Halifax, Nova Scotia; (c) all other ports?

Mr. Pickersgill:

(a) Saint John, N.B.	21,582
(b) Halifax, N.S.	292,632
(c) All other ports	441,682
Total	755,896

[Mr. Campney.]

PRIVATE CARS, C.N.R.

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many private, business or official cars, for the use of officials or executives of the Canadian National Railways since the 1st day of January, 1953, have been manufactured by the railway plants or purchased for the Canadian National Railways?
2. What was the cost including alterations of each of said cars?
3. Are any of such cars still under construction? If so, how many, and what is the estimated cost thereof?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows: 1. No private, business or official cars for the use of officials or executives of the Canadian National Railways have been manufactured by railway plants or purchased for Canadian National Railways since January 1, 1953. Since that date two obsolete passenger cars, which have been replaced, were converted to business cars in company shops, replacing two units no longer efficient or safe for use in service.

2. Cost of conversion was approximately $127,000 for each car and this represents the total cost as prior to conversion the cars had been retired and written off.

3. No.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—SEALS

Mr. Monteith:

1. How many contracts have been let for lead seals for the Post Office Department in the last two years?
2. How many lead seals were involved in each contract?
3. What was the name of the successful bidder in each contract and what was the bid per 1,000 seals?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare):

1. 7.

2 and 3. 1953 January 30; Federated Metals Canada Ltd., Montreal, P.Q., 1,000,000 seals, $3.61 per 1,000; Union Metal Co. Ltd., Winnipeg, Man., 1,000,000 seals, $3.35 per 1,000;

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF GRAIN HANDLERS AT LAKEHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. What is being done to bring about an early settlement of the strike of lakehead grain handlers in order to prevent economic unsettlement and serious distress in the marketing of wheat and other farm products on the prairies?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) sent me notice this morning of a similar question, part of which corresponds with the question of the hon. member for Prince Albert. In view of the importance of this matter I would ask that I might have the opportunity to give a little of the background of this dispute, one that I assure you has been causing my department concern now for a good many months.

The last agreement which was in effect between local 650 of the brotherhood of railway and steamship clerks, freight handlers, express and station employees and the lakehead terminal elevators association, representing elevator companies at Fort William and Port Arthur, was for a period of one year, terminating December 31, 1953. Pursuant to the terms of the collective agreement, local 650 of the brotherhood gave notice to the association that it wished to revise the agreement increasing wage rates and improving working conditions. Following this notice, the negotiating committees of the association and the local carried out direct negotiations subsequent to the termination date, but little progress toward a settlement was made.

On March 24, 1954, the lakehead terminal elevators association requested me to appoint a conciliation officer to deal with matters in dispute between the parties. The department's senior conciliation officer in Winnipeg was appointed on March 29, 1954. On June 11 the conciliation officer reported that he was unable to effect a settlement of the dispute, and on June 21 I established a conciliation board to deal further with the dispute. The board was fully constituted on July 19, 1954, with His Honour Judge Dowler of Port Arthur as chairman.

The board directed its efforts towards getting the parties back into negotiations on the issues in dispute with the result that on December 16, 1954, it was able to report that the parties "had been successful in settling all the issues except wages." On this issue the brotherhood had requested that the base rate paid at the lakehead be increased to the level of the wage rate paid by Vancouver elevator companies, with an additional 10 cents per hour to compensate for the dust hazard. On December 16, 1954, I received the report of the conciliation board, signed by the chairman and the nominee of the brotherhood, recommending a general increase of 3 per cent for all classifications affected.

Following receipt by the parties of copies of the report of the board, which I conveyed to them, the brotherhood advised me that the board's recommendation was unacceptable. The association of employers, in view of the decision of the brotherhood, did not express any view on the board's recommendation. Subsequently, my department arranged a further meeting between representatives of the parties in Ottawa on February 15. Some progress was made and a further meeting was arranged for a later date at the lakehead. This meeting was held but adjourned without results. A further conference between the parties initiated by the Canadian vice president of the brotherhood was held at Fort William on March 29, but no further progress towards a settlement was made.

My department was subsequently informed that a strike vote would be taken and immediately on receipt of the result of such vote I appointed Mr. Eric Taylor of Toronto as mediator to confer with the parties and use his best efforts to bring them into agreement. Advice to this effect was conveyed to the parties on April 13.

There was some indication that a strike would not take place until the parties had met with the mediator, and meetings with them were accordingly arranged by him to take place on Tuesday morning, April 19—that is tomorrow morning. When it was learned on Saturday, April 16, that the employees had initiated strike action, Mr. Taylor proceeded at once to the lakehead and is now actively engaged in efforts to resolve the dispute and obtain a resumption of operations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the serious possibilities connected with this strike, would the minister not consider personally going to Fort William to see whether or not he could bring these people together? It has serious possibilities to the west and to the economy in general.

Mr. Gregg: All I can say is that the minister and his department will leave nothing undone that they think will help towards a settlement of this dispute. It was only on Saturday that Mr. Taylor flew to the head of the lakes. Although yesterday was Sunday, he was able to get in touch with some members of the parties concerned and he is holding aggressive, active discussions with them on this day, the 18th. I think we might see what happens there. I will be very glad to report to the house as we go on from here.

REPORTED UNEMPLOYMENT CONDITION AT SEVEN ISLANDS, QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Labour. I regret I did not send him notice, but I do not think he will need it. Will the minister tell the house what action, if any, the government is taking with regard to a condition of unemployment reported at Seven Islands where 600 employees are reported to be looking for work, which will not be available for some weeks to come?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I am very glad to reassure my hon. friend and the house that that situation is not as was reported over the week end. This morning I had a discussion with the hon. member for Saguenay (Mr. Brisson), in whose constituency Seven Islands is located; and I have also had reports from our Montreal office of the unemployment insurance commission which, over the week end, was in touch with the management of the employment office, and I find that instead of there being 600 new Canadians assembled there, who are unemployed, there are 448 applicants for employment at the present time in that office, of whom 80 are new Canadians. They have assembled there, in small groups, from various parts of Canada, mainly from the St. Lawrence valley, during the last few weeks.

It was suggested that they go there so as to be in plenty of time to be taken on or to get their applications in when hiring takes place. Unfortunately hiring will not begin until May 15. However, even that number, though small, is nevertheless important. I am glad to say that the situation is well in hand and that the Montreal office and the local office are well able to cope with it. There is no trouble.

But this does again give a clear indication of the importance of personnel—new Canadians or old, who are urgently seeking work—checking in at the nearest employment office to make sure that the alleged employment elsewhere is a reality rather than a rumour.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED LAY-OFFS AT LEASIDE AND WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Has the attention of the Minister of Transport been called to the fact that quite short notice has been given to Canadian National Railways employees in the repair shops at Leaside, indicating that their employment will either cease or they must move to London or Montreal? Has he investigated whether the closing of this type of shop is really necessary in the interests of efficiency and economy?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I shall take my hon. friend's question as notice and look into the matter.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask a supplementary question in that regard? Can the minister give the house some information as to the projected lay-offs which are going to take place in the Canadian National shops at Winnipeg?

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

CF-105—REPORTED DELAY IN PRODUCTION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): May I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Defence Production or his parliamentary assistant? Will the minister comment on a statement made at an Avro workers' meeting in Toronto on Sunday to the effect that production of the CF-105 was being delayed and unemployment created through lack of necessary tools?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Defence Production): I have not seen the statement in question, but if there has been one I know of no grounds for its validity.

GRAIN

SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN STORAGE PAYMENTS AT ELEVATORS AFFECTED BY STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Can the minister say whether the regular storage payments at the terminal elevators affected by the strike have been reduced, as I believe was the policy in a previous strike?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Perhaps, as Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, I might answer that. I have not had the opportunity of going fully into this matter, but storage rates have not been reduced. At the moment this is a matter between the wheat board and the operators, but it is one upon which we are in touch with the wheat board.

Mr. Argue: Is the minister also in touch with the board of grain commissioners relative to the same subject?

Mr. Winters: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO FINAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): The question I was going to ask is slightly different from that asked by the hon. member for Yorkton. Is it the intention of the government, by an immediate statement, to carry out the commitment made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the final payment for wheat would be announced before seeding?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I read the question as it was submitted to me, Mr. Speaker, and it refers to a commitment. I may say I have not been able to find any record of a commitment, but in referring to the various Hansards I find that on April 1, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Prince Albert, the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that the announcement would be made as soon as the figures became available from the Canadian wheat board. He indicated that would probably be in three or four weeks from that date, and a reply in the same tone was given on March 14 to the hon. member for Assiniboia.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce plans to return early in May and I expect he will make a statement shortly thereafter. I may say that the board is making excellent progress in mailing out cheques on the barley and oats payments which were announced on March 14 and 18 respectively. The barley cheques are going out first, and they will be completed this week. They will be followed by the oats cheques.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if the minister might not consider the very serious financial plight of western farmers and make an announcement before the return of the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, or in his absence his parliamentary assistant. Can he give information to the house as to when farmers may expect payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act? Spring has come and this money is urgently needed for fuel and seed, and there are many areas in which no payments have been received.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have received a question from the hon. member for Kindersley which is along the same line, and which reads as follows:

Is it the intention of the government, by an immediate statement, to carry out the commitment made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the final payment for wheat would be announced before seeding?

Mr. Coldwell: Those are two different matters.

Mr. Winters: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): I cannot answer the question asked by the hon. member for Yorkton, but I shall look into the matter and see if an answer can be given in a few days.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED—PIPE LINE TO WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): May I be permitted to direct a question to the Prime Minister? I do so in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the government received any request from Trans-Canada Pipe Lines for a permit to construct a gas pipe line from Alberta to Winnipeg, with a request also to export to the Minneapolis and St. Paul's areas?

[Mr. Winters.]

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There has been no recent request from Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. There was included in the original plan a provision for the exportation of a certain amount of natural gas to the United States, but there has been no recent application.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO FIRE AT ROCKCLIFFE BARRACKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Has the Minister of National Defence any statement to make to the house concerning the disastrous fire at Rockcliffe airport?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I believe the facts with reference to this very regrettable fire have been fairly well covered by the press, but I might add a few observations.

As everyone knows, the fire took place at midnight on April 16, in barracks block 73, which is a second world war barrack block building, accommodating about 100 airmen. The station fire department arrived at the scene of the fire approximately two minutes after it was discovered by an airman.

Within a very few minutes they were joined by firemen from the Ottawa city fire department. Apparently there was adequate equipment, and it operated satisfactorily. It was almost 2 a.m. when the fire was finally brought under control. There was heavy damage to the south end of the east wing, and the washroom corridor on the second floor. The remainder of the building suffered water and smoke damage.

The evacuation alarm was sounded by the airman who discovered the fire, and he immediately began rousing others from their sleep. Intense smoke and heat however prevented anyone from entering the south end of the east wing on the second floor where the fire had originated. Some airmen did escape from this area through the windows but, most regrettably, two young airmen were trapped and died in the fire. Nine others received minor injuries.

The cause of the fire is as yet undetermined. An investigation is now under way by the Royal Canadian Air Force, the R.C.M.P., the Ontario fire marshal's office and the Ottawa fire department.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if his department is using fire resistant paint on buildings of that nature.

Mr. Campney: I cannot answer that question definitely in regard to this building. It is an old building, completed during world war II. I know that we are studying fire resistant paint, but I also know that in some cases the use of fire resistant paint has not proven effective and it is quite expensive. I am not sure as to the extent to which we are actually using it.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I would like to say that we have a report in connection with repairs to the library which shows that they are using fire resistant varnish in there. They hope it will help.

TRADE

OIL—REPLY OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT CONCERNING RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I should like to know if the government is yet in a position to give to the house the reply of the government of the United States in answer to a statement sent to that goverment as reported to this house some time ago?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall have to inquire. I returned this morning, and I am sorry I did not communicate with the Department of External Affairs to ascertain whether or not any answer had been received. I shall have to do that before I can give a formal answer.

Mr. Drew: I wish to thank the Prime Minister for taking this as notice, but I would point out that this matter was regarded as sufficiently important for the minister to read to the house the message sent to the government of the United States, and I do think we should have the answer given by the government of the United States to that message.

NEW WESTMINSTER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

MEASURE AUTHORIZING LOANS OF $200,000 BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house in committee on Bill No. 187, respecting the New Westminster harbour commissioners—Mr. Marler—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT

INCREASE IN ANNUAL APPROPRIATION TO GRADE CROSSING FUND

The house resumed, from Monday, March 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Marler for the second reading of Bill No. 259, to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, the amendments moved by the Minister of Transport on the motion for second reading of the bill that he suggested would remove the impediments to the operation of the act are now well known to us. Probably they will work out the way the minister has suggested with regard to five of the six proposals he presented, but the fifth, which limits the fund to $7 million, if the amount of the uncommitted balance is over $2 million on April 1 of any year, instead of being cumulative, indicates that this is a continuation of the sloth that made the momentum in accomplishment so sluggish and has brought about the consequent dissatisfaction with the board's present policy. It seems that the policy is to be the same, and I say the whole question should be examined.

I should like to refer to the statement of the minister that the board did not initiate projects, and that it acts only upon the petition of interested parties. The board should be in a position to initiate, and should not always leave to others the decision as to whether a project is needed, because the financial positions of some municipalities are such that many urgently needed projects will never be built. The board should be in a position to act on its own to protect the public.

At the time the board made an examination of the whole project they did not have the power to deal with the problem of unemployment that confronted this house last year. The minister said that unemployment was not one of the problems that confronted the board at that time, which is right; but since it has been injected into this arena—I mentioned it in debate the other day—it is a very important matter at the present time, and if the board had had the information at that time probably it would have introduced it as a subject to assist in solving our unemployment problem.

When the unemployment problem was considered some ten years ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) suggested that shelves of work would be provided to take care of unemployment in the future, and that municipalities and provinces were to have shelves of work set aside for that purpose. That situation has now arrived. Such projects as grade separations and the protecting of crossings with safety devices are matters that lend themselves to consideration at this time. That was the reason why I introduced it in my remarks. I thought it would help to solve the problem of unemployment and would prevent grade crossing accidents, without making work just for the sake of making work. This is a shelf of work that would lend itself to removing grade level crossing hazards and at the same time it would help to relieve unemployment next year.

It seems that all these problems are discussed or considered when we are right in the middle of them and nothing can be done. When the dominion-provincial conference meets, this question should be put on the agenda. The only reason why it was not considered by the board of transport commissioners when they were studying the question was that they were not asked to consider it.

Some papers made mention of the fact that there was no necessity to go into the whole problem because accidents were happening in remote sections of the country and also on grade crossings that were protected at the present time; therefore you could not take care of the indifference of the people who were driving, if they could not keep themselves out of accidents. I am not disregarding that point. It is quite true. But if the attitude were taken by industry, whether construction or manufacturing, that because of the indifference of the people no attention should be given to preventing accidents, I am quite sure we would have an appalling situation in the country. Because people are indifferent to the protection provided for them in accident prevention devices and disregard them is no reason why we should not continue to examine this problem which is causing concern to the people of Canada.

I am interested not only in unemployment but in the matter of safety regulations on the highways. This question has been touched on by some speakers. It should also be on the agenda of the dominion-provincial conference and should be tied in not only with safety on the highways but with an over-all accident prevention program. The whole question of safety should be studied, and standard regulations on the highways should be adopted so that all the people from Nova Scotia to British Columbia would be familiar with them and the safety regulations would all be the same. Then when tourists come to this country they could readily adapt themselves to the safety practices, precautions and devices that have been established.

These are some of the points that I thought should have been emphasized when the minister made his remarks on his motion for second reading. The unemployment factor and the factor of placing a limitation of $7 million on the fund are very important. The limitation on the fund is going to get us back into the position we were in formerly, and very little will be done. I am satisfied that while $5 million is a vast improvement, it will not take care of the situation that presents itself, nor will it solve our problems.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): I have a few comments to make because it seems to me that the principle of this bill is very important. There is a great job to be done in this country so far as the removal of level crossings is concerned not only from the standpoint of safety—because we all realize that there is a great toll in human lives each year from crossing accidents—but also from the standpoint of convenience. I know of many localities in Canada where the failure to provide for proper access from one side of a railway track to another has brought about serious inconvenience. I am thinking of my own constituency where on occasion traffic is held up for a considerable period of time owing to the passage of a particularly long freight train. I know that happens in this part of the country.

I recall going through the city of Brockville not long ago, and the traffic was held up in that place for some considerable time. So we are faced here with a grave problem. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the amount of money provided for this bill is totally inadequate even to come close to dealing with the problem. After all, this legislation must be judged in the light of its effectiveness in doing a job. When we realize the immensity of the job to be done, and when we look at the figure of $5 million, we appreciate how ineffective the legislation is going to be.

I suggest it is going to be ineffective, not only because of the paucity of the amount of money in the fund, but also because the municipalities are still to be called upon to bear a share, which not many of them are able to bear. I suggest that, in spite of the fact that these funds will now provide for a maximum of 60 per cent and that some arrangement may be reached with regard to the railroad's share, it is quite evident that a tremendous financial burden is going to be placed on the municipalities in this country. It does not matter what part of the country we consider, municipal councils and city councils have the same story to tell. The mill rate is now at an extremely high level and the municipal taxing authorities have gone as far as they can go. They are not able to undertake any appreciable expenditures of this kind.

Therefore, if the government suggests that through this legislation they are going to make any real attack on this problem, I think they have to give further consideration to the legislation. I do not know of any municipalities that are now in a position to go to the board and ask that a particular project be undertaken, particularly when the average project in a city may involve an expenditure of a million dollars or more. The $5 million figure, I suggest, is in keeping with the procedure under which the money is made available, that the onus is on the municipalities. Instead of the board giving leadership, going out into the various parts of the country where the problem is most acute, and showing initiative, the initiative is going to have to be left to the municipalities, and not many municipalities are in a position at the present time to embark on an expenditure of a few hundred thousand dollars on a rail crossing project.

It seems to me that, in view of the position of the municipalities, if the government is anxious to bring about some improvement in the rail crossing problem in this country, then the government through the board is going to have to offer the leadership and supply most of the money. If that is not done, then I suggest that not many projects will be undertaken in the country at the present time. I want to repeat that there are not many municipalities in this country that are in a position today to go before the board with a recommended project and to proceed in the construction of that project when it is invariably going to cost them a good part of a million dollars on an average. So if the government is really anxious to do something about this problem, I suggest that the sum of money in the fund is going to have to be greatly increased; and secondly the board is going to have to be given wider latitude. It is going to have to be empowered to go out and seek to eradicate the problem where it is most serious and to take the initiative in proceeding with these projects. When I say "take the initiative", I suggest that it will of necessity involve offering to pay a larger share of the total cost than is provided for in the legislation.

There is one other matter which I wish to deal with. I touched on it on a previous occasion. I feel that, in view of the seriousness of the unemployment problem in Canada at the present time, the government should be casting about and seeking ways and means of providing employment and in so doing performing useful works throughout this country.

The hon. member for Danforth mentioned a moment ago the shelf of public works. We are familiar with the promises made by the government immediately after world war II, that, in the event that unemployment did come, the government would be prepared to provide employment through a shelf of public works. Since those public works have not materialized, I feel that here, in at least a small sphere, the government could do something to provide immediate employment.

I realize that with modern methods of construction not too many actual labourers are going to be employed on these projects, but I suggest that where projects of this type are undertaken it is going to be a shot in the arm to business in localities where projects are being undertaken, and that it is going to assist in the economic welfare of the community. There are communities in every part of Canada that have problems of this kind, and the government could be using legislation to provide necessary jobs in those localities.

I was quite surprised a few weeks ago when the minister was commenting on the precedent set in the 1930's, when sums of money were made available in some cases from the unemployment relief fund to the rail crossing fund, and the minister at that time suggested that the time was not ripe. I asked him on that occasion whether he did not feel that now is the proper time to put sufficient money into the fund to provide some jobs. I must say that I was quite amazed by the answer given by the minister when he told the house that the government did not consider that now was the appropriate time to do anything in this regard. Now, I am just wondering how serious the situation is going to have to get in this country before the government is prepared to undertake even a small measure of this kind.

After all, we can talk about unemployment, we can talk about the necessity of providing jobs, but here is one specific example of where the government could be doing some little thing at least towards providing employment; and yet they feel that now is not the appropriate time. They are prepared to wait until the unemployment situation, I presume, gets worse. So I want to urge the minister at this stage to give serious consideration to the suggestions which have been made and to reconsider his earlier answer that the time has not yet arrived when it might be deemed necessary or advisable to place in this fund additional sums of money with the specific purpose of making an attack on the unemployment problem to at least a small extent in some parts of the country. I want to urge the minister to consider very seriously just how effective this legislation is going to be. We all welcome the addition of $5 million, but at the same time we have to ask ourselves this question. As a result of this legislation, will grade separation projects be undertaken in this country? That is the acid test of the legislation. I suggest that under the present arrangement, where the municipalities are called upon to pay an extremely heavy burden as part of the costs, not many subways are going to be built; and after all that is the real test of the legislation.

It is my considered opinion that if the government is willing to grant the board greater latitude and to permit it to enter into negotiations with the municipalities with a view to undertaking projects where perhaps the board would pay 100 per cent of the cost and relieve the municipalities in needy cases of any expense whatsoever, then we are going to do something about eliminating grade crossings in this country. But if we are simply going to pass the buck to the municipalities and limit the funds to $5 million and expect the municipality to come along with a few hundred thousand dollars to undertake the project, then this money is going to stay in the fund for some time. I can understand why the government decided that the money was not to be allowed to accumulate beyond $7 million. So I urge the government at this time to give some serious reconsideration to the bill in its present form and to bring forward the changes which, in my opinion, will make it more effective.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this subject was quite broadly discussed during the resolution stage and I do not pretend that at this point one can add new considerations, but in connection with the problem there are several factors on which I should like to lay stress briefly this afternoon.

We have three principal aspects of the bill. First, there is the increase in the annual parliamentary contribution to the railway grade crossing fund from $1 million to $5 million. Second, there is the increase from 40 to 60 per cent which may be ordered by the board of transport commissioners to be paid out of that fund, toward the cost of construction work for the protection, safety and convenience of the public. Then, third, there is the increase from $150,000 to $300,000 in the ceiling on the contribution which may be paid out of the grade crossing fund to the cost of construction of any such project.

The measure has been welcomed in all parts of the house; indeed, Mr. Speaker, it has received warm approval as far as it goes. The discussion has been concerned largely with pointing out what may be inadequacies in it and with urging upon the government an increase in the provisions thus made.

The two features which have attracted attention in the discussion have been safety of the public and some assistance in the attack on the unemployment problem. Both of these are serious matters deserving of the highest degree of attention on the part of parliament. As to safety, one need not dwell at length on the huge economic cost of injuries and fatalities in crossing accidents. It is easy enough for us to think of investments on the part of the public and those others who are called upon to contribute substantial amounts to the cost of grade crossing projects. Against that consideration, however, must be placed, in redress of the ledger balance, the huge annual economic cost of fatalities and injuries inflicted year by year in crossing accidents which might otherwise be avoided; and that is quite apart from the anguish that is caused by reason of those fatalities and injuries.

In the excellent and comprehensive report which the board of transport commissioners submitted to the minister on this subject, they brought most of their figures down to the end of the year 1953. I have obtained some of the figures for the year 1954 with a view to bringing the information up to date. Out of the large numbers of injuries and fatalities in the course of railway accidents, these figures have been isolated as applicable to accidents arising at public highway crossings, regardless of the form of protection or whether protection there exists. In 1954 at public highway crossings on railways there were 454 accidents involving injuries to persons, and in those accidents 179 people were killed and 596 were injured. That is a formidable total indeed. How does it compare with the record in recent years? I have here the figures on the number of accidents at the same types of crossings in the five-year period commencing with 1950. In 1950 there were 457 accidents at these public highway crossings; in 1951, there were 490; in 1952, there were 463; in 1953, there were 487 and in 1954 there were 454.

What has been the contribution to the solution of this problem by various types of crossing protection? A further glance at these figures indicates that over three-quarters of these accidents which have occurred at public highway crossings on railways have occurred at unprotected crossings. In 1950, out of the 457 accidents, 356 occurred at unprotected crossings; in 1951, out of the 490 accidents, 393 occurred at unprotected crossings; in 1952, out of 463 accidents, 364 occurred at unprotected crossings; in 1953, out of the 487 accidents, 392 occurred at unprotected crossings; and in 1954, out of the 454 accidents, 353 occurred at unprotected crossings.

Density of population and also density of motor car traffic enter into the picture substantially, as one can see by looking at the breakdown of the numbers of accidents at such crossings by provinces. These figures indicate that well over 40 per cent of accidents at grade crossings have occurred in the province of Ontario where population is more dense and the numbers of motor cars are so much larger.

On the part of some, Mr. Speaker, there is an impression that, after all, most of these accidents occur at night and that people keep their eyes open in the daytime. The figures do not bear out any such impression. Taking the figures for 1954, one finds that, out of the 454 accidents to which I referred, 235 of them occurred during daylight hours and only 219 during the night hours. In the case of accidents that occurred where motor vehicles were struck by a train—and of these there were 264—150 of them occurred during daylight hours and 114 during night hours. Those are cases where the collisions took the form of the train striking the motor vehicle. The majority of them occurred in daylight. No doubt many of them were cases where people had tried to beat the train across the crossing and others where they failed to observe the approach of the train. Then in the case of accidents that took the form of motor vehicles running into the side of trains—and there are many of these accidents—last year there were 140 of them, of which 46 occurred in daylight hours and 94 during the night hours.

It seems to me that these are important statistics, Mr. Speaker. The cost of grade separation work—indeed the cost of "construction work for the protection, safety and convenience of the public", to follow the words of the statute—is unquestionably high. Whether these works take the form of complete grade separation or of other crossing protection, the construction of these works is becoming increasingly costly year by year. The cost of constructing those projects—some of them major projects—has particularly increased by leaps and bounds with the soaring cost of construction in recent years. Consequently, with the increase in cost there has been a natural resistance, on the part of municipalities and oftentimes on the part of railways, to projects of this kind. Therefore, the importance of the increase in the permissible contribution from the grade crossing fund, from 40 per cent to 60 per cent in these cases, is, in my humble opinion, fully as important as is the increase in the annual contribution from $1 million to $5 million.

It would really be of much less effect than I think many hon. members of the house assume if the annual contribution were multiplied fivefold in this way and if there were not at the same time a corresponding increase in the maximum percentage which the board of transport commissioners may order to be paid out of the crossing fund to the cost of construction of any of these projects. Let us remember, sir, that the number of those among whom the cost of the work may be assessed is not large. In the case of provincial highways you have the provinces. In the case of other highways, and sometimes also in the case of provincial highways, you have the municipalities. Then you have the railways and you sometimes have public utilities. You sometimes have electric or street railways.

Let us bear in mind that no portion of the cost of maintenance of these crossings is paid out of the railway grade crossing fund and that when any of these projects is ordered to be constructed those upon whom a portion of the cost is assessed must face the fact that along with that allocation goes an allocation of the cost of future maintenance, and in many cases that may be a sizeable sum.

But let us look at this matter of the maximum contribution to the cost of construction as distinguished from the cost of maintenance. It is a heavy burden indeed that can be created for municipalities and for railways under these orders. So far as I am aware we have not, in any of the tables in the report of the board of transport commissioners, the total amount which has thus far been levied against any of the individual railways operating in Canada. We may see in the report at page 27, for instance, that the total expenditure for protection at highway crossings from 1909, the date of the inception of the railway grade crossing fund, down to the end of 1953 was approximately $52 million, and it appears that something over $18 million was assessed against the railways as their portion of the total. I think if further inquiry were made into the figures, including the cost of maintenance, we would have a much clearer picture than is yet available of the very formidable cost laid upon the railways in relation to the construction and maintenance of such projects.

As to the municipalities, the table on page 27 to which I have referred does not distinguish between provinces and municipalities, but out of the $52 million aggregate the total of contributions levied against the provinces and municipalities from 1909 to 1953 exceeds $19 million. Sir, this amount is bound to rise as the total increases if there is not some change made now along the lines proposed by which the proportion of the cost that may be paid out of the railway grade crossing fund may be increased.

One does not say that the experience of Canadian railways is precisely parallel to that of the United States railways operating in densely built up areas, but I mention the experience of one railway in the United States. It is not completely transcontinental, but one important railway in the United States having an annual business approximating that of Canadian National Railways or Canadian Pacific Railway has had levies upon it so far for grade separation and railway grade crossing works exceeding $160 million. It is time that we stopped and observed the warning in relation to this cost.

As long as municipalities are to be called upon to bear a substantial percentage of the cost of construction, they, in their depressed condition, are bound to offer resistance in many cases. It does not matter that in so many of these cases the need of the grade separation or of some change in the form of crossing protection is acknowledged. Accidents may have resulted at a crossing by reason of the absence of some better form of protection but in case after case—and I speak out of not a little experience in relation to cases of this kind—one finds objections taken by the municipalities simply because they feel they cannot meet the percentage of cost that is proposed to be levied upon them.

A similar situation exists in the case of the railways, which are a depressed industry in Canada today. We are reminded of that in the recent report of the royal commission on agreed charges by the former Mr. Justice Turgeon. He points to the fact that the railways of Canada today are a depressed industry. When the railways are called upon to pay substantial percentages towards the cost of construction of these works, is it any wonder, when these costs far exceed any benefit that the railway may expect to derive from the crossing protection or grade separation, that the railways in many cases are obliged to resist? That leads me to say this. We hear discussion in the chamber about the great potential value of a general program of crossing protection and grade separation in Canada as an aid to relieve unemployment, but it is of little value to propose that great national schemes of this kind should be undertaken if we are going to be faced with the same type of allocation of costs as we have been facing hitherto. It only means that the more of these projects that are mooted the stronger must be the objections taken by the municipalities affected and the stronger the objections that must be taken by the railways that are affected so long as the amount that they are called upon to contribute exceeds the benefit that they receive from the contemplated construction.

The increase from 40 per cent to 60 per cent in the proportion that may be paid out of the railway grade crossing fund is, in my estimation, as important as any other feature contained in this measure. I point out to the house that the 60 per cent we are now about to legislate is a maximum, just as the 40 per cent was that has existed in recent years. There is no guarantee that the board of transport commissioners will award that sum to be paid out of the grade crossing fund in every case that comes before it. It simply means that parliament is giving power to the board to order up to 60 per cent of the cost of construction to be paid in any case where it meets with the board's approval to do so.

If there is going to be an attempt made in the interests of public safety or public convenience to expand the program of grade separation works in Canada, then I think we must be prepared to be more generous in order to lighten the burden on the municipalities in those cases and, so far as the railways are concerned, it seems to me we must be prepared to draw more guidance from the policy being followed in the United States. It is federal policy in the United States to limit the contribution that the railways are called upon to make to grade separation in two ways: first of all, to limit the contribution to the benefit to be received by the railway from the contemplated construction and, second, even to limit that to an aggregate of 10 per cent of the total cost.

The federal policy in the United States thus provides for railways to participate in the cost of projects according to the benefits they receive and subject to this maximum of 10 per cent of the total cost. If there are no benefits available to the railways as a result of the projected grade separation, the railways are not called upon to contribute anything to the cost of grade separation in the United States. That is the federal policy there.

Now, the policy of the states is not uniform in this matter. There is quite a wide variation in the legislative policy of the various state legislatures in those cases where the grade separation falls within state, rather than federal, jurisdiction. There are some states which have laws providing for an allocation of cost according to the benefits received, which is like the federal policy in that country. Some states have placed a maximum of 15 per cent on the total contribution that may be levied upon the railways. Other states provide that the railways may be called upon to contribute a fixed percentage ranging from 10 per cent to 20 per cent. In other states, the state commission has the power to fix the railway contributions in a manner somewhat similar to the provision made in our own Railway Act, within certain limits.

It is well for us to bear in mind, sir, the increasing extent to which benefit has been made the yardstick of the contribution that the railways in the United States have been called upon to make towards the cost of grade separation work. In Canada there has been a steady and beneficial trend over the long period since 1909. Canada began in 1909 with a maximum contribution from the railway grade crossing fund of 20 per cent. In 1919 this contribution was increased to 25 per cent, and in 1926 to 40 per cent. It has remained at 40 per cent for 19 long years. The measure that is before us now has indeed been delayed too long.

Accompanying these percentage maxima there have been as well absolute maxima imposed in connection with the cost of any project, beginning in 1909 with $5,000. This was increased, the last time in 1950, to $150,000 per project which was far too low because the construction costs of these projects, oftentimes in areas where they are most needed, have run to such high figures that the maximum contribution of $150,000 out of the fund has been quite inadequate. I have misgivings also, Mr. Speaker, as to the adequacy of the proposed maximum of $300,000 per project.

When I raised this point in the debate in 1950, pointing out that the maximum contribution of $150,000 from the railway grade crossing fund was going to have the effect of preventing the elimination of grade crossings in some important situations, I was told that the great danger was that if we did not impose such a maximum the result could be that a few costly projects could absorb the entire amount available in the railway grade crossing fund. Now we are having a fivefold increase in the annual contribution, we are having an increase from 40 per cent to 60 per cent in the percentage contributions of the fund. I question whether the proposed new maximum of $300,000 for any one project is justified.

Looking back over the years, it is well that we bear in mind that on more than one occasion the railway grade crossing fund has been exhausted. It is well that we should bear in mind also that its purpose is more than safety. The terms of the statute contemplate the use of the fund for construction work for the protection, safety and convenience of the public. Undoubtedly, to an increasing extent, grade eliminations are being sought not merely in the interests of public safety, but in the interests of speed and public convenience. The great increase in the volume of motor traffic on our highways has resulted in many cases in a stimulated demand for the elimination of grade crossings. That is a factor that must be recognized, and it is another reason why an increasing percentage of the cost of crossing eliminations should be borne at public expense rather than at the expense of these municipalities, railways, public utilities or others who are, in the language of the statute, interested or affected by the proposed crossing works.

Sir, the problem is great. It is a problem that is bound to increase in proportion with the increase in highway traffic in Canada. I hope that no one will pretend that the increases that are being made in the bill are adequate to meet the problem. They are an important and valuable step forward. One would commend the report of the board of transport commissioners, and the recommendations which they have put before the government and to which, with one exception, effect is being given by this legislation. I am bold enough to predict, sir, that further legislative changes lie before us as we realize the extent to which this is a public problem and not simply the problem of the municipalities or the railways or the public utilities immediately affected in the case of any project. We would do well, it seems to me, to draw benefit and guidance from the example of the United States in this regard.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I do not wish to take up the time of the house, Mr. Speaker, by reciting what has already been so adequately dealt with by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and others who have criticized the suggested legislation. It is sufficient to say that we are all, of course, glad to see that the government has taken steps to increase the amount of this fund and increase the proportion of the contribution. We all realize this is necessary because of the increase in highway traffic in Canada and the speeding up of that traffic. In addition there seems little doubt that the already overtaxed municipalities are going to have to pay a still larger proportion of the cost of these enterprises.

There is only one thing in this bill with which I should like to deal, and that is the method of initiating proceedings. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) made the following statement as recorded on page 2134 of Hansard for March 17, 1955:

> The board of transport commissioners, which administers the fund, does not itself initiate the execution of these projects, but acts upon the petition of a railway company, a municipality, a province or some other interest that desires to have the project carried out.

Now, having a very dangerous crossing in my own constituency, which I have mentioned many times in this house, I have had conversations with members of the board of transport commissioners or rather officers of that board. It is my understanding that often proceedings of this sort are initiated by the board itself, either as the result of reports of traffic accidents or as a result of reports by the board's inspectors. Possibly when the minister replies he will make a further statement in the matter. This whole discussion came up, may I say, as a result of certain inquiries I have had occasion to make.

Since the sum the board has at its disposal for the construction of grade crossings is to be greatly increased, I trust the records kept by the board will be improved. I mention this because only recently I placed a question on the order paper, which was set out in Votes and Proceedings No. 52 at page "i", the issue of March 21, 1955. The subject was that of the Canadian National Railways crossing near Woodstock, Ontario.

The question was set out as follows:

1. Have any accidents occurred, since September 26, 1947, at the crossing where the main line of the Canadian National Railways from Montreal to Chicago crossed the Ontario provincial highway No. 2, approximately seven miles east of Woodstock? If so, how many?
2. Has the board of transport commissioners considered giving assistance from the railway crossing fund towards the construction of an underpass at this point?
3. If so, has the board yet reached a decision, and in what respect?

The answer given to me is as follows:

The board has no record of any accidents at this crossing since September 26, 1947. This crossing is automatically protected with a wigwag and bells and to date no application has been received by the board for construction of a grade separation at this crossing.

The latter part of the answer is quite correct when it states that the crossing is protected by a wigwag and bells, and that no application has been made. However, it is my understanding, from information I have received from officials of the board, that, since this is a provincial highway, application would more properly be made to the province. This has not been done as yet.

I cannot understand however the first part of the answer, where it says—

The board has no record of any accidents at this crossing since September 26, 1947.

After receiving the answer I took the trouble to get in touch with the board by telephone, stating that I was somewhat surprised by the answer given, and suggesting that they make a further check and make another reply. The answer I received orally was much the same as the one I had received to the question I had placed on the order paper.

I have discussed this matter before, and the board must have some record of it. At the first session of this twenty-second parliament I raised the matter in the house on three different occasions, as indicated at pages 5167, 5615 and 6080 of Hansard for that session. In addition to this, on June 24, 1954, I addressed a letter to the then minister of transport, the Hon. Lionel Chevrier, in these words:

Dear Mr. Chevrier:

For your interest and information I am enclosing clipping from the Daily Sentinel Review, Woodstock, for Tuesday, June 22nd, with respect to my favorite railway crossing at Creditville near Woodstock.

The reply received from the then minister on June 28 is as follows:

Dear Mr. Nesbitt:

This will acknowledge your letter of June 24th enclosing a clipping from the Daily Sentinel Review, dealing with the railway crossing at Creditville near Woodstock. I am sending this clipping to the board of transport commissioners.

Then on June 10, 1954, referring to a different accident, I wrote to the then minister as follows:

Since I made some remarks in the house about two weeks ago on the transport estimates with respect to an underpass on the main line of the Canadian National Railway seven miles east of Woodstock, known as the Creditville crossing, there have been two serious accidents.

I referred to one of these last Monday, page 5615 of Hansard. I am enclosing a news report from the London Free Press of yet another serious accident at this crossing which I think more than justifies my earlier comments.

I trust that you will refer this matter for consideration to Mr. Donald Gordon.

The minister's reply under date of June 14, 1954, is in these words:

Dear Mr. Nesbitt:

I have your letter of June 10th with which you enclose a clipping from the London Free Press dealing with an accident at the underpass of the Canadian National main line seven miles east of Woodstock.

Then, under date of June 17, 1954, I have this notice from the board of transport commissioners:

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of June 10th, which will receive the attention of the board.

In writing further on this subject, please refer to our file No. 26765·207.

And then the following:

Re underpass on C.N.R. main line Creditville.

In addition to that I would refer to an editorial appearing in the Sentinel Review of Woodstock, in its issue of June 24, 1954:

A coroner's jury found the Creditville crossing, east of Woodstock on No. 2 highway, "not up to date" in the inquest into a recent death at that crossing. The jury recommend the crossing be made safe.

In view of what I have just read, and the statements I have made, I find it difficult to understand how such an answer could have been given to the question I placed on the order paper. I would be glad to send this information to the minister. May I say that I have since been able to make inquiries from the Ontario provincial police which indicate that between Friday, September 26, 1947, and Saturday, February 5, 1955, there have been 77 accidents at this railway crossing in which 28 persons have been injured and one killed.

I do not wish to take further time of the house, but it must be obvious to everyone that this crossing is exceedingly dangerous; and I would hope that in the near future it would be dealt with by the board of transport commissioners, if it is within their power to do so. I express the further hope that the records the board has available to it will be kept more up to date in future.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in commending the board of transport commissioners for pushing this increase, and the minister for co-operating with the board.

In the last 20 years I have had many dealings with the board and I must say that never once have I been disappointed with what they have done. Sometimes I did not get what I asked for, but at times I have found that the action taken by the board was better than that I had recommended.

In ward 1 of Fort William we had a very dangerous crossing, and for years there had been agitation to have a subway built. There were many tracks children had to cross when going to and from school. Then, when the long freight trains were passing through in the fall of the year one might have to wait 15 or 20 minutes at that crossing. Ambulances and doctors were in no better position; they too had to wait.

When the position was placed clearly and forcefully before the board of transport commissioners no difficulty was encountered at all. They sent out their engineers and, instead of building a subway to accommodate everyone, they built an overhead bridge to take part of the traffic, and a subway to serve pedestrians and school children. This was done at a cost of $100,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway, a similar amount to the city of Fort William, and $100,000 to the dominion government. I realize of course that other cities are not as fortunate in their city council as is the city of Fort William, where finances are handled in splendid fashion. The city paid $100,000 and the government paid $100,000 and now we are well protected. The citizens of ward 1 are grateful to the members of the transport board, to the Canadian Pacific Railway and to the government.

Just about a year ago I made a plea for a farmer through whose farm the Canadian Pacific railway passed and cut the farm in two. When the farmer wanted to go to the other side of the track it cost him a lot of extra gas to go all the way round. Where half a mile would do it he had to drive about four miles. The board of transport commissioners put it up to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the result was that the railway paid the whole cost. It was not a heavy cost; it was more a fill-in than anything else, but they did it well.

I made many requests to the board of transport commissioners for stop signs. If you visit the riding of Fort William you will see that the board of transport commissioners had not neglected its job in this regard. Thank you.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few brief observations on this bill and to express my support of this legislation. The addition of the $5 million to the fund is to be welcomed and also the increase of the percentage to 60 per cent to be paid by the board and raising the maximum contribution to $300,000. That is all to the good.

Like some of the previous speakers, I wish the government had seen fit to increase the annual contribution to the fund; but, Mr. Speaker, I cannot resist the opportunity at this moment to point out to the house that the hon. gentlemen to my right, the members of the Progressive Conservative party, are some of the most illogical people I have ever listened to. On nearly every measure that comes before this house, they ask the government to increase its contribution to the legislation concerned, and when the budget comes down they howl at the government to reduce taxation. You cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. We of this group realize the necessity for taxation. All we ask is a fairer redistribution of the sums collected in taxation. The hon. gentlemen to my right are somewhat inconsistent in their approach.

However, I do wish to bring to the minister's attention the fact that in my constituency there are quite dangerous railroad crossings that go through quite small village municipalities, municipalities so small that it would be completely beyond their capacity to enter into any arrangements for the building of an underpass, an overpass or anything of that sort. Because the problem is so general in Canada, I realize it is not possible to think of anything being done for some years to come. But I do want to suggest to the minister that a relatively small expenditure on more vivid marking of crossings or the lighting of crossings at night, an expenditure that would be small compared with the expenditure required to build an overpass or an underpass, would be of great help. On many crossings there is simply a railroad crossing sign and nothing else. I suggest that in places where it is not possible at the present time to undertake those larger works, much more could be done with small expenditures to bring to the public's attention the fact that they are approaching a railroad crossing. The signs could be more dramatic in the daytime and they could be lit up at night. More could be done in that respect.

I have travelled over a number of crossings from time to time and I have realized how meagre the warning was that one was approaching a crossing where one might meet a freight train, particularly a freight train in my case, at any hour of the day or night. I do suggest to the minister that some money could be spent in that way to assist municipalities to protect such crossings; municipalities that are incapable of assuming the larger obligation.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much my ability to answer the hon. member for Kootenay West in connection with the blanket criticism of the Conservative party. However, I might mention that it is possible to recommend additional expenditures of money on a fairer basis than is provided by the present tax structure that we have and still criticize the budget which has been brought down. I might say to the hon. member that he neglected to add the additional fact that this party believes many millions of dollars are available if the proper economical type of government is provided for this country. However, I want to deal with one or two questions only. I am sure the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) will be very happy because he expressed himself in that way when I rose the last time.

We should remember that the figures we are dealing with are very misleading. If we check the history of this legislation we find that the initial contribution of the federal government was $5,000 for each project. That has been raised to $15,000 and $25,000. In 1928 it was raised to $100,000 and in 1950, to $150,000. I am wondering whether when we talk about $300,000—and my friends to my left continue to refer to this item—we take into account the serious inflation we have had in this country during those years. If we went back to the early years of this century and talked about $5,000, I am wondering whether it did not provide as much as the $300,000 will provide that we are talking about today. That restriction is a very serious one in connection with the complicated type of grade separation we have in the larger metropolitan areas. Of course, the same criticism in connection with the increase from $1 million to $5 million in the total allocation to the fund would be a reasonable one. To a great extent the government is simply keeping up with the increased cost of this type of construction, and is not taking into account the thousands and thousands of additional motor vehicles that use the highways every year.

At the resolution stage I pointed out that this government collected approximately $250 million in various types of taxes from the motor-driving public. I know that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has reduced certain of the taxes on vehicles and has removed the tax on automobile tires and items of that kind, but this government still extracts from the motorists at least $200 million each year. As far as I can determine, it spends only $15 million a year on them. It is about time that some consideration was given to the motorist. He is paying the taxes; he should be provided with safety facilities to the extent that he provides the government treasury with dollars. Even with the tax reductions, the Minister of Finance is counting on an increased sale of motor vehicles to provide him with the same net amount of taxes that he was able to get last year. It would seem logical to me that the amount of money to be applied by the federal government to this fund should be tied in some way to the taxes that are collected from the motor-driving public. If a percentage formula were arrived at, at an adequate amount, it would provide for the additional vehicles which will undoubtedly be on the highways of this country in the future. There is no end to them. Over the week end I noticed in the press it is expected that in the next four or five years about half the families in the United States will have two automobiles. If that is the case there, I am quite satisfied that the same trend will take place here. Surely, I might say to the Minister of National Revenue, it is just as logical to have a fund of this kind tied to the sales tax collected on automobiles, because of the increased sale of automobiles, as it is to provide for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to receive the sales tax collected on television receivers. As a matter of fact it is probably much more logical when we look at the balance sheet of that corporation and find that it can pass over $6 or $7 million of taxes collected to be used in some future year at the whim and fancy of the corporation.

The second point with which I wish to deal has been referred to on numerous occasions by other speakers. The hon. member for Kootenay West again referred to the fact that what we are asking for here is a redistribution of the taxation base, and undoubtedly it is the municipalities who are having the difficulty in providing safety facilities of this type for the public. Until such time as a reassessment of taxing powers can be reached by agreement among all three levels of government, the municipalities are going to find themselves in a very difficult position. I have said this before, and I say it again. Their tax base is so close to them that they find it impossible to take advantage quickly of the various new people coming to the country who are paying sales tax on the items they buy and who are paying income tax by deductions from their pay immediately they begin to work. The municipalities have no such opportunity, and they are being placed in an increasingly difficult financial situation, which is pressing them to the utmost.

I have one further point. When the federal-provincial conference which has been called for the next week or so is brought together here in Ottawa, the federal authorities would be very well advised to suggest as part of the agenda increasing the contribution to be made to the grade separation fund by a reallocation of taxing powers for that purpose. This would also help meet some of the other pressing problems.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, I should like to try to deal very briefly with some of the arguments which have been advanced during the course of the debate.

The first refers to the question of the increase from $1 million to $5 million in the annual appropriation to the grade crossing fund. On the part of a number of speakers the opinion has been expressed that this increase from $1 million to $5 million is inadequate and that it will not be possible with that amount to solve the problem arising from the existence of the many unprotected grade crossings which we have in Canada. As I think I said the other day in discussing the resolution, I do not believe anybody would seriously consider that it would be possible, by merely appropriating an amount of $5 million a year, to solve the whole problem of grade crossings. The number which exists and the cost of even the simplest form of protection, I think, show how foolish it would be for anyone to believe that the mere provision of an increase from $1 million to $5 million annually would mean the end of the problem.

I would like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that the amount of $5 million was suggested in the report of the board of transport commissioners. I think the reasons which they have given are very eloquent and explain fully why the amount has not been made larger. I think it will be seen from reading the report that this might be regarded as an experimental figure. I wonder if I might read two extracts from the report, Mr. Speaker. The first of these appears on page 90 of the typewritten report, and is as follows:

> In attempting to determine what might be the annual federal contribution to the fund, we recognize that while it cannot be determined with mathematical precision, it must reasonably reflect the practical aspects of the matter. Any amount which may be arrived at we think should also be sufficiently flexible in character to admit of modification in the light of actual experience. It would be difficult to justify a federal contribution which was not in reasonable accordance with the availability of highway authority funds. Certainly it would be uneconomic to cause a diversion of highway funds to grade crossing improvements in an amount which was not commensurate with the magnitude of the crossing problem. At the same time an increase in the contribution of the federal government, when related to the percentage distribution of costs as hereinbefore recommended would necessarily result in increasing the total potential costs to other parties—and regard must be had to the increased costs which the other parties may be economically justified in assuming. Furthermore, while we are aware that some provinces have sufficient funds to enable them to undertake a sizeable crossing improvement program, we cannot use their preferred position as a criterion of what other provinces may be able to undertake.

If I may summarize, Mr. Speaker, it was after long experience in administering the grade crossing fund that the board came forward with the recommendation that the annual amount be increased from $1 million to $5 million.

The report of the board continues to deal with the aspect to which some hon. members have referred, namely the fact that if in any year there is an uncommitted balance of $2 million or more, the appropriation for that year is to be reduced; that is obviously intended not to cut down on the expenditures but to avoid putting in the fund moneys not actually required for the purposes of the fund itself. The suggestion is that of the board, and I think it was quite obviously made in order to avoid placing in the fund moneys for which they see no immediate use.

I would like to conclude my reading of some extracts from the report with these two phrases, which I think are rather significant. They say, speaking of course of the amount of $5 million:

> The sum which we now propose cannot be regarded otherwise than an estimate of probable demands on the fund under the new conditions. It may well be two or three years before the most effective amount of the annual appropriation can be more definitely fixed.

That is the reason, Mr. Speaker, I said I thought that the amount of $5 million might be looked upon as being experimental.

The hon. member for Eglinton mentioned two other important features of this legislation, though I was not quite sure that the full significance of these changes had been fully grasped by him. The first was his reference to the increase in the percentage of the contribution of the railway grade crossing fund. He spoke of it, I think quite properly, as an improvement and said it is quite obvious that the increase of the contribution from 40 to 60 per cent will provide corresponding relief to the others who must also make contributions toward a project. But I think it must also be taken into account in connection with the other increase to which he also referred. That was the increase of, let us say, the maximum base for any project from $150,000 to $300,000.

I think we must not forget that these two changes are being made at the same time, so there is really a much more substantial increase in the contribution from the fund than would appear at first sight. For example, under the law as it stands at the present time, if a project costs $500,000 the maximum base is $150,000 and the contribution of the board would represent 40 per cent of that amount or $60,000. In that particular case there would be $440,000 which must be shared by others.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister right in those figures? Did he say the project was a $500,000 project?

Mr. Marler: I am suggesting that if we think of a project which would cost $500,000, the present base limit is $150,000 and the contribution of the board is 40 per cent, whereas—

Mr. Fleming: Forty per cent, or $150,000, whichever is greater.

Mr. Marler: That is right. In other words the maximum contribution at present would be $150,000, leaving $350,000 to be shared by others; whereas on the same project under the amendments the contribution would be $300,000 from the fund and therefore only $200,000 by the others interested, so their contributions would have come down by $150,000 for this particular project. It seems to me it is important to realize that there is not only this obvious increase from 40 per cent to 60 per cent, but that these percentages are to bear on a substantially higher figure as a maximum than is the case under the existing legislation.

I should like to make just one final comment. A number of hon. members have referred to the municipalities and their unwillingness to participate in these grade crossing separations. I should merely like to tell them that, although I have been a minister for only a relatively short time, I have been surprised by the number of letters I have received from municipalities asking that something be done for them in connection with the elimination of these grade crossings. I suppose the board receives a good many more, because quite obviously the applications should not be addressed to me. I feel quite certain that there will be no dearth of applications.

While I realize that there are municipalities whose finances are not so flourishing that they will be able to undertake these extremely expensive projects, by and large I think municipalities have shown a desire to carry out these projects and in many instances have shown an ability to finance them. In the cases in which it is obviously beyond their capabilities, I think it is not unreasonable to ask that the provinces, which raise substantial sums through the taxation of automobiles, both in licence fees and in gasoline taxes, should come to the relief of the municipalities which are in need of assistance.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be useful for me to prolong the debate further. I think we are all agreed that this is a desirable step forward. I hope we shall have an opportunity at this time next year of reviewing the progress that has been made with the larger appropriation available to the fund.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

RADIO ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING RADIO ANTENNAE AND ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 260, to amend the Radio Act.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Marler: Yes. Mr. Speaker, as I explained to the house in introducing the resolution which preceded this legislation it is proposed to make three amendments to the Radio Act. The first of these amendments would empower the Minister of Transport to make regulations regarding antennae for radio stations and private receiving stations. As it is somewhat complex I shall give a full explanation of the purposes we have in mind in proposing it.

Hon. members will agree, I am sure, that with the advent of television and the development of the elaborate outdoor aerials now commonly used, it would be desirable to take measures to control their mechanical features for safety purposes from the point of view of air navigation and protection of life and property. Because of its responsibilities for civil aviation and radio my department naturally is anxious to see that in the installation, erection, construction and repair of antennae, proper standards are maintained; but several municipalities and one of the provinces have also evinced interest in the matter by inquiries as to the making of bylaws governing television antennae.

It seems quite clear that the regulation of antennae is a part of the general field of radio regulation and, therefore, within the legislative competence of parliament. If confirmation of this assertion were necessary it would be found in the fact that in a number of localities in Canada television sets cannot operate without external antennae. Legislative authority in the matter being vested in parliament, we believe that the requisite legislation should be adopted to enable the Minister of Transport to establish the necessary regulations. The authority to make regulations would extend both to radio stations and to private receiving stations as defined in the Radio Act.

We have a measure of control at the present time over antennae for radio stations in that in administering the licensing provisions of the Radio Act we may control the nature and type of the antennae to be used, but we believe that it would be desirable to have general regulations respecting antennae that would be applicable to the various classes of radio stations. Though formerly the department had, through licensing, some control over private receiving stations, now that licensing of these stations has been abolished we no longer have any control over the antennae used by them.

In this connection I should like to tell hon. members that we propose to use as a basis for our regulations respecting the mechanical features of antennae for private receiving stations a set of standards for receiving antennae already prepared by the Canadian standards association which, as many hon. members know, is an industrial group which enjoys an excellent reputation because of the numerous standards it has laid down for the electrical and other fields.

I think I should make it quite clear that it is not our present intention to make these regulations concerning the mechanical features applicable generally, but only in those municipalities where the municipal authorities desire that they be made applicable and wish to undertake the responsibility of administration and enforcement. In these cases we contemplate appointing as inspectors under the act the municipal officials who carry out building inspection in the municipalities. We believe that arrangements along these lines would satisfy the municipalities which wish to see some control exercised over the elaborate antennae now being used.

Hon. members, therefore, will appreciate that in the circumstances we are not contemplating adding large numbers to the staff of the telecommunications division of my department for the administration of the proposed regulations. In fact at the present time I do not expect that any increase in staff will be necessary for this particular purpose.

The second of the amendments to be made by the present bill would empower the minister to adopt regulations exempting from licensing requirements numerous low-powered radio devices which technically constitute radio stations within the meaning of the Radio Act. Many hon. members are familiar with mechanical equipment such as doors in railway stations, garage doors, etc., which are actuated by an electric eye, and with interoffice communication systems which are not dependent upon the use of wires. I am sure hon. members will agree that it would be desirable to exempt the owners or operators of such devices from the necessity of obtaining a licence for them.

If this amendment is accepted it is intended to adopt specifications determining the maximum signal strength of the device that will be exempt. In this way we will avoid exempting devices that would interfere with radio reception and manufacturers will know that devices meeting these specifications will be exempt from licensing.

The purpose of the third amendment is to implement the obligations assumed by Canada under the international telecommunication convention with respect to the preservation of the secrecy of radio communications. By this convention Canada is obligated to impose secrecy restrictions on all radio communications not intended for the general use of the public.

Radio Act

At the present time the Radio Act provides that operators of coast or land stations or of mobile stations must subscribe to a declaration of secrecy, and the act prescribes penalties against such operators for the unauthorized use of information obtained by interception of any radio communication. The act also empowers the minister to make regulations to provide against any person divulging information received by means of a private receiving station. There is, however, a loophole which it seems desirable to close. Any individual can buy equipment that will permit him to receive practically any radio signal regardless of its frequency or wave length, and so to intercept private communications outside the ordinary or normal broadcast band. A receiver embodying this equipment does not fall clearly within the definition of a coast or land station or mobile station or a private receiving station, and consequently the operator is not subject either to the necessity of subscribing to a declaration of secrecy or to the regulations against divulging information applicable to operators of private receiving stations.

We do not propose by the amendment to prevent the ordinary private citizen from operating shortwave or other receiving sets; all we say is that, having become acquainted with any radio communication not intended for public use or information, a person may not make use of it or divulge it to any person.

In recommending this amendment we wish, of course, to implement and fulfil Canada's obligations under the convention to which I referred a moment ago, but we also wish to satisfy the complaints we have received in my department against the misuse of private communications.

In conclusion may I point out that questions concerning interference in the radio field, control of manufacturers and community television receiving systems are not within the scope of the present legislation. If hon. members wish to deal with these particular subjects I suggest that they might do so when the estimates of my department are under consideration.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement on this technical bill has been quite informative. In a matter of this kind, where the house is asked to pass legislation to confer powers upon a minister to proceed by regulation I think the house must ask itself whether the need for these powers has been clearly established. I feel the minister's statement does that. It is quite clear that with the rapid increase in the number of antennae being constructed, both around radio and television stations and on homes and apartments, to the point now where in some cities these masts resemble a small forest, the time has come when some form of regulation must be introduced in the public interest.

As the minister has indicated, a number of municipalities have already entered this field out of regard for public safety and fears that are genuinely created by the unregulated erection of these masts which, if not properly secured, could in some circumstances do a good deal of harm. I am sure all members are aware of experiences in which these masts have blown down in storms and public safety has in consequence been jeopardized.

The second question that it seems to me the house properly asks itself in a case of this kind is, if a need exists for some form of power or regulation, in what way does the government propose to exercise it? No doubt the house was gratified and reassured to learn that the type of regulation the government proposes to exercise under the first of the powers contained in the bill will be the embodiment of a recommendation from the Canadian standards association.

As to the appointment of inspectors, it was also reassuring to hear the minister tell the house that he does not propose to appoint a large army of inspectors to carry out the inspectorial functions contemplated in the bill. The municipal inspectors are certainly the persons best qualified to carry out this type of inspection and, speaking for myself, I can tell the minister his statement in that regard is very significant in relation to the general purpose and effect of the bill.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Refreshing.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) points out that this is a refreshing departure from some of the positions we have seen taken in the past with regard to the appointment of large numbers of inspectors.

I think the house will also appreciate the necessity for some form of exemption with regard to low-powered radio devices. I shall have some questions to ask in the committee with respect to some features, but I have no hesitation in saying that the bill, in the light of the explanation given by the minister, is one that I think can be said to be necessary.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—

Mr. Fleming: I have a question respecting clause (ee). If any hon. member has a question on clause (e) I will give way to him.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): As to clause (e), has the minister any record of any damage caused to anyone or of any injury to any person brought about by failure of the present type of antennae?

Mr. Marler: In answer to that question I think I should say I have no personal knowledge of any such complaints having been received or any such reports having been made to my department. I think what has originated the thinking with regard to this aspect of the bill has been the desire on the part of municipalities themselves to regulate the type of antennae that might be used.

I am quite sure hon. members will realize it would be a rather unhappy situation if we found that the municipalities were attempting to legislate with respect to antennae for television or ordinary radio sets, which to my way of thinking would be beyond the powers of municipal corporations. It seems to me that this bill is a much more effective and practical method of dealing with the subject. I think we will be agreed that there is no doubt as to the power of parliament to legislate with regard to this subject and I think, as the hon. member for Eglinton pointed out, that the municipal inspectors are the people who are best qualified to carry out the type of inspection needed to assure public safety so far as falling antennae and so on are concerned.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I wondered what prompted the municipalities. Were any of them in touch with the department concerning losses or injury to people?

Mr. Marler: In my own personal experience I can remember that when I was a member of the legislature at Quebec many municipal corporations applied for power to change their charters so that they might control the appearance of antennae from a purely aesthetic point of view. While of course one can fully understand that view, it would be a pity if aesthetics prevented people from receiving television signals.

Mr. Fleming: With regard to clause (ee), I wonder if the minister would enlarge somewhat on the basis of exemption. He has indicated the general purpose, but I am directing my question more to the method or the formula by which the exemption shall be carried out.

Mr. Marler: My understanding of the matter, in the discussions I have had with the officials of my department, is that they have not yet come to a final decision as to what level of signal strength should be set by the regulations so as to admit devices that reasonably ought to be admitted and will not interfere with radio reception, as compared with those which should not be exempted.

As I said a moment ago, the intention is to adopt specifications in determining the maximum signal strength; I take it that is the factor which is of the greatest interest and the measure of interference with radio reception. I am sorry I cannot tell the hon. member the level we contemplate setting, but I do not believe it is possible to give an answer to that question at this time as no final decision has been arrived at by my officials as to the level they would recommend as the basis for the regulation.

Mr. Fleming: That may be regrettable, because I am sure that decision will have to be taken before any regulations can be made that will have any efficacy. I would have hoped that this inquiry would have been made and the decision taken as to the strength that will be recommended to the minister as the determining point in respect of exemption.

Mr. Marler: I suppose the hon. member for Eglinton would realize, just as I do, that it might not be possible to provide a constant figure applicable in all circumstances. It seems to me there might well be circumstances in which a given level would be admissible, particularly let us say in the rather remote parts of the country, whereas the same level would not be admissible in the heavily populated centres where the number of radio receivers would be much larger.

Mr. Fleming: My point was that whatever may be proper strength at any particular place, whether it is uniform or whether it is established at varying figures depending upon population density or other factors, it nevertheless must be established by regulation.

Mr. Marler: Quite so.

Mr. Fleming: If it is going to be possible at some time or other to establish that in any detail for the regulations, I say it is regrettable the house does not know now what the strength is. It is not a matter of supreme importance; I am not suggesting that, but I think for the information and guidance of the house in connection with legislation of this kind it would have been a helpful thing to know.

Mr. Marler: While I rather share the view of the hon. member, at the same time I am sure he will realize that that would rob us of the flexibility we would have in a simple power to make regulations, as opposed to making this limitation part of the statute itself.

Mr. Fleming: I am sorry, but the minister misunderstands me. I was not suggesting that the formula, if it is going to be elaborate, should be written into the legislation. I am simply asking what the breaking point is at which the power to exempt will be used, so the house would be guided now in determining whether or not the section before us is adequate.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Penalty for unlawful interception of radio communications.

Mr. Fleming: The minister's statement indicates the purpose of this clause, and it is clear enough. However, in this regard I wonder if the language is very happy. My first thought in reading it over was, what does it mean? The clause reads in part:

> Every person who, having become acquainted with any radio communication not intended for public use or information, makes use of such communication or divulges it to any person, except when lawfully authorized or directed so to do, is guilty of an offence—

What is the meaning of that? It is saying that, in effect, if anybody does something that is illegal, unless he is legally authorized to do it, he is guilty of an offence. What does it mean?

Mr. Marler: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I find it difficult to conceive of a case in which there would be a particular authorization to divulge the substance or contents of a communication. But I might point out to the hon. member that this is virtually the same language as appears in section 7 of the Radio Act. I think the indication was that this new provision was to be similar to that which now applies to those who must subscribe to the declaration of secrecy to which I referred a few moments ago.

Mr. Fleming: I understand the purpose of the section as outlined by the minister, but it is the language which I must say I find rather baffling.

Mr. Marler: I wish I could enlighten the hon. member further. Personally while it may be difficult to imagine circumstances in which a person would be lawfully authorized or directed to divulge, I suppose that could take place in the event of some litigation, or there might be circumstances in which the information ought to be divulged.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Just before the bill carries, I may say that in view of the answers the minister gave me in connection with the fact there was no specific request for this legislation because of the danger of injury to people, I hope the regulations will not prevent the ordinary layman from constructing his own antenna, and that they will not limit the licensing to certain repair firms as the people who may construct this type of antenna.

Mr. Marler: I entirely share the hon. member's view on that subject.

Mr. Fleming: Just following that up, there is no power to licence persons in connection with this legislation?

Mr. Marler: No, none whatever.

Mr. Fleming: The only licensing will be of the equipment, and certain specifications in regard to the type of equipment used. There is no power to license those who are engaged in the business.

Mr. Marler: None whatever.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RAILWAYS

AGREEMENT RESPECTING TRACKS IN TORONTO HARBOUR AREA

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 262, to approve an agreement between the Toronto harbour commissioners, the Toronto Terminals Railway Company, Canadian National Railway Company and Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): There is not much I can add at this time to the statement I made at the resolution stage of this measure. As hon. members will no doubt recall, this simple bill seeks the ratification and confirmation by parliament of an agreement entered into last fall between the Toronto harbour commissioners, the Toronto Terminals Railway Company, Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Rilway Company. This agreement has to do with the rehabilitation and maintenance of railway tracks built by the Toronto harbour commissioners for the purpose of serving industries located in the harbour area. Since the commission did not have sufficient funds to maintain and rehabilitate these tracks, they approached the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways with the object of having them take over the rehabilitation and maintenance thereof.

An agreement was therefore entered into to that effect on October 5, 1954. Since the Toronto Terminals Railway Company is not empowered under its act of incorporation, chapter 170 of the statutes of 1906, to enter into such agreements, the present bill seeks to amend the act accordingly.

I wish to add at this time that it is proposed to move that the measure be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, after it has received second reading.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased that we will have an opportunity in the standing committee to give closer scrutiny to this legislation. The parliamentary assistant has given the assurance that schedule A, indicating the additional lands involved in connection with the trackages, will be made available to us at that time.

Any member from the greater Toronto district is definitely interested in anything affecting the harbour area of that city. I know we will receive a full explanation of the clauses of the bill. I do feel some concern, however, about the fact that the commission may lose some of its power to do what it may wish in connection with some phases of development in that harbour area. I refer to those powers to which reference is made in the agreement between the terminals railway company and the commission.

The agreement involved in the legislation simply makes provision for funds which formerly were not available to the commission for the rehabilitation of trackage, and makes a further provision for the extension of such trackage. Under the terms of the agreement such trackage extension will be paid for by the commission, and one would assume therefore that they are sufficiently in funds to take care of that aspect of the situation confronting them.

I am not sure this could not have been done by a simple amendment permitting the making of a loan to the harbour commission during the strenuous period through which they are passing. Undoubtedly there will be tremendous expansion in the Toronto harbour area, and it seems to me that some type of loan could have been made. After all, this money has been put up by the Toronto Terminals Railway Company only on a temporary basis. It is to be collected back over a period of ten years through the imposition of fees on carloadings charged to the two major railway companies.

I believe these same features could have been handled by the commission, and it could have retained strict control of the development if a loan of the kind I have mentioned had been made to it. In this way they would not have lost any of the area in which they exercise discretionary powers.

I realize that the extensions are to be by agreement, and that decisions are to be made by arbitration if no other means is successful. However, there are sections in the bill I find difficult to understand. For instance, there is the provision for the disposal of used material. I assume this would be in the form of trackage taken up. It appears that this used material is to be left for disposal by the commission. It seems obvious that the terminals railway company and the two national railways would have much better facilities for disposing of this kind of equipment, and I find it difficult to understand why the commission should be handling it.

I also note that interest on this money is to be charged monthly, a provision which seems somewhat unusual. Under an act of the province of Ontario interest can be calculated only on a quarterly basis. I do not see much difference between this legislation and legislation of other kinds under which money would be obtained.

Perhaps because I, too, am a lessee of property under the control of the harbour commission I have some concern over the fact that in the legislation the terminals railway company and the two national railways involved in the agreement are exempted from the payment of municipal taxes. It is indicated that the commission will undertake this burden for the three railway companies. I am sure I would be very happy if they would extend this privilege, because it would certainly relieve the burden on many taxpayers in that area.

I do not see why the bill should contain a provision of that kind. It would seem that this is a straight business transaction under which the terminals railway company is to be placed in possession and is to have the full advantages of the use of the land in question for a period of ten years. It is to be permitted to collect tolls which, in turn, will pay for the rental of the trackage in the area. I suggest therefore that it might be worth while to take a second look at that provision.

I said earlier that we would have an opportunity of considering the bill clause by clause. Before taking my seat, however, I would like to add that a tremendous job has been done in Toronto by the commission in connection with the development of the waterfront area. However, a problem of great magnitude is now facing them. I am not suggesting that they have not faced great problems before; but we know that in view of the development of the St. Lawrence seaway the position held by the commission in Toronto becomes of vital importance to that city.

I am reluctant to see the removal of any authority or discretionary powers the commission may have in connection with the development of the area. Of course until we have schedule A before us we cannot know exactly what provisions are being made for the development to take place. The commission is already facing serious problems when it meets other authorities. The municipality of metropolitan Toronto has had super highways designed which will cross the area, and which I am sure the commission will not regard as helpful to the enhancement and proper development of the area. As a matter of fact, instead of taking away any discretionary power, probably they should be in a position even to expropriate some of the city streets to provide for the orderly development of the whole area, which will eventually give Toronto the seaport facilities to which it will undoubtedly be entitled with the coming of the St. Lawrence seaway.

That is a very serious problem. They should have discretion to see that this development takes full advantage of the seaport area and is not impeded in any way by either companies or other governmental agencies which may not have the same opportunity, or may have more definite interests at heart than the commission which has been designed to take care of those problems which exist in the south end of the city. We shall welcome the opportunity of having a look at each item in committee.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): I should like to ask the minister a question in regard to the existing railway sidings, in view of the fact that there is a considerable number of crossings on Fleet street in Toronto at the present time. Is there any control over crossings being added which will multiply the transportation difficulties in the rush hours of morning and evening? Has the harbour commission or the city of Toronto any control over that, and over additional level crossings or sidings in the manufacturing areas?

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the parliamentary assistant speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, dealing first with the remarks made by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton), I wish to remind him of a fact which he has apparently overlooked, namely that the Toronto Terminals Railway Company is jointly owned by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. As I said a moment ago, all we are asked to do here is to ratify and confirm an agreement which was entered into among the Toronto Terminals Railway Company, the Toronto harbour commissioners, the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. When the measure goes before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines we shall have as witnesses Mr. A. D. Macdonald, regional counsel for the Canadian National Railways, and representatives of the Toronto harbour commissioners, who will answer such questions of details as those raised by the hon. member for York West and by the hon. member for Danforth.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

FOREIGN AIRCRAFT

THIRD PARTY DAMAGE—PROVISION TO IMPLEMENT CONVENTION

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 263, to implement the convention on damage caused by foreign aircraft to third parties on the surface.

He said: This is a bill to implement the Rome convention on damage caused by foreign aircraft to third parties on the surface.

In 1933 certain nations signed at Rome a convention which set up international rules to govern the liability of air carriers for damage to persons and property on the ground. This convention was ratified by only five countries and was not effective. Since the war new developments in international civil aviation have emphasized more forcefully than ever the necessity for an international convention with regard to damage caused by aircraft to innocent third parties on the surface. It seemed desirable to the international civil aviation organization to make a fresh start on the problem and to set up, on the basis of the old Rome convention and in the light of the subsequent experience, a new convention which would ensure a just indemnity to third parties and give carriers the necessary protection against risk of liabilities so excessive as to make the cost of insurance a prohibitively heavy burden.

Though I shall not go so far as to say that the convention which is set out in the schedule to the bill is a perfect solution of the problem, I think it is a reasonable compromise of different views on legal principles and varying economic circumstances. I think in considering this legislation it ought not to be forgotten that, because the various countries concerned have different points of view and different legal systems, an international convention is almost always the result of a compromise among their representatives.

The Rome convention was adopted at a conference held in 1952 in which Canada participated. Fifteen of the 32 countries represented at the conference signed the convention at that time; and though other countries, including the United Kingdom and Australia, have since added their signatures, only one country has ratified it. The Minister of Transport signed the convention on behalf of Canada on May 26, 1954.

The convention will come into effect when five countries have ratified it. I understand that some states are approaching the point of ratification, and I hope the convention will come into force in all countries in the world where civil aviation is developed.

The convention established a uniform measure of liability upon civil aircraft operators to any person who suffers damage on the surface when such damage, either in respect of loss of life or personal injury or in respect of property, was caused by foreign aircraft in flight or by any person or thing falling from it. It is based on the principle of objective liability; that is to say, from the moment any damage caused by a foreign aircraft in flight is sustained by a person on the ground, the carrier, that is to say the operator of the aircraft, becomes absolutely liable within the limitation specified by the convention.

The carrier can avoid this obligation only if he is able to establish (a) that the damage was a direct consequence of armed conflict or civil disturbance; (b) that he has been deprived of the use of his aircraft by act of public authority; or (c) that the damage was caused solely through the negligence or other wrongful act or omission of the person who suffers the damage or of the latter's servants or agents.

The limit of liability is based on the weight of the aircraft but is of such an amount that full compensation will be paid in all save very exceptional circumstances. In the case of a small aircraft weighing 1,000 kilograms or 2,200 pounds or less, the maximum liability would be 500,000 gold francs which is equal to $37,000. As will be observed from article II of the convention, the maximum liability increases progressively with the weight of the aircraft. Thus in the case of an aircraft weighing 100,000 pounds the maximum would be approximately $775,000. The liability in respect of loss of life or personal injury is limited to 500,000 gold francs or about $37,000, for each person killed or injured.

The carrier is entitled to the protection of these limits of liability except in the case of a deliberate act or omission done with intent to cause damage, in which case the liability is unlimited. In this way a carrier is given very significant protection in the event of an accident amounting to a catastrophe.

A further protection to the carrier is the introduction of the rule of the single forum. The convention provides that actions under its provisions may be brought only before the courts of the contracting state where the damage occurred, though by agreement claimants may take action before the courts of any other contracting state. In addition to the advantage of the single forum, the convention provides that judgments delivered in one contracting state can be executed in another contracting state without further litigation.

The convention provides for security for the carrier's liability by insurance effected in accordance with the laws of the state where the aircraft is registered. Alternative means of security are provided by cash deposit, bank guarantee, or state guarantee when the state is prepared to waive immunity for suit in respect of the guarantee.

The air transport board is satisfied that implementation of the convention by Canada, would be in the interest both of Canadian carriers and the general public. Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian Pacific Air Lines Limited, both of which are engaged in international air transport, are in agreement and have strongly recommended Canadian adherence.

Looking at the Rome convention broadly, I would say that on the one hand it provides reasonable safeguards for the injured victims on the ground in respect of damage to life and property in that they would have an uncontested claim for much if not all of the damage they might suffer from an accident caused by foreign aircraft. On the other hand the carrier is not forced to bear the heavy burden of carrying insurance against unlimited risk. Having regard to the diversity of national laws covering international air transport, there is the great advantage of having a uniform set of rules to govern liability for damage caused by foreign aircraft to third persons on the surface.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I feel a little like the pinch-hitter who appears at every game. I wonder if it would be possible for the minister to have this bill referred to committee as well. The reason I ask this is that I have looked over the debates in the other place and I find that there was a great deal of confusion about the meaning of numerous sections of the bill, or at least of the schedule. Perhaps it would be much easier to go through a lengthy document of this kind in committee than it would be in the house. If that assurance is not forthcoming I shall have to go on and deal with the bill.

Mr. Marler: If I might interrupt my hon. friend I think I should say this to him, that I am not putting the legislation of the house on a take it or leave it basis. That would be far from my intention, and I would not wish hon. members to think for an instant that was the spirit in which I approached this subject. But the fact remains that, just as was said in the other place, it is not going to be possible to change one word of the convention. I think hon. members must themselves make up their minds as to whether or not the convention should be accepted as it is or whether it should be rejected.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Then, Mr. Speaker, before we go into the committee of the whole there are a few aspects in connection with this legislation which excite my mind a little.

First of all, I feel that there is a possibility in connection with this agreement that we may find our Canadian air carriers priced out of the foreign market. Now, I am not using the term "priced" in its ordinary sense; I am using it in connection with the provisions here dealing with security. It reminds me a little of the GATT agreement. I am sure I shall be accused of being out of order in referring to that subject. It is nice to enter into these agreements, but it is not nice later when one of the contracting parties says, "There is an emergency here, and we are short of foreign exchange; we cannot allow you to send your products in here". It is possible for something similar to happen under this legislation. I am referring specifically at this time to chapter III, "Security for Operator's Liability," article 15, paragraph 4:

> Instead of insurance, any of the following securities shall be deemed satisfactory if the security conforms to article 17.

Paragraph 3 and the three subparagraphs of paragraph 4 refer to the accepting of satisfactory insurance. Paragraph 3 states:

> . . . the state overflown may refuse to accept as satisfactory insurance effected by an insurer who is not authorized for that purpose in a contracting state.

Paragraph 4 says that the securities provided in each case

> . . . shall be deemed satisfactory if the security conforms to article 17:
> (a) a cash deposit in a depository maintained by the contracting state where the aircraft is registered or with a bank authorized to act as a depository by that state;

Mr. Marler: Which paragraph?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Subparagraph (a) of paragraph 4. It would appear to me that subparagraphs (b) and (c), although the terms are slightly different in each case, provide the discretionary power for the contracting party to approve or not to approve of the type of securities provided. As I see it, if Trans-Canada Air Lines should be working under a bilateral agreement with any number of parties to this agreement, and if it should be determined at any time by one of those contracting parties that they did not like the services provided by the Canadian air line, I see nothing to prevent them from ordering a type of security which would have the effect of placing an embargo on our air services entering their country. That would appear to be one serious problem which confronts us here.

The minister might be able as well to give us some explanation as to the meaning of the amounts arrived at here, on the basis of dollars. I am not a monetary expert. I understand that the minister referred to the amount of 500,000 gold francs, and perhaps he can explain whether they are any different from the other type of francs used in France today.

Mr. Marler: Quite different.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): We might have some explanation as to that, because if they are not, then obviously the liability here might amount to 10 cents, as far as we are concerned. If there is some stability to that type of currency which is provided in this international agreement, then I believe that the limits provided here exceed the minimum financial limits required by our own air transport board in connection with domestic air operations.

A third problem which confronts us is in connection with the ability of the contracting party to be cleared of any liability in connection with civil insurrection—I believe that is the term—in the country involved. I am wondering what would be the effect if, for instance, in a foreign country there was some type of civil uprising, someone planted a bomb in that case in a Trans-Canada Air Lines plane—this is not fantasy, by the way—and as the result of an explosion over a third country we found some question of liability.

Perhaps I have used the wrong air line. If it happened to be a foreign air line which was flying into Canada, say over Brampton, and some explosion of that nature occurred, is it possible under this legislation that complete immunity would be obtained because the accident was the direct result of, say, some civil problem arising in another state?

I also notice that there is for a period of time a continuing responsibility on the owner of an aircraft after the sale of the aircraft. This factor might have a distressing effect in connection with a Canadian operator of an aircraft. I know that under our insurance coverage it is provided—and I suppose the situation is the same in nearly all jurisdictions —that your car insurance continues to cover you after the sale of your automobile and, I think, for a period when you acquire a new one; but in this type of liability in which the owner may actually part with possession and legal ownership it is questionable whether there should be a continuing responsibility of this kind.

The minister has indicated that this agreement has the full approval of both Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian Pacific Air Lines. I feel some regret that neither of those companies, as I understand it, was invited to attend or to have any representative along with the representatives of the air transport board or the Department of Transport when negotiating this agreement. After all, they are certainly the two major parties in the country which are involved in connection with this legislation. I know that the president of Trans-Canada Air Lines has indicated that this legislation fills the bill so far as they are concerned, and that he feels satisfied with it. At the same time I feel that representatives of both these operating companies could easily have been included in the group which negotiated this agreement.

I am a little bit surprised as well that the minister has not been able to indicate the acceptance of this legislation by any great number of countries. Of course we are especially interested in the situation with regard to the United States. I understand that as yet there is no indication that the United States is even close to accepting this legislation. Without their acceptance of it I would think that one of our major problems in connection with air transport in this country—because several of their companies have certain rights in and through Canada—will be left uncovered. If the minister could give us any assurance that they are expected shortly to enter into this agreement I think a major problem would be overcome.

There is only one other matter to which I wish to refer. In connection with liability I have mentioned that the convention apparently provides limits which, so far as I am aware, exceed some of the limits set by our own air transport board. It also provides, of course, that where negligence is proved there is no limitation whatsoever. I wonder whether the provisions dealing with security are adequate to take care of the situation involving the negligent operation of an aircraft. After all, if there is an accident in which an aircraft of foreign registry is involved in Canada, it is quite possible that the only asset which will be available for execution will be the damaged aircraft itself after the minimum insurance coverage has been paid.

To a great extent this is a problem of property and civil rights, and in dealing with a problem of this kind it is a question whether the federal government should not go a step further and ensure that security be available to cover all losses, not just losses occasioned where no negligence is proved. It would appear that the legal rule of res ipsa loquitur has been used here. That would appear to solve only one part of the problem. The other part perhaps should have been taken care of through the same system.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I think it might be useful and might facilitate the discussion if Mr. Matthews, chairman of the air transport board, were in the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry or do you wish to wait?

Mr. Marler: I think clause 1 can carry. I do not think it gives rise to any difficulty.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On the schedule:

The Deputy Chairman: That brings us to the schedule. Does the schedule carry?

Mr. McCann: Let us take it up chapter by chapter.

The Deputy Chairman: The schedule is one clause but if it is agreeable to the committee we can call the schedule, for purposes of discussion, chapter by chapter. Chapter I is "Principles of Liability".

Mr. Michener: May I ask the minister whether Canada would be bound by this agreement as soon as five countries have subscribed to it, notwithstanding the fact that the other country involved in an accident was not a party to the agreement?

Mr. Marler: My understanding of that matter is that although Canada would be bound, it would be only in respect of the contracting states.

Mr. Michener: That is what I want to know. It would only be countries—

Mr. Marler: And who had also ratified.

Mr. Michener:—who had ratified. If Canada ratified we would then be liable when their aircraft were here and they would be liable if our aircraft were there, but not otherwise.

Mr. Marler: That is so.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): At the end of the last sentence of the first paragraph there are the words, "in conformity with existing air traffic regulations". Would the minister advise us if all contracting parties to this agreement have common air traffic regulations, or are there different aircraft regulations in each of the contracting countries?

Mr. Marler: My information is that they are, of course, matters of separate regulation in each country. Just as Canada has the right to determine its air traffic rules, so would the other contracting states; but, as Mr. Matthews has informed me, there is a good deal of uniformity as between the various sets of regulations.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Does that mean that in each case it would be the courts of the individual country which would interpret the air regulations of that country?

Mr. Marler: I think the hon. member is losing sight of the fact that as a result of the convention the mere fact that the damage is caused by a foreign aircraft to a third person on the surface makes it unnecessary to go into the question of whether it was following the rules or was not following them. In other words, it is deemed to be liable and it can only escape liability under the condition set forth in article 5, which reads:

> Any person who would otherwise be liable under the provisions of this convention shall not be liable if the damage is the direct consequence of armed conflict or civil disturbance, or if such person has been deprived of the use of the aircraft by act of public authority.

In other words, if an engine drops off and causes damage you do not have to prove negligence. You merely have to prove the fact of the damage.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The minister might enlighten us in connection with the other instance, where there is negligence to be proven and where there is going to be unlimited liability. Will that not be according to the particular regulation and in the country's courts?

Mr. Marler: No. The point I was trying to make was that it is not necessary to prove negligence. All that is necessary is to prove damage. As the hon. member will notice in reading the convention, if the damage occurs in the province of Ontario, let us say, the person suffering the damage sues in the courts of the province of Ontario and he does not have to prove that the accident was due to negligence. He merely proves the fact of the damage. That obviously is the advantage of the convention, which is counterbalanced, I think hon. members will agree, by the fact that there is a limitation of liability. If we were to have no convention, as I understand the situation, negligence would have to be proved and there is no limitation on liability at the present time, with the result that it might be possible to get a judgment but it might not be possible to enforce it. The effect of the convention is, first of all, to eliminate the necessity of proving negligence, to establish the place where the suit must be brought, and to provide a fund, if you like, or security upon which the judgment can be realized by a simple process.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Perhaps we are talking at cross-purposes. Do I not understand that this does not limit liability where negligence can be proven?

Mr. Marler: I am afraid the hon. member is misinterpreting the sense of the convention. Once the convention becomes effective, saving acts of deliberate damage to which I referred earlier, whether or not negligence is proven the liability is limited in accordance with the statement to which the hon. member alluded a moment ago. Perhaps I had better deal later with the question of the gold francs.

Mr. Churchill: Chapter I, article 1, subsection 2, says that an aircraft is considered to be in flight from the moment when power is applied for the purpose of actual take-off until the moment when the landing run ends. Do I understand from this that taxiing into position at the start of a flight and taxiing to the unloading place do not enter into the question of liability here in case there is an accident during that particular operation? In other words, how do you determine when the actual take-off occurs and the landing run ends?

Mr. Marler: I think the convention is pretty clear on that subject. The aircraft is considered to be in flight from the moment when power is applied for the purpose of actual take-off until the moment when the landing run ends. As we are talking about aircraft and not craft lighter than air I think it is perfectly obvious that the convention does not apply during the so-called taxiing operation. I should like to remind the hon. member that this does not concern damage to people in the aircraft. It is damage to people on the surface.

Mr. Churchill: People have been injured when airplanes have been taxiing into position or when the engines have been started, and so on, and I was wondering why that was not mentioned.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): If a four-motor American Air Lines plane was warming up its motors at Malton airport and one of the propellers flew off and killed somebody, that person would not be covered under the convention?

Mr. Marler: I do not think the convention applies in that case.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Does the minister know of any particular reason for that?

Mr. Marler: Not having participated in the 1952 negotiations I am unable to answer that question.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Do I understand that under article 2 there is this continuing liability to which I referred previously, and that the owner may have parted with legal title and yet be considered responsible under the convention?

Mr. Marler: I think the answer to that is yes. If I may reply at this moment to what the hon. member said during the debate on second reading, I should like to draw his attention to the provision of subparagraph 4 of article 11 which shows what is the meaning of a gold franc. I am sure if he reads that clause carefully he will find that inasmuch as the gold franc is tied to a certain quantity of gold it can hardly be expected to fluctuate as violently as he implied a little earlier. I did say that 500,000 francs were the equivalent of $37,000, and by my arithmetic that would be 7·4 cents for a gold franc.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I was going to say that at the price the government pays for gold it would never change. Is there any particular reason—

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee wish to complete the schedule or call it six o'clock?

Mr. Harris: At this point, Mr. Chairman, without asking you to resume the chair, may I say that we shall of course continue this matter after dinner. As hon. members know, I announced the resolution with respect to blind persons. I see that the hon. member for Lethbridge is here, and should that resolution be completed before ten o'clock by any chance, I wonder whether he would be prepared to continue his speech in the debate on the motion with respect to external affairs?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes.

Mr. Harris: We could use whatever time was left before ten o'clock for that purpose.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: At six o'clock we were discussing chapter II of the schedule.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Can the minister give us any idea why the 14-day period was selected for the continuing liability?

Mr. Marler: To which clause is the hon. member referring?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That is article 3.

Mr. Marler: I am looking at article 15 because I understand that chapters I and II had been adopted.

The Deputy Chairman: Chapter III starts on page 6.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I think we may have been under a misapprehension here. We were looking at article 3 on page 3 as the next item. Certainly that was the impression I had. I do not know whether or not any other hon. member had the same impression.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not think there is any wish on the part of the committee to limit discussion, so perhaps we might revert to that article for the moment.

Mr. Marler: I think I could answer my hon. friend by saying that we do not know why the period of 14 days to which he has referred was selected. Evidently that was the agreement in 1952, and I do not think it has any particular significance.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we pass on now to chapter II?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): No, Mr. Chairman. Article 5 on page 3 puzzles me a bit. If the owner of an aircraft is deprived of its use by the act of a public authority, whose responsibility is it? As an example, assume that an agency of the United States government seizes an American Air Lines plane flying into Malton to transport refugees, or whatever you want to call them. Is there any liability on that party then under this convention?

Mr. Marler: If I understand the hypothetical case to which my hon. friend refers, if the United States government deprives one of its citizens of the use of his aircraft and then flies it over Canada, I take it that under article 5 the owner of the aircraft is relieved from liability under the convention because he has not the control of the aircraft, as this public authority has taken it away from him.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Would the state then become the operator and also be liable?

Mr. Marler: I notice that in another section of the bill, in defining the meaning of the word "person", it goes so far as to cover the state. If my friend looks at article 30 he will see that.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The only point in connection with that, Mr. Chairman, is that I think the two terms used have been "owner" and "operator" and not "person" up to this point. I may be wrong. No, "person" is used; that is quite right.

The Deputy Chairman: Anything further on chapter I?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Yes, article 7, which I have read along with article 13 on page 6, which is part of chapter II. Is it the intention here that both operators of the aircraft which subsequently injures a third party will be liable through the insurance fund or otherwise to the full extent of the coverage?

Mr. Marler: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Is that not an unusual situation? Ordinarily when third parties are involved is it not usual that the liability is limited to one stipulated amount?

Mr. Marler: I will not generalize, but as I understand the convention each aircraft will be liable up to the full limit that is mentioned in the convention.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In other words this would be almost what you would term a double indemnity clause. If T.C.A. were involved in an accident over foreign territory and on a negligence basis were only responsible to the extent of 25 per cent, they would still have to pay the total amount out of this insurance fund?

Mr. Marler: That is the limit of the liability of each of them.

The Deputy Chairman: Anything further on chapter I? Shall we go to chapter II, "Extent of Liability?"

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The minister spent a considerable time explaining to me the gold franc system, and the Minister of Finance has assisted me at various times as well. Is there no way this amount can be tied to a current price? The minister was able to explain that the limit of liability on a light aircraft amounted to about $37,000. I assume that was based on the present price of gold. Would it not be true, notwithstanding the formula used, that if tomorrow the United States decided $25 per ounce was going to be the price paid for gold, this formula would leave us paying out to an aggrieved party possibly only three-fifths of the amount the minister has mentioned. Is that not something that could take place?

Mr. Marler: As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, the significance of article 11, particularly the fourth paragraph, is that the measure of damage is expressed in gold francs and the gold franc is not expressed in currency but is converted into 65½ milligrammes of gold of millesimal fineness 900. I take it that if there is fluctuation you have always to go back to what is the worth of 65½ milligrammes of gold of that particular fineness. I would find it difficult, offhand, to suggest some other measure that would remain constant that would be better than this.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Under article 12, which is still in chapter II, there are paragraphs 1 and 2. They seem to leave unlimited liability in a case of wilful damage. Does that still envisage that the minimum amount under the convention insurance fund will be payable notwithstanding what the final judgment might be?

Mr. Marler: I think it is obvious that the purpose of this section is to remove the limitation on liability that we have been discussing. At the same time I do not suppose that the insurance is going to be for an unlimited amount. I take it that the insurance that would be required would be up to a certain limit. I think the provisions are stated further on. I do not think you could expect to recover more than the limits of the insurance.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Does the minister understand that the same thing would take place as takes place in connection with automobile insurance? When $20,000 is covered out of a claim amounting to $40,000, does this paragraph contemplate that $20,000 must be paid, namely that the minimum requirement must be paid?

Mr. Marler: Yes.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): From reading article 14 it would appear that in dealing with personal and property damage there has been a division of the amount available for the satisfaction of a claim. It would seem that it is divided into two parts, 50 per cent for personal loss and 50 per cent for property damage, with the overriding feature that in respect of property damage if the 50 per cent more than covers the property damage claim the balance available would go toward the payment of personal injury claims. I would gather the effect might be this, that there might be claims in connection with personal injury amounting to $50,000, in which four or five persons would be involved, and that there might be only $25,000 involved in property damage suffered by different persons. They might get all their money, whereas those making claims for personal injuries might receive only a small percentage of those claims. Would that be the result, under the wording of this article?

Mr. Marler: My understanding is that this article applies only in a case where the amount of the claims exceeds the amount of the security. My understanding of the convention is that it provides that the first half shall be divisible among claimants in respect of bodily injury or loss of life. So far as the other half is concerned, it would be available not only to those claims in respect of damage to property but also to the first group so far as their claims remained unsatisfied out of the first half.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): But does not this arbitrary division have the effect of separating the arrangement so that in one section we might have a situation where a total claim was paid out, 100 cents on the dollar, whereas in the other section it would be paid out to the extent of only 10 cents on the dollar?

Mr. Marler: No, I do not think so. I will not challenge the last figure, because I do not think it is relevant. But the position must be that the claims exceed the amount available for distribution. The point is that one-half goes to the claimants in respect of bodily injury or loss of life. The other half is divided up among the same group of claimants and the claimants in respect of property. So far as I can see it is impossible that any group should receive payment in full. In fact, I think if the hon. member would carefully examine the article in the convention he would find that it gives a sort of priority to those who have claims for bodily injury or loss of life.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I may be slow in understanding this, but if there is one group of people with personal injury claims amounting to $100,000 on one side and $25,000 property damage on the other, and there is a policy for $150,000—

Mr. Marler: You have too much money.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): —and we divide it under this system, I think you will find that the property damage people are getting all their claims, while the personal damage people are getting only a dividend on their claims. Is it possible that that might happen under this article?

Mr. Marler: In the figures my hon. friend just gave as to the amount of claims he started off on the premise that the claims were less than the amount available for distribution. Of course on that basis everybody would be paid in full. But if there is only $100,000, and let us say claims for personal injury of $75,000 and claims for property damage of $75,000, those who have the claims of $75,000 for bodily injury will receive half the $100,000, or $50,000. That leaves claimants of $25,000 for bodily injury, plus claimants of $75,000 for property damage to divide up the remaining $50,000. I think my hon. friend will realize that the claims in respect of bodily injury will receive another $12,500 and those in respect of property damage will receive $37,500. So that the claimants for bodily injury will be receiving $62,500 while the others would receive $37,500. I hope my arithmetic is right, and I think it is. But the principle is quite clear, according to the article in the convention.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Would it not be fairer if the whole amount were pooled and a proportionate dividend paid to all, pro rata?

Mr. Marler: Offhand I must say that I think the individual ought to be compensated in respect of bodily injury or loss of life before compensation is given for property damage. That may be a matter of opinion, but it was certainly the opinion of those who drew the convention.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): But you do not compensate him first. You just divide the fund; is that not right?

Mr. Marler: I do not think I can add much to what I have said.

The Deputy Chairman: Then we will pass on to chapter III, which deals with security for operator's liability.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): This is the chapter dealing with the requirements of contracting nations in connection with insurance coverage requirements and/or the cash requirements and bank guarantees, or otherwise required to be filed covering the responsibilities of the various parties.

In connection with the interpretation of these articles—and I do not wish to refer to any one in particular—is it not possible for a contracting party to refuse any of the types of security mentioned here, as being unsatisfactory to it?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I think it might be said that under the convention there might be a dispute as to the sufficiency of insurance. There are provisions under which a contracting state may dispute an insurance payment. There is provision for discussion as to the insurance and the settlement of the dispute. I think paragraph 7(a) enables a state overflown to request additional evidence of financial responsibility. But, unfortunately, perhaps this is somewhat reduced in efficacy by paragraph 7(b) which provides that in the event of a dispute between states as to financial responsibility the insurance or guarantee shall continue valid until the dispute has been settled by an arbitral tribunal. I admit that is not a very satisfactory outcome, but on the other hand I do not think that anybody would be particularly interested in maintaining insurance that really was not effective because after all, as my hon. friend knows, if the insurer is not going to pay at the appropriate time the insured in this particular case is going to have to provide the moneys.

Mr. Pallett: In chapter IV, provision is made for the commencement of an action within a certain length of time. Further down in the chapter reference is made to the possible revision of the whole action by the court of the other contracting party. Some provision should be made that would set out when the judgment will be final, rather than allowing it to be reviewed by the courts of the other contracting party. Look at article 19 of chapter IV and read article 20, paragraph 5. Article 19 provides for the commencement of the action and paragraph 5 apparently provides for a complete review.

Mr. Marler: I think that refers only to the execution of the judgment. As I understand it, article 19 says that the time for the bringing of the action is six months, but the paragraph to which my hon. friend has just referred, as I understand it, deals with the execution of the judgment; that is to say, after the facts have been determined and the operator of the aircraft found liable.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In connection with chapter IV, article 20, paragraph 5, under the rules of which court of competent jurisdiction would the proceedings dealing with the reopening of the proceedings be taken? What might be considered as a fair service of notice under the rules of one court might not be satisfactory service under the rules of the other court. I can see this situation arising. The court where the execution is issued might be a foreign court, and it might refer to proceedings taken in the court where the judgment was obtained as not giving proper notice to the defendant. The court where the notice was given might consider that it was quite proper notice. Is there any indication here as to which rules will be followed, the rules of the court where the execution was issued or the rules of the court where the judgment was obtained?

Mr. Marler: I take it, of course, from what was said earlier in the discussion that the judgment is obtained in the state in which the accident occurred. I cited this afternoon as an example that if the damage were suffered in the province of Ontario, the action would be brought in the province of Ontario and judgment rendered. But I do not believe it would follow that the judgment of the Ontario court is necessarily going to be executed in, let us say, the place where the operator of the aircraft has his principal establishment. It might be found convenient to take proceedings for execution in the state of New York; and I take it that the rules which are set forth in paragraph 5 would be determined by the court in which the judgment creditor attempted to enforce execution of his judgment.

I take it my hon. friend would feel that it was not unfair that the court which was being asked to order execution of some foreign judgment might reasonably say, "Was the defendant given a fair and adequate opportunity to defend his interests?" I am quite sure my hon. friend would not wish to find that his client, for example, had been condemned by a court of some other country on what seemed to him to be totally insufficient motives. I think he would like to feel that his client would be protected at the crucial moment when execution was asked for, and to know that the court would make certain that adequate notice of the action was given originally.

Without having practised before the courts I must say that it does seem to me that in a general sense these provisions are intended to ensure that the person being asked to pay will receive justice.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I was thinking more of protection for our own operators in connection with obtaining execution of their judgments in a foreign country. Obviously, under this paragraph, it is quite definite that the merits of the case cannot be reopened, but the rules of the court dealing with service may be entirely different in country X than they are in the province of Ontario. I go further and say that under paragraph 7 I find that we are also subject to the whims and fancies of the public policy of the state in which the execution is requested. Country X may be down in South America, so far as I am concerned, and what may be public policy there from day to day may materially affect our air operators' opportunity of collecting a judgment.

Mr. Marler: Surely not of collecting, but of having to pay, is it not?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Well, I would say it is the ability to collect through the process of issuing execution under these paragraphs.

Mr. Marler: I think my hon. friend is forgetting that the people who are benefiting through this convention so far as these claims are concerned are third persons on the surface. The case that he has just referred to, I take it, is that of a resident of some foreign country in Central or South America who may obtain in the courts there a judgment against, let us say, Trans-Canada Air Lines, and I suppose that if he could enforce that judgment against property down there that would be the Trans-Canada Air Lines' misfortune. If it considered it did not receive adequate notice, the judgment would not be enforceable in the courts of Ontario, let us say, unless the conditions set forth in paragraph 5 were realized.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I may have used a wrong example. Perhaps I should have said a citizen of Ontario having obtained a judgment in Ontario and attempting to force execution in country X is subject, as I see it here and if I understand the minister's interpretation of the rules of court, to the rules of court in foreign country X so far as the efficacy of service is concerned and subject to the whims and fancies, if I may use that term, of public policy of that state. Is that right?

Mr. Marler: I think so, yes. But I should like to point out to my hon. friend that that is the situation now. Regardless of the convention, if the aircraft is registered in some foreign republic and if an individual wishes now to enforce a claim for damages, he obtains a judgment from the Ontario court. If there is something within the jurisdiction of the Ontario court on which he can obtain execution, well and good. If he cannot, he knows that he has to go to the republic and in the courts there run his chances of being able to exemplify and execute a foreign judgment. I am sure the hon. member has tried to execute foreign judgments in Canada, and I am quite sure he realizes it is not a simple process.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): This convention does not add anything to the person's rights?

Mr. Marler: I think not.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there anything further on chapter IV? We shall now deal with chapter V, "Application of the Convention and General Provisions".

Mr. Pallett: I have a question with respect to article 26. Is there any agreement between Canada and the United States with respect to payment to Canadian citizens for damage occasioned by United States military aircraft in Canada? This provision specifically exempts them. I was wondering if there was another provision that includes them.

Mr. Marler: I do not think the hon. member is right in saying that it exempts them. It excludes them from the operation of the convention entirely, and I think I should say to my hon. friend that I know of no agreement that exempts the United States from liability for accidents caused by its aircraft to Canadian citizens. Certainly article 26 does not grant an exemption which does not exist at the present time.

Mr. Pallett: It does not include military aircraft.

Mr. Marler: No. In fact my understanding of the convention, Mr. Chairman, is that military, customs or police aircraft are excluded from the operation of this convention.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there anything further under chapter V? Then chapter VI, "Final Provisions".

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In connection with chapter VI, article 33, I wonder if the minister might be as specific as possible and tell us how many nations have signed this convention and, second, if he has any official notification of the attitude of the United States.

Mr. Marler: I shall answer the last part of the question first, by saying there is no official indication of the attitude of the United States. These are the names of the countries which have signed the convention. I take it that my hon. friend is not going to write them down, so I shall read them quickly: The Argentine, Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, Spain, France, Israel, Italy, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mexico, The Netherlands, Portugal, The Philippines, Switzerland and Thailand. After the convention was originally signed, it was also signed by Great Britain, Australia and Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Would I be correct in saying that not more than three of those countries listed have aircraft now operating over Canadian soil?

Mr. Marler: I think I would say there are four or five. There are, of course, France, The Netherlands, Switzerland, Great Britain, and Australia.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Could you give us any idea of the proportionate number of flights they operate?

Mr. Marler: No, I am afraid I could not.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Would I be correct in saying that they operate a small proportion of the total number of flights into Canada?

Mr. Marler: I would think so, yes. On the other hand they represent 100 per cent of the foreign aircraft flying over Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That does not include the United States, does it?

Mr. Marler: No.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): When shall this bill be read the third time?

An hon. Member: Next sitting.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Next sitting of the house.

BLIND PERSONS ACT

AMENDMENTS LOWERING ELIGIBLE AGE TO 18 YEARS AND INCREASING MAXIMUM ANNUAL INCOMES

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Blind Persons Act to lower the age for eligible recipients from twenty-one years to eighteen years, and also to increase the maximum annual incomes allowed to recipients.

[Mr. Marler.]

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the minister not going to say anything? Undue modesty!

Mr. Blair: I welcome anything that will be of assistance to those who are suffering from this handicap, and the fact that the age is lowered from 21 to 18 years is a step in the right direction. Personally I feel—and I should like to hear the minister's comments on this matter—that if the age were still further lowered to, say, 16, when other assistance in the nature of family allowances ceases, that money could be well used at a time when it was necessary for the education of these people who have this affliction. I think education for these people at an early age is a very important thing and that such special assistance, even lowering the age two years more, would enable them to obtain further education and fit them to carry on their lives under their handicap.

I received, as I suppose every other member of the house did, sometime about February, a brief from the Canadian council of the blind and the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. I am also very much aware of the splendid work being done by voluntary organizations in this line, and I would also mention the fact that medical science is doing a great deal in the way of prevention of this disability. But I note that the Canadian national council of the blind bring forth three recommendations; they comment on these, and at the finish of their brief they summarize these recommendations.

The first recommendation—and this was made before the minister introduced his legislation—was that the Blind Persons Act be amended, substituting age 18 years for the present 21 years for recipients of the blindness allowance. So the present resolution covers the first recommendation of the Canadian council of the blind.

The second recommendation was that the means test ceiling provided in the Blind Persons Act be raised to statutory minimum levels for single and married persons now applicable in the Canadian Income Tax Act.

The third recommendation was that a special guiding allowance of at least $10 per month be provided by the government of Canada, free from the means test, to all blind persons from the age of 18 years for life.

In their general comment—and these figures are interesting, because I think figures produced by the organization are authentic—they point out that elimination of the means test on the present blindness allowance would affect only some 3,800 persons in the age group 21 to 69 who are not now on the allowance, plus those who are on the allowance but for whom the amount has been reduced more or less because of income in excess of the present ceiling. The explanations they make are interesting. They estimate that the elimination of the means test would cost approximately $2 million, and they say further:

> Hence, the elimination of the means test would benefit only a few of the 8,000 presently on blindness allowance and none of the 7,500 on old age security.

Then they give revised recommendations. Again the first is that the age reduction from 21 to 18 would add approximately 290 to those on blindness allowance and would cost about $139,200 per annum. That is covered by the resolution. The second is that the increased ceiling recommended would add approximately 500 and would cost $240,000. The third is that a guiding allowance free from the means test would cover approximately 19,000 and would cost $2,280,000. So the estimated cost of the three recommendations made by the Canadian national council of the blind would amount to approximately $2,500,000 per annum. The first recommendation brought in by the minister today is going to cost $139,200.

They also pointed out that the principle endorsed by the world council for the welfare of the blind involves the payment of maintenance allowance to the less capable blind, subject to a more or less generous means test and a guiding allowance.

We welcome the resolution brought in by the minister. We think it is a good resolution. I am sure every person in the chamber will approve this assistance to these handicapped people. Yet one must recognize two other recommendations made by the Canadian council of the blind. In any future legislation I think we should proceed as far as we can toward implementing these recommendations from such a responsible body.

As I said, I welcome the additional amount that is being paid. I think it is a step in the right direction. But I think that the whole committee will feel that in future legislation we should proceed as far as possible toward implementing those recommendations.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I am going to be brief because I think there is unanimity in the committee in support of the proposals contained in this resolution. I join with the hon. member in saying that I think the age limit should have been lower than it is. I agree with him that when family allowance ceases the blind pension should begin. That would be at the age of 16. However, we have gone about this particular piece of social security legislation bit by bit and step by step.

I was here, of course, when the first blind pension plan was introduced. I had been greatly interested in the problems of the blind for many years. In fact at one time I had the honour of being honorary president of an organization in my own province and I was able to meet the blind people at that time, to understand their problems, and to realize how essential it was that something constructive should be done for them.

I quite agree that, after all, the education of the blind is of paramount importance. We have schools for them in various places, more particularly in the province of Ontario. One thing I should like to see is the adoption of a plan whereby the federal government might assist the provinces in building schools for perhaps two or more provinces. I should like to see one for the three prairie provinces so the children would not be obliged to go so far afield and be away from their parents for such long periods of time.

Many of the blind people, given the opportunity, are able partly to earn their own living. They are severely handicapped, hence can rarely make an income which is sufficient to meet all their needs. But given the opportunity they can at least partially provide for themselves. That is one of the reasons that I should like to see the ceiling on the earnings they may get from their labour, whatever it may be, increased considerably. I think the suggestion of the institute is reasonable, namely that the ceiling should be raised to the income tax minimum in the cases of single and married people.

But while I am of that opinion, I am much more interested in seeing the eligibility age reduced. I should like to see it reduced as soon as possible to the age of 16. As a matter of fact I should be inclined to go lower than 16, in order to help provide for the education of the child at an early age. After all, the parents assume an obligation and often a tremendous burden in caring for a blind child. Then too, the request for some allowance for a guide is, in my opinion, reasonable and fair.

While we are extending our social security system in various directions I think there is no more worthy cause than the extension of the system to those who are handicapped by loss of sight. It is true, I am happy to say, that modern medical science, as has already been pointed out, is doing much to remove blindness from our midst. Often sight can be restored. If the child is taken in hand soon after birth, often the threat of blindness can be removed by physicians. That consideration, of course, brings me to the hardy chestnut of our movement, namely that the provision of medical aid on a national basis is something that should round out our social security system. It would be of assistance in cases of this sort, where medical attention would be immediately available, and blindness sometimes would be prevented by speedy action by qualified physicians.

I do not think there is much I can add, except to say that we are and always have been wholeheartedly in support of this type of legislation. Speaking personally, I may say that I have always been exceedingly glad to support in this chamber any proposal which would assist this group of people in any and every way possible. I am happy indeed that this measure has been introduced. I hope that in another year at most we shall see amendments introduced designed to remove the ceiling or to raise the ceiling and reduce the age limit progressively, perhaps the next time, as requested to 16. I should like to go beyond that point and see the next step the reduction of the age below 16, before family allowance ceases.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, at this stage I would not think it necessary to speak at any length with regard to this resolution. However, I can say that we are grateful that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has seen fit to propose to the House of Commons a measure which will do the two things that are outlined in the resolution, namely reduce from 21 to 18 years the age at which blind persons become eligible for assistance, and increase the maximum annual incomes allowed to recipients.

At this stage we do not know how much the increase will be in annual income, but we are certainly in favour of both these things that are specifically mentioned in the resolution. We should like the minister to know that we would support a considerable increase in the ceiling on annual income allowed to blind persons because, as has already been pointed out, these people are carrying on under great handicaps. They require a much higher income than do ordinary persons, in order that they may do the things they are obliged to do. The cost of their training is much greater, the cost of assistance to get around is much greater, and all that sort of thing.

I am quite sure we are not telling the minister anything he does not already know. We are hopeful that he will take into full consideration the requests that have been made by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, in which I believe they mentioned the necessity for granting some allowance to blind persons in order to help them pay for guides where it is necessary to have guides. I do not know anything at all about the cost of a guide. I have not the slightest idea of what it costs to obtain and to maintain a seeing-eye dog or even to obtain the services of a human guide where it is necessary. However, the cost must be considerable. I would think that is nothing more than reasonable that we should give careful consideration to the requests that have been made that these people be given a certain allowance each year for guide purposes.

We would prefer to wait until the measure comes before us to debate the matter at any length, and so we reserve our criticism until we come to second reading of the bill. Suffice it to say at this time that we are very happy to see progress being made in the right direction, and we do hope the minister has gone as far as it is possible for him to induce his colleagues to go along with him at this time.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on the resolution. I have a great deal of sympathy for those who do not have their sight, and I believe it comes closer home to me than to most members of the House of Commons because of the fact that a daughter of mine was thrown from her horse some years ago, landed on her head and as a result of that accident became blind.

I know what a blind person has to go through in this life. I have had dealings not only with one blind person but with a great number, and may I say they do not want sympathy. They want to be able to work on their own and do things themselves. That is one way the Canadian National Institute for the Blind has done a lot for them. They send teachers and instructors to the blind people if the blind people want them. These teachers and instructors have taught them to read braille. They have taught them to use typewriters and other machines that even the minister or I, having our sight, perhaps could not handle. They have taught them to do many things. They have taught them to earn their own living.

But these blind men and women who have gone out to earn their living have found that they cannot get the pension owing to the fact that their earnings are too great. At the same time it costs a blind person more money to live than it does the man working at the next machine, because the blind person has to have someone guide him to the bus and to the plant where he is working. He has to be picked up again and taken home. In the home he has to be instructed to a certain extent, although not very much, in this and that, and shown where certain things are.

During the years the Canadian National Institute for the Blind has been in operation—and I speak particularly of the Peterborough branch with which I have had a lot to do—it has had to supplement the incomes of blind people in order that they might have fuel in their homes in the wintertime, proper clothing and medical attention and other little things they could not get on the blind pension or even when working and living at home. Most of these blind people are very intelligent. This is partly because of the fact that the Canadian National Institute for the Blind has supplied them with what are known as talking books. These are volumes of records on literature, history and geography. They have the Reader's Digest and the Bible in so many volumes, and the blind people can learn things by playing the records in these talking books. This is something else these people have to have in order to get along, but these books cost money.

There are many other things they have to have. The hon. member who just spoke mentioned seeing-eye dogs. Personally I am not very keen on blind people having seeing-eye dogs owing to the fact that they depend on the seeing-eye dog instead of depending on themselves. I think they lose something by having a seeing-eye dog, though these dogs will take them wherever they wish to go.

There is not much more I wish to say. In my opinion the lowering of the pensionable age from 21 to 18 is not good enough. It should be lowered to at least 16, as the hon. member for Lanark and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned, in order to pick up where the family allowance leaves off. There is a gap there of two years during which the parent has to look after the blind child. It is not fair. It means they have to deprive themselves and their other children, if they have any, of many necessities of life in order to look after the one child who needs extra attention. I hope that the ceiling on allowable income will be high enough so these people will not have to deprive themselves of things they have had to deprive themselves of in the past.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I regret that the minister did not choose to introduce this resolution with any remarks. I know he is waiting for us to conclude. However, I am pleased to see so much interest taken in the resolution at this time. I wonder whether the minister is so keenly aware of the situation, when the government is unable to see its way clear to give our blind people a dollar more out of every $10,000 of our national production. If we granted all the amendments to the act they asked for in their brief it would, as the hon. member for Lanark pointed out, cost $2 million, a little below 1 per cent of 1 per cent of our national production. I think their brief was like that presented to the government by the returned men of Canada. It was deliberately designed with the hope that it would appear so reasonable to the government that the government would not be able to find an argument as to why their requests should not be completely met.

I do not think the brief really represents what the members of the institute feel they should have. So far the only amendment about which we know anything definitely is that lowering the age of eligibility to 18. According to the brief that will cost the government only $139,200 a year. If I were a minister offering such a great social reform I would also hesitate to speak on the introduction of the resolution. After all, it would amount to only a relatively minor amendment.

In looking over the act I notice that this is another case where the federal government embarks on something in co-operation with the provincial governments on the basis of sharing the cost. I realize that possibly this is an invasion of provincial rights. However, I see no reason why this government has to limit itself to paying only 75 per cent of the cost of this pension. In these days we are particularly concerned about how we can rearrange the incomes of our lower levels of government. I think relief to some extent might be offered to the provincial governments if the federal government were to accept 100 per cent of the cost of blind pensions, just as they did in the case of pensions for our senior citizens over 70.

The leader of the group to which I belong pleaded with the minister to lower the eligible age for pension even more than the minister has offered. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked that the age be lowered to at least 16, and I was very happy to hear him use the words "at least".

I think the approach of the group to which I belong would be this. When such a tragedy happens to a family I think all of us in the community should say, not that we will shoulder the burden of this family—because no one who has a blind member of the family will ever admit it is a burden—but we should say we will shoulder the extra responsibility that you have as a result of having a member of your family who has the misfortune to be blind. I do not see why there should be any age limit to a blind pension paid on behalf of society as a whole, because if we say that a blind person must first reach the age of 18 to receive a pension, that person has already passed the age when a heavy outlay of money has to be made on his behalf.

Blind people like to feel that they also have a contribution to make to society and to the community in which they live. Before they can make that contribution they need training, the cost of which is away beyond the cost of an ordinary education. I feel, for that reason alone, that this pension should be payable at whatever age blindness occurs. I feel also that in many cases blind persons would have been able to regain their vision if an adequate income had been made available at an early age.

Another matter I wish to emphasize is that it seems to be taken for granted that we should pay no more in allowances to blind persons than we pay to old age pensioners. I was very happy to hear the hon. member for Peterborough place emphasis on the fact that a blind person has added expense. I believe we ought to get away from this idea of a $40 maximum for all those who receive pensions. If $40 is a suitable amount for old age pensioners, then certainly meeting the request of these national associations and allowing blind persons an extra $10 per month would not be out of the way. Even with $50 per month they would actually be receiving a great deal less than they need.

I notice the resolution mentions the maximum permissible income. We have no information as yet on what is proposed. I should like to see the legislation state that the means test will be removed altogether. I feel that the cost of administering such a means test must consume a considerable portion of the money that is saved by having such a test. This means test discourages the building up of self-respect in these people. I think they would like to find useful employment, and having a means test at all is merely discouraging these people from getting the training necessary to earn their own livelihood.

In reading the act I noticed regulations concerning the disposal of assets in order to qualify under the means test. We have gone through the mill in that respect with old age pensions. We have seen how the means test used to encourage people to illegally dispose of their assets in order to take advantage of the old age pension. I believe the Canadian people would be happy to hear the minister state that this government, in amending this act, had agreed to eliminate this means test.

In looking at the permissible income, I hope the minister will take a more liberal attitude toward raising the ceiling than was taken when we amended the war veterans legislation. I see that the permissible income ceiling for single people is now $840 per annum. Ordinary taxpayers in Canada do not pay any income tax on the first $1,000. It is considered that one needs at least $1,000 in order to exist. I do not see why, if we are not willing to abolish the means test, we should not at least allow blind people the minimum exemption that is allowed by the Income Tax Act.

I have noticed other discrepancies which I hope to see removed when I see the bill. The maximum income allowed a single person is set at $840. Then we come to an unmarried person with one dependent child, and we see that the maximum permissible income is $1,040. This means that there is an allowance of only $200 for the care of one child for a year. I should like the minister to indicate that he is prepared to allow much more under the amendment. I feel that the allowance for one child should be at least $500 per year, because it costs even normal people that much to sustain one child for a year.

Then the maximum permissible income for a married person is set at $1,320. Again there is an increase of $480 per year over the amount allowed a single person. Surely blind people should not be asked to live on $40 per month, yet that is what we are doing when we say that single people will be allowed to have an income of $840 and married people an income of $1,320. When both the husband and wife are blind, we place a ceiling on their income of $1,440 per year or $120 per month. This $120 per month is only $10 per month more than a married couple on old age pension receive in some parts of the dominion. When both the husband and wife are blind, surely it is unreasonable for us to say that they have to get by on $120 per month.

There are not many blind people in Canada. I do not think anyone in this house will take part in this debate because of what the blind people may do at the next election. Throughout Canada there are only slightly more than 8,000 persons in receipt of assistance under the Blind Persons Act, and the total expenditures by this government under that act amount to less than $3 million a year. I feel that if the government had decided to grant all the requests of the Canadian council of the blind and the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, the Canadian people might have said, "We have a liberal government in deed as well as in name". I do not think any opposition would have been registered from any section of the house had the government seen fit to spend that extra $2 million a year instead of a miserable $139,000.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Chairman, at the risk of repetition I feel impelled to support the proposals made by several hon. members. Before the minister speaks I would hope he might reconsider the suggestion he now makes, so the age limit may be reduced to 16 years.

I have listened with interest on many occasions to appeals made on behalf of the blind and of others who, as the hon. member who has just spoken said, make up a small minority of those people in our country who sometimes, under our democratic system, are almost forgotten. I have not had the same experience as my hon. friend and colleague from Peterborough. Many of us who know him well realize how close he is to this problem.

I feel impelled, however, to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lanark, who has given serious study to this and other welfare problems. I would support, too, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar who has described explicitly the present situation. I shall not take the time of the committee to repeat what has been said. As was pointed out so well by the hon. member for Peterborough, the blind persons in this country do not want sob stories on their behalf; they do not want sympathy; they want assistance.

It is clear that from their infancy blind persons place heavy obligations upon their families. As parents and perhaps as grandparents some of us know what it means to protect children who may run out on the streets, and how much greater the obligation must be when the children are blind. It has been difficult enough to watch my progeny, even when they can see.

I cannot help thinking that we overlook the seriousness of the problem. There has been agreement in the house to give old age pensions even to many who do not need it. Then we have given pensions to others who may have wasted what they received, and we have been reluctant and hesitant—I think sometimes because they do not have many votes—to give pensions to those who are totally disabled.

It is 25 years ago since I first spoke on behalf of the blind in this country. We have always been reluctant to consider their case. As the hon. member who has just taken his seat pointed out, the numbers involved are of no great political significance, and the amount of money involved is comparatively small. But the principle at stake is great. I cannot help thinking that the ages between 16 and 20 are ages of uncertainty. They are the time when boys and girls encounter great difficulties, and begin to wonder where they are going and what the future holds for them. Those are the years when their minds are in some state of turmoil. Surely if we can reduce the eligible age from 21 to 18 years we could reduce it to 16 and give these young persons a break, these children whose education is always more difficult and more expensive, these children who many times must travel long distances to get their education, and must be accompanied in their travels.

Hon. members know, I am sure, that among the blind are to be found some of the most brilliant persons in this country. I know many of them who are more capable of earning their living than some hon. members of the House of Commons would be if they were deprived of their indemnities. We know there is a vast difference in the abilities of those who can see. There are only a few who are in class A and are outstanding. Those who are in darkness the whole 24 hours in the day must be brilliant indeed, when they can survive. They are proud persons, persons who perhaps would not have been so clever had they been able to see. They have been forced by circumstances to develop their talents to meet the obligations their handicap involves.

Even though they may be trained in new scientific methods to help them meet their handicap, it seems a pity that their whole living becomes more difficult. Their earning capacity is generally depreciated, and in order to fit themselves to meet their handicap they must begin early. In these days, when we are spending so much money, and when we are so boastful of our social services, I would urge that we spend more on behalf of these unfortunate persons. Sometimes I think we have gone a long way in establishing social services in our rich country; but when we have established those services for those who are physically fit we should not quibble, we should not be niggardly, we should not argue about the amount involved when the suggestion is made that the age limit be reduced from 18 to 16 years.

There are not many blind in Canada today in that age group. The hon. member for Lanark has said that only $2,500,000 would be involved. Surely very little more would be needed to include those of 16 years of age, so they would be given the break to which they are entitled. Those of us who can see and who have our other faculties have never been forced to discipline ourselves as they have. Perhaps because of our indolence we do not realize the great care that must be exercised by the parents of blind persons so they may be fitted for their tasks in life.

Surely we can reduce the age to 16 years. After all, family allowance payments end at 16, as do mothers' allowances. What is to become of the blind child whose mother is unwell; how is he to survive in those most critical years of his life? Because we know they are critical years, even for those who can see; and certainly they must be tragic for those who cannot.

At this time, when the minister is reducing the age to 18 years—and I join with the hon. member for Lanark and others who have complimented him upon that action—why should he not reduce it to 16? I doubt if even that is far enough. If the age limit were reduced to 16 it would help meet during two more years the handicap of these unfortunate people.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I think it is significant that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has remained on the sidelines for such a long time while this proposal has been debated in the committee.

I agree with the other hon. members who have spoken from this side of the house. The proposal is quite inadequate. When one considers our physical resources in Canada and the very small number of people involved in this legislation I feel sure we should go at least as far as the Canadian council of the blind and the Canadian National Institute for the Blind have suggested.

Other members have referred to the excellent material supplied to all hon. members by these two organizations. I do not propose to repeat any of the material that has been dealt with, but one paragraph has not been referred to. These organizations mentioned that in Canada we spend approximately $38 per month compared with $56 per month in the United States. When one considers that our resources on a per capita basis are very great I am sure that if we brought our contribution up in line with what is paid in the United States it would not place any great strain on us.

I realize it is not too difficult for hon. members on this side of the house to ask the government to increase its commitments for various projects, but when one considers the handicaps that this small handful of about 8,000 Canadian people face when they go through life unable to see, then this is a matter to which those of us who have the good fortune to have good health should give more consideration.

Many years ago when I was at university I realized what a handicap it is to go through life unable to see. A young chap came to Saskatoon to give a musical recital. He and his mother stayed with friends of mine. My friend telephoned and wondered whether I would take time to show this blind boy through the university. I of course was very glad to accept the invitation and we visited the gymnasium, the convocation hall and some of the lecture theatres. The president of the university was kind enough to shake hands with him and ask him some questions. Later that night around the dinner table the young blind chap told his mother and his hosts of what he saw at the university. Although I had been at the university for some time I would not have been able to tell a group of people in as great detail and with as much enthusiasm about the wonders of the University of Saskatchewan as this young lad who was unable to see was able to do. He never had been able to see, and would never be able to see.

When it is proposed, as the minister is now proposing, that we should make the pension available at 18, it should be explained to us why the Canadian economy will not stand the strain of commencing the pension at 16. As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam pointed out, any child in Canada with the misfortune of being unable to see should have a pension available as soon as his sight is lost. We should regard our expenditures in this field as investments that will pay rich dividends to all the Canadian people. It has been one of our mistakes in the past that we have regarded payments of this sort as charity, as something we must do without very much enthusiasm.

The minister should be able to convince the rest of his colleagues that it is our responsibility to those who are blind to see that pensions be given without any means test. Since we are able to provide family allowances without any means test, and since everyone on reaching the age of 70 receives a pension without a means test, therefore it is not unreasonable that everyone who has the misfortune to be blind should have a pension without a means test. If there be those who do not require this money the Minister of National Revenue will be able to catch up with them eventually through the income tax machinery. It is a very fair device. If there are people who get the old age pension or family allowances and who can get by without them, the Minister of National Revenue is able to make some sort of adjustment with them.

Therefore the minister should give careful consideration to the suggestions that have come from this side of the house to the effect that pensions for the blind should be made available without a means test. If he is unwilling to recommend that the pension start when blindness occurs, he should at least meet the representations that when family allowances are discontinued the payment of pensions for blindness should commence. Since the minister has not committed himself up to this time I hope he will agree to recommend to the cabinet that the suggestions that have been made from this side of the house be given favourable consideration by his colleagues.

Mr. Martin: Perhaps it might be appropriate at this time to say a few brief words on this resolution. I should like to think—and I do think—that the observations made by the hon. member for Lanark, who is always so constructive in his approach to matters in this house, and those of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar represent the best mood of this house in the constructive observations which they have just made.

I am sure the committee will not mind my making this observation, that if one had to introduce a particular measure on the occasion of an anniversary event, this would be the measure. My colleague the Minister of National Revenue and I—I do not know whether he is aware of it—are approaching the end of the anniversary of that day ten years ago when we were both sworn in as ministers of the crown. Being somewhat of a sentimentalist I rather think it is a happy note that I should be able to introduce a motion of this kind on this particular anniversary, which I would want to share with my colleague the Minister of National Revenue.

As the hon. member for Lanark has said, this resolution is a further step in our effort to improve the conditions of our blind population. As the hon. member for Peterborough has said, that group does not want from this house or from any other group in our country any sympathy whatsoever. It is a group that is self-reliant. The work of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, of L'Association Canadienne-française des aveugles et l'Institut Nazareth de Montréal and the Montreal association for the blind confirms all that I have just said about the self-reliance and the initiative which the blind people of our country are prepared to take from time to time.

This is not the first amendment respecting the blind that has been introduced in this house during the past few years. The age, which is now being lowered from 21 to 18, was lowered from 40 to 21 in 1947. Those of us, Mr. Chairman, who are making this proposal to the house at this time had the responsibility of sitting on your right when that amendment was introduced.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned the desirability of rehabilitation for the blind, and I am sure the committee will generally echo what he has said in that regard. I do not know of anything that is more constructive to assist the blind than the work of rehabilitation. In addition to that, under the national health program the government is now financing the cost of four glaucoma clinics, one in Toronto, two in Montreal, and one in the city of Quebec.

Glaucoma is Canada's most serious eye problem. We have urged every province to follow the examples set by the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. In the past month we have approved a federal grant for the establishment of a glaucoma clinic for the province of New Brunswick in Fredericton, and also under the national health program we have provided financial assistance to a number of eye research investigations being carried out by the department of ophthalmology of the University of Toronto.

In addition, we have undertaken in the past seven years a program of remedial surgery to restore vision to blind pensioners where there is some hope of success. I think this particular story is one of the happiest I could relate to the house. Over 60 per cent of the cases which have been given remedial surgery under the arrangements we have made with the provinces for the joint assumption of full costs of the operations have been successful; vision has been restored to the point where the pensioner could resume a more nearly normal life, and in 60 per cent of all cases where remedial surgery was attempted the pensioner had vision restored and was taken off the blind assistance roll altogether.

That represents the determination and the desire of the administration to do what it can, not only to provide pensions but also to do something in a constructive way to improve permanently, if it can, the disability of failure in eyesight.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister spoke in percentages. What about the numbers?

Mr. Martin: The numbers are about 210, which is a very considerable proportion when we consider the total blind population of Canada, and I may say there is no limitation. Any blind persons now on these rolls and in receipt of this assistance can qualify for this kind of treatment, and the provincial governments in cases where agreements exist are prepared to arrange for the best of medical treatment in the effort to improve conditions.

Reference has been made to the six-point program of the C.N.I.B. I need not go into all the particulars of those six points except to say that all of them have been met by the government with the exception of two; and in those two cases, when we come to the bill we will see that a very considerable proportion of those remaining points have been constructively dealt with by the administration.

The second last point I should like to make is this. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, with his usual vigour, urged that the age should be reduced from 18 to 16. When the house passed the Disabled Persons Act it provided that a person benefiting under that act could qualify at the age of 18 years. At that time, as now, a blind person could qualify only at the age of 21 under the Blind Persons Act. The Blind Persons Act is disability legislation. It was the first legislation for disabled people in this country, and when from time to time I have met the various associations of the blind I have pointed out that improvements in the legislation which we had in mind for them would have to wait until such time as we could provide for the other classes of disabled persons for whom, up to that time, we had made no provision whatsoever.

I may say that the associations who came to see me were all agreed that we should do our best, first of all, to improve the lot of the other disabled classes of the country for whom no provision whatsoever had been made. What we are doing tonight with regard to the age qualification is to put the blind now on the same footing as that on which we have put the disabled persons.

Under the Disabled Persons Act the qualifying age is 18, and now through these present amendments we are making provision for the blind to be treated the same from the point of view of age as we treat the other disabled under the disability legislation; so I think, now that we have both these disabled groups in this particular on the same footing, whatever consideration is given at some later date can be dealt with on equal terms, now that we are face to face with the amendment before the house at the present time.

On this side, Mr. Chairman, with the support of the house we have in the last five and a half years lowered the age from 40 to 21; now under this legislation it is lowered to 18. We have abolished provisions removing from aliens, Indians, Eskimos and inmates of mental hospitals the disabilities which they suffered under the legislation before these amendments came into effect. We have abolished provincial residence requirements. We have abolished provisions for recovery from estates. We have abolished provisions which existed until 1947 by which married couples who were both blind received only half their pensions. So in these and in countless other ways I think the administration has shown its concern and its desire to improve the welfare of the blind citizens of Canada.

There need be nothing else said on this occasion. When we reach the discussion stage of the bill we can go into some particulars already discussed, answer certain suggestions that have been made, and deal with the problem in a more specific way. But at this resolution stage I would want to join on behalf of the government with those who have taken part in the debate in noting the progress that has been made. Notwithstanding the criticism which may be levelled at what the government has done in this particular or in others, I think we may all say with conviction that every Canadian can feel proud that through this measure he is doing something to help those of his fellow citizens who bear the heavy handicap of blindness.

In time we can hope that medical science will prevent more people from losing their sight. We can be confident that new drugs and new skills will be developed to lead others back from the unending night of blindness; but those Canadians who are now without the faculty of sight and those who will lose it in the years ahead will continue, I know, to receive our admiration, our concern and our support. They can be sure of our unfailing and continuing help.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a brief word or two. First of all, I should like to congratulate the minister on the introduction of this legislation. It has already been stated that everybody is in agreement with it. I realize that at this time, in connection with the other legislation, it may not be possible to remove the means test entirely, but this is a step in the right direction. Perhaps a great many people in the country do not favour the removal of the means test in every phase of social security.

In this case I have had many resolutions sent to me from branches of the women's institute and various other organizations who favour the removal of the means test altogether. My own point of view is that when, some time in the future, financial conditions are such that the government feels able to remove the means test, the reason for doing so may very well be this. Since in this country equalization of opportunity is one of the principles on which the democratic way of life is based, and since the loss of a person's eyesight is the loss of one of his most valuable assets, a pension in a small way compensates a person for the loss of this valuable physical asset and helps to make up for the opportunities he would otherwise have enjoyed.

There is one suggestion I should like to make for the consideration of the minister, and it is this. It is my understanding that, for the purposes of primary and, as it is sometimes called, secondary education the facilities now in existence are quite adequate for the blind. However, for those who are extremely ambitious and who have superior intelligence—and as the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe has pointed out, many persons who are blind have a high degree of intelligence and, because of their disability, have a great deal of ambition—some type of facility should be provided to enable them to have books printed in braille in order that they may advance to university education.

I realize that it would be impossible for universities all over the country to have these books, as they are extremely costly. I suggest for the minister's consideration that possibly the national library might be enabled to provide books giving advanced information in the arts and sciences and in technical fields, and that these books in braille might be sent out on loan to the universities. Or as an alternative—although I think this is a less meritorious suggestion—possibly one university could be designated as the recipient or holder of these books, and blind persons desirous of obtaining a university education could go to that university.

Those are just suggestions. I hope the minister will take them into consideration.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I will take but a few minutes of the time of the house to make a few observations to the government regarding the resolution now before the house, and more particularly to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). Like all hon. members who have spoken before me, I wholeheartedly endorse this innovation and especially the resolution.

I will take the liberty—as I think this is a fitting occasion—of congratulating in a special way the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, which has played an important part in bringing considerable assistance to the unfortunate victims of blindness.

Like those who have spoken before me, I would ask the government whether it would not be possible to lower the age of entitlement to the pension from 18 to 16 years, as requested a few moments ago.

Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that between the ages of 16 and 18 is the time when a child is most in need of a pension, especially if he belongs to a large family. I might tell the minister that the constituency which I have the honour to represent is a working class constituency, with large families, several members of which are afflicted with this unfortunate disease.

May I therefore make the following suggestion? If to receive the family allowance a child has only to be born, or again if to receive the old age pension one has only to reach the age of 70, I fail to see why any blind person, of whatever age, could not receive the blind pension from the moment medical science declares that person to be blind. Even in the case of a child under 16 the blind pension could be paid immediately in lieu of the family allowance paid until then.

Mr. Chairman, I might perhaps be allowed to suggest something to the minister. Many are those—there are some in my riding and I would like in particular to submit one case to the minister—who are not truly blind in a medical sense. However, the weakness of their eyesight prevents them from being gainfully employed. Nobody wants to hire them. May I be permitted to refer to the case I just mentioned and point out to the minister that a young fellow in my riding, a member of the Association for the Blind and a recipient of their help, requested a pension but was found ineligible under the law as a blind person, his eyesight being better than the minimum by one or two tenths, so that he is no longer considered to be blind, no longer belongs to the association and is left without any help from them as well as from the government. He is therefore reduced to public beggary.

I urge the government, which has just made a step in the right direction, to take a close look at this act in order to see if it would not be possible to make medical exams not quite so strict, so that those who are blind but are not recognized as completely blind under the Blind Persons Act may get some assistance.

Once more I unreservedly congratulate the minister on the presentation of this resolution. It is indeed a great step in the right direction, and I hope that the suggestions which have been made by some members of the opposition will enable the minister to draft the bill so as to bring another measure of relief to those whom Providence has not favoured in that respect.

(Text):

Mr. Zaplitny: I have only a brief word I want to add, Mr. Chairman. I am, of course, in support of everything that has been said on this side of the house, and I do not need to repeat it. However, there is one phase of the legislation that has not been touched upon and to which I should like to refer, namely the residence qualification. I understand that at the present time it is required that the applicant must have lived in Canada ten years before the date of his application. I realize that there are similar provisions in our other social security legislation, but in this type of disability I believe there is a special case to consider.

When immigrants arrive in Canada they are obliged to pass a medical examination. If that examination is at all thorough and efficient their eyesight is tested. I believe it would be altogether justifiable to reduce that figure to five years. A while ago, when he was replying to some of the comments made in this chamber, the minister drew attention to the fact that Canadian citizens feel they would like to take an equal share in assisting their fellow citizens. After a person has been in Canada for five years he becomes a Canadian citizen if he has fulfilled all other qualifications, and I believe that would be the proper time at which to extend to that person the same rights and privileges that are extended to any other person in Canada.

I make a plea to the minister to consider the reduction of the residence qualification from ten years to five. There are many supporting arguments I could use in so urging, but I do not think it is necessary for me to do so. The minister is quite aware of the problem, and I can only hope he will give some consideration to the question before the bill is introduced in the house.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to take very much time, but I notice that no one from our part of the country has spoken in favour of the resolution. We are just as much in favour of the legislation as anyone else. I believe the minister should be commended, and if there had been others here from my own province and the maritimes generally I know they would have commended him for this amendment to the act. We have a school for the blind in Halifax.

I wish to concur in what has been said by other speakers this evening. I think the minister's explanation as to the age of qualification, which was one thing that was bothering me, is very satisfactory. I believe we should consider all people who have disabilities on equal terms. I think his explanation was satisfactory to those who felt that the age might have been reduced below 18, and that it is wise to deal with these people on the same terms as others.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Harris (for Mr. Martin) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 350, to amend the Blind Persons Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I announced before we adjourned at Easter, we shall begin the budget debate tomorrow. However, I said at that time that we would continue with it through this week. I should like to make an amendment to that, having in mind the fact that we did not complete the external affairs debate, as I expected we would, before we adjourned. Therefore the order of business this week will be the budget debate tomorrow and Wednesday. We will resume the external affairs debate Thursday afternoon and continue with it until it is completed.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.56 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 19, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CAMERON (NANAIMO)—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF SPEECH BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. I have in my hand a report from the Toronto Telegram of Saturday, April 16, 1955 which I should like to place on the record. It is headed "Trotskyites among M.P.'s says Harris", and reads in part as follows:

> There are Trotskyites among the C.C.F. members of parliament at Ottawa, finance minister Walter Harris told Liberals attending the annual meeting of the Toronto-York Liberal Association at the King Edward today.
> He said expulsion of Toronto members of the C.C.F. party charged with being Trotskyites should not be taken as an unusual happening. He suggested some C.C.F. M.P.'s might be expelled on similar grounds.
> The finance minister called his recent budget "a plain, ordinary Liberal budget", not "a fantasy of imagination or a stand-pat budget".

From consulting Hansard, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the minister has denied the accuracy of this report and of course, without hesitation, I accept his assurance on that score. Nevertheless, I cannot refrain from expressing my regret that he did not take advantage of the first opportunity he had to correct this false statement. When he was approached, I am told, by the man who reported the meeting, immediately following the meeting, and asked if he would care to elaborate on his statement that there were Trotskyites among the C.C.F. group, I think it is regrettable that the minister failed to take advantage of that opportunity to deny this false report and that for nearly 48 hours he permitted it to wend its slanderous trail back and forth across this country. I may say that I find it rather curious. I have been in public life for many years longer than has the Minister of Finance. For over 20 years, sir, I have spoken in public on every controversial question that has come before the country. My speeches have been widely reported. I have yet to be misquoted. It appears to be an occupational disease of Liberal cabinet ministers.

In the house yesterday, when challenged on this statement, the Minister of Finance took occasion to read extracts from a letter which I had written on behalf of a man called Stanton who was later expelled from the Ontario section of the party to which I belong, on a charge of being a Trotskyite. It is perfectly true that I wrote that letter on behalf of Paddy Stanton. I wrote it because I had known him for many years on the Pacific coast. I have in mind one particular occasion that I am going to call to the attention of the house because I think it will explain why I wrote such a letter.

The occasion to which I refer was one during the 1945 federal election campaign in the city of Prince Rupert when a gang of communist thugs attempted to break up my meeting. At that time, Mr. Speaker, you will recall that they were supporting the Liberal party, their leaders having been released on the unfortunate Canadian electorate by the Liberal government of that day for their own purposes. When this gang of communist thugs attempted to break up my meeting, this man Paddy Stanton, fool that he was, attempted to settle the matter with his fists.

It was such things that I had in mind when I acceded to his request that I would speak on his behalf before the Ontario convention of the C.C.F. or write on his behalf, as I was obliged to do. If, as it now appears, Paddy Stanton has, since the time I knew him on the Pacific coast, become a Trotskyite, and if, on account of that fact, he has to some extent betrayed my trust and delivered me to my enemies, I am still not sorry that I wrote that letter because, when you reach my time of life, you realize that such things as requital of past favours, loyalty, decency and honesty are more important than are even the most glittering political prizes. I want to say this now categorically, Mr. Speaker. I am not nor have I ever been a Trotskyite; I am not nor have I ever been a Trotskyite sympathizer; and anyone who states that I am is an unmitigated liar.

The C.C.F. is the only political party to which I have ever belonged. The democratic socialist principles of that party are the only political principles I have ever endorsed or supported. I want to say this. If anyone, by a combination of statements outside this chamber and references within this chamber, should ever impute to me the charge of being a Trotskyite or a Trotskyist sympathizer he would not only be an unmitigated liar but he would be an unprincipled scoundrel and a contemptible coward.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 349, respecting Sharp & Dohme (Canada) Ltd.—Mr. McIlraith.

IMMIGRATION

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF PREMIER OF NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration what right Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland has to say, as he is reported to have said on March 29, that certain persons giving certain information would get "the bum's rush" and if they were Germans they would be deported for things said in Newfoundland?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I do not know whether or not this is a proper question, but I do not happen to have seen the newspaper report to which the hon. member refers and I would not presume to interpret something I have never seen.

GRAIN

REPORTED REDUCTION IN CANADA'S SHARE OF WORLD MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister comment on the latest dominion bureau of statistics report which shows an alarming drop in Canada's share of the world wheat market? What action is the government taking to correct this serious situation?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question and also for sending me a copy of the Wheat Review. The situation is that Canadian export sales in the present crop year have been substantially higher than during the last crop year. These increased sales will, in due course, be reflected in higher export figures. Canada has been retaining her place in all her established markets and has indeed got an increased share in many of them. The United States has been exporting increased quantities of wheat as a result of special programs of subsidized exports, including sales for local currencies, and this is one of the reasons for the change in the relative proportion of world export business. Nevertheless, Canada is retaining her place in commercial markets, and there is every reason to believe that we will continue to do so.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the minister is aware that each of the main exporting countries of the world, other than Canada, has increased its exports of wheat during this period?

An hon. Member: Gloom caster.

Mr. Winters: I know the hon. member is referring to the figures in the Wheat Review to which I have already referred. They are figures for some time back. I refer to the current situation in which Canada's sales are higher.

REQUEST FOR MOVEMENT BY RAIL AS RESULT OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the lakehead grain handlers' strike, have any plans been made to move eastward by rail the large number of box cars that are sitting there loaded with grain?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have no direct knowledge of any such arrangement being made. All I can do is emphasize what the Minister of Labour has already said, that is that every effort is being made to settle the strike at as early a date as possible.

REQUEST TO MAKE SELKIRK WHEAT AVAILABLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. What steps are the government taking to enable farmers with surplus Selkirk wheat to sell it immediately, thus making it available for seeding this spring?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Complaints along the lines of that just mentioned by the hon. member came to the attention of our department last week. As hon. members know, there is no restriction on the sale of Selkirk wheat in Canada, but it cannot be sold outside of Canada. The department immediately got in touch with the provincial departments of agriculture in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. They, in turn, through their agricultural representatives are endeavouring to help along the sale of this wheat by getting in touch with the seller as well as those who wish to buy this wheat. I would tell my hon. friend that if he has received complaints of this type he should write to the complainants and tell them to get in touch with their agricultural representative immediately and the wheat will be made available to those who wish to buy it.

AIRPORTS

HALIFAX—COMMENCEMENT OF WORK ON NEW CIVILIAN AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister say if work has commenced on the proposed new civilian airport for Halifax? If not, when is it likely to get under way?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): No work can be started on the new airport for Halifax until the necessary land has been acquired by the city. It is understood that the city is at present acting on this matter. Meanwhile certain preliminary survey work is under way, and included in this year's estimates is an amount which would permit the department to initiate at least land clearing work when advice has been received from the city that the land has been acquired.

TAXATION

AUTOMOBILES—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF REPRESENTATIONS OF MANUFACTURERS FOR REFUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has he received representations from the federation of automobile dealers and also from various provincial automobile dealers associations asking for reconsideration of the decision announced by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech that no rebates would be granted to automobile dealers in respect of automobiles on hand? In view of the fact that the loss to automobile dealers will be some $3,150,000, would the minister give reconsideration to this question to the end that the dealers should not have to absorb such a loss?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): It is not the intention of the Department of National Revenue to make any refunds consequent upon the budget changes. While I have not personally received any representations from the automobile dealers, I do not doubt that, as is usually the case, representations have been made to the department. The section of the budget speech referring to the practice of not accepting claims for refund is one of long standing. Prior to the time that this notice was given in budget speeches, manufacturers were in considerable doubt whether they could take back goods on which the higher rates of tax had been applied and either ship the goods out again at the reduced tax rates or replace them with other goods on which the lower rates would be applied. The notice given by the Minister of Finance is given in order to prevent the return of great quantities of goods merely for the sake of benefiting from the lower rates of tax applicable after the budget. No similar situation arises when taxes are increased because those persons having goods on hand at lower rates or where no taxes had hitherto been imposed are quite satisfied not to raise the question.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CHAPUT CASE—QUESTION OF FEDERAL INTERVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dufresne: Was the Department of Justice granted permission by the Supreme Court of Canada to intervene in the case of Chaput v. Romain et al.? If so, is the department intervening to protect or deny the rights of the provinces to administer justice in accordance with article 92, sections 14 and 16, of the British North America Act?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): If my hon. friend will look at the recent back copies of Hansard, he will see that a question almost identical with that which he has just asked was asked by the leader of the C.C.F. party and has already been replied to.

Mr. Dufresne: I have referred to the question asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the answer given does not answer the question I am asking today. I should like the minister to give me a better answer than the one he has just made.

REPORTED LAY-OFFS AT WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Is the Minister of Transport in a position today to answer the question I asked yesterday about lay-offs in the C.N.R. shops at Winnipeg?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): No.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REPORTED LAY-OFFS AT LEASIDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Transport if he is now in a position to answer the question I asked yesterday with regard to the closing of the C.N.R. car repair shops at Leaside?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I regret to say that the answer is no.

INQUIRY AS TO SUPER CONTINENTAL SERVICE STOPPING AT BRANDON NORTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he indicate whether the Canadian National Railways Super Continental service going into operation on April 24 will stop at Brandon North?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Canadian National Railways advises that the Super Continental will not stop at Brandon North. As has been announced by the railway, the schedule of this new train was drawn up to provide a faster transcontinental service and at the same time arrange convenient arrival and departure hours at intermediate stops to the extent possible under the new schedule. I might add that the Continental Limited will continue to stop at Brandon North.

REPORTED LAY-OFFS AT BROCKVILLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hayden Stanton (Leeds): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that there are 38 men about to be laid off at the Brockville railway divisional centre, and does he not think this is a very inopportune time for these men to be laid off—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Stanton:—when already more than a thousand men are reported out of work in Leeds county?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I received notice of this question just before entering the house, and I shall try to give the hon. member an answer as soon as I can.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Transport. When he prepares his answer to the questions that have been asked regarding C.N.R. lay-offs at Winnipeg and other places, will he take this as a supplementary question. How does he square the lay-offs now taking place with his statement in the house on February 7 that no further staff lay-offs were anticipated?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF GRAIN HANDLERS AT LAKEHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour in connection with the grain handlers' strike. Has he had any report from Mr. Taylor, the negotiator, and what is the present position? Has a settlement been reached between the strikers and the employers?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I have no further report than that given yesterday, except to say that Mr. Taylor is meeting both parties to the dispute today.

REPORTED UNEMPLOYMENT CONDITION AT SEVEN ISLANDS, QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Has the Minister of Labour received word from C.I.O. authorities of the serious situation now existing in Seven Islands where more than 500 immigrants have to beg their daily bread?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Where were you?

Mr. Dufresne: If so, are any steps being taken to help these immigrants to find work or give them some assistance?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question was answered yesterday. While I am on my feet, and since I suppose we are at the end of the question period and are about to embark upon the orders of the day, may I say that after a few days of recess and recognizing that there were several questions in which members were interested, I have been rather lenient yesterday and today. However, I shall have to return to my old habits. I want to say now that, starting tomorrow, I will not allow hon. members to make speeches under the pretext of asking questions.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

REPORTED AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS WITH RESPECT TO RETIREMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance? Have the Public Service Superannuation Act regulations been amended to provide for the retirement of civil servants at the age of 60 at the discretion of deputy departmental heads? If so, can the minister say whether representatives of the civil service organizations were consulted before such an amendment was made?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I will cover that eventually when we get into the budget debate.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDO-CHINA—INQUIRY AS TO WORK OF CANADIAN COMMISSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the recent return to Canada of Brigadier Sherwood Lett, the head of our commission to Indo-China, is the minister in a position to tell the house to what extent our mission there has been permitted to carry on its work, what progress has been made and what still remains to be done?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have already dealt with that subject in the statement I made on external affairs in which I covered to some extent the work of the commissions in Indo-China. There may be another opportunity when the external affairs debate is resumed when I can add to what I said on the earlier occasion.

TRADE

OIL—REPLY OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT CONCERNING RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is yet in a position to answer the question of which he took notice yesterday. In repeating the question I would point out that there is a statement in the press today from Washington which definitely refers to the voluntary control of the movement of oil into the United States. This report, issuing from the state department, indicates their acceptance of a definite plan of voluntary control from companies here. For that reason I do think we are entitled to the information in this house which is apparently accepted as a matter of course there.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Possibly I might say a word in reply to this question. As the hon. gentleman knows, and as the house knows, a note was sent to the United States government on this question and that note was tabled in this house. There has been no written reply from the United States government to that note, though we have been pressing for such a reply almost daily and have expressed to the United States government, through the state department, our anxiety to get it without delay. We have had an expression of regret from the authorities in Washington that they have not yet completed their reply.

As I indicated before the Easter recess, we have received an oral reply from the United States government pending the receipt of a written one. So, Mr. Speaker, I can say that the state department, in reply to our representations of March 8, have informed us orally that the executive branch of the United States government does not favour legislation to implement the findings of the cabinet committee on energy supplies and resources policy on the level of oil imports. This was made clear in the testimony given by the secretary of state to the Senate finance committee in Washington last month. With regard to the recommendations of the cabinet committee in Washington we have been told, orally again, that the state department is hopeful that the policy enunciated in the report of the cabinet committee can be implemented in such a way as to give recognition to the factors which the Canadian government regards as important in this situation. That is all I can say now, Mr. Speaker, but I still hope to be in a position, tomorrow or the next day, to table a written reply to our earlier representation.

Mr. Drew: No one is more anxious than I am to avoid anything that would embarrass us in our relationship with the government of the United States, but I would point out that the press report from Washington gave the very information which the minister has now given to us in the first part of his statement, that is the reference to the voluntary control of oil which is used as a basis for the argument by the state department that there should not be legislation establishing a formal restriction. This information is contained in the press today as coming from the state department.

Now, since the government thought that it was sufficiently important for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to read the note in full and explain the action of the government in regard to their concern about this voluntary restriction, it does seem to me that matters that are being placed in the open by the state department in Washington might well be available to us here in this house quite as early as they are to the public of the United States and to ourselves through the channel of the press.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Drew: I simply repeat that this is a subject that has been raised by the government and I think, consistent with the high degree of co-operation we wish to establish with the government of the United States, we should seek their co-operation in obtaining information which is not being held back in Washington.

POSTAL SERVICE

BURNABY, B. C.—INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Acting Postmaster General whether he has seen fit to reverse the decision of the Postmaster General concerning the new postal service in Burnaby and, if so, has he done so after consultation with one or both of the members of parliament for that area?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Postmaster General): I have reversed no decision. The matter has been drawn to my attention, and I am giving it consideration.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): I should like to answer a question asked yesterday on the orders of the day by the hon. member for Yorkton concerning when farmers may expect payment under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. In reply I may say that to date approximately 100,000 farmers have been paid over $23 million in awards with respect to the 1954 crop. There has been some delay in making payments due to the fact that the crop damage was more widespread than at any time in the past, a late harvest, and in a number of cases applications were received late. The largest number of awards ever paid in one year in the past was slightly over 85,000 as compared to 100,000 to date for the crop year ending July 31, 1955, which would indicate that the administration is doing everything possible to expedite the payment of awards on receipt of applications.

[Mr. Drew.]

FERRY SERVICE

YARMOUTH-BAR HARBOR—USE OF FERRY "BLUENOSE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Will the minister say what steps are now being taken to improve upon the tentative date of the end of July which he announced in the house on April 6 for the inauguration of the scheduled run between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor of the ferry Bluenose. If so, could he now say what probable date might be anticipated?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, every effort is being made to accelerate the program for putting the Bluenose into service, including arrangements with the shipbuilder to operate overtime and night shifts. But I would not like to make any more definite statement at this time than I gave on April 6 with regard to the inauguration of the service.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 5, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it is two weeks today since budget day. The tumult and the shouting have pretty well died down, and I think people have had a chance to see what the budget really does amount to. I feel that in a sense it has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. I hope the minister enjoyed the applause while it lasted. It must be very pleasant to be acclaimed as the little friend—I was going to say of all the world, but I do not mean that. I mean a very fractional amount of the world, namely those who were benefited by the budget. Everyone's heart seems to respond instinctively to tax reductions; but it is only as people have looked further and have found the real situation that they have realized how thin it all is.

They are gradually realizing another thing, too, and that is that the origin of it is unsound, namely that it is borrowed. It does not come because the government has been making savings. It comes because the government has borrowed money, and thus laid a greater burden on the backs of the taxpayers.

I think that the first joy and enthusiasm of the married man with two children and $2,500 a year must have been chilled a great deal when he found that, so far as this year is concerned, he would have four cents a week more to take home to his family. Well, there will not be much excitement over that.

And so far as the corporation taxes are concerned, the reduction from 49 per cent to 47 per cent is of course a move in the right direction; but it is only a trifling move. And neither shareholders nor consumers can hope to get much benefit from it.

But the thing that puzzles me and continues to puzzle me about this budget is that I cannot understand it. I cannot understand the minister's reasoning. The minister certainly puzzled me very much by the speech he made in Montreal last November; but during the last two weeks he has puzzled me still more, because it seemed to me that he gave reasons for doing one thing, and then did exactly the opposite.

I wish to support that by quoting from what the minister said. These were his words:

> I am sure that all will agree that when employment and incomes are high and the economy expanding at a normally healthy rate, we should fully balance our budget with a modest amount for the reduction of debt.

I think everyone will agree with that. He then went on—and I call attention of hon. members closely to this:

> Conversely when the rate of economic advance slackens and the economy as a whole is not fully employed, a moderate budgetary deficit should be no cause for alarm.

I call the attention of hon. members to that phrase "when the rate of economic advance slackens". Now, the minister spent some considerable time in underlining the fact that the economy was not slackening, but that it was quickening. His whole budget was based upon a big pickup, a pickup that seems extravagant. His whole argument was that the economy was quickening and not slackening. Therefore, having said that, how could he turn around, with a quickening economy—a very substantial quickening, with almost extravagant hopes—and nevertheless indulge in this deficit.

The only reason I can give—and while the minister denies it and I shall read his denial in a moment—the only reason I can give is that in spite of the fact that he did not like to mention the unpleasant word, he really did this because of the hope that he might in some way help unemployment. He did not say that, because it was not down his alley to say that things were not good. His whole line was to say that things were good.

According to the Canadian Press he said, in an interview after the budget, that "he had not cut personal income taxes and sliced 2 per cent off corporation taxes to stimulate the economy, indicating he did not feel the economy necessarily needed stimulating". That is quoted from the Canadian Press.

Now, taking the minister's speech, and subsequent interviews, as I say the matter to me is a complete puzzle. It is inevitable I think to assume that the cuts were made, among other reasons, to help unemployment by stimulating the economy. But the minister denies that. He says that he just felt "taxes were too high." Of course they were too high. But there is a proper way to reduce taxes, and there is an improper way. And he took the improper way, rather than the proper one. The proper way is to reduce expenditure. But of course that sort of thing is not dreamed of in the philosophy of this government.

There is another way; but I repeat he reduced taxes because he felt they were too high. In other words, it was a popularity measure. According to the minister's own statement, his only reason for doing so was to please the people. It was just a popularity measure.

Now, is it possible that he felt that, if he gave any other reason for it than his desire to please the taxpayer, he would lose their gratitude because they might feel it was not being done for them? However that may be, we have this curious situation, what someone has called an ambidextrous budget. Certainly I felt that the right hand did not know what the left hand was doing. I was glad to find this statement made by a responsible journalist, because it expressed my feeling and gave me further justification for my own belief.

I wondered if something was wrong. I have often wondered if there was something wrong with my head, and I wondered if there was something wrong with me, that I could not understand. But when I found that many other people held the same views as I do I came to the conclusion that my views were justified.

However much kindness there was in the minister's great heart when he reduced taxes, we cannot ignore the fact that a deficit has results. Whether he knew that or not, a deficit has results. And we cannot get away from that fact. One of those results is to provide some stimulus, a very tiny stimulus, but some stimulus, by increasing purchasing power. But apparently the minister cannot face admitting that, because to admit that the economy needed a shot in the arm was all against what he had said earlier—that there was a substantial pickup. I am glad to say it looks as if there was; but you cannot have it both ways.

No serious person can ignore the fact that there are fiscal, financial implications; and we taxpayers who carry the load are entitled to ask the minister some questions. Let me set out here an imaginary conversation between the minister and a reasonably intelligent taxpayer.

The taxpayer asks: How much money did you take last year?

The minister: About $4,107 million.

The taxpayer: And how much money did you spend in addition?

The minister: $194 million.

The taxpayer: That means that you borrowed $194 million which we shall have to repay.

The minister: Yes.

The taxpayer: And how much are you going to take from us this year?

The minister: About $4,202 million.

The taxpayer: And how much of a deficit are you expecting?

The minister: $160 million.

The taxpayer: Will that be borrowed, too?

The minister: Yes, unless there is a very pronounced pickup.

The taxpayer: Tell me about this deficit. Does this mean that $160 million is borrowed and put into circulation which will have to be repaid, and has it the effect that the money is spent twice; that is, the government spends it and the taxpayer spends it, because tax reduction does not come from government savings but from borrowing?

The minister: Yes.

The taxpayer: Well, then, as I see it, you are trying to give the economy a shot in the arm by reducing taxes.

The minister: I made the tax reduction because I thought taxes were too high.

I have used the minister's own words, and I hope it will affect others as it does me, that he is evading the whole issue. In so far as I am concerned I have to confess to the minister that it leaves me completely puzzled. He left me puzzled in Montreal last November, and I have been puzzled ever since, and the speech which he made two weeks ago did not take away that puzzlement; it really added to it.

Mr. Harkness: Probably he is puzzled himself.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. Macdonnell: I have wondered whether that was so, but I prefer to put it in this way, that the minister is just teasing us because an intelligent child really could not accept this view. And of course, the other thing is that the minister is really in an impossible position. He cannot admit there is any need of improving the economy. So apparently, according to the interview which he had, he just said it had nothing to do with that because that was not necessary.

What are we to say about the claims that we have had from so many ministers that everything is all right when you have the Minister of Finance sneaking in behind their backs and doing something which torpedoed all the things which they have been saying? Of course, Mr. Speaker, if the relief had come from government economies how differently we would have felt. We would have felt that perhaps at long last the spending spree was over. We would have hoped that some of the economies that we have been so generously suggesting all these years could be made. But the minister tells us no, that the tax reduction comes out of borrowings, or that only a miracle could prevent the borrowings and that would be such a pickup in the economy as no one has a right to expect. In other words, it is just a deferred tax.

I have referred, Mr. Speaker, to the thin gruel which is given to those who were the beneficiaries under this generosity of the minister. It is a popularity budget. I suggest, by the way, that this popularity may have implications inside the Liberal party as well as outside.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Somebody is preaching for a call.

Mr. Macdonnell: There is another point which enters into this and that is that there are a lot of people who do not benefit from this. That is not the whole story either.

Mr. Rowe: It may be the last budget.

Mr. Macdonnell: You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that this budget divides the Canadian taxpayers into two groups. First of all, there are the beneficiaries, but secondly there are the people who are not beneficiaries but who are going to pay. Everybody is going to pay. Not everybody gets a handout but everybody is going to pay, and the people who are less well off and who get nothing are going to pay for the relief of the others. That strikes me as an odd idea. I do not know whether the minister thought of that; I was rather pleased when I thought of it. Maybe it was thought of; maybe they just decided to let the poor people tough it out. They have had it tough enough, anyway; perhaps they can tough it out further.

Let me recapitulate. The minister says that in an expanding economy we should have a surplus, and then he tells us that the economy is expanding. He says further that in a slackening economy we may have a deficit. But as I have pointed out already, he has made it clear that the economy is not slackening, and, ignoring his own reasoning so far as I am able to follow it, ignoring the clear reasoning he has given us, he then plunges into a deficit. I shall have something more to say about that.

You cannot face both ways forever. You may be able to do it on budget night and get away with it, but it catches up with you.

Mr. Nowlan: They have been doing it for a long time.

Mr. Macdonnell: I said "forever". None of us thinks they are going to be there forever, though they have been there a long while.

Mr. Fleming: Too long.

Mr. Macdonnell: The press is catching up. It is interesting to note that a loyal, stout-hearted supporter of the government—I think I am describing them correctly—the Toronto Star, ignores the minister's exhilaration and evidently feels, indeed it calls, the outlook uncertain. It is apparently not filled with optimism as the minister is, but it has a good deal of hesitation and doubt, and it says this:

> Mr. Harris' maiden speech will come as a disappointment to the many Canadians who hoped it would stimulate production and reduce unemployment.

You see, the Star is apparently bold enough to believe that everything is not quite perfect and would like to see the economy stimulated. It is not like the minister. He does not want to stimulate it. It does not need stimulation, but the Star apparently thinks it does. I continue to read from the Star:

> Taken as a whole it is really an unimaginative stand-pat budget that in itself will provide little relief from our present economic problems.

You see, the Star is not convinced; it does not regard it as a simple reduction in taxation; it does not think that it is nothing but vote-catching, whatever others think. Whether the minister thinks it or not, whether the minister admits it or not, it has other results as well. As a matter of fact, the Star pays the minister the compliment of taking him seriously and it says, if things are really in a bad way—and I feel there is something in this—if things are in as bad a way as the Star thinks they are, then there might be an argument for their suggestion of a much larger deficit, though I do not agree with it. Nevertheless, if the minister started out with the view of the situation that the Star has he might quite probably have reached their conclusion. However, the minister can comfort himself with the Free Press of Winnipeg. They really have come through in grand style. I remember very well reading this because I have a great respect for the Free Press, when they are right, and I think this was right. I read this with great respect last December. The Free Press said:

> The fiscal discipline of balancing the budget cannot be abandoned. To urge anything of the kind is the very depth of Conservative irresponsibility.

That was said in December, and now we are in April, Mr. Speaker. The Free Press swallows the dose. It troubles them a bit. They are not too enthusiastic about the budget. They have little postern gates left open where they can get through later on if it turns out to be not a great success; but nevertheless, by and large, the Free Press gives it a kind of qualified blessing. They think it is not a bad budget. As a matter of fact, they do a little twisting and squirming and they make themselves believe it is not a deficit budget at all. I do not know how you can do it. It is in some kind of higher synthesis that I have not been able to reach.

The Star's words of course underline a very important question of fiscal policy which ought to be most seriously considered, particularly from the point of view of two groups in the community: first of all, all those on fixed incomes who cannot protect themselves against rising costs; and secondly, and perhaps at the present moment particularly, the agricultural community who are squeezed between the upper and nether millstones. Their costs are certainly not going down. I am afraid there is every reason to believe that it will require an effort to keep their prices where they are now.

If we are going to be serious people we must face the fact that there is no doubt whatever about the tendency of a deficit. The tendency of a deficit, indeed the actual effect of a deficit, is to create additional purchasing power through borrowed money. The minister cannot play fast and loose with hundreds of millions of dollars and say that it is going to have no effect on anything. Something is going to happen. Deficits mean higher purchasing power with a tendency toward higher prices.

The minister will say, in fact the governor of the Bank of Canada said the other day, that the tendency will be for unemployment to offset this tendency, and no doubt that is true. Nevertheless the tendency is there. This business of borrowing money is like taking the first drink, although I know the minister has not done that yet. You never know quite where you will stop.

We are at the end of what might be called fifteen years of boom times during which the government came along year after year and told us about the buoyant economy. How pleased they were to tell us of that. How good it has been for all of us that it was buoyant. Of course it was inevitable that they should take the credit for it. They were carried along on the crest of the wave and perhaps they hardly realized what was happening. But they took the credit and now it may be that they are going to have to have a reckoning. It may be that they are going to have to give a real accounting. Certainly it is relevant to ask how it is that after fifteen years of the kind of times we all remember, after the scores of billions of dollars that the government has taken from us, why after all this is it that with the economy quickened the picture is given to us by the minister of hundreds of millions which we will now have to pay by way of deficit. That is a question which I hope will be answered. I do not think the minister has answered it yet.

Reference has been made to the gross national product. The government has pretty nearly reached the stage when it almost holds itself able to control the gross national product, and I shall say a word about that later. If the gross national product does not behave as it is supposed to, then it is unfortunate, as the deficit could easily grow quite a lot.

I wonder what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the former Minister of Finance would say if they were here. They had some strong things to say a couple of years ago about deficits when our party was proposing to reduce taxes, not through deficits, although we were accused of that by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He said that we had deficits in mind and it was natural for him to say that because after all there was nothing in his experience which would suggest that you should reduce taxes by making economies. In his experience you only reduce taxes when you are on a rising economy, when prices are high, when you have hundreds of millions of dollars more than you expected by reason of these high prices, and you are able to make certain tax reductions. As my colleague says, they were made on the eve of an election.

It is natural for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to feel that anyone who was going to reduce taxes was not going to do it by saving, but would do it by some other method. So the minister who did not think much of deficits accused us, quite unfairly, of having it in mind. As reported in the Globe and Mail of June 25, 1953, the minister said:

> Deficit financing was just as dangerous for countries as it was for families who spent more than they earned.

Our good friend the former minister of finance also said in a broadcast, referring to borrowing money and running up the national debt—it was natural perhaps that he should say this because he had the delightful experience of being in office during a rising price economy and was able to show surpluses—and I think this is quite interesting:

> This is in a very real sense buying your votes with your children's earnings for quite obviously your children will be paying that extra debt.

What a pity that those two ministers did not tell the present minister that his tax reductions should come from economies. It is too bad that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not here today so that we might know just what he thinks about it. Perhaps we might get a judgment from the supreme court bench on it.

Is the government so bankrupt that in the face of difficulties that we all know we are facing now its only expedient is the old-fashioned one of debasing the currency? Borrowing is so seductive, and is a practice which should be closely watched, particularly, as I say, by the fixed income group and by farmers.

I think it is important to look behind the minister's words for a moment. He has not really taken us into his confidence. I am afraid that from the way he speaks we have had a sort of brushoff. Let us look for a moment at the gross national product figures on which he bases his calculations. Incidentally we should remind ourselves that the gross national product is a funny figure; it does not mean business done, it merely means goods produced. Conceivably you might have a terrific gross national product and still be very badly off if you could not sell it and deal with it. Of course it is a rough and ready guide because we do sell most of what we produce. But do not let us forget that the gross national product figure may contain, as it does now, millions of dollars of goods which remain unsold.

In 1953 the gross national product was $24·4 billion; in 1954 it had come down to $24 billion; and in 1955 we find the minister basing his budget on $25·25 billion, and he hopes it will reach a rate of $26 billion by the end of the year. That hope of course will be based on a bit of pump priming, if I may use that phrase in the minister's hearing.

We have a brand new way of setting taxes and making our estimates. We are doing it according to what we think the level should be rather than what we expect it to be. In other words, we take $25.25 billion and then set up a background where we would like to have this other figure of $26 billion. Then we go pretty far in just assuming that it is going to happen. I am reminded of a quotation from "Alice in Wonderland" that was used the other day in this chamber:

"When I use a word," Humpty-Dumpty said, "it means just what I choose it to mean—neither more nor less."

But the government has gone a long way beyond that when it says, "Things will be what we want them to be." I suggest that this is something worth knowing. As was pointed out to me the night of the budget speech when the minister was referring to tobacco and liquor, the minister does not drink or smoke but he surely does gamble. Everyone hopes that he will succeed but we would prefer that there had been a more reasoned approach. We would have liked to have some more reason for the course which we are following.

When I spoke last I complained that there was nothing in this budget for the unemployed. The minister has underlined this by saying that the tax reduction was not to stimulate the economy. I agree that the stimulus is very slight indeed. I understand that talking about the unemployed is something which one has to do with some discretion. I understand that it can easily be considered unpatriotic to refer to unpleasant things and I understand that a distinguished representative of the Liberal party has said this in public. I hope that I shall not go too far. Certainly the facts at the present moment, including those that have just come in, with regard to employment are not only unpalatable but are to me alarming.

I find it alarming that we have seven times as much unemployment as there is in Britain. That is taking the lower figure. That is not taking the large figure but is taking the figure of those without jobs and seeking work. Here are the last figures. In February the figures were as follows: In Britain, 281,000 against 379,000 in Canada without jobs and seeking work. Let us remember that the labour force in England is something like four times as large as our own. In March Britain has gone down from 281,000 to 269,000 and we have gone up from 379,000 to 401,000.

As I say, I find that to be alarming. Yet apparently by saying that I may be doing something unpatriotic and perhaps I should not say it. In any event an extremely civilized gentleman who is a lawyer and who often speaks to briefs, and who I think in this case was speaking to a government brief—I am referring to Mr. Duncan MacTavish, president of the national Liberal federation—said this and I read it with astonishment. He is a gentleman whom I know well. He is a highly civilized citizen. As I said, I believe this never would have been said by him except in speaking to a brief. I would hazard a guess that he did not compose these words at all. But I shall read them because to me they are almost unbelievable. They seem to me to show what can happen to people—people we like, people we know—who have had power for a long time. I read what Mr. MacTavish said:

But mischief committed in the guise of free speech—

Could I repeat that phrase, Mr. Speaker? This was said at a meeting of the national Liberal federation:

But mischief committed in the guise of free speech which results in serious damage to the common welfare—

I stop there, Mr. Speaker. That is interesting because you must find out who judges the damage. That of course begs the whole question. The damage is to be estimated by your political opponents, apparently; and if you say anything they do not like, then that is damage to the community and you must be stopped. Now I will read all of it. I will read it right through:

But mischief committed in the guise of free speech which results in serious damage to the common welfare escapes the punishment it deserves until and unless the public withdraws its support.

You see, in the long run the common sense and the good judgment of the citizenry prevail. We are saved, apparently, until the next election. Actually they are not going to do anything to us, I think, until the next election. That is something, and I suppose we should be thankful for it.

This to me is such an astounding statement —I repeat the word "astounding", and I try to use words carefully—that I can only illustrate, match or talk about it with a rather astounding illustration which I have here. This comes from the brave parliamentary days of the eighteenth century. As we all recall, in those days members were members. They owned their constituencies and they were not, as we are, courtiers of democracy. They did not have to trudge from door to door, somewhat humbly, as we do. This letter will indicate the delightful position in which they found themselves and which we may so well envy.

This is a letter from an M.P. by the name of Anthony Henley. It is in answer to a protest from his constituents about the excise act. That will sound familiar to the minister. Bear in mind that this was a pocket borough which Mr. Henley represented before the reform bill more than a century ago. The letter reads as follows:

> Gentlemen:
> I received yours and am surprised at your insolence in troubling me about the Excise. You know what I very well know, that I bought you, and by God I am determined to sell you. And I know, what perhaps you do not think I know, you are now selling yourselves to somebody else. And I know what you do not know, that I am buying another borough. May God's curse light on you all.

Mr. Pearson: Would the hon. gentleman read the last two lines of that letter?

Mr. Macdonnell: I will leave that as a special perquisite of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). It becomes somewhat personal and I do not think it is suitable for this house.

I want to repeat again that the minister went out of his way to underline the fact that his budget was not intended to stimulate the economy. Oh, no; no nonsense of that kind; it did not need stimulating. Therefore that is equivalent to saying that the minister was not taking steps for the unemployed. I believe that he was not taking us into his confidence, that they were somewhere in his mind but that he did not feel quite free to talk about it. When I say this I have in mind these figures, and particularly the last figures which are worse than ever and which seem to me to be just a disgrace to us all, particularly the fact that we should have seven times as much unemployment as there is in England.

The unemployed are not forgotten citizens, but I am sure they must sometimes almost feel themselves to be rejected citizens, casualties of the industrial army, frightened men and women with cold bodies and hungry stomachs, as my colleague from Hamilton West said, who are afraid of what is going to happen to them.

Let us look back to what this government has done and has not done. We all remember the brave words of 1945 and the spring of 1946. They were words of hope; they were words not merely of economic significance but words of hope, sympathy and understanding. But apparently today the expression of real concern is left to us in the opposition. The government apparently is concerned with one thing, namely to try to slide from under. That is the only way I have been able to explain to myself what is happening. It is true that last September the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) used words which were the absolute antithesis of that. Indeed, they went so far that I cannot help wondering whether perhaps, being in his own bailiwick at that time, he may have had a little bit of, shall I say, adventitious enthusiasm which prompted him to go a little bit farther than he would have gone in more serious moments. The Prime Minister said this:

> We have a country where there should be work for everybody and if we are not smart enough to organize the economy of the nation to provide work for everybody, we are incompetent.

Those are extremely strong words. Since then I think it is true to say that there has been nothing but ignominious retreat. The attitude of the government since then, as compared with that statement, is as far removed from it as the east is from the west. It is hard now to remember the clarion call of last September or even to think that it was made. Since then we have had nothing except a feeble little toot.

Mr. Harkness: We have had increasing incompetence.

Mr. Macdonnell: We have had an attitude of detachment. The unemployed are our fellow citizens. While we here in this house cannot deal with things in a sentimental way, regardless of business and regardless of financial considerations, nevertheless there is such a thing as an attitude of mind which I am sure will have its effect on our unfortunate fellow citizens. It has this effect, I know, on those who work most closely with them, namely, the social service workers. While they are often regarded as too sentimental, in my own family and elsewhere I happen to have close contact with them and I would say they are a very intelligent, wise group of men and women who do not deal only in sentimentality. When I read their memorandum on unemployment in greater Toronto I read something which it seems to me must be gall and wormwood to the unemployed. This is a memorandum which I received from Toronto and it has to do with the attitude of governments. I cannot help feeling sure one of the things that affect the unemployed most is that they are the unwanted people. They are tossed from one area of government to another. The memorandum reads:

> The federal government maintains that it has met the main need through unemployment insurance; that constitutionally the responsibility for any residual program rests with the provinces and there is no evidence that the problem is beyond the capacities of the provinces.
> The provincial government tells us that assistance to the employable unemployed is a federal responsibility. They refer to the proposals made by the federal government in 1945.

I shall also have occasion to refer to them.

> They also contend that they lack the financial capacity to meet the problem. The government of Ontario stresses the value of centralizing in one administration responsibility for both employment and unemployment.

The municipalities take the view that municipal revenues from property are unsuitable for meeting this need. They feel that it is unfair to the property owner to carry a responsibility which should be shared by all citizens. However, the city of Toronto has recently stated its willingness to share the cost of relief assistance and the services necessary in connection therewith with the federal and provincial governments on a 40-40-20 basis. There are twelve other municipalities in the greater Toronto area, some of which may not find it financially possible to enter into such an agreement.

As I said, and I do not wish to say this in any personal way, the question of real concern for the unemployed seems to have been left to us. When we talk with the government we seem to get into a world of statistics. Human beings seem to be remote shadows. How different it would be if the government were able to make real savings and to assist the provinces and the municipalities. After all, unemployment insurance is only a very partial solution. As we watched the government earlier in the session, as we noted the blank face they turn to all requests regarding unemployment, as we noted the ever more and more rapid retreat of the Prime Minister, as we listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), we all thought that action was being saved for the budget. We felt that the government would not dare to leave things as they were, that the budget would grapple with the situation. Well, we were wrong.

Here we have the budget and there is no report or explanation on this aspect of our affairs at all. As I said a moment ago, we have roughly seven times the proportion of unemployment in Britain. Why have we this plague, this disease? Is it want of flexibility? In the pioneer days people were free to go and expected to go across the country, if necessary, looking after themselves. But we have made it difficult, if not impossible, by our complicated machinery to move from one place to another. If a man goes to another municipality he may deprive himself of his rights to assistance.

Are we going to have to wait for the report of the new commission to be set up? Is that to be the intellectual answer to this intellectual bankruptcy that faces us so far? I am not going to sneer at the commission. I think there is a good deal to be said for having an outside view come and explore situations which are being handled by civil servants, however good they may be. I think there is an argument for that. On the other hand, I remember that a most high sounding committee was set up at the beginning of the war which was never allowed to do much. I think its days were numbered from the first day it was appointed because I doubt very much if the civil servants ever intended that the committee should be effective.

What about the younger people? As I said a moment ago, it is much more difficult for them to move about the country as they could in simpler and more pioneer days. We have the bitter complaint, which I myself believe, that there is injurious overlapping between the citizenship and immigration and labour departments in respect of placements. I believe this is true, and I put it up to the ministers concerned to tell us the whole story frankly.

I can find no sense in the government's attitude of wait and see. Have they dug down into the basic causes? Have they probed maladjustment city by city, industry by industry? I know of no evidence. We have not had it in the house.

In the house we have really had irrelevant generalities. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that business is good. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) hopes for the best. The Prime Minister, at the national Liberal federation meeting, spoke of "woes" that were "temporary". That will not comfort the unemployed. They may very well say that life is temporary too. No reasoned hope has been held out. Various questions enter the mind. Do we need higher skills? I talked last night to a manufacturer who pointed out to me the extraordinary need of increasing the number of people with higher skills if we are to meet competition. The suggestion has even been made that, as a temporary measure no doubt, we should keep children in school longer in order to give them higher skills. There would be difficulties of accommodation there and maybe it is not practical.

I am just throwing out these suggestions because when we have such a situation confronting us it seems to me that everything should be tried. If everything is being tried, all I can say is that the House of Commons has not been advised. I might refer to the debate on unemployment long enough to say that I was amazed by the negation on the government side. Even the little things have not been done. Why could the minister not have remitted the sales tax on municipal corporations? It is not a new point to raise but I wonder whether it has been fully explored whether we cannot do more processing of raw materials at home. I know that is as old as the hills, but has it been fully explored? Of course we have got to export a lot of iron ore and other things, but is it not possible for us to make the best of both worlds to some extent and manufacture more of our raw materials here?

Just the other day I heard of a case where a hardboard factory was set up and at the time it was established the United States tariff was 6½ per cent. The factory was doing very well and making a very superior product when suddenly the tariff was raised to 16½ per cent. That seems to me an unfriendly way for neighbours to carry on. That seems to me a case where there ought to be some possibility of compromise and accommodation. As we all know, in the province of Ontario real progress was made in respect of the export of raw wood. If these things have been done, if the situation has been fully explored, the house should know. I certainly am not informed as I should like to be. There is one special thing that I mention as I come to the end of this part of my speech. We seem to have made a sad mess in respect of one possible source of substantial employment. I refer of course to the pipe line. It seems that there we have just messed the thing up completely and lost for this year what might have been a very substantial source of employment.

A dominion-provincial conference is at last being grudgingly called. It is only an agenda conference, I understand. It is to get ready for the conference. It almost makes one despair when one wonders whether this is again a case of this year, next year, some time, never. I was present in the Senate chamber when the dominion-provincial conference was adjourned sine die around the 1st of May, 1946. At that time it was interesting, almost pathetic, to observe the desire of some of the provincial representatives, notably our friend Angus Macdonald who is no longer with us, to have the conference adjourned to a specific date. But no, it would not be conceded.

Now, it is hard to find any sign of enthusiasm on the part of this government in the preparations for the forthcoming conference. It seems to me their attitude has been one of twisting and squirming and trying by every means to avoid responsibility. Where are the brave days of 1945? The vision apparently has passed away. I know what has been said. It will be said that since then we have had to step up our defence expenditures. I know that very well, and a lot of other things have happened. The government is taking a couple of billion dollars more out of the taxpayers than they were at that time.

We go back to 1945. As I say, the vision has passed away like the snow in spring.

Let us remind ourselves of what was talked about seriously back in 1945. There were to be efforts directed to a high degree of employment; efforts directed to (1) export trade, (2) to private investment, (3) consumption, (4) expenditures and public investment. Governments then thought they could regulate the economy. I imagine now they would like to forget some of the brave words. I know that a gentleman not renowned for his opposition to the Liberal party, Bruce Hutchison, says that the minister is now on white fly paper, by which I understand he means that the minister is more or less stuck with some of the promises that were made in the past.

Now, let us consider for a moment what has happened since 1946. In his budget speech of 1946 Mr. Ilsley said that owing to the failure of the conference, which I described a moment ago, several of the major objectives must be held in abeyance for the time being. Then he added that "they remain, nevertheless, an essential part of the program of this government". On July 15, 1946, that was just after Mr. Ilsley's speech, Prime Minister King wired to the premier of Saskatchewan that the federal government was "ready to explore mutually satisfactory arrangements in regard to the whole or any part of our earlier public investment and social security proposals." In 1947 Premier Hart said that Mr. King had assured him—I think this was when the British Columbia agreement was signed—that as soon as a sufficient number of provinces had signed agreements he would call another dominion-provincial conference to discuss various matters, including unemployment.

In his budget speech of 1947 Mr. Abbott said that "the government of Canada looks forward to the day when the agreement of all or substantially all the provinces will make possible the achievement of the great national purposes which impelled the dominion to make its comprehensive proposals of August 1945." He said that this included "the development of an efficient and flexible tax system designed to permit the expansion of employment and income." That was in 1947, and those were brave words; but what about actions? Well, as I said a few minutes ago, the government seems to me to have been squirming and wriggling ever since to evade responsibility.

Perhaps there is one thing I should mention. I discovered to my surprise, and to the surprise of a lot of other people, a clause which is in the dominion-provincial tax agreements and which looks to me like a bit of slick legalism. I shall read it:

> Nothing contained in this agreement shall be construed as an admission by either party to this agreement that the said party is responsible for the whole or any part of the cost of the relief of unemployment, either during the operation of this agreement or at any other time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it is fair to call that a joker. I have met some people during the recess who certainly thought it was a joker. They had not known about it. They thought it was a curious place to have this matter of social policy introduced. Of course, it should be apparent to everybody that the effect of that was purely to benefit and protect the dominion. So far as the provinces are concerned, their responsibility comes under the British North America Act. They could not be relieved by this clause, so that we can take it this was what I call a slick legal device to protect the dominion. I do not think very highly of it because it would seem to me extremely likely that it was obtained under what might be called a mild amount of duress. The provinces were getting money at the moment and unemployment at that time was not a very serious matter. A bird in the hand was worth a good deal. However that may be, they signed that agreement.

Now, what do we find? I have read the memorandum from the social workers in Toronto pointing out that all governments were claiming they were not responsible. It is a sorry record. We had the visit of the Toronto board of control here, and they were told to go back and talk to the province. We had the request from British Columbia, and they were told that they had not established the fact they were unable to take care of the situation. It is a sorry record and the federal government cannot camouflage its half-hearted contribution.

Of course, as I said some time ago, these things come back, and usually to the purse. If the government had made savings, if they were able to do more, then the situation might be different. This brings me to the question of expenditures, savings and extravagance, on which I shall say a very few words. It is an old story and a sad story. We have had the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) compared to Hercules, but the reductions which have been made, on balance, are trivial, except in defence and finance. The finance reduction I understand is more or less temporary and accidental. The old sink holes are still infinitely capacious: professional and special services, telephones and telegrams and all the other things with which we are so familiar.

There is just one thing I am going to mention. It has already been mentioned in this house but seems to me to be so fantastic I am going to mention it again. It is the case of the C.B.C. The C.B.C. has been made a little empire. It has taxes of its own. This takes us back past the days of the consolidated revenue fund when all taxes were earmarked for special purposes and when infinite inconvenience was caused thereby. As I say, the C.B.C. has an empire of its own and taxes of its own. In their last report we have the astounding situation that they had a surplus of $6·5 million. Of course, it was not a surplus at all but a combination of circumstances that had prevented them from making some capital expenditures which they had intended to make.

The best comment I can make on their situation and the way they carry on business is to read what the Auditor General had to say in his report. He had made suggestions to the C.B.C. as to their method of doing business. When you have an empire of your own, and taxes of your own, and when you do not have to come each year to have your estimates approved in this house, I suppose you do become pretty uppish. And evidently the C.B.C. at any rate took precious little stock of what the Auditor General had said, and caused him to make this comment:

Subsequent action by the corporation—

This is subsequent to his suggestion of change, which was ignored.

Subsequent action by the corporation not having been of a nature to remedy the situation, the manner in which the accounts were kept during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1954, was not found to be conducive to satisfactory auditing.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and I ask myself if anything more conducive to abuse and more contrary to common sense in dealing with large sums of money could be imagined. I suppose someone had the bright idea that there would be a certain narrow logic in letting the users of radio and television carry the burden of the C.B.C., as we were doing away with licence fees. This was a bright idea. I suppose it was thought that it would be painless. Of course anyone who looked at the realities would see there was no reason whatsoever, no reason in the world, to expect that the tax would be the right amount; and there was even less reason to expect that if it was too large there would be any complaint from the C.B.C.

But even now when the foolishness looks so self-evident, and when as I say they have a phony surplus of $6,500,000—even now, apparently there is no disposition to change. Indeed, the answer that is given to us is that this year the C.B.C. will be able to spend the full amount. I do not know how they figure what it will be, because that would depend upon the amount of sales. But whatever it is, they will do their best—and I think probably we can rely upon them for that.

I can only repeat that when the government deals with money in this way, to use the Prime Minister's expression, it is not smart enough. And this is what caused some newspapers, I think, to call this an irresponsible budget. It is neither one thing nor another. It does little enough for its beneficiaries, and nothing to ease the burden of the lowest income groups in the community, who get no reduction of any kind, and who will have to help pay the taxes to repay the borrowed money.

Notwithstanding the optimistic predictions, we have deficit financing. I have read to the house the criticisms by other ministers with regard to deficit financing. We have tax reductions which are to come from borrowing. It is so much easier to borrow, and so we have set out on the slippery path of inflation, notwithstanding the fact that the minister tells us that times are good—and it is likely he would add that they are to be almost unimaginably better.

As for the real problem, that of unemployment—well, the budget virtually ignores it. They are looking to a dominion-provincial conference, as, if and when it takes place. We can only hope that the lukewarm and indifferent attitude of the government will be changed. That can come about only through the efforts of this house, supported by public opinion.

Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming):

> That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house regrets that in its budget proposals the government has failed:
> (a) to give effective stimulus to Canadian enterprise to create employment and opportunity;
> (b) to reduce taxation affecting those on low incomes and allowances;
> (c) to curb its own extravagance and inefficiency;
> (d) to recognize the serious position in which the Canadian farmer and other producers now find themselves."

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, rising to discuss the minister's budget I would say at first that, despite the able manner in which he delivered it, it was a most deceptive document, for it failed utterly to suggest any remedies for the situation that has arisen as a result of the drop in farm income and the serious level of unemployment—which are the real factors behind the latest recession in the Canadian economy.

One excuse, that the 1954 drop in the gross national production and of farm income is due to a poor western crop last year, is both misleading and fallacious. The poor crop has had relatively little influence yet, because of the small quotas of deliveries that have been permitted from it. There is—and I do not think this fact is generally recognized—a very substantial amount of good wheat lying on the farms of western Canada.

I have a letter which illustrates that point. It comes from the co-operative farm in my constituency on the Matador ranch, which is operated by some 17 veterans from the last war, and their families, on a co-operative basis. After referring to the distribution of cars at local elevators and protesting against being compelled to deliver grain at non-pool elevators—and may I say this is a very real grievance among our farmers in western Canada who wish to deliver their grain to the pool elevators system, their own organization—the writer goes on to say this:

> As far as our farm is concerned, we have about 14,000 bushels of 1952 wheat; 15,000 bushels of 1953 wheat and several thousands of bushels of 1954 wheat, so don't let the government in power get away with the idea that the poor 1954 wheat crop is the reason for the present farm plight. There is plenty of 1952 and 1953 wheat besides our poor grade 1954 wheat.

He then goes on to say this:

> We had hail damage of 43 per cent in 1953 and also some damage in 1952. As I regretfully say—here we are more fortunate than several of our neighbouring farmers who were not hailed. We were able to get hail insurance on wheat we would never have been able to sell or build storage for. Some have welcomed the hail so as to collect hail insurance as they have no faith in the way the present government in power has lost markets.

To identify the letter may I say that it was written by Mr. E. P. Monson of the co-operative farm at Matador; and of course this letter is available to the house, if it wishes to have it.

Thus, the minister's excuse regarding one aspect of the fall in our economy is, as I have said, quite fallacious. Nor should we allow it to be said—and I wish to make this point clear—that the policies of the pool, of the wheat board and the farm organizations are responsible for the loss of our overseas markets.

At no time was Canadian wheat held off the market to claim higher prices from Great Britain or from other overseas customers under the international wheat agreement. Great Britain, for example, was free to buy wheat from Argentina, Turkey, the Danubian countries, or any non-member of the agreement. Nor can the surplus of Canadian wheat be caused by this agreement or the operations of the wheat board. Wheat acreage in Canada has declined over three million acres between 1949 and 1954. Importing countries increased their own production not because of the international wheat agreement but because they wished to increase and subsidize their domestic production. Wheat in Britain, France and Italy has always been higher in price than under the international wheat agreement. When No. 2 northern wheat on the farm in my constituency in Saskatchewan was $1.60 a bushel, the British farm price rose from $1.99 to $2.28 a bushel. That happened between 1950 and 1953. I may say that these are the latest figures available to me. Prices in France rose from $2.01 to $2.83 a bushel in exactly the same period. Only the bringing into relationship of the sterling price with that of the dollar will bring about a change. This desirable convertibility, as it is called, will come only when North America imports more commodities from our potential customers and thus improves the trading relationship. Government policies to promote this alone can improve our wheat exports. May I say that I saw no such policies foreshadowed in the budget.

Those who would destroy commodity agreements in order to restore speculative marketing are offering no solution to the Canadian farm people or that of agricultural producers anywhere in the world. Therefore, the budget speech of the minister fails completely to recognize the real fall in the economy when it suggests that it is in large measure owing to the poor wheat crop of 1954. In my opinion, the budget fails to meet national needs in respect to two problems: the fall in farm income and the tremendous rise in unemployment, which I believe are not really two problems but are two sides of one problem. If we wish to be at all alarming, today's news of the latest dominion bureau of statistics unemployment figure of 633,000 people registered for work should alarm us. It is the highest figure for many, many years. I did not quite get the other figures of those actually out of work which were also broadcast, but they were well over 400,000 on March 19.

The minister's estimate of the gross national product seems to me altogether too optimistic. Even the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) does not do more than estimate the capital expenditure program which, while somewhat higher than in 1954, will still be lower than in 1953. The Minister of Finance believes that we shall not only recover our loss in production of last year but in this year we shall add to it and make what is in effect a very abnormal gain in the gross national product. Upon that assumption he bases his estimated deficit of $160 million at the end of the present financial year.

I want to say again that there was no reference in the budget to the 600,000 who were unemployed at that time, 633,000 now. These are the unplaced applicants for work. The only reference is to be found in this one sentence of the budget speech. The minister said at page 2728 of Hansard:

> In recent years we have become so accustomed to big improvements in production, that even a minor reversal of the trend is apt to cause more concern than the situation warrants.

Surely, 10 per cent or more of our entire labour force seeking work, or unemployed, should not be regarded as a minor reversal. Certainly, that is not the opinion of the workers, and above all it is not the opinion of an unemployed person.

The minister persuades himself that production levels for last year were next to the record. It is true that because of the growth in population and the monetary inflation during the post-war period, the absolute figure of gross national production has been increasingly satisfactory to the minister when presenting the budget. However, the present minister and the government should follow the example of the government's own bureau of statistics and express the gross national product in terms of constant dollars and then examine Canadian production today and compare it with the previous years to get the comparable per capita figure.

The gross national product per capita, in terms of constant dollars, that is the value of a dollar between 1935 and 1939, which is the base period that the dominion bureau of statistics takes, was in 1954, not just lower than in 1953, as appears to be the case when we consider only the absolute figures, but in constant dollars it was actually lower than 1953, 1952, and 1951, and it is indeed the lowest since 1950, when the Korean war broke out and we got a boost in production.

Mr. Harris: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but I take it that he has worked it out. I have just looked at the white paper and it does not appear to be that way.

Mr. Coldwell: These are the constant dollars on a per capita basis.

Mr. Harris: That is in the white paper.

Mr. Coldwell: I obtained it from the statistical review of the dominion bureau of statistics.

If we go back farther we find that the gross national product per capita, in constant dollars, was in fact higher in 1943, 1944 and 1945, than it was in 1954. I think that is right. Indeed, these figures underline the contention that I have made over and over again in this house that the Canadian production machine functions best during times of war or of post-war defence preparation. Of course, that is not the fault of the machine. Productively, our scientists, our engineers and our workers have increased their productivity year by year, but our economy has been unable to adjust itself to consuming all of which it is capable of producing except, as I have said, during heavy wartime or for defence preparedness. Therefore, there is really no overproduction. The unplanned economy fails to move the wealth of the nation to those who need it, and accordingly, there is waste and poverty in the midst of world-wide actual or potential plenty.

Now, this is where the budget has its part to play. There are two things which the budget could do, two related things which the minister failed to do. First, tax relief should be given in such a way as to most effectively stimulate consumption. Second, the budget should plan to enable the government to initiate large public investment programs to fill the gap when private investment fails.

Now, with regard to the stimulation of consumption, the budget does very little in this respect. We welcome even the parsimonious tax reductions that are to benefit the lower income groups. We welcome the reduction in the excise tax on automobiles and the abolition of the tax on tires and tubes. With the rapid growth in suburban living and the distances between our farms and their sources of supply, the automobile has become an absolute necessity rather than a luxury for large sections of the population.

I am disappointed that the minister did not reduce the rate of sales tax or even make wide exemptions from the tax of commodities like clothing and household effects. The sales tax, including the social security tax of 2 per cent, is 10 per cent at the federal level, but because it is pyramided as it passes from the manufacturer to the consumer, the increase in cost to the consumer is considerably more than 10 per cent. Indeed, in some circumstances it may even be 20 per cent or more than 20 per cent, though of course it is not always that amount.

One of the ways of increasing the purchase of consumption goods would have been to reduce the sales tax. The minister made some reductions in income tax which are expected to reduce the federal revenues by some $85 million in the current fiscal year. These reductions will, of course, not assist those who are unemployed nor those who do not pay income tax.

May I say to the minister that this was done in a most misleading manner. When we heard the minister we jumped to the conclusion that the reduction in the tax was more substantial in the lower brackets than in the higher income brackets. What the minister actually did, in spite of any impression to the contrary which was contained in the table which I looked at the night the budget was placed before us, was to reduce the tax rate by two percentage points in all personal income brackets. This means that the married taxpayer with two children receiving family allowance and earning $3,000 a year gets a tax reduction of $7 for the whole of 1955, or an average of 58 cents a month. In other words, slightly less than two cents a day. I do not think that anyone will argue that that will stimulate consumption substantially.

The married man with two children receiving family allowance with an income of $100,000 a year will receive a tax reduction of nearly $1,000, or to be precise, $977. The higher the income the more rebate that is received. This is a reversal of what the table included in the budget seemed to indicate when I looked at it the night the budget was placed before us.

Now to achieve the maximum of benefit to the economy, benefits should have been higher in the lower income group than in the higher. The best way to have done this would have been to have increased the basic exemptions to say $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons, with of course corresponding exemptions in relation to dependents. Had this been done the married taxpayer with two children earning $3,000 a year would have received a reduction of $105 instead of the $7 he will receive this year.

Mr. Harris: And the deficit would have been?

Mr. Coldwell: I shall come to that in a moment. In all the higher brackets increases should have been made to compensate to some extent for the loss of revenue due to the higher exemptions. While I cannot go into it as I would like to if time permitted, this could have been accomplished by the imposition of a capital gains tax. People in this country who have been dealing in stocks over the past several years have made huge incomes and those incomes have not been taxable.

The minister could have helped the small man too by the removal of the 3 per cent floor on medical expenses. The House of Commons expressed itself in favour of its removal some years ago and the government I think should be censured for having failed to carry out the recommendations of the representatives of the people of Canada so clearly expressed in this parliament at the time. If the minister is able to reduce the income tax on the higher income groups and on large corporations then he certainly could afford to adopt this proposal which would benefit primarily the low and middle income groups.

The government is by slow degrees introducing what is in effect a more regressive personal income tax structure, ignoring more and more the basis of ability to pay. Recent budgets have whittled steadily away at this principle. Let me make my point clear by comparing the tax rate for 1956 with that in effect in 1949 when the present scale of exemptions was established.

In 1949 a married man with no children earning $3,000 a year paid a tax of approximately $150; in 1956 a married taxpayer earning the same amount will also pay approximately $150. In 1949 a married taxpayer with no children and earning $5,000 paid a tax of approximately $510; in 1956 he will pay $510. In 1949 a childless married taxpayer earning $10,000 paid an income tax of approximately $1,660; in 1956 the same taxpayer will pay a tax of about $1,560, a reduction of $100. A person earning $100,000 paid a tax in 1949 of $50,360, but in 1956 he will pay $48,460, a reduction of $1,900.

The minister may say that this is due to the operation of the old age security tax. That is true very largely and that is my point. This situation arises because of the $60 limit on the old age security tax. A person with a taxable income of $3,000 will pay $60 just as the man with a taxable income of $10,000, $20,000 or $100,000 will pay the same $60. This means that at the lower income the old age security tax is 2 per cent, but in the $10,000 bracket it is six-tenths of 1 per cent and in the $20,000 bracket it is three-tenths of 1 per cent. This illustrates what I mean when I say that our income tax structure has become more and more regressive. If we must have a special old age security tax of this type, then remove the ceiling. Make it 2 per cent all the way through, which would help to get the fund out of the red.

I should say immediately that I am glad that the government has abandoned the fiction that old age security will be paid for by this tax. We never supported the proposal to set up what is in effect a separate fund to meet this special need. There was no more logic in that than there would have been in setting up separate funds to meet such things as veterans' pensions, family allowances or even defence expenditures which would result in endless confusion and administrative waste for checking and cross-checking. Better abandon the 2 per cent special old age security tax and pay for it out of general revenue with an income tax imposed in the higher brackets as well as in the lower to meet the need.

According to the estimates for the 1954-55 fiscal year the old age security fund today is made up of 20 per cent sales tax, to which everybody contributes—the larger the family the larger the contribution—7 per cent personal income taxes and only 4 per cent corporation taxes. This again illustrates my point.

I made a comparison between the personal income tax in effect in 1949 and that which will be in effect in 1956. In 1949 the tax credit allowed receivers of dividends from Canadian corporations was first introduced. At first 10 per cent of what was received in dividends on shares was deductible from the income tax otherwise payable by a taxpayer. In 1953 this tax credit was increased to 20 per cent producing, as I pointed out at the time, the fantastic result that a married man with no children who received all his income from clipping coupons could receive up to $9,760 free of personal income tax. That was the position in the 1954 taxation year.

As a result of the taxation changes proposed by the minister this year the results are even more fantastic. The government has been most lavish in benefiting this group of coupon clippers. As a result of the tax concession for 1956 when the tax changes will have their full effect the minister will have increased the $9,760 free of income tax to $11,133.33 which the coupon clipper may receive in dividends before paying any personal income tax. To my mind this is personal income tax evasion, quite legitimate but on a mammoth scale, marking an addition of almost $1,400 to the income which this group may receive tax exempt.

The following table indicates exactly what I mean:

	Coupon clipper (Gross unearned income from Canadian corporations of $11,133.33, married with no children)	Salaried person (Earned income of $11,133.33, married with no children)
Income tax (at 1956 rates)	$1,817.33	$1,817.33
Old age security tax	60.00	60.00
Surtax of 4 per cent on investment income over $2,400	349.33	nil
Total tax	$2,226.66	$1,877.33
Tax credit, 20 per cent of $11,133.33	2,226.66	nil
Tax payable	none	$1,877.33

This seems to me entirely inequitable when we consider that an earned income of $3,000 will pay $150 in income tax, while someone who receives his income from Canadian securities may receive $11,133 and pay no personal income tax at all. To argue, as the minister may, that corporations are taxed is entirely beside the point. I might just as well argue that because the Canadian Pacific Railway pays corporation taxes, then its wage earners should pay no income tax. I could just as well argue that proposition. Surely when we consider that corporation taxes are being reduced and that the income earner is of more use to society than is the coupon clipper, this iniquitous differential should be wiped out.

My second criticism was that the budget has failed to perform a second important function, namely preparation for a vast program of public investment. The minister was much concerned about the impact of corporation income tax. That he feels more concerned in that regard than in regard to individuals is evidenced by his decision to make the corporation income tax reduction retroactive to January 1 while the personal income tax changes will not become effective until July 1.

Concern for corporations no doubt is, in the minister's opinion, designed to stimulate investment. The first thing that must be pointed out is that the nature of corporation investment is changing. For instance, the 1954 preliminary figures indicate that gross business savings, presumably available for investment, and depreciation allowances were almost four times as large as were what might be called undistributed corporation profits. Accordingly the importance of the size of corporation profits is not as significant as it once may have been. Business has often refused to invest regardless of what its total profits may be. Consequently, reductions in corporation tax at this time, instead of going into new investments, may be paid in large part in the form of dividends, swelling the tax exempt status of certain people and providing them with what may be regarded as the guaranteed annual wage for coupon clippers. May I add that these same coupon clippers are often those who oppose most strenuously the idea of a guaranteed annual wage for the workers in industry.

It seems to me that the minister should have left the corporation taxes as they were, and should have diverted the revenues and capital gains into social investments of many types. That course indeed would have stimulated the economy. It would have demonstrated that the government was more concerned with social investment than with the financial interests. This revenue, as I suggested, plus an unearned capital gains tax, could have been used to assist the provinces to build hospitals and schools, to provide local amenities, to establish a vigorous national housing plan and, indeed, perhaps even a national health plan and so on. It might have helped in a national highway aid program, although this is considerably less potent in the economy in terms of employment than is the construction of houses and institutions such as those I have mentioned.

In order to emphasize the point I am going to move the following subamendment, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis):

That the amendment be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

"(e) to provide assistance to the provincial governments in order to enable them to plan their financing in such a manner as to relieve the people of this country from the crushing load of heavy municipal taxation."

I think that subamendment points up exactly what I have been saying. Some of our banks, it will be observed, notably in a recent monthly review of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, recognize the need for social investment of this kind to meet the needs of our people and to build a more prosperous Canada. The need for a public investment program has been underlined, of course, because of unemployment in recent months.

Municipalities have been forced, by the failure of the federal government to act, to adopt makeshifts. A short time ago the Toronto city council announced a work program which would enable unemployed men to earn $20 a week. This program reminded me of similar relief programs during the early days of the depression, which programs members of the Liberal party in common with some of the rest of us denounced from one end of this country to the other.

Of course this program will be of some help to those who are unable to find work, for it will assist them in obtaining food and a minimum of lodging, but can this be regarded from any angle as satisfactory? Is this a stimulus to purchasing power and our national economy? Is this indeed to any degree the honouring of promises that were made during the war by the federal government—particularly following the Rowell-Sirois commission—to assume responsibility for the unemployed employables? How can it be regarded as just and right that failure to plan our economic system should first deny to the unemployed the right to perform useful work that they are capable and trained to perform, and then force them to work at substandard wages—$20 a week—in order to exist?

Hence, rather than the reduction in corporation income taxes I should like to have seen at least a start on a vigorous public investment policy to provide opportunities for full employment. When private enterprise finds that it cannot profit by expanding its investment and production programs, the government is obliged to resort to promises and concessions. This is like enticing a donkey by holding a carrot before its nose. If private investors are unwilling to accept risks without government guarantees such as were demanded recently in the proposed building of a trans-Canada gas pipe line, a government investment board should fill the need. When large corporations fail to justify their oft-repeated faith in the future of Canada with deeds, then we should have a national investment board to meet the need for social investment.

That has been clearly demonstrated this winter. Instead of making concessions to corporations the federal government should be doing the job that corporations fail to do, and instead of guaranteeing them regarding future profits or the safety of their bonds, it should take whatever profits may accrue for the benefit of the Canadian people.

In connection with this pipe-line discussion, may I add once more—as I did when the matter came before the house some time ago—that it is intolerable that the head of a United States corporation, in this instance Gulf Oil Company, should refuse to have anything to do with a project in which the people of Canada might have some control, which the government demanded quite properly because of the financial risk the government of Canada was requested to take. I hope the government will remain firm in refusing to accept the dictatorship of any powerful corporation, whether it be Canadian, commonwealth or foreign. It is this parliament and this parliament alone which should make decisions affecting the welfare of Canada and its people, and not profit-seeking corporations, domestic or foreign.

We welcome the proposal to set up a royal commission to examine prospects for the future development of Canadian resources and the Canadian economy, but it can do little in the way of immediate help. What we need is immediate action and a continuous program of economic development conscientiously and intelligently planned in a democratic way by the people as a whole, to meet the needs of the people. That surely should be a function of this parliament.

I cannot go into other matters of great interest to the Canadian people, inasmuch as my time is drawing to a close. An opportunity will probably present itself to discuss the unusual type of tax reduction which applies only to one province. Let me say at once that some people have said that in attacking this concession to the government of Quebec we are attacking either the province or the people of the province to which it happens at the moment to apply. That is not so. As a matter of fact I would be as much concerned about this type of tax concession if it applied to my home province of Saskatchewan. To my mind the new law which is to come into effect this year introduces into the Canadian tax structure the dangerous precedent that federal income tax may vary from province to province.

I do not think that can be denied. No matter what the government may say, that is the effect of the proposal. The minister may say there is a provincial income tax in the province affected. Certainly there is. But the provincial income tax is levied on a different base, with higher exemptions than the federal tax, and there need be no necessary relationship between the two. The fact is that there is a unilateral reduction in the federal income tax that applies to one province which is, I may say, of special advantage to the high income groups in that province. That the reduction for Quebec was coupled with an invitation to any other province to break the tax rental agreements and enter into a similar arrangement is an invitation to undermine the whole basis of the tax rental agreements. These agreements are needed, and I believe everybody in the house thinks they are needed, particularly when broad fiscal powers of the national government are urgently needed to be exercised.

When the economy is threatened with recession, as indicated by falling farm prices and unemployment, that is the time when broad federal fiscal powers are most necessary; yet it is at this very time that the federal government itself has, in my opinion, weakened the national power to deal effectively with the national economic situation. However, I must leave this problem to some future debate.

A federal-provincial conference is pending. I hope this matter will be placed high on the agenda, and that ways and means will be found to strengthen rather than weaken the tax rental agreements because in many of our provinces, particularly those that are underprivileged through lack of natural resources, these tax rental agreements are of vital importance. If we are to have an even basis of opportunity for Canadians who live in various parts of Canada to enjoy the social services and other amenities of life which are their due, then we must have some method of spreading over the whole country the result of the productive enterprise of the country. The tax rental agreements were an attempt to do that, and I think they were successful to a remarkable degree. I am very disturbed to see what I consider to be a retreat from those agreements, indeed an undermining of them.

Of course I understand that when the conference meets, settles the agenda and meets again, tax rental agreements or some agreements must be negotiated or re-negotiated, let me add, with due regard of course to the rights and responsibilities of the provinces. But the provinces must also recognize that the welfare of all Canada is dependent upon the ability of this parliament and the government to meet successfully economic and social problems that are national in scope and importance. When confederation was established in 1867 the economic problems of the country were very different from what they are today. Yet the fathers of confederation in their wisdom saw to it that while the provinces were given the right to levy direct taxation all forms of taxation, including direct taxation, were to remain within the scope of the federal parliament.

In other words the fathers of confederation recognized, even in those days when the problems were few and simple, that this parliament must have the right to raise revenues in any way it saw fit to meet national needs. The tax rental agreements were a recognition that, while we had that right, nonetheless we were prepared to negotiate with the provinces with regard to a form of tax—income tax—which some of them had used, some only very recently, including the province of Quebec. Because of that it seems to me at this time, with the economy in its present condition and having in mind what may face us in the near future, that it is essential that we shall have tax agreements that will guarantee to all Canadians equality of opportunity from one end of the country to the other. Anything which tended to undermine that or to prevent this parliament handling national economic problems would, in my opinion, be fatal to the welfare of Canada and would bring about national disunity to a greater extent than we have known in the past.

We hope most sincerely that the federal government will not retreat from the right to organize the economy to meet the needs of the people of the country in whatever province they may live. Therefore we must have the necessary power, the necessary funds, to meet successfully economic and social problems that are national in scope and importance.

I see that my time has expired, but before I sit down let me say once again that in our opinion the budget and the proposals contained therein are unsatisfactory and fail completely to meet the conditions of falling farm prices, falling farm income, unemployment and other pressing needs of the country at the present time.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the rules of the house do not permit this group to move a subamendment; consequently there will be only the two already moved, one by the Progressive Conservatives and the other by the C.C.F. I looked over these amendments when they were handed to me on being moved by the hon. gentlemen, and because of the fact that each draws attention to the need for censuring the government on the various points mentioned we feel we must give our support to both.

I should like to say at this point that, in addition to censuring the government for its failure to meet the needs of the present situation, as was mentioned by the last speaker, the federal government should now be giving very careful attention to its plans for the dominion-provincial conference which is to convene shortly. Certainly if the provinces of this country are to discharge fully the responsibilities placed upon them by confederation, they must have the wherewithal with which to do so, and every effort will have to be made to see that they do have the finances. Otherwise I see no way in which the municipalities of the country, which have been carrying an undue burden of taxation during the past several years, can possibly be relieved.

I certainly join with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in his appeal to the government to make certain that sufficient finances are made available to the provinces through some equitable means, tax agreements if you like, such as may be devised at the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference. It is because these things have not been provided for in the past that I feel I must support the subamendment and the amendment criticizing the government's lack of action.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the central message of my hon. friend's first budget is a half-hearted apology to the Canadian people, as if this budget were saying to them: the opposition in parliament have done so much talking about a business decline and serious unemployment during the past several months that we have come to half believe it ourselves. Consequently we are making some changes in our financial policy for the coming year to help meet whatever these foolish people on the other side seem to think is wrong. There is no evidence, however, in the minister's budget to indicate that the government has come to fully realize just exactly what the situation is, and how serious it is.

The provisions of the budget do represent some change from the government's position of a year ago or even six months ago, but it is not enough to be able yet to call it repentance. Repentance, in my judgment, involves restitution. I have searched carefully through my hon. friend's budget and I can find only an indication here and there of half-hearted restitution to those who have been caused serious loss and worry, perhaps even extended suffering, as a consequence of government policies that have been allowed to carry on much longer than they should have been. I do think that budgeting for a deficit is exactly what the economy needs at the present time to help it pull out of the slump, and perhaps help to stimulate a higher economic activity so that unemployment can be abolished. I am afraid I cannot agree with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) on that point.

I must give the Minister of Finance credit for having recognized that necessity at least. I might say right here that when the minister recognizes the necessity of budgeting for a deficit now, he recognized the necessity of seeing to it that more purchasing power was left in the hands of the people so they could buy some of the goods that are available. It is not with his proposal to budget for a deficit that we quarrel. Our criticism is that the tax cuts he made were not well distributed, and they were not designed to give relief to all the people who deserve to have relief at this time. It is clear that the Minister of Finance knew, perhaps as a consequence of the talk of unemployment and business decline from this side of the house, that the economy did need some sort of a shot in the arm.

I have noticed that quite a number of newspapers in the country since April 5 have called the minister's budget a shot in the arm. Well, I dispute that very strongly. About the best anyone could possibly say in that regard is that the budget does provide a very mild hypodermic, but I am afraid it has nothing more than milk in it. I would say the minister realized he had to provide the economy with a balance wheel, but our criticism is that he failed to equip the balance wheel with the proper loads. The minister must realize, I think, that unless you keep a balance wheel well loaded with those very interesting little well placed weights on the rim it does not work smoothly, and it does not do the job it was designed to do. So it is with our economy. If you are going to provide it with a balance wheel you have to keep your balance wheel loaded. I shall talk about the the loads I have in mind just a little later.

Inasmuch as today is private members' day, Mr. Speaker, from five o'clock until six, may I ask you at this stage to call it five o'clock and I shall resume after the dinner hour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Low: It has been suggested that hon. members went through the business for private members' hour quickly in order to have the privilege of hearing my speech. I hardly believe that is true. However, we are very grateful that we can carry on without too much of a break.

I have mentioned already that we think the Minister of Finance did the right thing when he budgeted for a deficit this year. But the important thing for hon. members to keep in mind is the manner in which he intends to finance that deficit. If he is going to run the country into debt by the issuance of bonds, either to the general public or through the chartered banks of the country, then we feel that is wrong. We contend that in any action the circumstances call for this year, if the minister is going to budget for a deficit then he must be prepared to finance that deficit without running the country into a further burden.

He can do that, as we have pointed out time after time. But we say he has used the proper method in attempting to meet the situation, at least partially, this year. We do think if he had really intended to give the economy the shot in the arm, the effective one that the newspapers have talked about, he should have gone further than he did. A deficit of $160 million in a $25 billion economy is a pretty weak hypodermic any way you want to look at it. We think the minister could very well have gone as far as $300 or $400 million of a deficit with perfect safety this year at least, until Canada returned to a high level of economic activity.

There are good reasons for taking that attitude. The government is depending almost entirely upon tax reductions to pull Canada out of the business slump and to cure the serious unemployment problem. At least that is the way it looks to us, unless they bring in some rather substantial supplementary estimates in June providing for much greater government investment than any of us have seen or suspected thus far. And so, as I say, tax cuts of only $148 million in a $25 billion economy, under such circumstances as we now face, when business has been somewhat depressed and unemployment in various sections of our country is very serious, are entirely inadequate to meet the needs. That is one of the reasons we propose voting for the amendment and the subamendment.

We do congratulate the minister upon the tax cuts he did make. We think it was wise to reduce income tax rates. But the minister must realize that when he confines his reductions to the rate structure only he leaves out a great many people who deserve consideration, because there are many thousands of people in Canada whose incomes are below the income tax exemptions. What has the budget done for them? What has the budget done for old age pensioners, for those who are on superannuation, for the veterans on pensions and the like? Perhaps the minister felt that it was impossible to make any substantial change in exemptions under the Income Tax Act. I am inclined to believe that it was better not to try to do it this year. But we do think it would have been much more effective as a budget if, in addition to the income tax reductions the minister made, he had provided for some cuts in the sales tax. That would have made it possible for people in lower income groups to have at least some relief, and would have spread the favours at least more evenly. That is exactly where the purchasing power is most needed, among those people in the lower income groups.

I think perhaps the most serious criticism I can offer of the whole budget is that the minister failed to make any reduction in sales tax. I say this for a number of very important reasons. In the first place I think I have already mentioned that with the reduction in income tax rates he will not help the people who are not in income tax brackets—and in this I include old age pensioners, recipients of war veterans allowances and of veterans pensions, low wage earners—of whom there are many thousands. The reduction in the sales tax would have made it possible for them to retain a bit more of their already too meagre purchasing power, so they could do their share toward buying the surplus of goods that has accumulated throughout the country, and at the same time of course increase their own enjoyment of life to a certain extent. That would have been considerably more like real justice to all parts of the Canadian population than has been brought about by the minister in his budget.

There is another important reason, too, why I think the minister should have brought in some reduction in the sales tax at this time. We have developed a high price economy which is making it much more difficult than before for Canada to compete successfully in world trade. Anything, I contend, that will help to adjust consumer prices downward would stimulate trade and help to move more of our surplus goods to foreign markets. A reduction of the sales tax would be one means of helping to bring down some consumer prices to that end. We think the minister and the government lost a golden opportunity right here and, as I say, in our judgment this is the most serious criticism we make of the financial proposals in the budget.

There were some slight excise tax cuts provided, but they were only slight, and they touched only a very restricted portion of the goods upon which the tax is imposed. We are glad to see the reductions, of course, the reduction from 15 per cent to 10 per cent in the excise tax on automobiles, and the abolition of the tax on truck and automobile tires no matter for what purpose they are used.

These are all to the good, and I am sure the Canadian people generally will welcome these tax reductions. But right here I do wish to voice serious criticism of the method the government has of handling some of these excise tax cuts. I think their method is quite unfair to retailers, such as automobile dealers. Taxes are payable at the factory, which means that when the automobile dealer takes cars from the factory into his storeroom or storage lot, he pays the tax before he can take them out. When the government announces in its budget, as it did on April 5, that there will be absolutely no refunds on taxes already paid at the factory on automobiles taken out by retailers, but remaining unsold, I say it is acting unfairly.

I remind the government that they have gotten into a very bad practice in the past number of years, namely the practice of making everybody but the government tax collectors for the government. Anyone might think the government would be rather grateful to have these people performing this gratuitous and difficult service. But how does the government show its gratitude? Well, in the case of automobile dealers, at least, they show it by dispensing a fairly substantial measure of unfairness and injustice, causing many of them serious loss.

I know of one dealer right in this city of Ottawa who had paid $8,000 in taxes at the factory in respect of cars he had already put into storage by budget day and that had remained unsold. But when the announcement of the tax cut was made he could expect no refund, and had to sell his cars in competition with other businesses in the city. Consequently he is suffering a considerable amount of injustice. I would think it would be possible for the government to find some means of preventing this kind of unfairness. I repeat that the method of handling the tax cut, particularly the cut in the excise tax, is very unfair to some of our retail dealers.

Since April 5, when the budget was brought down, there has been considerable discussion about whether Canada will be able to achieve the $26 billion rate of gross national production this year. That was the aim set by the minister in his calculations. The official critic of the Progressive Conservative party has called the budget an excursion into unreality, I suppose because of the $26 billion figure as well as for some other reasons. Well, we should ask ourselves what chance the government has of achieving the $26 billion rate.

In the first place let me point out that we do have a great many unemployed in this country, and if the government will get busy and bring in policies designed to get them back to work they will contribute substantially toward the gross national production that we need to reach if we are to realize the plans in our present budget. Certainly by adopting policies which will put them back to work the government will have a better chance of realizing that $26 billion rate.

Another point to keep in mind is this. The minister has provided in the budget certain incentives to business to expand operations and to plow back into business more of the profits. Well, I agree with the need for providing those incentives. I think the minister was wise to make a reduction in the corporation income tax this year. Whether the 4 per cent reduction in corporation income tax will provide sufficient incentive to cause all-out production, I would not be able to say. And when I use the figure "4 per cent" I mean that the amount of the reduction will be 4 per cent of the present rate. I understand the reduction is from 49 per cent to 47 per cent, which would be about 4 per cent over all.

I am rather inclined to believe that this will not be enough. It will be some stimulus, but I do not think it will be enough. We have kept business generally in this country on a very high rate of income tax for a long time. Whenever you impose a burden of tax that takes from the corporations every year about half of their profits you leave them very little with which to carry on the necessary expansion and new development to keep pace with a growing economy—perhaps I had better say to give impetus to the economy, to make it grow; for it is entirely through private and corporation investment that our economy is expected to grow and expand.

I am not going to argue at this point that the amount of corporation income tax reduction was too small. I am inclined to believe that it could have been a bit more without any serious dislocation in the government's plan, and certainly something more than the 4 per cent would have produced considerably more incentive for expansion and development toward the $26 billion rate of gross national production which we hope to reach before the end of the year.

There is a third point to consider in this matter. If we get a good crop this year throughout the farming areas, and I sincerely hope we shall, then I believe we can reach the rate mentioned by the minister. But the greatest weakness of the budget, in my judgment, is its failure to provide adequate markets for our production. If we do reach the $26 billion rate of gross national production, what are we going to do with it? That is the big question. It seems to me that is the thing the government must face squarely sooner or later, and I suggest that now is the time to face it. What shall we do with all the production, if through incentive we spark an all-out effort and succeed in reaching the $26 billion rate of gross national production in 1955? I am not going to labour the point; I shall have something more to say about this matter of internal markets and balance wheels and loading the balance wheels just a little later on, but I do sincerely hope that we reach the objective that has been set by the minister.

The government has loaded its budget with a heavy burden of fixed charges which leaves it very little elasticity to meet the ups and downs of economic fluctuations. This fact increases the responsibility of the Minister of Finance and the government generally. It must eventually use more skill, managerial skill, than it ever used before in its history. It must become more conscious of the role which government must play in these times; otherwise, the fluctuations in the economy will become so violent as to make it impossible for the government to meet that burden of fixed charges without plunging the country into an impossible burden of public debt.

The minister said in his budget speech that two-thirds of all of the civil or non-defence expenditures provided in the budget were for public welfare, social security measures, for servicing the public debt and for paying provincial subsidies and tax rental payments. This does not leave very much elasticity, as I said, and it does impose the very heavy burden of fixed charges on everybody. With that in mind, it seems perfectly clear to me that the government in the future must pay very careful attention to ways and means of bringing our economy into equilibrium and keeping it there.

The government must come to realize that if they are to play their part, the part that government should play in this matter of bringing and keeping the economy in a condition of equilibrium, the main problem will be that of adjusting purchasing power to production. I think that problem of adjusting purchasing power to production is our most important problem even today. That problem will become even more important tomorrow. I ask hon. members to think what it will be tomorrow with atomic power in industry, with electronics and industrial food production and all the other advances in farming and industry which we are only beginning to realize today. Under these new circumstances of the future the problem of the adjustment of purchasing power may become a matter of life or death for this civilization, rather than just the most important problem that we face. I impress that upon hon. members and recommend it to their study.

It is trite to say that we have solved the production problem which, Mr. Speaker, I point out was at one time by far the most difficult one, both as to toil and as to mental effort. The next step, in my judgment, is much easier. It can be summed up in a single sentence. It is a careful statistical survey and bookkeeping balance of currency and book entry money in relation to the value of production. That is putting it in a nutshell. When it is put that way it seems almost too trivial to deserve serious attention; yet it is of tremendous importance, because without it all the heroic efforts that have been made in the past to achieve our present status of industrial power in this and in some other countries of the world may prove to be of little benefit to mankind.

On the other hand, if we accomplish this balance or adjustment of purchasing power to production, both the national and the international situation will be well under way to effective and just solution. Nationally we shall be able to achieve all the material progress that would be technically possible so that we can continue our advance toward more freedom, harmony and happiness amongst our people. Increased leisure, increased community activity and cultural development will by and by add to our enjoyment and our sense of completeness. Internationally, we would be able to balance imports with exports and get rid of all that incitement of the past to export in excess of imports; to try to get a favourable balance of trade, in other words. This, as hon. members can readily see, will improve our relations with all other people.

As for our less fortunate nations, the ones we are talking about here in connection with the Colombo plan, we shall be able to wait until they can afford to pay in goods and services without embarrassment or hardship to ourselves in any way, because by using the Social Credit financial proposals the exports can be financed without hurting us in any way. I say the greatest problem that we have to face today is this problem of adjustment of purchasing power so that it is brought into equilibrium with our production.

But if the government are going even to begin to bring our economy into equilibrium in the light of all the facts I have mentioned, including specifically the very heavy burden of fixed charges we now have in the budget, there will have to be a change in their thinking; they will have to lay down for themselves and follow some very scientific ideas. I cannot take the time here to mention many of them, perhaps just one or two. I shall depend on my colleagues to follow up with a careful examination of some of the others which are of tremendous importance. However, for a few moments I should like to deal with one of those ideas which I think the government must attend to, and which I think is very pressing. It has been mentioned to some extent by both the speakers who preceded me today. I refer to ways and means of keeping farm cash income in balance with total factory salaries and wages, and along with that ways of making effective use of the total market that is possible within our country.

Some months ago I was attracted to a short pungent statement by Carl H. Wilken, who is a successful Iowa farmer and a specialist in economic research in the United States. He said:

> It is foolish to think we cannot have just as much prosperity in times of peace as in wartime. With the greatest productive system in the world, the American people ought to be smart enough to find out how to keep it working at its full rate. It can be done. All that is necessary is to make use of the total market that is possible in this country. The key to such a prosperity and the total market on which it depends is farm income.

This is the end of Mr. Wilken's quotation. I was attracted to it and I did some research work, gathering as many statistics as I possibly could from the dominion bureau of statistics and from other places, to see if it applied to our own country. In my judgment, we in Canada have neglected this key far too long. It is the key to the total use of our internal market. Farm cash income has been allowed to decline seriously, especially during the past year. This decline has been variously estimated at between $300 and $500 million. Second, farm income has not been able to play its important part in the total Canadian market. Our industrial output has had to be cut off in various lines and serious unemployment has resulted, as has been discussed already at length in this house.

So there are good reasons why farm cash income holds what I call a key position in our Canadian economy. A look at the record will reveal this important fact. Under normal peacetime conditions the total national cash farm income runs at an almost exact level with total wages and salaries paid out by the factories of the country. The two hold to an approximate ratio of $1 of farm cash income to $1 of factory payrolls. During the long peace period from 1921 to 1938, whenever farm cash income declined for any reason, factory payrolls had to be adjusted downward to meet it; and when farm income rose factory salaries and wages rose in the same ratio. But there were always very serious shocks to the economy when factory payrolls did have to be adjusted downward to meet a reduced farm cash income.

This balance was upset soon after world war II broke out. Wage costs and industrial employment rose with the great demand for arms while farm prices were held down under price control policies. This landed us into 1944 with an abnormal situation, namely total factory salaries and wages of $2,209,621,370 and total farm income of $1,828,825,000. It will be seen that there was nearly $400,000,000 of a disparity.

Many economists had predicted that we would go into a depression by 1946 after the end of the war, but we did not. Several things prevented it, but none was more important than the restoration of the balance between farm cash income and factory wages and salaries. Farm income rose in 1946 by $150,000,000 to a total of $1,742,440,000; factory payrolls in that year totalled $1,740,000,000 in round figures, a reduction from 1945 of over $100,000,000 because the end of hostilities had cut back our war needs.

This provided a sound foundation for the period of general expansion which followed. The normal dollar for dollar ratio continued through 1947 and 1948. In 1950 farm cash income suffered a decline of $300,000,000 and unemployment was beginning to show itself when the Korean war broke out in the late spring of that year. As a result factory payrolls shot up to the highest levels in our history, reaching $2,771,267,000 for 1950 and $3,276,280,917 for 1951. Again we saw a period of unbalance. When we came to 1954 we saw a tapering off of defence spending, but because farm cash income sagged seriously there was no market in rural areas for the products of the factories; therefore unemployment appeared in very serious proportions. That was in 1954.

[Mr. Low.]

At the present time there is an unbalance between farm income and factory payrolls, and that I think is the most critical spot in our whole economy today. When the farmers of the country cannot buy the goods which are being made by the factories the only thing the factories can do is shut down temporarily and turn people out of work. This is a shock to the whole economy. We have to come to realize the vital importance, therefore, of farm cash income to industry and labour. I am convinced that for practical purposes the total dollar income of industry and labour is limited, if not completely determined, by the existing level of farm cash income. I think that is something worth studying by our economists here.

It should be borne in mind that the demand for factory goods that is created by farm cash income is not something that is limited to the farmers alone. An examination of all the facts will show that at least 50 per cent of Canada's total population live in small cities and towns and on land around those towns. Most of those towns and villages are really service centres between the factories and the farms, and they derive their support from farm income almost entirely. That farm cash income is distributed among the dealers and service people in those towns and small cities and villages, and it creates good business everywhere. Competent investigators have found that when a farm dollar starts its course from the farmer who receives it for his product it results in an average of approximately $1 in wages for the factory worker; and in addition—and this is the surprising thing—$7 in national income by the time it completes the full economic circuit that it makes through all the service centres of these towns and villages and small cities. That is a startling fact.

That may give you some idea why farm cash income is the key to the total market that we must have in our country for peacetime prosperity. I am convinced that we can have peacetime prosperity only with farm cash income levels in proper balance with manufactured goods, prices and factory wages. Otherwise we cannot have the total market that industry requires to operate at full capacity and thus to keep our people gainfully employed.

The government must come to realize this, too, and to understand that the key to the use of the total market within Canada is farm cash income. I point out here that the most important market that Canada has is its own people; fully 85 per cent of all that we produce is consumed by our own people. That is why we in the Social Credit movement have placed such emphasis upon the proper use of the home market by urging the government to make certain that this market is constantly supplied with enough purchasing power to buy the goods that Canada produces if it wants them. That is what we mean when we speak of keeping our economy in a state of equilibrium. It should be possible for our people to buy our total production if they want it.

I think the government and businessmen and industrial leaders and the labourers of the country should be just as much concerned as are the farmers in making sure that farm prices and farm income are restored to a parity level as soon as possible. We all have a stake in how much the farmer is able to obtain for his efforts on the farm, because all of us depend upon that basic farm income for our own incomes. When I speak for the farmer, therefore, I am speaking also for the industrial people as well as for ourselves. I think this is the key to our economic situation in Canada. I think also that the general public should be correctly informed about this whole very important matter of farm cash income.

This brings me to my conclusion in connection with this criticism of the budget. As I said before, I think the greatest weakness of the budget is that it has failed to do anything for the farmer, and certainly has failed to take any steps whatsoever to bring the total of farm cash income once more into balance with total factory salaries and wages, something which is absolutely essential if we are to have peacetime prosperity.

We in this group are firm in our belief that the country and the government will have to adopt a well-conceived and comprehensive program of marketing and price supports for agriculture. The adoption of a proper price support program is the only way by which the total of farm cash income can be kept in fair equilibrium with the total of factory salaries and wages in Canada. I know there are many newspaper people and businessmen who today are expressing their opposition to the adoption of farm price supports, and they point to the experience of the United States as a horrible example to deter the Canadian people from going further in their demands for a program of this kind.

But I am going to say that I am convinced that the general public are not being properly informed about farm price supports and the kind of program that can be made to succeed. At the present time most of our people are being told only how much it costs to maintain farm price supports. Some newspapers in the country and other critics are pointing out that the cost would be too high. In my judgment the cost of agricultural support prices would be far less than the cost of widespread unemployment, and farm price supports would be effective in keeping a balance and equilibrium in our economy. I am convinced that some such price support program as was recently suggested by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture would be of tremendous help in doing the kind of job that must be done if we are to have this peacetime prosperity of which I have spoken on several occasions.

I think we should do everything we can to help our people understand what happens when farm income is kept at a reasonable level; that is, how it increases factory payrolls and opportunities for a higher standard of living for all Canadians. Let us sincerely hope that the Minister of Finance and the government will, in the next few months, make a thorough study of the possibilities in this proposal of a system of price supports for agriculture, and that they will soon thereafter—at least by the next budget—come prepared to lay before parliament a price support program that will do the kind of job that must be done if purchasing power is to be adjusted to equal our production. We know this system can help to do the job.

But I warn the government that they will have to have a change in thinking. Unless they pull those dollar signs off their eyes and begin to see the realities beneath the dollar signs they will never be able to adopt the kind of policies that will help us to make use of the total market available in this country. They will have to adopt some better financial proposals as well, and we recommend to them the proposals which Social Crediters have been making over the years as a means of bringing our economy into equilibrium and keeping it there.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I repeat that the adjustment of purchasing power to production is the most important problem facing the Canadian people today. It is the answer to the economic problem, and I say there is no question in our minds about that matter at the present time.

I should like to be able to deal with other phases of the budget but time will not permit me to do so. I should like to have said something about the royal commission. That is exactly the kind of thing we have been proposing for the last 15 years in this house. Certainly ever since I came here in 1945 my colleague the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and others have been pleading with the government to appoint a royal commission to examine into all phases of our economic activity and bring in proposals that will help us to achieve the high standard of living that we can achieve in this great country, to make the wisest possible use of our economic possibilities, and particularly to keep our economy in a state of equilibrium. Some of my colleagues will have something to say about this matter in the course of the debate.

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, we have heard, in this house and outside of it, a great many speeches about this great country of ours. We congratulate ourselves on our great size, our natural resources, our hydro power and other physical assets. But I suggest that our greatest asset is stable government. Great wealth is of little value to the world, and of not much satisfaction to ourselves, unless it is properly used. In his first budget the Minister of Finance has shown his acceptance of responsibility and has maintained the high tradition of courage and progressive action so vital to our continued growth.

At the outset I should like to commend the tariff changes contained in the budget which will be of benefit to our farmers. Of particular interest to Nova Scotia, where the poultry industry has grown by leaps and bounds, is the reduction or elimination of tariffs on poultry eviscerating equipment. Similar assistance is afforded to the fisheries in the reduction of duty on fish meal plant and fish cooking equipment. Also of interest is the elimination of duty on fishing vessels over 100 feet in length.

It would be even more satisfactory if, by action in this house, we could reduce the duty on our fish entering the United States market. That is, to be sure, something that is outside our power, but there is a problem on which action could be taken. I refer to the restriction on trawlers operating off the shores of Nova Scotia. By international agreement United States trawlers can come within three miles of the coast, but our Canadian trawlers must stay outside the 12-mile limit. The obvious solution is, perhaps, to change the law respecting Canadian trawlers, but there are several objections to this course. The government has recognized the interests of the inshore fishermen in the recently announced restriction on trawlers inside the famous St. Margarets bay. Furthermore, in the interests of conservation the 12-mile limit may be the more desirable.

Would it, Mr. Speaker, be possible to have this problem reviewed by the northwest Atlantic fisheries council? Its primary purpose is conservation, and it has had marked success in obtaining regulation of the fisheries off the New England coast. It may be that the United States industry would respond to a proposal from the council which was based on a sound conservation policy. Our objective might then be accomplished without furnishing ammunition for higher tariffs on our fish products entering the United States market.

Apart from tax and tariff matters, there is in the budget speech a great deal that is of importance to all Canadians. As a Nova Scotian I was most interested in the minister's remarks on dominion-provincial relations, particularly the references to the tax rental agreements. I find it rather difficult to become greatly concerned over whether or not we achieve formal reallocation of financial powers and responsibilities as between the dominion and the provinces for, as the minister has said, it is not easy to visualize an arrangement which will meet all future contingencies.

The division of powers and responsibilities established by the British North America Act was practical for many years after 1867. After the turn of the century the rapid geographic expansion and the industrial development, proceeding at vastly different rates in different areas, changed the face of this country, but our constitution remained as it was in 1867.

Then came the depression of the thirties, under the stress of which our federal system began cracking at the seams. As in the maritime provinces, the obvious weaknesses which appeared in the thirties were only the exaggerated symptoms of unhealthy conditions which had existed for a quarter of a century. They were only soothed, not cured, by subsidy arrangements such as, for example, the Maritime Freight Rates Act, and so on.

The tax rental approach, while not without disadvantages, has brought substantial benefits to all the people of Canada and the various provincial governments. That the proportionate advantage varies among the provinces goes without saying, for otherwise such agreements would be unnecessary. I want to illustrate my point with some figures.

The federal tax rental agreements provide varying proportions of the revenue of the provinces. These proportions ranged from 22 per cent for Alberta to 47 per cent for Manitoba in 1953. In that year the proportion for Nova Scotia was 39 per cent. In this comparison we therefore find ourselves in the upper brackets but the advantage, I fear, is illusory. Such a comparison does not take into account the number, variety, and cost of services which may vary from one province to another. It does indicate, however, the importance to our revenue picture of the federal grants. The withdrawal of these funds would create serious problems in the provinces with a small tax base. In the event of a return to pre-war arrangements we in Nova Scotia would be faced with a prohibitive tax level or a reversion to inadequate or substandard services.

That is why I was so heartened by the tenor of the minister's remarks on this subject. Some members may disagree with the details or even the methods of approach, but I doubt if anyone would stand in his place and deny the validity of the objective of these agreements, which was stated so aptly by the minister on another occasion when he said:

> That objective is to make it financially possible for all the provinces, whatever their tax base, to perform their constitutional functions themselves, and to provide a reasonable level of provincial services without an abnormal burden of taxation.

I believe, and many Nova Scotians agree with me, that this objective can be attained without threatening our provincial autonomy. Indeed, this could easily become a meaningless shibboleth without some measure of redistribution of the wealth which has been accumulated in part at least on the basis of a national market. I am reminded here that "the law, in the majesty of its equality, forbids rich and poor alike to sleep on park benches."

My interest in the varying economic positions of the provinces is not confined to taxation problems. The announcement of the intention to appoint a royal commission to examine Canada's long-term economic problems is welcome. The outline of this proposal indicated a very broad approach, including a study of our productive capacities as well as our external markets. It will include an examination of our population growth in both its regional and age distribution aspects. In his speech the minister said, as found at page 2740 of Hansard of April 5:

> I am sure our provincial and municipal governments, our businessmen and producers, management and workers, would like to have comprehensive and carefully documented analyses of our various potentialities.

To that I say "hear, hear". I would add that I hope the regional analysis will not be confined to population studies but will extend to the relative economic positions of the various regions. Specifically, could the minister have the commission examine the possible value of having an agency of the federal government perform services for the Atlantic region similar to those provided by the Federal Reserve Bank in Boston for the New England states?

As I said before, we in the House of Commons should do more than work for the redistribution of national wealth through tax agreements. We must also work on the more positive line of reducing the economic gap between the provinces. The first step in such a procedure is to know just where we stand, and a thorough-going report on our economic prospects is just such a first step. I would go further, however, and say that a continuing scrutiny is necessary, particularly in the region where both chronic and short-term problems are the most serious.

Related to the general problem of dominion-provincial relations, Mr. Speaker, is the matter of federal grants to universities. I trust hon. members will bear with me, for they have heard me before, and others as well, urging a more equitable method of distributing these grants among the universities. I make no apology for raising this question again because I feel there has been ample time to correct the very obvious shortcomings of the present arrangement. With the permission of the house I shall quote the per student payment in each province provided for in the 1954-55 estimates. British Columbia receives per student $105.41; Manitoba, $99.26; New Brunswick, $122.59; Alberta, $157.57; Saskatchewan, $162.96; Ontario, $140.98; Prince Edward Island, $214.29; Newfoundland, $394.06, and Nova Scotia, $85.23.

The distribution of the money on the basis of population instead of at a per student rate has the effect of penalizing the province with the highest proportion of students in relation to population. The royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences in recommending financial assistance stressed the importance of the universities in the life of Canada. Because their service is national in scope rather than regional, the commission recommended that the universities receive support from the federal treasury. In the light of this, would it not be more logical for the government to set a uniform national rate per student, irrespective of the location of the university, rather than the present system? In the post-war training of service personnel the Department of Veterans Affairs was able to administer such a scheme without any undue criticism of federal interference in university affairs.

An alternative suggestion is to deal with the professional schools separately and I think the suggestion merits immediate action. I am told that the conference of Canadian universities, in its brief to the commission, assumed that all universities doing the same kind of work would receive the same rate of assistance and proposed a per capita grant ranging from $150 to $200 per student registered in professional faculties, and a single grant of $100 per student in other faculties. This was a recognition of the higher costs in particular faculties.

In Nova Scotia we have a university with professional faculties in medicine, dentistry and pharmacy serving the four Atlantic provinces. This means that much of our student body comes from the other Atlantic provinces as well as from farther afield, and of course we welcome them all to Nova Scotia. I think all members will agree that a single institution in these fields for that area is the most desirable set-up. Yet the concentration of students in these professional faculties at Dalhousie has the effect of reducing the financial assistance going to all universities in the province of Nova Scotia.

In this connection will you please note the following figures showing the cost of these professional faculties to the university. The proportion of the operating costs borne by student fee, not including capital charges, for arts and science is 44 per cent, for medicine 23 per cent and for dentistry 33 per cent. The balance has to come out of endowments, gifts or grants. It is true that we must recognize the differing outlooks among the components of our nation. I would be the last person to advocate the promotion of the mass mind or putting a premium on uniformity among our people. Let us accept the fact that we must be oversensitive as to provincial jurisdiction over education. But could we not separate financial assistance for professional training and put that on a per student basis? Then the assistance to the arts and science faculties, which are the heart of any university, would be distributed on a more equitable basis.

Before leaving this subject I should like to have it distinctly understood that we are not suggesting for a moment that the grants to other provinces be reduced. Students in all professional schools could be put on the same special per student rate. The grant for straight university education could then be on a per capita basis with more equitable results.

A tariff change which I feel sure will commend wide support is the elimination of duties on the articles and materials designed for the training of mentally retarded children. This is in line with the constructive policy of rehabilitation which is part of our program for assistance to the disabled. It is very gratifying that efforts are being made to round out that program. Now that allowances are being paid experience has shown some shortcomings, and I should like to urge that immediate consideration be given to the carrying out of the spirit of the act in a sympathetic and understanding fashion.

[Mr. Balcom.]

The Canadian Welfare Council, which appreciates the difficulty in administering and carrying out the provisions of Bill No. 462, made several essential suggestions in their brief to the Prime Minister in May, 1954. If more of these suggestions had been incorporated in our act I believe that we might not now have so many misunderstandings in the provinces. Unfortunately there are people thoughtless and cruel enough to take political advantage of the disabled and handicapped by telling the latter that they are entitled to full pension as disabled persons, at the same time knowing full well that such persons could not qualify under the act. Perhaps in many cases this was done through ignorance or inability to recognize the distinction between "disability" and "handicap".

Total disability can be determined on medical evidence and is so determined for war pensions and workmen's compensation. However, the handicap resulting from a disability is more difficult to ascertain. Total handicap is generally accepted as "unemployable", and unemployability is dependent on many factors such as physical and mental condition, personality, education and training. It is dependent in addition upon the economic and employment possibilities in the locality, plus the attitude of the public and the availability of rehabilitation services.

At this juncture I should like to point out to the minister that in Nova Scotia we have not the variety of jobs for disabled and handicapped persons that are so often readily available in industrial centres. Some applicants should, therefore, be considered eligible for the pension if suitable work is not available near at hand. A danger stressed in the Canadian Welfare Council brief was the fact that allowances for total or permanent disability, divorced from rehabilitation services, should be granted only when it is definitely proven a person cannot profit from rehabilitation.

Before leaving this subject, Mr. Speaker, I should like to respectfully and humbly suggest to the minister, a man who has a full understanding and appreciation of the dependent position of the disabled and untrained handicapped person, that after a full year of operation the act and regulations be given a complete overhauling. In the meantime I suggest, (1) that no applicant be turned down without being personally interviewed by the medical board; (2) that provision be made for an appeal from the finding of the medical board; this would give the applicant the same right as an applicant for old age assistance or a war veterans pension; (3) that consideration be given to classifying as permanently disabled those patients with arrested tuberculosis who, while living at home and able to care for personal needs, are unable to perform any kind of work and are dependent on their family; (4) that paraplegics able to stand only with the help of braces or crutches be considered as qualifying for this pension.

These suggestions, and I have more, are given constructively in the hope that the disabled program may be broadened and that disability allowances will be made part of a comprehensive plan providing for the economic needs of all disabled persons, as recommended by the Canadian Welfare Council.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose tonight to outline in some detail how Stalin of Russia conquered China, Stalin and his friends in America. I began speaking on this subject on April 6. On that occasion I said President Roosevelt of the United States while at the Yalta conference in February of 1945 threw Chiang Kai-shek to the dogs by giving Stalin pre-eminent rights in Manchuria, the workshop of China, and in north China—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I suppose all I can do at this stage is appeal to him, because there is now pending on the order paper a motion to refer estimates to the standing committee on external affairs, and it is my understanding that the debate is to be resumed some time this week.

Mr. Harris: Thursday.

Mr. Speaker: I am informed it is to be resumed on Thursday of this week, and I understand the hon. member is to be the first speaker when the debate is resumed. At that time I assume he will debate external affairs. I would hope, and I am sure hon. members would agree with me, that now, when we have entered the budget debate during which, by practice, one may discuss all affairs pertaining to the government of the country, we might not have a debate on external affairs, and have another on Thursday on the same subject.

As I say, I cannot enforce any rule at this time. But it may be that if, upon resuming the debate on external affairs, the hon. member were to discuss at that time the same topic, he would be found guilty of breaking a rule which has to do with the repetition in another debate of arguments already used by him. So I think it must be quite clear, between the hon. member and myself, as to the exact position with regard to the discussion on external affairs.

We all know that a great share of our attention is directed toward the difficulties in Asia, and the situation as it affects Asia and the west. I believe the hon. member would agree that there could be only one speech on that subject. Perhaps with that in mind he would decide to direct his attention more specifically to matters connected with the budget, when speaking on this occasion. If he were to make his external affairs speech now, perhaps he would by-pass his opportunity to speak on external affairs when that debate is resumed on Thursday. I think the hon. member and I should have no difficulty in reaching an agreement on that point, because he is always very reasonable and I am sure would have no wish to take advantage of the rules.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to displease Your Honour or to fail to take the kindly and gentle hints which help us to get on the right track, without displaying too much harshness. But I would like to tell Your Honour that this particular subject is so big and requires such thorough study that there will be plenty of information to occupy all the time at my disposal tonight as well as the time I can use in the debate on external affairs, and a good deal more beyond that. Because, contrary to the ordinarily accepted idea concerning the fall of China, the whole story is almost exactly the opposite of what the Canadian people have been told. This has been brought about by the way in which news and information in America has been managed so as to produce false impressions.

Then another matter I wish to discuss is that of the strategic importance of Formosa which, at this moment, could mean the very existence of our race and all we hold dear. By the time I have finished discussing those two subjects I am sure all my time would be exhausted in this debate and in the debate on external affairs.

If Your Honour insists that I desist from discussing this matter further, then I bow to your ruling. But I may say that in the 19 years I have been here it has always been understood that a member could discuss anything he chose in the budget debate, and also in the debate in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. Speaker: First of all I wish to thank the hon. member for indicating his comprehension of the problem and of my position in this instance. He is quite right when he says that in his many years here it has always been understood that one could discuss almost any subject in the budget debate. I do not want to change that now. But it may not have occurred very often in those 19 years the hon. member has been in the House of Commons that, concurrently with the budget debate, there has been an appointed debate on external affairs. It happens that at the moment there is listed on the order paper such a debate, and the announcement is that it is to be resumed on Thursday of this week.

The hon. member has said that he will take advantage of his opportunity to speak at that time. If the hon. member says that, because he needs more time, he is going to discuss that subject now and pursue it further on Thursday, would not his action defeat the purpose of standing order 37 which says that every hon. member is entitled to speak for 40 minutes on any one topic? Would it not also defeat the other rule as set out in standing order 43, which says that a member cannot speak twice to any question?

So there we are. The hon. member may speak for only 40 minutes, and he is not permitted to speak twice. I will tell the hon. member this, that in my view, although I do not wish to enforce it, because of the very fact that a debate on external affairs is already listed on the order paper I would be perfectly within the rules—certainly within the spirit of the rules—if I were to say that no debate on external affairs could take place in this budget debate until the debate on external affairs has been disposed of.

I would not wish to make that kind of ruling, and while the hon. member wishes to protect his position in the debate and keep it as wide as possible, perhaps he would not force the Chair to make a ruling which I would not like to make, which indeed I would be very reluctant to make at this time.

The hon. member has said that if I insist he will desist, and it would seem that he and I are in complete agreement. I welcome the fact that he has accepted my decision, even before it is rendered. I have to inform him that I do insist, and hope that, with good grace, he will desist.

Mr. Blackmore: Your Honour, the things I was going to say tonight are of the utmost importance to be said in Canada at the present time. I am going to leave it to Your Honour's responsibility, and I am going to leave the responsibility right on Your Honour's shoulders. I shall do just exactly what you say, but at the same time I feel very strongly that the information which I have all ready to give to the house is of the very first importance to this nation right now, especially in consideration of the fact that on March 24 the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) made a speech which was very injurious to the morale of Canada.

I am going to leave it to Your Honour. I shall go on with this subject on Thursday, realizing fully that it will be impossible to cover the material thoroughly. It is an easy enough matter for a person to tell a lie, for he can do it in half a minute, but to reveal that lie sometimes takes half a day and more.

Mr. Speaker: The speech the hon. member refers to was made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar during the debate on external affairs, was it not?

Mr. Blackmore: That is right.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member intend now to reply to the speech made in that debate in the confines of another debate?

Mr. Blackmore: That is correct.

Mr. Speaker: Then we are at cross-purposes here. The hon. member will recall no occasion when this has taken place. We are confronted with an overlapping of debates. It is an impossible situation. As I say, I hate to make a ruling, but I feel that at this moment I may be called upon to do so because the hon. member, after indicating that he would desist, does not seem quite prepared to do so.

I do not see how we can allow a debate on external affairs within this debate at this time when we all know that on Thursday we shall resume the debate on external affairs. As we all know, the hon. member will be taking the floor first on that occasion.

Mr. Knowles: Might I say a word on the point of order? I believe everyone knows that I am not likely to agree with the remarks which the hon. member for Lethbridge wishes to make. At the same time I feel that I must defend his rights if I believe they are under attack.

I think what Your Honour has most recently said is beyond question, namely that the hon. member for Lethbridge cannot in this debate attack a speech made by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, which was made in another debate. On that point I do not think there can be any doubt, but I do feel a bit unhappy at Your Honour suggesting that because there is a debate on external affairs before the house on another motion, that rules out any debate on foreign affairs during the time the budget is before the house.

I feel that if the hon. member has a speech on external affairs that does not relate specifically to speeches that were made in the other debate, he should not be denied the right to make that speech.

Mr. Byrne: What has it to do with the budget?

Mr. Knowles: Someone is asking, what has it to do with the budget? Not only is it traditional that the budget is a debate in which any matter can be discussed, but the reason for that tradition is that it is under the budget that money is raised for all sorts of affairs and some of that money, quite a good deal of it, is raised for external affairs, national defence and so on.

The only point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is one that perhaps I have already made. I have no objection to Your Honour ruling that the hon. member for Lethbridge must not in one debate refer to speeches made in another debate; but I believe careful thought should be given to the suggestion that there is any restriction on the subject matters that can be raised in a debate on the budget. After all, it is a pretty ancient and honourable tradition around here, and I do not wish to see it curtailed even for one who proposes to make remarks with which I will probably disagree. That, of course, is beside the point. What is at issue is that although members should not transgress the rules, they should nevertheless be given whatever rights and privileges the rules accord to them.

Mr. Speaker: I have been trying to find a citation in Beauchesne which says it is false to think that anything under the sun may be discussed during the budget debate. There is such a citation. I am trying to put my finger on it. After having made this general statement, the citation goes on to say that of course by usage for many years it has become so, that even after an amendment has been moved anything may be discussed. See citation 226, Beauchesne, third edition.

We have an amendment here that has nothing to do with the situation in China, and although by practice, even after an amendment is moved, hon. members have been allowed wide latitude in the discussion of the affairs of the country during the budget debate, do we not agree that it is merely a matter of common sense and looking at the spirit of our rules to the effect that members cannot speak twice on the same question?

Mr. Knowles: What is the same question, Mr. Speaker? Is it the subject matter or is it the motion?

Mr. Speaker: Well, the hon. member of course will agree that we cannot anticipate a debate which has been put on the order paper for consideration at a later date. There is on the order paper the resumption of a debate on external affairs. That is the question.

Mr. Knowles: He may speak only once to that motion.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. And of course at this moment, because of this general latitude which is given in a budget debate, there is the situation where a member says, "I need more than 40 minutes to develop my speech on external affairs; therefore, since I am given wide latitude on the budget I shall speak on external affairs, and then when the appointed debate on external affairs is resumed, I shall speak on it again, and if I have another chance I shall speak on it again." That has been the purport of the remarks of the hon. member for Lethbridge.

If the house wishes between now and Thursday to allow hon. members to speak on external affairs, if they wish to do so, when we resume the debate on external affairs they may speak again on external affairs only. If the latter debate is interrupted and we come back to the budget and have external affairs debated again, the latitude thus afforded certainly will not agree with the general principles of procedure to the effect that one should not duplicate arguments already used in other debates.

As I said, I do not want to rule on this because I wish to preserve what has been acquired by many years of tradition and custom, whereby hon. members have wide latitude in the discussion of the budget even after specific amendments have been moved. But I am pleading with the hon. member. What brought me to my feet was his last remark, in which he said he was going to reply to a speech made by an hon. member in a debate which is specifically known to be the debate on external affairs. If he wishes to do only that, that is another proposition.

As I said, on the other point I am not going to rule; but if the hon. member wishes to reply to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar I think he will have to wait until the debate on external affairs is resumed. There is a very good additional reason for that. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar does not happen to be here tonight. If it had been announced last evening that today we would proceed with the debate on external affairs he might be here expecting that some counter-arguments to his own speech might be presented; but as it is now, he does not expect external affairs to come up today, and it would be taking him by surprise. Would he reply to the hon. gentleman in this debate, or would he reply to him if he had another opportunity when we resume the debate on external affairs? That does not seem to agree with our general practice.

I think I have said enough on this point, and I would ask the hon. member to co-operate.

Mr. Quelch: I presume that so long as the hon. member does not reply to the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar he will be in order. I take it that we are not going to consider external affairs in a manner different from the manner in which we would consider any other department. Otherwise I can see a situation arising where an hon. member might want to discuss agriculture on the budget and also intend to speak on agriculture on the first item of the estimates of that department.

I am in that position myself; I want to discuss agriculture, and I should like to discuss it on the budget. I also intend to speak on agriculture on the first departmental item. You are now suggesting that in view of the fact that external affairs will be coming up shortly the hon. member should not speak on external affairs now and then again on Thursday. If that is so surely that would apply to every other department.

Mr. Speaker: It does not because the debate on external affairs is a specially prearranged debate. It is not a debate on the first item of the estimates of that department. The first item will come later before the committee of supply and at that time hon. members will be entitled to have a general discussion about external affairs and the estimates as studied by the committee on external affairs. But we are referring now to a specifically prearranged debate. Working through the usual channels hon. members agreed to have a debate on external affairs, and a certain date was set on which that debate was initiated. It is to that particular debate that I am referring, and not to any other debate to which the hon. member may be referring.

I do not remember an occasion when we had a budget debate during which an hon. member could speak about anything pertaining to the affairs of the country, and at the same time a specifically prearranged debate on a wide sector of our activities such as external affairs appearing on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles: There was a comparable situation earlier this session when we had the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and the debate on the NATO protocol running concurrently. I recall that some hon. members who spoke in the debate on the address in reply spoke on the NATO matter.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I think Your Honour is quite right that this debate should be limited in so far as it can be to budget matters. As you have recognized, however, almost unlimited scope is traditionally given in this debate.

It occurs to me that if the hon. member for Lethbridge desires to make more than a 40-minute speech, as he has stated he has in mind, one part of which would be by way of an answer to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in connection with the external affairs debate, he might be running counter to the rules by pursuing that course tonight. I wonder if he would accept a suggestion from me that if he thinks this portion of his remarks ought to be made first rather than second, he postpone it until the debate on Thursday and then make his answer to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Then I think the house would agree that what has happened now would not stand in the way of his joining in the budget debate after that and continuing any remarks he might like to make with respect to external affairs.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, there would be nothing to prevent the hon. gentleman discussing external affairs during the budget debate, but I think a proper objection has been taken to his referring specifically to what was said by an hon. member in another debate. If the hon. member wishes to discuss external affairs he can do so, and the only restriction upon him would be that he cannot refer to what has been said in another debate during the present session.

Mr. Coldwell: That is too bad.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I think this time should not be taken from the time allowed to the hon. member for Lethbridge, and he should be permitted to start all over again.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, all these kind considerations on the part of hon. members are certainly appreciated and they make me think that probably I had better defer this part of my speech until the external affairs debate. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has now come into the chamber, and I am giving him warning that I will have him in remembrance when external affairs come up again on Thursday.

I shall just change to another subject, and I really think I should have my full 40 minutes because I certainly have not used many minutes since eight o'clock.

I am glad in a way to speak on another matter tonight, because I had made a promise that on the first occasion available I would deal with a question which was raised some time ago by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham). Your Honour will remember that I said I was going to deal with the question of Alberta defaulting her bonds, and Your Honour suggested in your usual kindly way that I might defer that matter until some time later in order that the debate which was then in progress might be finished within the specified time. I agreed with you, and I think I shall use this opportunity to deal with the question raised by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Coldwell: You cannot quote him.

Mr. Blackmore: I am in some difficulty about quoting.

Mr. Knowles: What debate was that in?

Mr. Blackmore: The speech from the throne. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is reported on page 825 of Hansard of February 3, 1955, as having asked me why I did not tell the people about Alberta defaulting her bonds. I am not using his words, so the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar can be at ease. Later on he again asked me why I did not tell why Alberta had defaulted her bonds. Again I am not using his words. I propose now to tell about Alberta's so-called defaulting of bonds.

I said on a previous occasion that Alberta had no alternative. Alberta did not default on her bonds, she was forced into default by a series of circumstances which I now intend to present to the house. In doing so I think I am perfectly in order in this budget debate.

Let us recall that as of March 31, 1936, Alberta owed $167,037,144 carrying an average interest rate of 4·95 per cent. The annual revenue which Alberta was able to gather was only $15,000,000, so about 49 cents out of every revenue dollar had to be used to pay interest on the debt. I think today anyone will realize that a province like Alberta would have serious difficulty giving anything like the services to which the people were entitled with just slightly more than half of $15,000,000, and at the same time pay the cost of government.

This provincial debt had been contracted during years of relative prosperity, considering the prices for goods which were then prevailing. That was when much of the debt was contracted, except what was contracted during the depression in respect of relief. As I say, it was contracted when prices were fairly good and there was a measure of prosperity.

Up to that time Alberta had been largely an agricultural community. Agricultural prices were very low when Social Credit came in. Let us get the picture clearly. In large measure the debt had been contracted while times were relatively good, we will say in the twenties and in the years preceding the twenties, from 1905 on. During that time prices were fairly high. Then prices went away down to an all-time low. Conditions were such that it was next to impossible for farmers to pay their taxes.

Under those circumstances the Social Credit government was called upon to service a debt which had been contracted at a time of high prices for agricultural products and to do so with revenues which were being collected from farmers when prices were very low. This is the first important thing for everybody to get straight who wishes to understand the defaulting on Alberta's debt, or at least the so-called defaulting.

The master question that had to be answered when William Aberhart took office in 1935 was this: Could the Alberta economy at that time, in the depression, carry $167 million of debt at an average interest rate of 4·95 per cent? Premier Aberhart seriously doubted that it could. Premier Aberhart therefore employed R. J. Magor of Montreal, the best expert he could learn of, to come to Edmonton to examine into every pertinent fact with regard to Alberta's economy, particularly having reference to the people's capacity to pay taxes and the government's consequent capacity to pay interest and at the same time provide its people with the reasonable minimum standard of services.

After a thorough study Mr. Magor presented a comprehensive report. I am glad that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) is here beside me. He was at that time in the legislature, and shortly thereafter, if not up to that time, had been charged with the responsibility of acting as provincial treasurer.

As I was saying, after a thoroughgoing study Mr. Magor submitted a comprehensive report in which he gave it as his opinion that Alberta simply could not pay 4·95 per cent on $167 million of debt. Let it be borne in mind that under the U.F.A. government which held office between 1921 and 1935 the province had incurred a debt of $10 million in the form of what were called Alberta savings certificates. An Alberta savings certificate was a demand promissory note bearing interest at 4 per cent.

So that people out in the country who may read this speech and who may not have the ability to comprehend that the members of this house would have, may I make this explanation. If a citizen had $100 and felt that he would like to put it on deposit at 4 per cent interest, he could go to the appropriate officials of the Alberta government, turn in the $100 and obtain from the officials of Alberta a promise to pay, bearing interest at 4 per cent; that was a promise which the province agreed to make good on demand. In other words the individual could deposit his $100, obtain his certificate, leave his $100 there for six weeks, or six days, then go and demand his $100 and the province had to give him back his $100, no matter in what condition the province happened to find itself. Such was the Alberta savings certificate debt.

Hon. members will realize that with $10 million of indebtedness in the form of Alberta savings certificates, any provincial government whatsoever would have been in an extremely vulnerable position in case any considerable number of people holding these certificates should come and ask for their money at one time, especially if there was no reserve to take care of such a contingency. This is the first all-important thing to be borne in mind.

The next one is this. Let it be borne in mind that the inability to service these demand certificates had, on August 27, 1935, precipitated Alberta into the loss of her credit at least five days before the Social Credit party took office on September 3. All those who have any desire to be fair in appraising Alberta must bear this fact in mind. Considerable propaganda was circulated all over the country, much of it just downright lies, which purported to blame the Social Credit administration for the loss of Alberta's credit. It was all completely fallacious. The inability to service these savings certificates had caused the province to lose its credit, technically, five days before the Social Credit administration took office, although five days after the election. Let us remember that the election was on August 22, 1935, but the inability to service—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: Please get this exactly straight. The government was elected on August 22, 1935. Technically the U.F.A. government, which was still in office on August 27, had to default on these savings certificates. This was five days before the Social Credit government took office. So no blame could possibly be attached to the Social Credit government for the defaulting on Alberta's savings certificate debt.

The hon. member for Peace River reminds me that the previous government, that is the U.F.A. government, had left no reserve whatsoever. I do not want to be too harsh on the previous government. I have no particular complaint against the U.F.A. government which preceded the Social Credit government, because that government was obliged to take Alberta through the terrible depression years in which the costs of relief and other expenses were so great that they were forced into a tremendous increase of debt, a thing which they did not in any way desire to be forced into. However, those were the circumstances.

I think probably what I have already said is enough to show the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys that, on the score of defaulting on Alberta's debt, he has an extremely poor case against Social Credit, and no honourable man would press that case. I hope he is honourable enough to go out all over the country and tell the absolute truth. Then everybody will be much happier.

Because of the things I have already mentioned, it was impossible for Alberta to borrow in the world's money markets. Just as soon as the province technically defaulted on August 27 it no longer could go into the world's markets and borrow money. This is an extremely important fact. But this one also is important. The U.F.A. government had been unable to borrow money on the world's markets since the early spring of 1935; it seems to me it was some time in April. Premier Reid, who was then acting premier of the province, came to Ottawa endeavouring to get $750,000—I can remember quite distinctly reading about it—and found himself unable to get a cent. This fact is extremely important. It indicates that the province of Alberta had been really forced into default months before the Social Credit government was elected or took office.

Unfortunately malicious, adverse propaganda all over North America had so poisoned people against Aberhart and Alberta that conditions had been rendered extraordinarily and most unjustly difficult. It is important for people who did not live through those days to know that there was an outburst of adverse comment and criticism all over the country closely resembling the kind of thing that has burst out against Chiang Kai-shek, and engineered by the selfsame people.

Political opposition to Social Credit made it impossible for Alberta to borrow from the federal government of Canada. The prime minister in those days, the late William Lyon Mackenzie King, before the election was quite enthusiastic in his remarks about hands off Alberta. But just as soon as he got in power he had hands on Alberta, restraining her in every move. In addition the Bank of Canada failed to come to the aid of the province, though shortly afterward they did recommend substantial help to both Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

I hope the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys tells everybody about that. That is important. When a province like Alberta, no matter what the government is, goes to the Bank of Canada for assistance after she has done her part the very best she could and is denied assistance, it constitutes a scandal against the Bank of Canada. I wish the minister were here. However, I am sure he will read what I am saying and I hope his friends will point it out to him. I should like to ask him to tell the house some time what his solution for the problem would have been, what he would have done if he had been in Mr. Aberhart's position as premier of Alberta. And I hope he will take the trouble to document what he tells us so we shall have some evidence that he knows what he is talking about.

This was the situation. Premier Aberhart was positive that a rate of 4·95 per cent was too high and could not be borne. The bondholders and dealers in Toronto, Montreal and New York could not possibly understand the economic problem in Alberta. They could not see how it could be that if a farmer contracted a debt of $1,500, let us say, with wheat at $1.50 a bushel, and then when the time came to repay the debt found wheat was down to 25 cents a bushel, there would inevitably be reasons why the farmer could not pay the debt. It seemed impossible to make them understand that.

The bondholders hoped and believed that Premier Aberhart could and would be defeated in the 1940 election. They were not a bit desirous of being fair. But what did Aberhart do? He communicated with Alberta's bondholders asking them to refund Alberta's debt at a rate possible for Alberta to bear. In a general way he put the case to them much like this. Now, we know we owe you a good deal of money, but this administration does not owe it. In the legislature of Alberta there is not one single man who was there when the debt was contracted. They are not in any way to blame. We are desirous of being honourable with the bondholders, but it is simply idle for us to go on trying to pay an interest rate which we cannot pay, thereby accumulating more and more debt until we get to the point where you will lose everything you have invested in Alberta. We suggest that you be fair about this matter and agree to an interest rate we can carry. We will then pay the interest rate and we will pay off the bonds.

That was something like the proposition he offered them, but the bondholders paid little heed to Aberhart's request. The bondholders sent into Alberta a team of experts to study the situation and report. In this team the key man was Courtland Elliott. I do not wish to suggest anything against Courtland Elliott. As far as I know he is a very honourable and capable man. This team believed its findings had proved that Alberta could pay 5 per cent. The bondholders therefore sternly refused to refund Alberta's debt at a lower interest rate. Alberta then offered the bondholders one-half of the interest rate then carried by her bonds, pending further efforts to convince them that the cut was justified. The bondholders forthwith declared Alberta to be in default on her bonds.

Let me pause a minute to restate the situation so hon. members can understand just what happened. Alberta had been pointing out to the bondholders that she simply could not carry this heavy rate of interest, and finally she got to the point where she offered them one-half of the interest rate, whereupon they immediately declared her bonds in default. Probably when the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys gets around to the subject he will justify the action of the bondholders in doing that, and will explain how in the world under circumstances like that he can honestly say that Alberta defaulted on her bonds.

It looks as though we are going to have the filthiest election in the history of Canada, judging by the way the Liberals are behaving in Alberta and British Columbia. I think, therefore, it is fitting that we should warn ourselves beforehand that there is not going to be very much honour on one side in the coming election. Let us get the facts straight, and I do hope there will be enough Liberals who will tell the truth about the whole matter so as to keep it from being misrepresented. I am giving them the opportunity to do so by putting the facts on the record, with the man who was provincial treasurer during those trying times, the hon. member for Peace River, sitting right beside me.

The Alberta government announced that the government itself had cut the interest rate by one-half on all outstanding bonds. That was not defaulting by any means. That was simply refusing to pay a heavy rate of interest in consideration of the fact that the prices of everything Alberta was producing and marketing had fallen to such a low level as to render it impossible for her to carry out her commitments previously made.

Let it be borne in mind that the fall in prices had resulted not from Alberta's action, but had resulted, if it resulted from anything, from the actions of men in Ottawa and in the United States who represented the very governments with which Alberta was dealing. We have gotten away from those terrible times now and are able to look back, and we know that the depression with which we were struggling in 1935 was brought on directly by the United States of America and spread its devastating effect all over the world. Then we had bondholders in the United States of America and their friends in Canada blaming Alberta because she had been so sorely hit by a depression which was engineered and put into operation in the United States.

Now we come to what was to be done about this defaulting. If Alberta had left the situation just as it was without undertaking to do anything it would have been a different matter, but she was desirous of doing what was right. The hon. member for Peace River, then the provincial treasurer of Alberta, who is here to testify if I err in any way, in the spring of 1938 set about for the provincial government to recover Alberta's credit, and the province was behind him fully. He administered the treasurer's department for the provincial government with the utmost care, skill and economy. That was all he could do. He organized the government's financial affairs with the strictest wisdom. In fact, I think one of the greatest things he has ever done was that very job he did then.

He husbanded every dollar with the utmost frugality and used it with the utmost wisdom, dealing equitably with the Alberta savings certificates problem and with preparations for possible refunding. He put away a little bit here and there, at the same time trying to take care of those who were suffering, quite unintentionally, because they were unable to get the money they had lent the government in return for Alberta savings certificates. He paid off a part of the debt each year.

I hope the Liberal enthusiasts who go all over western Canada will remember to tell that Social Credit Alberta started to pay off the debt immediately. It was not because of oil that she started to pay off the debt. The large discoveries of oil did not occur until 1947. Alberta had made great progress in reducing her debt by that time, showing that she was getting herself on her feet and would have done so probably without the oil, although it would certainly have taken much longer.

The provincial treasurer then set out to visit the bondholders and others personally. He sought and obtained an appointment with the bondholders' protective council. It was adamant. It would not even listen to him, much to its disgrace. He then went to Ottawa and conferred with Dr. Clark, the deputy minister of finance, first to enlist Ottawa official's support in his refunding project, and second to ask that the dominion scale down the $8 million of treasury bills Alberta owed Ottawa. Either one of those things could have been done, but Dr. Clark was much more adamant.

He asked also that Alberta be given the royal commission's natural resources award, which would have amounted to over $10 million. This was a sum that was really coming to Alberta. It was compensation for the amount of money that Alberta had not been able to obtain during the many years Ottawa maintained control of and administered Alberta's resources. Ottawa controlled these resources from 1905, when Alberta became a province, until 1932 when they were finally handed over to Alberta.

Now, that $10 million could have been advanced to Alberta and would have enabled Alberta to deal completely with the savings certificate problem and, technically, to restore her credit. However, this $10 million was refused. He went to Montreal, Toronto, New York, Chicago and Los Angeles to confer with the bondholders and try to convince them that they should negotiate with Alberta. Among those he visited were the Kuhn, Loeb Company, Brown, Harriman and Company, the Mayflower Association, Wood, Gundy and Company, and Dominion Securities. Everywhere he found it almost impossible to make men believe—in most cases even to listen—that any Social Credit official could be sincere and honourable. This illustrates how far the lying propaganda had gone. He got nowhere.

An hon. Member: He is still there.

Mr. Blackmore: Very likely, but I would rather be in his position than in yours.

Finally he decided to talk with Courtland Elliott, the man who had assured the bondholders that Alberta could pay 5 per cent on her bonds. Mr. Low obtained an audience with that key man and prevailed upon Courtland Elliott to go over the various conclusions Mr. Elliott had arrived at which had satisfied him that Alberta could stand 5 per cent. He got Mr. Elliott to examine and talk over with him the evidence upon which Mr. Elliott had based his conclusions. They went into the details concerning the many elements that combine to make up Alberta's highly complex economy as they are set out in a very fine book called "The Case for Alberta" which Mr. Low was largely instrumental in having prepared in preparation for the Rowell-Sirois conference on dominion-provincial relations.

Gradually Courtland Elliott apparently came to see—it is impossible to tell exactly—that probably certain things had been overlooked and it would be reasonable to review the whole situation in respect of the amount that Alberta could pay. At length he apparently saw that Alberta had a real case, one that any honest man must allow. Mr. Elliott became a supporter of Alberta's case, much to his credit. Apparently Mr. Low with Mr. Elliott's help convinced Mr. John Hope, a representative of Dominion Securities, and Dominion Securities moved in behind Alberta, much to its honour and credit. Wood, Gundy and Company followed, and those two Canadian companies brought the United States companies into understanding sympathy with Alberta's refunding program, which was finally accomplished on an average coupon rate of 2·78 per cent. Alberta's credit was restored, both at home and abroad.

Probably I have gone far enough and said all that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys desired me to say. There is much more that I could say, but I think probably I have said sufficient on this occasion concerning this matter, which is very important.

It is important for another reason, Mr. Speaker. Every member, except two, who sits in this house comes from some province. Each of those provinces is having great difficulty in dealing with its financial affairs. If there is any man in this house who thinks that is not the case, I suggest he obtain permission to attend the dominion-provincial conference which is to convene before very long, and he will very soon find out. There is not a province in this dominion that is not in a relatively vulnerable position financially.

An hon. Member: Ontario.

Mr. Blackmore: Ontario, too. I was here during the depression, and I heard sad tales about the way people were being treated in various Ontario cities and towns. They are beginning to suffer now in Ontario cities and towns. If the unemployment problem gets three times worse the strain that will be placed on Ontario will be unbearable, even with Ontario's wealth. Especially will this be so if the agricultural income referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Peace River does not increase. Then the factories in Ontario will find themselves unable to sell enough of their goods to make their industries pay. They will be in serious difficulty.

Even if Ontario should not be in this difficulty, that is no reason why Saskatchewan, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and at least three-quarters of the provinces of this dominion might not be in an impossible position within a year. Let us bear that in mind. They will be in that position, not because of any measures taken by them but because of measures taken right here in Ottawa. No one is blaming the provinces today for the unemployment problem. The unemployment problem developing today is a result of the policies adopted right in Ottawa in this house. Let us bear that in mind. Remember that any province, put into a sufficient number of difficulties, ultimately will be forced to default its bonds or to put its people under circumstances which no civilized people ought to endure.

Now, Alberta was just one example. She was hit harder, and there were three or four reasons why she was hit harder. In the first place, Alberta paid a higher railway rate on everything she bought coming from the east than any other province in Canada. She paid more on goods she shipped east and west than any other province in Canada. In addition to that, Alberta was in the Palliser triangle and consequently she had to deal with droughts, seed grain relief and all that sort of thing. Only two other provinces had anything like that. Another thing was that when the land was given to the Hudson's Bay Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway, to compensate them for certain considerations in the west, that land was taken out of Alberta and Saskatchewan. It was taken in such a way that the population of Alberta has had to spread out over a wide area, making the costs of roads, schools and telephones greater than they should have been.

These were just a few of the difficulties under which Alberta laboured. I think probably I have said as much as is necessary at the present time. But I would just tell the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys that any time he wants to enter into a further discussion of this matter, all he needs to do is let me know, and I shall be right here.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the budget speech this year as I have on many other occasions. One has to search his imagination in order to understand what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) had in mind. The hon. member who replied this afternoon for the official opposition said that it confused him, and I am sure it has confused many people in this country.

It seems strange, after so many years of surpluses, so many years when we were told that we should not reduce taxation even though we were not spending as much as we were collecting, that now, at a time when we are spending more than we are collecting, we are told that we should collect less. This is not in keeping with the Scottish instincts of the Minister of Finance. It seems to me that in delivering this budget he either had a subtle inclination to popularize himself throughout the country, or else he was copying what someone else had done; because it does not sound like him at all.

Coming from almost the same district in Ontario as the minister, and he and I having had to struggle during our lives for our very existence in that district, I cannot help thinking that he must have had some other idea in mind.

I do not know whether this is a cyclical budget or a sickening budget, or just what type of budget it is. Someone intimated this afternoon to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) that it might be a cyclical budget. He spoke with that dry, Scottish humour of his; and those of you who do not like him, simply because you belong to the other side of politics, would do well to read his speech tomorrow, where he pointed out the inconsistencies of the Liberal party in the last number of years. I am sure if hon. members will read that speech they will realize that even the hon. member for Greenwood, with his enlightened mind, was still confused. He did mention, however, that it might have been a speech that was not intended to solve the economic problems of the country, but rather that it might have been one intended to solve the political problem of the Minister of Finance himself who, I see, shakes his head.

Mr. Harris: I have none.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) interjected this afternoon that the minister might have been preaching for a call. Well, those of us who belonged to the old Methodist church used to listen to preachers who were preaching for calls. I remember my mother saying to me, "That fellow won't do. I heard him this afternoon, and I know he won't please the people around here". I said, "No, we had better not call him". When I listened to the sermon, the speech on the budget, I thought probably it was one of those calls. But when I looked at the Prime Minister he looked so healthy that I had to conclude that his seat is not vacant yet.

But let me say this, that if this budget does not serve that purpose then certainly it will serve no other. There are a lot of other eligibles over there, some of whom are young enough and some who are old enough, if they had been wise enough. But I doubt if there is one who can take the place of the man who is there now.

Mr. Harris: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: No matter whether the Prime Minister stays there or not, I am satisfied there is a change coming. After being here for a number of years one has the feeling that he can sense things, and I can now hear rumblings in the mulberry bushes. I can hear discontent in the sidelines and by-lines across this country. I can hear them saying, "600,000 unemployed!".

Mr. McCann: It is the frogs you are listening to.

Mr. Rowe: You have been listening for the last ten years, and you should know. But you are so close to the bushes you cannot see the trees. I have noticed that those who are in the cabinet know least about what is going on out in the country.

Mr. McCann: Just sour grapes with you.

Mr. Rowe: And sour grapes with you, too, after the next election. I can tell you that.

Mr. McCann: That's what you have been saying for the last 20 years. For 20 years I have heard you saying that.

Mr. Rowe: I can tell you this, that if you would drive out one of these spring days and listen in the mulberry bushes of Renfrew county, you would find out something you have been ignoring about the textile plants in your riding, and the unemployed there.

Mr. McCann: There are not many.

Mr. Rowe: You say there are not many?

Mr. McCann: Just wait for a month or two and you will see where they are.

Mr. Rowe: If I had been a cabinet minister as long as you have, and—

Mr. McCann: Ask the hon. member for Greenwood how many went to hear him. There were only 18.

Mr. Rowe: You haven't even called a meeting for a while.

Mr. McCann: He had only 18 people there when he went up to address a meeting.

Mr. Rowe: You have not called a meeting for a while, either.

Mr. McCann: I have had lots of them, one of them only ten days ago, and there were 300 at it. Don't get into a racket with me, or you will get the worst of it.

Mr. Rowe: No, no, I am not at all afraid of getting the worst of it. I was here before you were, and I shall probably be here long after you are gone.

Mr. McCann: And you didn't get far, either.

Mr. Rowe: I know about the Renfrew county unemployed, whether you know it or not.

Mr. McCann: There are fewer unemployed in the Ottawa valley than in any other part of Canada.

Mr. Rowe: Go down and talk to the textile people and tell them that. What about the 8,000 unemployed in the cottons section of the textile industry alone?

Mr. McCann: That is not in my constituency.

Mr. Rowe: Oh, you don't care much about them, when they are in any other part of the country. But you are a minister for the whole country.

Mr. McCann: That is right.

Mr. Rowe: But you are just representing Renfrew. You must be getting nervous, if you are only representing one riding, and you are a minister for the whole of Canada.

Mr. McCann: Get on to the budget.

Mr. Rowe: Oh, yes, you want me to leave you now.

Mr. McCann: Oh, no.

Mr. Rowe: You want me to leave you.

Mr. McCann: I am delighted when you are with me.

Mr. Rowe: When you are getting the worst of it—

Mr. McCann: I shall never get the worst of it with you, boy.

Mr. Rowe: I never have yet.

Mr. McCann: I thought you had learned that by this time, surely.

Mr. Rowe: Let me say to my genial friend from Renfrew that a man can be here so long and he can get so smug that he does not even know how many are unemployed in Canada. I listened to you not long ago when you said there were very few unemployed in Canada. I listened to you, when I was making my speech in the debate on the speech from the throne, when you said I was exaggerating things when I said there would be 600,000 unemployed in March. By March there were 613,000 unemployed, and there are more unemployed today.

Mr. McCann: I didn't speak in the speech from the throne debate at all.

Mr. Rowe: No, you don't speak, you—

Mr. McCann: You said you heard me.

Mr. Fleming: You speak from your seat.

Mr. Rowe: You always show more brains in your seat than you do on your feet. You never rise to speak.

Mr. McCann: I will match them against yours—

Mr. Rowe: You just heckle.

Mr. McCann: I will match them against yours any time.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to Liberal apostles for the last 30 years in this house. They do not disturb me for a moment, Mr. Speaker. I say again you will hear it in Renfrew; you will hear it in Lanark, and you will hear it down through the Ottawa valley. You will hear it down in Cornwall and along the St. Lawrence valley. You will hear it in every industrial riding in Canada and in the agricultural ridings. You will hear the rumblings in the mulberry bushes. My friend the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) has quite a few unemployed in his riding.

Mr. McIvor: On a point of order, there were 800 fewer unemployed in Fort William last week than there were a year ago. That is from a source that does not tell a lie.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but there were many unemployed last year and more expecting to go on strike this year. I tell the hon. member for Fort William that I know something about the Fort William district, and I shall have something to say to him a little later on. I am not going to enlarge upon that. If there are 800 fewer unemployed I am sure the hon. member can tell me that there are still several thousand unemployed at the head of the lakes, which is a small part of Canada.

My, how this government boasts. It boasts of a country with such resources that no similar number of people in the world has ever enjoyed. It boasts about the $300 million railroad into Labrador to bring out the iron ore in that district. It boasts of the Kitimat development and the development of the resources up there. It boasts of a prairie land that is richer than land which any other people in the world enjoy. It boasts that no other 14 million people in the world have ever had the resources that we have at hand. Yet it says in one small district there are 800 fewer unemployed now than there were, but several thousands are still unemployed. We now have more people unemployed than any other important country in the world.

Stop and think of it, Mr. Speaker. What is wrong? We have a government that has sat idly by. It has been in power so long that it has become sleepy at the switch. As this budget indicates and as the Minister of Finance suggests, now that we are spending more than we collect we are going to start to collect less. When we were spending less than we collected, we collected more. Is it cyclical budgeting? I am not sure what the term is. If I were not in parliament I could give it a term.

The Minister of Finance laughs. He himself does not have a description for it. What is the plan of this government? They have no fiscal policy; they have no immigration policy; they have no financial policy. Why do we have a gunshot prescription along the line of reduction in taxes which means so little, as was exemplified by speakers who preceded me today? Is our development sound today? Ask the farmer. My hon. friend might ask the farmers of Renfrew county. Perhaps he has not met many of them for some time. He might ask them if they think the dairy industry is healthy; he might ask them if the poultry and egg industry is healthy; he might ask them if the beef cattle industry is healthy. There is nothing in this budget that will help the farmer.

I was amazed that the Minister of National Revenue would even venture to challenge the argument that the textile industry of this country is not in a healthy condition today. Surely no one who has worshipped at the shrine of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier as he has, can now say that our textile industry is flourishing. The late Sir Wilfrid Laurier fashioned the policy of those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, a policy that half of them have never followed since because we have more mongrel stripes of fiscal policy across there than have ever been in one group since confederation. We have the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) who is a higher protectionist than the highest protectionist on this side. We have some hon. gentlemen in the other corner in the house who are lower protectionists than the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier ever proposed to be, and we have those in the centre who do not say where they are going because they do not know. The ones on the left of Mr. Speaker have no fiscal policy whatsoever.

I wonder whether they ever pause to wonder, if it were not for the expenditure on defence, if it were not for the expenditure on expansion of industries that hope they will get a square deal in this country later on, what would happen to our development at the present time? Does the Minister of Finance not pause to realize that Canada with 14 million people imports more finished products representing the labour of foreign countries than the United States with 160 million people? We import more in actual dollars, not percentage-wise, than the United States. I would ask my hon. friend to take off that old dusty halo of free trade which is around his head and look the issues squarely in the eye and realize that if we are to expand industry we must find a home market in this country.

This budget, Mr. Speaker, proposes to reduce corporation taxes by some 2 per cent. That may help a little bit. I am one of those who believe that if you give corporations a chance they will give employment. If you increase depreciation, they will do their part. I do not agree with some of my friends to my immediate left. I am not sure at times where my friends to my extreme left are going. My friends to my immediate left suggest that all these things should be taken over by the government. I wonder who would be left to pay the taxes.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that when you tax corporations you tax the shareholders of the corporations and you tax all along the line. You milk industry of most of the incentive that gives employment to greater numbers; therefore I am bound to agree with the Minister of Finance in his slight, modest gesture to encourage industry by reducing corporation taxes by 2 per cent. You are still taking almost half of everything the corporation makes. The Minister of Finance, or his colleagues, are criticizing industry for not running their business right. They say we need more efficiency in order to pay more wages. I do not know any machinery that needs more efficiency than the cabinet right there in the front row.

Independent of politics, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that they employ—and I shall vote for it—an efficiency expert and pay him far more than any of the present cabinet is worth to show them the fallacy of some of their politics.

Mr. Harkness: He would recommend the dismissal of practically all of them.

Mr. Rowe: I think he would recommend the dismissal of about seven-eighths of them; in fact I would join him on at least half of them.

The present budget does not propose to do anything. The Minister of Finance said he did not intend to propose that. He said we did not have hard times, and that this year promises to be a good year.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: My hon. friend says hear, hear. It is to be a good year. It is always a good year for the fellow sitting in the back row who has not much responsibility.

Mr. McIlraith: Some of the members on the front row have a great deal of responsibility.

Mr. Rowe: I do not know; I have never noticed the hon. member demonstrate an awful lot of responsibility around here.

Mr. McIlraith: I was looking at the front row.

Mr. Rowe: Who is it going to help? The minister did not reduce taxes to stimulate business, because business did not need stimulating. He did not reduce taxes because we were collecting more than we were spending. He reduced taxes because of a deficit. Without wanting to be facetious I could not help wondering why the reduction. He says that if we have $26 billion of income, if we sell all our wheat which has been grown this year and what we have not sold for the last two years, everything will be all right. If that does not happen, well it will still be all right. I am wondering if he expects to be minister of finance at that time. I would much rather see him promoted than demoted.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Rowe: I am afraid if I did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre might doubt my motives. I think if the hon. member wanted to please a lot of people he might have reduced the sales tax. I can remember the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King almost weeping in this house when he ridiculed the Conservative party for putting on a 6 per cent sales tax. He said that it was the most iniquitous tax ever imposed on the people of any country. The poor pensioners, the war widows, the veterans and the crippled people would have to pay 6 per cent on everything they bought. He was going to remove it immediately; he threatened to remove it, but he got into power and added 2 per cent more, and we are now paying about 10 per cent. These apostles of economy now suggest that they have reduced the income tax for those who pay income tax, but the sales tax stays as it was.

It seems to me that is a strange type of procedure. If the Minister of Finance had said that things look a little dangerous, that there was a chance that the $26 billion revenue would be reduced to $22 billion; if he had said as he said in Montreal that taxes are too high—the minister shakes his head, indicating that he did not say that.

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Rowe: Misquoted again.

Mr. Harris: Pretty high, not too high.

Mr. Rowe: Why did you lower them if they are not too high? I think you said they were dangerously high.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): How high is pretty?

An hon. Member: How high is up?

Mr. Rowe: I do not want to reflect upon the press, but I must say that I have never seen so many misquoted people as those who make up the present cabinet. I would not want to embarrass the minister. Whether they were pretty high, too high or still high, I suggest to him that over long years we have suggested that they were very high and this year we find them reduced for a rather conspicuous lack of reason.

Mr. Harris: The hon. member should ask the hon. member for Greenwood, who heard me use those words in Montreal.

Mr. Rowe: He heard you use the words, but from what he said this afternoon I thought those were the words you used. That statement seems to be just as mysterious as the budget itself. I shall not enlarge on that further. I say again that the budget is a most difficult document to understand. After listening to the Minister of Finance I am convinced that this government has no definite and fixed policy. The Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, formerly prime minister of this country, stated in 1919 that they had what was more or less a chart. It was just like the chart you use when you go to sea. If there is a storm you forget the chart. He forgot it shortly after he was elected. He never followed the chart. The present government have not even a chart. They are drifting on the ebb and flow of good times.

For ten years this government have drifted on the crest of a prosperity which was more or less abnormal and unnatural. They have no policy with respect to fiscal matters; they have no fixed policy with respect to taxation; they have no fixed policy with reference to the development of our resources for our own people. I shall not go into that tonight in detail, but I say that no government since confederation has been so lucky. We are a people blessed with great resources, but the fact is that with 14 million people we sold more unfinished goods with less labour content in them than any other similar number of people in the world. Are we to remain more or less hewers of wood and drawers of water for other countries? I think it is time to stop, look and listen.

What we need in this country is a sound fiscal policy. We need a sound taxation policy. There is very little in this budget that means anything for the municipalities. Canada is a large country, and Canada needs transportation. Canada needs a four-lane highway from east to west. Canada is especially adapted to co-operation between the provinces and the dominion. I can remember that election campaign when the billboards were filled with posters depicting the happy family of Liberalism. Never have the provinces in this dominion been more divided than they are today. Unity—how this party carried the olive branch of unity in one hand with the sword of division in the other. In order to keep in power during the last 25 years they were ready to see one province build a highway to the border of the next province.

What have you done? You have robbed the provinces and you have robbed the municipalities. You have taxed the people; you have taken a greater percentage from the people in taxation than any other government since confederation. You have done the least for the provinces of any government since confederation, in the light of our development. We should have had a trans-Canada highway as part of our transportation system.

I can well recall when we were discussing the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway which is now being undertaken. I compliment the government on doing it at long last. The deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway and the development of power on that great system will provide one of the greatest inland water systems in the world. I well remember when I was the leader of the Progressive Conservative party in Ontario in 1936 and suggested that we should do everything we could to bring about the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway. I remember some of my hon. friends who sit to your right, and some who are not here today, saying that was childish prattle, that we would never need to deepen the St. Lawrence waterway. They are now the champions of the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway. How they have climbed on the bandwagon.

The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) will remember when they said I was talking childish prattle when I suggested that we needed the St. Lawrence development. As the comedian said, that was a few years ago. We now see some of these hon. gentlemen championing great causes to which they were opposed just a few years ago. My opposition at that time said that we would never need power from the St. Lawrence. They figured that we could get power just like you would buy buns off a shelf. Rather than talk about the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: I certainly can get better advice back here than I will ever get over there; don't worry about that.

Mr. Winters: Start on a new subject.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, Mr. Speaker, what a difference a few years make.

Mr. Winters: Is that the new subject?

Mr. Rowe: My hon. friend from Winnipeg laughs. He did not even belong to your party in those days. He was just of neuter gender politically at that time. He was a coalitionist. I am glad he has graduated even into Liberalism. But even that is the next nearest thing to neuter gender in Canadian politics today. On no issue has the Liberal party had a policy. On the St. Lawrence waterway the Liberal party had no policy, and I say that advisedly.

Mr. Fulton: They have not changed over the years.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I do not know now why they boast so much about what they are doing. However, I compliment the government today on being at last shoved into a position by the policies of those in our party and by the pressure of the public generally, where they have at least given their O.K. for the development of the great St. Lawrence waterway. I believe the great St. Lawrence waterway, the greatest inland water route in the world, will be the greatest boon to Canada to happen since confederation. I think the development of power in that district, along with the power that will be developed in the extreme west and the extreme east, will mean a great deal to our future development. I think the transportation of iron ore from Labrador to the inland sections of Ontario, and the transportation in connection with trade and commerce generally through the great St. Lawrence waterway system when it is completed, will be looked upon in the next 25 years as one of the greatest steps in the development of the world.

An hon. Member: A good policy.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, a good policy; and your party opposed that policy when we were suggesting it. But, Mr. Speaker, I am also one of those who believe that this country has a great future. I am not at all depressed. All these passing phases in our history are just like shadows at night. The government who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, have been in power for a long time. Now that they are rapidly, conspicuously and awkwardly approaching the twilight of their career, I can see that this country shall go on. It has been very strong to endure even the weaknesses of the policies they have enunciated. They may laugh but had they not had the advantage of fortunate circumstances in the world the policies they have enunciated or their lack of policies would have caught up with them long before this time.

They are now catching up with them. Just the other day I was wondering how the present government could endure another Easter holiday, in view of the statements that have been made by the Minister of Finance and by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Usually when you see a government starting to fall to pieces the leading lights of that government start to make mistakes, and they make clumsy statements.

I am one of those who believe that we need in Canada many millions more people. I have a keen regard for those men and women who come to this country and who are ready to work. The great Professor Einstein, who died the other day, had a formula involving X, A and B, where X meant one thing, B another and A was work. We need people who are not afraid of work. There is dignity in work, in hard labour.

There are not many members of this house who, one way or another, have not done some hard labour. In fact most members did some hard labour to get here at all, to say nothing of what they have done on the farms or in other places. I think I was happier in the hayfield than I was in election campaigns, as far as work was concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I have great regard for these new Canadians. I have great regard for these men who come from all parts of the world, these Czechoslovaks, these Hungarians, these Polish people, these German people. I have great regard for all these people who have come to this country because they saw here the greatest heritage that has ever been enjoyed by any similar number of people. I feel sympathetic toward the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration with regard to the remark he made. It probably was a slip of the tongue. I always feel sympathetic towards young men. As you know, Mr. Speaker, and as my hon. friend points out, some men are born to greatness, some achieve greatness and some have greatness thrust upon them. But after you have greatness thrust upon you, you sometimes get confused as to whether you were born to it or whether you achieved it.

As I say, I have great sympathy for the minister. I have made mistakes, and many of them, in the past; most of my friends over on this side have done so also. I would not want to be too critical of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). I realize that this is his first experience in the cabinet. I hope it is not his last. But, Mr. Speaker, I could not help thinking about what happened when he travelled out to the west. He is one who with his colleagues had been so zealous to make sure that we dispensed with the word "royal" in the royal mail and with the word "dominion" and everything that had the slightest reference to the British connection.

As he rode out to western Canada in a private car called the "Dominion of Canada" car, I could not help wondering. I was rather proud of the fact that he still used the word "dominion" even though his colleagues did not like that word. They did not like the word "dominion"; they did not like the word "royal". They did not like even the Canadian train to be called the "Royal Canadian". They would rather have it just "Canadian", whether it is any faster or slower. They do not like these things. I was therefore glad that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration still clung to the word "dominion" and had it on the side of his private car. I was glad he had it called the "Dominion of Canada" car.

But despite his zealousness to preserve the name "dominion" I wondered if, when he made his famous speech out there, he had in mind the children of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair). I know the hon. member for Coast-Capilano has lovely children. I saw those little girls. If ever I was charged with anything it would be for kidnapping such beautiful little children. My grandchildren are like them, although they are not any better looking than are the children of the Minister of Fisheries. I am a great lover of children myself; I could adopt any number of them.

Mr. Fulton: But you have not a private car.

Mr. Rowe: No, but if I could get enough children I would buy a private car. I am extremely fond of children. I am glad to see these young cabinet ministers so proud of their children that they think they are better than any other children, or better than children born any place else. There is nothing like local pride. I know my wife often says to me, "Oh, stop talking about your grandchildren; other people also have grandchildren". I know how the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Minister of Fisheries feel about the matter.

After seeing these children I can understand how they could say there are no other children like them. I can appreciate that they are some of Canada's best. But, Mr. Speaker, I sometimes wonder whether the minister made that statement because the Minister of Trade and Commerce has gone to Australia and is far away. In view of his record since, I think the Hon. C. D. Howe—

Mr. Winters: Right honourable.

Mr. Rowe: Right Hon. C. D. Howe; thank you. In view of his record he must have been a lively looking baby at one time, but still he was not born in Canada. I wonder whether it is because he is away in Australia that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration thought it was fair to take a sideswipe at him and say that if he had been born in Canada he would have made a better minister of trade and commerce. If he had been born in Canada he would probably never have said, "What's a million?" If he had been born in Canada he would never have had that American recklessness, and he might have been a much better minister altogether.

Then I wonder whether the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration forgot Sir John A. Macdonald, the greatest statesman Canada has ever had, bar none. Next to him is the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and away down the line are some of these satellites. But if Sir John A. Macdonald had been born in Canada what a great man he would have been. An Irishman once said that he was born in Ireland but he could have been born in Canada if he had liked. I think it was too bad Sir John A. Macdonald was not born in Canada. Even those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, would have thought more of him than they have demonstrated in their memories of everybody else but him.

Then there is the late Hon. Humphrey Mitchell. He was quite a character and quite a good man. I had a very warm affection for Humphrey Mitchell, as did many people in the house. I knew him very well for many years, and had much to do with him on labour matters. He was a most delightful man, but poor Humphrey would have felt very badly if he had thought there would be any reflection on him because he was not born in Canada, especially from one of his colleagues. Then I think of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Sure.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take much more time of the house.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member may score a goal in overtime.

Mr. Rowe: Well, if I have not scored a goal by now I had better not go on.

Mr. McCann: We will take out the goaler.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Rowe: It is sometimes difficult to score a goal if the referees are not watching. I remember that in the old Methodist church they used to say there were not many souls saved after 20 minutes. I have never saved many Liberals in the house after 25 minutes, so I do not know whether I should go on. However, even though I do not agree with the philosophy of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and everything he says, I think it is generally agreed he is one of the outstanding debaters in the house, but unfortunately he was not born in Canada and has to bear the brunt of it. Then there is the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck). Unfortunately he happens to have been born in Buffalo. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) was not born in Canada either. My dear friend who interrupted me earlier, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), was born in Ireland, and it is obvious he was born there. Then I find that I was not born in Canada.

Mr. Winters: That is the reason for the speech.

Mr. Rowe: As I have gone down the corridors and met my friend the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, whom I have known unparliamentarily for some time as Jack Pickersgill, I have often wondered why he has not been more friendly to me. I thought it was because I was a Conservative but now I find it was because I was born at Hull, Iowa, in the United States. I cannot help that now, at this late date. I cannot help thinking, as a further example of his thoughtless expressions probably arising from his inexperience and exuberance, of another quite prominent debater and wondering whether he forgot him. I have listened to this hon. member often in the house and have come to admire him. I refer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who was not born in this country either. He must have felt the minister's statement very keenly.

Indeed, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, one of the first prime ministers of Canada, was not born in Canada either, and he was a prominent Liberal. I believe Hon. George Brown was born outside of Canada, as was the late Right Hon. D'Arcy McGee. If D'Arcy McGee were here and in his usual form he would describe in a much better way than I can what the minister's statement means so far as making two classes of citizens in the dominion is concerned.

Then I sometimes wonder if the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration realizes that he represents the constituency of Bonavista-Twillingate. I have not been in that section of the country—

An hon. Member: Neither has he.

Mr. Rowe: —but he has not been there very much either. I wonder whether he realizes that none of the electors who elected him to parliament were born in Canada. He must have more affection for children than I have, because evidently the only people he really loves in Bonavista-Twillingate are the babies. All those who elected him were born before Newfoundland was a part of Canada at all. I could not help thinking of that song, "Oh, What a Beautiful Baby".

Mr. McCann: Sing it.

Mr. Rowe: He may have been a beautiful baby but, baby, look at him now. I wondered whether the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration realized he was not contributing very much to the development of this country by distinguishing these babies as he has. I have imposed on the hospitality of the house for five minutes and there are a lot of other things I should like to say.

Mr. Winters: Go ahead.

Mr. Rowe: But I always feel—

Mr. Winters: You will not have a more appreciative audience.

Mr. McCann: We will give you until ten o'clock to score.

Mr. Rowe: It is the first thing you ever gave me.

An hon. Member: He is better at taking things away.

Mr. McCann: There may be other opportunities.

Mr. Rowe: You have taken quite a bit from me at different times. I always feel it is not good sportsmanship to impose upon the hospitality of the house when one is given extra time. I think it would be particularly unethical and not showing courtesy to my colleagues on both sides of the house if I were to proceed to say the things I should like to say, because the things I should like to say and should say would not be as unanimously accepted as the extension of time to which you so generously agreed. So I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the time you have given me.

On motion of Mr. Zaplitny the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Harris the house adjourned at 9.54 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 20, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COLDWELL—LETTER FROM CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY RESPECTING NEW TRAIN AND ISSUANCE OF PASSES THEREFOR

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I think affects the privileges of all members of the house and the members of the other place. There has been placed on my desk a copy of a letter to the Clerk of the House from the Canadian Pacific Railway which I should like to read. It is dated April 15, 1955, and is as follows:

Dear Mr. Raymond:

As you know, Canadian Pacific on April 24 next will, through the Canadian, trains 1, 2, 11 and 12, inaugurate a new standard of passenger transportation in Canada. The reception of this new endeavour of Canadian Pacific by the travelling public has been most gratifying and advance reservations indicate that the demand will often exceed the space available.

In light of the large investment of the company in the new equipment and the demand for space, it has been decided that where possible the Canadian will be used exclusively for revenue passengers. Restrictions are being placed on all passes issued by Canadian Pacific.

Under section 351 of the Railway Act, the company is required to honour free transportation issued by you pursuant to that section on any trains of the company. Canadian Pacific cannot, therefore, restrict free transportation issued to senators, members of the House of Commons and members and staff of the board. We would, therefore, ask your co-operation in bringing to the attention of all to whom you issue free transportation certificates the necessity as far as possible of ensuring that the train be made available for revenue passengers. This co-operation by members of the Senate, House of Commons and by the board will not impose too great an inconvenience in that the present transcontinental train, the Dominion, which is designated Nos. 7 and 8, will continue to operate on a high standard of service providing an opportunity for a comfortable and enjoyable journey across Canada.

Sincerely yours,
N. R. Crump,
Vice-President.

I raise this as a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, because the Railway Act is quite clear. The Canadian Pacific Railway, in common with other railways, receives certain concessions from parliament, and to send a letter of this description to the Clerk of the House of Commons to be conveyed to members of the house is in effect an attempt to infringe upon the right which we have under the Railway Act. I respectfully suggest that the Clerk should ignore the contents of the letter.

MRS. FAIRCLOUGH—REFERENCE TO STATISTICAL INFORMATION RELEASED TO THE PRESS

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, in the newspapers today there appears certain statistical information with reference to the employment situation in Canada which is released jointly by the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics. These releases come out each month and those members of the house who have indicated their desire to have the information usually receive it in due course. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that surely such releases could be put in the hands of members of parliament at the same time that they are released to the press. Right up to this present hour I have not received this information which I feel I have a right to have as a member of the house. The matter has been referred to and is now a topic of comment, but up to the present time I have not received a copy of the release. I feel that every member of the house who has signified that he or she wishes to receive this information should have it at the same time that members of the press gallery are given copies.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE OF GRAIN HANDLERS AT LAKEHEAD

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the house that a settlement of the dispute affecting terminal elevator employees at the lakehead was reached this morning. I know that our news service is so efficient that this information has reached hon. members before now, but I think in closing this matter I should place upon the record the terms of the settlement.

The terms tentatively agreed upon yesterday in the negotiations between the parties conducted before the industrial inquiry commissioner, Mr. Eric Taylor, who was appointed by my department last week, were approved by the members of the brotherhood at a meeting held this morning. The terms of settlement are as follows:

Period of Contract: January 1, 1954, to December 31, 1956.

Labour Conditions

Wages: Effective January 1, 1954, 5 cents per hour additional.

Effective October 1, 1954, 3 cents per hour additional.

Effective January 1, 1955, 2 cents per hour additional.

Effective January 1, 1956, 2 cents per hour additional.

Statutory Holidays: Two extra days with pay if not worked, making a total of eight such holidays in the calendar year.

Health and Welfare: Blue Cross medical plan on a 50-50 basis, effective May 1, 1955. The monthly contribution by the employers to this fund is $3.50 and the same amount by the employees.

The new contract will contain the following additional provisions: (a) a provision setting out the rights of management; (b) a provision prohibiting strikes or lockouts during the period of the contract; (c) a provision for a more modern procedure with respect to the settlement of grievances; (d) a provision defining probationary employment.

I should like to express appreciation for the sensible and sincere manner in which, in the last 48 hours, the two parties to the dispute have dealt with this matter, resulting in this settlement, which enables the movement of a particularly sensitive product of Canada at this time. I also wish to pay tribute to the mediator and to the senior officials of my own department for their work in connection with the case.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, on behalf of the people of the lakehead we wish to thank the minister for the speed—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McIvor: —with which he appointed the mediator, Mr. Taylor, and for a job well done.

REPORTED UNEMPLOYMENT CONDITION AT SEVEN ISLANDS, QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) asked me a question regarding the assembly of new Canadians who are unemployed at Seven Islands, Quebec. At that time I gave him an immediate reply based upon my memory of a tentative report we then had. I should like now to make some correction in the reply I gave on that date. I am particularly speaking of this matter again in view of a dispatch which appeared in this morning's Gazette.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Since seeing that dispatch I have asked our director of employment to get in touch with the situation directly and immediately, and this is his report to me at noon today. He says:

> I got in touch with Mr. Simard, local office manager, unemployment insurance commission, by telephone.
> Following our investigations last week he made a thorough study of the situation and he reported to me there are 448 unemployed people registered in his office. Of this number, 120 are designated by him personally as immigrants.

That is the special correction I wish to make with regard to my own statement. I said the other day that it was 80, as it appeared to me to be at that time. He goes on to say:

> He had no easy way, of course, of ascertaining whether or not these workers were immigrants but he used this method. He had the leaders get together the various ethnic groups and they came to his office and registered. These were as a consequence designated by Mr. Simard as the immigrants under discussion.
> It developed that there were a total of 120. This is an increase over the figure of 80 that was at first estimated. However 50 per cent of the 120—again this is an estimate—are former iron ore company employees who would ordinarily be called back on a seniority basis. They returned to Seven Islands earlier without being called back and as a consequence are still out of work and may be until May 15.
> Twenty-three of the 120 are of Greek origin and were brought to Seven Islands by a Greek society. Of this group, only one has been in Canada less than a year.
> Mr. Simard reports further that of the 120 about 60 of them are drawing unemployment insurance benefits.
> He emphasizes the fact that there are not 600 immigrants involved in this problem and actually the 23 Greeks are the only ones that seem to be short of funds and steps are being taken to see that they do not suffer hardships.
> Mr. Simard emphasizes that there is no crowding around the unemployment insurance commission office and that everything is completely under control.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

LOSS-LEADER SELLING—TABLING OF REPORT

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I wish to table the report of the restrictive trade practices commission of an inquiry into loss-leader selling.

Hon. members will remember that, when legislation forbidding the practice of resale price maintenance was recommended by the MacQuarrie committee and enacted by parliament, fears were expressed in some business quarters that the abolition of resale price maintenance would lead to an increase of so-called loss-leader selling. It was feared that this would have certain harmful effects both on retailers and on manufacturers. The MacQuarrie committee therefore recommended that an inquiry be made into the prevalence and effects of loss-leader selling with a view to recommending suitable legislation, if any were considered necessary, to deal with it. The government, also, when the legislation forbidding resale price maintenance was being debated, promised to give close attention to its effects and to any practices which might develop as a result of it to any further legislative action that might, therefore, seem appropriate. The inquiry into loss-leader selling was in pursuance of these considerations.

The report, which the government is now engaged in studying, expresses the opinion that the practice of loss-leader selling does not call for legislative action at the present time.

Copies of the report in English are being distributed to members by the joint distribution branch. Owing to the length of the report, the French edition is not yet ready. Translations of the introductory and conclusion chapters are available and are being distributed by the joint distribution branch. The complete French edition will be distributed at the earliest possible date.

QUESTION

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—ADMINISTRATION COSTS

Mr. Balcom:

1. What amounts were shown under the heading of administration costs of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, during each of the following years: 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953, 1954?
2. Are carrying charges on properties used in connection with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?
3. If so, what amount for each of the above periods?

He said: May I ask permission to withdraw this question for redrafting?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Question withdrawn.

SAINT JOHN, N.B., IMMIGRATION BUILDING

Mr. Bell:

1. What was the total cost of the new immigration building at Saint John, New Brunswick?
2. How many immigrants was this building designed to accommodate per day?

Mr. Pinard: Return tabled.

He said: Dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

USE OF TITLE "ROYAL" ETC.

Mr. Pinard: I should like to ask my hon. friend if he would allow this item to stand a few days because I am collecting information which will make it possible for me to deal with the matter later.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION ACCOUNTS

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

REFERENCE TO TRIP OF MINISTER DURING EASTER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I should like to address a question to the minister of immigration. Did he enjoy his trip with his family to British Columbia in his private car during the Easter recess despite the fact that the words "Dominion of Canada" were painted on the car in which he travelled?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I enjoyed it very much.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO FIRE AT ROCKCLIFFE BARRACKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he has received a report from the Ontario fire marshal in connection with the fire at Rockcliffe air station last Saturday? If so, is he in a position to convey the contents of that report to the members of this house?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I have not received, as yet, any report from any of the investigations which are being made, including the one which the Leader of the Opposition has mentioned. I therefore cannot make any statement at this time.

STATEMENT ON LAY-OFFS AT LEASIDE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): On Monday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Eglinton asked a question with regard to employment in the car repair shops at Leaside. The hon. members for York-Scarborough, Spadina and York East have also discussed the same matter with me. After receiving these inquiries I obtained from the management of the Canadian National Railways the following information:

In examining maintenance requirements for rolling stock the management came to the conclusion that substantial economies and greater efficiency of operation could be realized by transferring car repair work to other railway shops with modern equipment and plant lay-out already available and currently not used to capacity. Accordingly they decided that the Leaside shop should be closed. The shop at Leaside, originally designed for engine repairs, is one of the smaller car repair shops and has a staff of approximately 270. It is expected that 150 of them will be given employment in other shops of the company probably at Toronto, London or Montreal.

In taking this step the management was careful to ensure that the interests of the employees affected are properly protected in accordance with the governing wage agreements and the matter was discussed with leaders of the labour organizations concerned.

While I am on my feet—

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Before the minister goes on to another matter, may I ask him why more notice was not given to the employees affected of this intended closing of the shop? Why was the notice so short?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Marler: I am unable to state what notice was given, and therefore cannot express an opinion whether or not the notice was short.

Mr. Fleming: It was very short.

STATEMENT ON LAY-OFFS AT WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): If I might deal with another question, Mr. Speaker, on Monday the hon. member for Winnipeg North asked a question concerning the Canadian National railway shops at Winnipeg. In this connection the management of Canadian National Railways have supplied the following information:

The increasing use of diesel motive power has resulted in a lesser need for steam locomotives and in a reduction in their maintenance.

After studying the position in western Canada the management came to the conclusion that substantial economies and greater efficiency of operation could be realized if the shop repairs to steam locomotives heretofore done in the main shops at Fort Rouge and Transcona were carried out entirely at Transcona and if the shop work on diesel locomotives and repairs to car equipment were consolidated at the Fort Rouge shops.

The management also advises that they propose to carry out at the Fort Rouge roundhouse the work on steam and diesel switch engines now performed at the Winnipeg east yard roundhouse.

It is estimated that as a result of these changes there will be a reduction in staff of approximately 100. In all of these changes the interests of the employees affected are properly protected in accordance with the governing wage agreements and the matter was discussed with leaders of the labour organizations concerned.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre yesterday referred to staff reductions by the Canadian National Railways at Winnipeg and other places and put the following question to me:

> How does he square the lay-offs now taking place with his statement in the house on February 7 that no further staff lay-offs were anticipated?

If the hon. member will reread Hansard of February 7 he will find the opinion there given was that of Mr. J. R. McMillan, vice president of the railway in Winnipeg, and not that of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Knowles: But the minister put it on the record.

Mr. Marler: I think if my hon. friend would read my statement in Hansard he would find that it is perfectly in conformity with the facts.

STATEMENT ON LAY-OFFS AT BROCKVILLE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stanton) asked a question concerning reductions in the staff of the Canadian National Railways at Brockville.

The management of the railways advise that after examination of the situation at Brockville they reached the conclusion that it would be in the interests of economy to eliminate Brockville as a through-car inspection point, and pursuant to this decision 26 car men were laid off on April 15.

IMMIGRATION

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF PREMIER OF NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has seen the press report to which I referred yesterday, may I ask him if he is now in a position to answer the question I put at that time, namely as to what right Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland has to say that certain persons giving certain information would be given the "bum's rush", and if they were Germans they would be deported.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will leave it to hon. members opposite to make comments on press reports which may or may not be accurate.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland has any authority to announce the intention of deporting anybody in Newfoundland.

An hon. Member: Yes or no.

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Eglinton is a lawyer, and is just as familiar as I am with the Immigration Act.

Mr. Ferguson: You are not very familiar with it. You don't know anything about it. He knows nothing about it.

Mr. Fleming: May I perhaps assist the minister to be more communicative by asking him if he, as Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, has given any authority to Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland to announce deportation of persons in that province?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not the function of my department to exercise censorship of the free speech of any Canadian.

Mr. Fleming: The minister did not answer the question, or even come close to it. May I ask him if he, as Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, has given any authority to the premier of Newfoundland to make an announcement of his intention to deport any person from Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Answer, answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will be delighted to answer the hon. member. The hon. member, who helped to frame the Immigration Act, knows what powers the Immigration Act gives to the minister and he knows perfectly well that it gives the minister no power to authorize any person, except a person in the employ of the department, to act for the department.

[Later:]

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if he has had a communication in any form from Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland in reference to the premier's threat to deport certain persons from that province?

Mr. Pickersgill: The answer is "no".

Mr. Fleming: I hope this will be final.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

REFERENCE TO CRASHES OF T-33 AIRCRAFT IN MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Since 19 lives have been lost in 20 crashes of T-33 aircraft during the last year in Manitoba, is the air force contemplating grounding T-33's pending an investigation as to whether the aircraft is to blame, or the methods of training. Are any changes in administration contemplated in Manitoba stations?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. May I say at the outset that I do not agree with the suggestion contained in the latter part of his question, that either lack of airworthiness of the aircraft or the method of training is responsible for the accidents which have taken place.

Naturally the Royal Canadian Air Force and the department are very much concerned with any accidents which result in loss of life. But, as I said, in answer to a question placed on the order paper by the hon. member, the answer to which appears at page 2431 of Hansard for March 28 last, our aircraft accident rate in Canada compares very favourably with those of the United States and the United Kingdom.

With respect to the T-33 crashes which have taken place in Canada, I may say that it is routine practice for expert R.C.A.F. accident investigators to investigate each specific accident thoroughly. This has been done in respect of each T-33 crash. After a careful reconstruction of each crash, in so far as it was possible, the Royal Canadian Air Force is convinced that no pattern has emerged from these accidents which would indicate any structural defects or any lack of airworthiness in the aircraft. There is therefore no appreciable reason why the aircraft should be grounded. As a matter of fact the T-33 has had a long and very good record of service both in the United States and in Canada.

Instructional techniques employed by the Royal Canadian Air Force have gone through a long and gradual evolution and are similar to and in some respects are considered superior to methods employed by other major air forces.

I might also add that the concentration of T-33 accidents in Manitoba is probably not unrelated to the fact that practically all T-33 flying training and weapons training in the Royal Canadian Air Force is being carried out in Manitoba. The scope of this training can be judged when I mention that there are several hundreds of T-33's involved.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask a supplementary question? Are any changes being contemplated in the administration of the stations in Manitoba?

Mr. Campney: Not that I am aware of.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED DENIAL OF RIGHT TO TRANSFER CONTROL OF STATION CKNW, NEW WESTMINSTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, notice of which I did not send him. He may wish to take this as notice. Will the minister tell the house why such a well known and respected firm as Southam Press company was denied the right to the transfer of the application for control of radio station CKNW, New Westminster, by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation board of governors, as announced in this morning's Montreal Gazette?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I shall have to take this question as notice.

POLIOMYELITIS

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRIBUTION OF SALK VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, which is a follow-up to my question to him on March 7 last. Has the government, in co-operation with the provinces, any plans to take over or take part in the distribution of the proven Salk poliomyelitis vaccine, which is shortly to be available on the Canadian market through commercial drug houses, in the same manner as it is doing with the supply of the Connaught laboratories of Toronto?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Mackenzie has given me notice of a question which I think in some particulars is the same as the question which my hon. friend has just asked me. The hon. gentleman who has just put his question did not give me notice of the specific question and consequently in fairness I feel that I should refer to the hon. member for Mackenzie.

The federal government, of course, has no control in so far as control of the distribution of products of any commercial organization is concerned. It is true that the Minister of National Health and Welfare did give a licence to two commercial companies, but that licence had to do with the testing of the potency and the safety of the particular vaccine. It will be a matter for provincial action as to whether or not there should be in any way control directed over the distribution in a province of a company. However, I think the question presupposes facts that are not really the case. It should be understood that the only sources of supply of the vaccine in the United States will be the commercial companies. That is not the case in Canada. The main source of supply for some time will be the Connaught laboratories at the University of Toronto, and within a very short time as well the institute of microbiology at the University of Montreal. I cannot say exactly when the commercial product will be available, although perhaps one company now is in the process of distributing, in certain parts of Canada, some small quantities of the vaccine.

Whatever control is being arranged has already been provided for as a result of a decision made by the ten provinces and the federal government last fall before the full value of the vaccine was made known. As a result of those prearrangements, I believe there will be in Canada as great a measure of control providing for the availability of this vaccine as exists in any other jurisdiction in the world at the present time. Much credit for this should go to the provinces and to the federal government who were able to make this arrangement, and I should like to say particularly to the Connaught laboratories who have played such a distinguished role in this very important matter.

As I have said publicly, great credit for the vaccine must go primarily to Dr. Salk, but if it had not been for the role of the Connaught laboratories, success in Canada would not have been attained so early. In view of the historic character of this particular discovery, I thought I should in this house mention particularly in grateful acknowledgment the services of Dr. Defries, of the Connaught laboratories, and particularly the researches of Dr. Rhodes, Dr. Joseph Morgan, Miss Helen Morton and Dr. Parker, all of the Connaught laboratories.

I am happy to say, Mr. Speaker, that Dr. Morgan, who was a member of the research team that discovered medium 199, which is so essential to the preparation of the vaccine, is at the present time, along with Miss Morton, a valued servant of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

This vaccine will be available in Canada in as great a quantity during the next two or three months as will be the case anywhere in the world. I expect that one—

Mr. Macdonnell: Time.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says "time". I think the people of Canada want nothing but the fullest information.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: And I take advantage of the very kind question put by my hon. friend to provide this information. We expect that as a result of the preparatory arrangements which I have indicated it will be possible to provide inoculations for possibly 1,500,000 individuals in Canada by July 1.

Mr. Sinclair: Have you any more questions?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): However, I hope that I do not get a supplementary speech. Is the minister aware that already there are rumours of a grey market or a black market in the product he spoke about?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare is aware of every rumour, unfounded and founded. I may say that we anticipated this one, too. As a result of the arrangements that we have made with the heads of governments in all the provinces, including the province from which my hon. friend and I come, I am sure that if there are any dangers of that kind they will be effectively dealt with by the provincial governments, the constitutional authority concerned.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, there was one section of my question that the minister did not touch on. My speech will be very short. Will the minister indicate what percentage of the available serum will be distributed through local public health authorities and what percentage through firms like Parke, Davis and the other company the minister mentioned? What percentage of the serum will be free through public health services?

Mr. Martin: All the supplies that are now in existence in Canada, enough for 750,000 individuals at the moment and for 1,500,000 by July 1, we expect will be provided through the Connaught laboratories. I cannot state now precisely what will be the percentage emanating from commercial sources, since I have not been told that yet, but I expect that by July 1 it will be negligible.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a question with regard to the 1,500,000 dosages? Can the minister tell us whether there will be sufficient dosages for the follow-ups? I understand there are three stages. Will these use all the vaccine available, or will there be sufficient available to follow up these 1,500,000 cases with further inoculations at the right time?

Mr. Martin: It is not 1,500,000 doses; it is 1,500,000 individuals. It will be up to the provinces to decide how many dosages they will want to give. In most provinces I have just been advised—I have not had a chance to peruse the reports of the provinces that have sent in their reports, but all provinces at this time are going to use two instead of three shots with the exception of Nova Scotia, Alberta and British Columbia. Of course that will not take care of the vaccinations which will be required by the whole country, but the Connaught laboratories and the institute of microbiology at Montreal will be working day and night to take care of Canadian needs.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Will the children of parents who do not believe in the use of this vaccine be compelled to take it?

Mr. Martin: Of course the actual responsibility in that regard is not mine, but knowing the provincial governments as I do I do not believe that anyone would be forced to do anything which a Liberal government would not agree to.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister give assurance to the house that all the vaccine from the Connaught laboratories, which I think he indicated would equal 1,500,000 doses, will be made available free of charge to the people of Canada? I think that that is the crux of the situation.

Mr. Martin: Perhaps my hon. friend would want to consider reframing his question and putting it to me again.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I think I can make it just as clear as the minister's answers have been to date. Will the serum amounting to 1,500,000 doses which the minister has indicated will be available by July be given free to the people of Canada?

Mr. Martin: With all respect to my hon. friend, I did not say, what he has indicated in his question I said. It is not 1,500,000 doses but 1,500,000 individuals. That is the number of persons whom we hope it will be possible to vaccinate by a stated date. Under the terms of the national health program we have, in accordance with arrangements made last fall, offered to the provinces on a 50-50 basis money which we hope, in view of the character of this particular illness, will be used for inoculations and immunizations for an unstated number of individuals throughout this country. If an individual wants to go and pay for it through a commercial house, that will be up to him; but in accordance with the arrangements which I mentioned earlier and which I announced last week the answer to my hon. friend's question is basically "yes".

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a supplementary question? Do I understand that arrangements have been made for a 50-50 division of the cost and that this is in addition to the health grant?

Mr. Martin: It is under the terms of the national health program.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. Coldwell: That means that if a province has not used its health grant it will be in a favoured position as compared with those which have carried out their obligations and used the health grant.

Mr. Martin: I do not think that it will work out that way. I think every province will be treated equally.

ATOMIC ENERGY

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the decision in Ontario to have a committee of the legislature study the question of radioactive fall-out in that province, will the government consider setting up a committee of this house to make a similar study with respect to the whole of Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government will give consideration to the suggestion made by the hon. member and, if it is found that there would be any real service to the Canadian public by the establishment of such a committee, will not hesitate to recommend it.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 19, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I wish to speak to two specific subjects, one having to do with the Department of Agriculture and one having to do with the Department of National Revenue. Before proceeding to deal with those matters I should like to make a few general comments with respect to the budget which is now before us.

On careful reading of the budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) one is struck almost immediately with the number of "ifs" contained in the budget. For this reason it could be called the "if" budget, and therefore I think hon. members generally will find it rather difficult to discuss the budget. A great number of unknown factors were contained in the analysis and proposals of the minister. However, there were some things specifically stated and I should like to draw attention to one or two of these.

In my opinion one of the glaring omissions from the budget proposals is the almost complete lack of any provision for the primary producers of this country. With the exception of a few minor changes in the tariff structure having to do with certain equipment imported for farming purposes, there is almost a blank-out of any reference to any change which would be of benefit to agriculture generally. The few changes which are provided in the tariff structure for the benefit of agricultural producers I think are more than offset by one provision which will be included in the budget proposals if the minister carries out his expressed intention of increasing the tariff on ethylene glycol.

If as a result of the study made by the tariff board the government goes through with this increase it will do more harm to agricultural producers than the total of the concessions which have been made through the reduction of the tariff on certain items. I certainly hope that the minister will not recommend to this house any increase in the duty on that commodity because the differential between the Canadian and United States prices is already considerable and the only effect of any increase would be to increase the price to the consumer in Canada. As the minister knows, with mechanized farming this is a commodity which enters definitely into the cost of production.

The other matter to which I want to make reference is the reducing of the tax on corporations. The minister was only carrying out a broad hint which he made last month in Montreal, in which he indicated that the tax on corporations was too high, and he therefore took steps to reduce it in the higher brackets. But I cannot be too enthusiastic about the reductions in the individual income tax, because it seems to me that the reductions in dollars are being made for those who least require them; in other words, the ones who needed the relief from taxation the most got the least consideration.

If I read correctly the table placed on record by the minister in regard to single taxpayers, table III at the top of page 2736, I find this. If he is earning $1,500 he will pay $5 less in 1955 than he paid in 1954. If we jump to $3,000, we find he will save $20 in taxation. If we jump to $10,000 income, he will save $90. If we jump further to $50,000, he will save $490. Then if we jump to $400,000, he will save $3,990. In dollars and cents, that means that a person with an income of half a million dollars will get as much tax relief as 800 single persons earning $1,500 a year. In my opinion that is going about it in altogether the wrong way. If it is the intention of the minister in making these tax reductions to increase the purchasing power of the Canadian public—I would assume that would be the chief consideration, as I can think of no other one which would be more valuable—then by relieving the person with an income of half a million dollars by almost $4,000, he is not increasing his purchasing power in the normal sense, because that person is already able to buy everything he requires with the income he has. He is giving him a tax reduction equal to that of 800 persons in the $1,500 bracket. In my opinion, the more equitable way to have done it would have been to raise the exemption level and make the necessary adjustments in the rates in the higher brackets in order that all the benefit of the raising of the exemption level would come to the persons in the lower income groups. Not only would that provide them with a greater amount of purchasing power generally, but it would also save the Minister of National Revenue a great deal of headaches and administrative expense, because he would have immediately perhaps tens of thousands less income tax forms to process; if you raise the exemption level, there will automatically be a large number of persons who have no longer to be taxed.

I think that would be a fairer and more effective method of providing tax relief for those who need it most, and it would be of benefit to the whole economy if it were done that way. However, the minister has chosen this way, and quite obviously it is a shift to the right: reduction in taxation for the big corporations and big reductions in income tax for the people with big incomes, but practically peanuts for the ones in the lower income groups.

While there has been some relief from taxation for certain groups, there is one group, as a matter of fact, which as a result of the budget proposals is facing a serious loss, and I wish to say a word on that today. I refer to the automobile dealers who are stocked now with new cars, for which they have already paid, including the excise taxes. They should receive some consideration with respect to a refund on the tax they have paid, to the extent of the reduction of the excise tax. Perhaps the government is not aware that in the last few years the automobile dealers have been put into an entirely different position from that which they used to occupy with respect to the automobile manufacturers. It used to be possible for an automobile dealer to obtain a number of new cars on what was known as consignment. In other words, he did not have to pay for them in cash; the cars were shipped to him, and if he was able to sell them he paid the company within a certain length of time. Now the situation is different. Owing to the credit restrictions which have been imposed in recent years on the dealers, the dealers are now obliged to pay cash on delivery for the automobiles they order. Automobile dealers who now have new cars in stock will have to pay for them, including the tax. There is no provision for them to return these automobiles to the manufacturer; they are bought and paid for. They are in the position of having to lose between $135 and $150 per unit, at a time when they have had a few years of not very active business. I would hope that the government would reconsider the decision announced the other day by the Minister of Finance and endorsed by the Minister of National Revenue yesterday. I think that is one group which will face serious loss unless some consideration is shown.

Now I come to the particular matters which I wish to discuss today. The first one has to do with the question of public investment. I am going to narrow down the subject in this case to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I do that for a particular purpose. This house has debated on one or two occasions resolutions moved by the hon. member for Kootenay West dealing with the national conservation program, and in my opinion it would be very desirable. Until we are prepared to make such a move there is now on the statute books an act enacted in 1935 and amended in 1937 and again in 1951, known as the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which has to do with the three prairie provinces and the Peace River block in British Columbia. Now under section 4 of this act the minister is given certain authority with the advice of the advisory board to do certain reclamation work, drainage, reforestation, and so forth, in order to prevent soil erosion. In another part of the act, under section 9, the minister is given conditional powers under which he can enter into an agreement with prairie provinces and municipalities in order to do special projects in those areas outside of the area designated in the act.

I should perhaps point out that under the act now the prairie farm rehabilitation board has jurisdiction in an area roughly known as the Palliser triangle, which takes in the southwest portion of Manitoba, more than half the province of Saskatchewan, and the southeast portion of the province of Alberta with a strip going north on the west side.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

That leaves out of the jurisdiction of the board a large portion of the province of Manitoba particularly.

We have found that over the years efforts have been made to have the provisions of that act applied to all settled areas in the three prairie provinces, and as a matter of fact in the four western provinces. In May of last year the four ministers of agriculture of the four western provinces had a joint conference dealing with this matter, and in a Canadian Press dispatch dated 10th May, 1954, the following news item appeared, and I quote:

Regina. A recommendation that the prairie farm rehabilitation administration's area of operations be extended to cover all agricultural lands in the four western provinces has been made by the agriculture ministers of these provinces.

Referring to the four provinces.

The recommendation was contained in a joint statement released by Saskatchewan agriculture minister, I. C. Nollet, at the end of a two-day conference of the ministers here Friday. The statement said the conference agreed "the work of the P.F.R.A. has been an important factor in helping stabilize agricultural production in the areas where it has been applied.

The ministers noted that many of the areas outside of the P.F.R.A. boundary in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia were in similar need of the P.F.R.A. policies.

That was on the 10th of May. In another dispatch of the same date which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press reference is made to a statement made by the minister of agriculture of Manitoba, the Hon. R. D. Robertson. The article reads in part as follows:

This decision was made at the conference of provincial agricultural ministers and their deputies in Regina last week.

The reference is to the decision to ask the government to extend the provisions of the act.

"The fact that we're all agreed P.F.R.A. should be extended strengthens all our hands." . . . At present the P.F.R.A. area coincides approximately with the Palliser triangle and in addition there is the Peace river block.

On the 7th of June last year I wrote a letter to the Minister of Agriculture following a number of conversations we had had about the matter in which I asked whether any action would be taken last year to carry out the requests of the ministers of agriculture of the four western provinces. In his reply dated June 9 he had this to say:

The only area which has been singled out for activities under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act is what is fairly well defined as the Palliser triangle. Anything which is done in the areas outside the Palliser triangle, which is similar to the work done under P.F.R.A., is provided for under special votes which appear in my estimates each year.

Then he ended with this paragraph, and it is rather important:

It has not been thought advisable to assume what the constitution attributes to the provinces, at least until a final and permanent agreement has been reached between the federal and the provincial governments with regard to financing in general. It is therefore not the intention to introduce legislation during this session.

That was last year. The reason I bring up the matter now and treat it as one of importance is in view of the fact that a dominion-provincial conference is to be held very soon, and it is quite possible this is one of the matters which may be considered. I think it is time that some decision was arrived at because repeated requests have been made by these provinces. We have in the prairie provinces a soil erosion problem which is far more urgent than anywhere else in Canada. It is partly due to the type of farming carried on and partly to the climatic conditions. Soil erosion, resulting in some cases from not enough rain and in other cases from too much rain, is causing damage and loss of fertility running into millions of dollars, and I think it is certainly time to apply public investment to a wasting asset which cannot be replaced.

Once the topsoil is washed down streams or blown away by the winds we have lost the most fertile and valuable part of our farming land. That is a process which has been going on for some time. I speak particularly about the province of Manitoba. If I were to say in the house that the government has discriminated against the province of Manitoba with relation to this act I might be accused of being partisan about the question, but I am going to quote the words of Liberal members of the Manitoba provincial house. Certainly the government would not accuse them of being partisan to their disadvantage. For example, on the 18th of January of this year a report appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press concerning a discussion by Mr. Hillhouse, the Liberal member for St. Andrews, of this very question of the application of the rehabilitation act in Manitoba. He had some rather strong criticisms to make of the federal government and particularly the Minister of Agriculture. The article reads in part as follows:

He said, during the Selkirk federal by-election last fall, Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, had promised $1 million in federal aid for flood alleviation in the interlake area. However, Mr. Hillhouse said, the amount Ottawa was offering had now shrunk to $125,000 . . .

As a matter of fact, up till now no agreement has been signed between the federal government and the province of Manitoba for any amount of money. These are the kind of things about which we are complaining. When a senior minister of the crown like the Minister of Agriculture goes to a point in Manitoba to speak at an important public meeting and makes the statement there that he is willing to recommend to the government that $1 million be granted, and nothing is done about it, we have reason to complain. As a matter of fact, it was $1,500,000 to start with, then it came down to $1 million and then all the way down to $125,000.

There is an article in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 8 dealing with the remarks of another Liberal member of the provincial house, Mr. Gildas Molgat, member for Ste. Rose. That happens to be part of my federal constituency and I know him very well. The article reads in part as follows:

Earlier Gildas Molgat, Liberal, Ste. Rose, said his area had been hard hit by floods since 1947 and that the P.F.R.A. "is not doing its job".

This is a Liberal member of the legislature making this statement. Then the article continues:

He charged the federal government with "discrimination" against Manitoba in framing the act, and urged that the province "put more pressure on" for amendments to P.F.R.A. so that it would cover all settled areas of the west and place "proper responsibility" on the dominion for damage done by drainage from federal park areas.

He was referring there of course to the Riding Mountain national park which is one of the sources of many of our flood problems in that part of Manitoba. So it goes all down the line. Again, in an article in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 8 you will find the following report of what the minister of agriculture of Manitoba, Mr. Robertson, had said. The article reads:

Mr. Robertson admitted that Mr. Gardiner may have made such a statement—

He was referring to the promise of $1 million.

—but that the deal had not been settled and that the province had insisted that any work affecting the level of the lakes was 100 per cent federal responsibility.

There you have a situation where Liberal members in the provincial house of Manitoba, including cabinet ministers, stand up and say that it is the responsibility of the federal government to carry out these over-all projects which would prevent the flood situations we have had. Yet the Minister of Agriculture states in this chamber that he will not recommend legislation because—and I quote from his letter—"it has not been thought advisable to assume what the constitution attributes to the provinces".

We cannot have it both ways. Either it is the responsibility of the provinces or of the federal government, and if there is any doubt about it then the dominion-provincial conference is the proper place to settle these doubts so that agreement can be reached. I think it is time some action was taken instead of having a lot of promises made at strategic times, usually when there is an election somewhere in the offing. I leave it at that. I regret that the Minister of Agriculture is not present today but I am sure that my comments will be brought to his attention.

The other matter to which I want to make reference today has to do with the Department of National Revenue. As my text for what I wish to say I want to take a statement made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech which will be found at page 2739 of Hansard of April 5. At that time he stated:

> May I say at this point, Mr. Speaker, what I think all hon. members know, that the Minister of Finance imposes and receives taxes. It is the duty of the Minister of National Revenue and his department to collect them. I should like to express my thanks to him and to his officials for the efficient and impartial manner in which this duty is discharged.

I have no objection whatever to one minister of the crown paying a compliment to a colleague. It is only a matter of professional courtesy that he should do so. I am not quite sure that he was not a little premature in his congratulations because frankly I am not impressed with some of the methods the Department of National Revenue has employed in the collection of taxes. I raised this question, which I am going to raise today, on another occasion, on March 4, in a debate in this house. While I set out the facts as I have them, and repeatedly asked the government to make some statement about them, when the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) replied in that debate he made no reference whatever to the statement I had made. Now, either he was not aware of those statements or he chose to disregard them. Whichever was the case, I am going to give him another opportunity today or during the course of this debate to explain the situation which I brought before the house at that time.

I am referring again to the matter of tax remissions made under the authority of the Financial Administration Act, and on the recommendation no doubt of the Department of National Revenue or the treasury board, to four corporations, namely the Aluminum Company of Canada Limited, which received a remission of $549,000, in round figures; the Gatineau Power Company, $496,000; the Saguenay Power Company Limited, $576,000; and the Bell Telephone Company, $371,000. The exact total of these remissions is $1,992,-728.11, or very close to $2 million.

Now, the circumstances under which these remissions were made appear to me to be quite unjustified. I stated the facts previously, and I am going to state them again. As a matter of fact, on the basis of another return which has come to my hand since then, I find that the information contained in the original return or sessional paper No. 99-B in reply to my question of February 14, was not correct. I am not going to accuse the Department of National Revenue of deliberately making a false return because they are very insistent that taxpayers should not do that. There are penalties provided for the making of false returns. But I do say the department made a quite inaccurate return; whether or not it was deliberate I cannot say. The facts stated in the first return do not agree with the facts stated in the later return on the same subject which came to my hand on March 28, 1955. I shall point out the differences in a moment.

When I raised this matter before, I pointed out that the dispute between these four companies and the department arose over a tax liability which the companies claimed they should not pay. The question arose as a result of the Quebec education tax which was imposed in 1946. The four companies which I have mentioned claimed that they should receive a deduction with respect to the education tax they paid to Quebec. The Department of National Revenue held that they would have to pay their full liability. In my opinion the department was quite justified in their attitude. If we refer to the Income Tax Act, section 12, we find the following:

> In computing income, no deduction shall be made in respect of > (g) a corporation tax, as defined by regulation, paid to the government of a province or to a municipality . . .

Well, there is not much doubt as to the meaning of that. On the basis of that section the department, I think quite properly, turned down the claim of the four companies and insisted that the tax be paid. The companies decided to appeal to the income tax appeal board, and here is where we find one of the differences between the two returns that are received. The original return stated that the matter was submitted to the income tax appeal board and the board decided that the tax in question was deductible. Then the return states that on appeal to the exchequer court the board's decision was reversed. All this information refers to these four companies.

Upon looking at the second return I find that, as a matter of fact, two of the companies did not even appeal to the income tax appeal board and that with respect to them, there was no appeal made from that board to the exchequer court. Those companies were the Aluminum Company of Canada

Limited and the Bell Telephone Company. I quote these words from the second return:

> Regarding the Aluminum Company of Canada Limited and the Bell Telephone Company of Canada it may be said that these two companies filed appeals from the disallowance of the Quebec education tax as a deduction from income.
> The question in issue was similar to the one raised in the appeals of Gatineau Power Company and Saguenay Power Company Limited. In view of the fact that these latter appeals had previously been heard by the income tax appeal board and by the exchequer court, the Bell Telephone Company of Canada and the Aluminum Company of Canada Limited requested, and the crown agreed, to a stay of proceedings awaiting the decision of the exchequer court.

Then this important paragraph follows:

> Subsequently a settlement having been made with these companies, the appeals were withdrawn and as a result they were heard neither by the income tax appeal board nor by the exchequer court.

In the original return, I am informed by the same department, in all four cases the appeals were heard by the income tax appeal board, which ruled in favour of the company and then on appeal to the exchequer court that court ruled in favour of the government and reversed the decision of the appeal board. There, you have a discrepancy in the information and—

Mr. Harris: Would the hon. member permit a question? I must say that I am seeking information because I am not too familiar with the subject matter. Is it not a fact that the settlement which was made would be recorded in the higher courts as a settlement, and to that extent the return would be correct?

Mr. Zaplitny: To which court does the minister now refer?

Mr. Harris: The court that my hon. friend said had not passed on this?

Mr. Zaplitny: With respect to two of the companies the matter went as far as the exchequer court but with respect to the other two it did not go to the exchequer court because their appeal was not made.

Mr. McCann: But the principle involved was the same.

Mr. Zaplitny: That may be correct, but the information is not stated in that way.

Mr. Harris: It is quite customary to stay one action while another is being heard.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am not quarrelling with what was done in that respect. I am pointing out that the information given in the first instance was not correct and does not agree with the information later given concerning two of those companies.

However, the remissions were made to these companies under the terms of the Financial Administration Act, section 22. In that section permission is given to the governor in council to make such remissions but there is a very important proviso to the effect that it must be in the public interest. The government is not permitted to just throw the public's money away any time they feel like it. They must justify that remission by proving it is in the public interest to do so.

In attempting to justify these remissions the Department of National Revenue stated two reasons in the original return. I quote:

> Taking into consideration the uncertainty of the outcome of the pending appeals to the supreme court and of the effect of the new legislation, it was considered advisable to accept the offer of the settlement made by the company.

The appeal referred to is the one which two of the companies made to the supreme court after the exchequer court had ruled in favour of the government. The appeals were never heard but the actions were started. The effect of the new legislation referred to here is the fact that in 1953 the paragraph in section 12 to which I have referred earlier was repealed by section 4 of the amending act, so that subsequent to 1953 that paragraph no longer applied. But it is stated plainly in the amending act that the section is applicable to 1953 and subsequent taxation years.

In other words, that amendment had no legal effect whatsoever on the taxation years 1946 to 1952. And yet, let us examine these two reasons given to prove that it was in the public interest for the public treasury to hand back $2 million to these four companies, sums which they held in trust for Canada. One reason given was the uncertainty of the outcome of the pending appeals to the supreme court. That is a strange reason to give, in view of the fact that the exchequer court had ruled in favour of the government and stated their reasons for doing so. I have their judgment before me.

Surely, after having referred the matter to a court of proper jurisdiction, the government should have some confidence in the decision handed down by that court. There was no reason why there should have been any uncertainty as to the outcome of the appeal made on behalf of two of these companies. The other two did not even make their appeal to the supreme court. But the one that really strikes me as being strange indeed is the other reason in which it is said that the effect of the new legislation was considered. As I said, the new legislation was passed in 1953, and was to come into effect only for 1953 and subsequent years. It had nothing whatever to do with the case in dispute. If the legislation was valid constitutionally up to that time and was changed in 1953, then by its own laws the government was bound to proceed to collect taxes which under its own legislation became due.

Surely they would not introduce a principle that would leave the door open to any corporation in Canada to put pressure upon the government to change the Income Tax Act in its favour and then say, "Now that you have changed the act, let us go back to 1945 or 1944, and hand us back some of the taxes you took from us under previous legislation."

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) was very careful to guard against that kind of thing when he said that certain provisions come into effect on July 1 or January 1, or that they would became effective immediately, as the case may be. None of these things is made retroactive, unless so stated. And it is stated here, plainly, that it is not retroactive, and that it is to take effect from 1953, on. So when one analyses the two reasons given he finds that neither is a valid one. And since neither is a valid reason there must have been others that are not stated. Certainly, in the light of the discrepancies in the return thus far, as time goes on I would not be surprised if we got a third answer. The situation is simply this: that, on the very weak pretence that the effect of amending the Income Tax Act in 1953 in some mysterious way had something to do with tax liability accrued from 1946 to 1952, and on the other flimsy ground that, owing to the uncertainty in the government's mind as to the outcome of the appeal to the supreme court, they felt that it was in the public interest to refund $2 million to these four corporations.

That is a very strange procedure, indeed. Because if the government proceeded by the proper methods, and if they felt that the treasury was entitled to the money they had received, they should have proceeded with the appeals to the supreme court and obtained a ruling in the matter. Then we would know where we stand. If they were not entitled to the money, then they should not have assessed it for liability.

As it now stands, the government has given a concession amounting to $2 million to four companies, and under circumstances which to me appear to be of a very suspicious nature. Until we have an explanation in the house, and until we are told how the government can justify its action under section 22 of the Financial Administration Act, then we have every reason to continue to be suspicious and to believe that the Minister of Finance was rather optimistic when he congratulated the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) upon the efficient and impartial method used in collecting taxes.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. McCann: Is the hon. member aware that the remission of tax liability was only to the extent of 50 per cent?

Mr. Zaplitny: Exactly.

Mr. McCann: Then put it on the record.

Mr. Zaplitny: That is what I referred to. But it still amounts to $2 million. The question is not one as to whether it was 50 per cent, 25 per cent or 10 per cent; the question is: Was it justified in the public interest; and, if so, on what basis can the minister justify that remission?

Mr. McCann: I shall reply either during the budget debate, or more probably when my estimates are under consideration. I believe I shall be able at that time to answer all the hon. member's complaints. The submission was a joint one by the minister of finance of that time and the Minister of National Revenue, and was concurred in by the government. It was not a departmental order, entirely.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I intend to stay away from that aspect of public affairs discussed by the hon. member who just sat down. Rather it is my intention today to discuss the guaranteed annual wage, the related problem of automation and the manner in which it may affect the economy of this country. Up to the present time the surface of the implication has scarcely been scratched; today I intend to do a little scratching at it. Most people ask, what is it all about? The workers say that if it is good for management to be paid by the year, then it is also good for the workers. The employers say it is illogical and uneconomic to pay wages to people who are not working.

I wish first to deal with automation. This is a new word used to describe the replacement of manpower by automatic machinery. Frequently this is described as the second industrial revolution, brought about by electronics. Let me place before the house a few examples of automation. The dial telephone is one; the machine in the telephone company which dials long distance calls, records the time and computes the cost is another; the electronic mail sorter is another. The machine in government offices which prints old age pensions and family allowances cheques by the thousands, and records them, is another; the machine that sends out premium notices from the large insurance companies is another. We are told that the Ford Motor Company has a new engine plant in Cleveland where six-cylinder engine blocks are turned out by an electronic brain which controls 42 automatic machine units. All that is done in 15 minutes. Formerly it took nine hours to do that operation. The Toronto Star on April 19 carried a report from St. Catharines as follows:

> The age of automation in Canada has been ushered in at a modern new plant of McKinnon Industries Limited, the one-time Canadian supplier to the saddle and buggy trade which now provides powerful engines for General Motors of Canada cars.
> In the new plant in Grantham township near here, which was designed and built solely for the production of a new V-8 type of engine, mechanization has been advanced until a single operator monitoring panels of flashing lights can now control the continual flow of engine blocks through a 140-foot monster machine that performs hundreds of operations without the touch of a human hand.

There are many other instances, too many for me to mention here. As a result of those improvements no one is sure whether automation will merely jeopardize or destroy jobs. But one thing I think is certain, that automation will bring about some job dislocation which will require the shifting of workers to new jobs and to new employers. It is quite possible that if we find more ways to do more work in fewer man hours there will be more work to do, and thus it will increase employment. That of course has been the historic position of industry; we can go back to the time of the invention of the loom which could weave six webs at one time.

The workers are not fighting automation, but they want to cushion its effects and they want to share in its fruits. The guaranteed annual wage is the workers' concept of wiping out the insecurity of lay-offs and loss of wages. They look upon it as a challenge to management. Labour is asking management to guarantee to workers an annual wage in the same way management is now provided. They ask to share in the abundance. Labour does not ask that management subsidize idleness. They want less idleness; that is their chief complaint. They believe that the genius of management, under free enterprise, can help solve and destroy the evils of unemployment as they now resolve the problems of production and distribution. Nothing can be settled by ignoring this problem or by calling it names, so we might as well start discussing it.

The words "guaranteed annual wage" are something of a misnomer, since they do not quite mean what they say. Theoretically it could mean a guarantee of some wage for 52 weeks; practically it means a guarantee of some income or period of work. It has as its purpose two main objectives, the elimination of the short work week and the elimination of seasonal slack time lay-offs.

The arguments used by business today are the same ones that were advanced against the minimum wage law, workmen's compensation, old age pensions, unemployment insurance, the eight-hour day and industrial pensions. The historic position of business has been that the guaranteed wage will bring on inflation, force bankruptcies and make workers lazy. We have heard all that before and it just did not happen. I ask this house whether all these improvements I have mentioned, and collective bargaining, holidays with pay and health benefits have harmed the economy or the people of this country.

My purpose in bringing this to the attention of the house is not to recommend a blind rush into guaranteed annual wage agreements. I do recommend to this house a very thorough examination. Job security and security of wage income have always been matters of great concern not only to the workers but to the employers, to the labour unions and to the governments. Thus guaranteed employment or wage plans have gained widespread support amongst wage earners, reflecting a very deep-rooted desire for steady jobs and steady incomes.

Let me be more explicit. A guaranteed employment, or a guaranteed wage plan, is a formal commitment by an employer to provide for all or some of his employees a stipulated amount of work or wages during the year. Under guaranteed employment a certain amount of work is guaranteed. Under the guaranteed wage plan income is guaranteed. The difference between the two forms is largely one of emphasis. Many employers have voluntarily attempted to provide year-round employment, not only because of such intangible but important benefits as better labour relations and the good will of the community, but also because of the savings to be derived from reduced turnover of personnel and the improved employee morale which result from eliminating the workers' fear of unemployment.

Employers in the main have been unwilling to commit themselves to guaranteed annual employment, fearing that seasonal or cyclical fluctuations, or both, may make fulfilment of that impossible. Some experts do say that stabilization of the workers' income, or lessening of the effect of unemployment, can be brought about to a certain extent through seniority rules, work sharing in slack seasons and dismissal pay.

These measures all help to bridge periods of unemployment or idleness. They do not provide security of income or employment. Seniority rules merely determine which employees are to be laid off. Sharing work also means sharing unemployment. Dismissal pay only softens the blow from the loss of the job. Although unemployment insurance provides some income during slack periods, payments are comparatively small and continue for a short time. There is no doubt that unemployment insurance is helpful, but it is not a satisfactory substitute for regular and steady employment, and it was never intended to be that.

Let us for a few moments examine in a general way what are the implications of an annual wage guarantee. Of course many questions come to mind when considering a nation-wide application of a guaranteed annual wage. If we consider the feasibility of a guaranteed annual wage in the steel industry, and I use this only as an example, we are concerned immediately with the problem of synchronizing demand and employment with those of other interdependent industries.

Two questions undoubtedly arise in the minds of those who are giving this matter some thought. First, would the commitments of an individual firm under a general industry agreement for a guaranteed annual wage need to be reinforced from a more general pool of resources? The second question of course is whether such an undertaking would require government participation in the pool to take care of cases where a whole industry is in a depressed state.

Some of these questions may be answered by the fact that if a guaranteed annual wage plan were undertaken during present high employment, a fund of purchasing power in the hands of the consumer could be assured. This in turn would increase demand for new investment to match a sustained consumer market. The possibility of failure to meet commitments would thus be reduced to a minimum. Of course there is the further possibility that with the aid of unemployment insurance an annual wage program could become a reality.

It is axiomatic, and it has been so stated by many hon. members in the house, that where workers are assured of full employment and economic security they furnish a background for that mass of purchasing power so essential for the continued turning of the wheels of industry. The production of steel depends entirely upon the wheels of industry turning, which in turn depends upon both the purchasing power of the people at home and the demands of foreign markets. If the steel workers, and I again use them as an example, as a group are guaranteed an annual wage thereby assuring continuity of full employment, they have a stability which permits them to go out and purchase automobiles, refrigerators and the thousand and one articles which require steel.

I intend to discuss for a few moments some of the arguments which have been presented from time to time in favour of an annual wage, and some which have been presented which are unfavourable to it. Let us examine the advantages of a guaranteed annual wage. The worker's feeling of security is increased; his morale is strengthened and maintained. Partially employed workers find it difficult to recognize the need for increased production when the results of their efforts are likely to result in lay-offs. Under a guaranteed wage the worker feels free to exert the maximum effort. He knows that increased effort on his part does not mean that he will lose his job.

Surveys indicate that many workers would prefer regular employment at moderate wages to irregular employment at high wages. Increased security would result in greater co-operation between labour and management. The worker's efficiency is likely to be improved. There will be less incentive to make work last. The sense of responsibility will be increased, resulting in less breakage and less faulty work.

The labour turnover may be reduced. Irregular employment often results in a high labour turnover, which increases costs because of the loss of trained men and the expense entailed in continually hiring new workers who have to be trained and whose initial efficiency may be low. The existence of an annual guaranteed wage plan will stimulate management to find ways and means to regularize production. Since workers will have to be paid whether or not there is work for them to do, every effort will be made by management to find something for them to do by trying to smooth out the variations in demand for the products of the industry and in the supply of its raw material, and by improving the organization of production and distribution.

To the extent that a guaranteed annual wage serves as a stimulus to the stabilization of production, unit overhead costs will be reduced because the same volume of production will be obtained with less capital, machinery and floor space, and a smaller labour force may well be needed. The stipulation that the guaranteed annual wage will not apply in certain specific instances might bring about a reduction in absenteeism, which would increase industrial output and thereby reduce costs. It is quite possible that there would be a beneficial effect on the economy as a whole. Other manufacturing industries and the retail trade would experience a greater stability of demand as a result of which consumption would be likely to be stimulated and investment in new undertakings encouraged.

Let us examine for a few moments some of the disadvantages which are from time to time put forward in opposition to a guaranteed annual wage. Those who are opposed say that if only a portion of the workers in a plant receive an annual wage the workers may be divided into two antagonistic groups resulting in a lower plant efficiency. The expense of operating a guaranteed wage plan may be greater than is justified by the benefits. This is particularly the case if work has to be done which involves increased variable as well as semi-variable costs. Greater stability may make it difficult for seasonal industries to acquire the temporary labour necessary to meet peak demands or to process raw materials available only at a particular season or time of the year.

The adoption of a guaranteed wage plan may force a firm to diversify its production, thereby increasing costs through a reduction of the economies which may be obtained from specialization. Further, a company may attempt to produce for stock when demand falls off, and this may prove to be a risky and costly undertaking which may outweigh any savings to be derived from operating at full capacity in a specialized industry. Business risks may be increased, and the entry of new firms may be discouraged.

A guarantee of wages would have the effect of converting some variable and semi-variable costs into fixed costs. This increased rigidity of the cost structure may make it difficult for a company to meet changing conditions successfully. The effect of this in any particular industry depends on the proportion which labour costs form of total costs. Another argument often heard is that it may have the effect of freezing the worker in his job and thus ending his mobility.

Those are some of the arguments pro and con which I have been able to marshal. There are many others. I felt the house was entitled to have both sides of the story now, since this will be a matter for discussion for some time yet.

I am going to be more specific now and deal with one particular problem. How would the guaranteed annual wage affect the automobile industry? Press reports indicate that it is now breathing down their neck. It is my own theory that the guaranteed annual wage is tailored for that industry and fits it like the paper on the wall. What is more, the industry by its very method of operation has been asking for it for a very long time. The constant and persistent lay-offs in that industry serve to spur the workers to obtain an income sufficient for 12 months. They and their families cannot be expected to go on short rations from the day of the lay-off until the day the call to return to the assembly line is sounded.

No one denies that a corporation has a duty to its stockholders to see that its operations are efficiently run and make a profit, but there is another duty which must be harmonized with that responsibility for making profits. That is the duty to the men who make the profits possible, a clear recognition of their right to be freed from the spectre of constant and persistent lay-offs. By countenancing the valleys and peaks in their industry, they have indicated that the methods which in their fathers' day were best are not good enough today. These times demand new methods, new approaches and a clear grasp of what is right, proper and just.

The automobile industry operates under a high protective tariff which limits competition. It is controlled by the big three, General Motors, Ford and Chrysler, who take full advantage of the tariff. It is true that the industry has made great contributions to the economy and well-being of this country. They pay good wages, but for too short a time. High wages are not a substitute for employment.

It must also be said that the industry has grown in importance and influence, and in the process has become rich in business and fat in profits. It is about time the rules were revised, because the industry has turned a bad habit into a practice, by producing at a very high rate for nine or ten months and then turning the workmen out to fend for themselves or become a charge upon the municipality until they are once again needed. With the advent of unemployment insurance workers collect benefits during unemployment, but these are still much less than normal pay. They now ask that work be spaced so they can work regularly in order that they may eat regularly.

The pattern of the industry is about as follows. They have six months of concentrated production, followed by four months of normal production which tapers off to a trickle, and then a two-months' lay-off. This is usually done under the guise of stock-taking, retooling for new models, renovating, repairing and maintenance, which is done with minute and tender care for the plant and the machinery. During that period the workers must look out for themselves; there is no maintenance for the workers as such.

The record of the industry is very interesting. During the years 1924 to 1928 the employment variation in the industry was 27·4 per cent. During the years 1947 to 1951 the employment variation was 4·7 per cent.

these were years of great shortages and great demands, and there was very little competition.

Mr. Rowe: Did you say 4 per cent variation?

Mr. Croll: Yes, that is what I said.

Mr. Rowe: You also said 27 per cent?

Mr. Croll: I said that the variation between 1924 and 1928 was 27·4 per cent. The variation in employment from 1947 to 1951 was 4·7 per cent. Now, once again the industry is being subjected to sharp short-term lay-offs which are increasing in number and severity. In the face of competition the employment variation now is almost three times what it was in the 1947-1951 period. It is rising again. Thus by the failure of the industry to correct the pattern which I have indicated, it has for the present time lost the initiative by default.

I do not think the guaranteed annual wage will affect industry adversely. I think it will provide it with an exercise in planning and economics which it can solve in the same way it has solved other very difficult problems. If they must find work for their employees on a year-round basis they will learn to make cuckoo clocks, and they will make them better than anybody has made them before. They will sell more and more, and sell them on the time payment plan in order to provide employment and profit. It is not good enough for industry to say that they have to meet consumer demand, for it is well known that they not only stimulate but they create consumer demand.

It must be said in fairness to them that industry is not unaware of its shortcomings and has attempted to meet the situation by bringing out new models in the fall rather than in the spring, and thus have a winter selling season. That is a laudable effort to stabilize the industry, but in the face of competition they are reverting to the old practice and the old pattern once again, and that is a dangerous one. The industry—and I think I know it well—is fortunate in that it has not only genius but talent within its ranks. The genius has been devoted to engineering, mechanization, production, distribution and automation; the talent to the human problems, the workers and labour relations. That is not good enough. It is time they applied the genius where they now apply the talent.

The guaranteed annual wage is not revolutionary; it seems to me rather evolutionary. I believe that the companies are hungry for a solution, but are fearful of breaking new ground and fearful of letting the team down. They can meet the challenge if the big three will undertake to do it collectively. Here is a great opportunity for them to give leadership by doing away with these periodic and what appear to be totally unnecessary lay-offs. The guaranteed annual wage has been operated chiefly in the United States, where only a small portion of the workers have been covered, and the same thing is true of Canada.

In replying to a question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on February 14, the Minister of Labour said in effect that no study was being made by the department of the guaranteed annual wage. In answering the question he also had something further to say. He said that in 1953 there were two guaranteed annual wage plans in manufacturing industries in Canada and three guaranteed annual plans in non-manufacturing industries, the total number of employees covered being 1,900. One plan has since been discontinued.

In 1954 there were eight guaranteed annual wage plans with a total number of employees of something like 1,050. To bring the house up to date, my information is that in 1955 we must add to that number the John Labatt Company of London which employs 500, the Pert Hosiery company of Montreal which employs 60, and the Eaton Knitting Company of Hamilton which employs 150. Some other countries have recently introduced guaranteed wage plans, but they have generally restricted them to a certain limited number of hours of work per week.

My purpose in rising today was to anticipate a measure such as this which can have a healthy effect upon our economy. Just as many of us have envisaged and fought for measures of social and labour betterment, minimum wages, workmen's compensation, the eight-hour day and 40-hour week, unemployment insurance and so on, so we have to give thought now to the guaranteed annual wage. While we have a high level of employment at the present time, we must maintain that condition by all the devices at our disposal. I do not regard the guarantee of wages as a panacea, but I do think it is a tool which can be put to work to round out a program of greater security, and which will make for harmonious industrial relations and a more lasting prosperity. At least we can give some study to advance the frontiers of knowledge in this particular field. This would give us a chance to bone up in order to create a climate of understanding and informed opinion with respect to what appears on the horizon.

Before the great debate, which may give off more heat than light, becomes one of great contention, we should give it study. In the light of the minister's answer to the hon. member, to which I have already alluded, it is my suggestion that the department make a careful and minute study of the implications of the guaranteed annual wage, and when it is completed turn over the report to the committee of this house on industrial relations for study and understanding. That would have the beneficial effect of creating a more thorough understanding by members of the House of Commons and the country generally.

This is no time to stand aloof. It will be on us before we know it. I think we should study the problem before it becomes a labour issue. In that light I present the matter to the government for consideration.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in examining the budget I think we must look first to see what is in it and, second, find out, if we can, why this particular budget was presented. First of all I am going to examine the budget and then a little latter I shall describe why I think it was presented.

In examining the budget, may I say that I think it has failed in the main purpose of a budget brought down in a period like this, which should be to provide the stimulus necessary to restore the pace of industrial production, trade and employment.

The first point is the reduction in the income tax. It amounts to 27 cents a week for a married man with two children earning $3,000 a year, which is considerably above the average for Canada. It amounts to 50 cents a week for a married man with two children earning $5,000 a year. That kind of tax reduction is not going to give anybody the incentive to go out and buy a television set, a washing machine, a refrigerator, a stove, a suit of clothes, or any of the things produced by the industries that are hardest hit today. It is going to create very little stimulus to sales in those industries, and I think it has failed in that regard.

The 2 per cent reduction in corporation tax was welcomed by industry but, Mr. Speaker, how much of that 2 per cent is going to be passed on to the consumers in the form of lower prices aimed at stimulating sales? I think very little. It will also do very little to stimulate plant expansion, because it will merely mean a saving of $10,000 to a company earning a profit of $500,000 before taxes. That is not enough to cause most companies to embark on a capital expansion program.

The third thing the budget did was to introduce a 5 per cent reduction in the excise tax on new cars. What does that amount to? It amounts to a saving of $75 on a new popular priced car. But the great majority of Canadians buy new cars on time, and the great obstacle in their path is the down payment. Therefore the 5 per cent reduction is not going to help them very much.

Although the budget has undoubted political appeal, it does not do the job required of a budget brought down in a period of economic slow-down, such as we are experiencing today. It is a superficial budget, aimed at taking people's minds away from the fact that the government has no plan for counteracting our basic economic ills.

By the announcement of the appointment of a royal commission to study our economy the government has recognized the need for such a plan. But I want to ask the government this question. What has it been doing in the ten years that have intervened between 1945 and now, since the introduction of the famous white paper in 1945 which recognized this need? During those ten years the various departments of the government should have been collecting the kind of information which the royal commission will collect in the next few years. The royal commission will require several years to collect the information, and several more years will probably be required then before the government gets around to formulating an economic plan.

If the government had had its various departments gathering the information which the royal commission will now gather, a plan for industrial expansion could have been put into operation some time ago, and we would not be experiencing the economic slow-down which we are experiencing today. For 15 years the government has been content to ride the crest of an economic boom which it was convinced would never end, but it did end in this past year. Now they have suddenly come to realize that this country is facing economic problems for which they have no answers. In desperation they have turned to the appointment of a royal commission to do the job they should have been doing for the past ten years. The problems we are up against today, Mr. Speaker, are simply the problems which were bound to present themselves when the nations devastated by war got on their feet, and when countries like the United States started looking around aggressively for markets into which to dump their surplus production. They certainly found one in Canada.

So today, Mr. Speaker, this government is trying to cover up its incompetence by turning to the device of appointing a royal commission to obtain information which they should have been collecting during the past ten years. There is no excuse for them not having obtained that information. They recognized the need in the white paper of 1945, and then went completely asleep and did nothing about it. The government realize they have no information upon which to formulate an economic plan, and the country is taking the rap.

I suppose that in the meantime, until this royal commission reports, this government is going to be quite content to sit back and do nothing. During the next four years, while this investigation is under way, the government will pursue its usual policy of hope and grope, somehow expecting that something is going to turn up—the something that just does not seem to turn up. I do not believe the average Canadian considers that kind of approach good enough. This government is caught badly off base, and it is making no attempt to do anything about it except admit it has no information on which to formulate a plan, and admit it is not going to do anything until this royal commission reports. The government knows quite well it will be several years before the commission can report. I think this is a disgraceful situation for any government to have to admit, but this government is admitting it today because it has no alternative.

Now, although the government cannot come up with any suggestions or any plan, and even though this government is too autocratic, too dictatorial, too self-satisfied to ever accept suggestions from the opposition, it is still our responsibility, failing any suggestions from the government side, to make suggestions concerning what we feel has to be done to pull our economy out of the doldrums in which it finds itself today.

I am going to make a few suggestions. I think what we must do first is try to formulate a plan which will start industrial expansion in this country and will provide steadily increasing employment, a steadily increasing standard of living. That is the only positive approach to this problem of unemployment and lost markets which this government is doing nothing to meet. To do this I believe we must achieve two important aims. The first is to improve the design and lower the cost of the products we manufacture. It is only by so doing that we can protect and improve our competitive position against the products which are made outside of Canada, and which are giving us such severe competition today.

Second, I believe we must greatly expand our secondary industries within this country so we can process a far greater proportion of our primary products than we are doing today. When we do that we will provide jobs for Canadians instead of simply providing the raw materials with which workmen in other countries will turn out finished materials, many of which we buy back.

[Mr. Hees.]

The steps which I believe we must take to accomplish these objectives are five in number and I should like to deal with each in turn. First, in order to develop new and better designs and more efficient methods of production, we must undertake a greatly expanded program of industrial research, based on the programs which have proved so effective in Great Britain, the United States, Germany and several industrial countries in Europe. Unless our efforts in this regard can match theirs at least on a per capita basis, then we must expect to have their products continue to beat ours in price or design or both. Such a program, Mr. Speaker, has made it possible for Great Britain to announce, on the same day we announced our highest unemployment figure here, their second lowest. Under that program Great Britain's unemployment has continued to decrease and ours has continued to grow. I feel that is a rather astonishing state of affairs for this country to have to admit.

Now, what is needed to achieve that end is for the government to call a conference of the representatives of management, labour and the educational institutions, who will produce most of the research staff, to discuss the best methods for getting a program of this kind under way. Such a program would include the pooling of technical information to be used by those engaged in an industry to compete, as an industry, against foreign competition. I believe that only by so doing can we compete successfully against the competition which we are receiving from other countries, and which gives every indication of continuing to increase rather than to decrease.

Second, I believe that in order to expand our secondary industries we must take steps which will make it attractive for new industries to become established and for existing industries to expand. I think we must remember that this is a free country, and unless conditions are sufficiently attractive to invite the expansion of established industries they are not going to expand, and new industries are simply not going to become established. One step I think we should take in this direction is to double the rate of depreciation on plant and equipment, and by so doing reduce the risks to those investing in new enterprise. Spread over the original depreciation period this move will cost the government absolutely nothing.

Another step I think we should take to encourage new industries to become established is to make it easier for them to show their first net profit. I believe a move we could make in this direction would be to reduce the rate of taxation on small businesses from the present 18 per cent to 15 per cent, and raise the ceiling from $20,000 to $25,000. I believe that in addition to this, in order to encourage these small industries to expand into large industries consideration should be given to the advantages of increasing the tax at a steady rate from the top of the lowest tax bracket up to a profit of say $50,000 a year before taxes. I think the sudden jump from the present 18 per cent on up to $20,000 to 47 per cent on the next $1,000 of profit is a deterrent to expansion today. I feel the government should give serious consideration to a steady increase in the rate of taxation rather than a sudden jump. If that were done it would give small industries, at present established and remaining small, an incentive to expand into large industries of the kind we need.

While the move I have suggested, of reducing the corporation tax, would reduce the income from that source for the time being, I believe the additional taxes which would accrue in the future from new enterprises which would be encouraged to start up and expand with the aid of this move and double depreciation would very soon, in my opinion, make up any deficit.

Mr. Harris: What will the deficit do in the meantime?

Mr. Hees: I shall deal with that later. From then on taxes on new enterprises, plus income tax which would be paid by people who are not now employed but who would then be employed in such new enterprises, would be found revenue for the federal treasury.

A third move I believe the government should make to stimulate sales is to reduce the sales tax by 25 per cent. This would greatly reduce the cost of things we have to sell and would place our products in a far better competitive position as against those from other countries competing with them today. It would be an important stimulus to sales, because it would make it possible for those in the lower income groups to buy more goods, and after all, they are the ones who are in greatest need of such goods and who will be most ready to buy. They are the ones who are hardest hit by the tax, because it is a tax which is applied without any consideration for ability to pay.

I believe a reduction in this tax would not necessarily mean a reduction in the sales tax total, because the greater volume of goods which would be sold because of lower prices, multiplied by the factor of the lower unit tax, would easily equal or exceed the present tax total. An excellent example of this was the government's experience with the cigarette tax two years ago.

Mr. Harris: That was smuggling.

Mr. Hees: The fourth move I suggest the government should make to stimulate our trade is that of bringing the value of the Canadian dollar down to parity with the United States dollar. This would make it more attractive for people from outside to buy Canadian goods, and would attract more tourists to this country.

As I have said, I believe these tax reductions would only temporarily reduce total tax receipts. A temporary deficit in my opinion would be well worth while if, by so doing, trade were stimulated and there was a stimulation of production to the point where in the near future it would be greater than it is at the present time. This would increase the tax totals the government would receive, because it would increase greatly the sources from which taxes come. I believe the minister will agree that, after all, that is the desirable end.

If in the meantime the government did make an all-out effort to streamline its operations, something it has made no effort to do up to this time, the savings which could be brought about in government operations would more than offset any temporary deficit which would be caused by tax reductions. In the long run I believe the moves I have suggested would substantially increase our tax revenue by increasing the sources from which taxes come, and for that reason I say these moves should be given serious consideration by the government.

In conclusion let me say that because the government has been lethargic in the past ten years and has collected no information upon which to base an economic plan, the establishment of a royal commission is a very necessary move indeed. In the meantime there is a big job to be done in facing the severe competition we are up against right now, a condition the government is making no attempt whatever to meet. Upon our success or failure in meeting that competition depend the jobs of our workmen and the standard of living of our people. I believe the steps I have suggested would help materially in meeting this challenge, and I urge the government to give these matters serious consideration.

As I said earlier, it is interesting to diagnose what has been the purpose of the government in producing a budget of this kind. It is certainly clear to me that the budget does nothing to stimulate sales or production, so why was it brought in? I think those of us who gathered here on the night of April 5 to hear the budget speech were rather surprised, when finally we had a look at the baby, to see that it had draped over its shoulder a banner upon which were written the words, "Liberal convention, 1956; vote for Walter Harris". And if there was any doubt in anyone's mind that that was the purpose of the budget, that indeed it was a convention budget, all he had to do was to look at the faces of the other six hopefuls. Each of them, Mr. Speaker, looked like a man who had just received news that his mother in law was coming to spend six weeks with him.

The one who really looked as though he was suffering most was fisherman Jack from Twillingate. He was really suffering. I thought he was choking on a piece of herring bait. He looked as though his rubber boots were a couple of sizes too small, and he actually felt so badly that he had to pull his sou'wester halfway down his face, during the speech, to hide the tears running down his cheeks.

An hon. Member: What nonsense.

Mr. Hees: There is no doubt in my mind that this is the first move in the campaign to build up an Uncle Walter myth. Because after all, Mr. Speaker, it is understandable that this should be done, particularly when the minister has seen what success the boss has met with in the last seven years in handing out this kind of malarkey.

Mr. Sinclair: Envy will get you nowhere. You are the malarkey man in the house right now.

An hon. Member: How is your campaign coming on?

Mr. Hees: The minister said to himself, no doubt, "If it works for him, why should it not work for me?" So he set himself the task of schooling himself to fill this particular role. And, Mr. Speaker, those of us who have observed the minister closely in the last couple of weeks have noticed that very often he has had a sort of dreamy, far-away look in his eye, the look of a man who sees thousands of little children gathered at whistle stops all across the country. As he walks down the corridor you often notice him now—you people in the House of Commons just watch him and see if this is not true—no doubt it is quite unconscious, but you can see the movement of his hands as he walks along the corridors, patting countless little tousled heads as he walks through the crowds and hands out the soothing syrup to the mothers of babies. Yes, the minister is working very hard at this, and more power to him. It worked for the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and no doubt the Minister of Finance has set his sights on the job.

Mr. Sinclair: You certainly tried to make it work from coast to coast last year.

Mr. Hees: The minister has not got away with it in the past, because the minister of citizenship and propagation, of course, has said himself that babies are his business. He is not going to let the Minister of Finance muscle in on his racket. So what did he do? As soon as the blow fell on the night of April 5 he went out and arranged for one of those new private cars the government sends around the country with its ministers, and he did not take just an ordinary trip. He took a real trip away across the country out to Victoria to make a political speech. And did he make a political speech? Out there he told the mothers of the country that they must produce more babies for him to pat. He is coming around and he wants to have them there, and he wants to be able to pat them.

After all, you cannot blame him for not taking this thing lying down, because this minister was told by the Prime Minister, when he was brought out of the back room and set so uncomfortably on the front bench, that he was the heir apparent. He does not like this kind of a budget being brought in by the Minister of Finance because it is a direct threat to him, and he is not taking it. Therefore he went out and made a speech. It was not a bad speech either, Mr. Chairman; it was fine, except that he made the great mistake of antagonizing every Canadian citizen who did not happen to be born in Canada. He told them in effect that they are second-class citizens and that they can never acquire the status of those of us who were fortunate enough to be born in Canada.

It is amazing to me how a minister who has his foot in his mouth for 95 per cent of the time can manage to make so many political speeches. It seems to me the only answer is that he is a contortionist and is able to do it. It is amazing that every time he makes a speech he pulls off one of those masterpieces. I do not know how he does it, but he certainly does it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us get back to the budget. It was not produced without a lot of trouble. During the nine-month gestation period, which lasted from the time the minister was promoted early in July until early in April, there were several very anxious moments. One of them came at the four-months' point. It was a very critical time in Montreal, last November, and for a while it looked as though there had been a premature birth, but the minister straightened that out and everything was all set. Then the seven-months' stage was reached, and his old department came up for scrutiny. Normally he would be expected to be on hand to defend his old department, but the government felt that would be a little too trying at this particular time, so they called in the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) to take on those noble knights, Sir John of Prince Albert and Sir Davie of Kamloops. The hon. member did very well, but of course he was no match for the two great debaters and they demolished him.

Mr. Harris: Pretty weak at this moment.

Mr. Sinclair: To use a fisheries expression, he is floundering.

Mr. Hees: It all adds up to the fact that this is obviously a convention budget, Mr. Speaker, one that is intended, as I see it, to build up the minister as a successor to the Prime Minister. The objective is to build up an Uncle Walter myth in the same way they built up the Uncle Louis myth, and that is about all it is accomplishing.

In the meantime the country is forced to suffer. There are no economic plans; there is nothing to stimulate production; there is nothing to stimulate sales, and there is no indication that there is to be any plan from the government for at least three or four years, or until the royal commission reports. In the meantime the country is going to be left to flounder. We are going through the same process of hope and grope, and to me it is a sad commentary on a government to bring in a budget at this time with no indication of any plan to overcome any of our economic ills. All they can do is to appoint a royal commission to do something which they know perfectly well they should have been doing for the past ten years and have simply failed to do. The country and the people have to take the rap for this government's lethargy, and that is about the saddest commentary one can make on any government's budget.

(Translation):

Mr. Gustave Roy (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join the great majority of Canadians who, through the newspapers of this country, have expressed their approval and satisfaction about the budget recently submitted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris).

When the budget was brought down last year, we were urged to be hopeful, and we have not been deceived because this year we are feeling the good results.

True, there is nothing to make us hysterical, but it is a first step which has started the wheel turning and we have reason to believe in the enthusiastic optimism of the Minister of Finance, who assures us that the wheel will keep on turning, and that every future budget will bring a gradual lowering of taxes, for the greatest benefit of the various classes of Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, the economic situation of the country has been fraught for the past few months with thorny problems which, from certain points of view, have a tendency to upset the sustained equilibrium that has been enjoyed these past years. That is why, more than ever, business activity must be held at a stable level, and in order to prevent economic stagnation or a serious recession, the government must take the necessary means to preserve this stability which has been the basis of our prosperity in the last fifteen years.

Particularly in the last ten years, the government has remained faithful to a policy of gearing expenditures to the economic situation. We had come to believe that it was necessary to ensure budgetary surpluses and, on no account, to accept deficits. It is only at this time that we are realizing the wisdom of the present government which has been adhering to the principle that surpluses must be accumulated in times of prosperity, the long-term view being that we must be prepared to sustain a deficit without too much trouble should national interest so require, in order to ensure the soundness of our economy.

The Canadian people have approved this policy of accumulating surpluses in order to improve our position in case we have to resort to deficit financing and have judged it a wise and farsighted policy. Our budget accounts show that, last year, Canada had started a gradual climb toward a more rational economic stability. Past records indicate that the figures pertaining to the gross national product, employment, income, manpower and economic trends in most sectors of our economy seemed to stabilize at a slightly lower level, when they did not decline.

These facts moved the government, in order to curb any tendency toward a radical and highly dangerous recession, to use the accumulated reserves for the purpose of maintaining stability and preventing everywhere any overly unfavourable effects. We are beginning to notice that we are entering a period of readaptation which may entail some slight changes in the level of our economic activity. Taking heed of these indications, the government has shown in the budget its readiness to take the necessary steps and the people of Canada are happy to see the foresight of the present administration. The government did not remain idle, did not count only on the hope of a probable business pick-up on a world-wide scale. On the contrary, it went to work and made concessions to individual and corporate taxpayers. It is about to allocate more money for public works, to make it easier for people to get credit in order to speed up home building. It has seen to it that the seaway works are carried out without delay, that the buying power is increased through higher unemployment insurance benefits, quite apart from the numerous other moves it has made to stimulate employment and to maintain a sound business activity.

That is why the Canadian people were very pleased with the last budget. The Minister of Finance has gained the esteem of all Canadians, who are praising his remarkable financial talent and his deep understanding of our Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituents, I wish to sincerely thank the government for certain generous moves it has made:

First of all, the continuation for another year of price support for butter gives respite to most of my farmer constituents. In my district, more than in any other, there is an urgent need for such price support, because the dairy industry is in a less favourable position than elsewhere in the province, due to various factors peculiar to that district.

As a matter of fact, production is limited, both in its intensity and variety, by insufficient means of production, and the volume of any particular product seldom reaches a high enough level to be marketed at a profit. Therefore, as the farmer in my constituency is unable both to produce and to dispose of his production as economically as most farmers in other districts of the province, and, besides, as he has to face market fluctuations with prices falling sometimes below basic price, he finds it hard to make ends meet, when he does not suffer a loss.

Dairying accounts for 85 per cent of farm production in my county and with such an uncertain revenue, our farmers are obliged to ask the government to stabilize the industry by preventing the importation into the country of vegetable oils for the manufacture of margarine, which competes unfairly with butter on the market.

I might, moreover, recommend to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) a substantial increase in the subsidies for the transport of grain to our district, so as to allow the farmers to stabilize their production cost at the same level as in the other districts of the province.

I associate myself with the hon. members from New Brunswick in supporting their request to the government of price support on potatoes, for this is an important industry in my county, and introducing such a measure would be a valuable contribution to the stability of farm revenues in that district.

Mr. Speaker, income from the agricultural industry provides a livelihood for 10 per cent at the most of the farmers in my district. To supplement their income and balance their budget, they have to work in the lumber industry. In this case, our farmers are deprived of a reasonable income because of the unfair practices of the buying companies that collude to purchase wood from farmers at ridiculous prices. I am happy to have co-operated with my colleague, the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc), in bringing about the federal inquiry now being made. I hope the provincial government will co-operate sincerely to compel the guilty companies to pay reasonable prices to our farmers and settlers for the wood purchased from them.

In addition to being forced to sell their wood at a loss, our farmers find their woodlots being practically depleted. They are thus deprived of a necessary source of income. The leaders of our farm industry are anxious to see our governments take the urgent steps necessary to cope with this problem, which is of vital importance for our farmers. I will therefore make so bold as to suggest to the government that it should put this very important question on the agenda of the next federal-provincial conference. Of vital interest to our farmers and colonists is this matter of reforestation of their lands in co-operation with the province. Already many farmers are quitting the land because of the loss of revenue caused by this depletion of their woodlots. A survey carried out by agricultural officials has shown that a very large percentage of the total farming population will follow suit in the next ten years. I urge the government to give this matter its most earnest consideration. The solution of this problem is highly important.

One last suggestion, Mr. Speaker. The government should do away with middlemen in the contacts between Central Mortgage and Housing and the home builder. Since the state would appear to maintain and increase its guarantees in the home-building field, it would seem only fair for it to ensure that the credit it extends be as inexpensive and as easy as possible to obtain throughout this country. Many contractors have complained to me that banks and other lending institutions show little inclination to lend money in connection with buildings erected away from heavily populated centres. That gap should be filled in the best interests of the many people who wish to build a home.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I commend the government for its decision to grant a pension to disabled people. The citizens of Canada deeply appreciate such a move, which constitutes one more step toward social security.

This year again, I wish to convey the general opinion of the people of Canada that the government should now implement a health insurance plan in Canada. This useful step would relieve the constant pressure towards an increase of family allowances, would complete the social security legislation of the country, would maintain the economic effects of family allowances, whose value has been reduced to less than half their former worth, and, through a higher level of health among the people, would contribute to the establishment of a strong, spirited and productive nation.

(Text):

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address this large and enthusiastic house this afternoon I feel greatly inspired. It is so quiet that it is more like a cathedral. I listened with a great deal of interest this afternoon to the discourse by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) on the guaranteed annual wage. I compliment him upon the presentation he made. It was a good speech, and it enabled him to avoid talking about the budget. Therefore his speech served two purposes. However, as I say, he did make a good speech on that subject and I am not going to repeat it.

I mention it merely because the potential leader of the opposition, according to the press, who followed him in the debate failed to make any comment on this matter of a guaranteed annual minimum wage, which is a most important subject at this time to organized labour on the North American continent. He may have been so preoccupied with his notes that he missed making any observation on this most important question.

If one sits here for two or three days and listens to the speeches made in most debates, one begins to wonder what is the subject matter before the house. I try to be realistic; I generally try to talk on the subject under discussion. As I understand it, the subject before the house at the present time is the budget presented by the Minister of Finance in a very well considered and excellently delivered speech. Many proposals are contained in that budget speech, tax relief to the income taxpayer, relief for corporations, and so forth.

Now, I am not going to take the budget and make any analysis of it, because I do not have to. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who is the chief spokesman for this group, in consultation with all other members of the group has done a first-class job in analysing the budget in all its aspects. He raked it over and turned it over and made an excellent presentation, and I agree with everything he had to say on the budget as such.

In addition to the budget, with its many proposals, there is an amendment moved by the Conservative party, the official opposition. I am going to put it on the record again, because I am going to talk about these amendments in their relationship to the budget. The official opposition spokesman, at page 2954, in moving his amendment, worded it as follows:

> That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house regrets that in its budget proposals the government has failed:
> (a) to give effective stimulus to Canadian enterprise to create employment and opportunity;
> (b) to reduce taxation affecting those on lower incomes and allowances;
> (c) to curb its own extravagance and inefficiency;
> (d) to recognize the serious position in which the Canadian farmer and other producers now find themselves".

The leader of this group, at page 2958, moved that this amendment be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

> "(e) to provide assistance to the provincial governments, in order to enable them to plan their financing in such a manner as to relieve the people of this country from the crushing load of heavy municipal taxation."

Now, I want to make it quite clear, in so far as the budget is concerned, that all the economic, social and financial problems of this country today are not the product of the government as such. They are the product of a system, and the government which is in power has to play the rules of the game as they are laid down. While the official opposition makes speeches and criticizes the party in power, in my judgment after sitting in this house for some considerable time there is only one motive for that criticism. There is never any suggestion as to what they could do themselves to change the system to bring relief and alleviation for the economic and social problems which are a product of this system and not the product of the government as such.

In their amendment I see nothing by way of a program, a policy or a criticism that would change the situation one iota. Asking the government to curb their own inefficiency and that kind of thing does not mean anything. In the face of a bad unemployment situation, all it means to me is that you should fire a lot of people who are now employed by the government, but that adds to the unemployment problem. There is nothing in their amendment that suggests that they would do anything different from what the government is doing at the present time. In fact they could not do anything. If they are going to follow strictly the lines of free enterprise as administered today by those outside of this house who control the economy, they could not do anything other than what is being done over there at the present time. Someone has to get on that side of the house who believes in taking the courageous stand of retaining what is good in the system of the past and purging it of the things that are evil; and I do not see the official opposition taking that stand, either in their amendment or in their speeches in this house.

The amendment of the C.C.F. party is merely tacked on. The rules of the house prevent us from laying down the kind of amendment we would like to move. We merely add that the government should take some action in regard to assistance to provincial governments whereby those governments may be in a position to relieve the heavy burden of municipal taxes which are charged against property exclusively. Property in the municipalities across Canada today is taxed to the hilt; it cannot go any higher.

It is at the lower level that assistance is needed. I do not say that it should be uniform or could be uniform. Some of the provinces, such as Ontario and Quebec and maybe British Columbia, which have large provincial incomes, are in a better position to help the municipalities—and they are doing so in many cases—than other provinces I know of, such as the maritimes and to some extent the prairie provinces, where they are not able to achieve uniformity in education and many other things provided in the provinces which have incomes enabling them to do such things.

I think that is one of the most important matters for the federal government to consider. I know a dominion-provincial conference is being held shortly, and there is no doubt that will be part of the agenda. There is a need today particularly to take care of the employable unemployed. While we have revised unemployment insurance, and it helps those who are receiving unemployment insurance, thousands of men who have run off the unemployment insurance rolls are now considered as charges on the municipal governments, who are unable to do anything for them. That is a question which has to be handled, and handled soon.

With respect to the budget itself, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has, I think, pointed up two very important questions which should be considered by the Minister of Finance and his advisers. I agree with him that the proper place to give relief, in so far as income tax is concerned, was the lower income groups. Increasing the exemptions rather than cutting taxes at this time was the line of action the minister should have taken. The exemptions should have been lifted high enough so that married people on $3,000 income and single people on $1,500 income would be taken out of the income tax brackets altogether. If you are going to put purchasing power in the hands of the people of this country so they can buy and help break the jam of unemployment, then these are the groups to which that relief should have been handed out, because the people in those income brackets are the people who spend about 90 per cent of their income on fuel, clothing, shelter and food.

As to the people earning over $3,000, it would not matter to me if the minister had increased the rates. It is not what you pay in taxes that counts but what you have left after you have paid the taxes. I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was absolutely right when he suggested that is what the minister should have done in order to make up for the revenue he would lose by granting income tax exemption to the people in the low income brackets up to the level I have mentioned.

In the time at my disposal this afternoon I am going to talk about economic matters, but before I do so may I say that in listening to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) I was at a loss to understand his logic in his criticism of the budget. First he set out to prove that the budget was no good, that it was a bad budget, offered no relief and did nothing for anybody. Then in the next breath he said it was a convention budget, a budget to build up the Minister of Finance as the next prime minister.

If it is a bad budget it is not going to do the Minister of Finance any good, or enhance his popularity at the convention. The hon. member for Broadview cannot have it both ways. First he says it is no good; then he says it is a good budget and is going to make the Minister of Finance the next prime minister. As far as I am concerned he has to straighten out his logic on that point to prove to me that he actually was criticizing the budget honestly, because his afterthought was that it was an excellent budget and was going to build up the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Knowles: He is a Progressive Conservative. He goes both ways.

Mr. Gillis: Well, you could perhaps have a worse prime minister than the present Minister of Finance. We know him pretty well. You see, Mr. Speaker, I am never particularly anxious to throw someone out of a job in order to get it myself, and I have not seen very much of a threat from the official opposition in the time I have been in the house or anything to indicate that they would bring about any great improvement if they were on the other side. It is better to hang on to the fellow you know who is at least trying to do a little bit than the fellow who just wants to get over there for the purpose of being on the front benches and being called a minister.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. Gillis: I think the present condition of the country and the international situation call for more serious thought than that. Of course we are fortunate because during war we are always very lucky. We have a lot of sensible privates who win the war despite the generals, and the same thing applies to governments. I think we underestimate the intelligence of the people in making their selection of those who are to represent them in the House of Commons. I believe we can pretty well depend on their judgment to do things right. That is why I am reasonably sure the C.C.F. is going to be pretty close to the government after the next federal election.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You are pretty close to the government right now.

Mr. Gillis: At least there would be this much improvement. We tell you in the house what we would do. We do not take the position in the house of hammering at the government for a lot of things they are not doing, knowing at the same time that if we were over there we would take exactly the same position. That is what the Progressive Conservatives would do but they would be a little worse than the present government. If we are ever fortunate enough to sit on the front benches and run the affairs of the country we will have no hesitation in telling you what we will do.

Mr. Trainor: God forbid.

Mr. Gillis: If we were over there now we would have stepped up the exemptions and we would have increased the taxes of the fellow who has the money. We would have got a lot of money by imposing a capital gains tax on the coupon clippers, described so well by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who can have an increase of $10,000 or $15,000 a year from the stock market without paying a cent of income tax on it. That is a nice exemption. We would have done something like that.

There is another thing we would have done. We would have been a little tougher on these fellows from outside the country who virtually have control of our economy through leases and so forth. We would see that their business was conducted along a little more honest lines than it is today. There would not be the same manipulation. We would not be selling the country down the river by admitting United States capital and giving these fellows leases for the next thousand years on the resources of the country.

Mr. Trainor: Who would you get to develop them?

Mr. Gillis: Who would you get to develop them? That is a very courageous question, isn't it?

Mr. Rowe: Take them over.

Mr. Gillis: You would not have to take them over. You would finance and develop them in the same way we fought and financed the last war. We did not have to go outside the country to borrow money. The Bank of Canada was designed to do that very thing. Where private enterprise fell down the government could institute a public investment program and develop the resources of the country, just as little Joey Smallwood is doing today in Newfoundland.

Mr. Trainor: You are talking like your friends to your left.

Mr. Gillis: No, I am not. That was Mackenzie King's idea. He practically told us when the Bank of Canada was established that he who controls the credit and currency of the country controls the country, and that the Bank of Canada was being established so the government would have some control over currency and credit in the event of Canada having to develop its own resources. We should never have sold our iron ore deposits and the future of steel down the river for the rest of our natural lives to a few monopolists in the United States. But that is what we did, and I did not notice very much opposition from the official opposition. The only opposition came from this corner.

We could have developed those resources ourselves. We could have farmed them out, held 51 per cent of the shares in the right of the Canadian people and given free enterprise the opportunity to get in on it if it wanted to do so. We could make it a partnership deal, but why sell out 100 per cent and lose control of the future of steel on the North American continent? That is exactly what it meant.

I want to say something about what is going on today in the maritime provinces. Economic conditions in that part of the country are anything but good. In making his speech the Minister of Finance stated that he was taking a gamble at this time. He said he was budgeting for a deficit in the face of a 2 per cent drop in our gross national product for the past year, but in taking that gamble he figured that the gross national product was going to increase this year by maybe 5 or 6 per cent. I hope it will, but I can tell him that if he is expecting any of that increase to take place in the maritime provinces he is going to be disappointed. The economic trend in that part of Canada today is just the reverse. Established industries that were producing in 1954 are not producing today.

Let me deal with the question of coal mining. That, of course, is the basic industry of the province of Nova Scotia, and to some extent it was a substantial industry in New Brunswick. The provincial government of Nova Scotia hired an outstanding firm in the United States to make a survey of their whole economic set-up. They recommended a lot of things, but they pinpointed the fact that in Nova Scotia the coal industry was the base of the economy. They pointed out it was in difficulties at the present time and that a lot of things had to be done if it were going to survive.

If Canada was a country that was exporting coal, if we had a big outside market, were producing a lot of coal and were not importing any, I would say that if there were any difficulties the cause would perhaps be faulty development and the fact that the mines were not operating properly, but in a country like Canada that could not be so because at the present time we are importing around 24 million tons each year from the United States. A large percentage of that is imported by the Canadian National Railways. We only produce around 16 or 17 million tons of coal ourselves. On many occasions in this house I have asked why a country that is importing that amount of coal should have no market for its own coal. I have never got an answer to that.

It is the same old story. In the area represented by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McCulloch) in the last four years the coal industry has been wiped out. Four fairly large collieries were operating and they have folded up. What happens to the people in those communities when an industry is lost? Nothing is put in to replace it, so those people pack up and get out. They are displaced persons. They are not even considered by the immigration department. Perhaps they have an investment of $10,000 or $15,000 in the community, own their own home and so on. They sell out at fire sale prices and wander up into Ontario or into the United States looking for employment. No effort has ever been made by the provincial or federal governments to take a further look at that problem.

I have a telegram here from the secretary of one of our industrial development boards, in the town of Glace Bay. It indicates that another large mine will be closing by the end of May. There are 720 people employed by that mine, the backbone of the whole community. There is a lot of investment based on that mine. It is closing, and there is no social responsibility on the part of that company which has taken millions of dollars of wealth out of this community. The company says the mine will close and that is the end of it. This is a huge corporation with all kinds of research facilities. You would imagine that if that kind of catastrophe were about to take place in such a community the corporation would have been doing some thinking about how the industry could be replaced. They say that is not their problem; they have no responsibility to the human being. They are in business to have figures on the right side of the ledger, so that community is being allowed to fold up.

I have said this a good many times. First the provincial government has to be persuaded that the right to preside over the liquidation of the coal industry should be relinquished. That is all they are doing, presiding over its liquidation. I have been connected with the coal industry for a long time. The only time it ever functioned properly was during the last war, when the federal government took over the regulation and marketing of coal. It functioned very well and there was no trouble. A lot of standards were raised, pension plans were established, vacations with pay and so forth. When the war was over these things were lost and conditions returned to what they are today.

There is only one answer, Mr. Speaker, to the future of the coal industry. I do not want to be too long about this, but if you read the material that is available concerning what coal may mean to the future of this country, you will be amazed. Remember that natural gas and oil resources are expendable. We have no guarantee how long they are going to last. People who are looking a long way ahead claim that in the final analysis we will have to go back to the coal industry, even as a source for gasoline and a lot of other ingredients that are in that fuel.

For a long time the argument has been that this should be a national industry. Someone will say that under the British North America Act the resources belong to the provinces. That is quite true. At the same time, under the British North America Act the federal government has the power to declare any work in Canada a work of national importance, and they can take over that industry and make it a national industry. Even the little mine at Flin Flon, Manitoba, because it was half in Saskatchewan and half in Manitoba, was taken over by the federal government. The federal government even assumed jurisdiction over labour relations.

People like the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham), as well as other people on the front benches, if they have taken any kind of look at all at the operation of the coal industry in Nova Scotia, must have concluded that it has been a faulty operation over the years. I do not think myself that the corporation—actually it consists of about 36 other subsidiaries, many of which are bigger than the coal industry—ever seriously considered trying to market the coal. Marketing is the big problem. The only agency in Canada that can arrange for the marketing of that coal outside of Canada is the federal government. It is beyond the jurisdiction of the provincial government.

A few days ago I asked the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys why the consumer subsidy of $2.40 per ton on coal going into Newfoundland had been discontinued. If applied to 250,000 tons of coal it would mean about half a million dollars. At that time the minister kind of shrugged it off. Since then I have seen statements in the newspapers by coal dealers in Newfoundland which indicated that the company was not trying to hold that market at all. Here is a clipping dated April 5 which indicates that Herbert K. Wyatt, managing director of the Wyatt Coal and Salt Company, gives the company a terrific beating. He says they had no marketing facilities and no storage facilities for the coal when it went into the car 90 miles away. Their loading facilities were such that they had to drop the coal 80 feet down into the car so that it was pulverized. It is stated that because of the lack of facilities for getting the coal into Newfoundland and marketing it, $3 per ton was added to the cost. Since the consumer subsidy is not being paid, you are not going to market that coal.

The point I want to make is this. This mine that is being closed now employs about 720 people and produces about 700,000 tons of coal. About 250,000 tons of coal should have been kept going across the gulf into Newfoundland. The general manager gave as his reason for closing the mine that they had lost a market for half a million tons of coal and they had not been able to make it up in the past year. At the same time he has a market for 250,000 tons of coal at his back door which he has thrown away because he will not market the coal properly in competition with United States coal.

These are matters that are the responsibility of the government. They are the responsibility of the provincial government first, and second, of the federal government. Every year the federal government puts a substantial amount of money into that industry by way of subvention. Under the Atlantic coal operators' loan arrangement, which went through this house, $10 million was made available and Dosco got $7·5 million to put into a mechanization program. I said ten years ago that so far as mechanization was concerned, and putting heavy electrical equipment in these mines, it was a lot of nonsense and amounted to throwing money down the drain. This contention has proven correct. It has added to the difficulties, in my judgment, and has been largely responsible for the closing of some of these mines. Nevertheless they went ahead with it, and the federal government has that investment.

A lot of the money you lent Dosco under that bill went into its 1-B colliery. It is the one they tried to test that equipment in, and the one they are closing at the present time. So I say the federal government has an investment in it, and I say that investment was not properly looked after, because under the terms of the bill under which they received $7,500,000 three specific things were mentioned. First of all it had to be sound from an engineering standpoint and, in my judgment, it was not. Secondly, it had to be economically sound. Well, facts have proven that it was not. And, third, it had to be in the best interests of the community. The mine is being scrapped, and the interests of the community are shot.

The provisions of that bill were never enforced, so far as the federal government is concerned. The dominion coal board have competent engineers who should have watched that project. The federal government should have intervened before these mines were wrecked. That is another responsibility of the federal government.

This Dominion Coal Company, which is supposed to be producing Canadian coal for sale in Canada or anywhere else, is one of the largest importers of United States coal in this country. They have a wholly-owned subsidiary in the city of Montreal known as the Dominion Coal Import Company. This same company which is alleged to be operating coal mines in Nova Scotia, taking out coal to be marketed in Canada, has that big import company which is importing United States coal and filling the markets in the Montreal and Ontario areas that should have been filled with their own coal.

Mr. Trainor: Perhaps the market likes that coal better.

Mr. Gillis: Well, if they cannot get any other they have to take it. But why should those people who operate coal mines in this country import United States coal and sell it in the Canadian economy, while they use the community as a pressure machine against the government to get more assistance?

Mr. Trainor: Surely they would sooner sell their own coal.

Mr. Gillis: But they are not. I can tell you this. You are a medical doctor; what do you know about coal?

Mr. Trainor: I know the Montreal market.

Mr. Gillis: You stick to your pills.

Mr. Trainor: What do you know about it, for that matter?

Mr. Gillis: What do I know about coal? Well, I worked many years underground in those collieries.

Mr. Trainor: That doesn't matter.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Gillis: I know as much about coal as you do about the amputation of a leg, and I would not argue with you about surgery.

Mr. Trainor: The digging of coal does not make you an expert on the marketing of it.

Mr. Gillis: I know a lot about marketing it, too. I have had to go into that angle of it. I am trying to show you that the people who have it, and who take government money, are not looking after it. This is free enterprise.

Mr. Trainor: You don't talk sense.

Mr. Gillis: It is all balled up under your system.

Mr. Trainor: You don't talk sense.

Mr. Gillis: The only time it functions is during a war, the same as the rest of your economy. It always amuses me to hear members of the Conservative party, particularly, get up in the house and talk about unemployment. Why, today you are just getting back to normal. What we have now is normal during peacetime. There is not a thing wrong that a little war would not cure, not a thing. That is all that is needed. But you never have been able to make this system work, at least during my lifetime, except when there has been a war.

Take a look at the years between 1918 and 1939, and from 1945 to date. It is the same old system: no profits, no work. The solution you offer to get rid of your piled-up inventory is to put the poor men on the street and then come in and say to the government, "You can feed them", after they have broken their backs producing food for somebody else.

I say the federal government granted permission to the Dominion Steel and Coal company to set up a subsidiary in Montreal to import United States coal, and that that permission should be withdrawn. They should be forced to market their own coal in their own market. That is the responsibility of the federal government.

Recently when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was in Nova Scotia he said there was little hope held for a national coal policy. Well, I think that is pretty shortsighted. Today we have oil, natural gas, atomic energy and coal, all competing with one another. And you mark what I am telling you; just leave them alone for another ten years and you will have neither gas nor oil nor coal, because they will kill one another.

Just take a look at the pipe-line situation—just a stock market promotion, with somebody else paying for it. They are not interested in supplying coal, gas and oil to this country in the future. It is just something to make money out of at the present time.

If we are going to plan the future fuel requirements of this country, then in the light of the situation today a national body should be set up, composed of competent people who know marketing conditions and who are familiar with these fuels, so that the future of Canada in the matter of fuel supplies may be protected.

Just take a look at what happened during the last war down in the Windsor area, where they were receiving natural gas from the United States. When the Yanks needed it they just shut it off, and you had that whole area running around looking for coal-burning equipment and trying to get coal supplies. That can happen again. The main lines from which we are pumping oil today are in the United States; they are not in this country. It often amuses me to hear people talk about the United States, and the possibility of war with us. They do not have to have a war with us; all they have to do is shut off the fuel supply and we are finished. Industries and everything else would stop.

It is time we began to take a square look at this question. I know they are doing what they can in the maritime provinces, but geography is against them. A development is taking place there today that will pay dividends. The formation of the Atlantic economic council is something that should have been done 25 years ago, because the answer to the maritimes' problem is in the interprovincial marketing development and complementing the economy of each part of that section of the country. Following that is the development of industry in the communities, where they are taking advantage of the research being done at the provincial level. They are setting up funds, not to bring money in but to create it in the communities and to control it there. If that development continues, then in my judgment in five or six years you will not be sending very much to the maritime provinces from Ontario and Quebec. They will be supplying you.

That is the kind of job that has to be done. But at the present time, and until such time as they can get something done for themselves, the federal and provincial governments at the next dominion-provincial conference should take a look at the coal industry, because much of it can still be salvaged. In my judgment, however, it has to be taken out of the hands of people who merely use it as a means of pressuring the federal government into sending them out more money. That is the way it has been working in that industry as long as I can remember.

Let me conclude by saying this, that so far as the budget is concerned, it is as good as I expected it would be.

Mr. Rowe: Perhaps you did not expect much.

Mr. Gillis: It is as good as I expected. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) offered the criticisms on behalf of this group, and I do not wish to take time to repeat them. He did it better than I could. But I think the time is coming in this country when there should be two budgets. First of all the Minister of Finance should do the sort of thing he did on April 5. He should give us a bookkeeping review of the year's activities, and a statement as to what he thinks his deficit or surplus will be in the next year. He could also give a forecast of what he would expect in the following year.

In addition to that there should be a capital budget. What is wrong in this country today is that we have no objectives. We have nothing to work for. If the Minister of Finance could bring in a capital budget and say, "Our objective next year is to clean up the slums of Canada so far as it is possible in each and every city, and also we are going to establish a system of low-rental subsidized housing to that end," in a very few months time you would have unemployment licked, and you would have every honest member in the house out working for you to complete that program and attain that objective.

This is not the way to build a country. I hope the next time the minister brings in his budget he will also have a capital budget. He is pretty realistic and I would hope he might do this, so that he would be able to tell the house, as his white paper said in 1945, "These are our objectives for the building of industry, the development of our resources and the housing of our people. If we cannot find risk capital to do this during this year, we shall do it ourselves by using the facilities that we have in the Bank of Canada." I hope we shall be able to do that at the next session.

On motion of Mr. Hahn the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall begin with the external affairs debate, and when it is concluded we shall take the following items in the order I indicate: Bill No. 182, to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act; Bill No. 261, to amend the National Parks Act and to establish a national park in the province of Newfoundland; Bill No. 282, to amend the Territorial Lands Act; Bill No. 257, respecting the Canadian forces; Bill No. 278, to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1954; Bill No. 192, to amend the Library of Parliament Act; and Bill No. 350, to amend the Blind Persons Act.

Mr. Knowles: When is it intended to resume the debate on the budget?

Mr. Harris: On Friday, unless it happens that external affairs runs over into Friday. If external affairs runs over we shall continue that debate, but if it is disposed of tomorrow I propose this other legislation for the remainder of the day, and on Friday we shall continue with the budget debate.

Mr. Rowe: You are not going to deal with all these other matters before the budget debate?

It being two minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

TRADE

OIL—TABLING OF REPLY OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT CONCERNING RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTATION

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the formal reply of the United States state department to our representations of March 8 concerning proposals that imports of oil from Canada and other sources should be restricted by legislation or by voluntary action. In view of the fact that our note was included in Hansard perhaps I should read this reply so that it could also appear there.

The reply is:

Reference is made to the Canadian embassy's aide-memoire of March 8, 1955, in which the embassy set forth in some detail the views of the Canadian government with respect to certain legislation being considered in the United States which has the purpose of limiting the importation of petroleum.

The Department of State appreciates receiving this clear and comprehensive exposition of the Canadian viewpoint. The problems discussed in the aide-memoire are receiving very careful study and the security aspects, as well as the economic considerations, of trade in petroleum and petroleum products between the United States and Canada are being examined.

The Canadian government may rest assured that its views will be given the fullest and most sympathetic possible consideration. As the Canadian embassy is no doubt aware, the executive branch of the United States government has indicated to the congress that it is opposed to the amendment to H.R. 1 proposed by a number of senators which would have the effect of placing legislative limits on the importation of petroleum.

I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, and the house will appreciate that this reply is not very precise. This is not, I think, particularly surprising since the issues involved are currently being discussed actively both within the United States administration and in congress. The full significance of this brief communication from the state department can only, therefore, be determined after the outcome of these various discussions is known, and it is that outcome rather than this particular note which is important.

In the meantime, as I informed the house on Tuesday last, we have been assured by the state department orally that every effort is being made to give recognition to the factors which the Canadian government emphasized in its earlier representations. While we cannot be certain about the final result I am hopeful that in the light of their own interest and of the considerations which we have brought to their notice, the United States government will deal with this question in a manner which will not interfere with the development of the trade in oil between Canada and the United States, which is of such importance to both countries.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members will welcome the information which has been given in regard to this very important subject. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs has explained, there is some reservation in regard to the information given, for reasons which we can all fully understand. I believe, however, it would be appropriate to point out that, having regard to the very close association between our two countries and to the extremely friendly relationship which has been regarded as an example, there are implications in one aspect of this matter which should be borne in mind.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce informed the house of the message which had been sent to the government of the United States at the time it was proposed that there be certain fixed limitations upon the movement of oil across our frontiers. It appears from the message that has gone from the state department to the appropriate committee of congress that every effort is being made by the government of the United States to prevent a rigid pattern of that type taking form. There was, however, one other aspect of this question which has not been dealt with as yet, and which I feel could have consequences which should not be ignored if there were not some satisfactory assurances in regard to it.

It will be recalled that there was a suggestion that, as an alternative to ordinary legislative procedure, there might be a method under which companies organized in the United States and transmitting oil to the United States might be called upon to produce by voluntary action the limitation which otherwise would be imposed by legislative provision.

Having regard to the very large investment of United States funds in Canada, and having regard to the desirability of mutual confidence not only from the financial point of view but from every other point of view, I would hope that any attempt to use the power that might be exercised by the fact that the money control was in the United States would be given very careful consideration. It could undoubtedly lead to loss of confidence on the part of investors in the United States in some types of investments here. At the same time it could raise questions in this country as to the freedom of investments which we have always regarded as being vitally important, whether they came from there, from the United Kingdom or from any other country.

I mention this because this subject was regarded as of sufficient importance by the government to be brought forward in considerable detail; and in seeking information it was not only in the hope that any legislative restriction might be prevented but also in the hope that any indirect restriction might be avoided which could interfere with that very friendly relationship in financial affairs which has been so helpful to both countries.

PRIVATE BILLS

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN PETITIONS TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale) moved:

That the petition of Westcoast Transmission Company Limited and the petition to incorporate Baudette and Rainy River Municipal Bridge Company, presented respectively on April 5 and April 18, 1955, together with the reports made thereon by the clerk of petitions on April 6 and April 19, 1955, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

STUDY OF RADIOACTIVITY RESULTS, UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Is the Canadian government giving consideration to taking the initiative in urging the United Nations to make a study as to the extent to which atomic and hydrogen bomb tests can be made without grave danger to the human race, as requested by the federation of American scientists?
2. If so, when will such action be taken?
3. If not, what are the reasons for the government's decision?

Mr. Pearson:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. The Canadian government has been in touch with friendly governments who, through the possession of atomic and thermonuclear weapons, have a direct interest in this matter. Statements made recently by responsible officials of these governments indicate that tests so far have produced a general level of radioactivity which is remote from endangering human life.

Of course these matters should be kept, and are being kept, under constant study as indicated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the house on April 4. In addition to the investigations referred to by the minister at that time, the scientific conference on the peaceful uses of atomic energy to be held in Geneva in August will consider a number of problems related to the health and safety aspects of atomic energy, including biological and genetic effects and radiation injury and protection.

The government would be prepared to support any serious studies, which gave promise of increasing our knowledge of the problem. It is the view of the government, however, that it would serve no useful purpose for it to take any special initiative at this time of the kind referred to in the question. The government will continue to consult with friendly governments on this important matter.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—DRAGGER PAYMENTS

Mr. Kickham:

What was the total amount paid in each of the counties of Prince Edward Island for the years 1951 to 1954 inclusive, under assistance in construction of vessels of the dragger or long-liner type?

Mr. MacNaught:

Fiscal year	Kings county	Queens county	Prince county
1951-52	$15,455.55	$14,300.55
1952-53			$14,246.10
1953-54	32,683.20
1954-55	16,514.85

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

RADIO COMMUNICATION BY T-33 PILOTS PRECEDING CRASHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Have any pilots of T-33 aircraft which crashed made radio communication which suggested they were in trouble?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for having given notice of his question. In some of the T-33 crashes the pilots were able to report by radio that they were encountering difficulty. Whether or not radio communication is possible in such circumstances depends of course upon distance, communications conditions and the rapidity with which an emergency may develop.

When radio communication is possible accidents are very often prevented because corrective instructions can be given. With respect to the 19 T-33 crashes which occurred in training command during the calendar year 1954, radio reports of difficulty were made in the case of five crashes, and in three of these five crashes there were no fatalities. No radio communication was received in the remaining 14 crashes.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask a supplementary question. When pilots radio that they are in trouble are they advised to use the ejector apparatus?

Mr. Campney: I would presume that the circumstances of the case as given to the tower would determine any advice that might be given. But I would think if there was any likelihood of a crash, most certainly a pilot would be given that instruction. In fact I would not think a pilot under such circumstances would require it.

INQUIRY AS TO TRAINING STAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister tell the house whether a two-stage or three-stage pilot training program is in effect for air force pilots? I mean by that, do they begin with Harvards and go to T-33's, or is there some elementary stage in the training program?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): The present regulations are that they go from Harvards to T-33's and then on to operational planes.

COAL

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DEVELOPMENT OF GAS TURBINE ENGINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in view of the recent announcement in the New York press that there is every indication that the final "run until it busts" tests at Dunkirk, New York, on the coal-burning gas turbine were considered successful, would the minister care to state if the experiments and investigations being carried on in Canada indicate that this turbine will materialize for economic use on our railroads?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given notice of his question. The Canadian experiment in the development of a coal-fired gas turbine engine by Professor Mordell at McGill University has been under way for several years under the sponsorship of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

About a year ago the machine was started on a test run. After about 50 hours' run certain weaknesses developed. After consultation among all the scientists connected with the project, it was decided that certain modifications were desirable before the tests were carried any further. The machine is presently shut down pending modifications, and it is expected that it will be back in operation very soon. When a test run of several hundred hours has been completed the results will then be made available to private industry. Any application of the machine to locomotive or other uses will then be up to private industry. We have reason to believe that the Mordell experiment is equal to or in advance of similar experiments in other countries.

Mr. Nowlan: May I ask a supplementary question arising out of that asked by the hon. member from Halifax. Would the minister advise us when he would anticipate that this test run of several hundred hours to which he referred might be undertaken?

Mr. Prudham: As soon as modifications have been made in the heat exchanger of the machine, I believe. We have every hope that the test run will be completed successfully.

Mr. Nowlan: When?

Mr. Prudham: It will be continued as soon as modifications have been made.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF ITEMS IN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue if the government is prepared to have referred to the special committee on radio broadcasting and television those items in the estimates which pertain to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? I am thinking of items such as Nos. 56 and 57. This request was made at an earlier stage, and follows the practice that has been observed in some other years.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter on which I am not in a position to give a definite answer at the present time. The house is well aware that estimates of some departments have been referred to the special committee on estimates, but the estimates for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are not included. Therefore I think it would take special action by the house to refer the estimates of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the radio committee. However, I shall take the matter up with my colleagues, and we will give an answer at a later date.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

LOSS-LEADER SELLING—AVAILABILITY OF EVIDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Will the evidence taken by the commission investigating loss-leader practices, the report of which was tabled yesterday, be made available? I know the evidence in whole would be very bulky. I am not necessarily asking that it be printed in Hansard, or anything of that sort, but it would be of interest to hon. members and others if the evidence itself could be accessible. What arrangements in that regard can be made?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to take up with the members of the commission the means by which that result might be obtained.

POLIOMYELITIS

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF SALES TAX ON SALK VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister in a position to assure the house that no sales tax will be levied on the Salk polio vaccine which will be available through the commercial drug houses?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which is under direct consideration at the present time, and when a decision is reached I shall let the house know.

[Mr. Fleming.]

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF CANADA COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? Is the Prime Minister aware of the press report that the government, allegedly for constitutional reasons, has dropped the idea of setting up the Canada Council? Is this true, or is it still the intention of the government to set up this body?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): It is still the intention of the government to recommend to parliament that this body be provided for.

Mr. Knowles: Good.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ASIAN-AFRICAN CONFERENCE—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN OBSERVERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada any observer or observers at the Asian-African conference being held in Indonesia at the present time?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, we have no observers at the conference; but we have a diplomatic mission in Indonesia, and we get reports of the conference through our mission.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items numbered 92 to 111 inclusive of the main estimates, 1955-56, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, on April 19, as recorded at page 2971 of Hansard, I said I proposed to outline in some detail how Stalin of Russia and his friends conquered China, indicating the part played by Roosevelt at Yalta in destroying Chiang Kai-shek. On April 6 I made a few remarks indicating that same part played by Roosevelt.

On each of those dates, I had hoped to answer the statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on March 24, 1955, concerning Chiang Kai-shek.

On April 6 I promised to read an excerpt from an editorial in a great United States newspaper, commenting upon the recent publication of the Yalta papers. The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) asked the name of the paper, and I promised to give it to him. I now give him the name of the paper and read the extract. The name of the paper is the New York Daily News, and it is dated March 18, 1955. It has a daily circulation of 2,050,000, which indicates that it is no third-rate or tenth-rate newspaper. The name of the editorial from which the extract comes is "The Sorry Record of Yalta." These are the words I culled from the editorial:

> So Roosevelt sold Chiang Kai-shek down the river, with a lame excuse that he felt sure Chiang would agree afterward to virtually giving Russia Manchuria and the warm water port of Dairen. Thus, Roosevelt set the stage for the red conquest of China, the Korean war, and the present threat of communist conquest of all Asia.

And, I might add, of all the world.

I think that will indicate quite clearly that I am not alone in the position I take. The particular statement of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was this, as reported at page 2356 of Hansard:

> How many Canadians or Americans understand why the Chinese people drove Chiang Kai-shek out of China?

Later on, as I recall, there were more remarks that indicated the reason he was driven out by the Chinese was that Chiang was "corrupt". In the same speech the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made three other statements which I shall not take time to read to the house at the present time, but the opening and closing words of which I shall give so they can be found readily by those who are interested. The first is on page 2358 of Hansard as follows: "It is about time... continental United States." The next is: "He suggested... the United Nations." The next is: "I have told... peace in Asia."

Now, there is diametrical opposition between myself and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. This is wholly honest, and there is no political concern in the matter. He believes one thing; I believe another.

I think the issue between us must be decided by reference to authorities. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is a university graduate, I am sure. I am a university graduate. He has been principal of a high school for a good many years; so have I. Neither of us is accustomed to telling lies, and neither of us is much accustomed to getting things wrong. He has been in public life a good while; so have I. I shall now give the authorities which I propose to use and we shall see which one of us can base his opinions on the sounder authority. In the time left to us in the present session I fancy the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and I shall have some entertainment.

These are the authorities to which I propose to refer. The first one is "China in Stalin's Grand Strategy." I have them all here on my desk so everybody can see them. It was written by Dr. Hu Shih, one-time ambassador to the United States during a period including 1939. The article is reprinted from Foreign Affairs, an American quarterly review, October 1950, copyrighted in 1950 by the Council on Foreign Relations, Incorporated. It was printed in the United States. I shall refer to this document whenever I have reason to refer to it by the words "Hu Shih". This will enable us to avoid repeating the name of this document so many times in Hansard, because with respect of every statement I make I am going to identify the document so there will be no question as to the soundness of what I shall state, or that the authorities to which I shall refer are valid.

The second document is "The Iron Curtain over America" which was written by Dr. John Beaty. It was first printed in 1951, and the eighth printing was in June, 1952. Dr. John Beaty is an M.A. of the University of Virginia, a Ph.D. of Columbia University, and a postgraduate of University of Montpellier in France. In 1941 he was called to active duty in the military intelligence service of the United States war department general staff, where he spent five years. In 1943 he was promoted to lieutenant colonel and made chief of the interview section. From 1946 to 1951 he devoted his time to intensive study preparing to write, and writing, "The Iron Curtain over America". Whenever I refer to this document I have just mentioned I shall do so by using the word "Beaty", which indicates the author.

I may say in addition, concerning this man whose works we are considering, that in 1942 he became a major and chief of the historical section in the intelligence department. He was one of the two editors of the daily secret "G2" reports issued to key persons in high places in the United States administration, giving the world picture as it had been four hours earlier. If a man like that does not get to know his way around the world, and what things are all about, I am sure it will be amazing to every hon. member of this house.

The third document to which I propose to refer is "The China Story" by Freda Utley, who is quoted as an authority by Dr. Beaty. I shall refer to "The China Story", 1951, by the use of the word "Utley". Freda Utley is speaking from firsthand knowledge. She was in China in 1946—page 60 of Utley. She heard General Wedemeyer in Shanghai—Utley, 61. She spent six years in Russia—Utley, 63 and 108. She was in Chungking and Shanghai in 1946—Utley, page 71. She knew Li Tsung-jen well in Hankow in 1938 and talked with him again in 1946—Utley, page 83. She was correspondent for the London News-Chronicle in the summer and fall of 1938 and was in Hankow—Utley, 103.

She was personally acquainted with some of the leading figures of the minority who corrupted United States foreign policy in the Far East—Utley, 103. She knew Stilwell in Hankow—Utley, 105. She was herself for some time deceived by Chinese communists and revealed it in her book "China at War", 1939—Utley, page 265. She was very frank. She knew John P. Davies—Utley, 115. She spent eight days in Yenan in 1946—Utley, page 140. She knew Edgar Snow who wrote "Red Star over China"—Utley, page 140.

Besides this she draws most profusely and specifically from authorities of unchallengeable authenticity, such as original documents. For example, on page 30 of "The China Story" she says:

> No one who takes the trouble to study the records can accept Acheson's statement.

That statement of Utley's pretty well applies to Acheson all the way across the board. She verifies this assertion by reference to Acheson's "Letter of Transmittal", to the white paper on "United States Relations with China, 1949" in her notes on page 263 of her book "The China Story". There seems to be very little doubt about the validity of Freda Utley.

The next document is "The Yalta Betrayal" published in 1953 by Felix Wittmer, a man who quotes original documents and lets them speak for themselves; a man whom Dr. Beaty occasionally cites as an authority, which alone pretty well qualifies him as being worth listening to. The next is "Freedom's Case Against Dean Acheson" by Felix Wittmer, a reprint from the American Mercury of April 1, 1952. I have that here, and I hold it up so all hon. members can see it. I shall refer to the pages of the reprint when I have occasion to refer to the article "Freedom's Case Against Dean Acheson".

In addition to these five documents I shall refer to certain smaller documents such as the McCarran committee hearings and other authentic publications. In every case the evidence to which I shall refer was taken under oath in a committee of one of the most solemn organizations in the world, the United States Senate. Finally there is the book "While You Slept" published in 1951 by John T. Flynn, who quotes abundantly and minutely from original documents.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I have endeavoured to be frank and straightforward with hon. members of the house. This is too serious a time in the world's history to be playing politics with a matter as serious as Formosa or China or Chiang Kai-shek. It is far too serious for any hon. member of this house to get up and make pronouncements on any of these three things without knowing exactly what he is talking about, and without considering everything he says. It is true that there will be honest disagreement, and I am going to explain that in a minute. I have done my utmost to play square with the house and the country and I welcome honest criticism, but I hope there will be no silly, superficial political criticism, because this is too serious a time for politics. I can play politics if I want to, but I prefer not to do it. We are too much under the shadow of disaster for anything of that sort.

Let me assure my C.C.F. friends that there is nothing political in my position today, as I said in my opening remarks, nor in anything I say. We are living in exceedingly dangerous days when the Christian religion, in fact all religion based upon a belief in God, is in extreme peril. Back in June, 1945, there was published in the Reader's Digest for June an article under the caption "The Fate of the World is at Stake in China". In referring to that article Freda Utley says that only a very few publications in the United States dared to print an article with a heading like that. In other words there was already in the United States a censorship which rendered it next to impossible for any newspaper to publish the truth about China. That serves to show how desperate is the condition we have fallen into up to the present time. It is true today, truer than it was in 1945, that the fate of the world is at stake in China. I think it can safely be said that it is at stake in Formosa.

I shall ask the minister later on to tell us why he feels so sure about what he has referred to as neutralizing Formosa. I think we shall give him an opportunity some time to explain that to us; but meanwhile under the circumstances, I am inclined to think that neutralizing Formosa is a desperately serious proposal.

Let me ask my C.C.F. friends whether or not they might not have been reading the wrong books or the wrong kind of books and periodicals. In saying that I am not being mean or political. I think everybody realizes that I have been open and aboveboard and fair up to the present time, and I intend so to continue. I expect those who are in the house to be just exactly that way.

Let me point out some things which astounded me when I learned them within the last few months.

In the United States, "the communist party line, beginning on October 2, 1942, was anti-Chiang Kai-shek". This is verified in "Freedom's Case Against Dean Acheson", as stated on page 9 of the American Mercury reprint—and it is an accurate document. When it is quoted by a man such as Dr. John Beaty, an ordinary person like you and me had better hold his peace until he is sure he knows whereof he speaks.

Again, Lawrence Salisbury in 1943 resigned from the United States state department to become editor of the Institute of Pacific Relations' fortnightly publication, Far Eastern Survey, and in this capacity he inaugurated a virulent anti-Chinese nationalist and pro-Chinese communist campaign paralleling that of the communist Daily Worker, the Nation and the New Republic—Utley, page 150. I think some people will be astonished to learn that the Nation and the New Republic are communist publications.

Mr. Knowles: We are.

Mr. Blackmore: If you are in any doubt about it just look yourself at Utley, page 150. That is how serious the situation is.

Mr. Philip Jessup, as director of the Institute of Pacific Relations, started in 1943 a virulent smear campaign against nationalist China much like the one conducted against Premier William Aberhart of Alberta. I had occasion to tell you about this the night before last. There never grew up in the Dominion of Canada a more straightforward man or a man more honestly interested in reform than Premier Aberhart; yet that man was lied about all over the world and particularly all over the American continent. I suppose that most ladies would have drawn aside their skirts if they knew they were coming into the same room where he was; he was a man fighting the whole power of the synagogue of Satan, whatever that may be. I shall drop the word "synagogue" and say "the hosts of Satan".

The people who are seeking to destroy Christianity and religion, Chou En-lai and all the people who believe in the rulers of Russia, belong to that fellowship, and they do not mean maybe. What they mean is that the Christian religion has to be destroyed, and that they will destroy it as surely as they are allowed to get power. You cannot say that the people who represent that kind of thing are emanating from Christianity. The people who opposed Aberhart are the same kind of people as those opposing Chiang Kai-shek now. The facts about Jessup appear in Utley, page 152.

May I now review Chiang's history in bare outline since 1912, and in the light of that history call upon men to use their plain common sense? There are men who say that Chiang was corrupt. I would like to see any member of this house undertake the job which Chiang Kai-shek did from 1926 on and avoid corruption in a huge country such as China, with very few trained and able people to help him. He was after all only a military general, not a statesman; not a dictator, just the president of a republic. I know that all sounds strange, but it is true, and the truth does sound strange after communist lies have done with it.

An hon. Member: What about the Christian Science Monitor?

Mr. Blackmore: I shall deal with the Christian Science Monitor in good time, but I wish to give the general facts. China is an enormous country with many different kinds of people and many different languages. It is a very poor country. It is a primary producing country; it has very few factories, and it has poor communications in every way and poor local organizations. It has 450 million people. The very idea of one man even attempting to govern a mass like that is enough to repel a person. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has been a school principal. You can imagine what kind of difficulty he would have if he had a school of 450 million pupils and did not have trained teachers to help him but had assistants who knew no more than the children themselves. That is the first thing.

Let us remember that the Manchu dynasty, as a result of the Manchu conquest, had been in power in China for more than 200 years. Thus there were Manchu war lords over the districts in China, much as we had the lords over the feudal districts in Britain, only not nearly as intelligent as the British lords.

Sun Yat-sen in 1911-1912 established the first republic in Asia. Let us remember then that China was a republic and realize that the man in charge of a republic does largely what his assistants want him to do as well as what he wants to do himself. Chiang Kai-shek was made president of the Whampoa military academy. His job was to train military leaders who could help Sun Yat-sen conquer the Manchu war lords.

Sun Yat-sen died in 1925. Chiang Kai-shek as I have said was merely a military leader; that was all he pretended to be. Being the kind of military leader he was, it took all his time to learn war. He was trained in Moscow and Japan; he got all the training he could get so as to become a successful military leader. He is one of the most skilful military leaders on earth today. He proved that conclusively in an incident about which I shall be telling you in a moment.

In 1925-26 he had to take over the leadership in China though almost entirely without knowledge or experience in political government. He was general of the army, yet he was called upon to take over Sun Yat-sen's responsibilities to govern. He established the national government with the advice of his elders on April 18, 1927. In the very year in which Chiang set up this national republic, Stalin established the Chinese communist party. Stalin established the communist red army also in the same year. Chiang Kai-shek had had to go north in 1926 to conquer most of China, to depose those Manchu war lords or bring them under control. He had singular success in this effort, and did simply marvellous things.

He had been in charge of China for only six years, and during that time he had been faced with most dreadful difficulties when in 1931 the Japanese attacked in Manchuria. It was in the far north, and it was very difficult for him to meet them. He had exceedingly trying difficulties then. He had to show extremely wise statesmanship. The Japanese were anxious to engage him in a full-scale war, when he was in no way prepared for such a war but they were. He had to fight a delaying action to hold them back as far as he could to prevent getting into a full-scale war in which he would have been annihilated.

This he did. He allowed them to take Manchuria and they established the puppet state of Manchukuo. as they called it. He then had a short time of six more years before the Japanese attacked on a full scale in 1937. One pathetic thing about the war that ensued was that the Japanese were plentifully supplied by the British and Americans with all the latest kinds of instruments of war, while Chiang Kai-shek had to fight with very meagre weapons. He was fighting the Japanese in 1937, and he continued to fight Japanese from 1937 to 1945.

Now I ask the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar if he thinks he could bring in reforms in a country like China and fight at the same time an army of 1,500,000 Japanese, as Chiang had to do, and, at the same time, look after a Russian communist organization in China and a Russian communist Chinese army. Think of the difficulty in raising the money to equip an army such as Chiang required! This is what Chiang Kai-shek did.

I spoke about 1,500,000 Japanese soldiers. All during the war, from the time we got into it in 1941, he was holding that 1,500,000 Japanese pinned against the east Chinese coast. If they could have gone abroad or could have gone to Australia and New Zealand, I ask hon. members what might have happened to us and what might have happened to the United States. Let us bear that in mind when we remember the absolutely terrible things the United States has done to Chiang.

Over much of this time he fought the communists as well as the Japanese. There was a time during which the communists co-operated with him, but there were times when they turned their armies against him, made a flank attack against him and did him serious harm, and then blamed him for mismanagement. The story is something terrible to read about, but it is all given in Hu Shih's "China in Stalin's Grand Strategy" and Hu Shih cites men who are recognized as world authorities, such as David J. Dallin.

There is no question about the truth of what I am saying. At one time while he was fighting the Japanese Chaing had to leave some of his assistants to rule China and hold the Japanese while he set out on a 6,000 mile march driving the communist army up into the north, destroying 60,000 of its best men and getting things into position so that he had a ghost of a chance to fight the Japanese. How do you suppose he could have instituted reforms during these periods?

Throughout all his rule he struggled against foreign interests. One of the things that caused Sun Yat-sen to rise was the fact that the British had in China their sphere of influence, as a result of which they had managed to get the Chinese to sign agreements which were greatly disadvantageous to the Chinese; and various other nations had similar spheres of influence in China. The result of that imperialistic control was that it was next to impossible to govern China well at all. Throughout the time he was doing what I have been talking about, namely fighting the Russian communist organization, the Russian communist armies and the Japanese armies, he had to be steadily displacing these outside interests so he would have a chance to govern China.

He constantly struggled against poverty, ignorance and vast numbers in China. Just think that matter over. There were 450 million people spread over such a wide area as that of China. At the same time—and it is a thing which must not be forgotten—he had a paucity of generals and a paucity of administrators. To hear some people talk, and to read some of the nonsense they write, you would imagine that skilful administrators simply sprang up out of the desert and that skilful generals merely rained down out of the sky. Where do you suppose he obtained enough capable men? How do you suppose he could govern a country of 450 million people without skilful administrators? How do you suppose he could hold out in China without skilful military leaders? He had to take what he could get.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred to what happened in Formosa. I suppose Chiang Kai-shek sent the best man he had, but that man was a military leader; he was not supposed to be a governor. He probably made bad mistakes. No doubt he did. But with all the other 450 million to take care of, and the vast hordes of red China coming down against him, how possibly could Chiang Kai-shek personally supervise Formosa to see that everything was done right? Just put yourselves in that position. Just do a little bit of realistic thinking.

He was constantly being stalked by Stalin. According to this document by Hu Shih I have read from, Stalin started back in 1924, and he stalked Chiang Kai-shek constantly for 25 years, because he knew if he got control of China, he would have a chance of controlling the world. Just as Lenin said, so thought Stalin; whoever controls China will control the world.

What was the result of all this effort? Chiang came through to 1945 triumphantly. There will be some who will doubt that, but it is given right here in Hu Shih. Maybe I shall get to the reading of the passage. He came through to 1945 triumphantly.

Even after all the United States and Russia were able to do to destroy him, Chiang Kai-shek retreated to Formosa in 1949 with dignity and with constancy, facing the foe with faith and determination and confidence.

What are the facts about what he left behind him? Some would think he was a victim of a disgraceful rout. Read "The Iron Curtain over America" and you will find that such thinking is entirely erroneous. What did he leave behind? He left behind on the mainland 1,250,000 Chinese soldiers—Beaty, page 146—who were ready to give their lives for Chiang Kai-shek. Do you suppose he accomplished that by being corrupt? According to Major General Claire Chennault he left behind him 150 million ardently loyal people all along the south and west China borders, almost as many people as there were people in the United States—all ready to give their lives for Chiang Kai-shek. He had with him on Formosa 200 to 250 planes. He had an effective navy. He had 600,000 loyal soldiers —see Beaty, 146—who retreated to Formosa with him. He was so strong and potentially effective that it required the Korean war—and this is a new slant on the Korean war, and it is one that turns one sick, but I am going to put the evidence before you—and the United States seventh fleet thrown in front of him to keep him from regaining China.

I am going to put the evidence before you to show that apparently the Korean war was deliberately engineered by people in the United States in order to enable the United States seventh fleet to be put between Chiang Kai-shek and red China so as to keep Chiang Kai-shek from recapturing China.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, you laugh. But explain away those 1,250,000 soldiers and those 150 million loyal people. Explain those away.

Mr. Nicholson: How much assistance did he get from the United States?

Mr. Blackmore: I will come to that matter. He obtained very little. You have heard of something said by Dean Acheson to the effect that Chiang received from the United States some $2 billion worth of military aid. In making that statement Dean Acheson is absolutely wrong. It is perfectly established in Utley's "The China Story", chapter 2, that Acheson apparently deliberately misrepresented. I will show it here. Never mind talking foolishly. Get the facts. Then you will talk intelligently. It required the Korean war and the United States seventh fleet to keep Chiang Kai-shek from regaining China. In the face of all this, how can any man with one-tenth of the intelligence and experience of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar permit himself to be deluded into even thinking that Chiang Kai-shek was thrown out of China?

Mr. Coldwell: It is queer what delusions we get.

Mr. Blackmore: That is right. How could he permit himself to be deluded into thinking that the Chinese people threw Chiang Kai-shek out of China? What would plain common sense tell you in the face of all this? I shall have to take up the matter of what actually caused the trouble at a later time. I have not the time to do so now. But let me recall again that Roosevelt at Yalta on February 11, 1945, gave Russia "pre-eminent interests" in Manchuria and in north China as a result of which unless Chiang Kai-shek could perform miracles Russia would be able to conquer China. I referred to that matter the other day. Maybe I shall have time to look into it at a later time.

May I now refer to a few instances in Chiang's life—and just a few. I will talk as long as I can and then I shall have to finish this at a later time.

Here is the first instance: In November, 1943, at the Cairo conference as reported in the statement of December 1—and you will find it in "The Yalta Betrayal" at pages 109 and 110—it was declared by Roosevelt that "all the territories Japan has stolen from the Chinese, such as Manchuria, Formosa and the Pescadores, shall be restored to the republic of China". That was in 1943. Did Roosevelt not know what he was doing? I do not know why he did the horrible thing he did two years later, but that is what he committed himself to in 1943. The evidence is here in "The Yalta Betrayal" at pages 109 and 110, if hon. members wish to read it for themselves.

Here is the second instance: In February, 1945, at Yalta, Roosevelt agreed to let Russia acquire what was to be in effect a permanent position of power in China by granting Russia —and I am quoting Freda Utley at page 3, although I am not putting her words in quotation marks—

1. The "lease" of Port Arthur to Russia as a naval base;

2. The "internationalization" of Dairen with "pre-eminent rights" for the Soviet union in this largest of China's northeastern ports;

3. The "joint operation" of the Manchurian railways by China and Russia, with the "pre-eminent interests" of the Soviet union safeguarded.

See "The China Story", page 3.

Hon. members do not need to be told what that meant. It meant that Russia could walk in and take over everything, which she did. Pre-eminent rights! This meant the two, China and Russia, would be working together, with Russia having pre-eminent rights. You might as well harness a lamb and a lion together and expect the lamb to have a fair chance.

In the Yalta agreement in 1945 Roosevelt sowed the wind from which Chiang Kai-shek within five years, beggared by abundant additional United States treachery, was to reap, and be almost wrecked by, the whirlwind; and before which in 1955, only 10 years later, the whole anti-communist world cowers in imminent danger of being utterly devastated by the tornado.

Here is the third incident. In July, 1945, Truman confirmed the Yalta agreement at Potsdam against the earnest advice of 50 high-ranking United States officers whose report to General Marshall accurately analysed the situation as it affected China, and forecast exactly what would happen. They made it quite clear that we did not need Russia in the war. Japan was already beaten, and to let Russia come into that war would be a calamity of the first magnitude. Yet in the face of all this Truman confirmed these Yalta agreements. See the Russell committee hearings, part IV, June 21, 1951, page 2916.

Here is the fourth incident. In November 1946, as the white paper on China states:

> The—Chinese nationalist—government's forces had occupied most of the areas covered by its demands to the Chinese communists in June and during later negotiations and had reached what turned out to be the highest point of its military position after V-J day.

Does this indicate in Chiang a man who is inept, a man who is corrupt, a man who is ineffective? Or does it indicate a man who towers above men in his character and ability? See Utley, page 16. All this in spite of Roosevelt, Truman, and General Marshall! I want to talk about General Marshall and what he did, by and by, and tell the outrageous things he did to Chiang Kai-shek in 1946.

This is the fifth incident. In September, 1947—remember now, after all the bad things that had been done in 1946—General Albert Wedemeyer, in his survey submitted to the United States president, said the—> —Chiang government had large forces still under arms and was in control of all China south of the Yangtze river, much of north China, with some footholds in Manchuria.

This is a quotation from Beaty's "The Iron Curtain over America", page 118. This again in spite of the further abominations committed against Chiang by Marshall and Truman in 1946! I shall elaborate on those at a later time.

Here is the sixth incident: On July 17, 1949, Owen S. Lattimore, in an article in the Sunday Compass entitled "South Korea—Another China", pointed out that for the United States state department in relation to China, "The problem was how to allow them—China—to fall without making it look as if the United States had pushed them." There is no further word necessary.

An hon. Member: Is that verified?

Mr. Blackmore: Of course it is verified. I cannot verify everything in a minute. I shall verify that before the end of this year, and I think the hon. member will simply feel worse than a mouse.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: I quote this from "America's Retreat from Victory", page 159.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. A. H. Hollingworth (York Centre): I should like to make some observations about the Far East, Mr. Speaker. I shall simply say of Europe that, although the situation is fraught with danger, it is by no means fraught with disaster. I am not so cheerful about the Far East, however. I believe that most Canadians are alarmed about the inconsistencies and what seems at times the belligerency of United States foreign policy in Asia. I feel that the time has come for some plain speaking.

I believe it was Secretary of State Dulles who said that Canada is no satellite of the United States, and I feel we should make that fact abundantly clear. It is clear that the explosive situation in the Far East results from the clash of interests between the United States and communist China, and also from the chief satellite of the United States in that area, nationalist China. As a fundamental premise we can readily divest ourselves of the pernicious influence of the communist propaganda gramophone theme that the United States is a world aggressor intent upon thrusting the American way of life down the throats of others. One cannot live in Canada and believe that the United States people are imperialists. But one can believe they can be misguided, albeit they are perfectly sincere. This is the nub of my submissions today.

It will be recalled immediately how important the Marshall plan was in the rehabilitation of Europe. This was a magnanimous and generous stroke which I believe mirrored the feelings of individual United States citizens. We all believe in the objective of world peace, but this does not imply that we agree on the means by which it may be achieved. As Milton said, one has the right to think, to utter and to argue according to one's conscience, and it is that opportunity I am availing myself of today.

Toward the end of 1954 most Canadians felt that progress was being made in working out a modus operandi with the communist world. It appeared that President Eisenhower had taken over active command of the United States foreign policy. The majority decision of the joint chiefs of staff to participate in the defence of Dien Bien Phu and in the prospective defence of Quemoy were both vetoed by the President. Some attributed his change of attitude to the visit of Sir Winston Churchill to Washington in June; others thought it was because of his realization of the awful consequences of the H-bomb, and still others thought it was the result of the enthusiastic reception he received on the hustings during the congressional election, when he talked about a world at peace. Whatever the reason, it was gratifying to hear less blustering from the state department, particularly in reference to the Far East, and to hear more emphasis on the constructive working out of a modus vivendi with the communist world. It was widely felt here that the President was firmly exercising his presidential prerogative in foreign affairs and was a better judge than his advisers on the great questions of war and peace, and that he truly reflected the feelings of that great nation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are confused again. We thought Chiang Kai-shek was to be restrained, and now we fear he may be unleashed. Pronouncements from the state department have again become turgid and equivocal. Is the seventh fleet now to defend Quemoy and Matsu, which Sir Anthony Eden recently asserted were indubitably Chinese?

Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on Quemoy and Matsu. It was both gratifying and reassuring to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs state that any eruption there would not be our war. Mr. Speaker, we have no business at all intervening in a civil war struggle over those islands. Hon. members know that the question of whether or not the United States would fight over those islands rests with the President, and I agree that Mr. Eisenhower is a humble and sincere man dedicated to peace. But the basis upon which he is to make a decision, I understand, is whether or not he believes that the Chinese communists will use Quemoy and Matsu as a springboard for an invasion of Formosa. Therefore at best the President's opinion will be only a guess, and the peace of the world, I submit, is too important to hinge upon the guess of even such a good man as the President.

In February it will be recalled that congress gave the President carte blanche to defend Formosa and "such related positions" as he deemed necessary. Then came the revelation that Britain and Canada would not support such a policy, particularly as this position seemed to involve Quemoy and Matsu. The ground-swell of public opinion in the United States against the administration's ambiguous policy slowly grew into a perceptible roar.

In the April 3 edition of the New York Times, Governor Harriman of New York was quoted as saying that the administration's policy disregarded "the sensibilities of either our Asian or European friends and allies", and then he went on to say, "It has not only been illogical but deadly dangerous to arrogate to ourselves"—meaning the United States—"the sole responsibility for decisions which involve the future of many peoples."

Senator Spessard Holland, a conservative Florida Democrat, issued a statement indicating only public resistance in his state to going to war over Quemoy and Matsu. Mr. James Reston, Washington correspondent of the New York Times, pointed out in the issue of April 3 that to argue that the defence of the offshore islands is necessary to the defence of Formosa is almost like arguing that the loss of Staten island, a ferryboat ride from Manhattan, would jeopardize the defence of Bermuda. He went on to state that this argument is made against the testimony by the joint chiefs of staff, and that they can defend Formosa even if Quemoy and Matsu are taken.

As a result of all these audible rumblings of dissent the administration began discussions with Britain, Canada and other allies on the possibility of a joint guarantee for the defence of Formosa. Conceivably this could be a face-saving substitute for the original demand for a cease-fire as the price for yielding Quemoy and Matsu.

Then Mr. Adlai Stevenson, in an important and significant foreign policy address, urged the administration to consult with its friends and allies, and even the uncommitted Asian states, asking them to join with the United States in an open declaration condemning the use of force in the Korean straits and to agree to stand with the United States in the defence of Formosa. Alternatively he suggested that the United States submit a resolution to the United Nations general assembly to condemn any effort to alter the present status of Formosa by force. It is interesting to note that the day after Mr. Stevenson made the speech, Secretary of State Dulles in effect endorsed Mr. Stevenson's speech, and it would appear that Mr. Stevenson had smoked out a clarification of the administration's position.

I would think that Mr. Stevenson's first proposition woud be unacceptable to the non-committed Asian states, and indeed to ourselves and to Britain as well.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has repeatedly stated in this house that our foreign policy in the Far East will be in consonance with the principles of the United Nations and with decisions made by that organization in the Far East. But a general assembly resolution would have, I should think, a good chance of success and, of equal importance, it would remove the terrifying responsibility for this decision from the shoulders of President Eisenhower and turn it over to the United Nations, where it belongs. I would humbly urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as a distinguished world statesman, to use his good offices toward this end, and if need be to take the initiative in bringing this before the United Nations assembly.

May I now consider those countries in the Far East where the yeast of revolution has been most ceaselessly fermenting. Countries such as India, Pakistan and Ceylon have now achieved independent status within the commonwealth. Indonesia, Burma, Indo-China and the Philippines have achieved self-determination. Siam alone seems to be wallowing in the past. Japan is rapidly recovering from the ravages of war and defeat. But the key country in Asia is China, which has undergone a successful revolution, and a complete one too.

Briefiy the fundamental raison d'être of the Asian revolution is that it is a struggle for self-determination against the colonialism which reached its peak in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The people of the Far East are impressed more with the positive materialistic achievements of Russian communism than depressed with the ruthless and abhorrent extirpation of the freedom and dignity of the individual. They want food; they want to be treated like human beings. As Mr. Adlai Stevenson put it so succinctly, "They want rice and respect".

As for the Chinese people's government, there seems to be incontrovertible evidence that they are the effective government of over 500 millions of Chinese. At Geneva they were recognized as such, as the de facto government. Most of the important Asian countries as well as the United Kingdom and the Scandinavian governments, among others, recognize the People's Republic of China as the de jure government as well.

In spite of the brusqueness and even rudeness which characterizes their dealings with the west, in spite of their truculence and obstruction, they are governing China, moving into a hiatus created in great part by the misgovernment of Chiang Kai-shek and the Kuomintang so that in effect it was not difficult for the communists to take over.

That Chiang, the successor to the redoubtable Sun Yat-sen, should fritter away the basis of a Chinese democratic state and lose the democratic revolution by misrule is, I submit, one of the tragedies of our times. So I say we should consider recognizing the government of the People's Republic of China, but make it contingent upon a general settlement in the Far East, particularly concerning the question of Formosa, through the United Nations.

It is simply a matter of facing facts. It is trite to say, but should be reiterated, that recognition does not mean approval. We certainly do not approve of the totalitarian policies of the Soviet union, but we recognize her existence and her government. I believe Mr. Churchill put it most neatly. In stating the difference between recognition and approval he said, "Mr. Speaker, I recognize the member for Ebbw Vale", who is, of course, Mr. Aneurin Bevan, "but I don't like him."

Second, we can never expect China to enter into a modus operandi with the west if we fail to make the fundamental overture of diplomatic recognition. It should never be forgotten that the Chinese revolution was primarily an indigenous one. The men of the long march were certainly not Russian satellites, as Professor Dennis Brogan has said. But our present policy of treating them as pariahs in the human society serves only to throw them more and more tightly into the willing arms of the Russian bear.

This policy I advocate seems to me to be plain common sense. I am not advocating a neutralist policy for this country. I aver unreservedly that our star is firmly placed in the western firmament; but in Asia I am much more willing to listen to Prime Minister Nehru, who is an Asian, a fellow member of our great commonwealth, and a firm democrat, than to the tergiversations of the state department and the bellicose vacuity of the so-called China lobby.

I concur in the reasoning that Formosa should be placed under the aegis of the United Nations for the time being. It is true that in the 1890's Formosa was ceded to China and then subsequently recaptured by the Japanese, but I submit it is only fundamental justice to see how the Formosans feel about it. After all they are not Chinese, nor are they Japanese. It would seem to me that this would be a good spot to apply the principle of self-determination. But by no means let us be drawn into a shooting war over Formosa. I would say that the quickest way for the west to alienate the numberless masses of Asia is to start dropping bombs on China. Of course, if a world war should erupt our position is irrevocable.

Let us, therefore, strive to use our good offices to effect an equitable and just solution in the Far East. Let us make every effort to avoid a world holocaust which in Sean O'Casey's phrase would make us "step over time into eternity". My respectful submission is that the means I have just outlined are essential and imperative to that end.

(Translation):

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, this morning's newspapers told us that the Chinese communists were engaged in intense military preparations and that the United States had sent their chief of staff and their under secretary of defence to Formosa to inquire into the situation on the spot.

It is quite evident that there remains an imminent danger of war in the China sea and the Chinese question is the most serious of all those facing us at this time.

There seem to be many doubts here, in Canada, with regard to the position of our country in connection with this problem. The policy of this country, in spite of a great many speeches and statements from our minister, remains as vague as before. In any case, there is nothing new in that.

We need only remind ourselves that a year ago, approximately, on a tour around the world, our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stated while in Asia, in the Philippines, to be exact, and in Korea, that sooner or later this country would have to recognize communist China. The Prime Minister made that statement at the time he was in Korea visiting our troops who had just fought against the army of this same communist China. The reaction, in the country, to statements of the Prime Minister was one of surprise especially since he took good care during the same trip not to land in Formosa and visit the Chiang Kai-sheks.

There must have been, also, an extraordinary reaction to those statements of the Prime Minister within the United States state department.

One must hope that the Prime Minister at that time wished to convey, in a somewhat naïve way perhaps, that Canada would be ready to make every sacrifice to ensure peace to the world, that our country wished to be on good terms with every nation of the world even with communist nations and that we are a peaceful nation adverse to the waging of war against anyone. But today our government is moved by a vastly different purpose, and it goes to the other extreme. Where before it wanted to flirt with communist China, it is ready now to commit our country. And it lets the United States know that it would be unthinkable for us to remain neutral if they were engaged in a major war with that same communist China that our own Prime Minister was ready to recognize just a little over a year ago.

Of course conditions have changed in the last twelve months. As a matter of fact the United States have decided to defend Formosa for Chiang Kai-shek and, what is more tragic, to defend the islands of Quemoy and Matsu.

The danger of war is extremely serious at this time in the China sea. The Chinese nationalists and the American military leaders claim that the islands of Matsu and Quemoy are necessary for the defence of Formosa. They wait only for the decision of the President of the United States to defend them and to keep them in the hands of the nationalists, even if those islands cannot be defended without invading the mainland or resorting to atomic bombing. And yet the disastrous effects of the Hiroshima bombing on the moral prestige of the Americans among Asiatic peoples is something that can never be measured.

Even England, faithful ally of the United States, refuses to become involved with our neighbours to the south, and does all she can to restrain them. Canada should follow this example and urge Washington to let these islands go, as they cannot be defended anyway. As far as Formosa is concerned, let us hold a referendum there under the guidance of the United Nations.

That would be better than to make speeches like the one delivered in Toronto by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), a speech which conveys the impression that this country was in a hurry to commit itself and that this government did not want to miss the opportunity to embark upon another international venture.

We have international obligations as a NATO member, and also as a member of the United Nations; but that is apparently not enough, because one of our ministers had to anticipate conclusions and make statements equivalent to this completely colonial slogan: "When the United States are at war, we are at war".

Obviously, our allies to the south are our closest allies, and any international problem which our allies have to face affects us. We must therefore give them all possible support inasmuch as they are the most powerful western state which has to assume tragic responsibilities and to lead a cold war against the Soviets and their puppet states.

But there is a difference between this and going as far as to tell the whole world that every major war involving the United States will also involve us.

In 1914 and 1939 Canada was engaged in major wars in which our participation was meant to save the very existence of democracy in the world. Nevertheless, in the first world wide conflict our friends to the south waited until 1917 before they declared war. During the last war they waited until they were attacked at Pearl Harbor before taking up arms on our side.

Apparently, though, the government believes that this country must commit itself to any kind of adventure.

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order: Does the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) mean by that that the Secretary of State for External Affairs recently stated that when the United States are at war, Canada is necessarily at war also?

Mr. Balcer: Possibly the minister did not mean that, but a large number of citizens of this country did receive that impression. If the minister so desires, he can always state his case later in the debate.

Mr. Martin: You know that that is not the case.

Mr. Pearson: That is not what I said.

Mr. Lesage: The member for Three Rivers knows very well that the Secretary of State for External Affairs never said anything of the kind and that nobody who has read his speech in good faith could ever come to any such conclusion.

Mr. Balcer: I am sorry to see the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources accuse those who gathered that conclusion from the minister's speech in Toronto of being insincere.

Mr. Lesage: Or else they did not read the speech.

Mr. Balcer: Or people who did not read the speech. However if the minister wishes to comment on my remarks he will have the opportunity to do so during the current debate.

Mr. Habel: You can do so on television.

Mr. Balcer: Formerly the saying was: "When England is at war, Canada is at war too". Nowadays, the old colonial motto is flourished under a different form: "When the United States are at war, Canada is at war".

What becomes of our independence with all that? The government seems to think little of it.

The minister may have spoken thus in order to obtain from the United States a more generous attitude toward us with respect to commerce.

Well, if that is the reason for his last speech in Toronto, you must admit that it has been a complete flop, as evidenced by the stand taken by the United States on the GATT agreements and, more recently, by the statement which was made on the oil issue by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), and the long silence of the American administration on that same issue. While the United States is reluctant to encourage the development of our oil resources which are essential for the defence of the whole western hemisphere, we are in a hurry to tell them that if they become involved in a major war we cannot but rush into that war at once.

It is obvious that the United States is essentially and vitally important for our trade. But it is unthinkable that our Secretary of State for External Affairs should commit our future and give up all thought of independence or neutrality in the event of a major war involving our neighbours to the south.

The policy of this government seems to be that Canada should take part in every venture and that her real independence can never be asserted.

Between recognizing communist China, an idea to which the Prime Minister was partial, and going to war against that country there is a middle road which it should be the goal of our Canadian diplomacy to follow.

(Text):

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I object to the way in which this debate has been carried on. The organization of the debate has been bad. I see no reason for a debate being started about a month ago and carried on in this hit or miss fashion without any continuity whatsoever. But it has had one advantage, at least to myself. I was able to go home and talk with various groups of people about the declared policy of the minister, and to get the reaction of my own constituents, and have certain convictions of my own confirmed.

It is almost a truism to say that one of the affirmative purposes of foreign policy is to try to create such conditions that the people of Canada can live in peace and security. The negative aspect of foreign policy is to try to avoid war. On both counts I do not find the policy of the government at all reassuring. We had from the minister an analysis of the situation in Asia with which I find myself in substantial agreement. I think what he said was right. We are engaged in a battle for men's minds. We have to win that battle. The minister knows how to go about it; but what the minister has said and what government policy is are two entirely different things without any reference whatsoever to each other.

The minister gave an analysis of Formosa, and my feeling was and still is that to some extent he was giving the Pentagon the green light to go ahead. But not even the Pentagon has gone quite as far in some ways as has one of the minister's colleagues. I suppose it must have been with some trepidation that the government learned that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was going to Australia. Possibly they were worrying about what he would say, what commitments he would make and what statements of policy he would enunciate which would provide some embarrassment for those left here.

The minister told us in his speech that we have engaged in no commitment to share in the defence of Formosa; he said that our obligations in this matter arise only out of our responsibility as a member of the United Nations. But apparently his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is not of the same mind, according to a press dispatch today, part of which is in direct quotation marks. It is again possible that this is another evidence of the occupational disease of ministers in being misquoted, as referred to by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). However, as I say, some of this is in direct quotation marks. This dispatch is dated Canberra, Thursday, April 21, and is by the British United Press. The minister was attending a press conference and the report reads:

> "Canada agreed with Australia's stand on the Formosa crisis," he said. "We take the same view as Prime Minister Menzies and are prepared to go full out for Formosa but I do not think we can go full out for the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu which historically are a part of China."

Here is a new enunciation of government policy. The second in command in the government says the government is prepared to go full out for Formosa. We ought to know, and know very soon, whether this is a new statement of policy on the part of the government or whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce is giving assurances to the Australians which I am convinced the people of Canada are not prepared to give.

If the Minister of Trade and Commerce is labouring under what I hope is a delusion and misapprehension, is it not conceivable also that our friends to the south may be labouring under the same delusion and misapprehension as to what is the real opinion of the people of Canada? When the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was speaking in this debate he told the minister that when speaking in the house he had watered down the remarks he had made in Toronto. I read the speech which the minister gave in Toronto, and I listened to and read his speech here. I probably have no knowledge whatsoever of semantics, but if there was any dilution it was not obvious to me.

I think the hon. member for Prince Albert was labouring under the same sort of delusion as certain newspapermen in Ottawa were labouring under after the visit of the United States secretary of state, Mr. Dulles. After Mr. Dulles had spoken I read in several newspapers that members of parliament were impressed. Perhaps that was the right word to use, but I am not quite sure in what context they used the word "impressed" because some of us were so impressed—that "some" extends beyond the members of my party—that we had some difficulty falling asleep that night just wondering what the secretary of state of the United States had in mind.

What the minister of external affairs said—and this is the important part—was that if the people of the United States were engaged in a major war in which their very existence as a people was at stake we could not stay out of it. The question arises as to who decides when the existence of the United States is at stake. Is it going to be the prerogative of this sovereign parliament to make that decision, or is it going to be decided for us outside the borders of this country? Perhaps that is a matter which only time will decide, but as far as we in the C.C.F. are concerned this parliament and this country are going to make the decision, and nobody else is going to do it for us.

We are faced with problems in Asia which we either solve or I think we may perish. The United States feels that communist aggression in Asia is a menace to its security. The United States feels that further aggression must be stopped. I cannot see how the offshore islands of Matsu and Quemoy, if they were occupied by communist China, would be a menace to the security of the people of Canada. As a matter of fact I cannot see how the occupation of Formosa by the same troops would be a menace to the people of Canada.

There are others who disagree with me. I am certainly not advocating the handing over of Formosa to Peking, but I fail to see, in terms of logistics or anything else, how the occupation of these offshore islands can possibly affect our security. But there are those in the United States, and some in high positions, who affirm that their security would be imperilled were the offshore islands to be lost.

The United States feel that the Chinese want to control southeast Asia, and I think they are quite right. Therefore the United States feel that they must persuade as many as possible of the people in southeast Asia to join them in a fight against communism. In that respect they are all wrong, because the people of southeast Asia are not remotely interested in this western fight against communism. They are most interested in the fight against poverty, and I think we can save them for our side if the policies as enunciated by the minister are carried out by the government.

On the other side of the medal, China feels that the presence of the nationalist government in Formosa is a constant threat to it. I happen to disagree. I do not think that Chiang Kai-shek and his troops present a menace at all to the mainland of China. Nevertheless I wonder how I would feel if I came from British Columbia and there was a potential enemy power on Vancouver island. I think I might feel as the Chinese do with a hostile government within 200 miles of their borders. The Chinese feel that Formosa is a threat as long as Chiang Kai-shek and his myrmidons are there; it is a threat which has to be eradicated. They know that the United States has entered into an alliance with the nationalist government in Formosa. They know that air bases will be made available to the United States, and it is an elementary step in logic that if Formosa is a threat to Chinese security these bases have to be destroyed.

We are facing the irresistible force and the immovable object, and if they both persist in following the same path they have been pursuing in recent months then tragedy may ensue. But if sanity supervenes the situation might be saved. If it does not, with what are we faced? There might be in the United States conception a war of survival, because I do not believe that a war over the offshore islands can be a limited war. I do not believe that a war between two major powers can be a limited war. Once it starts, it goes, and it goes completely. However, I offer this opinion. I do not think there is going to be war over these islands, because I think there is a growing revulsion among the people of the United States against it, despite the fact that there are those near the top of the administration who perhaps would be willing to indulge in such a dreadful venture. But the feeling of the people of the United States is communicating itself to those in authority and that, combined with the fact that the President knows what war means, may be our greatest safeguard.

Nevertheless there are those in the United States—and again those in high positions—who are willing to see us go to war over these offshore islands. Perhaps they have not followed out the logic of their thoughts. If they did, I submit, they would arrive at a picture as black as it is possible to paint. If the United States decides that the security of Formosa depended upon the offshore islands, they will fight for those offshore islands. The Chinese maintain that they are Chinese territory; I agree. They are going to try to take them.

The question is, how will the United States conduct such a war? We have been told on high authority that if the coastal batteries in China fire, as of course they will fire, on the offshore islands, these coastal batteries will have to be obliterated. It would not only be the coastal batteries that would fire on the islands. Surely aircraft would be used also. Therefore the bases from which these aircraft come would have to be wiped out, but how would it be done?

I think all we can do is study with some care the statement made by the vice president of the United States in a speech he made in Chicago on the 17th of March of this year, according to the report in the Montreal Gazette:

> Vice-president Richard M. Nixon today warned the Chinese communists in the bluntest of terms they will be met with atomic weapons if they embark upon "an additional aggression".

This is the vice president of the United States.

> "It is foolish", he said, "to talk about the possibility that the weapons which might be used in the event a war breaks out in the Pacific would be limited to the conventional Korean and world war II types of explosives. We are not prepared to fight that kind of war. Our forces could not fight an effective war in the Pacific with those types of explosives if they wanted to."

That is the word of the vice president of the United States, one who but for the grace of God might conceivably be president if the present incumbent should die in office. If the Americans decide to use atomic weapons on China the result for the Chinese will be terrible. The result for the Americans will be devastating, for all that will result will be that all of Asia will be united emotionally behind China.

Asia has not forgotten the atomic bombs which were dropped on an Asian country. I think many Asians are still aware, as we are, that in 1945, the Americans had broken the Japanese code. In July, 1945, the Americans knew that the Japanese, through the instrumentality of Molotov and Moscow, were putting out feelers for peace. They knew that all that was stopping the Japanese from suing for peace were the terms of unconditional surrender. In July, 1945, the Japanese were virtually beaten. After July, 1945, atomic bombs were dropped in Asia, specifically in Japan.

Asians have not forgotten; neither, I think, have we. But if we take the word of the vice president of the United States, atomic bombs will be used in a new war. The Chinese after all are human beings, as we are, and they will have a desire to hit back. They will have a desire for revenge, and we would be living in a fool's paradise if we dreamt for a moment that they had not a stockpile of their own atomic weapons, not necessarily made in China but supplied to them by their friends in the Soviet union. We might be careless were we to assume that the air force the Chinese have is such that they do not have long-range bombers; and if they have long-range bombers, even though they can fly only on a one-way mission, and if they have an atomic weapon, I suspect that they will be strongly tempted to use it.

The quickest and easiest way would be over the north, where we have radar screens which may be sufficiently adequate to spot hostile planes, although I am quite sure that visual observations would be used to check the situation. The moment hostile planes are known to be flying over North America or over the Canadian north every American station across the world is alerted. We also know that; and when the situation comes, apart from the fact that our own skies will be darkened with interceptors, it only needs one blunder for the instruments of death to be launched on their way.

In a modern war one does not attack cities, one does not attack industries, one attacks airfields from which opposing aircraft can take off. I am quite sure that the Americans have many Soviet airfields pinpointed, but I am quite sure there are many which the Americans and we know nothing of, and if the final tragedy happened I am certain there would be reciprocity of the worst kind, which would mean thermonuclear war. I do not think it will happen, but it conceivably could, and it could happen this year unless sanity prevails.

As I said earlier, I do not believe there can be a local war between two great powers. But suppose the United States, even in a localized war, finds itself in conflict with China; what is the position of American troops in this country? After all, what is the position of belligerent troops in a neutral country? What would we do? Would we intern them or would we hand them over or convey them to the border and set them free in the United States, or have we a new concept of neutrality, as I think we have—all help to our allies short of manpower? That is a hypothetical question which may not need to be answered; nevertheless, even assuming that wisdom prevails and there is a withdrawal from the offshore islands, the problem is not solved.

One of the things which obsess many in the state department is the fear that the United States will be regarded as a paper tiger. To some extent it is a sign of immaturity, but it is a definite fear on their part. If they come to be regarded as a paper tiger the only answer I can give is that their blundering diplomacy has brought about the situation. Yet I would sooner see the United States regarded as a paper tiger than think that Canadians should have to go and fight for United States blunders.

But there is another fear, namely that the morale of Chiang Kai-shek's troops on Formosa will be hurt or will perhaps be ruined if we give up these offshore islands. Again I answer quite simply that I would sooner see that morale totally destroyed than see one Canadian killed fighting for Chiang Kai-shek and Formosa. As far as we are concerned in this party, not only are we not prepared to support any war for the offshore islands, but we will not support any sort of war for Formosa as long as Chiang Kai-shek is there. If there is any validity in what the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, then there is going to be a fight in this country; because we will fight this issue not only within parliament but in every area across Canada.

We have no business getting into a war to protect Chaing Kai-shek and his admirals and his generals in Formosa. If Chiang Kai-shek is not an interloper in Formosa, that means that Formosa is Chinese territory. We have no right getting into a Chinese civil war. If he is an interloper I see no reason why we should have to fight for him. The internationalization of Formosa has been asked for. That may be a solution. But Chiang Kai-shek must be removed. I am not going to say that he should be put on a modern Elba, but perhaps the China lobby in the United States could act as host to him for an indeterminate time. At least let us take him out of circulation in the Pacific area.

One thing the minister asked us to do was to try to find out what the Asian objectives are. Premier Chou En-lai some months ago said this:

> Unless we establish a powerful modern industry, a modern agricultural system, modern communications and transport services, and a modern national defence we will not be able to shake off our backwardness and poverty.

I think what Chou said would be accepted by most Asians. They are determined to achieve equality, and with every justification in the world. They are tired of being treated as subject people—as coloured people. We talk—and I have the unhappy feeling that we do so disparagingly—of the coloured people in Asia. Mr. Speaker, white is also a colour. In our own way we are just as much coloured people. Also we cherish our religion of Christianity. I am sure they cherish their own faith in precisely the same way we cherish ours.

A year ago I spoke in debate at the time of the meeting in Geneva, and I referred to the desire of the Asians to be rid of colonialism, their desire to be free and their desire for equality as well. In the opinion of the Asians the only way this equality can be manifested is through a vast program of industrialization throughout the various countries. The Asians are going to decide their own destiny. They are going to choose their own friends. The less we have to do with deciding their destiny, except in a co-operative way, the better it will be. We must realize that revolution is going to be the order of the day for many years in Asia but we should realize also that revolution of that sort can conceivably be quite bloodless. Yet we are afraid of revolution. We who are the creatures, the children of revolution are desperately afraid of seeing it in other places. Let me quote this:

> In fostering revolutions wherever they show themselves, in regretting those which have failed, in extending a helping hand to those which seem to prosper, they lend new strength to the apostles of sedition and reanimate the courage of every conspirator.

That is not a statement by some member of the state department about the Soviet union. It was spoken 140 years ago by Count Metternich and he was describing the United States, and quite rightly so, because America was then trying to grow into nationhood. She had had a revolution. The revolution was essential to her nationhood and her well-being. Now we are unfortunately reaching the position that the United States and many others wish to deny this right to Asia. It is amazing how soon the most ardent revolutionaries become the staunchest supporters of the status quo. We ought to remember that we are all the children of revolution, and that if other countries want to indulge in the same practice they should be allowed to go to it.

Furthermore, we had on this continent 140 years ago what was known as the Monroe doctrine, which worked, due in part to the tacit approval of England. What would happen if the Asian nations decided they were going to have their own particular Monroe doctrine in Asia? What then would we think? Would we think they are criminal or venal and that they must be stopped, or do we concede to them the right which we ourselves have?

There is just now going on a meeting at Bandung which all of us are watching with the greatest interest. I do not expect too much from it, but it may be significant. I do not expect too much because there are many disparate and diverse elements there. There are many conflicts of ideologies. There are perhaps those who aspire to take over the leadership of Asia and who find themselves in conflict with others.

Agreement will be difficult on various matters, but agreement that colonialism must stop will be unanimous. Agreement that there must be the greatest measure of freedom for the people of Asia will be unanimous. Agreement that the standards and conditions of the people in Asia must be raised will be unanimous, because it is disgraceful to think that human beings in Asia who, by our Christian doctrine are the children of God, have a life expectancy of some 27 years. They know nothing but poverty. To expect them to share our fight against communism is to ask far too much of them. What we must be careful about is this. We must not try to draw our specifications for Asia. Let them draw their own blueprints. Let them have their own plans to fit their own needs. Then by all means let us go in and help them. But above all let us help them in every way possible toward achieving that equality of status which they themselves want.

However, one task beggars the imagination. By and large the village is the communal basis of life. It is true that there are cities, but there are not many of them in comparison with the number of villages. The village is the centre of life. It is the centre of the religious beliefs of the people. Their headman is in the village. The local priest is in the village. They have village discipline. There are village mores. There is a sense of belonging, a sense of community, in the village. There is also starvation. There is also a subsistence level of which the people in Asia are determined to rid themselves.

If industrialization on a large scale is going to start in Asia, there is going to be an efflux from these villages into the towns. We remember the human havoc created by the Occidental industrial revolution. That havoc will be nothing compared to the human havoc which will be wreaked in the Orient unless the west is prepared to come to their assistance. It will be the sort of social havoc in which communism will breed unless the west is prepared to come to the assistance of the various countries. Asia is determined to go ahead with its industrial revolution. The people know the chances which must be taken. They are prepared and determined to take those chances. They are going to need capital, obviously. They are going to need long-range education. They are going to need improvements not only in the myriad of villages but in the cities; I refer to improvements in the way of health, sanitation, and the building of hospitals. They are going to need help in the techniques of industry.

I think that is where the west can play a significant part. With the help of our artisans, craftsmen and social welfare workers, our doctors and our nurses, we must be prepared to place at their disposal whatever resources we have when they request them. But they need capital. There is so little capital because there is so much poverty. After the last war the Russians accumulated capital by fastening on their people a most repressive regime in which life did not count so long as there were savings arising out of production, which savings could be channelled into industrialization. Conceivably, that will happen to Asians, unless they are helped. Those nations which are able to help are the ones which have savings like those of us in the west, savings which must be invested and which could be invested in no better way than in helping to improve the standard of living of the Asian people. We shall have to be prepared to support land reform, no matter how obnoxious some of us may find it.

I am afraid we shall have to encourage nationalism. I never for a moment thought that I would encourage nationalism. I do not like it. Nevertheless, Asia is going through a period through which the western nations went 100 years ago. Nationalism is in the air in Asia, and what I fear is that the Asian people will absorb our vices without at the same time assuming our virtues. But it is a stage through which they are going, and therefore we had better realize it. We ought to be doing all we can to assist them. The great problem is going to be that they are not going to take 100 years to achieve their hoped for equality through industrialization; they are going to try to do it in a generation if they possibly can. Earlier, I mentioned very briefly some of the problems which would be faced. The minister knows them. The minister has said that all sorts of aid must be extended to Asia, and still we give this miserable $25 million per year through the Colombo plan, and a smattering of dollars here and a smattering of dollars somewhere else.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, but they are raising it to $26 million.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): They are raising it to $26 million, but if they raised it to $260 million it would be a lot better. In the last few years we have spent billions of dollars on antiquated, outmoded and archaic forms of defence.

Mr. Pearson: So have the Asian countries.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): They may have, but we would have had much more defence had we used some of these hundreds of millions of dollars to do the things which the minister himself said should be done.

One of the obvious things to do is to provide, in part, the capital assistance which is required in Asia. But I do not want to see it done on a national basis. If it is going to be done properly, if it is going to be done successfully, it has to be done through the United Nations. There is no other way. Any one nation doing it on an individual basis is going to be suspect, human nature being what it is. The United States people were generous in the Marshall plan. The recipients of that aid have no greater love today for the United States than they had before the Marshall plan. The Marshall plan has helped them greatly as anyone can see from the European statistics on industrial production. But this has to be done collectively through the United Nations, as was suggested a few years ago. At that time a special United Nations fund for special economic development was suggested, with a request for an opening capital of $250 million. What was the position of Canada? Our commitments for defence were too heavy; we could not afford it. Instead of spending some of these tens of millions of dollars on outdated conventional weapons, which no longer are within the ambit of the new rules of war, would it not have been far better to use that money to help the nations of Asia economically and in other ways? But no; this government will not do it.

The minister will speak about it. The minister has the country completely confused. Canadians believe we are giving away hundreds of millions of dollars a year on the basis of the minister's speeches, yet on the basis of the government's action we are giving away an amount which is quite close to peanuts when we consider the need in the world. We have to help, but we have to help by understanding them. That is what the Asian people want. They want to choose their own leaders. They do not want to have reactionaries imposed upon them, as has been the case in the past. They do not want the Chiang Kai-sheks; they do not want the Bao Dais; and I doubt if many really want the Syngman Rhees. Their leaders must have the confidence of the people. It is conceivable we shall dislike their policies immensely, but so long as they have the support of the people we have to realize that if there are elected leaders in Asia who are going to carry on this fight against communism in their own way it will pay us to support them. It will not pay us to support them in the sense that we are in a position of sovereignty over them. We should support them on the basis of a partnership. We should support them on the basis of mutual aid.

The alternative is plain if we do not do it. The Asians will prefer their own form of communism to western imperialism. I do not think there can be any question whatever about it. The Asians have shown they can solve their own problem. All one has to do is to consider what happened in the state of Andhra in India, some few weeks ago, a state of some 20 million people, which all the commentators told us was threatening to go communist. When I read in Time magazine that this was the case I felt greatly encouraged because Time is lamentably wrong in most of these cases. What happened was that, although the communists pulled every trick out of the bag, nevertheless Mr. Nehru managed to so sway and arrange affairs that the communists were thoroughly trounced. This was done without any help at all from the state department, miraculous as that may seem. Really, I think the Asians are quite capable of solving their other problems in the same way if they get some help.

All I say is this. We cannot make allies of these people by asking them to join in the fight against communism. We are going to make allies by asking to join with them in a partnership in the fight against poverty and disease which has so afflicted them, and which is so implicit in the minister's speech but which is denied so explicity by government policy. We see what the anti-communist regimes can do in India, in Burma and in Indonesia, but there are others who need our help. What we have to realize is that the fight in Asia is not between western ideas and communism; it is not between western standards and communism; it is not between western economics and communism; it is not between western capitalism and communism. It is a fight against poverty. Until we realize that, and until we are prepared to play our part in combating that poverty, we are going to continue to lose out.

I believe the time has come when the western powers have to make up their minds exactly what they are going to do in Asia. We cannot be the victims all the time of the policies of the United States which leave us confused and unhappy, not knowing what is to be done. There is one good thing to be said for the actual fact of United States policy, it is providentially a far different thing from the numberless policies which are given out and emitted by the brass hats in the Pentagon and the would-be Warwicks in the state department and in other positions of influence in the United States. United States policy in action has fortunately been far different from the suggestions which have been made by the leading exponents of policy in that country.

So, what we have to do is to assure the Asians that it is our objective to see that they are freed from foreign domination and that they have leaders of their own choice. We should show them we are prepared to co-operate with them in every way possible to raise their standards of living, socially and economically. The alternative is plain. The alternative is years of stress, perhaps not years of terror, but years of alarms and excursions and threats, leaving some more and more despondent and others more and more despairing.

I was reading a book of Lewis Mumford's the other day, and he quoted a letter from a correspondent which went as follows:

> Each culture evolves a characteristic gesture that symbolizes its essential values. Thus Christianity brings to mind a suppliant figure on its knees in prayer; the Buddha sits in the calm of eternity with snails in his hair. The gods and Pharaohs are seated—great granite figures of power. There is in these postures an element of the ultimate, an expression of a transcendent attitude.
> But what, pray, is our posture upon having miraculously touched the innermost sources of nature's power? Our school children here in the backwoods of my village are taught in daily drill to duck under their desks when they hear the syren blow. The citizenry here built themselves deep underground shelters where they are to cower while their civilization is blown to atoms. And those not fortunate enough to grovel in fear and trembling underground are taught to fall upon their faces in the gutters of their cities and await their doom. Prostrate, our heads deep in the mud, we face the future. Such is our posture.

If we were to accept that, then we would believe we were moving inexorably toward extinction. And it may be so; but I do not believe it. Obviously this letter is written by one who has become disillusioned, and in turn whose disillusionment has led to despair. Disillusionment might be a good thing; within limits it certainly is. But I see today no rhyme or reason for despair if we do the things we know we ought to be doing. I have no sense of despair, but I have a sense of frustration and a sense of anger. I am angry with a government which, by its blindness and by its refusal to act, by denying its own minister's policy, may perhaps save itself dollars, but conceivably could help to lose a civilization.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, usually I find myself in large measure in agreement with the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart). I do not disagree with a good deal of what he said today; but on one point I think surely, upon reflection, he must realize that he was on very weak ground. That was when he asked, what would we do in the event of war, if the United States was in that war and Canada was not? He asked whether we in Canada would intern Americans, or what we would do.

I am sure my hon. friend, who is such a strong supporter—as I am—of NATO, must realize that NATO is the last solid device we have in this world today, apart from the political device of the United Nations, to protect our security. I am sure the hon. member must realize, upon reflection, that he was talking directly contrary to the set-up of NATO. Of course if the United States got into a war, and Canada did not, the uniformed forces stationed in Canada or in any other part of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization area would have every legal right to remain there, and to operate there.

I think, too, if my hon. friend will look back in history he will see that there have been other great historic occasions when one part of the world was engaged in war and another part was not; and yet that did not compel the part of the world that was not technically at war to apply all of the technicalities of neutrality.

I think my hon. friend will remember that when the two great world democratic leaders, Winston Churchill and Franklin Delano Roosevelt, met on a battleship at their historic conference off Newfoundland, there was no attempt on the part of the United States naval forces to intern that person who called himself "naval person", simply because he happened to be wearing the uniform of the British navy.

And when I am on the subject of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill may I say that I am glad to see in this debate, unlike the debate that took place on the same subject on February 12, 1953, members of the Social Credit party have not taken quite so anti-Roosevelt a position as they did then, when the leader of that party said, as reported at page 1881 of Hansard:

> But, Mr. Speaker, when the full history of these times is written, when all of the facts have been brought to light, there will be many people who will say that the past two presidents of the United States have been the great betrayers of humanity.

In my opinion that was one of the most unfortunate statements ever made in any British parliament; because if the people of the British commonwealth ever owed a great debt to one personality, they owed it to that very great Democrat, the late Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Nowadays, when it is the fashion to debunk so many people and to besmirch and belittle so many people, and with people making a lot of money debunking persons such as Lawrence of Arabia, and when people can make money by making offhand comments about what was said or supposed to have been said at the Yalta conference, I wish to say that in my opinion we never would have come through the great world crisis, and we would not be here today debating how to deal with this latest menace with which the free world is faced, had it not been for the great support we got from that great-hearted Democrat, the late Franklin Delano Roosevelt—even for years before the United States was technically in the war.

Mr. Low: And we would not have had the problems we face, either.

Mr. Philpott: I would like to hear from members of the Social Credit party in the house perhaps a little bit of the new approach I read the other day in a newspaper. We all know someone has said that you cannot believe everything you read in the papers. Sometimes it is denied.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member ought to know.

Mr. Philpott: However, I am giving the organizer of the Social Credit party, and also the business manager of the "Back-to-the Bible" hour, Mr. Orvis Kennedy, credit for accuracy and sincerity. He said something the other day to the effect that perhaps we should try gestures of good will to these 600 million people of China, that perhaps we should even give them some gifts of our surplus wheat, and see how they would react to that.

I am not suggesting that is a practical proposition; but when I compare the spirit of that statement with the spirit of what we heard this afternoon from my very good friend, for whom I have a warm feeling in my heart, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), then I think I would have to go along with Mr. Orvis Kennedy and not with the hon. member for Lethbridge.

When I hear these fulsome flatteries, these fulsome compliments, to Chiang Kai-shek—and I for one will not say one word in disparagement of Chiang Kai-shek or, for that matter, any other Chinese statesman today—I think that sometimes it is an advantage to have held a job for a long time. I happen to have been in newspaper work in Canada for 33 years, and my memory goes back to some of the very first articles I wrote. These were in the years when Chiang Kai-shek was winning southern China. I think I could even dig up some of the old scrap-books; and if I dug up scrap-books and photographs I am sure I would find the Russian adviser, General Borodin, or General Galen, standing side by side with Chiang Kai-shek in the conquest of southern China. And I think if I were to dig up another news item I would find that in February 1943 I wrote an article for many Canadian newspapers stating that there was a state of disguised civil war in China between the forces of Chiang Kai-shek and those of communism.

One of my most prized souvenirs is a letter I received on the official letterhead of the consul general of China in Canada demanding a published retraction in Vancouver papers, and saying that there was never anything so nonsensical as trouble between the communists and the government of Chiang Kai-shek. And so I say that sometimes it is an advantage to have a long memory and to have had an experience in these times through which we are passing.

I intervene in the debate today to make only a few points. I wish first to compliment the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) upon what I thought was one of the most masterly exhibitions of practical diplomacy I have been privileged to see. And if we want to know what a masterly exhibition of practical diplomacy it was, all we have to do is to see what has happened subsequently in the United States. When I saw the technique of the Secretary of State for External Affairs first in his Toronto speech and also in this house, I wondered to myself just what he was doing, and then afterwards I thought I saw the point exactly. I thought that he made the most important point of all, and perhaps he made it first, namely, that in any life and death struggle, whether we like it or not, we are indissolubly tied in with the United States. Whether we like it or not, in any such life and death struggle involving the United States and Canada, involving in practical terms, if we want it that way, the areas of northern Canada or any other part of the North Atlantic treaty area, which we are obliged to defend, we would be in that war from the first day and from the very first hour. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we cannot too lightly take the view that anything that is happening out in Asia does not immediately concern us, even if, as the minister pointed out, we may have no direct commitments, or no immediate obligations for what happens there. I say that if we ever wanted proof that Canada counts when she speaks out in international affairs or, in a larger sense, that the British commonwealth counts when it speaks, either publicly or privately, to make peace, we have seen that demonstrated in the past month or six weeks.

We have seen a great modification of the United States policy, particularly in regard to those two disputed offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu. The minister made very clear, not only on that occasion but on other occasions, that Canada believes they belong to or they are part of the Chinese mainland. These, of course, are my own words. It would be the height of folly to have a war over those two particular islands; but there is a quite different situation in regard to the larger disputed island of Formosa.

If we are to make our influence felt in international affairs, perhaps we should be prepared to speak out just as clearly on Formosa as Canada has already spoken out on the offshore islands. I for one sincerely hope that either Canada or some other member of the British commonwealth takes the initiative at the proper time to see that there is something in the nature of a United Nations trusteeship set up over the island of Formosa for a fixed number of years. I would suggest not too short a period; I would suggest about ten years. It seems to me that if we are to make our voice felt, even as practical peacemakers, we have to suggest something that takes into account the actual realities of the world in which we live, and one of the realities in the world in which we live is that, regardless of the legal or even moral position of the ultimate ownership of the island of Formosa, it is a position which, in the opinion of the responsible heads of the United States military, naval and air forces, is of considerable strategic value. I for one would not be too forward, or too brash, in suggesting to the United States that they should simply wash their hands of Formosa at a time when the Russian communist powers are in fact in an even more dubious position of legality in their occupation of the numerous countries of eastern Europe, including Poland, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, and so on. But if we are to make a practical suggestion that has any chance of being accepted by the different contending parties, it might come out of this United Nations trusteeship idea. A United Nations trusteeship would fulfil the primary strategic objective of the United States military leaders. That objective has been stated by President Eisenhower himself, who said that they will fight, if necessary, to keep Formosa from falling into unfriendly hands.

A United Nations trusteeship would above all be fair to the people who live on the island of Formosa, and we could at least apply that principle of self-determination about which we have heard so often, as early as the first world war. Finally, I think a United Nations trusteeship might even get the agreement of the present communist government of China, because that government must know very well that if it comes to a fight they have no chance to take the island by force from the United States, if the United States wishes to try to protect it. Therefore I submit, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps Canada could make known in one way or another that she would solidly support a United Nations trusteeship for Formosa, and that it should be a stipulated number of years, and that at the end of that time the people of Formosa, in complete freedom, should be allowed to decide their own destiny.

If I understand correctly some of the subterranean half-interruptions that I hear from the other side, I might surmise that someone is saying, well, that is exactly what Mr. Attlee said in Vancouver last Saturday night. Well, Mr. Attlee did say it in Vancouver last Saturday night, and his vast audience, which was by no means composed entirely of supporters or adherents of the C.C.F. party, gave him the most tremendous ovation that has been heard in Vancouver in many a year. But I say that many other people said it long before Mr. Attlee said it in Vancouver last Saturday night. Among others—

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, three years ago.

Mr. Philpott: Among others, I would put the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar a couple of weeks ago.

Mr. Knowles: Two or three years ago.

Mr. Philpott: The Prime Minister of India a couple of years ago and I think, in my own column, four or five years ago.

Mr. Knowles: That was before you became a Liberal.

Mr. Philpott: I now wish to turn for a minute, Mr. Speaker, to one other subject. The most important fact stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his two speeches on major foreign policy was that, whether we like it or not, we are inextricably bound to the United States in any war involving the life and death of our two countries. Because we are, because that is one of the facts of life that we must accept, because it is true, Mr. Speaker, that if Russian planes ever do come across the north pole and are detected by that northern distant early warning radar alarm, or by any considerable number of the many tens of thousands of people whom we have already enlisted in the ground observer corps, we know perfectly well that, regardless of any formality, the war would be on, the whole thing would be automatic. The retaliatory forces would take off from this country and that would be it. But because it is a fact of life that we are inextricably bound with the United States, we have to exercise very real forethought and great foresight to prevent complications of our position.

I am not now going to refer to the many speeches and writings of the late Colonel McCormick of the Chicago Tribune; but there are people in the United States who have queer ideas as to the future of this North America. Among them has been my very good friend, a very fine gentleman, the new junior senator from the state of Oregon, Mr. Richard Neuberger, who only a couple of weeks ago in Canadian papers from coast to coast advocated what I would call the annexation of this country to the United States, which I thought had passed out with the Tories in the year 1849, when they stoned the governor general. Incidentally, I have always blamed them for doing that as otherwise the capital would have been in Montreal and not in Bytown or Ottawa where Queen Charlotte never fixes the potholes until tulip-time, and apparently this year there is going to be a great scarcity of tulips. As I say, this thesis of annexation went out with the time the Tories stoned the governor general in 1849. We have now had it resurrected from two different ends of the scale.

It is one of the facts of life in the world in which we live that the northern frontier of Canada will have to be defended much more strongly than it is being defended today. I for one want to make my voice heard just as clearly as I can that I am in favour of Canadians defending Canada. I am in favour of taking over the major responsibility, I do not say the entire responsibility, for defending the north of Canada. It is a fact that among the NATO powers we have become, in the famous words of Mr. Churchill, mixed up together for the common good. But I do say that we should take over the major responsibility for defending the north of Canada, that we should take whatever steps are necessary to see that the major job of defending that North American frontier is discharged by Canadians and with Canadian principles and Canadian policies in mind.

I for one would not want to give the false impression that I am in favour of bringing home from Europe any part of the strong air force we have there defending the western frontier. I had the privilege last autumn of visiting NATO headquarters in Paris and talking with one of the finest Americans I have ever met in all my life, General Nordstad. Sometimes when we over here on this side of the border listen to the radio or read the press, and sometimes wonder about some of the things the United States might be considering doing, if we had a chance to talk with a real American like General Nordstad we would come away with a great feeling of reassurance. You know that you could trust your life with that man; you know he would never give any order that you would not give yourself if the fate of the two countries was at stake.

When I see that we have very large forces stationed in Europe and when I read that strong pressure is being exerted by some quarters to station greatly increased forces in northern Canada and that there is some suggestion that perhaps if we have not enough Canadian forces to go around we should station a large percentage of United States forces in northern Canada, I for one am completely opposed to that suggestion.

I believe that Canada should be defended by Canadians. If we have not enough air force or enough ground troops to discharge all of our obligations, it would be better at the proper time and in the proper way to transfer some of the forces which we now have in Europe, have them take over the job of sentry duty in the north and have them replaced by United States troops which some people are now suggesting should be sent to defend our northern frontier.

While I am on the subject may I say that in my opinion the time is coming when we will have to have considerably more ground forces. I for one would like to see this country experiment a bit and I have a suggestion to make to my very honoured colleague, the minister of defence, of whom I think all British Columbia is so proud at his having been given this big and onerous job, which he is doing so well. I should like to suggest to my colleague the minister of defence and to his colleagues in the cabinet that consideration should be given to a modification of an old plan that was used as early as the first world war.

I should like to see, beginning with November 1 each year, a period of training started for perhaps 20,000, 30,000 or even 40,000 of our young men. During the past few weeks I have been checking with people whose military judgment I respect and who should know about these things. They tell me that the proper kind of intensive training would turn out very useful soldiers after a six-months course. I for one would like to see this experiment tried.

I think one reason why many of our young men are not joining the armed forces is the length of the period of service. Not long ago I checked to find out why more men were not joining the R.C.M.P. and the reply I got was, "Who wants to sign up for five years?" The same argument might be used with regard to the armed forces.

In any event I throw out the suggestion that Canada should consider a new way of raising and training the military forces which are going to be necessary if we are to have the increased protection which we need on our northern frontier. Let Canada be defended by Canadians. Every winter we should train several scores of thousands of young Canadians from November 1 until April 1 or May 1; they should be put through an intensive course of training. Then those who desire to be released to return to their regular civilian jobs could be released, while those who wanted to come back the following year to be fitted into a more professional or highly trained integrated unit would have that opportunity.

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to make a modest contribution to this debate for the purpose of expressing my point of view and asking: where is communist ideology leading us? My intention is to use the English language for the benefit of the majority of the members of the house and I hope sympathy will be extended to me for doing so. If I should make mistakes during the course of my remarks I am sure the indulgence of hon. members will be on a par with my efforts.

As I said, where is communist ideology leading us? Owing to an intensive propaganda, carefully and hypocritically prepared, too large a number of human beings, amongst whom unfortunately too many Canadians, consciously or not, and through naïveté, ignorance or malice, seem to convince themselves each day, and more and more, that communism is nothing more than a political party which it is possible to join.

Thus indoctrinated, these people hope for the advent of communism to the government of their respective countries because in their ignorance and steeped in the false concepts of this fatal doctrine they look forward to the quick healing of the ills with which they are afflicted and the end of the miseries afflicting them.

On the other hand, the leaders of this pernicious ideology, reactionaries through hate or disposition, harassed with the idea of dominating, materialists to the point of even denying the existence of a Supreme Being, verily believe in the administration of the world by a caste of people without soul or heart, or respect for man as a being, created by God, and they seem bent upon imposing a diabolical dictatorship which would make slaves of the free men of today. Let us not fool ourselves. Communism is not a political party in the real sense of the word, for its doctrines are not founded upon principles of social and economic order. Its bases lack this conception of democracy to which each and every one of us is so deeply rooted. Moreover, it does not have this definition which we have of the democratic regime which, freely chosen by the people, must apply itself to serve the people.

On the contrary, communism is a movement of ideas. It is a complete denial of the rights of the collectivity. Its ideology is a new concept of the world and life, embracing atheistic materialism and denying the existence of all spiritualism. Its leaders and partisans consider it as a pseudo-religion.

Since the end of world war II, out of which the democratic countries emerged victorious, without having obtained peace, the communists, our allies in the victory over the nazi hordes, did not lose any time in invading certain countries which they dominate today, and which are administered by governments selected and approved by the Kremlin, the undisputed centre of communism in the world.

Feeling powerful after the help given the democracies in their fight against Hitler's Germany, and attributing the victory to themselves, without delay they started the conquest of certain countries hitherto democratic, employing, for so doing, their skilful propaganda as well as the methods and the arguments best suited to each centre.

At this point, I would like to make a digression and state that in certain countries they have exploited the miseries and the poverty of the people. We should not forget that poverty gives birth to communism and the best action to be taken to prevent it in Canada is to administer in such a way that every Canadian can have the job he is entitled to and in the meantime be kept away from starvation.

I will always remember what the Italian prime minister said at the national press club in Washington during his last trip there, that the "communist element in his country grew from economic, not ideological causes". At the same time Premier Scelba expressed his nation's gratitude for "generous and spontaneous aid" from the United States, without which, he said, neither Italy nor the rest of Europe could have avoided calamity.

We in Canada are also contributing our fair share in the economic recovery of certain nations with the aim, no doubt, of preventing communism from finding its way into those populations. I therefore do not hesitate to repeat that we are thus making a great humanitarian gesture and that we will have contributed in large measure to upholding the democratic system within those nations, a symbol of peace, justice and future prosperity.

However, we must not forget that misery and poverty have both made their sorrowful appearance in our country and that we owe it to ourselves to do everything possible in order to prevent its disastrous spreading. I also reiterate that Canada's contribution to the member nations of the Colombo plan must be maintained and increased, if possible, but on the condition only that we concern ourselves about our own citizens at least in the very same measure as we do with respect to outsiders.

Communism cunningly filters into all classes, and we cannot allow ourselves to live in this country in a culpable lethargy. Let us only remember the sad examples of Poland, Czechoslovakia and many other countries today living in bondage in Moscow, thus pointing to the fact that the leaders of those days did not foresee the menace that was threatening them and unfortunately became a reality.

Referring to communist propaganda again, I wish to say that to the peaceful propaganda were added the forceful means, the massacres and persecutions, such as we have read accounts of in the free press for a few years and which are the satanical means suggested by Marx himself in the conquest of the world into bolshevik slavery. It matters little what dishonest and damnable means communism must use to attain its aim in the domination of the world; what really counts is the intended objective. It is the enforcement afterwards of a universal rule which will enslave the free man, establishing a materialistic and atheistic policy, which ignores the authority of our Creator, God, of men and things, but forces the human world to adore the new masters of the world, the eventual successors to Lenin and Stalin.

The communists entertain the hope—I should say that they are assured—that little by little, and maybe sooner than we could imagine it ourselves, the Marxist way of thinking will penetrate all our minds, and that it will acquire the freedom of the cities. If no dike is built against communism, we shall soon note that the people think in a Marxist way, meaning before everything that they have become totally materialistic and atheistic.

Numerous have been those in the world who sacrificed themselves on the altar of well-understood democracy in the course of the two world wars and who have made the supreme sacrifice so that this democracy founded on real peace, justice, entente cordiale, brotherly love and faith in God may live and endure. If at this moment we cast a look into the painful situation in which those who long for peace and liberty find themselves, we must come to the conclusion that the time is serious and we cannot afford to dismiss lightly the constant menace overhanging our heads, and that we cannot possibly remain indifferent to the continued threats of attack by force of the Chinese communists engaged by their masters from the Kremlin. The idea of domination by soviet Russia is becoming more and more concrete, and the sudden changes which took place recently within the soviet supreme command fairly indicate that the promoters of disunity and war have won a nefarious and dangerous victory for the security of the world.

Their Chinese satellites, obeying blindly Moscow's orders, are thus getting ready to launch on Formosa and its adjacent islands an armed attack of which the main aim is to incite the United States to make reprisals in order to keep that strategic centre, necessary to its defence and still occupied and fortified by Chiang Kai-shek's nationalists.

A retort from our powerful allies and neighbours would undoubtedly throw all the nations of the world into a war, since at that very moment a Russia well armed and in readiness for quite a few long years would already be in the fray behind red China, dragging along with her all those countries which she succeeded in dominating and communizing. The preparations for a conquering thrust are going ahead at an accelerated pace in red China under the surveillance, the approval and the direction of Moscow, and from one moment to another the world will have to face that stark reality.

It will be the launching of a war aiming at the conquest of the peoples, to the benefit of a disastrous and diabolical ideology. It will be the seeding of devastation, sorrow and death. It would no doubt be the beginning of the requiem of our democratic liberties, if the communist forces were ever to emerge victorious.

Mr. Speaker, communism is heading us, little by little, towards a future which every man, ever so little serious, cannot envisage with optimism, short of finding a quick solution which would prevent the destruction of the human world.

I do not pretend to have found that solution, but it seems to me that it is open to any man, particularly to those who occupy responsible public positions, to collect himself and to search for suggestions likely to solve a problem of such importance and seriousness.

In the manner of Christians, which we are, we believe that God and God alone was the Maker of man and things, and that it belongs to Him only to determine the end of things and human beings.

We can entertain different views as to the means we should take to avoid an international struggle which would bring into conflict nations having widely opposed ideologies, and on the strategy to follow in order to ensure our defence.

In the light of facts and circumstances we must, however, not forget that everything must be tried so as to establish peace in the world, token of happiness and prosperity: that peace which was promised by God to men of good will.

The general public, together with certain persons who hold positions of authority, do not seem to see and realize where a war, waged with the H-bomb and all similar devastating modern armaments, would lead us.

If we but remember what happened when an atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima, causing death and destruction, we shall see that an H-bomb can destroy at the same time cities of such importance and population as London, New York and Moscow.

If an H-bomb war were to be waged, it would mean that in no time at all the world would literally be wiped out. If all the inhabitants of London, New York and Moscow were to be exterminated, the world could, in centuries, rebuild, and the whole thing would be looked upon as a minor disaster, however considerable it might be. But we now know, more particularly since the Bikini test, that the H-bombs can gradually spread their destructive powers over a much wider area than that the scientists had at first forecast.

It is now authoritatively recognized that one bomb can be made with a destructive power 25,000 times greater than the atomic bomb which once destroyed Hiroshima.

Such a bomb, the explosion of which takes place in the air or on the sea, has radioactive particles which spread in the air. These radioactive particles gradually reach the surface of the earth in the form of deadly dust or rain. It was with that dust that the Japanese fishermen and the fish were infected, even though they were altogether out of what the American experts considered to be the danger zone.

As yet, nobody knows just how far those radioactive particles can reach. However, the most competent authorities are unanimous in saying that a war where the H-bomb would be used could bring about the end of the human world. It is to be feared that if a great number of those bombs were used as a means of attack or defence, this would mean universal death; it would mean sudden death for a fortunate minority only, for it would mean, for the greater number, a slow death accompanied by tortures which it would be impossible to depict.

We therefore have to face a situation which deserves a care from which we cannot escape. We must make a thorough examination and ask ourselves what means to take to avoid a war, without however forgetting that we must, at all costs, stop the forever growing menace of communism in the world.

In the gospel, our Lord gave us this saying upon which every Christian should meditate and put into practice: "Love one another". He did not only give us this advice, since He gave us the example by sacrificing Himself on the cross, in His great love for the world.

More than ever before, it is high time that the nations resume the practice of that doctrine, that we follow the example which was set by our ancestors, and that the feeling of brotherly love which formerly prompted man again become the prerogative of our life and our future.

Whatever our relations may be, let us remove from them, hypocrisy, untruth, pride, the hunger for domination and love of lucre. With regard to diplomatic relations between nations, may they be founded upon frankness and honesty. Let us remember that wile and deceit last only so long, and that sooner or later those who employ those contemptible means inevitably get caught in their own snare.

The communists forget all about the existence of God and base their policy and desires of conquest on political data only; they cannot be imbued with love for their fellow men and are inevitably unhappy, deceitful, lying, proud and arrogant, acting only through animal instinct. Within their minds, they keep alive that hideous cancer, that ideology condemned by faith and good sense, which communism is, and of which the deadly propaganda has no other aim than to poison the heart and soul of those whom it has indoctrinated, only to kill them afterwards.

We must therefore face the following alternatives: First, the conquest of the world by anti-social, anti-patriotic, anti-Christian communism, which would turn us into beings with an animal instinct, slaves without ideals and future. We should forever say good-bye to private enterprise and to our status of free men and should renounce our glorious past and our most noble, patriotic and religious traditions. Our life would be affected by the horrors of those massacres and persecutions, the establishment of those state prisons which we call concentration camps, the infamous tortures of those people who are thirsty for blood and tears, and finally death, without the satisfaction of having near us one who would at least pray for the salvation of our souls.

Second, the gradual destruction of humankind by means of that H-bomb which by degrees would wipe out men and things, and which would make us suffer the most atrocious pains. Those sufferings would be equalled only by those endured in primeval days, when men were straining to find inconceivable ways of torturing the early Christians.

In order to avoid such a catastrophe, I can only see one solution, and without doubt the best one to protect imperilled humankind. I refer to the return to God and His teachings, through prayer, so that He may inspire the aggressors to discontinue the expansion of their subversive doctrine and prevent them from going into mass assassination of that world which He created, and that He alone has the right to annihilate.

Let us urge the leaders of our democratic nations to call upon the guidance of Providence in all their discussions. Let them call upon the guiding light of the Holy Ghost, who will enlighten them in the important decisions which they must make for the happiness, peace and security of the peoples whom they administer.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): When I was in Vancouver at Easter, Mr. Speaker, I was interviewed by a member of the Vancouver press and he asked me a question concerning the attitude of the members of the House of Commons towards external affairs. He asked me if I thought the majority of the members were interested in Canada's external affairs or foreign relations. I found that question rather difficult to answer. I said that I imagined everyone in the House of Commons, like everyone else I presume who thinks at all, at least occasionally must have a few questions in his mind about our relations with the rest of the world. I was of the opinion, however, that a great many members of the house felt that they were quite uncertain as to what Canada's foreign policy actually is, and therefore they felt incapable of commenting on it, either commending it or opposing it.

There is a strange quality about Canada's foreign policy, Mr. Speaker, almost an impression that it is all done by mirrors. We have to find out what our policy is by a careful examination of the statements that are made to tell us what it is not. It is a very difficult process. In fact, sometimes I am reminded of the old Greek stories about the Delphic oracle when I listen to our minister of external affairs. You will recall that the Greeks used to go to Delphi and they used to put their questions to the Python priestess there, who came out with very cryptic answers. The devout pilgrims used to look at the answers and scratch their heads because there were two or three interpretations as to what the answer meant. I feel that for the last two or three years we have been somewhat in that position with regard to Canada's foreign policy.

Of course, the underlying basis of Canada's foreign policy, as the minister of external affairs has told us repeatedly and quite rightly, is the fact of our geographical proximity to the United States and the necessity of taking into account our relationships with that country before any other consideration. This is quite true, and it is an obvious fact. But for some time I have regretted that, beyond the formal commitments under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, our government has not really come out with a forthright statement of our intentions with regard to the United States in the event of an attack upon North America. It is true that it is implied, in fact it is stated, in the North Atlantic treaty that we shall have to go to their aid in repelling an attack on the other members of NATO, of which the United States is the major ally.

I have this feeling, that if our government were to state quite plainly and bluntly to our American friends and the rest of the world that any attack on the United States, whether through Canada, through Hawaii, California or Florida or anywhere else, would not merely see Canada dragged in by the hair of her head, but would see Canada quite actively and at the very outset placing our entire resources behind repelling those forces, then our position would be stronger. I do not like to think of Canada as being merely the Belgium of another war. We should have a more positive stand. We should state quite plainly that we recognize that the safety of the United States is our safety. If we made that very positive then we would be in a position to speak bluntly and plainly to our United States friends when they pursued policies which to our mind are policies which may very well invite that attack which we must help them repel.

We do not do that. Instead of that, we permit ourselves to be pushed along a number of very dubious policy paths, paths that cause a great deal of concern, I am quite sure, to every member of this house including the minister of external affairs. I want to refer rather briefly to one policy decision that we made this year. I do this, not in any sense of attempting to say I told you so, but merely as an example of the danger of following a policy about which we have some misgivings. I refer to the ratification of the Paris treaties. I do not think anyone will deny that practically every member in this house had very grave misgivings, and the minister himself told us that it was with grave misgivings that he advocated this policy, but he could see no alternative. There were some of us who considered that those misgivings should have dictated our policy.

The news from Europe recently does tend to cast some doubt on the wisdom of the policy that was decided upon at that time. The news, for instance, of the negotiations between the Soviet union and Austria is, I think, very ominous because we see here exactly the pattern of the advances the Soviet union will make to West Germany. We see the very ominous prospect, Mr. Speaker, that the Russians will be prepared to offer the German people the great prize in which they are interested, that is reunification of Germany. While they will do that ostensibly on the basis of having a neutralized and disarmed Germany, and while that reunited Germany may for some time be disarmed and neutralized, we should never forget that, reunited under the auspices of the Soviet union, the eyes of the German people will be turned eastward in gratitude rather than westward, as they might have been had we taken another policy.

We paid another very heavy price in connection with that, and it is one of which we had warning. I heard of it in Europe when I was there last year. I refer to the collapse of the only honest, progressive and decisive government that France has had since the end of the war; that was part of the price we paid for it, turning France back again into the hands of people who had been signally incapable of bringing France back to her previous pre-war status, to say nothing harsher about them. It was quite obvious that Mr. Mendes-France was able to maintain his hold over the national assembly merely because the members of the national assembly knew the nation was behind him. It was behind Mr. Mendes-France because of his decisive handling of the Indo-Chinese problem and his announced determination to deal with some of the worst economic evils, transferring more of the burden of the cost of administration to the shoulders of those who could best bear it, the improvement of social services for the French people and, in short, bringing order into the French economy. And he had, on account of that program and on account of that achievement in the international field, such public support that not even the rather dubious elements in the French national assembly were prepared to throw him out.

But the moment that we in the rest of the western world insisted that Mr. Mendes-France put his head on the block and agree to German rearmament, that popular support was cut away from him, and immediately his assembly support followed, with the result that Mr. Mendes-France fell. And instead of having a potentially strong and determined ally we have now another demoralized country, again struggling in the pit of political corruption which, unfortunately, has been the fate of France since the war.

This I think can be attributed to our determination to follow the predominantly American line of policy. I do not think anyone will deny it was that tremendous pressure of the United States that induced the rest of the western allies to support ratification, and I suggest we have already paid a very heavy price for it.

There is not much that can be done about it now. It is finished; it is water under the bridge. But we have now some other policy decisions to make that may very well affect future events. At this time there is a conference going on in Asia, the Bandung conference; and of course what is happening there is a test of strength between two Asiatic figures, namely Nehru of India and Chou En-lai of communist China. And the fate of Asia may very well depend upon which of those two men prevails at that conference. I, myself, am not very optimistic. I believe that Mr. Nehru, however, might well have been placed in a position of being able to capture all Asiatic minds—and that is what those men are trying to do today—had we in North America devoted even a small fraction of the wealth we have devoted to defences of rather doubtful value to make a massive contribution to the capital development of India and the rest of southeast Asia. Then Mr. Nehru would have been able to offer the Asiatic peoples economic progress plus freedom.

But if he is placed in the position of merely offering them political freedom without economic progress, then Mr. Chou En-lai, who, undoubtedly, has the dictatorial power to develop China as he and his advisers wish to develop it, is going to be in a much stronger position to appeal to those people. Because of course it is a truism that if starving people are offered the choice between a loaf of bread and freedom, they will reach for the loaf of bread. And I am very much afraid that Chou En-lai has been left in a position of having more loaves in his basket than Mr. Nehru.

That is another opportunity we have missed, quite largely I think because we have not placed ourselves in the position of being able to speak bluntly and plainly to the most important figure in the western world, the United States of America, which undoubtedly has demanded that we devote an enormous part of our resources to these defences which, as I say, are of rather doubtful value in the view of military experts who presumably know what they are talking about.

However, I am not a pessimist. I do not think we will have another war. I think Sir Winston Churchill's last dictum was perhaps the most profound, when he said that the world has developed weapons which both sides are afraid to use, and that we may very well find some safety in the shadow of world annihilation.

But we then face another danger. And it is a danger that was rather neatly expressed two days ago by the medical profession of Great Britain, in a statement appearing in the Medical Press, which is the professional journal of the medical profession in that country. I wish to quote from this, as it appeared in the Globe and Mail as a reprint from Reuters in London on April 19. It says:

> Atomic and hydrogen bomb tests should be halted pending international research into the genetic hazards of radiation, the Medical Press, British professional journal, said today.
> "If the struggle to perfect nuclear weapons is in fact a struggle towards peace it will indeed be ironical if it produces without war the most dangerous and fearful effect which war could bring," it added.

> "If in 30 years time we are told that a doubling of background radiation is in fact dangerous that information will only be of academic importance because the doubling will already have taken place and nothing can undo it".

Let us get that through our heads.

> The Medical Press suggested that while some of the test explosions might be scientifically necessary others were "largely a sort of sabre-rattling".
> "It is even a possibility, and not a pretty one, that there are physicists who regard these explosions with much the same sense of juvenile satisfaction as is manifest in small boys letting off homemade fireworks in the street."

I bring this up because of answers received today to questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The questions the hon. member placed on the order paper were as follows:

> 1. Is the Canadian government giving consideration to taking the initiative in urging the United Nations to make a study as to the extent to which atomic and hydrogen bomb tests can be made without grave danger to the human race, as requested by the Federation of American Scientists?
> 2. If so, when will such action be taken?
> 3. If not, what are the reasons for the government's decision?

The answer to the first question is No—a plain and simple No. The government was not asked if it was prepared to initiate these studies. It was asked if it was prepared to take into consideration taking the initiative in urging that these studies be made. And the answer is No, that they will not do even that.

Then the second part of the question is answered by the answer given to No. 1, it states here. And then the answer to the third part—and this is the interesting part—is as follows:

> The Canadian government has been in touch with friendly governments who, through the possession of atomic and thermonuclear weapons, have a direct interest in this matter. Statements made recently by responsible officials of these governments indicate that tests so far have produced a general level of radioactivity which is remote from endangering human life.
> Of course these matters should be kept, and are being kept, under constant study as indicated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the house on April 4. In addition to the investigations referred to by the minister at that time, the scientific conference on the peaceful uses of atomic energy to be held in Geneva in August will consider a number of problems related to the health and safety aspects of atomic energy, including biological and genetic effects and radiation injury and protection.
> The government would be prepared to support any serious studies, which gave promise of increasing our knowledge of the problem. It is the view of the government, however, that it would serve no useful purpose for it to take any special initiative at this time of the kind referred to in the question. The government will continue to consult with friendly governments on this important matter.

This is a very interesting answer, and I am sure that the Federation of American Scientists, the British Society of Nuclear Physicists and the French Academy of Sciences, all of which have expressed concern about this, and have stated categorically that no one knows what the danger point is, will be delighted to know that the government of Canada knows what the danger point is. Because that is what the answer to this question says: They know it. Somebody has told them—

> Statements made recently by responsible officials of these governments indicate that tests so far have produced a general level of radioactivity which is remote from endangering human life.

A very strange thing indeed, when the Federation of American Scientists has not yet heard of this discovery, that we have not yet reached the danger level. They tell us it has not yet been established and they are very anxious that studies should be engaged in immediately to discover that danger point. But our government is not even prepared to ask that this work be undertaken by the United Nations. Why not? The only conclusion one can come to, Mr. Speaker, is that this government is prepared to run the risk of condoning all-time, permanent genetic damage to the human race rather than offend Mr. Dulles.

There was a reference in the answer to this question to the answer given on April 4 by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). It was one of his usual extremely voluminous answers. It goes on for page after page. Here is the important part of it, as reported at page 2653 of Hansard:

> Since there remain a number of unanswered questions in this field, there is a need for continuing research and investigation into the genetic problem. Increasingly large numbers of people are being exposed to increasing amounts of radiation because of the wider use of radioactive materials in industry, research and medicine. In addition, there has been a slight, though appreciable increase in radiation all over the world as a result of the weapon tests.
> However, the best scientific evidence available indicates that it is most unlikely that any significant genetic effect would result from the increased radioactivity that has occurred.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare immediately send a telegram to the Federation of American Scientists, the French Academy of Sciences, and to the British Society of Nuclear Physicists, reassuring them that he has discovered what the danger point is that none of them knows anything about.

For some time, Mr. Speaker, I have been corresponding with a young French scientist, an assistant to Prince Louis de Broglie, who brought this matter to the attention of the world some months ago, and he sent me a book that he had written on the problem, which contains a foreword by a man who, of course, did not know as much about physics as the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He died a few days ago. His name was Einstein, and he had this to say:

> But more important still is your note on the menace to life of the cumulative action of the experimental atomic explosions. If you think I can do anything to support publicly your campaign, I am only too ready to proffer my services.
> Albert Einstein,
> December 7, 1954,
> Princeton.

It is surely a serious state of affairs, Mr. Speaker, that our government has reached such a point that it does not even dare to ask the Americans to have a study conducted of the dangers of their program; when every responsible scientific organization in the world is telling us it is essential that that should be done.

Mr. Martin: What my hon. friend should point out is that the Canadian government itself, through the appropriate departments, is doing the very thing that he says we are not doing.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I would suggest with all due deference, Mr. Speaker, that it might be that even the officials of the minister's department would perhaps be aided in their research if they were to co-operate with the leading scientific organizations of the world which are asking that a responsible world organizational study should be instituted. I do suggest that even the most brilliant physicists in our national research council in Canada are not likely to have the opportunities available here in Canada to study the effect all over the world of the explosions that have taken place in the United States and in the Soviet union. Is he telling us that here in an area in which there have been no thermonuclear explosions our scientists can tell us more accurately the dangers than can the Federation of American Scientists, the French scientists and the British scientists? If our own government scientists are discovering some facts about the dangers of these atomic explosions, then it would seem to me the logical thing for our government to do would be to place the results of their inquiries and their investigations before an appropriate commission of the United Nations, no matter how unpopular such a course might be with the American administration, or with those sections of it who produce those statements for which there is no scientific backing whatever, none whatever, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare is well aware. As one examines his statement and the statement of his colleague of the Department of National Defence, if it were not the most serious problem in the world, it would be the most ludicrous situation imaginable. We are told almost in the same breath that there is no danger, and that they do not know what the danger point is. That is the situation we are in today.

I come back to the point I made at first, namely, that unless we come out and face the world with a clear-cut statement of the serious responsibilities that we are anxious and willing to share with regard to the defence of North America and the defence of the United States, we are not going to be in a position to speak bluntly and plainly to those sections of the American administration who are now toying with these great dangers. Surely, we should seek to appeal to those very large numbers of Americans who also view their government's activities in this regard with a great deal of misgiving. Surely, we should be appealing to the American people and their sense of decency and generosity—the American people that we all know are our kind of people. Surely, we should be appealing over the heads of those irresponsible officials who are now doing their best to suppress all knowledge of this matter.

It is surely an ominous and significant thing, Mr. Speaker, when a leading body of American scientists felt it necessary to make a public statement to the world which indicated that they regarded with great fear and misgivings the activities of their own government. If our government is unprepared to take such a stand, I suppose they can console themselves with the thought that if the worst fears of those who are far more competent than I or anyone in this house are realized, there will be no one left to revile them.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like at the outset of my taking part in this debate on external affairs to pay a high tribute to Canada's role in world affairs. I feel that as a nation we have done a lot to foster the cause of world peace. I feel that our efforts under the Colombo plan, and the meeting of our obligations in full under the various agencies of the United Nations, have done much to enhance the prestige of Canada in all parts of the world.

I cannot help but remember the days before I was elected to this House of Commons. Each time that I read of the remarks our minister of external affairs made in various parts of the world I was glad and proud to be a Canadian with a spokesman such as that. However, it was not long before I noticed that after every progressive speech, after every speech that to me sounded like a sensible contribution to the cause of world peace, invariably when he got back to Ottawa and had a meeting either of the executive of the national Liberal advisory council or of the federal cabinet, there would ensue a speech which was so reactionary that it almost undid all the good done by the minister's original speech.

This also calls to mind the last annual meeting of the Dewdney C.C.F. association in British Columbia. As a guest dinner speaker we had a Dr. David of India. If my memory serves me right, he was the head of some theological institution in India connected with the United Church of Canada. Incidentally, Dr. David was unable to eat the dinner which was set before him because as he explained, the average Indian is unable without serious after-effects to eat such sumptuous meals as Canadians are able to prepare.

Dr. David outlined the effects of the Colombo plan. As I remember, he said that the income of the average citizen of India is $50 per year. He warned us of communist advances in India and said that if the Colombo plan, which at that time was only in its beginning, was effected as it was then conceived, it would raise the standard of living of the average citizen of India by 10 per cent. He thought that it might, and I would emphasize the "might", be able to save India from communism.

While Dr. David was speaking I had a feeling of pride in the way Canada was bearing its share under the Colombo plan. But throughout the length of his speech, whenever I thought of what we might be able to do, there arose in me a feeling of shame that we were not doing as much as we were able to do. I would remind the house that Canada's contribution under the Colombo plan is less than $2 per annum per capita as against more than $100 per capita being spent on national defence.

I should like to move on to my second subject, and that is the talk given this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott). I agree with most of what the hon. member had to say, but I take serious issue with one recommendation he had to make and which seemed to me to be an advocacy of a winter army for Canada. A year ago I endorsed what the hon. member said this afternoon, that Canada's defences should be manned by Canadians and by Canadians only. I would say that this policy of Canada for Canadians is O.K. There is nothing wrong with it as long as Canada's foreign policy is determined by Canadians. If it is to be determined in Washington, then I can see nothing wrong with Washington bearing the onus of effecting their own foreign policy. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South when he advocates that Canadians defend Canadian soil with the proviso that Canadian foreign policy be determined in Ottawa by Canadians and not by any visitors we may have in Ottawa.

I was a little leery when I heard of this idea of a winter army, lest it might be a Liberal solution to seasonal unemployment in Canada. I could not help remembering what the Conservatives did to the unemployed during the hungry thirties when they herded them into vacant army camps and looked after them there. Perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver South is being a little more progressive than were the Conservatives, but he has suggested that they be herded into vacant army camps and then be given a little army exercise while there. If this is meant to be a measure of relief for seasonal unemployment, then I will oppose it most heartily.

Another member from British Columbia with whom I must take issue is the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I know that for a number of years in this house he has been urging the necessity of military preparedness as far as the west coast of Canada is concerned. I know also that he is a wholehearted supporter of a Pacific military pact. He thinks that our defences for the west coast would be much more adequately served if we did agree to a Pacific defence arrangement. Now, I think that he is completely out of touch with the sentiments of the people of British Columbia when he is advocating that policy. I think that the people of British Columbia are prepared to take their chances on world peace. Having in mind the horrible means of destruction now available, we realize that it does not much matter whether on Vancouver island we have three-inch guns or six-inch guns; we in the lower mainland will be obliterated anyway. We are not overly concerned with a Pacific military defence arrangement similar to the arrangement arrived at under NATO.

Mr. Speaker, before I continue, I should like to say that I endorse the C.C.F. policy on external affairs. My leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), has very ably put forth the C.C.F. position, its endorsement of the aims and objects of the United Nations and endorsement of the North Atlantic treaty alliance and a plea for the neutralization of the island of Formosa. I believe that on other occasions he has asked our government to recognize the existing government at Peking and for the admission of red China into the United Nations. However, I feel that the world situation is much too serious for us to divide ourselves along strictly partisan lines. I feel that when the question of the survival of the human race is involved we ought, for the time of the debate at least, to forget that we are Liberals or Conservatives or members of the C.C.F. or Social Credit parties. I asked for a place on your list, Mr. Speaker, because I would like not only to endorse the C.C.F. position but also to add something to that and possibly what some of you may interpret as some qualifications to the attitude of the C.C.F. I would like to place on record why I first became a member of the C.C.F. What appealed most to me about the platform of the C.C.F. was the stand taken by our first leader, the late J. S. Woodsworth, and by one of his active supporters in this house, the late Miss Agnes Macphail. They were classed as pacifists and at that time I saw a good deal of merit in their arguments. I also recall very vividly to this house that the man who defeated the great power of the British Empire was Mahatma Gandhi, a humble man who believed in pacifism all the way down the line.

I think the Canadian people have about reached the stage where, instead of adding a million dollars for military preparedness, they feel that the Canadian government should say to a man like Dr. Schweitzer in Africa, "You are doing something for humanity; we will give you a million dollars to help you in your work", rather than change three-inch guns to six-inch guns. I think that this government would receive hearty endorsation from the Canadian people in helping this missionary, doctor and great musician. I think our history books in Canada might well be rewritten to place some emphasis on such men as he is and the work he is doing. We might place a little less emphasis on some people who are now in the light of recent inventions becoming a little old, such men as the great Lord Nelson and others like him.

Before I continue, I must at this time express my appreciation to the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne). He spoke to us, for the benefit of most of us, in the English language. I only regret that the arrangements for opposition members and the appreciation of the government toward the role of opposition members are not enough to enable members of the opposition to enjoy a little leisure time in which they might learn the other great language of this house.

I hope I shall be privileged to remain in this house long enough so that some day I may be able to please the hon. member for Quebec West and take my part in the debate on external affairs in his native language. I sincerely wish to compliment him on his speech, and also on almost everything he said. It was a real revelation for those of us from British Columbia—and it is not Colombie Canadienne; it is Colombie Britannique—we sincerely appreciated what we know was a most sincere effort on the part of the hon. member for Quebec West.

The hon. member raised some matters to which I must refer. As I said, I endorse most of what he said, but I wish to refer to his bringing the question of religion into this debate. Mr. Speaker, surely there are some Canadians who believe the Bible literally when it says "On this rock I will build my Church"; there are others of us in this house who believe the Bible just as literally when it says, "Thou shalt not kill". We think that we have the same right to believe one portion of the Good Book as other people have to believe other portions of the Good Book.

An hon. Member: That is misrepresentation.

Mr. Regier: There was also another statement. I notice an hon. member saying that that is misrepresentation. I say that no one is as guilty of misrepresentation on the political scene in Canada as the Liberal members and the Liberal party in the province of Quebec have been.

An hon. Member: Nonsense!

Mr. Regier: There were continued insinuations of hatred towards the communists. The Good Book tells me "Thou shalt love the sinner and hate the sin", and I say "Thou shalt love communists and hate communism". That is just as logical. A communist is a human being entitled to the love of his fellow men, but that does not bar us from hating communism. Let us be very careful to make a distinction lest we lose faith in the cause of the western world.

I have often heard it said—and I think it should be said in this debate—that more crimes have been committed in the names of Christianity and democracy than in any other name in human history, and I would like to warn the members who would invoke religion not to tie in free enterprise with religion. Economic arrangements have nothing to do with the order of society which the good Lord ever advocated.

An hon. Member: That is what you think.

Mr. Regier: If you read the history of His life you will never see any advocacy of free enterprise. I am not going to argue one way or the other; I will be fair to that extent. But when you attempt to invoke the Almighty God on behalf of free enterprise you are taking in an awful lot of territory, and I would like this especially to be a warning for the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson).

Mr. Patterson: Thank you.

Mr. Regier: At election time such phrases as "Will you have the Bible or the bottle?" are an insult to the intelligence of the Canadian people.

Mr. Patterson: Who used them?

Mr. Regier: I will go further and say that I am a great believer in the supernatural, if you like. But my God does not need any sword to defend Him. He needs no hydrogen bomb. If He is a god worthy of worship, He does not need human effort at all and His rule will prevail.

Lest I be classified as an unqualified pacifist may I say at this time, as I said a year ago, that I am a firm supporter of the maintenance of law and order throughout the world. I was a believer in the league of nations. I still regret the great betrayal of the league of nations. Just for the record, let me say that it was the democracies which sabotaged the league of nations as an instrument for world peace when they failed to interfere in order to prevent aggression in the Far East and again in Abyssinia. When that happened, the common people throughout the world lost confidence in that world-wide organization.

After the last war ended, the peoples of the world decided to make another effort. I hope they will not have to make a third effort. There may be no one here to make that third effort. I feel that, in a similar way, the United Nations has been betrayed and that some of the democracies in the world today would not be overly unhappy to see the sabotage of the United Nations. At the outset let me say that I think the Soviet bloc was the first bloc—if there were blocs at that time—to betray the intent of the United Nations when they overran what are now called their satellite nations. I sometimes wonder, though, how much we helped the situation by formulating such an organization as NATO. However, if it is the only alternative to the Soviet bloc, I am in hearty support of NATO. I have voted for it in C.C.F. conventions. Yet, I should like to sound this warning. Unless we implement article 2, which I consider worthy of support on its own merits, I believe we shall run into difficulty. Article 2 is the only insurance premium we can pay for the military aspects of NATO. Unless we are willing to pay that insurance premium, I feel that NATO will end up in disaster.

I have previously indicated my opposition to a similar alliance in the Far East in the way of a Pacific pact. I much prefer the policies pursued by the prime minister of India, namely a ruthless extermination, if you like, of communism—it will be noted that I did not say communists—within his own territory and a realistic approach to this problem of coexistence when it comes to doing business with other nations.

Many people are surprised and are expressing surprise at the lack of enthusiasm shown by Canadian youth with regard to this matter of enlistment in the army, navy or air force. Back home in my constituency there is a man who made a survey on a Saturday of all the young people whom he met. In one survey the question asked was: Would you like to become enlisted in the Canadian armed forces? The almost unanimous reply was that the young men did not know why they ought to enlist in the Canadian armed forces. Then he made another survey and the question asked was: Would you enlist in an armed force, under the auspices of the United Nations, designed to prevent aggression throughout the world? He claims that he had almost unanimous endorsation by all the young men he met. I think the lack of enthusiasm on the part of our young men can be explained partly by the lack of a definite Canadian foreign policy.

How do we return to the United Nations, Mr. Speaker? And return I think we must. First of all, I believe we must remember the original intent of the United Nations. The United Nations was formed to prevent aggression and not to interfere in the internal affairs of any of the member nations. If we vary from that purpose, or if we even for one moment ignore the fact that the purpose of the United Nations was to prevent aggression, then we are obliged to remember such people on our side as Marshal Tito, Syngman Rhee and Generalissimo Franco, and we are obliged to give serious thought to what right these people have to being on our side as some of us fondly like to think they are.

I think we could get back to the United Nations and its original intent if we paid a little bit more attention—and I hope our newspapers will do so—to the current Asian-African conference meeting in Indonesia. I feel that a great deal of world history is being determined there. I should like to endorse what was said by one hon. member who spoke previously, namely that only now are we regretting that we in the western world did not ensure Prime Minister Nehru's being able to carry the day at this Asian-African conference. We have no one to blame but ourselves.

I notice with a good deal of worry what happened with regard to Austria. With the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) I share the worry of the whole western world as to what effect it would have on our situation if Moscow were to agree with the government of West Germany in a manner similar to that in which they agreed with the government of Austria. The government of Austria has said that in return they will remain forever neutral in the matter of military involvements. The government of Sweden has always adopted the same policy. In taking part in this debate I notice that the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) expressed a good deal of concern about what was going to happen and about the inherent dangers in the rearming of West Germany. I feel that we are now just a little bit late in beginning to worry. If we are to give complete sovereignty to the people of West Germany, who are we thereafter to tell them that they may not relieve the sufferings of their brothers in the eastern zone of Germany? I should like to underline what the Leader of the Opposition said when he said that the paramount interest of the people of West Germany is the reunification of Germany.

I was one of those lucky enough to hear the former prime minister of Great Britain, Right Hon. Clement Attlee, speaking in Vancouver on Saturday last. He said that the question of what our foreign policy is depends to the greatest extent on where you are.

Now, I ask this house, where are we in Canada? I follow that with another question and I think it is a logical one. It is this. Can Canada be defended? I doubt that very much; I doubt whether Canada can be defended. About a week before Easter the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) was unable or unwilling to assure the Canadian people that we have even as much as one atom bomb in Canada. He was unwilling to give his citizens that assurance.

In connection with the matter of research, to which the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) so ably referred this afternoon, if the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) had been smart I think he would have assured the Canadian people that he would appoint the top scientists of the dominion to make sure that these thermonuclear weapons will not have—

Mr. Martin: Will the hon. member permit an observation? If he looks at the statement I made in this house on April 4, he will find I did that very thing.

Mr. Regier: I am glad to know the minister has announced that a committee of the top scientists of Canada has been appointed to investigate the possible effect on the Canadian people. This was new to me, and I thank the minister for that interjection. I hope I have not misinterpreted what he said.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the people of India, southeast Asia, Great Britain, western Europe and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, considering where they are in the world, must have world peace. Each of these nations, if a major war should break out—let us not play with the idea of minor wars—both right and wrong, will go down to defeat in the holocaust that will ensue.

I hope that nothing I say is going to label me as an opponent of the veterans of Canada. If there are people in Canada who think other than as I do, and if they are willing to make the supreme sacrifice and I am one of the fortunate ones to survive a war, then my first responsibility is to see that these people are as adequately cared for as the rich resources of our nation will make possible.

Also, I shall have no truck with the so-called peace front in Canada. I do not believe in any so-called righteous war against the so-called capitalist oppressors. I do not believe any war or any revolution has ever resolved anything in human history. I come back again to the fact that, if absolute values exist in the world, then absolute values will continue to exist, wars notwithstanding. There are vested interests on both sides. There is the vested interest of imperialist communism and there is the vested interest of international capitalism. I say, a plague on both your houses. We want peace and prosperity in the world for all the people of the world.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I was not going to say anything in this debate, but I should like to correct something that I do not think is altogether fair in the statement made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. First, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) on the speech that he made. I have not always agreed with him, but I do not believe he ever spoke more sincerely than he did today. He came right to the point expressed so ably by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that love is stronger than hate and faith is stronger than doubt.

I agreed with the hon. member who has just taken his seat when he said he was proud of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) when he made his statements away from home. He was proud to be a Canadian and so was I. But I think he just slipped a little bit when he said that these statements were spoiled when the minister came home and met the Liberal association. I do not believe the minister ever met the Liberal association before he made his statement. The implication is that the minister is one thing at home and another thing away. As I know the minister, he has always given of his best, whether he was on third base on the baseball diamond, in his home, in this house or in Europe. I stand behind the minister 100 per cent in all his statements. He has stood for peace, and peace with honour.

I was talking to an official who served with the army in Korea. He told me two things that I think this house should know. First, he said that communism was failing in China. He proved this by saying the communists were trying to break up the home life in China. Home life has been sacred to the people of China for hundreds and thousands of years, and they do not like it. He proved his statement by saying that refugees are arriving by thousands in Hong Kong. I do not remember the exact number of people who have come into Hong Kong, but I believe the population has increased by over 2 million. These people would not serve under communist rule. The streets are lined with people sleeping side by side on little mats. He said there is a feeling over there that there is going to be a revolution before too long; that may or may not be true.

Another thing this captain told me, and I was thinking about it when the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) was speaking about Korea, was that Korea is hopeful. He said that there was a church a day built and organized in Korea every day for the last three years. I think that is outstanding, and it proves the statement made by the hon. member for Quebec West, that these people appreciate the kindness of the members of the church and that love will win out.

Another reason why I am speaking tonight is the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott). I cannot quote his exact words because my memory would not allow that, but he said the young men of the country should be organized for military training for four or five months of the year, say from November 1 to April 1. He has shown wisdom in that statement, even though he comes from the west. I feel this would be splendid training for the young men who may be out of work, and would it not be a splendid remedy for those who are out of work for a few months each year? Again I congratulate the minister upon sticking to his guns in the fight for peace with honour.

Mr. Speaker: When the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in rising to close this debate I would be ungrateful indeed if in the first place I did not express my appreciation of the encouragement and support I have just received from the hon. member who has just taken his seat, and tell him in reply that I shall be very glad to play third base for him any place, any time.

Mr. Speaker, this debate began on March 24 and, with appropriate intermissions, is finishing on April 21. During the days that have been allotted to the discussion of this subject—and there are few subjects which will come before us which will be more important—the discussion has ranged far and wide, from the atomic pollution of the atmosphere, on which my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) speaks with such enviable assurance, to the Old Testament, its history and its mores, about which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) talked to us some days ago.

To a very large extent, however, the discussion has been focused on the situation in the Far East, though other subjects have been brought up, and a great many questions have been asked. Tonight I hope to deal with some of those questions. Also I feel I must challenge one or two observations made during the course of the debate which I do not think were correct. It may be that I shall not be able to deal adequately with all the matters raised, in which case I ask the pardon of those whom I have overlooked.

When the committee on external affairs has the estimates before it—and that is the purpose of our present resolution—of course there will be opportunity before that committee to question the minister on any matter raised in this debate, or any other matter concerning the policy or the administration of the Department of External Affairs. As is customary, I shall be very glad to make myself available to that committee for as long as it desires to question me.

In this debate more than one speaker has referred to the valuable part being played in these tense and difficult times by the association to which we belong, and of which we are very proud, our commonwealth of nations. I believe we are all conscious, probably now as much as ever before in our history, of the value of that association—especially in the service it is now performing not only for the nations of the commonwealth, but for the world at large in providing a bridge, one of the few effective bridges, between the free East and the free West.

In his contribution to the debate the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) devoted most of his speech to our commonwealth of nations. He advocated—and in certain sections of the house this has been advocated for years—what he called the strengthening of our commonwealth. Among other things he asked what was the basic difference between the commonwealth and, let us say, the United Nations. He asked what was the difference between our relationship with members of the commonwealth and with, let us say, a country like Brazil.

Well, if he had attended meetings of the United Nations assembly or other United Nations agencies—and I hope he will have that opportunity—and if he had attended commonwealth discussions, I think he would sense at once the difference between the two associations. And that is not of course to depreciate the value of the association of the United Nations.

The basic difference in the commonwealth relationship is that it has been formed, has grown up and has been built on the habit and the tradition of co-operation. We have developed within the commonwealth a feeling of close unity. There is a genuine understanding among its members to work together in peace and in war, and a strong desire to co-operate and to work out agreed policies and agreed solutions to problems, even when it is not always possible to do so. And then of course we have the great advantage of a common head in the commonwealth, both for the monarchical and the republican members, and also the bond of common parliamentary institutions and parliamentary traditions.

The hon. member for Oxford feels that we should strengthen these bonds, and that we should develop what he has called a central secretariat. He says that we should also try to work out an intra-commonwealth defence force. Well I would suggest to the hon. member—and this is a matter which has been discussed often both in and out of the house—that if the members of the commonwealth tried to build up some strong and centralized machinery, if they tried to build up a centralized intra-commonwealth defence force, far from strengthening this association it might, indeed, weaken it to the point where it would disappear, at least in the sense in which it exists today.

I think the commonwealth in its present form and organization is doing a most valuable and important service. One of the most useful things about the commonwealth is that it does include within its membership a variety of peoples, at times antagonistic peoples; and if we tried to bring those peoples together in any formal and organized way, for defence or by exclusive economic co-operation, far from strengthening the association we might indeed weaken it.

The hon. member to whom I have referred, while he did not underestimate the difficulties, rather expressed the hope that by this kind of development—and I think I am quoting him correctly—the commonwealth might become or lead to a third power bloc which would be powerful enough to act as a counterbalance to the United States and Russia.

With all respect, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this third force concept, whether it is a commonwealth concept or any other group of states, is a dangerous one, because it would mean that, in a sense, we in the commonwealth were separating ourselves from the United States and coming between the United States and the NATO powers on the one hand and Soviet imperialist communist powers on the other.

I think it is much better to stick to the concept of two blocs, two forces in the world —if there have to be two—the forces of peace and the forces that we think threaten the peace. It is better to line ourselves up with the former and welcome into its ranks any free states wishing to join it. One specific respect in which the commonwealth has been playing a useful part in recent years—and this is a matter which has been referred to by a good many speakers—is in the provision of technical and capital assistance to underdeveloped countries, especially those in southeast Asia and the Indian subcontinent under what we call the Colombo plan. The Colombo plan, of course, is more than a commonwealth arrangement; but it was commonwealth in inspiration and organization. It has proved its value and I hope it will continue to do so.

In this debate, some very strong criticism has been levelled at the government by my hon. friends opposite and by some members of the official opposition, that we have not played an honourable part in this Colombo plan; that what we have done was—I think the words were—a mere pittance, or, as it was referred to by one speaker, an insult to the needs of the problem. Well, of course, Mr. Speaker, as is nearly always the case in any human endeavour, we could have done more. But to keep this project in perspective I need only point out that in the four years of the plan, capital and technical assistance from outside the countries which are members of the plan has been contributed to the amount of $1,300,000,000; last year $340 million, of which Canada will have contributed $128,400,000. That is not large in terms of expenditure on other things. I would be the first to admit that; but I would point out to those who criticize us so bitterly—perhaps "bitterly" is not a fair word, but criticize us so strongly—and I am not objecting to that—and who relate our expenditures in this field to those which we have to make on defence, that the primacy of expenditures on defence is admitted by those very countries which we are helping and who need our help; it is admitted to a point where some of these countries which are receiving capital assistance—and I say this in no way of criticism at all—are now devoting more than half of their already inadequate budget to defence. And some of those countries that are devoting such a high percentage of their budget to defence are the first to proclaim that they have no feeling of menace from attack by outside communist states. I mention this merely to try to show that this is not as simple a problem as is sometimes portrayed. Also, while not unduly satisfied or smug, or certainly not boasting about what we have done, I am not going to be apologetic about it.

I would prefer in this regard to quote the verdict of an outside source, the Economist, a magazine which is often quoted in this house and which, writing about the Colombo plan progress report on December 25, 1954, had this to say:

> On the contributing side of the plan, the part played by Australia and Canada is particularly striking.

The Economist went on to say:

> In spite of the undoubted achievements of the plan in the past three years, it will be necessary not only to maintain the momentum of economic development in the area but to increase it.

I agree with that. I continue:

> But it is not simply a question of finance. Expert technical advice and training is of equal importance, and in this direction the technical co-operation scheme, together with other parallel projects of technical assistance, has undoubtedly played a major part. It is equally important to get more effective planning as well as better management and administration. None of these tasks can be solved quickly. The Colombo plan's future tasks are measured not in years but in decades.

And so, Mr. Speaker, while none of us needs to be satisfied with what we have done, I think we can look forward to a continuation of this plan with resources from this and other countries and with an even greater field for usefulness than it has had in the past.

A planning conference has been set for Singapore next September, when the whole future of the plan is to be examined, particularly in its relationship to United States support, which has been, if I may say so, somewhat more forthcoming in recent months than previously.

The discussion of the Colombo plan brings me to the main subject which has occupied most of our attention in this debate and which I dealt with when I introduced the resolution some time ago, namely international developments in the Far East. Discussion of that subject has, to a very large extent in this debate, revolved around our Canadian relationship with the United States, to a point where it has been difficult at times to disentangle the two things. I think it is a normal and healthy sign that we should be so preoccupied in this house in a debate on external affairs with the most important aspect of our foreign relations at the present time, namely our relationship with the United States of America. I think of that relationship, important as it is bilaterally to us, in terms of collective action, in terms of collective defence, not merely as something between Canada and the United States, but as something between Canada, the United States and its friends in NATO and in the United Nations. I also try to distinguish, in this defence relationship with the United States, the problems which may come from what we have begun to call peripheral conflicts from those which will be posed by a major all-out war of extermination.

Hon. members will recall that when I spoke some time ago in this debate I tried to make this distinction clear. So far as these peripheral wars, those smaller wars, if you wish to call them that, are concerned, Canada, both through its relationship to the United States and through its relationship to the United Nations or to NATO, might be involved in them. But Canada can hardly remain aloof from the latter. We are also concerned with those smaller conflicts because of the danger that they may spread into a larger conflict. There is no better example of that danger than the situation in and around Formosa and the coastal islands. It is possible, of course, that even if trouble were at the beginning limited to that area, it might spread to this continent. If it did spread to this continent it would be very difficult for us to remain aloof from its effect. The facts of geography, apart from other things, would indicate that. Well, how can it spread? It might spread not by any all-out massive attack from some Chinese communist government on the North American continent, because that would not be possible under present conditions. It might spread by a reaction on the part of the Chinese government's allies, a reaction on the part of the Soviet union, which would result in a massive all-out attack on this continent, the Soviet union being the only power today on the other side which is capable of that kind of reaction.

Now, if that reaction took place as a result of a local conflict in China, that would be an aggression; it would be a violation of the United Nations charter and we would be asked to undertake the commitments which we have accepted as members of the United Nations or the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

When speaking on this aspect of the question some days ago, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that if war broke out over Formosa or over the coastal islands that kind of chain reaction would be absolutely inevitable. I think I ought to quote him at this point because this seems to me to be of importance. Referring to the Secretary of State for External Affairs he said, as reported on page 2350 of Hansard of March 24:

> He has but to read the words of Molotov in which he stated that the situation in Asia was of equal concern to the U.S.S.R. In that case it is but fantasy to say that what might happen over there would not become an all-embracing conflict.

I did not go as far as that and indeed I do not think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) went quite as far as that in his statement, but I do admit that that kind of conflict might spread even though it was not inevitable that it would. I feel, and I am sure that hon. members on all sides of the house must feel, that if it did spread, if that did happen and there was a massive aggressive air attack on this continent, a struggle in which the very existence of the people of the United States and of Canada would be at stake, all our continental, all our NATO defence arrangements and our whole system of collective security which we have built up over recent years would come into play. In that kind of situation, and I limit it to that kind of situation, how could we be neutral?

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) himself admitted this in his statement. I should like to quote from what he said, as reported on page 2877 of Hansard of April 6:

> Now, if the minister were merely saying that if a world-wide conflagration breaks out, particularly bearing in mind the power blocs that exist in the world today, because of our geographical position, to put it in the vernacular, we would have had it, one could hardly argue with him.

His leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), had this to say, as reported on page 2356 of Hansard:

> Perhaps the minister is right. Perhaps if they—
> Referring to the United States of America.
> —were engaged in a major war it would involve us automatically, because of our geographical position with them.

I think that in the circumstances which I have mentioned that is self-evident, but I do not from that draw any such deduction as has been drawn by certain members of this house, most noticeably this afternoon, the most irresponsible being that by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer); I do not draw any deduction from that statement of automatic assurance of support or willingness to intervene on behalf of or with the United States in any war, major or minor, on the continent of China or any place else where that kind of intervention would take place. Whether support in those circumstances could be counted on from Canada would depend entirely on whether our commitments under NATO were involved, whether there was aggression under the United Nations charter.

I want to be quite clear about that. Anything that I said in Toronto and anything that I have said here—I hoped I had made this quite clear the other day but apparently it was not clear enough for the hon. member for Three Rivers—does not mean nor could it fairly be interpreted as meaning that whenever the United States is at war we are bound to participate. It does not mean that we have any obligation to participate in any war except a war against aggression within the principles of the United Nations charter.

Now when I say that, and I am merely repeating what I said in the house the other day, the hon. member for Prince Albert complains that this—I use his own expression—is watering down our support for United States policy which I gave in my Toronto speech. I do not think it is watering down anything at all. What I tried to do the other day, and what I am trying again to do tonight, is to squeeze some water out of the interpretation given to that Toronto speech by careless commentators. Nevertheless, whatever I may have done in the way of squeezing water out, the speech still seems to remain too strong for my friends of the C.C.F. party.

The position that they take, if I interpret that position correctly, is that while this statement in the circumstances which I have mentioned may be true, I should not have said it because it might be misconstrued in the United States and because of that misconstruction they will feel, as someone put it, that they now have Canada in the bag, that our influence will have been weakened or will even possibly have vanished in Washington.

Who would be fooling whom by remaining silent about Canada's position in the conditions which I have outlined? We certainly would not be fooling the United States government by our silence, because they know of our relationship to them in NATO and they know of the relationship which we have built up with them under NATO in respect of continental defence. I hope that silence in this matter would not be fooling any potential enemy, because if it did that it would be bad.

However, it might possibly fool our own people. Silence might be misinterpreted in this country with unhappy results for which the government would rightly be criticized. I prefer the verdict in this matter of the Daily Telegraph in London to that of my hon. friends opposite. The Daily Telegraph, referring to Canada and the United States, had this to say in an editorial:

> The conclusion to be drawn from the interdependence of the two nations in a major war is not, as some of Mr. Pearson's critics have suggested, that the United States can take Canadian support in a circumstance for granted, and therefore may disregard Canadian views. On the contrary, it gives the Canadian government both the right and the duty to warn and to dissuade.

That remains our right and I hope that we will exercise it on appropriate occasions in Washington. It is also our duty and I hope that we will discharge it on appropriate occasions. It seems to me that the moral of this position is that if all these dangers surround us, little wars with their obligations, or big wars with all their catastrophes, if we are surrounded by these dangers, then the moral is to do everything we possibly can to stop any war before it starts.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is not in his seat tonight, but I know he has good reason for not being here. I would prefer to refer to his speech in his presence, but I should like to quote what he said, as reported on page 2356 of Hansard:

> But I wish to suggest this, that the Canadian people want our government to state forthrightly and without equivocation that we will do everything we possibly can do to ensure that Canada's influence and Canada's policy, especially in its relations with the United States, will be directed toward the avoidance of conflict, political and economic.

We have already given that assurance, but if it will make my hon. friends feel any better I am quite happy to repeat unequivocally that assurance tonight in this house. If we fail, and we might fail, then I suggest that our policy be this: when possible, to limit conflicts, to prevent them spreading, and then to end them. There is no other policy in the mind of any member of this government.

This debate, Mr. Speaker, has done something else which has caused a good many of us—I know that it has caused me—some anxiety. In certain sections of the house—and I am referring now to the members of the C.C.F. party—it has underlined a very deep uneasiness which they in particular feel about United States policy. That anxiety—and "anxiety" is certainly not too strong a word in view of some of the expressions that have been used in this debate—was expressed both by the leader of the C.C.F. party and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). In my view these hon. members, for whom, as they know, I have great respect, and others in their group who spoke, presented an unfair and unbalanced picture of the situation, especially in respect of the United States' attitudes and policy towards Asia. I am now talking about the situation in the Far East. I was especially disappointed, and indeed distressed, by the analysis which was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, not so much of the policy, but of the purpose of the policy of the secretary of state of the United States. On page 2878 of Hansard he said this:

> I think it is Mr. Dulles' primary purpose to keep war away from the United States.

A few words later, he says:

> If he can keep war away from the United States—if he can keep it in the Pescadores, in Quemoy, in Matsu or in northern Canada—his aim is met. His aim is to keep war away from continental United States.

We may have differences of opinion with Mr. Dulles on matters of policy. I have had them myself, and no doubt will continue to have them. We may have one view or the other about the wisdom of his policy, but I think that it is most unfair to suggest that the secretary of state of the United States, who is serving in the government of President Eisenhower, has any other purpose than that which we have in this house, to keep war away and not merely away from the continental United States. I would not like that kind of statement to go on the record of this house without the kind of challenge that I am giving it now.

The hon. member also said—and this sentiment was echoed by other members of his group—that our foreign policy should be made in Ottawa only and not in Washington. Well, Mr. Speaker, as long as Canada is a sovereign state, the decisions in foreign policy and any other policies have to be made in this parliament of Canada. That is a very different thing from saying that our policy can only be made in Ottawa and should not be made or even influenced anywhere else. Foreign policy in this world of interdependence cannot be made in any one country or any one capital no matter how powerful that country or capital may be. We are working together today in a peace coalition, and the very essence of that coalition is that every member of it acts only after discussion and consultation with others. In that sense each member must influence the other members' policy, and I hope it will remain that way, because that is the way it should be. That gives our best chance for peace, by collective policy and collective action. In this respect I am distinguishing between decision and the formulation of policy. Suppose the United States adopted that maxim and made its own policy solely in Washington, or the United Kingdom decided to make its policy solely in London, or the French government solely in Paris; it would not be long before the North Atlantic Treaty Organization would itself dissolve. If it dissolved we would not be worrying so much about whether we were making our own policy; we would be worrying far more about our protection against potential enemies even than we do now.

Foreign policy in a coalition working for peace is bound to operate collectively if it is to succeed. That does not mean that we are merely tagging along behind American decisions. It may be that my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre and some of his colleagues think so. He himself said, as reported on page 2877 of Hansard:

> We feel the result is that Canada has said—

This refers to my statement in Toronto.

> —that we regard ourselves as quite free to make any decisions we want with regard to foreign policy, so long as they are agreed to by Washington.

Well, Mr. Speaker, with all respect, that is a distorted and unfair interpretation of what I said in Toronto or what I have said in this house, and I only need mention one example to prove how unfair it is. Has Washington agreed to our statement of policy that we will not intervene in Matsu or Quemoy if they are attacked by the forces of communist China? We have made that statement and I am happy to repeat it tonight, but it was not made, nor was the policy decided, after any agreement in Washington; on the contrary. That statement then was unfounded.

Another statement from the same group was made to the effect that apparently I feel now that I have to go along very easily and readily with the views of the secretary of state of the United States. I hope that Mr. Dulles' views will be such that I can go along with them easily and readily, but I can assure you, sir, if any assurance is needed, that I will not hesitate to disagree with them when I feel that it is undesirable and unwise to support them. It seems to me that the trouble with my hon. friends in the C.C.F. party in these matters is that they take a jaundiced and morbidly suspicious view of everything that goes on in the United States, or at least in the United States official circles. As was pointed out this afternoon in what I thought was a very effective intervention by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott), sometimes they mistake the clamour and confusion of voices in that vigorous, free democracy for the authentic expression of United States policy. I suggest, therefore, that occasionally they look a little more closely behind the headlines. I also suggest with respect that they look across—not across the border so often—but across the ocean to some of the real sources of danger to peace in the world today from communist imperialism.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and others have done just that. They have looked across the Pacific, and they have found many things which they did not like. I think we can all share to some extent their feeling of uneasiness. But I myself thought—and I hope I am not being unfair to him in saying it—that the statement of the leader of the C.C.F. party on this matter was not a fair presentation of the case. He attacked very vigorously indeed the Chinese government on Formosa and its leader Chiang Kai-shek and what he called his "bloodthirsty war lords". He did not see fit in this statement of his to make any such attack on the Chinese communist government in Peking. He emphasized the danger to peace from Chiang. But I want to point out—as has been pointed out by others, particularly I think by my friend the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Fraser)—that it is not Chiang Kai-shek that we are concerned with on Formosa. It is peace and the defence of a people against communist aggression.

He also—and I take particular exception to this, Mr. Speaker—talked about not only danger from Chiang Kai-shek but danger from the United States. This is at page 2357 of Hansard. He emphasized the danger of being dragged into a war by the policies that are now being pursued by the secretary of state of the United States. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we are in much more danger of being dragged into war by policies that are pursued by the foreign minister in Peking and by the foreign minister in Moscow than we are by the policies pursued by the secretary of state of the United States.

No one wishes to adopt a provocative or bellicose attitude toward any government, communist or otherwise. We are obliged to coexist with them in this world, whether we like it or not. But when the leader of a party in a debate of this kind will spend so much time attacking the policies of our friends, I think he might have spared a word or two for the dangers which might come to peace from the policies of those whom we have some reason to fear.

In his statement he outlined what his own policy—and I presume he was speaking for his group—towards China in the present situation would be. I have just jotted down the four points he made on that occasion. The first was that we should exile Chiang Kai-shek—and this suggestion has been repeated by other members of his party—presumably by force. I do not know who is anxious to take part in that particular expedition.

I have no brief for the government of Chiang Kai-shek. I am not going to object to the facts which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) stated about the atrocities that were committed in Formosa in 1947, just about ten years ago. It was a dark page in the history of that island and in the history of China. But I would ask him to go a little bit beyond 1947 and to read reports which have been appearing in the Manchester Guardian recently by their correspondent, a wise and unprejudiced observer, as to the improvement that has taken place in the government of Formosa in recent years. We do not in this government have to subscribe to the policies of Chiang Kai-shek; we also have a fairly open mind about the future of Formosa and indeed we have been criticized because we have not been more specific in our policy in this regard. But I certainly do not subscribe to any policy which would ask us to share in the ejection of Chiang Kai-shek and half a million Chinese nationalist soldiers from Formosa.

The second suggestion the leader of the C.C.F. made was that we should neutralize Formosa and place it under a trusteeship. I think there is a good deal to be said for that suggestion. That may prove to be the wisest solution to this extremely difficult problem. I think, however, it is premature to be dogmatic on the point or to make up our minds finally on anything like that at the present time. A great deal of discussion is now going on in diplomatic channels as to how this problem of Formosa can be solved in a way which will meet the wishes of the Formosan people and will take that island out of conflict. The solution may turn out to be the neutralization of Formosa and a trusteeship under the United Nations. That may turn out to be the wisest solution. But I would point out that that particular solution, namely to put Formosa under United Nations trusteeship, is about the only single thing on which the Chinese communists and the Chinese national government agree. They are both violently opposed to it.

So far as Canadian responsibility is concerned over Formosa—I think this had better be repeated, and I will try to make it clear—we have no other commitment in regard to Formosa than that which arises from our membership in the United Nations. That was the position a year ago and that is the position today. We feel that the status of Formosa has not yet been finally determined but we also feel that the communist government in Peking should not use force to bring about that determination. This afternoon my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre—

Mr. Knowles: Winnipeg North.

Mr. Pearson: —or rather the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) had something to say about a press report of a statement made or alleged to have been made in Australia by my friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I have seen the report to which he has referred and we expect to have a more complete report shortly.

Mr. Knowles: Have you not cabled him already?

Mr. Pearson: But even on the basis of the press report, my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in answer to a query at a press conference, merely stated that Canada was prepared to go full out for Formosa. To me, Mr. Speaker, that does not sound like an alarming statement and it certainly does not indicate any change whatsoever in Canadian policy in this matter. When he talks about going full out for Formosa, no doubt my colleague had in mind going full out to keep Formosa out of this Far Eastern conflict. In that sense I am sure he will have the support of all members in this house.

Then the third point made by the leader of the C.C.F. was that we should seat communist China at the present time in the United Nations, and he contrasted our policy or the Canadian government's policy in this regard unfavourably with that of the government of the United Kingdom. But I should like to point out that the government of the United Kingdom—which has, of course, recognized the government at Peking as the government of China—has not at any time, so far as I am aware, supported the application of that government for membership in the United Nations.

Then the fourth point he made was that we should not intervene in the struggle between the two Chinese governments over the offshore islands. This afternoon the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), by a process of misinterpretation of remarks of mine which I find to be completely astonishing and almost unbelievable, somehow or other got the impression that our policy was to intervene in the struggle for the offshore islands, and he contrasted our policy with that of the United Kingdom. It has been said more than once—I have said it already tonight and I do not mind repeating it, if necessary—that it is our policy to stay out of this struggle for these offshore islands, and I think that other governments would be well advised to adopt the same policy. I am even bold enough to hope that that will be the policy which will be adopted in due course by all governments concerned.

Then the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, supported by some of his friends, criticized the United States because the line of defence which the United States administration was drawing was too far from North America. My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), as he will remember, made quite a point of the same criticism. In that part of his speech the leader of the C.C.F. had this to say about the United States, as reported at page 2358 of Hansard:

> Why not for a change—

And I think he was referring to me.

> —be outspoken about United States policies that are equally imperialist in a sense, not in the same sense as the old imperialism used to be, but in the sense that there is an attempt to control a very large part of the world through bases and by display of arms.

He worried, as did some of his friends, that in that attempt to control, as he put it—and I do not think this is a fair description—the United States government had extended its front lines of defence across the Pacific ocean far away from the shores of continental United States.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) brought up the same point, but, instead of criticizing the United States for its far-away defence line, stated flatly that we should follow this example and our first line of defence should be Formosa, as it is for the United States. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that this whole concept of geographical defence lines used for political purposes is misleading, and can even be dangerous. On the one hand, if Formosa is a vital first-line position for the United States or for any other far-off country, then it could be argued with great validity that the offshore islands should be protected as vital to that vital first-line position. If that is so, then the coast of China is vital to the protection of the islands, and so on until every bit of territory you could secure becomes a first line.

I believe, however, it is equally dangerous to suggest that no country in its search for security has any right to establish a line of defence outside its own borders. Where was our first line of defence in 1939? Hitler said it was not in continental Europe, that we should be out of continental Europe. It had nothing to do with us because we were across the Atlantic and the British were across the channel. He said, "Clear out; this is not your line of defence". If our line of defence must be a geographical line close to our own territory, what are the British and ourselves doing in Europe today? It is because the first line of defence of Canada, in that sense, is in Europe that our men are there. Therefore, the argument does not seem to be impressive, one way or the other, as a geographical argument. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, surely that our own line of defence is attacked and our own security is jeopardized whenever a free people anywhere is the victim of aggression. In fact, our safety is endangered whenever there is any war any place. Our only safe line, therefore, is peace. Our only safe policy is to join with friendly states in maintaining that peace and preventing war by collective action.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra—I am sorry he is not in his seat tonight—asked me three other questions in addition to this question about our first line being in Formosa. One of them was, is it the belief of the Canadian government that the offshore islands, Quemoy and Matsu, should be handed over to red China in the hope of inducing the communists to stop fighting? I think I have answered that.

His second question was, does the government believe or does it not that in the Pacific communist aggression can be stopped by giving up territory? I think I have tried to answer that, Mr. Speaker.

Then he added, will the minister tell us whether the Canadian government believes that the British should give up Hong Kong? This does not seem to be a very relevant question in the context of this debate. Certainly, it is not relevant to the situation of the offshore islands or indeed in Formosa. I know that in certain quarters it is being suggested that because the British are reluctant to help in the event of the invasion of the offshore islands, other people should be reluctant to help the British maintain their position in Hong Kong. The offshore islands, of course, are part of China and are incidental to a war between two Chinese governments, so that is not the same thing either legally or politically as the position of Hong Kong, whatever one may think of it in other respects.

Then the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra came back to his favourite question. I was quite certain he would not make an intervention in this debate without tackling me once again with it. He asked me, will the Canadian government work for and advocate a protective grouping of the nations of the Pacific such as exist in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization? I wish he were here so that I could give him exactly the same answer as I have given him six or seven times before. It would be along this line. There is no single arrangement in the Pacific at present which is along NATO lines. It has been considered that the arrangement should not be along NATO lines because of different conditions in the Pacific. The south-east Asia defence organization, which he had in mind, has no such commitment as NATO at all. The main reason why it has not got such a commitment is that the United States would not accept one in those circumstances.

I could tell him tonight if he were here, as I have told him before, that we are not therefore taking any initiative or accepting any invitation to extend our commitments in that area, that is in the Pacific, beyond those which we now have and which include our commitments under the charter of the United Nations. I do not think he had any right to go on to say, as he did, that because we would not extend our commitment in this way we were not alert to things happening in the Pacific and we were more interested in Europe. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that what has happened in Korea, and what is now happening in Indo-China, is sufficient evidence that we have and retain a very genuine interest in what goes on in the Pacific and Asian areas.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would return almost to where I began. The subject which has loomed so large throughout this debate has been our relations with the United States and our preoccupation with those relations. This preoccupation, indeed this anxiety, is understandable over our relations economic, our relations political and our relations strategic. I suggest that that relationship, vitally important as it must be to us and as it has been in the past, will be even more so in the future. A relationship to be successful on both sides must be based on mutual respect, a freedom to hold and to express our own views. I assure my hon. friends who have been criticizing the government because we have not, as they have said, had enough courage to express those views, that they do not feel any more strongly about that than we do. However, we in the government happen at this time to have some responsibility for the conduct of international relations. It is not always advisable in the conduct of diplomacy and international affairs, even with our best friends, to shout from the housetop and throw our weight about, in order to impress our own people with the fact that we are very independent.

This relationship must also be based on recognition of the fact that if our coalition, which is now headed by the United States, breaks up, then indeed there will be a grave danger to peace and security. I suggest, therefore, that while we must be independent and speak up when it is necessary to do so, we must be sure we do nothing avoidable by our words and by our deeds to further that wrong end of disunity and division. When we do disagree with the United States we must be sure that that disagreement is not based on a narrow conception of our national interest, but is a disagreement which goes to the very basis of the coalition policy and which we maintain on the highest principles of peace and international security.

It is quite true that there are strains and stresses on the coalition at the present time. There has never been a coalition, even in wartime, which was easy to manage. In peacetime, they are not very often necessary. But in a period such as we have at present, between peace and war, a coalition is not only desperately required, but it is very difficult indeed to manage. So there are stresses and strains now pressing against it, but we will be able to weather them. It is quite true that the greatest of these at the present time is in the Far East. I have not come across a better short expression of the nature and the importance of these Far Eastern strains than I found in a paragraph in the April 9 edition of the Economist. It reads as follows:

> The danger of the next few months is that, confronted by the threat of renewed fighting off the China coast, many otherwise sensible people in Britain—

And the writer could have added Canada.

> —will say that they would rather have peace than the American alliance. Nothing, in fact, could be sillier, for there is no such choice. It is still possible to have both peace and the alliance. It is certainly not possible to have peace for long without it.

We wish to have in this parliament and in this country both peace and the alliance—not merely the American alliance but an alliance for friendly co-operation with all peace-loving free countries of the world.

Motion agreed to.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, TRAVELLING EXPENSES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Thursday, March 31, consideration in committee of Bill No. 182, to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act—Mr. Lesage—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—"Historic place".

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks about these words that have been added concerning age and architectural design. I do not mean that they should not have been added, but I do say that difficulties could arise in time.

First, I believe there might be some danger of stressing the architectural factor of these sites, rather than their age. Secondly, I think we should be careful to watch the interpretation of the word "age", because so far as different areas in Canada are concerned, it is a purely relative term. For example in the maritime provinces, one of the older areas, we have a great many historic sites which are fast reaching a state of destruction and falling into misuse. Action must be taken quickly if they are to be saved.

There is a tendency nowadays to sectionalize procedure in respect of the sites. For example, it may be suggested that there would be one for Ontario, one for Quebec, one for British Columbia and one for New Brunswick. I suggest we should move quickly in respect of those sites of great age in the older sections of Canada, because they will not remain there long. It is easy enough to mark a tablet or a cairn, but we must take action quickly in respect of the sites.

For example in Saint John, the loyalist city, I believe there are only two of the old loyalist buildings left, and they will not remain much longer. If an effort is made to sectionalize and to group everything, we will miss out in the preservation of these buildings.

A Saint John paper of yesterday proves my point perhaps better than I could prove it in argument this evening. The article to which I shall refer concerns a visitor to our city who, upon arrival by aeroplane, got into an argument with a stranger. This visitor is quoted as saying:

> "I couldn't mind my own business", she conceded with a laugh. "I told him this was the oldest incorporated city in Canada, where people knew how to live graciously. I told him there were culture and graciousness here 200 years ago, when people were eating beans in what is Ottawa today."

This statement of appreciation of that old culture was made by Mayor Charlotte Whitton, a very well known educator and historian in this area. And so I just leave with hon. members the thought that, in the matter of age, we must move fast in respect of some of these sites in the older areas of Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: Apropos of what has been said by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, I believe the minister has a problem on his hands in dealing with the definition of what is to be construed as of national historic interest. The hon. member has referred to certain buildings formerly occupied by loyalists in the city of Saint John, buildings which undoubtedly should be preserved.

Members from other provinces could refer to other matters of local, and sometimes of provincial and of national interest. I believe there must be co-operation between the national historic sites and monuments board and provincial governments and authorities so that buildings and sites of provincial interest will be maintained by provincial authorities and those of national interest maintained by the national board.

For instance in Nova Scotia the provincial government has bought certain buildings which might be considered to be of national importance, but which most certainly have great provincial significance. I should like to see worked out some modus vivendi by which this could be done, and I would hope the minister would encourage the board along these lines. I would hope that it would work in closer co-operation with the various provincial governments. Perhaps a line could be drawn—it might be a tenuous one—between provincial matters on the one hand and federal on the other so that we would achieve the preservation of those sites which should be preserved, for the perpetuation of historic interest.

Also I believe the minister might ask the board to act as advisers to various departments of government, particularly the Post Office Department, to see that historic stamps are issued at proper times, and to act as custodian and adviser in respect of the preservation of these historic landmarks for which the minister's department is responsible.

Clause 2 agreed to.

[Mr. Bell.]

On clause 3—Living and travelling expenses of appointed members.

Mr. Nowlan: Do I understand that the sum of $75 is the total amount to be paid out in a year for clerical and stenographic assistance to the chairman of the board and $30 per year to the members? It seems to me there should be much more money than that available for secretarial assistance, or the board will not be able to do the work which I would hope it would do.

Mr. Lesage: Previously members of the board had no allowance for clerical assistance, and they suggested that $30 would be acceptable.

Mr. Nowlan: Is there any amount available, other than the sum mentioned in this clause? And just to anticipate the minister's answer, I understood that it was to be the policy of the department that a permanent official from that department would act as secretary. That being so, I would assume that secretarial expenses would be borne by the department rather than by the board as such.

I would urge that if there is to be only $75 for the chairman and $30 for each member to carry on the secretarial work of the board, then the House of Commons should not have spent the time it has spent on this measure, because the board will not be able to do the work it should do.

Mr. Lesage: The secretary of the board is an employee of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and most of the secretarial work is done in the department for the board. However, the members of the board have to do some work when they are in their respective provinces, and the amounts which are proposed in this clause are to cover the clerical expenditures that they have to meet when they are outside of Ottawa.

Mr. Nowlan: The general expenditures of the board will be borne by the minister's department. Do I understand that?

Mr. Lesage: Yes. The secretarial work is done in the department.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

AMENDMENTS WITHDRAWING LANDS, CREATING NEW PARK, ETC.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 261, to amend the National Parks Act and to establish a national park in the province of Newfoundland.

He said: Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the purport of this bill, has given consent so far as Her Majesty's property rights are affected and the house may do therein as they shall see fit. I gave fairly full explanations of this bill at the resolution stage. I shall be ready in committee to discuss the various clauses, which would permit of a more orderly discussion because the various amendments differ widely one from the other.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Use of water.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It seems to me that this bill should be set over until another day because it certainly was not indicated to us that it was to be proceeded with tonight.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, last night.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I did not so understand.

Mr. Lesage: It was in the order of business mentioned by the leader of the house last night.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I would suggest that Mr. Chairman call it ten o'clock. It is two minutes to ten.

Mr. Lesage: It is five minutes to ten.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It would be more appropriate if we had a full discussion of it on another day. Would that be agreeable to the minister? Will you call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Shall I rise and report progress, and request leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lesage the house adjourned at 9.57 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. THATCHER—ANNOUNCEMENT OF RESIGNATION FROM C.C.F. PARTY

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I crave the indulgence of the house for a moment to speak on a matter of personal privilege. On three different occasions I have been elected to this parliament as the standard bearer of the C.C.F. party. During those years I have appreciated the privilege of working with C.C.F. members of parliament and with the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

However, I regret to say that recently there have been growing differences between myself and my colleagues on matters of major public policy. At one time I had hoped these differences could be resolved. However, the present session of parliament has convinced me that such a hope is futile. Therefore, in fairness to my leader and in fairness to my colleagues and in fairness to myself I feel that I have no alternative but to resign from the C.C.F. party.

This is not the time to deal in detail with our differences, but I shall take an early opportunity in the house to explain the reasons for my action. For the remainder of the present parliament I propose to represent the constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre as an independent member. I shall not apply for membership in any other party. I shall continue to support those measures and motions which I believe to be in the best interests of the people who elected me, no matter from what quarter they are advanced.

Under these circumstances I must ask you, sir, to allocate to me a seat in another part of this chamber.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

LOSS-LEADER SELLING—AVAILABILITY OF EVIDENCE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Kamloops whether I would table the evidence received from the restrictive trade practices commission in the course of an inquiry into loss-leader selling. I am now tabling such evidence. I may say that it is not on the table, but rather on the floor beside me. It is quite voluminous, and I doubt if there would be enough clear space on the table as presently covered to accommodate this evidence.

This voluminous evidence falls into two parts. The first part is the green book, as it was referred to throughout the hearings, which contains the information that was collected by the director of investigation research for the purpose of laying before the commission. The second part consists of the transcript of the evidence which was given before the commission in the course of the hearings which it held across Canada last summer and fall.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr Speaker, may I express my appreciation to the Minister of Justice for the rapidity with which he complied with the suggestion I made yesterday. May I ask whether he will table more than one copy and, if not, whether he could inform the house whether the evidence is generally available, or whether this is the only set.

Mr. Garson: We would be in a position to supply a reasonable number of copies to any members in the house who are interested. But we could not by any means supply every member of the house.

IMMIGRATION

UNDESIRABLE ALIEN REPORTED DETAINED BY MONTREAL POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, since my question affects two departments of government I am wondering if the Prime Minister would care to make a statement regarding an American gangster earlier identified in this house by myself as an undesirable alien, since detained by the Montreal police department and now being held by the immigration department in Montreal?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, I have no information I can communicate to the House of Commons in connection with that person.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COAL

REPORTED CLOSING OF NOVA SCOTIA MINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Has the minister received a telegram from Glace Bay with regard to the reported closing of Dominion No. 1-B colliery? If so, has he any statement in regard to the matter, or any statement in regard to the situation there from the point of view of employment?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I have received several telegrams relating to the announced closing of No. 1-B colliery. Most of those telegrams cited the loss of markets as the reason for closing. My understanding is that the real cause of the closing is the high cost of production. That problem has been clearly understood by both management and labour for some time, and I believe the announcement of the closing of the mine has been made after very careful and serious consideration by both management and labour.

Mr. Drew: Has the minister given any consideration to the possibility of appointing a group of experts, either from his own department or from outside, to examine the opportunities that may present themselves to make other uses of this colliery, if necessary, in view of the very substantial dependence of a large number of people in that area upon that operation?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Speaker, I do not quite understand what the Leader of the Opposition means by "other uses". There can be only one use of a colliery, and that is to produce coal. For the last two years the problem has been given very careful consideration by the dominion coal board, management and the unions. Only recently a representative of the Nova Scotia government was in Ottawa, and a plan was suggested by me to that representative. He was to take that plan back to the Nova Scotia government, the mining company and the unions. As yet I have had no further report as to how that suggestion was received. It is my intention to get in touch with the president of the company today to see if the suggestion is considered to have any merit.

Mr. Drew: This is not in any way by way of a debate, but since the minister said that he did not know what I had in mind in suggesting other possibilities, may I say I was thinking, for instance, of the fact that in other countries there have been cases where mines which became uneconomic, from the point of view of ordinary operations, became very economic from the point of view of the development of electricity right at the mine head. I had that in mind, and other similar possibilities, in view of the substantial dependence of a large number of people upon this operation.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Speaker, you just cannot produce electricity economically with $11 coal at the pithead.

Mr. Gillis: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? Is it correct to say that in so far as the government is concerned, jurisdiction over this matter that the Leader of the Opposition is inquiring about is in the hands of the provincial government? Second, I should like to ask the minister whether the provincial government of Nova Scotia has made any representations to his department with respect to relinquishing control of the industry in order that the federal government might take some action?

Mr. Prudham: No, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

LIFTING OF ALLEGED EMBARGO ON MOVEMENT TO THE LAKEHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Has the embargo on Saskatchewan grain moving to the lakehead been lifted?

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to send over a notice of his question. In answer, I may say that there never has been any embargo by the transport controller. The railways had too many cars on track at the lakehead, and accordingly would not move any further cars to that destination. The situation has come to an end with the settlement of the strike and the opening of navigation on the lakes, and there should be normal movement from now on.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RESPONSIBILITY FOR LOCATING AND DETAINING UNDESIRABLE ALIENS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice whether the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will continue to leave to the Montreal police the responsibility for locating and detaining undesirable aliens, such as Michael Joseph Consolo, who was turned over to the immigration department this afternoon by the Montreal police?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, ordinarily, in those provinces in which the enforcement of the law is carried out by the provincial and municipal police forces, as in Quebec, the apprehension of criminals is the responsibility of those police forces.

With regard to my hon. friend's question, of which he did not give me notice, I shall be glad to discuss the matter with our own officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to see whether there is anything further that I need to add to what I have just said.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 20, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the budget debate so far has proven, among other things, that the Conservatives are bankrupt of ideas. Certainly, there is a marked resemblance between the amendment that they proposed to the speech from the throne and the amendment they moved in this budget debate. I also note that the leader of the socialist party, the C.C.F., did not at this time propose any socialistic means by which he could cure the ills of the nation. That certainly is a step forward.

The Minister of Finance is a charming man, but he is a Conservative wearing a Liberal mantle. His budget is a palliative, not a cure. It reminds me of an injured man who is given a cane and who is so badly injured that he requires a crutch for support.

Finance in this country today is a sick man, and I would say that it needs the full treatment. Time and conditions will prove that the Minister of Finance might have been the emancipator of all time. Instead of that, I think we shall have finally to record that he is just another tax collector. Instead of throwing caution to the winds, he has decided to follow the Conservative caution that I spoke of earlier. I am almost led to believe that he read some of the budgets that were brought down in the late Prime Minister R. B. Bennett's regime, for certainly he has nothing further to offer than was offered at that time.

I may say that I have always admired the new Minister of Finance. I have always thought of him as a man of vision. Instead of that, I find him a man of revision. He has merely revised the tax structure that has been in existence for some time. I hope the minister will be at the proposed dominion-provincial conference. I would suggest he will find in the discussions at that conference that some of the ministers of finance from the far western provinces will propose new techniques and new principles which might be able to straighten out the affairs of this country. What we require today are alternatives, not remedies. In his first budget he has failed to relieve those who need it most. The man on the low fixed income is the man who gets the least. The man on the small superannuation and on the small annuity gets nothing. I find the budget does nothing for the old age pensioner, or for the war veterans allowance man who is unable to obtain casual earnings. It does relatively little for the blind and disabled. To my way of thinking, their plight is worse than it was a year ago. It does nothing for those who are on old age security. The budget reminds me of the biblical story. When the rich were putting their gifts into the treasury a widow put in two coppers, and our Lord said that she had put in more than all of them. The same widow is still putting two coppers into the treasury, and putting in more than all the others.

It is not my intention to treat the budget with derision, but I say that it is an orthodox conservative budget. It does not go far enough. I congratulate the minister upon the tax concessions and the tax cuts that he has made. It is the purpose of the opposition to offer constructive criticism, not just criticism that will tear down the house that we have built. The leader of my group gave some constructive criticism, methodically and well. It would be presumptuous of me to review all the information that he gave. Before going on with that, let me say that the tax cut now given is too little and too late to cure depressed industry and relieve the unemployment situation as it exists at this time. The situation will deteriorate still further unless additional action is taken by the government.

What we need is an injection of more purchasing power. We must have a balanced economy. We must balance the purchasing power within the nation with the productive capacity of our workers. It is most important that this injection of purchasing power should be made where it will do the most good.

Studying the matter I would say that the quickest way to create work today would be to create a demand for the goods in connection with which we have the heaviest turnover, such as food, clothing and automobiles. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) took care of the automobile matter to some degree with his 5 per cent reduction in the excise tax, but putting money into durable goods at this point is not of as great value from the point of view of creating immediate employment for people now unemployed as other methods would be. It will not cure the problem which is quite likely to continue and grow.

The greatest market for non-durable goods is to be found among the people who have no money, those who do not pay income tax, those who do not buy automobiles. The removal of the sales tax on clothing and textiles would create an increased demand for those particular goods and this demand would be set up almost immediately. It is quite possible that it would help in offsetting the unemployment which is prevalent today in the textile industry. If we had taken the sales tax off textiles we would have done more to create jobs in this country at this time than is being done by the reductions in the income tax. It certainly would have made the dollars which these poor people have go considerably further and would have created a demand for the goods which they require so badly.

It would be better still to inject purchasing power into the hands of these people themselves. This group consists of unemployed employables, war veterans on disability pension, those who are in receipt of annuity or superannuation payments and those who cannot make money by casual work because they are handicapped or because there are no jobs available. We could create purchasing power by increasing the old age pensions paid to our senior citizens. We could increase purchasing power by giving larger old age security payments.

We could also assist materially by putting dollars into the small annuities, into all annuities for that matter, and making them worth what they were when people first purchased them. You will possibly remember, as I do, the days when we saw large signs in our post offices and banks telling people to prepare for their old age by buying annuities or pensions of one kind or another. The people who bought those annuities some years ago were led to believe that if they bought a $20, a $30, a $40 or a $50 annuity it would be worth that amount of money when they needed it most.

However, the opposite is true today. The $50 annuity is worth approximately $25 today. Let us reward these people for their thrift and foresight in investing in post office annuities and other forms of annuities by putting dollars back into the annuity fund.

I do not intend to spend any great amount of time discussing the budget, but I should like to draw to the attention of the minister the excellent way in which my leader drew attention to the relationship between agricultural production, labour and national income in the United States. I believe it was discovered that when you have a maximum of labour, farm income and production the ratio is 1-1-7. I commend my leader's address to the minister's careful attention because it is quite possible that in this lies the key to an economic formula for full employment.

I listened with considerable interest to what the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) had to say during the course of the debate about a guaranteed annual wage. It is not my intention at this time to discuss the guaranteed annual wage because I think we can do a better job and be able to speak at greater length when the estimates are before us. However, I was struck by one point in his speech. I think he gave an excellent discourse, but then he tried, not with the same success, to make out a case against it.

There was one thing that did stick in my mind, that is his suggestion that if the auto workers were not continuously employed in building automobiles under a guaranteed annual wage they might turn to the making of cuckoo clocks. I wondered what was to happen to those who were already employed in the building of cuckoo clocks. Possibly they would be busy building something else of which somebody else had already produced too much.

As I said earlier, I would refer the minister to the address of my leader and his reference to the plight of the farmers. We have noted from time to time the fact that our labour problem depends largely on farm production. Whatever the labouring man creates is quite often the direct result of what the farmer has produced and what he has received therefor. I do not intend to debate this problem because, as I said before, there has been so much said about his plight and the effect of what he produces upon the nation as a whole.

There are other groups that could be dealt with at this time. There is the case of the old age pensioner, the blind person, the disabled person and the men and women who are receiving old age security. I am quite satisfied, as is possibly every hon. member in this house, that this problem is not being adequately dealt with today. We should spend more time studying what can be done for these senior citizens. With automation and the fact that jobs are becoming fewer, these people have not the funds to carry on, and we must find some way of looking after them. Their plight can and will probably be discussed at the appropriate time on the estimates.

However, there is another group in regard to which I have checked the estimates carefully to see whether I can include it in the discussion on the estimates; but I cannot. Therefore I propose to tell you something about their difficulties. They play a most important part in the economy of the community and they are a most important economic group in the business of the nation. They are the forerunners of the metropolitan areas, they are the financiers of the community, and they are the hardest hit in times of depression. I refer to the small retail shopkeepers. What drew them to my attention was an article in the dominion bureau of statistics "News Notes" of April 1, 1955, from which I quote:

> The number of commercial failures under the Bankruptcy and Winding Up acts increased 37 per cent last year from 1,657 in 1953 to a post-war peak of 2,278. Defaulted liabilities jumped to $53,142,000 from $32,818,000, average liability per failure increasing 18 per cent.

Now I know that this refers to commercial failures and does not necessarily include all retail merchants. However, it does include the retail merchants. They, as I said earlier, have played a most important part in the building up of our community and of our nation, and I feel that they have not been given the consideration which we are capable of giving them. The small shopkeepers in this country do approximately 60 per cent of the nation's business; the chain stores in comparison do 40 per cent.

Let us examine the significance of the statement which I have just read. It means in effect that there are 2,278 families who have become financially destitute. It means that those employed by these commercial enterprises are temporarily unemployed. It means that we are going to add all these people to the unemployed list. It means in effect that our employable unemployed list has grown by 2,278 families plus all the people whom they have employed.

That is a most discouraging state of affairs. Here we have people who have lost their life savings. They have no compensation; they have no unemployment insurance; they are destitute. They have given their all to the growth of this country and to the growth of their small communities. They are probably the greatest philanthropists within the nation, and yet there is not a place where we find we can discuss their plight. It is a tragedy of our economic system that these builders of our community life should finish their business careers in this way.

There are certain factors which cause these failures. Some of them are of a personal nature over which we as a parliament have no control. However, I am not interested in their personal shortcomings. I am more interested in what we have done and what legislation we can pass in order that we might see that these continued failures should not be with us in the future, especially if they are not due to their own personal shortcomings. I speak of the economic aspect over which the small merchant has no control and all the legal technicalities which might be involved in giving him assistance.

The first of these items which I have listed is the fact that buying in quantity means that we should be able to purchase at a discount. I do not know whether hon. members are aware of what buying in quantity actually means. It means to some companies that if you buy one case of goods you are not buying a quantity but if you buy five cases of goods you are buying a quantity. Most people have the impression that one has to buy a carload lot of goods before one is buying a quantity. Does the hon. member have an observation to make?

Mr. Byrne: You are selling a fine bill of goods.

Mr. Hahn: Thank you. I hope to continue selling it too. Most people have the impression, as I said, that in order to buy a quantity one must buy in carload lots or at least in multiples of ten. Such is not the case. I am thinking of a particular item which you would be buying in quantity if you bought five items; but you have to buy ten to get a further increase in discount. If you buy 25 you are buying actually at carload lot prices. A particular firm may have 25 different items, and does not care which one of the items you buy. You can buy one of each, which means that it takes just as much bookkeeping and there is just as much trucking involved to pick up each one of the 25 items. You are supposedly buying in quantity, but in effect you are not buying in quantity in the true sense of the word. However, you are getting the advantage of a 25-case purchase. That is one of the reasons why we find that chain stores are possibly able to undersell these smaller retail merchants who are trying to be competitive with them. The man who is helping to build the community contends, and I contend, that buying in quantity should mean certainly buying more than one item, or one per article, not 25 items each of one different article, especially when the same amount of bookkeeping and the same trucking and so forth is involved in carrying out such a transaction.

To illustrate my point further with respect to the sales made by the small retailer as compared with the chain store, I would say this. If the chain stores were to purchase all their goods from the one wholesaler and were to get the chain store price, the wholesaler would in all likelihood go bankrupt. Today the small merchant is in effect subsidizing the chain store. The small merchant is buying 60 per cent of the wholesaler's product, as against 40 per cent by the chain store. In effect it means this. For purposes of illustration, we will use a lot of 100 cases of goods which are sold on the national basis of 40 to a chain store and 60 to the small retail merchant. If each of those pieces of goods is worth $7—assuming it is the net cost—the net cost of that parcel of goods would be $700. If the wholesaler is willing to sell that commodity to the chain store at 10 cents less than cost and to the small retailer at 10 cents more than cost, the price will then be $6.90 to the chain store and $7.10 a case to the small retailer. The 40 cases of goods which the chain store buys at $6.90 would return to the wholesaler 40 times $6.90 which would be $276. The 60 cases of goods which are sold to the small retailer at $7.10 would, in effect, give the wholesaler $426. That would be his net return. The wholesaler then, adding those two figures together, would receive for his goods $426 plus $276 or $702 in this transaction.

In effect what has happened is that the wholesaler has sold his commodity for less than cost to the big chain store and for more than cost to the small retailer, and has still wound up with a $2 profit on the whole transaction. That is something that is being done. For that reason I say that the small retailer is subsidizing the chain store today. I contend that that is not fair business practice. I contend that we in this parliament should take action to see that no commodity is offered for sale, unless it is on a clearance basis, at a price less than wholesale to any particular group of merchants or individuals. The small merchants of this country should not be discriminated against.

A second factor in this matter is the unethical practice of coupon disposal. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that each hon. member from time to time has seen the coupons that are offered by certain firms in this country and that are put out as an introductory offer. In one instance I am thinking of a soap firm in the city of Edmonton. I think it was called Soapone. Those people issued thousands and thousands of coupons to the merchants in western Canada. Then after the merchants had given the 10 cent value per coupon, they failed to recover them. The firm went bankrupt.

A coupon is a form of money and its use should not be permitted in that particular sense. If those companies are willing to sacrifice 10 cents per box as an introductory offer, I would say they should be compelled to issue box lots or case lots to the merchants at a discount sufficient to enable them to quote their price 10 cents below what would be the normal price at a later date. That would be the fair way of doing things instead of what is being done now where, because some particular lady happens to bring along her coupons or because she has an accumulation of them from her neighbours who do not use that particular brand of soap, she has an advantage over the other ladies. That part has nothing to do with the actual merchandising of it. The fact remains, though, that here we have coupons being given to the merchants who take them in good faith and, having taken them, find that they cannot recover their money from the firms in question because they have either gone bankrupt or are unwilling to accept responsibility for the issuance of those particular coupons.

Then there are other unethical practices in respect of this coupon letting. I remember a particular instance—and it also took place in western Canada—in which the small merchants were going to be the outlet for a new brand of soap. The purpose was to introduce a new type of soap of one of the larger soap companies. In this instance the merchant was approached by the supervisor of the soap company and it was proposed that if he bought, let us say, five cases of soap, which would be 60 packages, he would be given 60 coupon cards. On each one of those cards he would have to put the name of one of his customers. Then it had to be sent through the mail to this particular customer. The customer in turn was to return it to the storekeeper and it could be retrieved on that basis.

What it was, in effect, was a grandiose scheme to force the small merchants to buy cases and cases of soap that they did not require. I had occasion to go into one merchant's store subsequent to the offer of this particular deal. Two years later he still had that particular soap in the warehouse. Because he had 500 customers, he obtained 500 boxes. But the soap men knew full well that only about 10 per cent to 15 per cent of these coupons are ever recovered. By this means they were able to get rid of their commodity, get the finances from the merchant who was obliged to pay for this product, and the result was that the merchant became, in effect, an unloading centre for the manufacturer of this particular soap product.

Then there are certain other unethical procedures that are being followed in today's merchandising. We have deals between manufacturing firms and particular chain stores whereby a chain store is given a certain sum of money for a display in their store. The offer is this: If you give us this particular spot—let us say in a window—for advertising purposes, you will get $2 from our firm. But no little merchant is given the advantage of that same deal. He is never given the same offer. If he inquires about it, he is merely told that it is not open to everybody. Mr. Speaker, if it is right for a chain store to be given this particular treatment—and I call it unfair treatment as far as the small merchant is concerned—then the small merchant should be given the same treatment. We should have the same treatment for the chain store and the small merchant if we are going to keep our equal tenor of good feeling in the business world today.

I also find that if you take five cases of a particular product, possibly you get less in the way of advertising allowance than if you take ten cases, or if you give them a particular spot near the cash register which seems to be one that most of them want.

An hon. Member: It is another form of discount.

Mr. Hahn: It is, in effect, another form of discount that the small merchant is not being given the privilege of enjoying. I say that the same offer should be open to the small retailer. I say that if he is willing to devote a space in his small store to the advertising of a particular product, he should be given an equal discount for it. We have the small merchant, in effect, first subsidizing the price to the chain store and, second, subsidizing the advertising of the chain store.

Then there is one other factor—and I think this is a fairly well established one—namely that no cost price is established for certain of the products that are for sale today. If it is established, certainly nobody is aware of it. We have instances were you buy five cases of a particular brand of soap. I am using soap again as an example because it is one of the most culpable in this instance. You buy five cases at a price discount. You devote a certain store space to it. You can just about guarantee that another of their products of a similar line will be down 20 cents a case the following week or even 40 cents a case. Thereby they are setting no cost value or no price value on it. Possibly between the two levels there is a cost, but because the demand is less for one product they immediately cut its price in order to increase demand, with the result that they have the small merchants coming and going in trying to arrive at an equalized price. The small merchant is always on the short end of the stick because he never has a chance to become and remain competitive with these large chain merchants who are only concerned with one thing, the elimination of the little man.

I charge that there is virtually a combine among the soap companies. They control the soap business of the country. They control soap supply. I am speaking of Lever Brothers and Procter and Gamble. There should be an examination into their unfair practices and it should be determined whether or not the same rights are being extended to the little merchant as are being given to the big merchant. It should be determined by what form of advertising or other method the soap companies are letting the little people know that the same rights are afforded to them.

This is the type of economic practice that is today killing the small retailer. As I said earlier, the little merchant is subsidizing the chain stores. Canada is today losing a share of income tax from the large wholesale outlets of these chain stores by reason of the fact that we find so frequently the wholesale firm has its own retail outlet with the result that there is not sufficient profit to require the payment of a large amount of income tax. There would be sufficient under ordinary circumstances with smaller retailers because the shareholders would require it. In the case of such large firms as Macdonalds Consolidated, Safeway and others I am not satisfied that a large enough amount of income tax is payable. I am not satisfied that is so in the case of Macdonalds Consolidated at the present time, certainly compared with legitimate wholesalers who do nothing but wholesale.

Business and salesmanship in this country should depend upon service, quality, personality, cleanliness, incentive, initiative and their related factors. It should not depend upon special privileges, agreed charges and unethical practices. The purpose of these big firms appears to be to eliminate competition and ultimately to set up a monopoly. We are unalterably opposed to monopolies. These little men are important to our country, and I say that we should examine the matter and see how we can keep them with us.

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this time-honoured debate pertaining to the budget and, coming from the riding of Niagara Falls where we probably have more tourists than any other place in the dominion, I naturally feel I should refer at the very outset to this type of travel in this great country of ours. In the year 1954 there were 647,948 vehicles of the non-permit class which entered at Niagara Falls and 337,181 of the travellers' vehicle permit class. Somewhat larger figures existed at the port of Fort Erie where we had over a million vehicles entering of the non-permit class and some 350,000 of the travellers' vehicle permit class. One cannot overemphasize the value of the tourist dollar that is left within the confines of our country.

Expenditures in Canada by travellers from the United States and other countries were maintained in 1954 at a figure close to the peak established in 1953. First estimates indicate that residents of other countries spent some $300 million in Canada during 1954, a decrease of some $3 million or 1 per cent lower than the previous year. Although slightly lower than the record of 1953, the 1954 estimate represents an increase of 9 per cent, or $25 million, over 1952. Compared with a decline of nearly 6 per cent in the volume of entries, available data on expenditure indicate slightly higher averages per visit in 1954 for some types of transportation. Travel receipts from the United States declined some $4 million from the year before but remained well ahead of the 1952 figure. Receipts from overseas countries set a record at $22 million, an increase of 10 per cent over the previous record established in 1953.

Most of the increase in expenditures by residents of Canada returning from the United States can be traced to the automobile traffic. Canadians returning by automobile spent over $136 million in the United States during the past year compared with $133 million in 1953, an increase of over 2 per cent. Compared with an increase of 3 per cent in the number of automobiles returning, this would indicate slightly lower average expenditures.

Purchases declared under the $100 customs exemption privilege by Canadians returning from the United States in 1954 amounted to $66 million, a decrease of $6 million or an 8 per cent decline from 1953. This would indicate that a smaller portion of Canadian travel expenditures in the United States went for merchandise, a trend contrary to that of the previous year.

The total number of visits to Canada by people from other countries amounted to 26·4 million in 1954, a decrease of 1·6 million visits, or 5·7 per cent fewer than the record established in 1953. It must be emphasized, however, that these visits are made by vacationists, summer residents, commuters, businessmen and all other travellers except immigrants. They include repeat visits by commuters and others who enter the country many times during the year. Approximately 85 per cent of the visits are for 48 hours or less. Only 15 to 16 per cent of the visits last longer than 48 hours.

I want to say I was very much disappointed the other day to hear the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), in reply to a question from the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), say that no redress would be given the automobile dealers on new units which they had on their hands when the budget was brought down. It is my opinion, and it is a very definite opinion indeed, that they should receive consideration. Naturally I was very happy to see the reduction of 5 per cent on new cars, as I think all automobile dealers were as well, but I think they have a justifiable claim pertaining to these new units.

The automotive industry, through its manufacturing plants, sales agencies and connected trades, garages, service stations, buses, transport, petroleum industry, rubber industry, suppliers such as steel plants, paints, glass, textiles, etc., is reported to provide over 20 per cent of the labour force of our country. So you can see that the automotive industry is a very basic one to our economic prosperity. Anything that tends to restrict the sale of automobiles is bound to show up in reduced payrolls, reduced income and corporation taxes from all the connected industries, and reduced sales and excise taxes in new automobiles, all as a direct result. Hence it is of the utmost importance that automobile sales agencies be kept healthy and working at full capacity.

In my own city of Niagara Falls nine dealers had 209 new units on hand when the budget was brought down. The average reduction in excise tax, from the smallest to the largest car, is estimated to be about $100 per unit. So the total reduction in value amounts in Niagara Falls to an estimated $21,000. On top of that there was an inventory of $370,000 in used cars. It appears that this will drop at least 5 per cent on account of the tax changes. This is another $19,000. Therefore the total decrease in inventory value is approximately $40,000.

Ward's Automotive Reports, which is a publication published in the United States, in the March 21, 1955, issue reported that 38·7 per cent of United States dealers lost money last year, and that the average profit of all United States dealers was three-fifths of a cent on every dollar of sale, before income or corporation taxes. We do not have the Canadian figures yet, but as a rule they follow or parallel the United States figures.

In the long run it will cost the government nothing to return this tax, because I think it will keep many dealers in business who would otherwise be forced to go out, and it will leave many others more solvent and thus able to carry on their business more freely. It will increase taxes from dealerships, factory payrolls and the extra new cars that would not have been sold otherwise, and it would be a further indication that the government really meant what it said when it proclaimed the budget as a job-producing and hence an income-producing budget.

I would also like to point out that any excise tax at all on any automobile is unfair. The government described it as a luxury tax when they imposed it. But certainly automobiles are no longer luxuries for most of their uses. And I also feel that the tax is unfair in the following respects: First, because dealers have to pay the tax when they receive the cars, and are given the extra burden of financing it for the period they have that car. They have to carry insurance on it as well. Then when it is removed the government refuses to return it on the units still in stock. And it is my firm belief that if the government would rebate the tax on the new units in stock they would get it all back in taxes on extra units that would be sold, by way of income tax from increased jobs, and from increased taxes from dealer earnings. It could quite conceivably be that they might lose considerably more than they kept if they do not do so.

The previous tax change policies are not applicable at this time because of two very important reasons, first, that the size of inventories in dealers' hands at the present time is very large. When the taxes were decreased, as we decreased them on previous occasions, dealers' profits were high enough to absorb the loss without its being any serious problem.

And now I have another matter of importance in the Niagara district—and it is very relative to the St. Lawrence development—and it is that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) will have to give due consideration to the traffic through the Welland canal which, naturally, will be increased to a very great extent. We have three or four large corporations along the Welland river and because of the boats which will be coming in to these companies, loaded with materials to be used in the manufacture of their products, I think it is only right that some consideration should be given to this problem of widening and deepening the Welland river so that boats can get through a lock into this territory.

I realize this would of necessity be quite a costly venture, and I do not want to tire hon. members with too many local problems, but I think this one is of prime importance. The difference between the Welland river and the Welland canal at Port Robinson is about 7 feet, which would be the extent to which ships would have to be lifted or lowered. And the distance from Port Robinson to Chippawa is some seven miles, as the crow flies. But any development there would, of necessity, have to straighten out the Welland river at certain points. There are at least six bridges crossing the river, four of which would eventually require reconstruction but, for immediate use, only two located at Port Robinson would have to be altered in order to bring the ships as far as the Welland Chemical and Noranda Mines Limited. The Norton and Carborundum companies are very greatly interested in such a development since, at the present time, they bring their raw material from South America by boat to New York city and break it for rail transportation to Niagara Falls, Ontario. The present canal system on the St. Lawrence permits boats of only approximately 3,000 tons to go through, and this is an uneconomical amount for them to bring in by boat all the way. If they could bring ships of 5,000 or more tons through the canal system, it brings it within the range of economic possibility and, in the case of Carborundum itself, they have mentioned that they would use at least 25 to 30 boatloads per season.

With the construction of the seaway in the lower St. Lawrence, the Welland canal area becomes the best protected harbour on the great lakes system. It might be an expensive and inconvenient method of docking if slips were cut into the side of the canal, with the added hazard of interfering with up and down shipping. One of the best solutions appears to be the use of the Welland river which gets the boats off the routine traffic of the canal into an area which could be built up industrially and where they can move up and down and turn as they like without obstructing the heavy traffic on the canal.

I recall that last year, speaking in this debate, I referred to the terrible congestion of automobile traffic at both the Burlington cut-off and the Homer bridge at St. Catharines. I can only repeat what I said at that time, that these are two of the worst bottlenecks in the province of Ontario.

I want to be fair in this matter, realizing of course that other hon. members have other traffic problems. But I must point out that at these two points we are receiving tourist traffic. They are entering Ontario and Canada for the first time; and I imagine they get pretty well fed-up, if I may use that expression, with the delays they have to endure at certain times. We as citizens in the community—and I include in this the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Cavers), the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) and the members from Hamilton—must be getting sick and tired of this dilly-dallying attitude between the federal and provincial governments as to whose jurisdiction it is to alleviate such problems. I note the Burlington high-level bridge is to be started shortly, but this has been in the offing now for a number of years.

I want to say that in my own experience I have seen traffic tied up from the Homer bridge back to Niagara Falls, a distance of about ten miles, with two-way traffic on both lanes waiting for the bridge to be lowered. And I feel that if we want to treat tourists as well as possible, we will have to eliminate this condition where they run into traffic difficulties within only a few miles from Niagara Falls. I am sure their impression of Canada must receive a handicap at once.

Talking about the tourists' impression of Canada, I again want to pay my highest respects to both customs and immigration officials at the ports of Niagara Falls and Fort Erie. They are the first people that the travelling public come in contact with, and I share with the department officials a justifiable pride in the way these men conduct their offices. Many a time tourists have told me how much they appreciate not only the efficiency but the co-operation and advice of these splendid officials, and I hope that their good work will be recognized by the ministers of these departments, and that soon they will receive wages commensurate with the services they render.

Another suggestion I would like to make, and I make this in all sincerity, to the Minister of Transport, is that it would not cost the government too much money to keep an ice-breaker down on the river where it enters lake Ontario. Perhaps not for another 40 or 50 years will we witness the spectacle of the ice jam we had just a few weeks ago. However, on the other hand it might happen again next winter, and if this ice-breaker were on hand when the ice starts to gather and refuses to flow out into the lake, this boat could be immediately started into operation and keep the channel open before the ice has an opportunity to jam and cause millions of dollars' worth of damage such as was caused in the last few months.

I do not want to be at all critical of the Ontario hydro commission, but I think they could well afford to pay half the cost of this ice-breaker in order to protect their very valuable hydro plants in case we have another jam such as we had a few weeks ago. If this should go even a few feet higher, we would suffer millions and millions of dollars' damage, not only to their own hydro plants but to our manufacturing concerns, resulting in lay-off of employment because of lack of power. I make this as a very serious suggestion, that I think the Department of Transport and the Ontario hydro commission should get together to alleviate the anxiety we had this winter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the budget, I join with the rest of my colleagues in this house in congratulating the minister on such a very fine presentation, and with it the encouragement that he has given to the people of Canada. With so much bad news coming from various sources in the world, it is encouraging to know that the Minister of Finance has predicted a good year for the people of Canada and has made a general although modest tax reduction for this year and 1956. I think the minister rightly believes, and we all join with him, that the government, business and the people of Canada must work together to ensure continued prosperity, and we all feel encouraged that he expressed the hope for a steady increase in business rather than an immediate upward thrust. The imagination and the effort of the Canadian people have brought this country to its present state of development and there is no reason to believe that it cannot continue to go forward under a government which permits private enterprise to flourish while safeguarding the nation from any monopolistic or other practices which could prove harmful.

Just a few weeks ago, some outstanding economists met to survey the state of the nation's prosperity. They studied every available index of business activity, and when they had gone over all their charts and tables, and had peered into the future through their crystal slide rules, the consensus among them was that 1955 will not be the best year in our history. It will only be the second or third best, according to their calculations.

Now the prospect of struggling through a year that is only the second or third best and most prosperous we have ever known is not exactly what I would regard as a fate worse than death. Yet if we were to believe even one-half of the alarmist talk, we could only conclude that we are sliding into a terrible depression; that Canada's golden age is past, and that our only chance of salvation is to board the first train for Ottawa and beg the government to run our various businesses for us in the Dominion of Canada.

Well, I for one am not quite ready to give this country back to the Indians, and I think the time has come when we ought to face squarely up to the fact that most of this depression talk is inspired more by the politics of our present situation than by the economics of it.

If our national supply of common sense has not been wholly exhausted, the Canadian people will take a long, cold look at that primrose path to inflation before they travel it again; for the destination to which it leads is national ruin.

So, instead of trying to read the inscrutable future, let us turn our eyes in the opposite direction and use a little of that 20-20 hindsight with which the good Lord, in His wisdom, has so generously endowed us all.

The success or failure of our economy depends chiefly upon our people themselves, upon businessmen, labourers, farmers, everybody in Canada. The only thing that government can do is to provide a fertile field to work in; but the thing that makes Canada go—and that always has and always will—is the individual effort of 15 million people, all trying to do a little more for themselves, a little more for their families, and a little more for each generation, every fellow trying to improve his own position. The cumulative effect of all that work, by all those people, is the thing that has made Canada what it is today.

Canada today is still undergoing that difficult and sometimes dangerous transition from war to a peacetime economy, and all of us are closely watching every economic index that records a change in business activity. But prosperity, unfortunately, is not a mere statistic. It is primarily a state of mind; and if we permit anything or anybody to destroy the confidence of the Canadian people, or to undermine their faith in the future, neither we nor the government can prevent a depression.

Now it would be wonderful, of course, if our economy always grew at a steady, unfaltering pace, but that never happens in any nation anywhere. To me it has always seemed that our economic progress is a good deal like the waves that break over the beach on the incoming tide. Each one comes roaring in, spends itself, and then recedes, but in doing so it contributes to the volume and the force of the next wave, which always comes in a little farther. Yet those who spend all their time watching the waves can become so obsessed with this process that they never observe the onward movement of the tide itself. And so it is, I think, with many of our pessimists today. They simply cannot see the tide for the waves. Many times, I am sure, there must have been those who felt that the tide had turned, but of course it never had, and it never will as long as freedom of opportunity and freedom of competitive enterprise continue to exist in this country. So let no one tell us that we have reached the end of our golden age; for this, in truth, is only the beginning. In my opinion, we stand on the doorstep of the greatest era of progress this nation has ever known. The problems ahead are difficult, but they are not insuperable if they are approached by men of good will with vigour and energy and primary dedication to the public interest.

In the state, as in the nation, there are two essentially different ways to administer government. One is to sit back and wait until difficulties become problems and problems becomes crises, waiting for these difficulties, problems and crises to solve themselves, or hoping for some easy solution to turn up. This is the easy way, the expedient way, the political way. It piles up the burdens for later years and later generations. In too many cases, time, instead of solving the difficulties, multiplies them, until they become emergencies. By failing to anticipate the problems and to plan ahead, by complacently refusing to face the facts, the problems can assume disastrous proportions. Then, instead of considered and provident action, emergency treatment becomes necessary.

The alternative way of government calls for frank, fearless and continuous looking ahead to see the difficulties before they grow into crises, and to try to do the things that need to be done to prevent them from developing into an acute stage. This calls for a calm but searching appraisal of the future needs of the people of the state. It calls for intelligent planning of how best to meet those needs, how, for example, to stimulate and encourage the necessary expansion of facilities, production and enterprise, public and private, and, of course, it calls for timely action to carry out this plan. This, in my judgment, is the only sound way of government.

I think, Mr. Speaker, we should consult among ourselves and take counsel to advance the interests of each and all. We should all examine and re-examine how we can best serve our common interests. With this as our goal and with God's help, we can move forward with boldness, with confidence and with faith. Our pride is a badge of unity and a common bond amongst us all. We should not seek to divide ourselves but to unite more closely than ever, and by uniting to knit even stronger the bonds of our common welfare.

I have the utmost faith in our Prime Minister, in the Minister of Finance and in the members of the cabinet that they are steering a proper course for the development of the greatest country in the world.

Much of our future will be of our own making, but some of our success will be made by others who go on and apply the knowledge, the materials and the processes we give them to different, and perhaps greater, uses than those for which they were originally intended. So I think it is with Canada. Here we are, a young nation with a great future. Already we are the world's third greatest trading nation, the fourth ranking industrial power, and the seventh steel producer. Surely, that is a record of which any nation would be proud. But it is only the beginning.

It has been said that the twentieth century belongs to Canada. That is true, but the statement does not do anything by itself. We have to make it become a fact; we have to claim it for ourselves; and believe me, Canadians are doing just that.

Let us look at it in this way. Youth is on our side. We are stepping out with all the vigour of youth into a new era in which we are equipped to choose our own road to success. We have the resources, the skills, the will and determination to do the job. By choosing the way of initiative and enterprise, operating in a free economy, Canada today stands in an enviable position. It is a land steeped in the traditions of political, personal and economic freedoms; enjoying prosperity and standing on the brink of greater things to come; it remains an outstanding example of the achievements of a modern industrial civilization.

The late Senator Taft, a great citizen, a great senator with an illustrious father, of the United States, said just a year or so before he passed away that the financial people in Washington would be well advised to go to Ottawa to study the Canadian financial structure. That is the remarkable statement he made pertaining to the financial structure of this great dominion. I think that was a very great tribute by a great man to a great country.

During the Easter holidays I made it my business to talk to many people about the budget. I did not talk just to Liberals, I talked to people of all political beliefs and in all walks of life. Almost each and every one of them said to me, "Yes, it was a great budget; we had looked for something like that but we hardly dared to expect so much". So I say to the Minister of Finance, "Carry on, you are doing a wonderful job for the people of Canada".

[Mr. Houck.]

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have indeed been interested in listening to the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck). Like all Liberals, he seems to be a disciple of Dr. Coué. There is only one thing that I was impressed with and that is this: the hon. member knows the part he must play as a member of the Liberal party. He is firmly imbued with the idea that he should be ready to talk at all times on behalf of his party and about the great successes and the manner in which this government has handled the affairs of Canada.

The hon. member does not quite realize that a government is composed of two parties. After the election is over the majority that is counted is Her Majesty's loyal government. But the minority is Her Majesty's loyal opposition and they have a duty to perform just the same as the government. We in the opposition are not going to be mesmerized by disciples of Coué who are ready to go up and down this country saying, "We are well; nothing could be better; there is nothing wrong; there is no depression"—I am not afraid to use the word depression; I am not going to call it a recession—"everybody is working". As a member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition I have a duty to perform for the people of Canada.

I am not satisfied that a country with all the natural resources which our friends have enumerated, with all the great potentialities that this country has, should be in the position we see outlined in our daily papers of having approximately 600,000 men out of work. On a recent trip to Europe I visited Italy and I was informed that they had approximately 15 million people more than that country could really support, a number almost equal to the population of Canada. They do not produce coal, timber, pulp, iron, metals of all kinds and the country is a poor farming country. Here we have all that. We say that there is unemployment in Italy and the poor people are not getting much to eat. Well, there are 600,000 people in this land about which we heard so much five minutes ago who would like to have jobs so that they could eat on the basis of their being Canadian citizens.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) was appointed to his lofty position I met a gentleman in Toronto who had never had the great pleasure I had of meeting the minister and who said to me, "This fellow Harris must be some man."

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: He is.

Mr. Ferguson: I said, "Hear, hear" at the time too, but I lived to apologize and blush when I heard the budget. After the budget had been out I met this same gentleman and he said to me, "Did that fellow they appointed Minister of Finance think up that budget or was it the Liberal cabinet?" I said, "What made you think that?" He said, "If the cabinet had anything to do with it it would be the mess it is now, but I cannot just conceive of a man whom they would appoint as Minister of Finance, after having that great honour bestowed on him, thinking up a budget as rotten as this one. It must have been entirely the work of the cabinet."

The hon. member for Niagara Falls said that all the friends he had encountered during the Easter recess had said it was a wonderful budget. If they or any other Liberal in this house or anybody else in the country can possibly conceive that an automobile which formerly sold at $2,400 and which is now to be sold at $2,325 will encourage buying of automobiles, in my opinion that would be the greatest stretch of the imagination possible. Any man who had come that near to having the purchase price of $2,400 for a Chevrolet car would not wait until he got the last $75 before buying a car.

If this government thinks that it is any inducement for a man with four children to go out and cut loose, and as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) says, we are all out for it; if they believe that the people are going all out with a 17 cents a week saving on income tax; if they think that that is going to stimulate the progress of this country, then they are doing some thinking.

What this country should have and what it could have had—not a five cent cigar but a twenty-five cent cigar as suggested by the Liberals—is a much better set-up if they had agreed to co-operate with industry, with provincial and municipal governments, with the immigration officials and with financial people across this country. They could have achieved an over-all plan for our economy.

We should be ashamed in this vast country of ours, with its untold wealth, to say that we had 5,000 unemployed from one end of Canada to the other. We should be crying for immigrants to come here and utilize our natural resources. We must hang our heads in shame when we realize our present position. This government is in power. The government is the only body with the necessary power, with any degree of authority to say to the provincial governments, "Forget politics." In Ontario they may have a great Tory government while there is a Liberal government of Canada. This government should have them all meet at a designated spot with the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Newfoundland, Quebec, British Columbia and all the rest. They should do what was done in the war and call in the best financial brains of the country openly and fearlessly and the top men of industry. That should be done before we have unemployment. They should attempt to widen the path of progress; they should be ready to go further along the path of progress. We are not interested in unemployment, we are interested in the development of the natural resources of this country.

What has been done? This is Liberal prosperity which the hon. member for Niagara Falls does not want me to mention as a member of the opposition. We had Liberal prosperity in 1939 when there were 800,000 people on relief. It was the greatest thing that ever happened to the Liberal government when Hitler declared prosperity for this country by calling a war. As late as December, 1939, there were 500,000 people registered on relief in spite of the fact that war had been going on for three months. The mayor of Midland came to Ottawa with a delegation and pleaded with the government to commence the building of ships at the shipyard at Midland. We had the finest shipyard on the great lakes at Collingwood, the town in which I live, and there were only 250 people working in that yard in 1940 with the war on. It took delegations, telegrams and full-page spreads in the newspapers before we were able to obtain the construction of ships for the war.

That is Liberal prosperity. Hitler called the war. Eventually this government was forced, through the war, to turn the wheels of industry. When we could export and utilize everything we could produce in this country we had about five years of prosperity. During the war we could not make automobiles and tires and we could not use many other things before our factories were changed over from war conditions. That took approximately two years. It has taken six years of the eight since the war to replenish the larders of this country with the necessities of life, and today the greatest undeveloped country in the world has 600,000 unemployed. I for one am not going to go through this country and say that we are doing a great job. We have been endeavouring to obtain manufacturing industries for this country. Pray God they do not hear about the actions of the Liberal government, or they will never come here. This is wishful thinking. When you hear these men who represent towns and who sit on the Liberal side of this house representing human beings here in parliament say that we are well off and doing a great job—shame on them. They get up here and say that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is the greatest that Canada ever had, or that the hon. Mr. So-and-so can never be beaten. They say that he is a Canadian baby and that surely he was never born in a foreign country with intelligence like that. That is the sort of silly nonsense that you hear. The Minister of Finance until recently held the portfolio of minister of immigration. Here is a clipping from a newspaper and I presume that there is some truth in it. Twenty-six Italians entered this country by means of faked passports or forged documents of some kind obtained through government officials, and these men are being asked to return to Italy. They believed that they entered this country in good faith. They are Canadians. I believe that any people who set foot on the shores of Canada, if they are honest, God-fearing and workers, are Canadians. That to me is the mark of a Canadian, not the fact that he is born in Canada; he may be a loafer and not entitled to the name of Canadian. If there is a semblance of truth in this newspaper report and these Canadians came to this country in good faith, they should never be returned to Italy unless they wish to go back to Italy of their own accord.

Coming back from my trip to Europe, I came in to the port of Halifax, but leaving I went via Saint John. I suppose that the previous speaker would expect me to say that this was a great job. When my wife and I entered Liverpool, we left our stateroom at eight o'clock in the morning, we went through customs and immigration with people from all parts of Europe and from Australia. We had our breakfast by ten o'clock, and the boat train left the dock with passengers headed for European ports and Australia, all cleared.

When we left England and went to Europe, we landed in Calais. The Calais boat was packed with people going to various destinations throughout Europe. We went through customs and immigration, and within one and a half hours we were on the ship with passengers leaving for various destinations. On the way back from Europe, it was the same procedure.

When we arrived in the great country of Canada, which has no faults and should not be criticized, having a great government, our luggage was deposited on the docks at Halifax at three o'clock in the afternoon. At nine o'clock I was still standing freezing in the immigration and customs building, which had been built under the supervision of this government. I was there with a whole shipload of people, my overcoat on and my collar turned up. There was not a single spot where I could purchase any food, and all these newcomers, as well as Canadians returning to Canada, were suffering the same treatment. My luggage arrived from the dock at nine o'clock in the evening. I could obtain a cup of coffee, with milk and sugar splashed into it without any request. After I stayed 20 minutes in a line and finally reached a door that wide, I had this stuff slopped at me.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Was it in a trough?

Mr. Ferguson: It might just as well have been in a trough. However, I busied myself in trying to obtain cups of hot coffee for new Canadians, particularly women with little children arriving in this country. They had great difficulty standing in that line and keeping control of their children. The little souls were crying for food and were asking for water and coffee. If you can visualize a newcomer to this great Canada of ours holding two or three children and trying to balance three or four cups of coffee in her hand, that is some sight. That is in the immigration hall built by this great government of ours. The people eventually got on a train for different parts of Canada. The train was freezing cold, and every one of them wore their overcoats in the modern railway carriages in this great country of ours. You are going to get some facts, gentlemen. They slept with their coats on in this train. Two superintendents of that railway line got on the train and apologized for the conditions. Before we arrived at about twelve o'clock in Montreal—

Mr. Nicholson: What time did you leave Halifax?

Mr. Ferguson: At twelve o'clock the night before.

Mr. Herridge: Was it by C.P.R. or C.N.R.?

Mr. Ferguson: I am not trying to say who is to blame. I want to say what should be done by an inefficient government so that the people of Canada can really progress and unemployment will be relieved. That is all I am trying to do. I am not trying to put my finger on any group. I am trying to tell this government that it is not yet too late to reduce the number of unemployed and to proceed with the prosperity of Canada—to become more like the men who built the C.P.R. railroad, and the other men who fought for the development of the great Dominion of Canada, the Tories. I am telling the government to try to emulate to some degree the past history of the great Conservative party of this country. If they do so they will stay in power; if they do not they will go out at the next election, because their sins will find them out.

We arrived in Montreal at twelve o'clock. The train was shunted to the assembly unit. There was no heat in the carriages. Mr. Minister, I will secure for you a list of all the passengers on board the Scythia and send them a copy of this speech, to see whether I am telling the truth or not. They will all say that it is a fact. At approximately three in the morning a spark of heat came on in those cars. Those who were headed for Winnipeg were on the same train as I was. Another train went to Toronto. The Montrealers got off there, and I landed at Ottawa station, in the capital of Canada, with 10 or 15 people. One woman was coming to see her daughter who was married to a man in the Royal Canadian Air Force. She was approximately 70 years of age. There was not a semblance of a porter, a redcap or anyone else to take the luggage which they had brought with them for a two or three weeks' visit. That was not any overnight bag.

I searched around the station and found a polite and courteous railroad employee who had nothing to do with helping people to take their baggage to the warmth of the station; but he condescended or consented to take hold of a truck and together we loaded the baggage on the truck and brought the people into the warmth of the station with their baggage. These were people who could not carry their luggage. They were too old to do so. They should not have been asked to do it. That was 6.30 in the morning. That was their greeting in Canada's capital.

If the government does not know about these things, it should know about them. Those are things about which this government should call a conference and co-operate with its railroads. I am not saying which railroad was involved. But if that condition occurs on both our railroads, call them both in so that, if one is to blame, the other will not do the same thing on another occasion. Or if they are calling the provinces together, if this government is to blame, let them take the blame and see that it does not occur again. Do not worry about the premier of one province saying, "Oh, you people are always making mistakes". But the people we blame are those who make mistakes and continue to repeat them. In my opinion this government is continuing to repeat its mistakes, and has done so almost since the day it first came into power; and that is a long time unfortunately for Canada.

Today we in Canada are headed toward the same conditions with which we were confronted in 1939. I heard that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said he did not like to hear people talking blue ruin, that conditions were almost normal and that unemployment was seasonal. I say to this government, to any provincial government or to any group of people that can alleviate suffering and create employment that this is one country on the face of the globe that should say, "We need immigrants; we have absolutely no employable person who is out of work." That is the position for Canada to be in.

We cannot be satisfied because we are a little better off than, say, England. As a matter of fact, we are not as well off as England. We cannot be satisfied by saying, "England has 100,000 unemployed and we have only 15,000 who can become employed and want employment." We are in the position where we cannot say we have 5,000 people who want to work and are unemployed, having regard to the vastness of Canada, its wealth and the millions of people who are desirous of coming here and helping us to build.

It is not too late to put ourselves in the position that Canada should be in. We should have industries that we do not have today coming from Europe and establishing here. We should be creating new industries. Our ships should be going back and forth from various parts of Europe relieving those people over there who want to live in a land of plenty, and bringing them in here to do the work that should be done, in order to build this country up in a lifetime not to 15 million but to 75 million. Those are not big figures. That is not nonsensical talk at all.

Here we are a country with 15 million people. Well can I remember my father saying this to me on Portage avenue in Winnipeg, and he was then younger than I am today when he said it. He looked at the excavation for the great T. Eaton Company store on Portage avenue on a Sunday morning and he said, "Son, when you are my age this country will have 50 million people." I am now past the age that my father was when he made that remark. Through the mismanagement of Conservative and Liberal governments, the old dotards of the past, we find ourselves with 15 million people. It will be noted that I say the dotards of the Conservative party of the past also. I am not my grandfather and neither are these men in this government their grandfathers. We are alive and have the benefit of the examples of the past and the experience of the past. Those men in the government should not do the things their grandfathers did. They should have learned that people ought not to sleep in parliament.

They should go ahead, relieve unemployment, encourage immigration and let this be the most prosperous country in the world.

It is all very well for us to crow about this being a land of milk and honey. But we find that people coming into this great land of milk and honey are not able to obtain work. They are capable of working irrespective of their nationalities. They are good workmen irrespective of their nationalities. They begged, borrowed or stole their passage money. They are looking for work in this land of plenty. What do they find in the year 1955? They find conditions almost equal to those of 1939. At that particular time there was in power the same government that is in power today. During the election during the war and after the war they shouted about the great Liberal prosperity. As I have said before in this house, this government takes the credit for putting the oil in the ground in Alberta and for putting the nickel in the mines in Sudbury. The Kaiser used to say "Me and God". This government does not include God. The Kaiser was at least a bit honest, but not this government. They talk about the great Liberal prosperity, the growth of Niagara Falls, the immigrants coming into Niagara Falls, Collingwood's growth, 1,100 people employed in the shipyards during the war. Today there are 500, and if there is no new work that is not on the boards today, by the end of July the number will be down to 250. There are 800 people registered for relief in the town from which I come which has a population of 8,000.

If the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck) thinks he can cow me into being quiet, he is mistaken. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) laughs. He knows that is true. He knows that in the part of the country from which he comes the condition is serious. It is not a matter to laugh over. Maybe I could do so if I were minister of finance. As the hon. member for Niagara Falls said, some people think this is a great budget. But I do not think that any member of the government has any right to crow or to laugh when he knows that a town near where he was born, namely the town of Collingwood, has 800 people on its unemployment rolls today, in this land of plenty. Maybe that is a provincial matter. Maybe it is a matter of co-operation with the provincial government. But let the members of this government stand on their feet and say who is to blame. Let them say that they cannot get the provinces to co-operate. Let them say that the great industrialists will not co-operate or that the financial institutions of Canada will not co-operate. They would not dare do that because they know it would be a challenge that would be taken up by all those governments, institutions and peoples that I have mentioned. They would come here only too willingly to do what can be done to make Canada grow, with its great wealth, to a far greater extent than it has ever grown under the guidance of this Liberal government up to date. That is my reply to the budget.

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada, living in a desert of Liberalism, have recently witnessed a mirage. It was obvious, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) brought down his first budget, that it was one of the greatest deceits the Liberal government has ever imposed upon the people of Canada. The budget, couched in misty terms, is nothing but a mirage. The minister touted the income tax reductions and pointed out how they ranged from 13·3 per cent for those in the lower income tax brackets to 2·8 per cent for those in the higher brackets, when actually it was a 2 per cent reduction across the board. The minister placed the mirage at a distance in the hope that by the time the people became aware of the results the matters would be forgotten.

Let us examine what this hoax will give the people of Canada. A single person with a taxable income of $1,500 will save $5 this year or $10 in a full year. That is the minister's 13·3 per cent. If he has an income of $3,000 he will save $20 this year or $40 in a full year, whereas an individual with an income of $100,000 will save $4,000 in a full year. A married man with two children having a taxable income of $3,000 will save $7 this year or $14 in a full year. A married man with two children having an income of $30,000 will save $644. Indeed it is nothing but deception to tell the people of Canada they are being given a tax reduction of 13·3 per cent when the tax reduction is 2 per cent and ranges in amount from $5 to $7 to $40.

Had the minister wanted to give tax relief to those in the lower income brackets he could very well have increased the exemptions from $1,000 to $1,500 for a single person and from $2,000 to $3,000 for a married person. I do not think there is anyone in Canada today who can expect to live on the present exemptions allowed by the government. By increasing these exemptions tax relief would have been given directly and in significant proportions to over a million Canadians.

Mr. Harris: How much would it cost?

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): It would have cost $60 million, according to the figures I took from the tax statistics. That is by adding the income of all those in the $1,500 bracket as opposed to the $1,000 bracket, and in the $3,000 bracket as opposed to the $2,000 bracket.

Mr. Harris: Did you take that through the whole scale?

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): I took it through the whole scale. I would assume that by giving tax relief to those in the still lower income tax brackets you would have still had a figure lower than the $128 million in tax relief that the minister has granted by giving $4,000 to the man with a $100,000 income and $5 to the man with a $1,500 income. In this way tax relief would have been given to that large portion which is so urgently in need of purchasing power in a time of economic difficulty and severe unemployment in Canada. It was pointed out by my leader that if the government had desired to give relief to those really in need of it, that large and significant portion who unfortunately do not make enough money to pay income tax, they could have abolished or at least reduced the sales tax which is now levied at a 10 per cent rate on most necessities of life. The minister could have changed the social security tax so it would have some progressive features.

In looking over the minister's appraisal of economic conditions in Canada, I find that he wandered into his own mirage in assuming that the decline in the gross national product was due almost entirely to the poor wheat crop. I live in a large farming area in Saskatchewan. I do not know a single farmer who has been unable to deliver all the grain for which there has been room. We find we have a carry-over in Canada of 570 million bushels for export. I think the minister should have been aware of the fact that since the beginning of the crop year on August 1 deliveries of wheat from the farm are nearly 100 million bushels below the ten-year average.

Deliveries from the farm this year are 158 million bushels. Last year they were 268 million bushels, whereas the ten-year average is 257 million bushels. I think the purchasing power that would have been given to the farmers by this extra 100 million bushels of wheat, had they been able to deliver it, would have been a significant factor in giving our economy some purchasing power. I think it is significant that not only are deliveries of grain from the farm the lowest since the war but we also have the highest unemployment since the war. I think those are two sides of the same coin. We have deliveries at an all-time low since the war and we have unemployment at well over 600,000.

We find the government showing no particular concern for the plight of the farmer other than as an excuse for the decline in the gross national product. If they were really concerned I think they would be giving more consideration to the final payment on last year's crop which would at least give the farmers some purchasing power. The farmers in the western provinces have only been able to deliver two to four bushels of low-grade wheat per specified acre. When you consider that the price of some of this wheat is 85 to 90 cents a bushel and figure what two bushels an acre will give a farmer farming on a modest scale, I am sure you can understand the plight in which he finds himself.

We had the assurance from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that the final payment on the crop would be made before seeding. At least, he hoped so, and he expressed himself in such a manner as to remove all doubt. It is apparent that the farmers of western Canada must wait until the Minister of Trade and Commerce returns from his world tour to announce the payment. We will perhaps be lucky if the payment is 5 to 7 cents a bushel, and the farmers will not receive it before seeding. In fact, they will be lucky if they receive it before they start on their second summerfallowing operations.

Anyone who has travelled through the farming areas of Saskatchewan or who comes from there is fully aware of the hazards of farming. They are aware of the fact that an insect can plague your crop and make it disappear practically overnight or that plant diseases such as the recent rust epidemic can result in total loss. They will realize how the drought of the thirties shrivelled up crops and left nothing in the heads and how excess moisture, on the other hand, can have the same disastrous result. Then there is the damage caused by hail, wind and weather throughout every operation.

When the farmers have overcome the hazards of the weather, harvested their crops, made up their tax returns and paid their tax, they are then confronted with the greatest hazard of all, the uncertainty of the whims and vagaries of the Department of National Revenue. Upon filing your return you are assessed, but the assessment often means nothing. Perhaps you will receive the assessment from the Department of National Revenue within a year, and you will continue to make out your subsequent returns assuming that the assessment made of your revenue was correct.

However, we find that the department can go back six years from the date of the last assessment. We find, perhaps in an unusual circumstance, that if the assessment for 1946 were received in 1950, the department can go back six years from 1946. In other words, they can go back to 1940. It is stated in the law that they can go back six years which, in effect, means seven years, since the assessment is usually made in the year after the tax year; and this will amount to eight calendar years.

I do not believe there is so much variation in the cost of production in the various tax areas throughout Canada that it should be necessary to take this length of time to properly assess a farmer's income tax. I should think that in my area of Saskatchewan, served by the Saskatoon office, it would be quite possible to process these tax returns in two years, and give a correct tax assessment.

What do we find happening to the farmer who, as I pointed out, has survived the hazards of the weather? Well, one day he might be confronted by two inquisitive gentlemen who, often without indicating their position, will proceed to question him. The standard practice is for one of them to ask the questions and the other to sit in the background with a pencil and a large notebook.

The typical approach is to ask the farmer what he thinks of the allowance for the cost of living. The farmer, having some knowledge of the cost of living, will say, "Well, gosh, I don't know; things are awfully high". The gentleman will say, "How much does it cost for you to live a year?" The farmer will say "Oh, I don't know, gosh, things are awfully high". "Let's figure it out. How much does it cost to feed your family?" "Oh, I don't know". "Well, we will put down a figure", which they do. "How much does it cost for clothing?" "Oh, things are awfully high". "Would it be about $300?" "Oh, I don't know". So then the second gentleman, who has been writing down the answers, will come up with a cost of living figure of, let us say, $3,000 a year.

Then they will divulge who they are. They will say they are auditors from the income tax branch, and they have found upon checking his returns for the last five years that he has shown a net income of $15,000. But over five years his cost of living at $3,000 a year is $15,000. "Now, what do you know about that? It is obvious that you have gypped us in income tax, and owe us a thousand dollars". Well, the farmer has admitted that was the cost of living. The man was right there writing it down, and they have assessed him on that basis.

Or they might try a different approach. They might ask him, "What car did you buy in 1946? How much did you sell it for? What did you buy after that?" And sooner or later, knowing how good the average memory is, the farmer will make a mistake. Then the departmental inspector will point out, "Oh, no, you did not get $1,300 for that car; you got $1,900. There is a capital gain of $600", and the farmer immediately becomes confused. He just does not know what to say, or what he should not say. After this questioning the farmer is completely cowed by the brain-washing of the investigator, and in all probability he has been assessed for a figure that bears only a slight resemblance to the true figure.

It is not long before word spreads around the community that the gestapo are in town, cross checking, investigating, intimidating and frightening. And just who are these men? I am not for one moment accusing all of them of doing this with any intent of being deceitful. I think most of the income tax inspectors are trying to do their jobs conscientiously. But under the existing act there are certain procedures they must follow. They are out to collect money, and they are going to collect it.

I have obtained from the civil service of Canada an advertisement asking for auditors of income tax for the taxation division, and I was most interested in what are considered to be the desirable qualifications of those men, who are to receive $4,080 to $4,620 per annum. Their duties, among other things, are to assess farm and small business returns. The applicant must have graduation from a university of recognized standing, with specialization in commerce, business administration, finance or accounting, and at least three years' accounting experience, preferably auditing, in the office of a professional public accountant, and so on and so on.

Nowhere along the line is there any mention of any agricultural experience. They do not need to know what a tractor, or a kernel of wheat looks like. Knowing farming as I do, if you have an old Case tractor, for example, and do not have the carburetor adjusted properly, you can pour three and a half or four gallons of fuel an hour through the old brute without any difficulty. As a result gasoline consumption on your farm will be twice what it should be. If you did not keep every receipt from the company from which you bought your fuel you might be approached by this accountant, a man who might not know a Case tractor from a steam engine. He would say, "Well, you can't do that. According to accounting practice, it is so and so." And if the departmental officials are not satisfied with the answers given by the farmer they can always ask him to make out a net worth statement.

For those who are not familiar with the net worth statement let me say that in most instances it is a complete reversal of British justice. In this connection I should like to quote from the second edition of the Canadian Encyclopedic Digest where, at page 398, they deal with making the arbitrary assessment on a net worth basis, and say:

> An assessment based on the "net worth method" raises a presumption of validity in its favour that must be met by the taxpayer. The taxpayer must establish affirmatively that his taxable income was not that for which he was assessed. It is not sufficient in meeting this onus to establish a possibility that the amounts as shown in the financial statement prepared by the income tax officials are incorrect.

You can see at once the unfortunate position in which the farmer is placed when he is asked to make out a net worth statement. They will assess you arbitrarily for a certain amount and then say, "Prove me wrong." The farmer may be forced to make out a net worth statement for a period of six years, covering his assets for that period of time and contrasting those assets with those of another period of time. It is a fairly complicated procedure and, in many instances, lawyers or accountants making out these returns charge as much as $200 or $300. They are made up at the insistence of the income tax branch, which does not allow the individual to deduct the fee the lawyer charges him.

In connection with the making out of the net worth statement, I have received a copy of a very interesting form the farmer is asked to fill out. It requires information concerning personal expenditures over a period of years, and the document has eight columns. On it there are 25 items one is expected to fill in, so the income tax branch will have a complete estimate of the amount of money he has received.

This is a very interesting document indeed. "Food purchased during the year." "How much food did you buy in 1947, 1948?" and so on. "Food produced". "How much did you spend on fuel?" Well, you might have a record of it and you might not. "Clothing purchased"—and you fill this out for eight years. "How many clothes did you buy in 1946"—or 1947? "Household furnishings; household replacements; bedding; recreation; charitable donations." "Oh yes, I remember going to a show in 1947. There is 50 cents I forgot." How ridiculous can you get? Also "travelling expenses; wedding or funeral expenses."

The farmer is asked to fill out eight columns on this form covering a period of time ranging up to seven or eight years past. I am not certain just how many copies the department asks to have submitted, but the thing I want to point out is the ridiculousness of asking anyone, no matter who he may be, to make out a statement of this kind; because no one, or at least very few, would keep a record of how many wedding gifts he had given in 1947 or 1948. Therefore, why subject the farmers to such a test of their intelligence?

As I mentioned, the farmers receive their assessments year after year, with perhaps only minor adjustments. They, therefore assume that they are paying the correct tax, but five or six years later the department will disallow certain items of depreciation and bill the farmer for perhaps several hundreds of dollars. If it happens in a year like this the Department of National Revenue shows no leniency, because I hold in my hand a garnishee of an entire bank account of $609.39 of a farmer in my constituency, which was collected to pay income tax. The department will argue that the man had made the money and therefore he should pay it. No consideration is given to the fact that the farmer has marketed only two bushels of wheat per acre.

I have another statement which shows that since September 1, 22 writs have been issued by the Department of National Revenue in one of the towns in my constituency. Therefore it is apparent that the department is intent on only one thing, namely collecting money from the farmers of the western provinces. Such an unsavoury mess exists that the farmers would prefer a production tax with all its inequalities and injustices. Recently on the political scene in Saskatchewan the Gardiner machine has seemed to break down. I should like to point out that until they get the McCann machine fixed up, the Gardiner machine will continue to break down.

One of the greatest injustices that existed under the Income Tax Act was the amendment in 1949, which was made retroactive. It will be noticed that in the budget the minister brought down the 2 per cent tax reduction given to corporations was made retroactive, but in that instance the arm's-length clause was made retroactive. In Saskatchewan because of the time the province was settled, many of the farmers are reaching retirement age. We all realize the difficulty of establishing younger persons on the farm; therefore a farmer will decide to give his son the privilege of buying his farm to get him started in the farming business.

What do we find? We find that the son gets treatment different from that given an absolute stranger. An absolute stranger can make a bona fide agreement to buy the equipment and buildings and depreciate them at the amount paid. What of the son? He cannot do that. Because of this arm's-length clause the son is not able to depreciate them at any more than the undepreciated value of the machinery as it exists. What is making it particularly difficult—and I wish the minister would look into the manifestations of this clause, because it was made retroactive without notice—is that transactions made in good faith that took place in 1947, 1948 or 1949 are subjected to the arm's-length clause, which did not exist at the time the transactions were made. If a transaction was not made in good faith and was not a bona fide agreement I could see some excuse for the department disallowing the depreciation charged. This factor is making it very difficult indeed for a son to start up and take over where his father left off.

In some instances all that needs to be done is this; and I hope there are enough people familiar with this so they can save themselves the difficulties that others have been subjected to. If it is a transaction between a father and a son, what the father does is take out the machinery and haul it into the machine agent and say, "I'll give you $5 if you will buy this machinery and sell it all back to my son at the same price." The son then takes it back to the farm. In that way he can get away from the arm's-length clause and the transaction is perfectly valid.

We find another aspect of the departmental work that is particularly annoying to the farmers in the three prairie provinces is its inefficiency. I recall a case that was brought to my attention. The farmer pointed out that he had filed his return and in a few days received a refund of $100. The department said, "You paid us too much; you did not owe that much." Well, the farmer was quite pleased, but in three months' time he received a registered letter from the department saying, "We made a mistake; you did owe us the $100. Pay it back with interest." I found that quite interesting and I asked the farmer to give me a little more information. He said, "Gosh, no; I don't want to get into any trouble with those fellows."

The officials operating under the Income Tax Act have put the fear of the Lord, or the fear of something, into the farmers of Saskatchewan. As I pointed out, they are able to deal with the weather but they are not able to deal with the various rulings made by the departmental officials. I recall another instance where a farmer had a building destroyed by a cyclone. He had just built it. He was forced to build it, as a matter of fact, to house his grain, and was just putting the roof on when the cyclone came along and blew the whole thing down. Had it not been blown down he could have depreciated it at 5 per cent over its useful life; but since it was blown down and no longer existed, he is allowed no depreciation and is out $4,600.

While I am on this matter of depreciation may I say that it is most unfortunate that over the past years, when we have had congestion on the farms, consideration has not been given to the rightful claims of the farmers to be given accelerated depreciation for granaries constructed on the farms. I realize that we must have a certain number of granaries to store the crops. In some instances farmers have had to build granaries to store twice the crops they would normally store, and as this congestion wears off they will have empty shells sitting on the prairies waiting for a cyclone. It will not make much difference, because they get so little depreciation now, they might as well get none at all.

If the department do not feel they should give the complete depreciation I wish they would consider giving an accelerated depreciation on a certain percentage of the buildings. Suppose accelerated depreciation were given to the farmer on all the grain storage built in addition to that required to house two-thirds of the average yield on two-thirds of his cultivated acreage. He could have the normal depreciation on anything up to that limit. Naturally, the space he would require over and above that should be depreciated in three years.

I am also interested, Mr. Speaker, in another feature of farm income tax. It will be noticed that in the United States farmers are permitted to charge off soil and water conservation against current income up to 25 per cent of the gross farm income. A very significant change has been made in the United States income tax legislation making this allowance. In Canada this is deemed to be a capital gain. You might on occasion have a deep gully washed out in your land, and might have to pay $50 to have it filled in to restore the land to its previous condition. But that is considered to be capital gain and you cannot deduct it for income tax purposes.

There is another very interesting aspect to income tax as it operates in Canada, and that is the tax paid by farmers in the various provinces. I should like to place on record the figures for the 1952 income tax year, which are the latest we have and which come from the tax statistics. They are as follows:

Prince Edward Island	$ 70,000
Nova Scotia	40,000
New Brunswick	66,000
Quebec	233,000
Ontario	2,647,000
Manitoba	1,707,000
Saskatchewan	13,268,000
Alberta	8,350,000
British Columbia	1,075,000

We find that in that year Saskatchewan farmers paid $13,268,000 as compared to a total of $14,186,000 for all farmers in the rest of Canada. Another interesting aspect is the number of farm assessors in the different provinces, which is as follows:

Prince Edward Island	3
Nova Scotia	5
New Brunswick	4
Quebec	14
Ontario	80
Manitoba	31
Saskatchewan	55
Alberta	40
British Columbia	11

We find that in Ontario and Quebec there are 3,024 farmers per assessor whereas in the western provinces the number is 1,973 farmers per assessor. We find that in Quebec there are 9,595 farmers per assessor as compared with 2,036 in Saskatchewan. If the minister thinks I believe the farmers of Ontario and Quebec are not paying their share of income tax he perhaps would not be too far wrong, but what I want to point out is that it is stated in the Income Tax Act that you must maintain books and records. I believe it is the function of assessors to go around to make sure the farmers are keeping books and records. I have a copy of a letter from the income tax department which points out the necessity of keeping books and records, and it concludes by asking the farmer to advise when he has complied with the above request. It would appear that the 14 income tax assessors in the province of Quebec will require additional help if they are going to call on 134,336 farmers and ask them to keep proper records.

These are some aspects of the manner in which the income tax department has been operating. I think you will agree that there are some changes and improvements which could be made. As I pointed out, the farmers have been intimidated by the departmental officials, and it is very difficult to get statements from them. They refuse to give you information. I would like the minister to see what he can do about correcting some of these most flagrant injustices.

In conclusion I should like to state that I am in wholehearted support of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I think the provisions of that amendment are most necessary and they certainly apply to the government of the day. The amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), my leader, asks for governmental assistance to the provinces in connection with such things as a national health plan, a road program and federal aid to education, all of which have from time to time been emphasized by resolutions by the C.C.F. but ignored by the government.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to rise and speak in this debate. First of all I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance not only upon his presentation of the budget this year but also upon the constructive and courageous budget he has brought before us. I think it is significant that members of the opposition groups have found a great deal of difficulty in dealing with this budget in the critical manner expected of them. Certainly if we are to judge from the general public reaction to this budget and the reaction of the leading newspapers of Canada, their task is most difficult indeed.

I think I can indicate to hon. members the general public reaction to the budget and the reaction of leading Canadian newspapers by describing a cartoon which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald the morning after the budget was presented and which many hon. members may not have had an opportunity of seeing. This was the work of the well-known and highly-regarded cartoonist of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald, Bob Chambers. The picture depicted a newly-wedded bride who could be easily recognized as the Minister of Finance. She was placing before her new husband, representing the "little man", the public, a cake. The title of the cartoon was "Her First Cake". The look of delighted satisfaction on the face of the husband, representing the public, spoke volumes for the public acceptance of and pleasure in the budget which the Minister of Finance had brought down. I would suggest that if the minister has not received the original of that cartoon the publisher of the paper should be good enough to send it to him so he can perhaps frame it and preserve it on his office wall.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

Private Bill

PRIVATE BILL

SHARP & DOHME (CANADA) LIMITED

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 349, respecting Sharp & Dohme (Canada) Ltd.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member going to explain this bill?

Mr. McIlraith: I was ready to do so just as soon as Mr. Speaker had finished, but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was able to voice his interjection before that time had arrived.

Mr. Knowles: I wanted to be sure the hon. member had a chance to speak. We have not heard from him for quite a while.

Mr. McIlraith: There are members in the house who think it is not wise to be heard too frequently.

Mr. Speaker, the bill before the house seeks authority to grant to a patent application an effective filing date of July 20, 1950. The necessity for the legislation arises out of the somewhat technical requirements of our patent law and procedure in dealing with applications. In 1947 an application under No. 564079 was filed and dealt with. By amendments to the regulations under the Canadian Patent Act there is procedure for what is known as supplementary disclosure, covering subsequent discoveries related to any patent application pending before the patent office. In this particular case a further application by way of supplementary disclosure was made in 1950, because of further research work that had been done on the subject matter of the patent.

This application by way of supplementary disclosure procedure was rejected and it was held that a new application was required, but by the time the application by way of supplementary disclosure was rejected the statutory period for filing the new application had lapsed, and the consequence of the procedure is that the applicants are not able to have the patent granted through the regular channels under the patent legislation.

As I say, the procedure is somewhat technical, and I have perhaps oversimplified it a little. I think it would be the wish of hon. members when dealing with it in committee to go into the whole matter in some detail, but I doubt that it is practicable or possible to give a much fuller explanation at this stage that would be of a helpful nature to hon. members in considering the matter. I therefore ask for the second reading and then the reference to the committee.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite).]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Private and public bills now having been disposed of, the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Speaker, as all hon. members had an opportunity during the Easter recess to return to their constituencies and consult with those whom they represent in this house, I am sure those of us who support this government returned very much encouraged by the public acceptance of this budget. I am sure that hon. members opposite do not come back to take part in the budget debate in any way aided or comforted in the task before them.

In the debate this afternoon the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) in the course of his remarks referred to experiences which he underwent on his return from Europe a few weeks ago, when he landed at the port of Halifax. I am not going to deal in any great detail with what the hon. member had to say, not having been there at the particular time to which he referred. I am unaware of the actual facts involved. However, I do know that the building to which he referred mainly in his remarks is not only newly built but is a building which at the time he was there was, and indeed still is, under construction. I would point out to the house that the inconvenience and difficulties which he experienced were obviously the result of the upsetting and unusual conditions which always exist when a building is required to be used for its normal purposes while it is in the course of construction or substantial renovation.

I can assure the hon. member and the house that so far as the treatment of immigrants and other passengers landing at the port of Halifax is concerned, the evidence I have seen is completely contrary to the evidence that was given in this house this afternoon by the hon. member. I have on many occasions been present when large numbers of immigrants and other passengers were being handled by the immigration facilities at Halifax. I have seen the facilities provided there for them, the speed and courtesy with which the necessary formalities of customs inspection and other matters are carried out, and the general satisfaction shown by those who go through the normal procedure of landing at that port. I have seen many completely unsolicited letters written to individuals and officials at the port of Halifax thanking them for the extreme courtesy and care that has been shown in dealing with newly-arrived Canadians, particularly, and the general public as well.

Mr. Speaker, my real purpose in entering this debate is to deal with a question which is, I think, of considerable importance and interest to this house and to the Canadian people. Statements have been made in this debate by several hon. members opposite, and indeed they have been made outside this house by the same members and others, to the effect that we in this country export an undue proportion of our natural resources in the raw and unprocessed state. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), particularly, in the last day or so have made assertions of this kind in contributions to this debate. The well-worn phrase, "the hewers of wood and drawers of water" has been used. The suggestion has been made and the impression left that government policies are at fault and that there exists a situation which is unhealthy and not in the best interests of Canada.

I want to deal with this matter on a factual basis, to try to point out just what is the real situation and then deal with some of its implications for the Canadian economy and the Canadian people. First of all I should like to make two or three preliminary points. The first is that Canada is the greatest trading nation in the world on a per capita basis. This trade and the resultant Canadian prosperity has been built up in the only way that was possible, namely by producing the things we can produce and which can be sold on the world market, and producing them better and more cheaply than they can be obtained from other sources.

The second point is that if we take a narrow point of view it is possible to say with truth that to manufacture completely in Canada the raw materials we produce would provide to Canada, in the form of income and employment, the maximum return which can be achieved from those particular materials. However, in my view it is not true to argue from that particular statement to the general statement and say that it follows that the maximum benefit of resources development in Canada would accrue to us by insisting upon complete manufacture of all our raw materials before they leave this country. Our experience and, I believe, that of other countries, seems to me to prove that a sound program of resources development cannot be built on such a narrow foundation. What is perhaps even more important, I think our experience proves that a broad program of resources development creates the only possible basis on which any substantial development of secondary industries can be built.

The third point I should like to make is that we ourselves are dependent on imports of raw materials. I do not think it is generally recognized or understood that we in this country are, in fact, net importers of industrial raw materials. We hear a great deal about Canada being a great storehouse of natural resources and that the world is becoming increasingly dependent on Canadian raw materials. Those statements are true. But what Canadians do not realize is the fact that we are a net importer of the raw materials that go into our industrial production.

For example, in 1953 our exports of industrial raw materials amounted in value to some $300 million. These included nickel, pulpwood, iron ore, asbestos, copper, zinc and other similar products. Our imports of industrial raw materials in the same year amounted to about $550 million, covering such things as crude petroleum, coal, raw cotton, iron ore, raw wool, crude rubber, etc. Hence we are a net importer of industrial raw materials to the extent of about a quarter of a billion dollars.

What is the explanation of our dependence on these imports? Canada has a rapidly growing industrial economy which requires raw materials which we do not produce or which we have not in this country, but which we are obliged to go out and buy, sometimes at extremely high costs. We believe in buying in the cheapest markets in the world, and we get our imports from the cheapest sources. But the point I want to make is that those who are critical of our exports of raw materials would do well to recognize and keep in mind the dependence of our secondary industries on imports of essential materials which we ourselves do not possess.

Let us look at the facts of our trade. I am going to use 1953 because that is the last year for which final figures are available. The principal raw materials we export are agricultural and vegetable products consisting mainly of food; animal and animal products, which also are to a large extent food; non-ferrous metals; non-metallic minerals and their products; and wood and wood products. In 1953 the proportion of our total exports which were raw materials was 32·2 per cent. The proportion of our total exports that were partially manufactured or semi-processed was 28·9 per cent and the proportion of those which were fully manufactured was 38·9 per cent.

The first point of importance to recognize in these figures is that the largest segment of our export trade is in fully manufactured goods. The second is that the value of our exports of fully manufactured goods was $1,600 million in round figures. The value of our raw material exports was $1,328 million. In spite of all that has been said by hon. members opposite and others, the first fact to remember is the preponderance of fully manufactured goods in our export trade. The second is that adding the proportion of semi-manufactured goods in our export trade, the total amounts to 67·8 per cent. In other words, two-thirds of our export trade consists of fully manufactured and semi-manufactured goods, combined with only one-third left for the export of raw materials.

A closer examination of these figures brings out some even more striking facts. Of our total raw material exports, approximately 80 per cent are agricultural and vegetable products, wheat, feed grains and various kinds of food products. These things are exports which must almost inevitably leave this country in their raw state because they are designed for either human or animal consumption. If we add to these agricultural and vegetable products the category of animal and animal products the proportion rises considerably more, in fact to over 85 per cent. In other words if we were to try, as was suggested by the hon. member for Broadview, to make some extreme, and I think impractical, efforts to reduce the proportion of our exports which are in the category of raw materials, we would either have to stop exporting wheat and feed grains and that sort of thing or try to work on a mere 15 per cent of our total export trade.

One result of the speeches and statements that have been made on this subject by hon. members opposite has been, I think, to create in the minds of the Canadian public an idea that our resources development industries are in some way in the category of poor relations in the Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker, I think nothing could possibly be further from the fact. Canada's resources industries in 1953 provided jobs for 1·6 million Canadians, or 31 per cent of Canada's total labour force. Thirty-four per cent of Canada's national income of $19 billion was earned by Canadians working in these industries, and 56½ per cent of the Canadian investment program undertaken by business, amounting to $3½ billion, was devoted to the development, the growth and the extraction of our natural resources from our lands, our forests and our waters.

We all recognize, Mr. Speaker, how important to the Canadian economy has been our great investment program, amounting to over $5 billion last year, and I think it would be most unfair to that great segment of our economy, the resources development industry, not to recognize that almost two-thirds of that investment program arises out of that particular industry.

I should like as briefly as I can to cite some of the reasons our resources industries are so important to Canada and to the Canadian economy. First of all there is the contribution we make to international security and prosperity. Industrial raw materials, fuels and food are the three basic economic ingredients which a free world requires in its endeavours to increase international security and prosperity. We in Canada not only have an abundance of these resources but we are developing them in an efficient manner and at a rate that is hardly matched by any other country. Therefore a broad resources base makes Canada one of the strongest natural allies in the cold war for the United States and the other countries of the western alliance.

The second matter to which I should like to draw attention is that the expansion of our resources industries is balanced with a growth of secondary industries. Our resources development in Canada has gone hand in hand with the expansion of secondary industries. Both these developments have taken place in response to long-term demands, and there has been little if anything in the way of forced or specially induced expansion in Canadian resources development or in secondary industries. The sole exception is certain developments during and after the war for defence reasons. Notwithstanding the recent renewal in the house and elsewhere of the cry that we are the hewers of wood and drawers of water, our production of food and raw materials continues to be looked upon not only by Canadians but by our allies as very respectable occupations, and we are interested in an economic expansion that is well balanced but which will have to be on the basis of resources development as well as the industrial front.

The third point I should like to make has to do with the diversification that we have been able to achieve in our resources development, which has lessened our economic vulnerability. Canadian resources development, as a result of the program that has been carried on over the last few years, is now much more broadly based than it ever was before. In the fuel field, coal and hydro power are supplemented by the newcomers, oil and natural gas. In the mining field our traditional resources of nickel, copper, lead and zinc have been supplemented by uranium and titanium. Further, resources industries, which were of minor importance before the war, have become major factors in our industrial raw material development—for example, aluminum and iron ore. This broadening of our natural resources base has undoubtedly removed some of the vulnerability of the Canadian economy, which was inclined to suffer when world demand dropped for certain particular commodities.

The fourth matter to which I should like to refer is the contribution that resources development has made to strengthening regional economies within Canada. Our resources development program has made an important contribution to Canadian regional economic diversification and to the opening up of new land for settlement. For example, the prairie provinces used to depend primarily on agriculture for their prosperity. Now we have important oil and natural gas developments in Alberta, uranium mining in Saskatchewan, and nickel and copper mining in Manitoba, with processing and refining industries located in these regions in increasing numbers. More recently the development of mining prospects in the maritime provinces and Newfoundland is having an increasing effect. The Kitimat aluminum project, the Lynn Lake non-ferrous metal mines, the Labrador iron development, all mean the building of new railway lines into these regions and the opening up of new areas of virgin northern country.

The fifth point is the effect that the development of our resources industries has had on improving our balance of payments position. We have been selling as much of our raw materials resulting from these great developments that could not be used in Canada at excellent prices on foreign markets, and this has had a very beneficial effect on the Canadian economy.

The final point is the general one of the contribution to general economic stability. Canadian resources located in inaccessible regions, or difficult to prove up or extract on an economic basis, could in most cases only be developed by the making of large capital expenditures. In the post-war period substantial and for the most part increasing amounts have been invested for this purpose in this country. High capital spending for resources development has been one of the most dynamic and vital factors making possible a continuing rise in Canadian economic activities. In fact, but for the very large and diversified resources program, Canadians could not have avoided the consequences of the so-called inventory recession in 1949 in the United States to the extent we did.

Having dealt with our resources development industry, I should like to come to the vital question of whether we should process more of our industrial raw materials before export and, if so, how it should be done. This is a problem that has been given consideration for many years. When the alternative was between leaving the resources unused or selling them abroad in unprocessed form, initially at least, the answer given in this country in most cases has been, let us go ahead with the development of these resources. But this problem has remained how to increase processing at home and how to convince our customers that it is in their own as well as in our long-term interests for them to take more raw materials in processed form when they can be produced in Canada more efficiently than or at least as efficiently as in other countries.

What progress has been made in this regard? With the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put on Hansard two tables taken from the government publication "Trade of Canada". These tables show the total exports of Canada for 1929 and 1953, both in percentage and value terms, broken down as between raw materials, partially manufactured goods, and fully manufactured goods.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member permission to place these tables on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dickey: The tables are as follows:

Sum of components may differ slightly from totals shown due to rounding.

(1) Fiscal year ended March 31, 1930.
(2) Exports amounted to only $19 thousand in 1929.

I am putting on the record in these tables the total proportions for 1953, and the same information is given in the table for 1929. These figures show that since 1929, by reason of natural development, we have made significant progress in increasing the proportion of natural resources products being exported in processed form, either fully or semi-manufactured. The table will show that there are four main groups of exports which show substantial declines in the proportions shipped abroad in raw form in 1953 as compared with 1929. Three other main groups show somewhat smaller increases. The main decreases took place in the classification of non-metallic minerals and their products, which were down one-half, from 70 per cent in 1929 to 35 per cent in 1953; in fibres, textiles and textile products, down from 18 to 7 per cent; in non-ferrous metals and their products, down to 23 per cent from 36 per cent in 1929.

If hon. members will study these tables I believe they will see a very clear pattern emerge. From this I submit that it does not appear that we are shipping an unduly large amount of our natural wealth out of this country, in its raw state, to supply factories in other countries. It is true that we do export considerable quantities of natural resources products in their raw form, especially foodstuffs, but their relative share of our total exports is declining, and the great bulk of our non-food raw material exports is processed to varying extents in Canada.

The belief has been expressed that if Canada insisted that all her natural resources products be completely processed before being exported, unparalleled prosperity would result. Unfortunately it is not nearly as simple as all that. For example, to begin with, any attempt to compel foreign buyers of Canadian products to alter the form of their purchases would lead quickly to serious losses of our world markets. There are alternate supplies and substitute materials for most of our natural resources products, and undoubtedly other countries would utilize these in the face of any such Canadian restrictions.

Second, any such action would invite retaliation. Other countries would follow suit to Canada's ultimate detriment, as we are on balance, as I pointed out earlier, a heavy net importer of raw materials of the industrial type. If the inward flow of these raw materials were interrupted our steel mills, our textiles mills, our natural rubber and aluminum smelting industries would suffer severely. The aluminum smelting industry would be especially vulnerable, since it depends entirely upon imported bauxite and imported cryolite, with Canada's main contribution being abundant low-cost hydro power.

In addition, some of our exports of raw materials are really part of an exchange trade based on the economies of transportation or on the interchange of complementary products. Both these factors operate in the two-way flow of iron ore, with the totals being almost in balance in 1953, when exports were valued at about $31 million and imports at $28 million. For similar reasons of economy it may turn out that when Canada achieves a large measure of self sufficiency in crude petroleum supplies it will be done by large exports balancing large imports rather than by processing all our own crude oil.

I should like now to deal with the extent of industrialization that would be required in Canada to process all the natural resources products we are capable of producing. This may be gathered by looking at the iron and steel picture. It is expected that within a few years Canada's iron ore capacity will have expanded to 25 million tons annually. The question arises, why do we permit the export of this raw material rather than require its conversion in Canada into steel and steel products?

Superficially that is an attractive suggestion. But besides the necessity of finding markets for that steel production, there is the rather difficult problem of finding $5 billion in capital investment which would be required to create in this country that kind of steel capacity. Without assured markets I am very much afraid that we would not find capital ready to risk itself in that way.

In summary, if I may just list the reasons for the present state of our trade in raw products and manufactured goods, and the reasons for the developments which have taken place since 1929, I would say, first, that Canada is a low-cost producer of a number of raw materials for which there is a world-wide demand in their natural form, and has become an important source of supply for many of the countries which need these raw materials.

Second, Canada's domestic market for most of these materials is small, and frequently such resources would not be developed at all except for the export market. For example, the nickel developments at Sudbury would never have been made to meet the requirements of the Canadian plating industry.

Thirdly, it is usually more economic to produce in larger quantities; and selling in wider markets reduces the cost of production, which benefits the Canadian consumer and the Canadian manufacturer who also uses these raw materials.

Fourth, the development of natural resources often contributes to regional economic development, as I have pointed out.

Fifth, the development of Canada's natural resources for the export market usually paves the way for the setting up of domestic industries to process the resulting materials for home use, and eventually for export as well. Certainly that has been our experience in a number of fields.

Finally, the export of raw materials is a part of Canada's economic structure and any drastic reduction, whether due to restrictions on exports in raw form or not, would upset the whole economy. Any upset in the balance of payment pattern could mean large trading deficits for Canada, and eventually even the curtailment of essential imports.

Therefore I think that in respect of this, as in many other problems, the correct view is the balanced view based on the facts. I submit that the generalized and unsupported statements made very frequently on this matter by hon. members opposite have not been contributions to clear thinking in respect of the Canadian economic position today or its future prospects.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I do not intend to delve into any particular aspects of the budget. They have been dealt with very ably and efficiently by some of the other members of our party. However, I should like to deal with one or two problems that are particularly applicable to my own riding and constituents and which, if promptly acted upon and dealt with in an effective way, could have a great economic effect on the whole of Canada.

I do not wish to belabour an issue that has been debated from time to time in this house, but I do notice that issues that are continually brought to the attention of the government sometimes do find their way into legislative measures. The question I am going to discuss was mentioned in the latter part of the second great war, and has been mentioned so often since that I cannot understand why some concrete policy has not been advanced by this government to assist in the decentralizing of industry.

A great deal of the buoyancy of our financial position in the world today is due to the fact that foreign capital is being invested either in the development of our natural resources or in the creation of new industrial empires. I feel that consideration should be given and planning should be done to see that those empires will be set up under conditions and in locations that will be in the best interests of Canada as a whole.

I feel that there are three main departments of our government that would be economically affected by planning of this kind. The first department is that of transport. Indications are that our railroad systems have been operating at a tremendous deficit for the last year. In fact we know that in the year 1954 the Canadian National Railways had a deficit of $28,758,098. They find that some of this deficit arises from the fact that quite a number of their branch lines are not paying. I feel that if industry, which is being centralized in our metropolitan areas, could be distributed throughout the entire width and breadth of our country it would naturally give more business and bring more revenue to our transportation systems. I also feel that if many of these branch lines are discontinued the possibility of smaller communities getting any of these industries will become practically nil.

Another department that is involved is the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources which, through co-operation with the provincial departments of planning and development, should take some steps to see that great industrial empires do not encroach on our very valuable agricultural lands. I speak particularly of the lands in southern Ontario, where we have been endowed by old mother nature with fertile soil, a moderate climate and all the natural attributes to make that one of the most productive fruit and vegetable districts in the world. Man can never replace these natural resources which have been given to us, and there are many districts where soil and natural conditions make it impossible to carry on agriculture economically, yet where it would be feasible to build manufacturing plants.

Then we have one other department of the government which is directly involved, namely the Department of National Health and Welfare, which has the task of promoting and developing civil defence. We hope and pray that these tense periods will pass and there will not be another great war, but we know that we must look upon this matter with a sense of reality when all the great nations of the world are doing their utmost to keep ahead in the creation of new weapons of destruction. To this department falls the task of looking after the safety of the citizens of our country in case of attack.

When so many people are gathered together in great metropolitan areas the task of protecting or removing them from these areas becomes well-nigh impossible. We shudder to think what could happen. We have seen it happen before when our weapons of destruction were many times less devastating than they are today. Had more thought and planning been given to this situation the expensive projects that we find in our larger centres to relieve traffic congestion, such as subways and through expressways, might not have been necessary. I feel that if more direction were given, many industries could settle in smaller communities to the mutual advantage of both the industries and the communities. Today we find that people living in those smaller communities are demanding and getting all the facilities provided in more thickly populated areas. If they had more supporting taxpayers the burden of municipal taxation on property owners would be less oppressive.

The second matter I wish to speak about is also one that has been given considerable publicity in this house, but it is also one about which I feel not too much has been done. I refer to the condition of the farming industry in our country. When one looks over the budget one finds that as regards the farmers as a whole very little relief has been given to alleviate the trying circumstances in which they find themselves. It is true that the average farmer may pay a few cents less in income tax, though when I spoke to a couple of my constituents during the Easter recess I found that one indicated that his reduction in revenue from the sale of his hogs over the past year was $2,500, while in the case of the other the reduction was $1,500. Therefore I think they will find that their reduction in income tax will be very small this year because a lot of them will not have to pay any tax. The farmer may get his tires a little cheaper. If he has a car to turn in he will likely pay a little less for a new one than he did before.

A survey by Dr. MacFarlane, of the Macdonald agricultural college, indicated that according to the bureau of statistics a year's work by an agricultural worker was worth only $3,600, while a year's work by workers in other occupations was worth almost $5,000. The explanation is that while the prices of farm products have been steadily declining for several years, the prices being charged for other products have been going up. In other words the producers of our agricultural products are not getting an undue share of the national production.

I am sick and tired of the fanfare and headlines that follow declines in agricultural prices. So much has been said about our high-cost economy that when beef prices drop, when hogs, poultry, or any other agricultural products go down in price, headlines proclaim that according to the index of the bureau of statistics the cost of living has dropped. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that when it is caused by only one segment of our economy it is too much to shout about, and I feel it is a very selfish way of looking at this question.

No part of our national economy can live unto itself today. If farm prices drop, the things the farmers buys are fewer, and believe me, he is willing to buy when he is making a profit on his operation. He is willing to buy such products as farm implements, clothing, electrical appliances, automobiles and many other ordinary commodities of everyday life. When the farmer stops buying the manufacturers of all those commodities find that production soon catches up with the demand and there are lay-offs that are not all caused by the dumping of commodities by other countries where labour costs are lower. They are caused partly by the falling off in the purchasing power of one of the basic industries of our country.

I say that part of the fluctuation in the farmers' prices and in our agricultural returns results from the fact that today we have no definite, genuine market on which we can depend from year to year. The United States of America has from time to time been a good customer, but under ordinary circumstances and in an average year the United States produces more agricultural products than she herself can use.

The budget gave no indication that there would be any increased promotion of trade in agricultural products with other countries. There was a time when we enjoyed access to and even preference in the British markets where, because of their tremendous population, there are approximately 30 million people to be fed every year, and which is one of the most permanent and stable markets in the world for agricultural products. There was a time when our cheese ranked first in demand by the people of Britain. How do we know that the newer generations who have grown up and who have developed an appetite for this product from other countries will have the same preference as the rank and file of British people?

In those days not only did our cheese go to Britain, but our butter, our pork and our heavy steers went to that market. We do not send any beef today, and in that connection it might be interesting to note that Britain buys 70 per cent of the beef produced in the world. I feel that a great deal of the uncertainty in our agricultural economy is due primarily to the loss of this market.

This great Liberal government tells us that one of the reasons we had to give up the British market was that Britain did not have the dollars with which to buy the products of our farms. But did this government leave no stone unturned to see that every possible dollar's worth of defence production was spent in Britain? The report of the Department of Defence Production, January 1 to December 31, 1954, indicates that materials purchased in the United States in the period April 1, 1951 to December 31, 1954 totalled $493,731,000, whereas those purchased in Great Britain amounted to only $104,255,000. Had more dollars been spent in Britain she might have had dollars which could have been used to stabilize our agricultural economy.

This government has been telling business, which has been in straitened circumstances for years, that they are faced with another buyer's market. This applies not only to business in Canada but to business in the international field. If the farmers of our country felt that there were adequate markets for their products and that when they were ready for market there would not be a surplus they could produce more than they are producing of cattle, hogs, poultry, butter, cheese, etc., and their cost of production would be reduced while our gross national product would be increased.

In the face of continued drops in agricultural prices there is one other thing I should like to mention, a phase which was applicable not only to my own riding in 1954, but because of excessive rainfall during the harvest season applied equally to many districts, particularly in southern Ontario. It is true that last year the western provinces had an unusually wet crop year, but the farmers there have the facilities of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to help them when needed. The farmers in southern Ontario depending on late crops such as flax, white beans, soybeans and sugar beets to get extra money to pay taxes and many other yearly debts that accumulate, particularly in these days of high production costs on our farms, found there was no assistance available to them.

I maintain that what is good for one section of this dominion in time of economic strain should be applicable and within the reach of every farmer who needs it. I should like to endorse the suggestion made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that we recommend the development of an adequate scheme of crop insurance with costs to be borne jointly by the federal and provincial governments and the producers.

In closing I should like to say a few words about education, a matter which I understand will be brought up before the coming dominion-provincial conference. We have no greater asset in our country than our youth, and we should leave no stone unturned to see that everything possible is done to fit them to take their place in the world of today. Most municipalities are trying to do this, but with the limited means of taxation at their disposal they are finding it well-nigh impossible.

I feel that the federal government, which now takes over 75 per cent of the tax dollar, must do more to assist this very important function of government at all levels. This was the conclusion arrived at after a research program carried out by the Canadian school trustees' association under the direction of Dr. M. E. LaZerte, a distinguished Alberta educationalist. This report indicates that to ensure equality of educational opportunity for all Canadian children the dominion government should designate special grants to the provinces for the specific purpose of assisting education.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I must say that this slender and somewhat weary Friday evening audience is not very inspiring.

Mr. Coldwell: You have the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), and I am here.

Mr. Knowles: You have the quality.

Mr. Herridge: Yes. Mr. Speaker, I am also somewhat heartened by the fact that my Sunday school teacher of nearly 50 years ago is listening to me this evening.

An hon. Member: Do you know your lessons?

Mr. Herridge: I have learned them since that time. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment and the subamendment. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) expressed the collective views of this group so far as major criticisms of the budget are concerned. I do not intend to weary the house by a repetition of his explanations. I merely want to re-emphasize and deal with a few matters of particular concern to working people in this country generally, and to bring to the attention of the minister a few matters of particular concern to some of my constituents, which they have asked me to raise during this debate on the budget.

The minister made provision for a percentage reduction of the corporation tax and a percentage reduction of personal income tax. On first hearing it sounded rather good, but on later calculating it did not look so good. I am of the opinion that it would have served the interests of the lower income groups much better if he had accepted the suggestions that have come from this party in recent years, that he increase the basic exemption for single persons to $1,500 per annum and for married persons to, say, $3,000 per annum. The present proposals of the minister merely mean a saving of a few cents a day, and in fact afford no actual relief to the low income groups.

I suggest that the loss of revenue that would be occasioned by increasing exemptions could be made up in other ways. We in this group recognize the fact that a certain amount has to be raised by taxation. Taxes are required to pay for the things we advocate; we do not back away from that. We in this group point out what we consider a fair distribution of the tax burden in this country. In our opinion there was no necessity at all at this time for a reduction of the income tax for corporations. That would be one way to meet the loss of revenue occasioned by increasing income tax exemptions.

We think there should be the imposition of a capital gains tax, which we believe would bring a considerable sum to the treasury of this country. We think that if the minister removed the 20 per cent tax credit allowed on dividends from Canadian corporations his revenue would be considerably increased. We believe the policy we have suggested would be sound and would cover the loss of revenue occasioned by extending the exemptions to lower income group people.

We believe the minister could have assisted the lower income groups by removal of the 3 per cent floor on medical expenses. If the minister considers it proper to reduce the income tax for corporations. That would the time has come to give effect to the wishes of the House of Commons that have been expressed in this respect. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and other members of this group have advocated the abolition of the 3 per cent floor for some years, and we hope that, even before this debate is finally concluded, the minister will again consider the proposals coming from this side of the house.

Now I should like to deal with a few matters which are of particular concern to some of my constituents and which, as I said before, they have asked me to bring to the attention of the minister. There are many working people in Canada, both salary and wage earners, who because of circumstances are required to live some distance from their place of employment—in my constituency it is a matter of between five and thirty miles—not because they wish to live that distance away from their employment but because in many cases they are forced to live that distance away in order to obtain satisfactory housing accommodation and so on; as for instance the employees of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. This is a large corporation operating in my constituency, and I think the circumstances are typical of those existing in many other parts of Canada. There are thousands of those employees who have to travel from five to thirty miles a day to and from their employment. These expenses are considerable. They vary from $10 to $35 a month. They are all unavoidable expenses incurred by these salaried and wage-earning people.

I believe other members of this group agree with me that if the minister can allow the travelling expenses of a commercial traveller who goes around the country selling bubble gum or something as unnecessary as that, surely he could give consideration to allowing these salaried and working people an exemption on account of these abnormal travelling expenses. I am not suggesting that the ordinary expense of 10 or 25 cent street car rides to work should be exempted for income tax purposes, but I do think there is a sound case for consideration of those who have to spend from $10 to $35 a month travelling to and from their employment day after day. I urge the minister to give this representation consideration.

I noticed that when the minister was speaking on the budget he made some reference to special incentive provisions for certain companies. I find on page 2738 of Hansard the following:

> Our tax laws contain special incentive provisions for the oil, gas and mining industries. It has been the policy in the past few years to review these provisions each year and annually to grant an extension of them. There are certain advantages in this procedure but, on the other hand, it carries with it some uncertainty for the future. In the past few months I have been giving considerable thought to the operation of these incentives and to the importance of these two industries to the future of Canada. I believe these special tax provisions have clearly established their value in promoting expansion and I now propose to make them a permanent part of our law.

I think the minister is quite correct in stating that this provision has been a special incentive in the exploration for these natural resources. In my opinion there is some justification for giving consideration to these corporations in this respect because they are endeavouring to develop natural resources, and I think we should promote such development.

However, once again I should like to bring to the minister's attention the fact that I believe the farmers of this country should get similar consideration. If these incentive provisions are justified for these corporations which are expanding production by developing natural resources, then ethically speaking, and by the same token, I think the farmers of this country are entitled to similar consideration. Every new acre cleared, drained or irrigated increases production in this country and this increase performs the same function as does the development of natural resources performed by these companies to which I have referred. I think the farmers of this country who are increasing production by doing the things I have mentioned are entitled to exactly the same consideration as these corporations which are carrying on exploration for the development of our natural resources. I again urge the minister to give consideration to our pleas from this side of the house on behalf of the farmers of this country.

I must say in passing, Mr. Speaker, that I was pleased to note that the minister has decided on the reduction or elimination of tariffs on brooders for farm animals, certain components of feedstuffs, sweet potato seedlings, poultry eviscerating equipment and other machinery connected with agricultural production. I am pleased indeed to see that statement. While in the reading of the paragraph this announcement might not mean a great deal to some members of the house or to other people not acquainted with the circumstances, I know personally that it brings a measure of relief to some of our poultry producers and some of our farmers. I am pleased that the minister has seen fit to do this. I am glad that the representations of the farm organizations and of members of this house in this respect have received favourable consideration by the minister.

We are all pleased with the repeal of the excise tax on tires and tubes, regardless of their use, and with the 5 per cent reduction in the excise tax on automobiles. I am sure that step is welcomed by employers and employees in the automobile industry, and by a good many purchasers of cars in Canada. However, I think that the decision of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) not to allow claims for refunds arising out of tax reduction in respect of goods upon which taxes have been paid occasions some injustice. In that respect I have had representations from automobile dealers in my constituency. I know a good number of these smaller dealers very well indeed and I think there is some justification for consideration of their protests and their claims.

The implementation of the budget places some of them in quite a serious position. To illustrate the effect this decision of the Minister of National Revenue has on their businesses, I am going to read one letter I have received, and it is typical. I think it illustrates the position of the average small automobile dealer. My correspondent has this to say:

> In connection with the reduction in excise taxes on new vehicles, we understand that no provision has been made in the budget to take care of new vehicles in dealers' stocks prior to bringing down the budget.
> This places practically every dealer in the country in a very awkward position. Every used vehicle on our lots has to be reduced proportionately, which we are quite ready to assume, of course. This is a large item in itself, as any larger dealer has in the vicinity of $50,000 worth of used cars for sale.
> My firm's stock of new vehicles on hand on April 5th totalled 20 units, on which we had paid $6,315.80 excise tax. In effect, without any rebate from the department, we stand to lose $2,105.27, in addition to the revision in our used car inventories.
>
> The argument seems to be that the last time they raised the excise tax they did not assess stocks in dealers' hands at the time. However, if I recall correctly, there were practically no dealer stocks in existence at that time—and certainly there was no request from the dealer organizations to be excused from collecting the additional tax.
> We automobile dealers are responsible for the collection of vast amounts of taxes for the government—which we pay in advance long before most of the sales are actually made.
> May we respectfully request you to make a serious plea to the honourable minister to implement ways and means of rebating dealers for stocks on hand as of April 5th?

I think there is some justification for the complaints of these automobile dealers, particularly the smaller ones, who will be quite seriously embarrassed by the application of the law according to the decision of the Minister of National Revenue. I urge that he give their representations further consideration.

There are one or two other matters I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. The first is one that I have brought to the attention of the house repeatedly throughout the last six or seven years. I have a number of constituents who practice forestry conservation. Some of them have wood lots; they might be termed large wood lots. Some have small timber holdings and some have holdings which are somewhat larger. But they are men who throughout the years have attempted to conserve a certain area of timber varying all the way from 100 acres to, in some cases, 5,000 acres. They have built roads. They have built trails. They have done thinning on their properties and they have made provision for easy access to the forests in case of fire.

In some cases these men have been doing this for 50 years. They have been conserving cutting from these natural resources throughout the years, and I know several who at the present time have more timber today than they had the day the first axe was swung in those timber holdings.

For persons who are practising conservation policies with respect to the management of timber I suggest that some opportunity should be allowed for certain income tax deductions, such as those that are allowed in the United States, for moneys expended directly in practising these policies. I know that the larger lumber companies are enabled to charge up to operations the cost of roads and certain other costs in developing large timber holdings. I think those arrangements are made with the income tax department. I have never been able to get to the bottom of that deal, as a matter of fact, but I am quite sure that a good many of the smaller timber holders are not able to take advantage of these provisions.

I believe some arrangement should be made for these smaller holders.

In our country there is going to be a much greater development—and I am very keen on it myself—of the woodlot and the smaller managed timber holding of anywhere, as I said before, from 100 acres to 5,000 acres. These people who are providing for the maintenance of the supplies of forest resources should receive some compensation for capital expended now on which in many cases they will receive no return in their lifetime. I know men who today are spending considerable sums of money in building roads and trails and practising forest management principles who will never receive full benefit from the expenditure during their lifetime. It will possibly be 50 years before the results of these conservation policies are fully effective.

I ask of the minister in his budget proposals consideration of some arrangement for these persons who can prove, by inspection or by certificate from the British Columbia forest service or something of that sort, that they are conserving our natural resources and that they are investing money for the future, so they may have an opportunity to deduct a percentage of these expenses from their income tax.

There is no question, Mr. Speaker, but that unemployment is our major domestic problem. I am not going to rehash the unemployment debate in my brief remarks this evening but in that connection, like my leader and all other members of this group, I regret that the budget does not provide for a long-term public investment program to meet this urgent need now and in the days to come. We are very sorry about that. We believe the budget should have contained proposals for a long-term investment program in low-cost housing, a national conservation policy, improved highways, trans-Canada pipe lines, irrigation projects, power development, hospitals and grade crossing improvements. All these things are sadly needed in the country. We are sorry the budget does not make provision for at least the commencement of such a long-term program.

I must say that we welcome the announcement that the government intends to establish a royal commission to examine carefully our potential economic prospects. This is all to the good and from our point of view a very necessary step for the planning of the proper development of our natural resources. Apparently the seeds sown by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in this respect are beginning to sprout. His speech of March 2, in which he urged the government to adopt a public investment program and to adopt a 100th anniversary committee, has been recognized and considered by the government.

At that time he urged the government to consider a committee to deal with a public investment program, so that when we celebrated our 100th anniversary we would have many things about which we could be proud. The hon. member placed a resolution on the order paper on March 17 asking for the establishment of such a committee to deal with the development of a public investment program over the years and coming to fruition at the time of our 100th anniversary. We are very pleased indeed to learn that the voice of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been listened to by the minister and the government at this time.

I should like to refer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as the Sir Stafford Cripps of the House of Commons. He is no Greek Adonis to look at, but he is certainly a good one to listen to. There is no question about it in this case, as on former occasions, the government has listened to his suggestions and advice, and we are very pleased that they have done so.

So far as the personnel of the commission is concerned, I hope it will be thoroughly representative. Naturally you have to have very well qualified persons to act in a satisfactory manner on such an important commission. I do think that, among others, there should be qualified representatives of the working people, the farmers and the veterans of the country. There are certain aspects of this problem which these three large groups would wish considered, and I am sure that qualified representatives could make a most valuable contribution to the investigation and report by the royal commission.

However, it will take some time for the commission to complete its studies, and what is required at the present time is immediate action to meet the unemployment situation. I do not think we can ignore the fact that owing to various technological and other changes that are occurring in Canada and other countries at the present time, we are faced with the problem of a considerable amount of unemployment unless we take special measures through government action, federal, provincial and municipal, to overcome it. We believe that action should be as the result of planning, co-operation and co-ordination of activities among all levels of government.

I must say I find it very difficult to follow the policy of the Progressive Conservative party so far as their criticisms of the budget are concerned. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), if I heard him correctly and if his television interview was correctly reported, suggested that deficit financing is not a good thing. I think the hon. member for Greenwood was expressing his personal conviction. I judged from his speech that he considered deficit financing a poor thing. I listened to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), and I am quite sure anyone can fairly say that his proposals would mean a great increase in deficit financing so far as the government is concerned. Therefore I am not quite sure just what is the policy of the Progressive Conservative party with respect to deficit financing.

Personally, while small deficits may not be of serious concern, I do not think a government or a country can be run for long on very large-scale deficit financing. I think a better way is to provide for a public investment program because—

Mr. Brooks: You agree with the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Herridge: —I think deficit financing would be more costly to the people of Canada in the long run. In my opinion it would be much sounder to establish a public investment program. I believe we should use the collective and personal credit of all Canadians for this purpose. When I say "collective and personal credit" I mean exactly this, that we should use the facilities of the Bank of Canada for the issue of a certain amount of credit to carry on all these necessary public works and projects I have mentioned previously, and that we should also use the personal credit of the people of Canada by the floating of low interest bond issues so the individual citizen of Canada would have an opportunity to contribute to a specific project.

I suggest that the government would get a tremendous response to an issue of Canada development bonds. I think the government would be surprised at the number of Canadians, from the less well off to the very well off, who would like to subscribe to such a bond issue and who would like to feel they were participating in a public investment program advanced by the government. I suggest the government could very well consider discussing with the provinces when they meet here the possibilities for a planned investment program as the result of the use of the collective and personal credit of the country with close participation by as many Canadians as possible. I am sure if it is engendered in the right spirit, if we can get the federal, provincial and municipal governments working together, if we can get their purposes and objectives co-ordinated with close co-operation among all governments and the right appeal to the Canadian people, we can finance a public investment program on a very sound basis that will very soon meet the employment needs in Canada and provide for continuing employment in the years to come.

We have the unemployed representing unused human resources. We have unused natural resources. All we need is action on the part of the government to design a program related to a financial policy to meet the need that is so evident at this time. I do urge the minister to give consideration to that type of approach to the situation.

I am of the opinion that in recent years governments have overlooked the willingness of the people of Canada to respond to this type of appeal. When there was a war on the people responded to war loans. The morale of the Canadian people was high, and each put his shoulder to the wheel. I am confident that this type of program and policy, handled in the proper way and placed before the Canadian people in an attractive manner, would bring a response that would surprise the government. From talking to many people I meet, friends and others, who have some spare cash, I am sure they would be prepared to invest small sums, and that they would be delighted to have an opportunity to take part in such a constructive and progressive development if, in so doing, they felt they could assure to their fellow Canadians employment in days to come.

Mr. H. P. Mang (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to offer a few general remarks on the budget and the economic situation of our country. It would be presumptuous on my part to attempt to give a detailed analysis of either the budget or the economic situation, but perhaps I can offer a few remarks which will have some value or which, if they have no value, will at least give me some satisfaction.

There is one feature about budget debates and the consideration of budgets that has always interested me, and that is the attitude taken by newspapers, people in public life and the general public, when they seem to consider the budget of any public body as something to be considered by itself. To my mind a budget should always be associated with the work it is trying to do. All too often I find newspapers, and the public in general, either going into ecstasy or despondency over whether a tax rate has been raised or lowered; and a finance minister or a secretary-treasurer is either praised or condemned in the light of how much more or less he is providing to be spent in the conduct of the public business for which he is responsible.

This matter has puzzled me for a long time. If I were not afraid of disclosing my age I would say that as far back as 1934, when I happened to be making a speech on the budget of that time in the legislature in Saskatchewan, the same thing puzzled me. On that occasion I said it was as necessary for the people of a country to be tax conscious as to be conscious of a malady such as cancer, tuberculosis or some sickness of that nature. It has always been a puzzle to me to find that people consider expenditures or the providing of funds as something in, as it were, a separate room, apart altogether from a consideration of the things the expenditure of tax moneys is to provide.

The fact is that the two things go hand in hand. If one is fair, then he must consider it in that light, and in that light alone. The balance sheet must be looked at from both angles. To my mind the budget of a public body is much the same as the budgets we have in our own private lives. We see that we have so much money to spend, and that we have so much earning power. Consequently we decide what we are going to buy—what kind of car, what kind of radio, and all those things we wish to provide for ourselves.

When we begin talking about either reducing or increasing taxation we must emphasize in our own minds, and keep it as a background in the consideration of any budget, a clear picture of those things we desire to have.

[Mr. Herridge.]

In the budget now presented to us we must follow a similar procedure. While home during the Easter recess I interviewed a good many people. I called on municipal officials, on elevator agents, on reeves and councillors, and talked to people on the street, and I found the reaction to this budget was very favourable indeed. The impression I gained—indeed, it was told to me in so many words—was that the budget was considered honest and realistic, that it was facing the facts with which we are confronted, that it did not go off into an inflationary program but that it did the best it could to meet the prevailing situation.

People realize that we do not want any reduction in those services which, during times of prosperity, we have built up for ourselves. Those people do not want to give up any of their old age pensions or war veterans allowances. They do not want to deny themselves any of the public services that, as taxpayers in Canada, we have purchased for ourselves. Furthermore they felt that if we were to enter into an extensive program of public works the government would be acting as the agent of the taxpayers to hire those who are unemployed. It was felt that to hire 600,000 people at a time such as this would present some difficulty to the taxpayers.

These were the thoughts that appeared to be in the minds of the people. I was happy with the reception the budget received, particularly so because we in the west, where money is short, as it may also be in some other parts of the country, felt that the budget was facing up to the situation as it exists. The government in office is responsible for the carrying on of the public activities we want, those things for which in many cases we have asked and petitioned. We do not want to have them reduced. We know that moneys have to be provided for these purposes, and therefore we could not expect any great reduction in taxation.

In 1953 our national economy did not suffer greatly dollarwise. The figure, one we hear often repeated, was something over $24,500 million. According to the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce it had dropped last year to $24 billion. Since I am a grain grower and come from the prairies, it interests me very much to know that both in the budget and in the speech from the throne it is emphasized that the lack of production with respect to grain, particularly in western Canada, has had a serious effect and is indeed partly responsible for the drop in Canada's national output. To me this is very interesting, because it emphasizes the great importance of the three prairie provinces in our economy. Indeed, they are at least the stone on the side of the keystone in the economic arch of Canada. I noted particularly the emphasis on that phase of our economy.

We did suffer last year. In the province of Saskatchewan there are places where we grew 20, 30, 40 and 50 bushels of wheat to the acre the previous year. Last year we grew 2, 3, 4 and 8 bushels of wheat to the acre. My constituency of Qu'Appelle is practically all under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. That means that a great part of it yielded fewer than 4 bushels to the acre and nearly all of it yielded fewer than 8 bushels to the acre. This made quite a dent, shall I say, in the economy of our area, as it did all through Saskatchewan.

We are very appreciative of the help this act has given. Naturally some of us would like to have had more; who does not want twice as much, if he can get it? But we do appreciate and have appreciated the consideration that has been given to the west by this government over the years it has been in office. We do appreciate what it has done to solve western problems and the help it has given to meet them.

I have mentioned previously some of the things this government has done, which we greatly appreciate. Of course we westerners must be forgiven for some of our impatience, because we are so young. Some of our grandfathers saw the buffaloes roaming there. Our grandfathers and fathers took over the raw prairie from the Indians, the gophers and the buffaloes. That is in the memories of men still living there. We all know that the young are very impatient. That can be seen from the political performance of the twin provinces of western Canada, Alberta and Saskatchewan, who are celebrating their fiftieth anniversary this year. I do not know of any two political parties that are more opposed to each other than those two facing each other across the Saskatchewan border. One province is Social Credit and the other is socialist at the present time.

It will not be that way all the time, of course. That is partly owing to their youth. I hope other members from other parts of Canada who are pioneers, not of the west but of Canada itself, will understand that. I think at once of the oldest and yet the youngest province of Canada, namely Newfoundland. I have been told that in that province today there are roads that were laid 350 years ago. It makes me feel very humble and very appreciative of the fact that we are young, and because we are young we make demands and requests, sometimes in very violent fashion. That is one of the reasons we do it in that way.

We are short of cash throughout western Canada at the present time. It is not at all hopeless, however. The situation is that we bought a great quantity of goods during our prosperous times. We are just like the worker in a factory. If he gets an increase in wages he spends it the day after tomorrow, and very often it is spent on a new television set or on a new commodity of some kind that he wishes to have.

We are far from bankrupt in western Canada. Indeed, our wealth is quite substantial. A good deal of our money has been sent to Windsor, Toronto, Montreal and Oshawa. We do not regret that because we do not care so much for money out there. What we care for are goods, which are the true wealth of any land. We want a new combine; we want a new truck or a new car, and that sort of thing, but at the moment we are short of cash. If those wheat payments can be hustled along a little we shall appreciate it. I do not threaten as some people do, by shaking a finger or a fist at our very efficient Minister of Trade and Commerce. That does not make the stenographers work any faster, and it is not physically possible to get the payments out any faster. We are going to be patient. We are very patient people out in the west. We have acquired that virtue because we have learned to depend chiefly on the weather and the soil for whatever we have.

In spite of the handicap of a socialist government from which we suffer out there—I shall not mention the other government, because it does not concern us at the present time. They are getting along very well, but they are also getting help from sources outside their own borders and, of course, oil and gas—we are hoping that with the help we are getting from this government in various ways, with the other payments coming in, and with the grain moving again, we shall not have to ask the house for any special consideration.

The matter of trade has been emphasized over and over again. It has been said that we must expand our trade. The loss of some of our markets has been deplored. Of course the loss is regrettable. I was interested in the discussions on unemployment and trade. Employment in any country depends upon trade, both domestic and foreign, but that trade depends upon the consumer. Unless someone buys the thing you make, it just lies there. For example, you can have combines standing in Toronto by the acre, or trucks standing in Oshawa by the acre. They do not do anybody any good until someone starts to use them. As soon as the products of labour are brought into use you have wealth, and not before that.

The consumer has not been emphasized enough in our discussions here. The consumers of this country, or of any country with which we trade, call the final tune. The consumer is the one who decides whether he will or will not buy. May I point out that we, as western farmers, have always tried to be reasonable in the marketing of our grain. May I give this illustration. Every manufacturing concern in the economy of Canada should consider it very carefully. When we formed the wheat pool through which we hoped to market our grain, one of the objectives of that farm organization was to try to keep the price of our grain in a reasonable relationship with what the consumer was able and willing to pay. With the exception of 1929, when many people in this country, the United States, and throughout the world for that matter, misjudged what the consumer was going to do, we have followed a policy in our sales of grain of always considering the ability and willingness of the consumer to absorb our product.

Without going into detail on that point but just to bring it into focus I would point out what happened last year, and I do this to indicate what I think industry should do. Perhaps I should not say "should do", as it is up to them, but this is what the wheat board did. First of all we recognized that the markets of the world were becoming highly competitive, and that if we were going to sell our product we would have to maintain our competitive position. We all heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce make that statement when the price reduction was announced.

This is what happened in western Canada last year when we tried to adjust ourselves to the competitive situation that had developed in the international grain market. I should like to quote a short paragraph from the Canadian wheat board report dealing with price which illustrates how we have tried to meet the international competitive situation with regard to the sale of our wheat which, as I said a few moments ago, forms such an important part of our national economy, as was recognized in the budget speech and the throne speech as well. Referring to the international wheat agreement the report had this to say:

> From the agreement level of $2.03 per bushel at the start of the crop year board quotations for No. 1 northern wheat basis in store Fort William-Port Arthur declined through the course of the crop year to a level of $1.70½ per bushel on July 30, 1954, representing an over-all decline of 32½ cents per bushel for the year.

That was done in order to meet competition in the markets of the world. I ask industry, which would consist of the investor, management and labour, what they have done to remain competitive in the markets of the world. In western Canada the budget resources of the farmers have shrunken, not only because of yield but because of price adjustments. When we come to consider the purchase of a new truck, a new combine or a new machine produced in eastern Canada in the centres I have named we are faced with the fact that the cost of labour has risen and profits have increased.

We in the west cannot see how our commodity is going to take the adjustment when on the other hand industry, consisting of the units I have mentioned, is permitting its returns to go up all the time. We hear of less work, more wages, better holiday arrangements and more fringe benefits. The cost of all these items is built into the price of the combine, the truck and the car which we must have to run our business of producing wheat.

I am not telling anyone what to do; I am simply posing the question. That is one reason I was glad to have it announced in the budget speech that a commission is to be appointed to look into the whole economic picture of Canada. Some hon. members have indicated that they think this might take a long time. I do not know, but if the right men are appointed and they get busy I do not think it will take too long. The Prime Minister will know more about this because he was on the Rowell-Sirois commission, which had a somewhat similar duty to perform.

I suggest that the commission should consist of responsible men. It should look into the reasons for our high costs of production which I have hinted at, and the relative influence those matters have upon our high-cost economy which is making it so hard for us to compete in a highly competitive world against West Germany, Great Britain and Japan, three of our chief competitors who within the past few years have come up by leaps and bounds. As a matter of fact, as their employment figures have increased and as their production has been poured onto the markets of the world, to that extent have our unemployment figures here in Canada increased.

This commission should make a thorough survey of company profits, investor returns, labour and transportation costs. The cost of transportation is quite an item in the wheat and pulp and paper industries. Last year it cost the pulp and paper industry something like $250 million in transportation costs alone, and we could easily figure out the cost of transporting wheat, a most vital factor in our high-cost economy. And then there is taxation to be considered.

This commission will be able to establish facts in a way that we cannot establish them in this House of Commons. In this chamber we might be able to assess the economic situation in Canada in relation to the five points I have mentioned, but our duties are different. One group has the responsibility of conducting the business of the country; another group has the responsibility of criticizing the way in which that business is done; others offer suggestions, and so forth. The net result is that the poor public are very much confused as to what is the actual situation.

I am pleased that this matter is to be dealt with by a royal commission because above all else it will provide information to the people of Canada which is unbiased and not coloured by the political expediency of any party, or entangled with certain matters which should not enter into it at all. I would not undertake to indicate the personnel of this commission, but I was highly impressed by Mr. Graham Towers at committee meetings last year. Then there should be two representatives from the manufacturers' association, one from management and the other from the investors' side. I would certainly have representatives of labour sitting on the commission. Such institutions as banks should be included, and of course farmers, one farmer from the east and one from the prairies.

The reason I would like all these people represented is this, that they would share the responsibility for that report. You could go out into the country and give the people a factual presentation of the situation as it is, uncoloured by political bias. It would do away with the confusion that is brought about at the present time in the way these economic facts are presented to the public who are responsible for the membership of this house.

There is another point I should like to mention because it comes up so often. It came up again tonight. That is the question so often asked, if we can so regulate our economy during war that there is no unemployment, and if we can get all the money we want during a war, why not in peace? I have puzzled over that for quite a while, but I have answered the question, to my own satisfaction at least, for some time past. I do not remember much about 1914—we had no radio then—but you will remember that on the eve of the declaration of war in 1939 we had a marshalling of all the political forces of this country within one hour. I think it was from seven to eight o'clock out west, when the then prime minister, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, spoke, telling the people of Canada what was happening and what had happened. Then the premier of every province spoke on the same program. The result of this was a marshalling of the minds and the will and, as a result of that, the resources of this country to one purpose. That is the first reason you can do certain things during wartime which you cannot do in peacetime. I challenge anyone to suggest that such unity could be attained even if you had a million unemployed today.

The second thing is this. With the marshalling of all those forces of the mind, of the will and of the resources, both human and natural, you have the government immediately going into action with respect to the regulating of the economy, and you institute a rigid economy to accomplish that one aim in which we all unite. You have the invoking of the War Measures Act, you have the national registration, and you have the wartime prices and trade board. You marshal the human resources, and that is why you can do those things about which the question is so often asked: if you can get all that money in wartime why can you not get it in peacetime? That is one of the reasons. You can get that kind of unity and you can solve your problems as easily as that. But you would never get it, even if you had a million unemployed, today. That is the way I answer that question for myself. Others may answer it as they wish.

The other matter concerns the profits of corporations. We live in a free enterprise economy. That of course is a term which has been kicked around almost ad nauseam, "free enterprise" or "private enterprise". Many people mention it and do not even know what it is. It simply means that a person in this country will produce the most when he is seeking his own happiness; when he has his own way of working and is using his own skill for his own profit. He may have great ambition or little ambition; he may have initiative or not, and that depends on each individual human being. A great deal is made out of so-called big business. I sometimes wonder whether it is to the advantage of the people themselves—never mind the business or the economics—to indicate to them that somebody is trying to rob them all the time. It creates a spirit of leaning on somebody else to accomplish the things which the individual actually wants to accomplish. Let us look at some of the figures. This is perhaps just one example, but it applies to others in a greater or lesser degree:

The British Columbia firm of MacMillan and Bloedel Limited, one of the world's greatest enterprises in forest products, records gross receipts of $142 millions in 1954. Of special significance is the disposition of profits. To 4,582 shareholders there went a total of $4,189,000 in dividends.

Coupon clippers, I presume.

To governments (federal, provincial and municipal) there went taxes totalling $14,490,101. To 8,648 employees there went salaries and wages totalling $30,023,649.

. . . the owners of the business—the shareholders—got less than one-third of what went to governments in taxes, and about one-seventh of what went to workers in salaries and wages.

I am not condemning labour, those who work with their hands or work with the pen or work with their brains in management, for wanting a fair share and keeping the bulk of what comes out of that particular business. But the point I am trying to make is that we should not condemn a business as such just because it is making profits. We are all sharing in those profits, particularly today, because in the last 30 years at least the corporations have taken on a different form. The public itself is a shareholder. General Motors corporation has something like 500,000 shareholders, and you could name others.

I do not want to go into details at the present time, but the point I am making is that labour prospers to the extent that businesses prosper; it gets its share out of those profits. Remember this. In this house the Minister of Finance through his taxation powers can reduce those profits by taxation if they should get beyond all bounds or if they injure the economy by taking too much in profits out of the production of goods. The Minister of Finance and the government in that case will use those profits and redistribute them, as he is doing now.

I know there are other sides to the argument, but the point is, what is the alternative? The alternative is, of course, state ownership and state control of the means of production and distribution. If you are going to switch from this economy you will have to go to some alternative. I question very much, and I have always questioned, whether the people of Canada are of the type who want to have their private initiative controlled and governed by a body that is perhaps not endowed with any more wisdom than the average man in the land. Looking at it fairly, before we condemn the system we have and try to substitute another one therefor, we should look at some of these angles in a realistic way.

There is one more matter on which I wish to give my own view. In this house we have had mentioned very often—indeed we hear it every day—our great natural resources of forests, lands, streams and rocks. Those four basic natural resources have been mentioned.

It has been contended that because we in Canada have such an abundance of these natural resources, and an extremely energetic people, there should be no unemployment, and that all this is wealth.

I think I pointed out previously in this house, in my own immature way, of course, that these natural resources are not wealth until they are turned into something usable, and that until it gets into the hands of the consumer it is nothing. Otherwise you might as well leave the resource for the artist to paint or for the fisherman to enjoy.

To make the example more extreme, consider these combines and trucks that you see standing around that have not gone into consumption. Until they go into consumption they are not wealth. If you try to monetize them after they are built and bring them into consumption in that way, I just am not condemning the idea but I am wondering whether that is feasible or possible. Those combines and trucks might just as well have been left in the ground, as far as wealth is concerned, until some farmer buys the combine or somebody buys the truck. The combine or truck is not wealth until it goes into consumption. It can go into consumption only when an individual uses his brain and his brawn to get some purchasing power through his own efforts. Then he can turn this into wealth and something usable.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Come on over here. You do not belong over there.

Mr. Mang: Perhaps you do not get my point. I have not time to go over it again. So we have these natural resources, but we must have the application of the stored-up wealth that we have in the form of money and the desire or the ambition and the energy—particularly the initiative and the ambition—of the individual Canadian to go out and get something for himself if we are going to keep the economy alive and build it up. If you are going to bring these products of your ambition, energy and initiative to the consumers you must bear in mind what the consumer thinks he can pay you for the service you have rendered.

We in the wheat business are trying to do that. I urge the rest of the people of Canada —particularly the labour unions, management and investors—just to take a good long look at the matter. I therefore think this suggestion of the Minister of Finance with regard to appointing a commission is a good one, together with my suggestions as to personnel. By this means I think we can bring the economic problems into focus.

It has often been stated that the twentieth century belongs to Canada. It was repeated this afternoon. That prophecy was made at the beginning of the twentieth century. It was made by a son of old Quebec from which the original white Canadians came. By a peculiarly strange stroke of fate, in the middle of the twentieth century we have from that same province a Prime Minister who is charged with the responsibility of making a reality that vision of 50 years ago. I think we are well on the road to that progress if each individual and each section of Canada will assume his and its share of responsibility rather than throwing the responsibility on somebody else, or more particularly loading upon the government of Canada alone the responsibility for prosperity and well-being in this land.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, on looking quickly over the budget speeches over the years, I have found that one thing is noticeable, namely that the question of tariffs looms less important now in the budget speeches than it did a number of years ago. I suppose this situation is due, in part at least, to the fact that tariffs are not now looked upon as a source of revenue to the extent they were at one time.

I realize that I am running the risk of committing the sin of oversimplification but it would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that generally speaking the items on which we might have tariffs fall naturally into three classes. First, there is the class of items which we are forced to import, which we do not produce in our own country. In that category, of course, fall such things as citrus fruits, spices and many other things.

It would seem to me that those items as a class should be free of duty, because any duty imposed on them is imposed merely as a source of revenue; and if duties are imposed they increase the cost of living by that amount. I think there are some items in this classification which are not duty free but which might well be. For instance, I believe there are tariffs on some such items as fruit juices, citrus fruits and items of that sort which there is no hope of ever producing in this country. I realize that there are other fruit juices that might be considered to be competitive; nevertheless I think that, generally speaking, there is a large class of goods which should remain duty free.

Then on the other end of the scale there are other items in which this country is pre-eminent and as to which there is no worth-while competition from other countries. In that group you might place nickel, asbestos, perhaps wood pulp and many other things. We do not normally import these articles anyway, because our own national industries can compete effectively with any imports. In these cases it would seem that duties are unnecessary. That leaves, of course, the great group of products which are produced in this country and with which imports compete. That, of course, is the group that gives us the biggest problems when it comes to deciding what items should be protected and what items should not be protected.

In connection with changes in the tariff, I am pleased to note that certain things which are used in the agricultural industry have had the tariffs removed. I refer to such things as agricultural spraying equipment and items of that sort. I feel that is a welcome move to Canadian agriculture and the Canadian people generally. I am also pleased to know that it is intended to refer the question of the tariff on potatoes to the tariff board. To my way of thinking it is a matter of pressing importance that some protection should be given to the Canadian potato grower if at all possible.

The question of arriving at what is a suitable tariff for various imports is further complicated by the fact that our country falls into four different economic areas, the Atlantic provinces, central Canada, the prairies, and British Columbia. A tariff set-up which will please one section and stimulate its economy may not be satisfactory for the others. I suppose the only way you could make everyone happy as far as tariffs are concerned would be to have the reverse of a customs union. You would have to balkanize our tariff system so that it coincided with out naturally balkanized economy. That of course would not be practical.

Therefore the only solution that remains is to try to bring the economy of all parts of the country more into balance. In this connection I think it is fair to say it would be easier to devise a tariff structure that would meet with the approval of all if industry were spread across the country, and if our industrial areas were not so dependent for agricultural products on far-away sources. I was very interested in a brief reference to a certain subject made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. As found at page 2730 of Hansard of April 5, he said:

> There should also be an increase in construction activity in the season now beginning. Indeed, it is clear to all of us that alongside the pushing back of the physical frontiers of our country there is also taking place an expansion of urban facilities which is simultaneously making Canada a land of large cities. This trend toward metropolitan development creates special problems of its own . . .

I am very pleased that the minister recognizes that this trend creates problems. I think it is perhaps one of the most serious trends that has taken place since the war.

If it is allowed to continue and the policies are maintained which permit it to continue, this dangerous and shortsighted program may well lead ultimately to the very destruction of civilization in this country.

If we do a little basic thinking about the matter we will realize that centuries ago, or even up until quite recent times, large cities were a necessity. They were a necessity for defence reasons in early times. In medieval times you had to put a wall around a city. It was necessary to have the people living in a very small area. Cities were necessary for purposes of communication. In those days means of communication were very crude and slow, and you could not communicate rapidly over great distances. There was also the problem of transportation. Everything had to be carried by man, animal or boat.

All these problems have now disappeared. In this connection I should like to quote from a speech delivered at Harvard University in 1930 by Alfred North Whitehead. He said in part:

> Throughout the whole span of civilization up to the present moment, the growth of condensed aggregates of humans, which we call cities, has been an inseparable accompaniment of the growth of civilization. There are many obvious reasons: the defence of accumulated wealth behind city walls, the concentration of power in the form of human muscles and, later, in the form of available heat energy, the ease of mutual intercourse required for business relations, the pleasure from a concentration of aesthetic and cultural opportunities, the advantages of a concentration of governmental and other directing agencies, administrative, legal and military . . . But, if we examine the trend of technology during the past generation, the reasons for this concentration are largely disappearing. Still more, the reasons for the choice of sites for cities are also altering. Mechanical power can be transmitted for hundreds of miles, men can communicate almost instantaneously by telephone, the chiefs of great organizations can be transported by aeroplanes, the cinemas can produce plays in every village; music, speeches, and sermons can be broadcast. Almost every reason for the growth of cities, concurrently with the growth of civilization, has been profoundly modified . . . the effect of new technologies on the sites of cities, and on transformations of cities, is one of the fundamental problems which must enter into all sociological theories. . .

There are, on the other side of the scale, very important reasons why this trend toward a few large cities in Canada should be reversed. In this atomic age large cities can be wiped out almost instantaneously by H-bombs. It would take very few of them to paralyse a very high percentage of the production and population of the country if present trends are permitted to continue. Transportation also is being complicated by the congestion of our larger cities. At the present time we have the contradictory situation of it being necessary to spend millions of dollars in Toronto, and probably in Montreal, for the construction of underground railroads, while at the same time we have applications from our national railways before the board of transport commissioners requesting that services be discontinued in many of the outlying parts of the country because of lack of traffic.

These, Mr. Speaker, are a few of the reasons, but there are many more. I could refer at length to the many complications created by the fact that our population is concentrated in a few centres. For example, it has been calculated that the workers at the A. V. Roe company spend $12,000 a day just getting to work. It has also been calculated that traffic delays in the city of Montreal cost $30 million a year. These are figures which alone would give one reason to believe that we should contemplate doing something about the growing tendency for our industries and our population to congregate in a few large centres.

Ex-mayor McCallum of Toronto was reported in 1949 as saying that he thought his city should grow no larger, but that only senior government action could prevent it. I think that was a true statement, and that it behooves this government to give a lead in the dispersal of industry and population more evenly across the country. I do not mean by this that it would be necessary to uproot present industries, wherever they may be, and transplant them to new areas. But the continued trend to construct new industrial sites around our larger cities definitely should be discouraged.

In other countries something is being done about it. In 1940 the government in Great Britain appointed a royal commission to look into this very problem, as a result of which the new towns act was passed; so that now in Great Britain there are under construction 16 garden cities ranging in population from 30,000 to 80,000.

In the United States the problem has received government recognition. In 1948 the national security resources board issued instructions in industrial locations advocating that no new factories be built adjoining centres of more than 50,000 people. After that report was made, and perhaps partly because of it, only about a third of the new plants built in the United States since 1940 have been located in places with populations over 100,000. So it appears that in that country a concerted effort is being made to deploy the economy and the industry of the country evenly throughout the whole area.

In this connection I should like to quote briefly from an article which appeared in the Community Planning Review for November, 1952, regarding a conference held just prior to that time. It says:

> The theme of the presentation, made by members of our council to the federation of mayors last July, was that the major cities of Canada, and indeed major cities all over the world, have grown beyond the point where they are efficient in terms of industry and commerce, and also beyond the point where they provide happy and satisfactory living for those who must spend their lives in, or in close proximity to, these larger metropolitan areas.

In that connection, in 1946 a survey was taken in the United States by, I believe, Fortune magazine, when it was found that two-thirds of the people living in American cities having populations of over 100,000 were dissatisfied with the environment in which they were forced to live.

I think it should be agreed that this is an important problem about which up to now this government has taken no action. It is a problem which is becoming increasingly acute, and it is a trend which as time goes on it will be more difficult to reverse. I intend now to turn briefly to another subject, but I must say that the one I have just discussed is one I would like to hear debated in the house when the subject of civil defence is under consideration, if indeed it cannot be approached from some other point of view.

I turn now for a few moments to government accounts and to the budget, as such, presented by the minister. During his budget speech he had this to say, as reported at page 2730 of Hansard:

> Assuming normal crops, and if no unforeseen adverse events occur, I would expect our gross national production in 1955 to exceed 1954 by 5 or 6 per cent; that is, it should reach $25¼ billion or perhaps just a bit more, and on that figure I shall base my revenue forecasts.

A little later on he had this to say regarding his predecessor's budget speech of a year ago:

> In his budget speech last year my predecessor projected a scale of expenditures and revenues that almost exactly balanced. He made it clear, however, that his projection was based upon two assumptions, normal crops and an early resumption of our normal rate of industrial expansion. He said explicitly that if these conditions did not materialize there would be a deficit of 2 or 3 per cent. Well, as hon. members know, we had a poor wheat crop, the poorest in 17 years, and the resumption of a normal rate of industrial expansion has been slower than we had hoped. As a consequence we have a deficit equal to 3½ per cent of our expenditures.

My reason for offering these quotations is to remind the house that during the last ten years at least we have been in a period of rising prices. Or, to say this in another way, we have been in a period when the value of the dollar has been going down constantly in the matter of purchasing power. Under those circumstances it is or should be easy indeed for any government to balance its budget, for the simple reason that it pays its commitments in dollars having less purchasing power than dollars had when the commitments were made.

In a period of rising prices, of course, all debtors benefit because their commitments in terms of purchasing power go down. That is a happy situation for any government to find itself in. But, like most benefits of that kind, the old rule that one gets nothing for nothing comes into play; and there will come a day when the situation will be reversed and all debtors, including the government, will find themselves obligated to meet their commitments in dollars with a purchasing power equal to that of the dollars current at the time the commitments were made.

Relatively speaking it has been a simple matter for this government to meet its commitments to the recipients of family allowances and old age pensions in dollars which have only a little more than half the purchasing power of the dollars existing when the commitments were made. The same applies to the interest on the national debt, and all other commitments of government. But from now on there is a strong possibility that this trend will not be so great, and that it may even be reversed.

Under those circumstances the minister admits that the budget will not be balanced. He places his estimate on a very optimistic outlook, so far as gross national product is concerned, measured in dollars. It seems to me that when the inflationary trend stops the actual gross national product may continue to go up as far as goods are concerned, but it may decline as far as dollar value is concerned; and after all it is on the dollar value that the budget is based. So we may be entering a time when it will become increasingly difficult for this or any other government to balance its budget.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that this is a time when every effort should be made to reduce unnecessary expenditures and see to it that the taxpayer gets 100 cents in value for every dollar he is forced to spend. If prices continue to rise in a spiral the cost of living will continue to rise, and that would not be a good thing. We could quite easily reach the inflationary point of no return. Already the cost of living is so high that many Canadians find it difficult to exist.

Not only is the cost of living high under this government; even the cost of dying is very high, and no change has been made in that regard. I note with regret that the Minister of Finance did not see fit to remove the sales tax from such items as coffins, hearses and even flowers, which one places on the graves of deceased persons. It strikes me as almost ghoulish that the government should see fit to enhance its revenue at the expense of those who have been recently bereaved. In most families death is a catastrophe from the financial point of view, even leaving the sales tax on coffins out of consideration.

Some minor reductions have been made in the income tax, and they are welcomed. I regret that no relief whatsoever has been given to the large group of Canadian citizens whose entire tax burden is borne in the form of indirect taxes. I also regret that no relief has been given to the municipalities. The least that could have been done was to make purchases by municipalities exempt from sales tax. I should have liked to see a budget which gave more consideration to the primary producers of this country. It is those who produce goods who cause our standard of living to rise in a material sense. Too much emphasis can be placed on services. Services may be a very convenient thing and in many instances are necessary and contribute to production; but if the accent continues to be placed on services, we may as a nation get to the point where we are trying to be well off and reach prosperity by, if you carry the argument to its logical conclusion, taking in each other's washing.

Mr. Fulton: A very important matter; cleanliness is next to godliness.

Mr. MacLean: But you cannot live on it alone.

The Minister of Finance was very optimistic, or he based his predictions on a very optimistic forecast of industrial and business expansion in the year that lies ahead. I hope that in the interests of the economy of the country, the standard of living and the happiness of all Canadians, his optimism will be realized in fact. I hope that the industrial expansion in the year that lies ahead will exceed his fondest hopes. If it does, I hope he will not attribute it to the very meagre relief he has given by way of tax reductions.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I believe the most important thing to consider in a debate of this kind is the role which we assign to the budget in our modern-day society. There may have been a time in our history when the budget was considered merely as the instrument by which the government raised moneys to carry on the day to day activities of government. But I believe today we have to consider that the budget is also an instrument of social and economic planning. It is a means of dealing with the major economic difficulties facing the nation. It is on that basis that we ought to consider the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance, and judge whether or not it contributes to a solution of the outstanding problems facing Canada at the present time.

Before dealing with the broader aspects, I should like to make a very brief reference to a number of specific provisions or perhaps omissions in the budget. Great emphasis was laid on the reduction in the personal income tax but I wish to draw to the attention of the house the fact that there are a great many people in Canada who do not pay income tax, for the simple reason that they have never earned sufficient money to become liable for taxation. I checked the latest figures available, and I must say at the outset that they are 1952 figures. I do not believe percentage-wise there is a great deal of difference between the figures of that year and the figures of last year.

I found that in Canada in 1952 there were over half a million Canadians, some 594,980 to be exact, who had incomes of under $1,000; there were over 403,000 Canadians earning incomes of from $1,000 to $2,000; there were some 251,000 Canadians earning incomes of between $2,000 and $3,000; and some 20,000-odd earning between $3,000 and $3,500. These figures give us a total of some 1,276,610 Canadians who, during that year, were not liable to income tax simply because their incomes did not make them liable for such tax.

Bearing these figures in mind we have to ask ourselves this question. What has the budget done for this great number of Canadian citizens? It has given them no tax relief whatsoever, and I remind the house that these are the people in greatest need. I suggest that when the government is bringing in some measure of tax relief it should be directed toward those who are in greatest need. If the government has operated on that principle there would have been a different sort of tax reduction provided for in this budget.

We have to ask ourselves, what has the budget done for our senior citizens on old age pensions? What is in this budget in the way of tax relief for our blind pensioners, for those on war pensions and war veterans allowances, or for the vast number of Canadian citizens who are on small pensions of one kind or another, such as former railroaders, for example, who are seemingly trying to exist on pensions as low as $25 a month? There is no tax relief for these people in this budget.

When the Minister of Finance brought down his budget and there was a tremendous amount of desk-thumping by supporters of the government, it seemed to me that it was an indication of an attitude of mind. They were pleased with the budget even though it had overlooked the needs of the great number of Canadian citizens who are not earning enough money to pay income tax, and in 1952 there were over 1,200,000 Canadians in that category. As I pointed out, there is no tax relief whatsoever in this budget for Canadian citizens in the greatest need. I remind those supporters of the government who were so enthusiastic the night the budget was brought down that this budget has shown a callous disregard for the plight of many of our citizens.

I would call attention to the deceptive manner in which the government tried to get this across to this house and indirectly to the people of Canada. A great play was made on reductions in the income tax, and we were told that the income tax deductions were going to vary according to income. We were told that those in the lower income brackets were going to get a tax reduction of 13·2 per cent, and then we were told in the next breath that those in receipt of high incomes were going to get a tax relief of only 2·8 per cent.

I wonder who the government thought they were fooling with that sort of subterfuge. No matter how you figure it out it means a 2 per cent blanket reduction across the board. The government brought this in in a deceptive manner and tried to convey the impression that there was some fairness and equity in the manner in which these reductions were being made, when all the time there was plain evidence that the income tax reductions amounted to a flat 2 per cent reduction across the board.

There is no justice or equity in that sort of tax relief. A 2 per cent reduction across the board means a lot more for the big fellow than it does for the small fellow. When we look closely at the figures we find that a married man with two children having an income of $3,000 will get tax relief this coming year of $14. On the other hand the taxpayer who is in receipt of an income of $20,000 will get tax relief amounting to $354. Is that the Liberal concept of equity and fairness in a tax program, that the person who needs help, the person with a low income, gets a niggardly $14 reduction in income tax while the man earning $20,000, who certainly is not on the verge of being poverty stricken, gets tax relief amounting to $354? I ask, is that the Liberal concept of fairness and equity in a tax program?

If the government had wished to do something to reduce the tax load on the people of this country who most need relief they could have done that by reducing the indirect sales tax. I would venture the opinion that the average family in Canada in the lower income groups, perhaps those at the lowest level of liability for income tax purposes, will pay about twice as much in sales tax during the year as they will pay in income tax. So if the government had been anxious to give tax relief to those who are in greatest need they would have brought about a reduction in the field of indirect taxes.

There are not too many figures available with respect to this problem in Canada, but I have noted a survey and study prepared for the United States congress in 1941 entitled "Who Pays the Taxes?" This report reveals that in the United States indirect or consumption taxes took from 16 to 20·6 per cent of the income of those receiving incomes under $3,000. For the income group earning from $10,000 to $15,000 indirect or consumption taxes took only 9·9 per cent of income. In the case of those earning $15,000 up to $20,000 the indirect and consumption taxes took only 8·8 per cent of income, and in the case of those earning more than $20,000 the indirect or consumption taxes took only 5·7 per cent of income.

Therefore it is quite obvious that the indirect tax bears most heavily on the low income group. The figures supplied in this study would indicate that indirect taxes bear about four times as heavily on the lower income group as they do on the higher income group. The reason is quite obvious. A person on a low income must spend all of his income on consumer goods, whereas the man with a higher income can afford to put money aside in savings. Therefore the lower the income the greater the amount of money spent on consumer goods.

I repeat that if this government had been anxious to provide a measure of tax relief for the lower income groups of this country they would have gone about reducing the indirect taxes.

On motion of Mr. Ellis the debate was adjourned.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUPER CONTINENTAL TRAIN—ANNOUNCEMENT WITH RESPECT TO PASSES

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement which I think would be of interest to hon. members concerning the Super Continental train. The management of the Canadian National Railways has advised me as follows: The number of cars making up the new Super Continental, which commenced operation between Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver on April 24, must be limited to enable these trains to hold their new fast schedules. This limitation, coupled with the very large expenditure involved in providing new equipment for and operating these new trains, has placed upon the Canadian National the obligation of deriving the fullest passenger revenue from the new service and of ensuring sufficient accommodation for all revenue passenger traffic offered. For these reasons the following restrictions have been placed on passes:

1. No pass held by railway personnel of any rank or by other than railway personnel will be accepted for transportation on the Super Continental, unless such pass is accompanied by a special permit issued under authority of the office of the president.

2. So far as railway personnel are concerned, such special permits will be issued only when it is considered to be in the company's interest to have the employee use the Super Continental; but, in the cases of holders of passes other than Canadian National personnel, applications for such permits will be given appropriate consideration.

The Canadian National is thus making every effort to reserve sufficient accommodation on the new train for revenue passengers, but the action being taken will, of course, in no way affect the rights of members of the Senate or of the House of Commons to use their certificates to travel on the Super Continental when it suits their convenience to do so. Special consideration will be given to applications for permits for dependents of members of the Senate and of the Commons accompanying them.

I think the last phrase is the best part of the statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fulton: May I take it from what the minister has just read that members of parliament and their families will not be welcomed on board either of the new trains?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, I hope that when the hon. member reads my statement tomorrow he will find there is a little more warmth in it than he has suggested.

Mr. Fulton: I doubt it.

[Later:]

INQUIRY AS TO PROPORTION OF ROLLING STOCK TO BE MANUFACTURED IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister state what proportion of the new rolling stock required in the operation of the Super Continental train of the Canadian National Railways will be manufactured in Canada?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I will take my hon. friend's question as notice. It is not the kind of information that I ordinarily would be carrying in my possession. I shall make inquiries and give him an answer as soon as I can.

COMPARISON OF RUNNING TIME WITH THAT OF C.P.R.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the present interest in the dieselized trains which left Montreal and Vancouver yesterday, can the minister explain why passengers on the Canadian National should spend two hours and ten minutes longer on the train going from Montreal to Vancouver than those on the competing train when, prior to dieselization, the Canadian Pacific Railway train was only able to beat the Canadian National Railways train by fifteen minutes?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I received notice of my hon. friend's question just a few minutes before coming into the house. I shall institute inquiries and, as soon as I have an answer, I shall communicate the information to him.

Questions

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I beg leave to table under the provisions of section 18, paragraph 2, of the Canadian National Railways Act, chapter 140, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, a copy of order in council P.C. 1955-519, dated April 6, 1955, withdrawing from entrustment to the Canadian National Railway Company the Hillsborough bridge, which forms part of the Prince Edward Island railway.

MARITIME COAL PRODUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

STATEMENT OF OPERATIONS FOR YEAR ENDED MARCH 31, 1955

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): In accordance with section 9 of the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act, I have the honour to lay on the table statement of the operations for the year ended March 31, 1955. One new loan was granted during the year.

MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

AVAILABILITY OF FRENCH EDITION OF MAP OF CANADA

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I believe some hon. members would be interested to know that a French edition of the map of Canada, on the scale of 100 miles to the inch, is now available for distribution at 50 cents a copy.

QUESTIONS

SALES TAX APPEALS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Is the tariff board authorized to hear appeals against sales prices determined by the Minister of National Revenue as the basis for computation of the sales tax?

2. If not, is consideration being given to the tariff board being granted such authority, or to the setting up of a sales tax appeal board to deal with this and other questions relating to the administration of the sales tax?

Mr. McCann:

1. No.

2. The Minister of Finance is reported on page 2739 of Hansard, April 5, 1955, to have indicated in his budget speech on that date that it is proposed to invite a small committee to look into the present statutory provisions with respect to the base on which the tax rate applies and to study this and other technical problems and to make recommendations.

[Mr. Marler.]

C.N.R. LAY-OFFS, ONTARIO

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron):

By Ontario districts, how many employees of the car department of the Canadian National Railways have been laid off during (a) the year 1954; (b) the months of January, February and March, 1955?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the hon. member and explained to him that the Canadian National Railways do not assemble employment figures by districts, and in consequence it is not possible to answer the question as asked. If the hon. member would care to rephrase his question, the management will give the employment information that is available.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE PAYMENTS, MANITOBA

Mr. Pommer:

1. How many veterans in Manitoba are in receipt of war veterans allowance?

2. Of these, how many receive additional payments under the special assistance fund?

He said: On the advice of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs I should like permission to withdraw this question for rewording.

Mr. Speaker: Withdrawn.

CAMP PETAWAWA SURVEY

Mr. Harkness:

1. Were Beauchemin and Hurter, of Montreal, given a contract to make a survey of Camp Petawawa?

2. If so, when was this work done, what were the terms of the contract and what was the final cost?

3. What was the purpose of the survey and why was it needed?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes.

2. The work was done in 1951 and 1952. The contract provided for:

(1) A control and contour survey of the existing camp and three new areas.

(2) Preparation of a site plan for new camp.

(3) Preparation of record drawings of the existing camp.

(4) Report on water, sewer, storm drainage in existing camp.

(5) Report on the roads of the existing camp.

The cost of survey work was $45,758.20.

3. The original purpose of the survey was to provide the necessary topographical data needed to prepare plans for a new camp to meet mobilization requirements (as indicated in "Canada's Defence Program" (1951-52) at page 14, paragraph 61). The data was actually used as the basis for the preparation of plans for home station development at Camp Petawawa (as indicated in "Canada's Defence Program" (1954-55) at page 42, paragraph 165). It also provided a model for other surveys, particularly that at Camp Gagetown.

2. (a) What was the estimated number of automobiles made by each manufacturing company in the hands of dealers at the time of the increase on which the lower excise tax had been paid? (b) What was the value of the automobiles in each case?

Mr. McCann:

1. (a) April 11, 1951. From 15 to 25 per cent. (b) No information as to the number. The excise tax would not have been paid on domestic automobiles in manufacturers' hands.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION ACCOUNTS

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., exchanged between the office of the Auditor General and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and/or the Minister of National Revenue, since January 1, 1950, relating to the accounts of the said corporation.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, this is a rather unusual motion for the production of papers. I say that because the Auditor General informs me that a similar motion for the production of papers was moved by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) on January 28, 1953. The Auditor General states that that was the first time in his experience that correspondence of the Auditor General had been called for. At that time the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stated, as reported on page 1398 of Hansard:

> The Auditor General is always available to appear before the public accounts committee when his presence is desired, and it is open to any hon. member to address to him any question he may see fit to put to him directly.

The committee on radio broadcasting is sitting and I suggest that the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) would have the same opportunity as was indicated on that former occasion to go before the committee on radio broadcasting and ask any questions which he might desire to ask with reference to what he has in mind.

The Auditor General is presently in New York at the United Nations where he acts in the capacity of auditor, but he has signified to me his willingness to appear before the committee on radio broadcasting at any time and is prepared to answer any questions or not answer any questions which might be put before him. If that is acceptable to the hon. gentleman I make that suggestion to him; otherwise I shall have to oppose the motion.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the suggestion made by the Minister of National Revenue is one which I do not think I can accept as dealing adequately with the situation. To my mind this is a motion which involves the rights and privileges of every member of parliament. The Auditor General is a servant of parliament. I feel that parliament is entitled to obtain the production of correspondence between the Auditor General and departments or agencies of government.

I would point out that in days gone by it was the practice of the Auditor General to include in his report to parliament copies of correspondence which he had exchanged with various departments and officials of departments. I have in my hand one copy of the Auditor General's report in which a number of letters are reproduced. I do not know when this practice was discontinued, but I do suggest that inasmuch as the Auditor General in some cases in his current report refers to correspondence with government departments, and particularly as in this case in connection with the C.B.C. he has reproduced that correspondence in part, it is perfectly within the rights of parliament, whose servant he is, to ask for the production of the full correspondence in order that we may be in possession of the facts.

The public accounts committee has not been set up for this year. I myself am not a member of the committee on radio broadcasting, and I would not consider it proper to suggest that some other member should cease to be a member of that committee in order that I might pursue this matter there.

I rest my position on the basis that parliament is entitled to the production of full correspondence between the Auditor General, its servant, and any government department or agency.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think that anyone would contest the right of parliament to require the Auditor General to produce any correspondence, but inasmuch as the Auditor General in the discharge of his responsibility to parliament prepares a report I suggest that it would not be in the best interests of proper administration to have him feel that any correspondence he had had with departments for the purpose of preparing his report, which it is his responsibility to deliver to parliament, would itself be subject to publication in the house. It seems to me that if we have, and I think we all have, implicit confidence in the manner in which the Auditor General discharges his responsibility as such we should not establish any practice which might hamper him in the methods he adopts to get the information which it is his responsibility to communicate to the house.

I am sure that when he attaches correspondence to his report he does so because he feels that that is proper in the discharge of his responsibility, and when he does not do so it is because in his best judgment he is otherwise giving parliament all the information which his duty requires him to divulge. I do not think it is a matter of the right of this house to insist that correspondence be produced. The house should determine in the proper exercise of its discretion whether it will make that a feature of the duties of the Auditor General or whether it will continue to leave it to him to discharge, in the light of his oath of office, the responsibility he has to parliament whose appointee he is.

Perhaps the motion could be allowed to stand while the hon. gentleman conferred with the Auditor General, as I know we all do at times. I think we are all agreed that we would have the right to make an order, but what we have in mind is whether it is desirable that this order be made or not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister state whether the Auditor General has indicated to him that he does not desire to produce the correspondence which he had in the course of his investigation or examination?

Mr. St. Laurent: I have not been in touch with the Auditor General this time. I was in touch with him in 1953 and to my knowledge that was the first time this matter arose.

The conclusion was reached that we would have the right to compel him to produce correspondence but it would not be desirable to do so, and there was the fact that he was available to be heard before the committee to explain the situation.

I know that there is correspondence, which constitutes one of the ways taken by the Auditor General to secure the information. I would not like to have this house decide that it did not have the right to compel any of its appointees to produce anything that is in his possession as such appointee, but I would also like to have the Auditor General feel that there was no reflection upon the way in which he was discharging his responsibilities in any motion that was adopted here. I think that, if we were to allow it to stand, a solution might be reached that would respect in every way the rights of this house as one of the branches of parliament and would also avoid doing anything that might interfere with the regular discharge of the Auditor General's responsibilities.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker may I say with respect that I think the suggestion of the Prime Minister is reasonable under the circumstances.

I should however say that I myself have not received any communication from the Auditor General indicating that he would have any reluctance to produce the correspondence in question. Apparently the Minister of National Revenue has had some communication either with or from the Auditor General, but I have not. I would have thought that if there was actual objection that objection would have been communicated to me. In the absence of such communication I would be surprised to find that there was objection.

However, I think the request of the Prime Minister is certainly reasonable under the circumstances, and I would be agreeable to having the motion stand for the purpose of such communication as may be deemed appropriate with or from the Auditor General.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask a question of the Prime Minister in this connection? Could the Prime Minister explain the change which, I understand, has taken place, whereby the correspondence which used to be included by the Auditor General is not now included?

Mr. St. Laurent: My understanding, Mr. Speaker, is that the correspondence was not usually included. There were at times included parts of the correspondence exchanged with departments that the Auditor General felt would be explanatory of the report he was making, but there are frequent exchanges of notes which are merely initialled for the purpose of obtaining explanation about matters upon which the Auditor General feels he should report. No one could object to attaching to his report any correspondence that he felt was of a nature that would further explain the report. It is only to leave with the Auditor General a certain measure of discretion in the manner in which he feels he is properly discharging his responsibilities to parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion stand?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, in fairness to the Auditor General, and in answer to the question by the hon. member for Kamloops, I must say that he raised no objection whatever. I have had absolutely no communication or correspondence with him, and, in talking the matter over with the officials of his department, he indicated that he was busy in New York and would not be back for some time. He indicated to his officials the stand which I have stated here, that he would be prepared to come before the committee on radio broadcasting and answer any questions that might be put forth. The hon. member, although he is not a member of the committee on radio broadcasting, could within his rights as a member of parliament appear there or be substituted for some member who is presently a member of the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion stand? Stand.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE ACCOUNTS

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., exchanged between the office of the Auditor General and the Department of National Defence or the minister or any official of the said department, since January 1, 1950, relating to the accounts of the said department.

He said: I assume, Mr. Speaker, that under the circumstances this motion could stand too, although I do not know whether it could be dealt with under the same arrangement as just suggested by the Minister of National Revenue, because there is no committee on national defence. Let it stand for the time being.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

BALLANTYNE PIER, VANCOUVER—ELEVATOR

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between any department of government and Kerr, Gifford and Company, since the 1st day of January, 1953, in connection with the elevator at the Ballantyne pier at Vancouver, together with correspondence from any elevator companies containing offers or negotiations for the rental or leasing of the said elevator.

Mr. Marler: I have no objection to the adoption of the motion, but I would suggest that it be amended to include the national harbours board, as I understand that otherwise no correspondence would be produced on the motion. I would therefore suggest that the motion be changed by adding "between any department of government or the national harbours board". We have no objection to the adoption of the motion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank my hon. friend, and I would appreciate having that amendment placed before the house.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry as amended?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EAST BURNABY, B.C. POSTAL STATUS

Mr. Goode:

For a copy of all petitions and letters exchanged from June 1, 1954 to date, between the deputy postmaster general and any persons, protesting the changes in postal status of East Burnaby (Burnaby 3), British Columbia.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I have just spoken to the hon. member and he has agreed to amend the wording as follows "between the Postmaster General, the deputy postmaster general and other officials of the Post Office Department and any persons" and so on.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry as amended?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COAL

REPORTED CLOSING OF NOVA SCOTIA MINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys? My question arises out of a telegram received from the president of district 26 of the united mine workers, Nova Scotia, and also out of a statement which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald on the 23rd of this month. Can the minister inform the house as to what plan he had to prevent the closing of No. 1-B colliery at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, to whom this plan was outlined, and what steps were taken to provide consultation between the union, the company and the provincial government of Nova Scotia?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. friend for giving me short notice of his intention to ask this question. Some two years ago the officials of the district and local branch of the union, together with representatives of the provincial government of Nova Scotia and the Dominion Coal Company, met in my office to discuss the problems of No. 1-B colliery. At that time the colliery was facing a temporary shutdown in order that the company could carry out certain mechanization. The whole problem was very thoroughly discussed at that time and it was established that the real problem was the high cost of production. The difficulties at 1-B colliery have been known to both the union and the company for at least two years. My information is that the cost of production per ton of coal in that colliery is at least $2 above the average in the district. The problem of reducing costs so that the coal can be sold competitively is a problem that only the company and the union can solve. Although, as I have said, this is a matter between the company and the union, my recent efforts have been to find out if everything possible is being done to reduce the cost of production in that colliery.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? The minister is quite correct in saying that it is not a new situation. The mine did close at that time and was reopened. Is the story in the Herald on the 23rd correct, that you had a plan to keep that mine in operation at the present time and that you had talked about it with someone from Nova Scotia who you anticipated would organize your plan in that province at that time?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Speaker, I have not read the story in the Herald. As I have said, I have been endeavouring to get all parties concerned together in a co-operative effort to solve the cost problem in that colliery.

Mr. Gillis: The story in the Herald carries your picture. You should have a look at it.

[Later:]

ESTIMATED AMOUNT TO BE SHIPPED FROM NOVA SCOTIA TO CENTRAL CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Buchanan (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Is the minister in a position to give the house any information on the volume of coal likely to be shipped from Nova Scotia to central Canadian points now that the St. Lawrence river is open to navigation?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): At this time of the year the companies desiring to ship coal up the St. Lawrence river under freight subvention usually ask for acceptance by the dominion coal board for that purpose. I have been told by the coal board that acceptances this year are well over two million tons but somewhat less than for the same period last year. However, acceptances asked for this year are considerably higher than the actual tonnages shipped last year.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR DATE OF FINAL PAYMENT ON 1953-54 POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has any decision been made by the wheat board yet as to when the final payment for wheat of the 1953-54 crop will be made. Will the minister bring to the attention of the board the necessity of the early expediting of this payment to the end that it might be of assistance in the seeding operations of western farmers?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. At the same time I have received a similar one from the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue):

> Is the inventory cut-off for the 1953 wheat crop now being made? Can the minister say how soon after the cut-off the wheat board will begin making the final payment so that the wheat producers' critical financial position can be improved?

The answer is that the wheat board has issued instructions to its agents to report as at the close of business on April 29, 1955, on stocks of wheat in their hands in order that accrued charges may be calculated.

This marshalling of information is, of course, essential to the closing of the pool and will make possible an earlier date for the commencement of payment than would be possible if the board had waited until the actual cut-off date to issue its instructions to its agents.

It will take the wheat board approximately two to three weeks to prepare and audit their accounts with respect to the 1953-54 wheat pool. As soon as the amount of the final payment is established, steps will be taken at once to distribute the cheques to the producers.

[Later:]

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF EMBARGO ON EXPORT OF SELKIRK WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. Pommer (Lisgar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I did not send him notice. Has his department given any consideration to removing the embargo on the export of Selkirk wheat at this late date in April?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Yes; consideration has been given, and we have advised that the export of Selkirk wheat should not be allowed at this time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN FORCES IN KOREA—CONTINUING COMMITMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether any decision has yet been reached as to the future of the Canadian forces in Korea, and if he is in a position to give the house any information as to the continuing commitment accepted by Canada in that regard. If he is not able to do so, perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) might be able to give us some information.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to make a statement on the matter within the next few days.

Mr. Fulton: As a supplementary question I should like to ask whether the second battalion of the Black Watch, I think it is, are still standing by at their camp in the maritimes?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHINA-UNITED STATES—REFERENCE TO PROPOSAL OF CHOU EN-LAI

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister any statement to make to the house concerning Chou En-lai's proposal for direct negotiations between China and the United States, and has he any statement to make on reactions over the week end to this proposal?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything I can usefully say, on the orders of the day, on a matter of such great importance. On the general question, I think I said all I could say in our external affairs debate which ended last Thursday.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED REPRESENTATION OF LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister now in a position to tell the house whether the subject of unemployment will be discussed at his conference with the provincial premiers meeting this week? If so, will organized labour have an opportunity of sending any representatives to that conference?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is not a conference with organized labour. It is a conference with the heads of provincial governments. As to the first part of the question, may I say that it is my intention to suggest that relief for needy persons, whether employable or unemployable, be discussed at this meeting with the provincial premiers.

Mr. Argue: How about work for them?

Mr. St. Laurent: If the hon. member has any job available, I shall be glad to note it and to bring it to the attention of the provincial premiers.

Mr. Argue: What about the other 600,000?

Mr. Fulton: The opposition is always ready to accept its responsibility. What about the government?

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister with regard to the responsibility for unemployed employables. What attitude is the Prime Minister going to take at the conference—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —as to the liability of the federal authority for these people, which was accepted in 1945?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, there was no liability accepted in 1941 or in 1945. There was a proposal made in 1945 which was not accepted—

An hon. Member: By whom?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. St. Laurent: Not accepted by the provincial ministers who were present at that conference.

Mr. Argue: Only one.

Mr. St. Laurent: It was not accepted by the provincial ministers at that conference.

An hon. Member: How many?

Mr. St. Laurent: There were nine provinces then and there were nine provincial premiers.

An hon. Member: He would not know that.

Mr. St. Laurent: The proposal was one that was made as an over-all proposal to all the provincial governments, and it was not accepted. I think as Canadians we all recognize that it would be unfortunate if there continued to be uncertainty about whom needy persons should apply to for assistance when required.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is not so much a question of constitutional responsibility. Although we still maintain that the residual constitutional responsibility for those in need who are not covered by unemployment insurance is that of the provinces and their agencies, nevertheless I think as a Canadian that there should be some solution to this problem. I think as a Canadian that it is a problem that has to be administered by the local authorities and that people in need should not be directed from one place to another and thence to another.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent: There should be one authority that would deal with them, and the burden involved in dealing with them is something that should be borne as it is borne, no matter through whose hands it passes, by the Canadian taxpayers, it being a burden that falls upon the public. That has been the case. I think it is impracticable to try to differentiate between needy persons who are in need because they cannot do work and those who are in need because they cannot find work and are not covered by unemployment insurance. That is a matter of degree and opinion which, if it remains, will not remove the uncertainly as to one authority saying that a person is employable and the other authority saying that the same person is not employable and therefore should be dealt with by somebody else.

I hope we can face this situation as a humanitarian problem that concerns all of us as Canadian citizens and work out some arrangement whereby the needy will be dealt with by one authority and the burden of having done so will then be borne in a manner that will provide for efficient and provident administration.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of his interesting and informative statement, he does not agree it is a pity that this government waited for nine years—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton:—before reconvening the conference to deal with the problem?

Mr. St. Laurent: I hope from now on that question will be dealt with by us as Canadians and not as Canadians belonging to any particular party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton:—so do I, but I think it is a pity it took the Prime Minister nine years to reach that decision.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did the Prime Minister mean by his last statement? What is the inference?

Mr. St. Laurent: The inference is that this matter should not be a political football and that, so long as it is a political football and we do not approach it as good Canadian citizens feeling for the needs of our fellow Canadians who may be in need, I do not think it is as apt to be considered on its real merits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: You are nine years late in finding that out.

An hon. Member: Stop kicking it around.

POLIOMYELITIS

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF SALES TAX ON SALK VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister aware that Salk polio vaccine is being sold to the public, and has the government now made a decision as to the removal of sales tax on such purchases?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of what the hon. member for York West has said with reference to the private sale of vaccine. The government has made a decision that there will be no sales tax on polio vaccine. I just want to say a word or two in connection with this matter.

When the hon. member asked his question last Thursday, he had not given me notice of it at all. I told him that the matter was already under consideration by the government. The difficulty was as to how you are going to do these things. It could be done in two ways, either by remission of the tax or by a statutory change under the budget regulations whereby it would be put upon the free list. At that time the decision was not made. In this connection I might say that I was subjected to what I thought was a little bit of unfair criticism by the Toronto Globe and Mail when it said that there never should have been any delay. The delay was not about policy but rather about the method of accomplishing the desired result.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): As a supplementary question, may I ask whether notice has gone out to the interested parties that this tax has been removed?

Mr. McCann: Not yet; but it will be generally known shortly.

IMMIGRATION

UNDESIRABLE ALIENS—INQUIRY AS TO ARREST AND DEPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister issued warrants for the arrest of any of those originally named by me on April 6 as undesirable aliens subject to deportation from Canada?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I do not think there is any question of issuing warrants for arrest. One of the persons who was mentioned by the hon. member on Friday has been detained and has been ordered deported.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFITS TO MAY 31

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Can the minister say whether he has replied to the request of the Canadian Congress of Labour in a letter a couple of days ago asking for legislation to extend supplementary unemployment insurance benefits to May 31? If so, what reply did the minister give?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I have received the request referred to by my hon. friend but I have no reply to make other than that which I made immediately before the Easter recess, namely, that this whole matter had received the most exhaustive study not only by the commission but by the government and it had been decided to maintain the limiting dates from January 1 to April 15.

FOREIGN AIRCRAFT

THIRD PARTY DAMAGE—PROVISION TO IMPLEMENT CONVENTION

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. 263, to implement the convention on damage caused by foreign aircraft to third parties on the surface.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I think I might take a few moments to say that, although it has been indicated to us by the minister we are left in the position of having to accept this legislation and the schedule contained therein in full, it should at least be remarked in passing that there are some serious shortcomings in the legislation. I make that statement notwithstanding the fact the legislation is of a type sorely needed so far as the regulation of air traffic is concerned. I will be brief and will refer to individual points which I think show that in the over-all picture sufficient consideration has not been given to the various items that have been covered.

In the first instance, because of the mechanical requirements set up covering security which must be complied with by the various contracting parties, in order to cover, by insurance or otherwise, damage claims which may arise, we find that we have placed ourselves in the position that a virtual embargo may be placed upon the entry of our aircraft into another country at the whim or fancy of that foreign country. I say that because it appears that the type of security which may be offered may be rejected by any contracting party, and although arbitration is provided in some instances, it would still be possible for that contracting party to refuse admittance to our aircraft. In that respect, I would say that this condition is the same condition as has arisen in connection with some of our trade policies where we bound ourselves under agreements, and at the same time allowed some discretionary power to one of the contracting parties to admit or refuse our goods as they saw fit. In connection with that point, I may say that these provisions are set out in chapter III of the schedule to the agreement.

[Mr. Knowles.]

The second point with which I should like to deal is found in chapter II of the schedule, where we find that the compensation to be paid is tied to the French gold franc. I must say that before the minister explained the meaning of tying the compensation to the French gold franc, I had serious misgivings as to just what compensation parties in Canada might obtain under a valuation of that kind. But even with the explanation which has been given, and even with the tie-up to the French gold franc, we are still left to obtain our compensation on the basis of the amount which may be paid from time to time by the United States for one ounce of gold. Even using that type of valuation, there is nothing to ensure that in the future the number of francs which are provided to cover compensation to an injured party might not be entirely inadequate.

The third point to which I shall refer is that there is no protection afforded to parties on the ground injured as a result of accidents which occur in the use of the aircraft prior to the actual application of power for the takeoff or subsequent to the removal of power upon landing the aircraft on the runway. There is no coverage whatever in those two individual cases, from the time the aircraft touches down until it is at rest at the airport with its engine shut off, nor do we have coverage from the time the aircraft is warmed up on the tarmac and is removed to the runway for full power to be applied for the takeoff. Those provisions are contained in chapter I of the schedule. It seems to me we have been remiss in not obtaining complete coverage for people on the ground from the actual time the ignition switch is turned on in the aircraft until it is turned off after the passengers have alighted.

The fourth point is that, upon examination, we have found there is a continuing liability on the owner of the aircraft for a period of time after the complete legal disposal of title to the aircraft itself. I think perhaps in connection with this point there was the intention to provide the same type of continuing insurance coverage for injured parties as we have now provided in a number of public liability and property damage policies covering the use of automobiles. However, I feel that this provision may present a real obstacle in so far as our own airlines are concerned. As an example, in connection with Trans-Canada Air Lines re-equipment program, there may be disposal of numerous aircraft to foreign countries and we may find our government-owned airline bearing a continuing responsibility notwithstanding the removal of any legal title to the aircraft in question. These provisions are contained in chapter I of the schedule.

My fifth point concerns the question of the procedure used in obtaining execution of judgments which may be obtained in connection with this legislation. The minister has been fair in pointing out that no greater rights are obtained through this legislation than have been available to any private party heretofore in attempting to obtain execution of a judgment in a foreign country. I feel that should have been one of the main reasons for drafting this type of legislation, to ensure that in the execution of a judgment for a valid damage claim no particular impediment might be placed by the country in whose territory the assets or insurance fund lies. These provisions are contained in chapter IV of the schedule. Execution of the judgment may be refused if the judgment concerned is contrary to the public policy of the state in which execution is requested. What public policy may be in any number of South American countries, I would not know. There might be a complete inability to issue execution and obtain repayment of any damage claims.

My sixth point is that there has been a very feeble effort in chapter II of the schedule to provide some type of preference for persons who have personal injury claims. The fund has been divided into two parts, for personal injuries and for property damage. There is a residual clause that if money is available after property damage has been completely paid, that money will go into the personal injury fund. At the same time, that does not definitely cover the situation. I feel there will be numerous claims where personal injuries have been suffered and, because of the division of the insurance fund, the person who has been injured may end up by getting a payment of 10 cents on the dollar whereas someone who has suffered property damage only may receive 100 cents on the dollar.

My seventh point is the usual one. Again we are being asked to agree to proposals which have been contributed mainly by representatives of the United States. As usual, too, we are being asked to ratify the agreement before that country ratifies it. Again the minister has been very fair and has stated that only a small percentage of the actual flights over Canadian territory as of this date are going to be covered by this agreement. Until such time as the United States does formally accept this agreement, then the coverage that will be available to Canadians will be restricted to a great extent. I believe it is the responsibility of the government, in presenting legislation of this type, to see that we are not being presented with the hollow shell of an agreement which reads well but does not afford the protection it is intended to afford.

Finally, I may say that, on questioning in the special committee on transport, the president of the Trans-Canada Air Lines indicated satisfaction with this agreement but I was very surprised to know that this agreement was negotiated entirely without the benefit of the advice of counsel of our two major operating international airlines. It seems to me that if we are to go out in the future under the guise of obtaining some beneficial result for the Canadian public, giving them protection, which undoubtedly is the chief requisite of this agreement, in view of the thousands and thousands of dollars that are spent on delegations of this kind, we should expect that they would seek, and be glad to seek, the counsel of those airlines in our country that are having to deal with these problems day by day.

If we cannot do better than this in the future, we should call on such advice or it would be better for us to stay at home.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Marler: I certainly do not wish to prolong the debate on this measure unduly, but if I may judge from the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, he seems to fail to appreciate that there are manifest advantages in relieving persons on the surface who suffer damage from the necessity of establishing negligence. I take it that the price of not having to prove negligence is the limitation of liability for which the convention provides. As I said in the debate on second reading, I do not think anybody would suggest that this is a perfect convention from every point of view. Particularly, it might be considered that it represents an agreement reached after discussion between some 32 nations in 1952, and that in consequence it is the result of compromise on the part of those who participated in the discussion. I have no doubt it was the best agreement that could then be made.

The hon. member also referred to the fact that the compensation was expressed in gold francs, and complained that if there were a fluctuation in the price of gold, there would thereupon be a fluctuation in the limitation of the liability. Well, that may be a perfectly valid criticism, but it would have been more valid if the hon. member had indicated some means by which the amount of the compensation could have been fixed by some standard other than that which is provided for in the convention. It ties it to the gold franc consisting of 65 grains of gold of fineness 900.

The hon. member then went on, in expressing two or three criticisms of the convention, to complain that it did not provide for the situation where damage occurred before takeoff or after landing. I find that a little contradictory because, after criticizing the convention, he went on to regret that it did not apply for a longer period than that for which it is to apply. In effect, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has failed to appreciate the fact that before takeoff and after takeoff there is no limitation on liability whatsoever. The convention does not protect the operator who causes damage to the person on the surface in these circumstances.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): May I ask a question?

Mr. Marler: Yes.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Of course he does not have any security either, does he, under the circumstances?

Mr. Marler: Well, I suppose that would depend on whether you considered the airplane itself as something having value or not. If, as is usually the case, and I should like to touch on that in reply to another comment of the hon. member, one bears in mind that these foreign aircraft do come into Canada and that there is therefore the process of executing judgment against planes belonging to the operator who has incurred a liability, it would be wrong to say that there was no security. The insurance security might not be so easily attainable, but the fact would remain that the plane would be there. It could be there, and the judgment could be executed, provided the plane was within the jurisdiction of the court which granted the judgment.

With respect to the question of the continuing liability on the owner if he dispossessed himself of the aircraft, perhaps if the hon. member had been the only person who had anything to say in making the convention it would not have contained the clause which it does contain; but, as I said earlier, this is the result of international negotiations between 32 countries, and I do not think we should condemn the convention solely on the ground of this fact of continuing liability.

The hon. member spoke also of the question of the execution of the judgment. I think it is fair to say that the provisions of the convention reproduce in substance what I would assume to be the general provisions of law in any jurisdiction with regard to the execution of the judgments of some foreign court. I do not think there is anything repugnant in the provisions and I think the hon. member, if he were advising a Canadian airline, would be rather glad, when he was defending it against the execution of a judgment rendered in some foreign court, if, under the convention, he could invoke the grounds of defence which are mentioned in the convention itself. Certainly, I would feel much happier if I were in the position of defending one of our airlines from such a judgment if I felt I could oppose execution on the grounds set forth in the convention.

As I said earlier, so far as execution of a Canadian judgment is concerned, the house should not overlook the fact that there is always the possibility of executing against an aircraft when it touches down in Canada, not necessarily immediately but on some future occasion.

The hon. member also spoke of what he described as a feeble effort to protect or to give priority to personal claims. I am sorry that he does not seem yet to understand the provisions of the convention. When we were discussing this matter in committee the other night I tried to show him by giving him a hypothetical example of the division of the proceeds of the insurance that when the proceeds were less than the total amount of the claims those who had claims for personal injury had a priority over those who had claims for property damage.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I had better examples.

Mr. Marler: Well, all I can say is that though the hon. member may have better examples, he cannot find an example anywhere where the property claims would be paid in full without a very substantial proportion at least being paid to those who have claims for bodily injury. At all events, I do not think the convention can stand or fall on this point. On reading the convention one can see that there is no doubt whatever that there is a definite effort, not a feeble effort, as the hon. member said, to give a species of priority to those who have claims for bodily injury.

In conclusion, the hon. member said that the United States of America had not ratified this convention. He referred to the fact that only a relatively small number of flights over Canada were by foreign aircraft. Of course I think that is true. If there is a smaller number of flights there is a decreased possibility of foreign aircraft causing damage to persons on the surface.

I think the convention is a workable document and one which ought to be ratified by parliament. I would add that both the Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian Pacific Air Lines have approved the signing of the convention by Canada and I think it will be in the interests of Canadian aviation to have this convention ratified.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I wonder if the minister would consider one example. Take a building in which there were twenty people and this is destroyed by foreign aircraft. A total of $100,000 in insurance is involved. Each of the twenty people may put in a claim for $10,000, which would total $200,000. The property damage may amount to $50,000.

If I understand the working of the formula correctly, the fund would be divided into two, $50,000 for personal injuries and $50,000 for property damage. Under those circumstances the twenty people each with a claim of $10,000 would receive only a small proportion of their total claims, whereas the property damage would be paid for in full.

Mr. Marler: I have been trying to follow the hon. member as he went along. I shall give him the figures and he can go back and check them afterward. In the case which he has just given the claims for personal injury would be $200,000 and the claim for property damage would be $50,000. The indemnity under the convention is divided into two parts so that $50,000 would be immediately attributable to the claims for bodily injury. There would then be a balance of $150,000 in claims for bodily injuries which were unsatisfied. Those claims to the extent of $150,000 would divide with the claim for property damage amounting to $50,000 the other half of the indemnity, so that the property damage claim would receive $12,500 while the claims for bodily injury would receive $87,500.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I think—

Mr. Speaker: I am enjoying the examples which are being given in order to illustrate certain phases of this convention but I must remind hon. members that we are considering the third reading of a bill and the minister has closed the debate.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

AMENDMENTS WITHDRAWING LANDS, CREATING NEW PARKS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Thursday, April 21, consideration in committee of Bill No. 261, to amend the National Parks Act, and to establish a national park in the province of Newfoundland—Mr. Lesage—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Use of water.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The first part of this bill deals with the use of water in national parks and if it is the wish of the minister to have that first section passed I would agree, but I do want to discuss parks generally when we come to subclause 3. Otherwise I can go ahead now and say what I have to say about the hospitalization plan at Banff.

Mr. Lesage: I do not know what kind of general discussion on national parks the hon. member wishes to have, but I suppose that any discussion on the administration of parks relating to matters in connection with which there are no amendments would be out of order and should be dealt with when the estimates of the department are being considered. I believe what the hon. member desires to discuss is the general situation with regard to the hospitalization plan. That would come under subclause 3. Perhaps hon. members woud agree that we consider this clause by subclauses.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Perhaps the minister would rather that I waited until subclause 3 is before us.

Mr. Lesage: Would it be agreeable to discuss this clause by subclauses?

The Chairman: Is it agreed that for the purposes of discussion we call the subclauses separately?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On subclause 1.

Mr. Harkness: What particular parks is this designed to cover? I presume there are certain parks to which it would apply and certain parks to which it would not apply.

Mr. Lesage: This would apply to all parks, but if my memory serves me right the question was raised last year in connection with Kootenay park.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, this is a provision to permit certain water to be sold to an area just on the edge of Kootenay park?

Mr. Lesage: The situation may arise where we wish to sell water outside a park, which situation I believe is covered by clause 1 (4). Subclause 1 is really for clarification purposes in connection with the supplying of water within a park.

Subclause agreed to.

Subclause 2 agreed to.

National Parks Act

On subclause 3—Hospital services.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): This subclause deals with a matter of great importance to the people in my constituency, particularly those who live at Banff. I realize that this legislation will apply to all national parks and will cover Jasper as well as people who live at Banff. May I say first that I appreciate the minister bringing forward this legislation at this time as it is something the people of Banff have been working on for some considerable time.

Both the hon. member for Acadia and I have discussed this with the minister and the departmental officials in Ottawa on a number of occasions during the past year or so and we are pleased to know that the minister is now bringing down legislation which will make available to the people of Banff the general hospitalization plan which is in effect in Alberta. So that hon. members of the committee may know what we are talking about in a little more detail, may I tell them something about the plan which is proposed for Banff. I should like to quote what Mr. Lee Leavitt, the M.L.A. for Banff had to say about this, as reported in the Banff Crag and Canyon. Referring to the $1 per day, it says:

> Each patient under this plan pays one dollar for each hospital day. The local hospital district and the provincial government share the remaining cost for the standard ward care on a 50-50 basis.

Then it goes on:

> Then there is a separate contract which covers extras, which may be negotiated only if the dollar per day plan is in force. But such agreement is optional. After 25 per cent of the daily set cost of these extras is paid by the patient, the remaining cost is shared again on a 50-50 basis by hospital district and the provincial government.
>
> Proposed new legislation which will be brought before the house—

Meaning the provincial legislature.

> —this session, will make some changes to these present arrangements. In short, it means that, providing a hospital district will also negotiate an agreement covering special services or extras, the cost of both agreements, as described, will be shared by the provincial government on a 40-60 basis. With the government paying the 60 per cent there will be little difference in costs between the alternative plans. The cost of the dollar per day contract, without extras covered, will continue to be shared on a 50-50 basis. The additional contribution by the provincial government will, I am sure, stimulate interest in this hospitalization plan.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you will see that this hospitalization plan is one of the most progressive of the hospitalization plans in all of Canada. Therefore the people of Banff are rightly concerned in their desire to have the federal government amend the parks legislation so that they will be able to share under this plan. It is going to affect every one of the citizens of Banff who are taxpayers, and provision is made also for those who are non-resident if they take out a separate contract with the district and the government to share in this plan. Speaking from memory, I think that the cost of this plan is $8 per individual, or $15 per family a year, giving them access to all these services. But the people of Banff themselves feel that they have the right to share in these hospital benefits in the same way as any other person in Alberta. Of course I think that it is only right and proper that they should have it. Again I say that I am glad that the government has seen fit to come to the same conclusion.

The provincial law which exists now makes the province's share payable to the municipal authorities, and the municipal authorities must collect their own share of that revenue; but there is no municipal authority in Banff. Therefore Bill No. 261, which we are presently discussing, is to make Banff parks an eligible area under the provincial law. Alberta is amending its hospitals act to permit park contributions to be levied and collected from the Banff citizens by the parks superintendent or other person or authority appointed by the government authorities here. I want to make it clear that the amendments in the province of Alberta are making it possible for these collections to be made either by the park superintendent or by some other authority named by the government. I think that is quite clearly borne out by what the minister said the other day in the house. On page 2146 of Hansard he had this to say:

> Hence the provincial laws are going to be amended to say that in the parks the contributions can be levied from the population by the parks superintendents or persons authorized by the park authorities. Our bill is to authorize the government, through the park superintendent—

May I just point out, Mr. Chairman, at that point that, as far as I can read the bill, it does not authorize the park superintendent only to make the collections.

I am pointing that out to you now because I wish to speak about that further a little later on. The bill, as I understand it, makes it possible for the park superintendent or other authority to make the collections.

> Our bill is to authorize the government, through the park superintendent, to receive these contributions paid by people for these hospital schemes which would be established. They could be so established only after a referendum has been taken, according to the provincial acts, in the parks or in the townsites, I am not sure which at this time. It will be easier to follow when I have the bill.

I just bring that to your attention for the purpose which I indicated, Mr. Chairman.

The people of Banff are desirous of having this tax collected by some other authority rather than the park superintendent. Their view—and I shall give it to you categorically in a moment—is generally speaking that, if the park superintendent is one who is going to collect these fees, then of necessity he will be guided, and must be so, by the park regulations, and the people of Banff through their advisory council are of the opinion that they do not relish being under the park regulations, for reasons which I shall give. They do suggest, though, that this collection could be made by the advisory council itself, which is the body chosen by the people in Banff to represent their interests, or it could be collected by the provisional board of the hospital district which is being set up in the Banff area. In that way they contend that it would be more fairly levied and more fairly collected and greater satisfaction would come about all the way through.

I said, Mr. Chairman, that I was going to tell you exactly why the Banff people did not want this under the regulations. This may come somewhat as a surprise to the minister, but I think he will agree with me when he hears my argument that the people of Banff are quite right in what they say. Now, I am reading from a letter dated March 14 from the advisory council. Mr. Shaw is the chairman of the advisory council, and the secretary is Mr. R. E. Edwards, both living in Banff. It says in part—

Mr. Lesage: May I ask the hon. member to whom the letter is addressed?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The letter is addressed to me. He says if the government carries through this present plan—

Those words are my own, and I am beginning to quote from here on.

—apparently this would mean the inclusion of the hospital plan in the parks regulations and this is very definitely opposed by the council. The chief reasons for this opposition are (a) The very unsatisfactory administration of the health and welfare tax and the almost certainty that the hospital tax would be administered in a similar manner. (b) The inclusion of the hospital plan in the parks regulations would render it subject to the same unjust penalties that are incorporated in the welfare tax. (c) The fact that the collection and administration of the hospital tax could be done at least as efficiently, and probably at less cost to the ratepayers, than if handled by the federal government.

They have further explained their views in their letter dated March 24 addressed to me and signed by the secretary. You will understand that they are explaining why they would rather not have the collection under the park regulations. They say:

Non-compliance with any park regulation is liable to a penalty of a fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment for not more than six months, and as the welfare tax is part of the park regulations the section quoted becomes applicable. In cases where a resident has become delinquent in the payment of the welfare tax, it has been the practice of the department to summon him in the police court with the result that he is fined—

And this is the unjust part of it.

—both for non-compliance with a regulation and also the amount of the tax. The section dealing with distraint of goods is not invoked, but the delinquent is really treated as if he were a criminal and in addition he is actually punished twice, which is certainly unjust.

Just in case there should be some question as to whether or not that is the actual law, may I just refer to the regulations; and may I say to you that, when I studied these regulations, I was astonished to find the severity with which this matter can be handled. It refers not only to a delinquent in respect of the payment of a welfare tax, or rather not only would it refer to a delinquent in the payment of his hospital tax, but to anyone who violates any part of the act or any regulation whatsoever, no matter how trivial. Just listen to some of these provisions. I thought I was reading something from the medieval ages when I went over this thing. I am going to suggest to the minister what should be done with it in a few moments. I am reading from page 5 of the regulations. It is chapter 189 of the statutes. It says here:

Penalties and Procedure

Any person violating any provision of this act or any regulation,—

May I stop there to say this, Mr. Chairman. There have been put in force, in the Banff park, regulations of which the people of Banff have had no prior information, and of which they have had no notice. Then when you have penalties like this imposed, the situation becomes outrageous. I am continuing to quote:

—in addition to any civil liability thereby incurred, is liable on summary conviction to a penalty of not more than five hundred dollars,—

Mr. Lesage: Not more than $500.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes; not more than $500.

Mr. Lesage: It could be any amount. It could be 50 cents.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It could be; but I am speaking of the act as it now reads. The minister knows very well that the court could impose a penalty up to $500.

Mr. Lesage: Yes; but have you not confidence in the judgment of our judges?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Do not press me too hard. I continue to quote:

—and in default of immediate payment of such penalty and of the costs of prosecution, such person may be imprisoned with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding six months.

Mr. Lesage: What is astonishing about that provision? It is the usual one.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What is astonishing about it is this. It applies to any regulation whatsoever. The minister told me he was going to give me a lesson in fishing. Incidentally, I may say that I am looking forward to that lesson. But I would advise him not to bring along a fish hook that has three prongs on it because, if he does so, that is a violation. I am told that "two-gang" is the word. I am not a fisherman, but I will be one when the minister gives me a lesson. If you had one of these hooks in your possession, or if the police had reason to suspect that you had one of these in your possession, they can come into your house without a warrant and break into your trunk, your dresser, or into your bedroom if the door is locked and search the house, even on suspicion. Then the next heading is this:

Arrest, Search and Seizure

Any constable or any person having the powers of a constable under the provisions of this act or regulations may, (a) on view,—

That is on sight.

—arrest any person found committing an offence against this act or the regulations or found committing within a park any unlawful act; . . .

It is an unlawful act or it is a violation of the regulations if a person fails to get that old licence for the town cat that I was talking about some months ago. If he fails to pay this $3 licence fee to have a cat in the park, he is subject to a fine of not more than $500 or to six months' imprisonment with hard labour—whoever heard of such a thing?—without even a warrant being necessary. Then part (c) reads as follows:

(c) on view, seize, whether within or without the boundaries of any park, any timber, hay, mineral, fish, mammal or bird, or any part thereof, arms, ammunition, explosives, traps, nets, rods, vessels, boats, vehicles, equipment, outfit, appliance, or any other article whatsoever that he has reason to believe are or have been possessed or used in connection with the commission of a violation of any of the provisions of this act and the regulations.

That means that if I were suspected of having had one of these fish hooks with three prongs on it—that is not the right term but you know what I mean—in the park, the authorities could come into my house in Calgary, without a warrant, and make a search of that house; they could break into any part of it which they desired to break into; and on conviction I would be liable to a penalty of $500 or six months' imprisonment with hard labour.

Mr. Goode: What is the date of the regulation?

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It is the very latest. It is right up to date. It is the revised statutes of 1952.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is now seeking an amendment to section 8 of the National Parks Act. The amending bill which we are now studying does not purport to amend section 8. Moreover, the hon. member started with a premise in which he was giving his reasons why the park superintendent or the park authorities should not be given the power to collect the hospital tax; because, as he says, the council is not satisfied with the way the collection or the levying of the welfare tax in the national parks is being done. Might I refer the hon. member to the regulations governing the levying of the welfare tax in the parks and which cover Banff park. I refer especially to section 7 of these regulations which reads as follows.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What page is that?

Mr. Lesage: It is in the regulations. It is order in council P.C. 1954-14 adopted on the 7th day of January, 1954. Section 7 of it reads as follows:

7. Where a person refuses or neglects to pay a tax within 30 days following demand, the superintendent may levy the amount of the tax by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the person in default together with the costs of the distress and sale.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Of course; but that does not say that these other provisions I have indicated are not applicable. I was just about to say—

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, may I say that section 8 has not been used in the course of levying taxes in the park.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I did not catch that remark.

Mr. Lesage: Section 8 has not been used in the course of levying the welfare tax in Banff park. It is section 7 of the regulations respecting the welfare tax, the section which I just read.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): A moment ago I said that when I got through with the discussion of this part of it, I was going to suggest to the minister what should be done. The minister has now said that these provisions have never been applied. I want to take objection to that statement. They have been applied in part on other occasions. It is no use for us to say that they have not been applied.

Mr. Lesage: Not with respect to the levying of the welfare tax, and that is the only matter with which we are concerned now. In studying the bill we are not concerned with infractions of the fishing laws in the parks. We are interested in the levying of a hospital tax, which is what subclause 3 of clause 1 deals with. I would respectfully ask, Mr. Chairman, that, as the hon. member himself said a few moments ago, we keep in order in discussing the matter of a tax for the establishment of a hospital plan in that park.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I contend that I am perfectly in order. We are discussing the hospital plan and how it is going to be brought about and, as I have indicated, the people of Banff have written to me concerning this matter.

Mr. Lesage: They should have written to me also.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They have discussed it with the minister.

Mr. Lesage: I did not receive any news from them recently.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They have discussed it with the minister. Incidentally, surely the minister is not implying that the people of Banff should not write to their member.

Mr. Lesage: No, but if they want an amendment to the act or if they want special regulations it seems to me it would be better for them to write to me as well as to the hon. member.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. Lesage: They had better write to me, especially since I had quite a discussion with the members of the advisory council last summer. At that time the members of the advisory council seemed well satisfied with the establishment of a poll tax which would be collected by the park superintendent, and the letters read a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Bow River come as a surprise to me.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The minister is getting a little bit mixed up. He probably figured he was on one of those fishing excursions when he was at Banff—

Mr. Lesage: I did not fish for votes.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): —because my information is the only time the advisory council met the minister when he was on that trip was for about half an hour. He indicated to the whole meeting, as I understand it, that he was in a great hurry and did not have too much time to discuss the matter with them. I understand he spoke for about 25 minutes out of the half hour and then, as he was reaching for his hat, he said: "Are there any questions? I have to catch a train."

Mr. Lesage: That is completely unfair. I spent practically a whole morning with the members of the advisory council. We had a full discussion of the problems which the members of the council wished to raise. They presented me with a written brief. We discussed the matters contained in the brief, and the question of a hospital plan came to the fore. I said I was sympathetic to the establishment of such a plan in the parks. I said I would propose to the house at this session an amendment to the parks act to make it possible to establish such a hospitalization plan in the parks, and that is what I am now doing. But there was never any question that there would be any other system than the levying of a poll tax and that collection would be made by the park authorities. It might very well be that some other system will be adopted. But whatever system is adopted, the present amendment—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): On a point of order, I do not mind the minister interjecting to answer a question or to try to correct me if I am wrong, but I wish he would wait until I am through to make his speech. He has made a couple of statements that are causing me some concern. He said there was never any question of anything else except a poll tax. The people of Banff have been unalterably opposed to a poll tax. They have understood from the beginning that there was to be an assessment tax. In fact, the provincial government has gone so far as to say this plan could not possibly be put into operation at Banff on any other basis than an assessment tax because everybody else in the province of Alberta is on an assessment basis. The minister and his department know that to be true. I want to emphasize that. Do not say here that the people of Banff have always advocated a poll tax. They certainly have not. The provincial government has also made it very clear to the authorities at Ottawa that it could only be done on an assessment basis.

When he was discussing the matter a moment ago the minister pointed out that the people there wanted such a plan. Of course they want it. There is no question about that. As I said when I started my remarks, we are all grateful to the minister for bringing in this legislation—although it is only his job—and making it possible for the people of Banff to have hospital service. However, the only thing the federal government has to do is to bring in this little bit of legislation, and the people of Banff and the province of Alberta will do the rest.

An hon. Member: Let them collect it too.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Certainly they would. The people of Banff want it collected either by the advisory council or by the provisional board of the hospital district which is being formed in Banff. Certainly they would do it because, as I have indicated, they do not want to come under these park regulations with these unfair penalties attached to them. In a letter I just read I indicated some of the unfair penalties that have been applied. It is no use for the minister to say that this section has never been applied or that the penalties would not be applied to the hospital plan. Of course they will. They have been applied. If these things are so outdated, why keep them in the act?

I suggest to the minister again that this section should be taken out of the act because it is so ridiculous to think that a person violating any of these regulations should be subject to a $500 fine or six months' imprisonment at hard labour. There may be several reasons why a person could not pay his tax on the date when it was due. There may be several reasons why he had a fish hook with three prongs on it in his house. But is that to say he should be subject to a fine of $500 or six months' imprisonment with hard labour? Of course that is ridiculous. I suggest to the minister he would be doing a service to himself, to the country, and particularly to the national parks of Canada and the people therein, if he would strike this penalty clause from the statute entirely.

At this moment I do not have much more to say. I have pointed out to the minister how grateful the people of Banff are that this amendment has been introduced. I have pointed out to him as strongly as I can why I think there should be certain changes. I have mentioned two very important changes. The first is that the collection of the tax should be allotted by the federal government to the advisory council, the elected body of the people of Banff. The government can do that if they want to without further amendment of the legislation. If not, the collection of the tax should be allotted to the provisional board of the hospital district. In either case, it should not be subject to these park regulations.

In the second place, the tax, without any question, should be on an assessment basis. The provincial government has made it very clear it just would not be feasible to do it on any other basis, and certainly not by means of a poll tax. That is something that is not done in any other part of the province, and the contention is that the same practice should be followed in Banff that is followed in other parts of the province. I hope the minister will take the suggestions I have made into consideration. I do not think he has made a definite decision whether or not the tax will be a poll tax or will be on an assessment basis. I hope he will give this matter consideration. In view of what I have said, in view of the fact the people of Banff do not want it on a poll tax basis but on an assessment basis, and in view of the fact the provincial government insists it shall be that way, I think the government should declare quite candidly at this time that the things I have asked for will be incorporated in the act and the regulations.

Mr. Quelch: I am glad to see this amendment to authorize agreements with authorities in a province for making arrangements with hospitals for hospital service. I understand the main reason for introducing this amendment now is to make it possible for the people of Banff national park to come under the dollar-a-day hospitalization plan. I understand also that there is some concern now as to whether or not the sisters at Banff can continue to operate the hospital without financial assistance. On the other hand, they are strongly in favour of coming in under the dollar-a-day plan. I am sure the minister himself would agree that it would be a deplorable situation if the hospital at Banff had to close.

I attended a public meeting in September called under the auspices of the advisory council, to discuss the dollar-a-day scheme. I may say that at that meeting there was a great deal of confusion as to the method by which the money would be collected, and confusion as to the method by which the tax would be levied. Some were under the impression it would be done by a poll tax; some were under the impression it would be by a mill rate levied on property; some thought the province would collect the tax; some thought the superintendent of the park would collect the tax, and others thought the hospital board would collect it. There was so much confusion at that meeting it was decided finally that a member of the advisory council would go to Edmonton and have a meeting with the minister of health. Upon the return of this delegate, another meeting would be called and then a further discussion would take place.

Mr. Shaw of the advisory council went to Edmonton and had a thorough discussion with Dr. Cross, the minister of health, concerning the plan. Then, on October 27, another public meeting was called. At that meeting Mr. Victor Price, the business manager of the Holy Cross hospital in Calgary, was in attendance in order to answer any questions that might be asked because he had firsthand knowledge of the operation of the dollar-a-day plan. I might mention that Mr. Price was there, not as a representative of any government but purely as a service to the people of Banff in order that they might get firsthand knowledge of the operation of the dollar-a-day plan.

When the meeting was called it was announced that if the plan went into operation it would have to be on the basis of a mill rate tax on assessed property. Perhaps to make this quite clear I should read a letter that was written by Dr. Cross to Mr. R. E. W. Edwards, secretary of the Banff advisory council. The reason the letter was written was that the people of Banff had asked the advisory council to obtain from the minister of health a statement in writing so that there would not be any more conflicting statements. During the first meeting some people said the minister of health had stated this, and others said the minister had said something different. In view of this the people wanted a written statement so that they would know exactly what the proposal was. I will read the letter that was written by Dr. Cross to Mr. Edwards, and which was made available to the people at that meeting:

Dear Sir:—

Re Proposed Municipal Hospital District for Banff National Park

Further to a meeting with a member of your council, Mr. Shaw, last week, this will advise that the only plan acceptable to the department to establish the $1 a day hospitalization scheme is by way of a mill rate tax on all assessed property within the boundaries of the park. This method is in accord with the municipal hospitals act, being chapter 185 of the revised statutes of Alberta, and the plan is in operation today in sixty-nine municipal hospital districts over the province.

We have agreed to amend the municipal hospitals act as suggested—

I should like the minister to pay special attention to this:

—by Mr. R. G. Robertson, deputy minister of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources at Ottawa, to make any resident of the park assessed for school taxes, a ratepayer under the municipal hospitals act. This will give your council (or park superintendent) authority to levy and collect a tax on the same basis as your school tax at present in effect; then the municipal hospital board will be in a position to requisition your council each year for sufficient funds to carry out an agreement with the sisters' hospital at Banff.

So from then on the discussion that took place in that meeting was on the definite understanding the plan would be financed by a mill rate on the assessment.

Now, Mr. Price wanted to know just how many of the people present at the meeting were ratepayers, and how many were just curious spectators. A show of hands was called, and it was found that 99 per cent of the people present at that meeting were ratepayers. When the vote was called an overwhelming majority of the people at the meeting voted in favour of the dollar-a-day hospital plan financed by a mill rate tax, on the assessment of property. I quote from an article appearing in Crag and Canyon concerning that meeting:

Following an explanation of the dollar a day hospitalization plan, a meeting that jammed the auditorium on Wednesday evening voted overwhelmingly for the establishment of Banff national park as a municipal hospital area. A request, therefore, to this effect will be forwarded to the proper authorities.

A show of hands established that over 99 per cent of those present were ratepayers—those whom the plan would most seriously affect. The only plan acceptable to the department of health as a means of financing the scheme is by way of mill rate tax on all assessed property within the boundaries of the park.

I believe that should settle clearly in the mind of the minister that any discussion that has taken place recently concerning the adoption of the dollar-a-day plan in Banff has been on the basis of a mill rate levied on property. The minister has stated it should be on the basis of a poll tax. Personally, I believe a poll tax would be a very unfair method of financing the hospital plan. I have heard it suggested that the minister has been influenced by the Canadian Pacific. I am not making that as a charge. Of course, it was made quite clear at the meeting that the Canadian Pacific would be very much opposed to a mill rate tax on property for the purpose of financing the hospital. Some of the other very large property owners were also opposed. As I say, however, 99 per cent of the people at that meeting were ratepayers and they voted overwhelmingly in favour of the hospital plan being financed by a mill rate tax on assessed property. Let us not have any more discussion as to whether the people of Banff are in favour of the poll tax or a mill rate on assessed property. They are definitely in favour of the mill rate tax on assessed property.

I am hoping that the minister will not now, at this late date, throw a monkey wrench into the works by insisting that the plan be operated on the basis of a poll tax. As the Alberta health department has pointed out, they could only do it on the basis of a mill rate. All the other hospitals are being financed on that basis and they could hardly make an exception for one hospital to be financed on a different basis. I hope the minister will find it possible to agree to something to which his deputy minister has apparently already agreed, namely that it be financed by a mill rate.

Mr. Lesage: It is alleged my deputy minister agreed to that?

Mr. Quelch: This letter from Dr. Cross to Mr. Edwards referred to your deputy minister. I have already read this letter from Dr. Cross, the minister of health, to Mr. R. E. W. Edwards.

Mr. Lesage: I do not agree that my deputy has said that.

Mr. Quelch: Is the minister saying now that his deputy was not in favour of that being done?

Mr. Lesage: I have here a copy of a letter from my deputy, Mr. R. G. Robertson, to Mr. McCallum, of December 29, 1954. I am going to read it later when my hon. friend has finished.

Mr. Quelch: I have nothing more to say, except that I hope the government will proceed with the amendment we have before us in order that the dollar-a-day plan may be made available to the hospital at Banff. It would be a mistake to finance it on the basis of a poll tax. The mill rate on the assessment is a fairer method of taxing.

Mr. Lesage: I shall just read the extract.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Read the letter.

Mr. Lesage: It is a very long letter. May I read only the extract which pertains to the question we are discussing now?

Mr. Quelch: What is the date of it?

Mr. Lesage: It is dated December 29, 1954. The extract reads as follows:

> I think there is considerable merit in collecting the taxes from those who pay health and welfare taxes because there would be a wider distribution. Approximately one-third of the residents of Banff fall into the class of renters; consequently they would be excluded if a property tax were adopted, unless they came into the scheme on a contract basis.
> Another factor in favour of the poll tax is that we are now collecting such a tax for the cost of health and welfare services.

It is most difficult to decide whether it should be a poll tax or a so-called property tax. As a matter of fact the property is all owned by the federal government and it is leased; but it would be a tax on the interest of the lessee in the property. You may call it an assessment tax if you wish.

Mr. Quelch: It has already been done for schools.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, it has already been done for school tax purposes. Therefore, it is a question of deciding whether it should be a poll tax or an assessment tax. Both the hon. member for Acadia and the hon. member for Bow River argue in favour of an assessment tax. May I say again that when I discussed the matter with the members of the advisory council in Banff last summer it never entered my mind that it could be anything but a poll tax that they had in mind, which would be levied in the same manner as the park superintendent collects for the welfare services.

I do not want to argue in favour of the poll tax and against the assessment tax at this time because I do not have to make the decision today. I want to study the matter very carefully and discuss it with the authorities of the province of Alberta and with the officers of the parks branch of the department, and also to consider the representations which I no doubt will receive from the residents of Banff. But it seems to me that whenever we discuss welfare measures, we should as a general principle try to have as wide a distribution of the burden as possible.

That was one of the principles which were the basis of the recommendations which were made by the committee on old age security in 1950. Whenever the benefits of a social security measure are universal, be it all over Canada, all over a province, or all over a municipality, the burden should be as widely distributed as possible over the people who will benefit from it. That is one of the principles I have to keep in mind when I make the decision whether it will be a poll tax or an assessment tax. There are other considerations; but one thing is important. It is this. The bill which is before the house now reads as follows in subclause 3, paragraph (q):

> Levying taxes on any residents of a park or on the interest of any persons in land in a park in order to defray in whole or in part . . .

It permits either an assessment tax or a poll tax to be established.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister permit a question. In reality, does this amendment make any difference? Paragraph (q) reads:

> levying taxes on any residents . . .

The old section read:

> levying taxes upon the residents of a park . . .

In reality, is there any great change in these words? Further on the paragraph reads:

> . . . or on the interest of any persons in land in a park . . .

Mr. Lesage: This is not a substantive amendment. The really important amendment is subparagraph (ii) of (q).

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Lesage: It has to do with the cost of hospital services. We had to write the whole of paragraph (q) into the amending bill. I understand the law officers of the crown profited by the fact that the bill was being amended to make changes which I do not think are any more important than the hon. member thinks they are.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not see it.

Mr. Lesage: The important change appears in (ii) of subclause (q) which appears at the top of page 2 of the bill. That is the important addition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The rest of the changes are merely alterations in terminology in order to make it clearer?

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In reality this applies to only one park, namely the Banff park?

Mr. Lesage: It could apply to Jasper as well, or to Waterton lakes, because they are in Alberta where there exists this hospitalization system.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about Saskatchewan?

Mr. Lesage: Is there a hospitalization plan there? My officials tell me that under the provincial law as it exists in Saskatchewan now it could not apply to Prince Albert park.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It would not apply.

Mr. Lesage: No, not according to what my officials tell me.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Therefore in reality this covers the situation in three parks in Alberta?

Mr. Lesage: As I said, Mr. Chairman, this amendment follows the brief which was presented to me in Banff last summer by the members of the advisory council, asking that the proper amendments be made to the parks act so the provincial hospitalization system could be applied to the residents of Banff park.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): May I say to the hon. member for Prince Albert that this applies only to the parks established in Alberta, because no other province in Canada is so progressive in its health measures in relation to parks. We hope the other provinces will take a lead from Alberta in this respect, as they have in other things, and make it possible for their park residents to have the same advantages of a health insurance scheme.

The minister made a point on which I wish to comment. He suggested that in his thinking on this matter, after the bill is passed he will have to give consideration to the matter, after consulting with the people of Banff and the provincial government of Alberta, and come to a conclusion regarding it. I have no objection to that. I think it is an important amendment and one that should bear fruit, but I should like to suggest to him that another point must be considered.

He has already indicated that the tax should be applied to the greatest number of the people who are to receive benefit under it. When the minister is considering this matter may I suggest to him that the provincial government could not inaugurate a program of this magnitude without being reasonably sure that the revenue would be forthcoming to carry it out. It seems to me that because the population at Banff is a shifting one the revenue from a poll tax would be very uncertain. On the other hand, an assessment basis tax would be more permanent.

In addition to that, all the people in Banff who were not taxed on an assessment basis would have the privilege of coming under this legislation by entering into separate contracts, and everybody would be covered. It seems to me that an assessment basis would be the most appropriate of all, and certainly it would be the most satisfactory from the standpoint of administration and the security of the people of Banff, who are anxious to have this measure in effect. As the hon. member for Acadia has stated, they have indicated an overwhelming desire that this be as we have outlined it. I hope the minister will see fit to follow the advice of the people who are going to be concerned in this very matter.

Mr. Harkness: As the minister has pointed out, this provides for levying either a poll tax or a land tax, or both. I take it from what the minister has said that no definite plan has yet been decided upon as far as Banff is concerned. Is that correct?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, that is correct. We are seeking by this amendment authority to make regulations for the establishment of the system in Banff park. As I said, until lately I was under the impression that there was no doubt as to what the people wanted, that is a poll tax. However, from what the hon. member for Acadia and the hon. member for Bow River have said there would seem to be practically unanimity among the Banff residents in wanting an assessment tax. I shall have to consider the matter.

Mr. Harkness: As has been pointed out, the population of Banff fluctuates considerably. During the summer time there are many summer residents there who may stay one, two or three months, and then there are a number of people employed at the hotels who may be there for a similar length of time. I am wondering whether the phrase "levying taxes on any residents of a park" would include people who are there on a fairly temporary basis. What is the definition of "resident" which is going to be applied?

Mr. Lesage: As I said before, in the case of the welfare tax which is already collected in Banff under provincial law, a poll tax is imposed on the residents. Perhaps I should read the regulations governing the levying of this tax. They are as follows:

3. (1) For the year nineteen hundred and fifty-four and for each year thereafter each resident shall pay a tax of one dollar to the superintendent for health and welfare services.

(2) Subsection one does not apply to

(a) a resident who has not attained the age of twenty-one years and who is wholly dependent upon a parent or other person for support;

(b) a resident who has attained the age of twenty-one years and who is wholly dependent upon a parent or other person for support by reason of mental or physical infirmity;

(c) a resident who is in receipt of blind persons allowance, mother's allowance, old age assistance, widow's pension, or indigent relief under the laws of the province of Alberta;

(d) a resident who is in receipt of a pension under the Old Age Security Act (Canada) and who also is in receipt of a supplementary allowance under the Old Age Pensions (supplementary allowance) Act of the province of Alberta;

(e) a resident who pays to an improvement district taxes on freehold lands in a national park;

Mr. Harkness: That still does not answer my question as to the definition of "resident". Those are the exceptions who do not have to pay this welfare tax.

Mr. Lesage: Regulation 2 (b) defines resident as follows:

"Resident" means a person who has attained the age of eighteen years and who has been ordinarily resident in a park for six months of the year immediately preceding the year for which a tax is payable.

Mr. Harkness: That is really a six months' residence qualification.

Mr. Lesage: In the year preceding the year in which the tax is to be levied.

Mr. Harkness: Then summer employees are not included?

Mr. Lesage: They are not. That is one of the difficulties we have to consider in deciding as between a poll tax and an assessment.

Mr. Harkness: On that basis summer residents who are there for two, three, four or five months, less than six months in any event, and summer employees who are there for the same length of time, less than six months, would not be covered by the hospital services?

Mr. Lesage: They would not be covered either by the tax or the hospital services.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They could be covered by a separate contract if they wanted to enter into one.

Mr. Harkness: Would there be any difficulty in supplying hospital services to people in the parks on the same basis as it is done in Calgary? In that city every owner of land—in the case of a park it would be every lessee—pays the hospital tax as part of his general taxes. Then any roomer or tenant who wishes to come under the scheme can do so by the payment of a flat fee of so much for a single person and so much for a family.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is what we are asking for.

Mr. Lesage: If all the residents in the park are going to benefit the question would be whether all residents with six months' residence in the previous year should pay the tax, as they are going to benefit; or should it be paid only by those who are freeholders or who are leasing land in the park and who would therefore be paying for the whole population who would qualify as residents.

Mr. Harkness: I think the minister misapprehends the system we have in Calgary, and I think this applies to other municipalities in Alberta. There a tax is levied on land, and every owner of land and his family would be entitled to hospitalization for a dollar a day. That would not include any resident who did not pay taxes; in other words tenants and roomers. But those people can be covered by the payment of a flat fee of $10 for single persons and $20 for married persons and their families. These people are not forced to come into the plan, but if they do not come in they receive no benefits and must pay for hospitalization at the regular rate. I see no reason why the same thing could not be put into effect in Banff.

Mr. Lesage: As I said, I have arrived at no decision in this matter and this discussion will certainly help me. What about people who lease land in the park and occupy it only during the vacation period, say for three months in the year?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Is not all land leased?

Mr. Lesage: I just want to know the answer of the hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Harkness: The minister is referring to land in the park which is leased but which if it was not in the park would be owned?

Mr. Lesage: Yes; that has to be the basis for assessment in the parks.

Mr. Harkness: The man with a summer cottage would be assessed. He would pay the tax and he would be entitled to hospitalization if he required it when he was there. The same thing applies in Calgary. A man may live in Toronto and own two or three lots in Calgary. He is assessed, he pays his taxes, and if he is sick while in Calgary he would receive the benefit of the dollar a day hospitalization. If he gets sick there he gets in on the dollar a day hospital plan. If he does not happen to get sick there, of course, he has not received any benefit out of it. Nevertheless the benefit is open to him if he wants to live in that particular area.

Mr. Lesage: But my point is that he will be taxed for 12 months for a service from which he can benefit for only three months. That is the difficulty. It is no easy problem. The whole thing will have to be considered very carefully and a decision made.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if it would not be a good idea for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to discuss this question with his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare? It might solve all these problems if he could get his colleague to bring in a nation-wide program of health insurance.

Mr. Quelch: The suggestion was that the assessment roll would be the same as for the school tax.

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Quelch: There was a good deal of discussion as to whether it should be a poll tax or a mill rate on assessment. As a result of that discussion a member of the board was sent to Edmonton, and when he came back he made it clear that the only basis upon which the dollar a day plan could be put into effect under the Alberta hospital act would be on a mill rate assessment. From then on it was urged that there should be a mill rate on assessment, as the only basis on which they could get the dollar a day plan. The letter made it clear that they could only have a dollar a day plan provided the mill rate was levied on assessment.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to say another word about this. I think the minister is unduly concerned. He pointed out the difficulties that would arise because the people holding land that was taxed only had access to the benefit for three months a year. As the hon. member for Calgary intimated, if a person owns property in Calgary and decides to live in Toronto and visit Calgary for three months of the year, then he would have access to the service for the three months he was there. If he took sick in Toronto he would not have access to it there. There is nothing different in the implementation of this system in that province and in the park area. It is already established in the park area that the school tax is on an assessment basis. There has been no difficulty, as far as I know, about that tax. Certainly if this were followed along the same lines there should be no more difficulty in administering it on the assessment basis for the hospitals than is found now for the schools. It seems to me that the minister should give it very serious consideration.

Mr. Lesage: I shall.

On subclause 4:

Mr. Yuill: I am interested in this subject, as Jasper happens to be in my constituency, and they face a similar problem there. I have been told by the majority of the people there that they would be happy to avail themselves of this dollar a day hospitalization. I think the same rule would apply there that applies to my town. I happen to be the mayor, on my sixth term now, and we worked it very successfully there. There was direct taxation for the property owners and a tax for the non-taxpaying residents. They paid a flat rate of $8 per year. I do not see anything to worry about if there are people living in the park who do not pay rental, from the governmental point of view. Owners of property pay taxes in that respect. Every man who gets any benefit pays for it. The ordinary person who does not avail himself of the $8 privilege is out of luck so far as the dollar a day service is concerned.

I think that could work there in the park just as well as it has in my town. We have been contributing on that basis for a number of years. As a matter of fact my town provides that without any special levy, as an added service, but any non-taxpaying resident pays $8 a year for that dollar a day hospitalization. It is something that works there; I believe it would work anywhere else within a park.

On clause 2—Lands withdrawn from Waterton Lakes national park. Lands withdrawn from St. Lawrence Islands national park.

Mr. Harkness: Under clause 2, Mr. Chairman, I see the department is withdrawing 753 acres from Waterton park and attaching it to an Indian reserve or a portion of an Indian reserve which is entirely enclosed by the park. Exactly where is this situated, and what sort of land is this 753 acres? Is it a mountain or forest land?

Mr. Lesage: It is not really bush land. It is open prairie with small brush, not very good for park purposes. I believe the best thing I can do is to send the map to the hon. member.

Mr. Knowles: Put it on Hansard.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Governor in council may establish national park in Newfoundland.

Mr. Stick: I wonder if the minister would care to give us information regarding the national park in Newfoundland. I know we have been discussing this for a number of years. Could he bring us up to date on the situation that exists today? Where are you going to put this park, when do you hope to begin, and so on? Have you any information like that?

Mr. Lesage: I met the minister of mines and resources of Newfoundland, Mr. Rowe, in November or December. We discussed the matter together, and he told me that he would write to me as soon as he could have clear title to offer for the national park, the area of which was surveyed by the officials of my department two or three years ago.

Mr. Stick: Do you know where that area is?

Mr. Lesage: Bonavista bay.

Mr. Stick: Is that Newman sound?

Mr. Lesage: Newman sound.

Mr. Stick: I take it, Mr. Chairman, that as soon as the provincial government has fulfilled its obligations the federal government is prepared to go ahead with the park?

Mr. Lesage: That is exactly the principle we are adopting in this clause 3 of the bill.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

TERRITORIAL LANDS ACT

AMENDMENT PERMITTING SALE OF LAND BEFORE SURVEY

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 282, to amend the Territorial Lands Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Repeal.

Mr. Lesage: The amendment to the Territorial Lands Act provides simply for the repeal of subsection 2 of section 5 of the act.

This subsection required that plans of survey had to be approved by the surveyor general before territorial lands could be sold. It applies to lands in both the Yukon and Northwest Territories. While the intent of the subsection was perfectly sound, it has raised difficulties in practice.

When a person wishes to purchase a parcel of land, he expects to be informed of the price that will be charged. While it has been possible under the present subsection to give a prospective buyer an estimate of the probable cost of the land, no formal agreement of sale could be legally entered into until after the survey had been carried out and approved by the surveyor general. Due to a continuing shortage of qualified surveyors it has usually been a minimum of two years and often much longer between the time a request to purchase was made and the time the survey was completed and approved. During the intervening period the land may well have increased substantially in value, and the original estimate of price would be greatly exceeded when the time came for the formal agreement to be completed.

By deleting subsection 2 the sale of land will be governed by the general clause in the act, namely section 4 which states:

> Subject to this act, the governor in council may authorize the sale, lease or other disposition of territorial lands and may make regulations authorizing the minister to sell, lease or otherwise dispose of territorial lands subject to such limitations and conditions as the governor in council may prescribe.

It would then be possible under this general section to enter into an agreement of sale shortly after the request to purchase was made, based on an appraisal of the land in question, with a price fixed on a unit basis and with the total price to be paid subject to the completed survey. Normally the unit price would be a price per acre. The appraisal would be made by competent officers who would make as accurate an estimate as possible of the area involved so that subsequent adjustments in the total price, on completion of the legal survey, would be kept as small as possible.

It is proposed that regulations made under the act will contain a provision that no letters patent covering the sale of land may be issued until the survey has been completed and approved by the surveyor general, so that the original intent of subsection 2 will be met.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see this proposed amendment which will repeal subsection 2 of section 5 of the Territorial Lands Act to permit sales of territorial lands to be made prior to survey of the land and which will permit the price to be fixed at the time the application to purchase is accepted by the department.

In the past, under the present provisions of the act, I know of persons in the Yukon Territory who applied to purchase parcels of territorial land many years ago. They naturally wanted to know the cost under the present act, but officials of the lands division could not tell them what the price would be until such time as the land in question was properly defined by a dominion land surveyor. In certain cases there was a gap of several years between the time of application and the time of survey, a situation which naturally caused considerable dissatisfaction and inconvenience. In other words, under that interpretation a person would not know how much he would be assessed for the land until several years after he had decided to purchase it.

Those now contemplating the purchase of territorial land will welcome the proposed amendment which will enable the department to tell the applicant what the price of the land will be when he applies to purchase it. I am pleased to see this amendment being introduced.

Mr. Harkness: I presume this amendment applies to lands in the Northwest Territories as well as to lands in Yukon Territory?

Mr. Lesage: Yes. I said that in my remarks a few moments ago.

Mr. Harkness: I did not catch that part.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether this amendment envisages or involves any other change in government policy with regard to the sale of land in the Yukon or Northwest Territories? In particular may I ask whether it has any bearing on oil or mineral rights?

Mr. Lesage: No.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time? Now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Lesage moved the third reading of Bill No. 282, to amend the Territorial Lands Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING TRADE MARKS, QUALITY MARKS, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 306, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: Are we not to have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): May we have an explanation of it?

Mr. Knowles: Does not anyone on the government side know anything about this Senate bill?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, may the bill stand?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Weir: Yes.

On motion of Mr. Weir the debate was adjourned.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT AND DEFENCE SERVICES PENSION ACT

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 257, respecting the Canadian forces.

Mr. Pearkes: Is the minister going to make a statement in connection with this bill?

Mr. Campney: Yes; a very short one.

This bill contains a series of amendments to the National Defence Act and to the Defence Services Pension Act. On March 14 last, in speaking to the resolution preceding this bill, as reported at page 2004 of Hansard of that date, I endeavoured to review generally the scope of this bill and to refer briefly to some of its salient points.

As the 26 clauses of the bill are not related to each other, and as the bill does not deal throughout with one specific subject, it is hardly possible to debate the principle of the bill on second reading, as is usually the practice. I would therefore suggest that the bill might be given second reading now and that we might then proceed in committee to consider the bill clause by clause, as has been the procedure in each of the previous years in which a bill of this type has been brought forward. I think that procedure might be more acceptable to hon. members and might at the same time expedite consideration of the bill.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, as this seems to be an unprincipled bill I think that would be the best policy to follow.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Cavers in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Cavers): Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Herridge: I have a word or two to say. The explanation of this clause reads as follows:

> This clause would make it possible to reinstate, without a break in service, officers and men who have been released as a result of a sentence of dismissal or a finding of guilty by a service tribunal or any court, and the sentence of dismissal or finding of guilty ceases to have force and effect as a result of a decision of an appellate court or other competent authority.

I want to ask the minister this question. If a man who has been sentenced by a court martial, say in world war II, rejoins the forces, does this amendment wipe out that sentence?

Mr. Campney: No. This amendment is to cure a defect in the act which has been felt by a number of people.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): What clause are we talking about now?

Mr. Campney: This is clause 2. We had better wait until we come to it.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Reinstatement.

Mr. Campney: At present when a man is convicted and his conviction has been set aside on appeal, he has to re-enrol in order to be reinstated. In other words he cannot be retroactively reinstated. We find, as the result of a ruling of the Department of Justice, that there is a break in his service even though, having been convicted, he wins his appeal. This provision will take care of that situation. The practice proposed here is followed in the United Kingdom. Except for this clause the break in his service would affect his pensionable time, seniority, and possibly his position in respect of progressive increase in pay. The amendment is made in the interests of the person who has been convicted and has won his appeal.

Mr. Herridge: Thank you.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The minister might explain this clause. It would seem this is a method of taking back from civilian life ex-members of the forces in order to try them before a military tribunal. I wonder whether the civil courts could not adequately take care of matters of this kind. I am thinking about the instances of pilfering to which reference has been made. Would the civil courts not be able to take care of people who have returned to civil life?

Mr. Campney: A civil court can only deal with civil offences. The law now provides that a man who has been released from the service may still be tried under the code of service discipline for offences committed while in the service although he has left the service. That is the law now. But there is no provision in the present law stating that the man is under service discipline for the period between the time he is charged and the time he is convicted or acquitted. This amendment will mean that a man who has left the service and is charged with a service offence which took place during the time he was in service shall be under the code of service discipline from the time he is charged until the charge is disposed of. It is a purely procedural gap which we are trying to fill.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Do I understand the purpose is to cover jurisdiction when he has in fact been taken back into the service? As I see it, there are certain offences such as absence without leave and desertion which would be peculiar to the military, but theft and other offences of that kind would be triable before a civil court just as well as they would be before a military court. Is there any indication that the intention is that all cases of that kind are to be brought back into the military courts?

Mr. Campney: No, only cases where the offence has taken place while the man was in the service would be tried under the code of service discipline, and no others.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Exclusion of time.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): This clause deals with the period of limitation in connection with offences, and under subclause 3 (c) it would appear that it shall not include any time during which a person was serving a sentence of incarceration imposed by any court other than a service tribunal. I would assume that would be the case except if the sentence arose out of the offence for which he was being charged. Should there not be some additional words there to make it a little clearer?

Mr. Campney: If a man has been tried by a civil court, he cannot be tried and sentenced again by a military court. The purpose is to deduct from the period of three years within which a person must be tried except for the more serious offences any period during which he is a prisoner in a civil prison, a prisoner of war, or confined in any other way which affects his liberty.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

On clause 6—Petition in respect of delay of trial.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): This is a very important clause. It has to do with the number of days a man may be held prior to what we might term committal for trial either by summary process or by court martial. I think it has possibly been in mind that there could be many abuses in connection with this provision. As a matter of fact I have had some personal experience in defending men under circumstances of this kind.

Has the department given any thought to inserting a clause whereby the onus would be on the commanding officer to point out to the accused the provision which will apply consequent upon the passing of this amendment? It is fine to have it here, but from experience it seems to me it would be of great benefit if there were some provision that the commanding officer must do two things. First of all the commanding officer should be obliged to inform the accused of this provision, that is, the length of time involved before coming to trial. Second, there should be a limited period during which the commanding officer must appoint an officer to defend. It seems to me that only with these additional safeguards can we say that this amendment would be really effective.

Mr. Campney: I think there may be some merit in the hon. member's first suggestion. I believe steps might be taken to acquaint a man with his rights, and we will give the matter consideration in connection with our regulations. With respect to the second point raised, the man selects his own defence counsel, and I do not think the commanding officer should be involved in that particular part of the man's defence. Sometimes these cases are quite complicated, and we find that in practice it takes more than 90 days to get the evidence required to proceed to trial.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It has taken six to eight months.

Mr. Campney: The same thing applies in civil trials. It often takes a good deal longer to get to trial than one thinks when he starts. We are faced then with the position where either the man must be released or some other arrangement must be made to keep him in custody. This is a discretionary power to be exercised by the minister in such cases.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I understand the minister's point that the accused has the right of selection, and I think it is well taken. But would the minister consider the suggestion that a period of seven days, or whatever period might be considered reasonable, be set aside for the selection of the defending officer and that, failing that, the commanding officer should appoint an officer to defend? That is done in the civil courts in charges of a serious nature. The bench has the right to appoint defence counsel. A period of seven days could be provided for the accused to select a defending officer, and on his failure to do so, the commanding officer could then appoint one. I think that would be in keeping with our civil process where judges are quite within their rights in refusing a guilty plea and saying that they are going to enter a plea of not guilty and proceed with the trial. Only in that way can we bring the procedure somewhat in line with the rights which are possessed by an accused before our civil courts.

Mr. Pearkes: Is the minister going to reply?

Mr. Campney: In reply to the hon. member, I might say I understand that in practically all cases a judge advocate general's officer is available to the man if he wants to select him. I am told also that under an order in council, in any serious case a man may be given assistance in obtaining civilian counsel, and the commanding officer is obliged to make this order in council known to the accused.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): What reasons have the minister's advisers given for suggesting that a man should be held in custody for three months while the authorities are deciding whether or not they have the evidence? I say it is quite preposterous in view of the practice in civil life.

Mr. Campney: The clause will not be commonly used. The necessity for it will arise in cases in which there is a good deal of evidence to check or a great deal of searching needed to get the evidence upon which to proceed to trial, such as in a conspiracy case. In my experience in civil practice, 90 days is not a very long time in which to prepare a complicated case for trial. Personally, as a lawyer, I do not see any undue harshness in it assuming it is properly applied, because the practice as I have found it in civil cases, and I understand the practice in the services has been pretty well the same, leads me to believe that every once in a while there is a case that you have to have stand for a very considerable time in order to properly prepare it.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I point this out, that in civil cases the accused can apply for bail and he can be out on bail for that 90 days. This is not the case with a soldier; he is going to be in the hoosegow.

Mr. Campney: Unless it is decided to put him in open arrest; that is a matter of discipline. It is true there is no provision for bail in service procedure.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I would confirm what the minister has said. It is quite usual for us to wait for the spring assizes or the fall assizes in connection with a criminal offence. There seems to be nothing remarkable about that. If we have a limit here then we know we have some right, and that you cannot go beyond that limit. I believe we had evidence of people being held even longer than that during the last war.

Mr. Nesbitt: In connection with this clause, I am not too familiar with military procedure but is there any procedure analogous to that which we have under criminal law for a committal for trial to ascertain whether or not there is sufficient evidence to hold the man for trial?

Mr. Campney: I understand that an initial investigation along the lines the hon. member has suggested is made by the commanding officer. In all cases he holds a preliminary investigation and reviews such evidence as is available and makes a decision.

Mr. Winch: I should like to add a little to what has been said. It is my opinion that cases in which it takes the prosecution 90 days to complete its evidence, as a rule, are not the type where a man would be under open arrest. Even if he were under open arrest there is a big difference between being under open arrest and being out on bail in a civil case. In the case of open arrest you are not in the hoosegow, as the hon. member for Nanaimo mentioned, but you are confined to quarters. There is, therefore, a very big difference between being under open arrest and being out on bail in a civil case. It looks to me as though there is an undue hardship on a person who has not yet been found guilty.

Mr. Gillis: The point that sticks in my mind in relation to this subject is that if it takes 90 days for a commanding officer to secure sufficient evidence to try a man, there must be something wrong with the charge in the first place. The difference between a man out on bail in a civil case and a man in the services who is confined to barracks is that the man on bail can go to his work and maintain his family, while the man in the services is deprived of his pay and allowances during the period he is under charge. I feel that 90 days is a very long time to hold a man, even under open arrest. I do not believe he would be under open arrest, anyway. My experience with commanding officers is that they generally like to tie you down and keep you where they can get you when they want you.

Mr. Campney: I might say that a man under charge, before he is tried, does not lose his pay and allowances. I might give some examples of the need for this clause. We had several cases in Korea where serious offences were charged and we had to bring some witnesses from Canada to Korea. We have had charges of murder in Germany. It is not so easy to find out all the facts in such cases in a foreign country. This power will not be used lightly, but in serious cases it is necessary, and I think it is very necessary to the proper functioning of trials under military procedure. As I said when I was making some remarks a few minutes ago, on occasions 90 days is not a very long time in which to prepare the evidence in a serious charge.

Mr. Gillis: The pay and allowances are not affected?

Mr. Campney: Not affected until the trial, no.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Majority vote.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Would the minister give us his explanation of clause 7?

Mr. Campney: This represents a change in procedural law. At the present time the judge advocate merely advises the court-martial as to what is the law. This provision would extend his duties and his responsibilities to the point where he will decide what the law is. In other words he will be somewhat in the position of a judge with a jury. The lack of this authority by the judge advocate, it is felt, has led to some unfairness to accused persons on a number of occasions where trials within trials on the admissibility of evidence have taken place in the presence of the members of the court. It is not felt that such procedure has been altogether fair to the accused.

Since normally the only official of the court who is a lawyer is the judge advocate, it is felt it would be more in the interests of the accused obtaining a proper trial if the judge advocate were made responsible for directing the court-martial as to what is the law, and then the court-martial, having taken their law from him, can make any finding they see fit on the facts.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In connection with that section, does the minister see the change in procedure amounting to this. If the matter of the admissibility of evidence is raised by counsel, the court-martial board retires in the same way as the jury retires and the judge advocate hears the evidence dealing with the admissibility of the evidence and makes a ruling on it. Then the board comes back. Is that the process we see developing here?

Mr. Campney: That would be the practical result of this amendment.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): If that is the case, do we also show the judge advocate as being removed from the court at the time consideration is given to the decision, or does he continue to sit with the board all during that time?

Mr. Campney: It is my understanding that the judge advocate does not sit with the court when it makes its decision.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Under the present procedure, does he not sit with the board during periods of debating the decision, even to the extent of suggesting appropriate lengths of sentences and things like that?

Mr. Campney: No. I understand a change was made in 1948.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I am getting to be an old man; therefore I am not up to date on these things. If there is assurance of that procedure being followed we can possibly say that this clause is satisfactory. What everyone is concerned about is that the judge advocate does not act both as judge and jury. We have talked about setting it up on the basis that it would be closely akin to the civil process of judge and jury. If it is currently in the act or in the regulations—I have not noticed it—that the judge advocate does not sit in at the time the decision is made, I think we can safely say that we have separated the law from the peers of the accused, which in effect may not be a true statement of military law, but it still does what we are trying to achieve, namely to have the accused tried by laymen.

Mr. Campney: I cannot give the number of the section offhand, but the act now provides that the judge advocate shall not sit with the court-martial when the finding is being considered.

Mr. Herridge: Some four or five years ago it was brought to my attention that a permanent army sergeant had stolen a jeep engine and that he had been court-martialled. The finding of the court-martial was that he was to lose 52 days' pay and retain his rank. This was brought to my attention by other members of the armed forces. I took it up with the proper authorities and they told me I was all wet, it was not true. Anyway, after investigation they found out that it was true. It had a rather bad effect on the other men concerned with military discipline and things of that sort. Will this section prevent the recurrence of such a situation as that?

Mr. Campney: The punishment awarded, whatever it may be, is entirely in the hands of the court. The judge advocate has no part to play, nor has he any right or duties in connection with the imposition of punishment, except to ensure that it is a legal punishment. While I do not know the facts of the case to which the hon. member has referred, it might be just a bad judgment of the court. I am not familiar with the case.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): This is an observation on this section. In keeping with the general trend of thought about the death penalty in connection with offences under the civil law, has the department given any consideration to making it necessary to have a unanimous verdict of a general court-martial before the death sentence may be imposed?

Mr. Campney: No; I must say we have not given any serious consideration to changing the law in that respect. A death penalty awarded by a court-martial must of course be approved by the governor in council, which means that a review takes place.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In connection with a matter as serious as this, and having regard to the legal history behind the death penalty and the jury's verdict, might I suggest that the department consider under the circumstances that the two-thirds vote which may impose a death penalty be changed to a unanimous vote of the general court-martial. I might refer to the fact that an appeal which may be made to the minister here is no different from an appeal that eventually may be made to the governor general in council in connection with criminal offences.

Mr. Winch: May I suggest that if the advice of the hon. member who has just spoken is followed by the Minister of National Defence, if he has any ideas on the subject whatsoever and takes the advice that has been offered he should make his representations before the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons which is now sitting on the question of capital punishment.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I do not know whether I misunderstood the minister just now when he said that the imposition of any sentence was entirely within the power of the court. Does that mean that there is no limit on the kind of sentence that they may impose, or is there a limitation such as we have in the Criminal Code?

Mr. Campney: There are limitations. What I was trying to point out was that the judge advocate has no power to decide the question of sentence; that is entirely a matter for the court-martial. I was trying to divide the two points.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8—Authority.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Perhaps the minister will explain the reason for the addition here.

Mr. Campney: This is an attempt to cut down the time and expense involved in appeals under certain circumstances, by reducing the number of appeals. As the law stands now the court-martial appeal board may find an appellant guilty of an included offence or on an alternative charge, but in such a case it cannot impose a greater sentence than that already given. This is to provide that the minister or some other authority which he may appoint can do these two things himself rather than sending the case to the court-martial appeal board. In other words, if he sees or his officials see that a case has gone wrong and the court-martial appeal board will undoubtedly substitute another finding, he can himself do that and avoid the loss of time and the cost involved in an appeal. It is felt that this provision will be in the interests of justice and will reduce the number of court-martial appeals.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): This clause certainly does grant fairly wide administrative powers to the minister. I can appreciate the additional wording in connection with subclause (b) (i) which reads:

> The tribunal could on the charge have found the offender guilty under section 120 of that other offence,—

Here of course we have a relationship to the types of offences which are committed. Ordinarily, it is the case of the minister making a decision on a lesser offence than that with which the man was originally charged. The second part of the additional section reads:

> The tribunal could have found the offender guilty of that other offence on any alternative charge that was laid.

Here we have the situation where some other type of offence might have been laid without there being any relationship to the first offence. In all fairness we might have evidence which had very little to do with the alternative charge laid, yet the minister is to be granted full authority to convict on another charge which apparently was either set aside, was not heard or was disposed of probably in some cursory manner. Here we have the minister having the right to reinstate under this section. Is there any particular reason why those words should be included?

Mr. Campney: I should like to make three observations. First, under no circumstances can the minister increase the punishment. Second, the man may still appeal if he wants to; he does not have to accept this disposition of his case. Third, as regards an alternative charge, I understand that practically speaking that would mean a lesser charge. The two charges which the hon. member mentioned are different charges; they are not alternative charges but are based on two different sets of facts. It seems to me that the permissive power to be given under this section could not possibly prejudice the accused and it might possibly shorten his agony as to what is going to happen to him.

Mr. Nowlan: It is clear that this can be done only with the consent of the accused; the minister cannot substitute a conviction for one offence after the accused has been convicted in error on another. I am thinking of the man who has been convicted in error, as the section says, or on insufficient evidence.

Mr. Campney: His consent is not required.

Mr. Nowlan: Do I understand that the minister can substitute a conviction for another offence without consulting the accused, when possibly if the accused went through on appeal he could win an acquittal?

Mr. Campney: The only offence to which we need address ourselves is an included offence or an alternative offence charged in the information. If one of these lesser charges is substituted the accused can still appeal in respect of that charge.

Mr. Nowlan: I realize that clause (a) is a recapitulation, but we are passing it now and it covers a situation where a man has been convicted illegally or where his conviction cannot be supported by evidence. That is going a long way. In other words there is no evidence to justify his conviction, yet the minister is given the power to convict him for some other offence when it appears from the evidence the service tribunal was satisfied with the facts established. If they made an error in the first place they might very easily make an error in the second place. I think the minister should not be able to substitute a conviction where a man might want to appeal and take his chances on getting acquitted entirely; instead of being convicted of murder the minister might convict him of manslaughter, just to use a simple expression.

Mr. Campney: The powers under discussion are vested in the appeal board. This is merely a narrow selection of cases where it appeared obvious the minister might properly act. If in the circumstances mentioned by the hon. member the minister, having all the facts before him, substitutes a lesser offence he still has 14 days to appeal if he wants to.

Mr. Harkness: I do not understand the phrase in line 13 which reads "if it appears that the service tribunal was satisfied of the facts".

Mr. Nowlan: When they made a mistake.

Mr. Harkness: There is no transcript made of their proceedings and observations. It might be that two members of the court-martial board might think a man was guilty and another member might not think he was guilty. There might be quite a bit of discussion before they eventually come to a majority decision. I do not see how it can be said "if it appears that the service tribunal was satisfied of the facts" particularly when you are going to change the offence. I do not see how it is possible to say that they are satisfied or not satisfied.

Mr. Campney: When a service tribunal comes to a decision, whatever it may be, I think it must be assumed that they are satisfied as a tribunal of the facts on which they have reached a decision. It seems to me that under those circumstances this clause does have a meaning, because if certain facts are required to prove a certain offence and a man is found guilty of that offence, I think one might be permitted to deduce that those facts were accepted.

Mr. Harkness: I assume that what you are going to do is take the transcript of the evidence at the trial and decide from the evidence as to the facts. If the tribunal have found him guilty of a charge on which they could not properly find him guilty you are going to say that the facts as shown in the transcript are correct and find him guilty on another charge.

Mr. Campney: I think the minister is limited in this case, as the tribunal would be, to the charges that are laid. He cannot substitute new charges; you have to work within the charges laid or within the included charges which are set out in section 120. You are not permitted to substitute new charges and prejudice the man's position. We must go back to the point with which I started, that consent is not being asked to permit the minister to change the charges or to give additional punishment or to do anything more harsh to the man than he is faced with under the existing circumstances.

This provision if enacted will enable the minister to obviate all the expense and time involved in holding a court-martial appeal board hearing and to come to a decision which is obviously the proper one on the facts. We have had cases where a new trial would be onerous and probably would get nowhere. By the time the matter was reheard witnesses might have disappeared and so on. I should like to give assurance that this is not an attempt on the part of the minister to pre-empt the rights of the court-martial appeal board, but to expedite decisions of cases on the facts.

Mr. Harkness: Perhaps the minister could make this clearer by giving us a definite example of how this subclause (a) would apply.

Mr. Campney: The section to which I referred gives an example. A person charged with attempting to desert may be found guilty of being absent without leave. It involves a question of intent. As any lawyer will know, there are all kinds of offences where a lesser offence is included in the greater. That is where some of the judges go wrong, when they find a man guilty of a greater offence than the facts might reasonably warrant.

Mr. Harkness: I think the examples the minister gave would be more applicable to (b) than to (a). I can see where they would be applicable as far as (b) is concerned but, unless (a) and (b) cover the same ground, I do not quite see how they apply to (a).

Mr. Campney: As a matter of fact I must say that the two sections cover largely the same field, but (b) is probably more detailed and specific than (a).

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I would say it is wider.

Mr. Campney: More detailed, too.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I wonder if the minister could tell us how he defines the word "finding" in subclause (a). I am not a lawyer and I do not know, but I would have thought that in the case of a charge there are only two things that can be done; either the charge is proved and the accused is convicted or the charge is dismissed and he is acquitted. How can you bring a new finding relating to the same charge? I admit it is something I do not understand.

Mr. Campney: A man might be charged with stealing, for example, and he might be found guilty of improper possession. A question of motive may be involved. Or he may be found guilty of attempted robbery when he has been charged with robbery. They are gradations of the same basic offence.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): With all respect, Mr. Minister, I suggest that you are speaking now of an alteration in the charge. Subclause (a) refers to the same charge. You have to find a new finding on the charge of robbery, not a new charge of illegal possession of goods. I submit that there can be only one other new finding, and that is the dismissal of a charge.

Mr. Campney: It has always been my understanding that if a man is charged with a serious offence such as robbery it is open to the court to find him guilty of attempted robbery or a similar crime of lesser degree than robbery on the facts as they are brought out. That is a new finding, but it is a lesser finding based on the set of facts.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Is that not what is set out in subclause (b)? It does not seem to apply to subclause (a).

Mr. Campney: As a matter of fact, perhaps it would be helpful to the hon. member if I dealt with one other section of the act which may clear up the question of a finding in relation to a previous finding. Section 172, subsection 1, says:

> The minister, and such other authorities as he may prescribe or appoint for that purpose, may substitute a new finding for any finding of guilty, made by a service tribunal that is illegal—

That is, in his opinion.

> —or cannot be supported by the evidence, if the new finding could validly have been made by the service tribunal on the charge and if it appears that the service tribunal was satisfied of the facts establishing the offence specified or involved in the new finding.

That is how the section stands at present. The proposed clause would apply it to other cases where, in the opinion of the minister or an authority appointed by him, a new finding should be substituted.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): So far as I can judge it is the very same thing as we have in front of us.

Mr. Campney: I probably should have said that the part I read is the present (a) part of the section. Part (b) is only to elucidate, extend and clarify, and I do not see that any great change of principle is involved.

Mr. Harkness: The only difference that I can see between (a) and (b), after all this talk about the matter, is that in (a) this change is made to a lesser finding if it appears that the service tribunal was satisfied with the facts, whereas under (b) they provide that the minister or whoever he appoints can substitute another finding if it appears that the facts prove the accused guilty of that other offence. In this first case, as I said a short time ago, it seems that if the majority of the court found this man guilty of an offence which they legally could not find him guilty of, the minister may then find him guilty of a lesser offence on the facts which the transcript of evidence would show these people had accepted. In this second case what is the situation, that the facts proved him guilty? Does the minister or the officer appointed by him just take the transcript of evidence and hold a new trial on it himself?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): As it is now six o'clock, could I suggest that the minister might bring us after recess an example or examples of what might happen in each one of those subsections in that section? As I see it, dealing with (b) (ii), I think there is an extension when you deal with any alternative charge.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

An hon. Member: No.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock clause 8 was under discussion. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I think we had asked before recess that the minister obtain for us some examples of the various methods of handling more than one charge under paragraphs (a) and (b) of the section.

Mr. Campney: Yes. We were all possibly getting a little bit confused with respect to this section. The hon. member for York West suggested that I might prepare an example under each of the subclauses (a) and (b) (i) and (b) (ii) illustrating how we would deal with a situation under each of those subclauses. This I have attempted to do during the dinner hour, and possibly it will be helpful to us.

Under subclause (a) a man charged with desertion may, under the power granted by section 120 of the National Defence Act, be found guilty of absenting himself without leave. If a man is convicted of desertion and, on review, it is found that there is no evidence of intention—something which is, of course, an essential ingredient of the offence of desertion—the minister may, under clause (a), on the same facts substitute a finding of guilty of absenting himself without leave.

If I may, I shall now turn to subclause (b) (i) and consider the case of a man charged under section 76 with using threatening language to a superior officer, but who could be found guilty of behaving with contempt or of using insulting language to a superior officer. If he is convicted of using threatening language and there is not sufficient evidence to establish this fact, there may, however, be sufficient evidence that he behaved with contempt or used insulting language. Under clause (b) (i) the minister could, under such circumstances, substitute a finding either of using insulting language or of behaving with contempt, whichever the record appeared to support.

To come to subclause (b) (ii), a man charged with theft and alternatively with negligently failing to account for property set out in the theft charge, might be originally convicted of theft. But the record might disclose that the evidence adduced in support of the theft charge actually showed a failure to account, and that this failure arose out of negligence rather than from wilful misappropriation which is, of course, an essential ingredient of a conviction for theft. If it was felt that the record did not support a finding of wilful misappropriation—that is theft—the minister could, under subclause (b) (ii), substitute a finding of guilty on the charge of negligently failing to account.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman. In the light of the explanation given by the minister, does it not appear as a fact that the minister may in effect quash a conviction where a charge has been laid in the alternative? Where the court has found that the accused is not guilty of one branch of the alternative but is guilty of the other, does it not follow that the minister could quash that conviction and sentence the accused on the charge on which the court found him not guilty?

Mr. Campney: I am informed that the practice is that where a man is convicted of an offence the alternative offences are not dealt with. The first review, as a matter of fact, of every conviction is made by the judge advocate general. Each conviction is reviewed by him, and the judge advocate general advises me if there is any reason to do so. This section is for the purpose of permitting expeditious handling of certain cases where the facts and the record warrant a change and where it is obvious what will happen if the case goes on through the long procedure to the court-martial appeal board.

Mr. Fulton: The thing that bothers me is this. If a man is accused of alternative charges, one the major charge and the other the lesser, I should like to know what the explanation is of the fact that if the court finds him guilty of the lesser charge the minister may nevertheless in effect quash that finding because it is illegal, or because it cannot be supported by the evidence, and find him guilty of the major charge. That is the thing that bothers me.

Mr. Campney: Practically speaking, it is not open to me as minister to find a man guilty of a major charge if the court has found him guilty of a lesser charge. In practice it works only the one way. I can find him guilty of the lesser charge if, on the advice of the judge advocate general, I do not think the facts warrant a conviction on the greater charge.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad of that assurance, but I wonder if the minister could just carry it one step further and point out to me—and I am sorry to be obliged to delay him—the basis upon which he says it works in that way. I shall be glad to think it works in that way, and I shall be glad to know it works in that way. I just want to be convinced that you can only substitute for the sentence of the court a conviction on a lesser charge.

Mr. Churchill: While the minister is thinking about that matter, may I ask this question. Would not the word "lesser" substituted for the word "other" meet the suggestion of my hon. friend?

Mr. Fulton: Why not substitute "lesser offence" for "some other offence".

Mr. Campney: I am informed that the use of the word "lesser" would mean changing a whole series of sections throughout the act. The phraseology in this particular clause agrees with the general phraseology of the act. I think it is quite clear that where a number of charges are laid the major charge is the one on which the man is tried. If the court does not reduce the charge to a lesser one, then it is still open to me to do so, on the advice of the judge advocate general, after perusing the record.

Mr. Fulton: What I am asking is this. On what authority, under this clause, does the minister say that he cannot quash the finding of the court and direct a finding that the accused is guilty of the major charge? Suppose he is charged with A. I am not using legal phraseology here. Suppose he is charged with A or B or C, and that A is the major one. Suppose the court finds him not guilty of A but guilty, let us say, of B. What I want to know is this. Where is the authority for the statement the minister has made that he cannot quash that conviction and direct a verdict of guilty under A? The minister has told me that he cannot do it. I shall be glad to be convinced that he cannot do it, but I want to know the authority for it.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Might I interject at this point that if I read section 175 properly, even though the conviction might be on a higher charge, as I understand section 175 the punishment could be no greater than that which was previously handed out on the alternative sentence.

Mr. Campney: That is right. Under no circumstances could I increase the punishment.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That would answer my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Fulton: No, it would not answer it at all. I say that with respect. I am sorry to differ with my hon. friend. I think it is an important principle that a man should not be found guilty and convicted of a major charge where the court itself has convicted him of a lesser one. I want to know on what authority the minister said he cannot convict him of a greater charge. That is all I want to know. I am not concerned with sentences.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Under those circumstances my observation would not apply. I think my hon. friend is quite right.

Mr. Campney: I must say that charges are not set out in the act as greater and lesser. While it is theoretically possible that the minister might find a man guilty on what some people would call a greater charge, the governing factor is he could not give him a greater sentence than that given at the first trial. Practically speaking the charges would be graded downward. If the minister were to find that a man had been properly convicted on a major charge he would let the conviction stand. It is only where he thinks the major charge, if you wish to call it such, has not been proven that he might find the accused guilty of the lesser offence.

Mr. Fulton: What happens in a case where a man pleads guilty to one of these alternative charges? Can the minister find that the evidence does not warrant that plea, reverse the plea of guilty and direct a plea of guilty on one of the other charges?

Mr. Campney: I do not see how that case could arise, because there would be no evidence at all taken for the minister to review.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, yes, there might be. A plea of guilty might be entered after the prosecution had completed the submission of its evidence. I will put it this way. I was not able to follow the reasoning of the minister as to why the word "lesser" could not be substituted for the word "other". The minister referred to a whole series of sections and said that the wording would require changes. But as this itself is an amendment why would that be necessary? Why would the word "lesser" not be accepted?

Mr. Campney: I think for the simple reason that throughout the act offences generally are not graded. They are bracketed in groups, but they are not graded under the terms "lesser" or "greater", or any such terms. If you insert into the act the word "lesser" you will be in a good deal of trouble with respect to other sections.

Clause agreed to on division.

Clauses 9 and 10 agreed to.

On clause 11—Exercise of chairman's powers by other members.

Mr. Pearkes: Clause 11 enables the chairman of the court-martial appeal board to delegate his powers and functions to any other member of the board but, as set forth in section 190 of the act, there are certain qualifications laid down for the chairman of the board. Under subsection 2 (a) the chairman must be a judge of the exchequer court or of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction. It is not necessary for all members of the appeal board to have those qualifications. Surely if the chairman of the appeal board is going to delegate his powers to another member of the board that member should at least have the same qualifications as are required of the chairman.

Mr. Campney: The act provides that certain procedural matters are to be dealt with by the chairman of the board. As a matter of fact he has found it very difficult at times to arrange hearings, sittings and so on. It is only his powers as chairman that are involved, not his powers as a member. He has found it very difficult at times to make such arrangements promptly, bearing in mind his other duties. The present chairman is Mr. Justice Cameron of the exchequer court, and he has asked that some provision be made so that interlocutory matters, disposition of details of hearings, subpoenaing witnesses and so on, may be dealt with by one of the other members of the board.

Mr. Pearkes: I quite understand the desirability of an alternative chairman or some other member of the board being able to assume the duties of the chairman, but surely that other member should have the same qualifications as are laid down for the chairman, because the act says very clearly that the chairman must be a judge of the exchequer court or of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction. You might have a member of the board who was not a judge of the exchequer court or of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction who would be acting chairman. It seems to me if you are going to delegate the powers of the chairman you should at least delegate them to somebody having the same qualifications as are required of the chairman in the first instance.

Mr. Campney: Subsection 2 (b) of section 190 provides that a member of the court-martial appeal board other than the chairman must be a judge or retired judge of the exchequer court or of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction, or a barrister or advocate of not less than five years' standing.

Mr. Pearkes: Exactly; so that you might have a barrister or advocate with five years' experience acting as chairman when the chairman himself must be a judge.

Mr. Campney: I do not see that any prejudice is created by the fact that the actual chairman, who has superior qualifications if you like, is temporarily otherwise engaged. The work of the court must go on.

Mr. Fulton: Would it meet the point the minister and the department have in mind and at the same time preserve the principle the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich has in mind if you inserted the word "administrative" before the word "powers"? I take it what is in mind there is merely to give to someone else power from time to time to administer this board so the personal attention of the chairman will not always be necessary while the chairman is engaged in his duties as a judge of the exchequer court. Would, therefore, the insertion of the word "administrative" meet the one point while preserving the other principle?

Mr. Campney: I do not know what the definition of that word would be in this act.

Mr. Fulton: I am thinking of the intention.

Mr. Campney: It seems to me that the calibre of the chairman of the court-martial appeal board is such that the matter can be safely left to him. I have told hon. members what is the view of the present chairman, and what he has in mind. I think the same would also be true of any subsequent chairman. I do not see that any prejudice will arise from this power of delegation which is being sought at the request of the present chairman.

Mr. Pearkes: I still come back to this point. Could the section not be limited so as to provide that the acting chairman must be a judge or ex-judge, and not merely a barrister or advocate of not less than five years' standing?

Mr. Campney: In view of the difficulty we have now in finding judges for extra work of this nature, we ought not to make it more difficult. I am very sure in my own mind that this power will only be used by the president of the court in a reasonable and sensible way, and I do not think I would want to change the scope of this authority.

Mr. Fulton: The minister may not appreciate the point that the original intention of the act was to appoint a person of judicial experience as chairman of the board. Then to assist him there may be appointed as members of the board those who have had judicial experience and, as additional members, barristers who have had at least five years' experience as practising barristers or advocates. In other words, the whole effect of the scheme is to ensure that as chairman and senior members of the board there will be persons who have already had judicial experience.

This section, if the proposed amendment carries in its present form, opens up the possibility that in place of the chairman, who must now be a judge of very considerable experience, you may appoint a man who has had no judicial experience at all. This might not be the intention, or the minister might believe it is something that will never take place, but it is a possibility. I submit in all seriousness that we have to examine what may be the effect of the statute. I am sure it would not be a desirable effect if the power and functions of this man of experience and judicial capacity be capable of delegation to a person of no judicial capacity.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I should like to add to the remarks of my learned friend —at least, my hon. friend—

Mr. Fulton: Learned and honourable, I hope.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Both. I think his argument is very sound, especially in view of the fact we lead up to this clause through a maze of sections giving what might be described as very wide discretionary powers, considerably wider, I think, than one would find in most legislation dealing with our civil courts. With all due respect to the members of my profession, I do not believe any of us would be very happy to place in the hands of a man who is qualified to be a member of this appeal board on the basis of having had five years' experience as a barrister the wide powers which have been set out for the chairman of the board. I believe the criticism is on very sound ground. I believe it should be indicated in this legislation that the person to whom the powers were to be delegated should have the same qualifications as the chairman himself.

Mr. Campney: As a matter of fact—

Mr. Pearkes: I was just going to call attention to this, that this court-martial appeal board has only recently been set up. I feel it is an excellent measure which was introduced about two years ago. Prior to that the appeals went to a very senior and experienced army, navy or air force officer, as the case might be. These are appeals from general courts-martial on which one would expect senior officers with experience to be sitting, with legal advice behind them. In years gone by when there was an appeal by the man who was convicted that appeal received the most careful consideration from very experienced senior officers.

This appeal board is an alternative way of dealing with the appeal. I have no objection to it, in fact I believe the appeal board is good. But I do believe some degree of experience should be expected from the appeal board, and particularly from the chairman of that board. In fact the original act provides for that by saying that the chairman must be a judge. This amendment is going to allow a barrister or advocate of very junior capacity to act as chairman. All that is required is five years' experience as a barrister, and he may be a man junior in experience and in age to the chairman of the original court-martial. It seems to me that in order to do justice to the serviceman who is appealing, the serviceman should have the right to have his appeal heard by a man of eminent judicial capacity.

Mr. Campney: The chairman of the court-martial appeal board has, I think, three main duties. First, he has the duty under section 195 to make the rules of court which have to be approved by order in council. This is not necessarily a continuing function, although he must continually observe and determine whether any changes are required.

Then under section 190 he has to preside at all sittings of the board unless he delegates another member to preside in his place.

Again under subsection 4 of section 190 we find:

> The minister may require the court-martial appeal board to sit and hear appeals at any place or places, and the chairman of the board shall arrange for sittings and hearings accordingly.

This is where the chairman finds that he gets into difficulty sometimes, because he cannot devote his full time to checking these detailed arrangements. It is in regard to that particular section that he would like to have the authority to delegate his power. In respect of the first two powers, if he wants to change the rules such changes must be approved by the governor in council, and on the question of presiding he can now nominate any of his co-members to be chairman for the time being.

Clause 12 agreed to.

On clause 13—Execution against officers and men.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I gather that this section is designed to enlarge the rights of creditors against members of the armed forces in so far as the execution of judgments obtained in the civil courts is concerned. Perhaps the minister might let us know if this section does provide an opportunity to garnishee wages, or if that is excluded? I cannot tell from reading the section whether or not there is any restriction in that respect. If the section does permit that, is it something that is desirable?

Mr. Campney: The proposed amendment does not permit garnishee proceedings, the reason being that in garnishee proceedings you are really suing the crown. This amendment does not alter that position.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Clause 13 reads:

> No judgment or order given or made against an officer or man by any court in Canada shall be enforced by the levying of execution on any arms, ammunition, equipment, instruments or clothing used by him for military purposes.

This would appear to be an all-inclusive restriction and the only one which would confront a creditor. Is there a restriction on the pay contained in some other legislation that the minister may be able to inform me about?

Mr. Campney: I do not think any section of this act deals with that matter. It is just a general principle of law that you cannot garnishee the crown. This proposed section exempts from execution only those articles of equipment of which the man has possession.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The net result is that we have a situation where the ordinary creditor has access for execution to everything except what might be considered military equipment, but is there a restriction in the general sense on proceeding against it.

Mr. Campney: According to the section.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 14—Offences committed outside Canada.

Mr. Harkness: This clause has to do with the jurisdiction of civil courts. Can the minister tell whether this is a practical sort of provision? I am wondering, for example, how the witnesses to a crime committed outside of Canada, we shall say, perhaps in Korea, in Germany, or some place else, could be brought here to give evidence before a court in Canada? This provision provides that a civilian with the forces who commits a crime outside Canada can be brought to Canada and tried in any court in Canada. It does not seem to me to be a practical provision from the point of view of witnesses.

Mr. Campney: This is in the nature of a permissive section. In each case it would have to be decided whether in the interests of economy, availability of witnesses, etc., it would be better to have the trial overseas or have it here. For example, this fall we shall be rotating a whole brigade. There might be some outstanding litigation involved. With respect to the air force, the change is gradual; it goes on all the time. There are cases where it would obviously be better and more effective to have the trial here although the offence took place abroad. The purpose of this section is to permit the decision to be made as to where the trial shall take place, on the grounds of economy and effectiveness.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a question to ask the minister on procedure. When it is decided that the trial shall take place in Canada, who sets the venue for the trial? Has the accused any appeal respecting the change of venue if the place of the trial does not suit him?

Mr. Campney: I think the ordinary rules would apply. In the first instance the judge advocate general would select the place where the charge is to be laid. The accused can then always apply for a change of venue, just as in civilian procedure.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I am wondering whether there is a tendency toward extraterritorial effects in this clause. That is, in the first instance will the accused have any choice as to whether he should be tried by the courts of the jurisdiction in which the offence takes place? I assume he would be regarded in the category of a civilian attached to the armed forces, and the charge would simply be laid under the armed forces act and he would have no choice as to where he would be tried.

Mr. Campney: I do not think the accused would have any choice as to whether the trial should be here or abroad, if I understood the hon. member correctly. In most cases, practically speaking, it is the judge advocate general who would elect. There is no desire to interfere in countries abroad with which we have treaties. But as I said a few moments ago, there may be a few cases where it would be better to have the trials here.

Mr. Nesbitt: This goes back to a question I asked the minister a bit earlier. I am curious about this, since I presume from what the minister said that the judge advocate general sets the venue. Would it be set on the principle that it should be held some place near national defence headquarters, around Ottawa, or what would motivate the judge advocate general when he set the venue? I believe the minister said that if the venue of the trial were not suitable to the accused he could move under the ordinary rules of procedure to change it; but he could only change within the province where it was originally set, according to our rules of criminal law. It brings up the question whether this whole clause legislates with regard to procedure rather than substance. For instance, if for various reasons the judge advocate general picked Ottawa, which is in Ontario, as the venue, and the accused wanted the venue moved to British Columbia, under our present rules he could not move for a change outside of the province in which he lives.

Mr. Campney: I think the jurisdiction, if you wish to call it such, of the judge advocate general would be purely administrative. This has to do with civilians and the information in each case would naturally be laid in the place from which the person came. But someone has to decide this matter. If a civilian went abroad from Kingston the charge in all probability would be laid in Kingston. It is just a case of someone having to be responsible for initiating the matter.

Mr. Nesbitt: I follow the minister's remarks. That part is quite clear. But suppose the charge was laid in Kingston, as the minister suggested in his example, and the accused desired to have the venue changed to Winnipeg, let us say, which is outside of Ontario, under what procedure could that be done?

Mr. Campney: It could not be done. If he came from Kingston he would not be tried in Winnipeg. You do not change the venue from one province to another except under very exceptional circumstances.

Mr. Nesbitt: I gather from the minister's remarks that under ordinary circumstances, if the charge were laid in Canada under this clause, it would normally be laid in the province from which the accused came.

Mr. Campney: That would be true, yes.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In connection with the jurisdiction under this legislation, is there generally an agreement among the various countries covering the situation so there is no dispute as to the jurisdiction in which the actual offence took place? I am thinking of an alleged murder taking place in the United States when a group of our forces may be down in Seattle or some place like that. Is this type of clause and this type of jurisdiction recognized by the United States in a case of that kind?

Mr. Campney: Yes, Mr. Chairman; the NATO status of forces agreements which have been signed by most of the countries concerned set out in detail the jurisdiction and powers.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 15—Woman deemed to be widow.

Mr. Pearkes: Clause 15 deals with amendments to the Defence Services Pension Act, and the first amendment introduced in this clause is to make provision for the common law wife of an officer in the services to receive a pension on the death of the officer with whom she had been living.

It will be recalled that the Defence Services Pension Act is divided into five parts. Part I deals in the main with army officers; part II has special reference to the navy; part III has special reference to the air force, and part V deals with those personnel who entered the service since March, 1946. Therefore this particular amendment deals solely with the common law wife of an officer who joined the army prior to March, 1946.

I regret exceedingly that the minister should have even thought that it was desirable to introduce such an amendment. The reason given is that this act is being brought into line with the Public Service Superannuation Act, but I submit that there is all the difference in the world between a gentleman holding the Queen's commission and who is expected to exercise powers of leadership, and an ordinary civil servant.

An officer's character should be unquestioned. I do suggest that if an officer is living with a common law wife then his character might very well be open to question, and he will not be able to exercise the same qualities of leadership as a man whose domestic life is above reproach. We know that common law wives are recognized in many respects, and no doubt they came in during the frontier days when a man had to live under pioneering conditions and quite often would take unto himself a native woman.

While life in the army may be considered in some respects as living on the frontier, especially in our northland, the fact is that there is ample opportunity for officers stationed in the north to return to civilization in order to have carried out the ordinary religious ceremony of marriage. There are in the services today hundreds of chaplains of all denominations, and there would be no difficulty whatever in an officer having a priest or chaplain of his own denomination available to carry out the marriage service.

I think it is fundamentally unsound and unwise to lower the high standards required of an officer who is expected to lead men in battle. I know that sometimes during wartime it is necessary to lower some of these standards, when you have to have a wide expansion of officer personnel; but this is dealing with regular army officers, career men who have entered the services with the idea of setting high standards for others to follow. I cannot believe there are many regular officers who were in the services prior to 1946 who would require this particular amendment.

This pension to the widow is not paid as of right, it is paid as a compassionate allowance and is granted under certain definite conditions. There are limitations as to those who may receive a widow's pension. Section 26 of the Defence Services Pension Act sets out the qualifications. First, an applicant must be in the opinion of the minister worthy of a pension. If in the opinion of the minister the applicant is wealthy she will not receive a pension. And there are other qualifications. Surely high moral qualities are of more importance than wealth. I take strong exception to this amendment, and I hope the minister will see his way clear to withdrawing it inasmuch as it applies to the regular army officers in peacetime.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to point out to the hon. member that clause 23, which I hope we will be coming to shortly, carries the same provisions in respect of part V.

Mr. Pearkes: I know that.

Mr. Campney: The purpose of this clause probably is not as narrow as the hon. member may be inadvertently suggesting. With the variation in divorce laws, even as between Great Britain and Canada, as well as other parts of the world, we have cases where people have regarded themselves as properly married throughout the great part of their lives. Then the man dies and it is found out that because of the interpretation of the laws of divorce in this country the widow has no pension.

These are not just cases of people living together in defiance of all the laws and conventions of society. A certain number of cases exist such as I have mentioned, where on the death of the spouse the widow finds herself faced with great hardship and difficulty, especially if she is left with a family. I think this principle has been well recognized in our procedure in Canada. It is approved in the Pension Act, the superannuation act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and was also approved in the dependents' allowances regulations.

I think it is well recognized that men and officers serving throughout the world serve under many difficulties, especially abroad, and occasionally find themselves in the position I outlined a moment ago. I would think that a provision of this kind, the principle of which has been well recognized for many years in other acts in Canada, would prove of considerable benefit for officers and men in the services and their dependents.

Mr. Pearkes: What is the position of a legitimate wife, still living, under the first paragraph of this amendment? Will she get a pension also?

Mr. Campney: I am informed that a legitimate wife living apart from her husband, unless she is living in such circumstances as would disentitle her to alimony or other support, would normally get the pension. In that case there is no question who would get the pension. There would be only one pension. I think we even fixed that last year for elderly generals.

Mr. Jones: What limiting factor is there regarding the service of the officer? Supposing an officer got his commission and served for five years and died; would the widow get the pension?

Mr. Campney: It would be governed by the rules with regard to pensions. I think the minimum period is 10 years.

Mr. Jones: It is rather misleading to mention seven years where the limiting factor is 10. I am going to suggest that this clause be altered and that the limiting factor be made 10 years. I have in mind a case of a young man, a corporal, who served in Germany for three years. He was killed in an accident, unfortunately, and his widow and two children cannot get a pension or allowance because he had not served for 10 years. Nevertheless he had given his whole life to the service of his country. That is not governed by any act. I think this act should eliminate the 10-year penalty.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Jones: No. I would like the minister to answer.

Mr. Campney: If I heard the hon. member rightly, I think the situation to which he referred would not be a matter for the Defence Services Pension Act which we are now amending but the Pension Act itself.

Mr. Pearkes: Surely service under part I is for 25 years. He must serve 25 years, unless he is compulsorily retired at 20 years.

Mr. Brooks: I was going to ask, Mr. Chairman, about subclause 2. It seems rather drastic. It says:

> If, upon the death of an officer or former officer, it appears to the treasury board that the widow of that officer had, for a number of years immediately prior to his death, been living apart from him under circumstances that would have disentitled her to an order for separate maintenance under the laws of the province in which the officer was ordinarily resident, and if the treasury board so directs, having regard to the surrounding circumstances, including the welfare of any children involved, she shall be deemed, for the purposes of this act, to have predeceased that officer.

That section, Mr. Chairman, really makes the treasury board the judge. It says, "if it appears to the treasury board". It does not have to be proven to the treasury board, and there does not have to be a court order or anything of that kind. The treasury board can simply say that this widow in their opinion is not entitled to maintenance and can even take it away from her children. I wonder if more proof is not required than seems to be suggested in this section. Surely there should be a court order of some kind.

Mr. Campney: From my experience I would say that the treasury board has to be thoroughly satisfied as to the rights and merits of any case before it acts. If I read this section correctly it makes it possible for the treasury board, where such action is indicated, to take the pension which a widow would have received and give it to the children. It seems to me that may be a desirable provision. Someone has to make a decision, and the treasury board is familiar with such matters. I would think they can be safely relied upon to make a proper judgment in a matter of this kind.

Mr. Trainor: May I ask the minister if this provision applies to officers only and not to other ranks?

Mr. Campney: Clause 23 makes this applicable to other ranks.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): I should like to ask the minister this. Subclause 1 (a) refers to a period of seven years, and (b) refers to a number of years. Would the minister please tell me what is meant by "a number of years"? Is that two or more?

Mr. Campney: In this subclause, any number of years in the discretion of the treasury board.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): In the first case, under subclause 1 (a), there would have to be a period of seven years, whereas under subclause 1 (b) two years would be sufficient?

Mr. Campney: I understand the reason for the seven years in the first part of the clause is that the wife might be entitled to the pension.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Why is there any difference in the period of years if we are going to apply this in principle?

Mr. Campney: Because, I think, the expectation under (a) is that there is a wife, and under the other that there is not.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): But at the same time under (b) there is nothing to prevent the parties from getting married, whereas there is something in (a), as one of them is married. You are making it much easier under (b).

Mr. Campney: The two cases are dissimilar because in one case there is a wife to be protected and in the other presumably there is not.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): In regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Royal in regard to the discretion of the treasury board, is there such a thing as an appeal to any court from a decision of the treasury board under this section?

[Mr. Campney.]

Mr. Campney: No, there is no appeal from a treasury board decision of this kind.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Does the minister think that is absolutely fair?

Mr. Campney: I think experience has proven that it is reasonably fair. I have not heard many complaints about treasury board decisions on these matters. The really important fact in regard to treasury board decisions is that the board has personal knowledge of the regulations and assess these matters carefully. I think their work is done thoroughly and their decisions are completely unbiased. I have not heard any complaints about them.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Pearkes: On division.

Clause agreed to on division.

Clauses 16 to 26 inclusive agreed to.

VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

CERTAIN BENEFITS CONTINUED TO PERSONS JOINING REGULAR FORCES BEFORE JULY 1, 1955

Hon. R. O. Campney (for the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 278, to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1954.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, is there any comment which the minister wishes to make on this bill?

Mr. C. E. Bennett (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Sections 8 and 12 of the Veterans Benefit Act, 1954, make available to certain ex-service personnel the benefits of the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act and of the Unemployment Insurance Act, respectively. Originally, the reinstatement in civil employment provisions were restricted to those who were specially enrolled for the purpose of serving in the special force, or who belonged to the reserve forces and served on the strength of the special force.

In the case of unemployment insurance the provisions were extended to the same two groups and also to members of the regular forces who served on the strength of the special force in a theatre of operations and were discharged on medical grounds while on the strength of the special force.

In 1951 the benefits of the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act were extended to all persons enlisting for service in the regular forces and who did not serve for more than three years; and in January, 1953, the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act were so extended. It is now felt that circumstances have changed to the point where the granting of these benefits should be restricted to those who have had service in a theatre of operations or who are now members of the regular forces and qualify under the conditions which I have outlined above. The latter are aware that they have this coverage and it is proposed to cover all who will have enlisted before July 1, 1955.

It has never been the policy to consider as veterans those who serve in the regular forces in peacetime and who do so for a career. The other statutes mentioned in the Veterans Benefit Act apply only to veterans who were enlisted for the special 18-month engagement or had service in a theatre of operations.

I might repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the proposals will not affect any entitlement which those now serving may already have under the Veterans Benefit Act.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it this bill is to be referred to the committee on veterans affairs and no doubt it will be discussed in detail there. As we all know, the Veterans Benefit Act has been amended a good many times. It has been amended practically every year since 1950. As the parliamentary assistant has told us, it was passed in order to allow benefits which were given to veterans of world war II to be given to members of the special force who served in Korea during the Korean war, if we can call it that. I am sure everyone here will agree that this situation is as it should be. Korean veterans should receive and are receiving, we are glad to know, the same benefits as those which were given to veterans of world war I and world war II.

I think it is quite appropriate at this time to mention the fact that these veterans of the Korean war have given a good account of themselves. The last of the troops are now returning from Korea. As a matter of fact I think the last battalion has returned to Canada, and the other troops in Korea will soon be returning home. As we all know, these men gave a good account of themselves, as I have mentioned, in an extremely difficult fighting area, perhaps one of the most difficult in which men have ever had to fight. They have maintained the high standard that Canadian troops have always maintained in war, both in the first war and in the second war.

As to this particular bill—and as I said a moment ago it will be before the committee—there are two outstanding features. One is that it discontinues the benefits under the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act. The second is the discontinuing of the benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. These benefits are discontinued on July 1 of this year. Up to July 1 any man who enlists in the Canadian army will receive the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Those who enlist after July 1 will not receive those benefits. In other words we shall have two groups of men serving in the Canadian army, namely one group of men who will receive benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act—and these are of great value—and another group of men who will not receive those benefits.

On the face of it, Mr. Speaker, I must say that there seems to be discrimination there. A soldier coming back now or being discharged from the army, as I understand it, is entitled to 90 days' benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Hence all these men up to July 1 will receive that benefit. It is my understanding that these benefits will not be available to soldiers who enlist after July 1.

I should like to ask the minister just why July 1 was decided upon as a cut-off date. I should also like to have his comment on the criticism I have made on the score of unfairness. I should like to know whether there is some substitution which is being made for the benefit of these men who enlist after July 1 in order to compensate them in the same way as those who enlist before that date. After being in the army for three years, a man turned loose in Canada even at the present time, when we have considerable unemployment, would have a difficult time to carry on and obtain a job.

The parliamentary assistant spoke about the men serving in peacetime. The peacetime as we have it today is entirely different from the peacetime we have had in the past. Today we have what is known as the cold war. Today a young man who enlists for three years might well expect to be thrown into a hot war in a short time. I think these men might be considered. I believe it would be a good thing to continue the unemployment insurance benefits for the men who are enlisting. It would give them a sense of security after their three years' time was up and they retired from the forces. I should like to have from the minister or the parliamentary assistant some comment on these criticisms I have made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the parliamentary assistant speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Bennett: Mr. Speaker, there is no particular significance with regard to the date of July 1, 1955. I should like to point out to the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) that this date applies with regard to men going into the service. Anybody who enlists on or before July 1, 1955 will be covered by those provisions in the Veterans Benefit Act. As the hon. member knows, men are being enrolled and enlisted for terms of three, five and seven years. Hence a person enrolled in the regular forces now would still be covered for the next three years. The date of July 1, 1955 was set so it would not be unfair to anybody. Anyone who enrols or enlists in the regular forces up until July 1, 1955, is covered. The date was set far enough in advance so there would not be any unfairness.

As the minister said when he introduced the resolution, and as I said in the statement I have just made, it has never been the policy to consider as veterans those who serve in the regular forces in peacetime and who do so for a career. The other statutes mentioned in the Veterans Benefit Act no longer obtain or apply to people serving in the regular forces. I do not think the hon. member believes that the unemployment insurance statute or the civilian employment statute should so apply. It is on that principle, that people who follow a regular force career should not have the benefit of the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act or the Unemployment Insurance Act, that this act is now being amended.

Mr. Brooks: In reply to what has been stated, may I just say that we now have the Unemployment Insurance Act which covers practically all civilians. We did not have that at one time when men joined the armed forces, but we have it now. My point is that a man who serves for three or five years in the army, and that has been his employment, should be treated just the same as the man who is employed in civilian life. In these days, when we are bringing everything up to date, I think we could very well include men in the army under our unemployment insurance scheme in the same way as we try to include our civilians. That is the point I was trying to make.

Mr. Bennett: Regardless of the merit of the hon. member's suggestion, I think he will admit that it does not come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I would point out to him that the act as it now stands applies only to persons enrolled in the regular forces for three years. At the present time many of the engagements in the regular forces are for five years or seven years, and this act does not now apply to them. If there is any merit in the hon. member's suggestion I think it could be raised on the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Brooks: I shall raise it in the committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

GREAT LAKES FISHERIES

MEASURE TO IMPLEMENT CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES SIGNED SEPTEMBER 10, 1954

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (for the Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 279, to implement a convention on great lakes fisheries between Canada and the United States.

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to approve the ratification of the convention on great lakes fisheries between Canada and the United States, and to provide implementing legislation to carry out Canada's obligations arising thereunder. The convention was signed at Washington on September 10, 1954, after prolonged negotiations extending over a period of many years. The fishing interests of Ontario and the government of Ontario were consulted on all aspects of the convention and were represented in the negotiations leading up to the signing of the convention.

The purpose of the convention is to improve the great lakes fisheries through co-ordinated action of governmental agencies in Canada and the United States. Over a period of years the decline in some of the principal stocks of fish in the great lakes has been viewed with concern on both sides of the border. The causes of the decline are not adequately known. The sea lamprey has been greatly increasing in numbers and threatening some of the valuable fisheries. The lake trout in particular have suffered from the depradations of this parasite.

At present research in the great lakes area on the Canadian side is being carried out by the federal government and the government of Ontario. On the United States side the federal government and eight state governments are engaged in similar research activities. One of the principal aims of the convention is to co-ordinate all these activities and direct them to common purposes.

The minister made a very thorough and complete statement at the resolution stage, and I do not believe I can add anything at the present time to what he said on that occasion. It is my intention to ask one of the members of the government to move that the bill be referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries when it receives second reading.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the bill not only involves the great lakes area but also involves the federal governments of two countries and the governments of the province of Ontario and eight states in the United States, I should like to make a few observations. The parliamentary assistant has just said that he is going to ask that the bill be referred to the standing committee; therefore I am going to limit my remarks and make them as brief as possible. We on this side of the house welcome the convention and regret that it did not come into existence years ago.

I am one of the members of the house who happen to live on the shores of the great lakes. I live on the shore of lake Huron, and in front of where I live the fisheries are carried on which are the concern of this parliament and are involved in this proposed legislation. Having lived there for some 25 or 30 years I must say that I am a bit more familiar with the difficulties that have been encountered by the fishermen than many hon. members of the house. Figures already placed on the record have revealed a condition that must be corrected, and only through research and co-operation among the higher levels of government will that result be attained.

People have the idea that all a man needs to do is obtain a fishing boat, set out a few nets, haul in the fish and sell them. I have become very well acquainted with some of these fishermen over the period I have lived there, and I know from experience that fate has not been very kind to the fishermen of lake Huron because of the damage caused by the sea lamprey which we are now attempting to overcome. I noted from the minister's statement of last March that some research work has been done. I think it was done around Manitoulin island as a joint co-operative effort of the federal government and the Ontario government, and I believe some degree of success was achieved. I thought the amount of money spent on the project was terribly small for the task involved, because the annual loss to fishermen is in the millions.

I think no one will disagree with me when I say that the fishermen and the two governments had plenty of notice of the condition, and that some measures should have been undertaken at least 15 years ago. The condition is becoming worse. I do not intend to put a lot of figures on the record because I know the department in Ottawa, through its research facilities, has all the figures available over the years as to the catch of the respective types of fish in the different lakes. But there is one point I should like to mention here. In looking at the figures I have seen it seems to me that some lakes and some particular species of fish are affected more than others. It would seem that the fishermen of lake Huron and lake Superior—no doubt lake Michigan too, though I do not know anything about it—have suffered more than the fishermen on the other lakes.

Fishing is not a highly paid profession to begin with. I recall that years ago the fishermen made good money when they could get a decent price. The unfortunate part about the industry is that while there are certain times of the year when they get high prices, immediately after Lent, for instance, whitefish or pickerel for which the fishermen have been getting 55 or 60 cents a pound drop to 5, 10 or 15 cents a pound, and at times cannot be sold at any price. This is startling but true. You cannot see the result of that in the retail stores, but there it is. The fish caught by the fishermen of the great lakes go to great centres such as New York and Chicago. I know that a lot of lake Huron fish goes to New York.

This is an interwoven picture, but I want to deal with Ontario. I believe the Ontario government grants licences to the fishermen and tells them how many nets they may set out. I believe such licences cost about $50 per net and entitle the fishermen to lawfully fish these waters. The minister made a statement that can probably be clarified in committee, because I do not understand it. He said that in Canada fisheries are the responsibility of the federal government. I suppose in so far as the great lakes are concerned that might apply to the distance from our shore United States fishermen may come, and things of that sort. I cannot quite grasp what the statement really means.

I am going to place two or three figures on the record to substantiate the argument that this convention should be operative just as soon as possible. I cannot give the name of the newspaper that was the source of this clipping, but apparently it is from some reliable newspaper. I believe the figures have been reported before in this house. No doubt the department also has figures which substantiate the fact that there has been a severe drop in the catch over the last few years. I recall that years ago we did not have anything preying on these fish, but now each year the catch seems to get less and less. These figures corroborate what the minister said, and certainly substantiate completely the facts put on the record by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. McBain) in his fine presentation during the resolution stage.

I believe the house will be alarmed to note that in the Georgian bay area, which is part of lake Huron, there was a decrease of 38 per cent in the catch in 1954 as compared to 1953. Certainly this is an alarming situation that commercial fishermen in that area are facing. There was a drop of 41 per cent in the catch of whitefish and that is the fish which, along with pickerel, brings the best price. I am quoting the figures for 1954 as compared with 1953. In northern inland waters there has been a reduction of 10 per cent. In other parts of lake Huron one special type of fish shows a reduction of 8 per cent, and there are greater reductions in the catch of other types of fish.

I just wish to emphasize that these are figures which I know the department will have, together with a great many more. I am satisfied, and I know the department is too, that over the years the figures will show that this curse of the fishing industry has been increasing. I know that today some fishermen even hesitate to set their nets.

There is another item I wish to mention, Mr. Speaker. I realize it is something that probably should be mentioned in a provincial legislature, but because the province is tied in with this government through this convention I think I will make this observation in order that it may be on the record. It is this. Down where lake Huron flows into the river St. Clair at Sarnia or Point Edward we have an alarming situation which is a proper matter for research. These big boats, sandsuckers I think they are called, are allowed to suck up sand and gravel from the bottom of the river. Many people may think that a few boatloads of sand or gravel would not amount to very much. I can only tell you what the fishermen tell me, and they have two complaints about it.

In the first place they say it takes the sand off the beaches in that area for probably 20 miles. It so happens that the only good sand beaches are on the Canadian side and there is a good deal of shale on the other side, so it is our area that is affected. Coupled with the high water we have a terrific erosion problem which is costing the people of this country millions of dollars a year. On other occasions I have mentioned the erosion damage caused by the high lake level, and I have maintained there should be some correction because this high water is caused in part by man-made diversions into lake Superior.

In some areas I have noticed that the fishermen have registered complaints about these sandsuckers with the Ontario government. It is said they are doing a great deal of damage to the shore line. I say this subject is related to the fulfilment of the desire expressed in this convention. The subject matter may be connected with civil rights and may be under provincial jurisdiction, but since through this convention the provincial government are agreeing to having the federal government act for them in this connection, I am mentioning the matter in the hope that it will be discussed.

There is another matter which is also connected with research that the fishermen in my area complain about. I do not know whether it is the whitefish or trout or pickerel that spawn in the shallow waters along this area, but they are affected by the large amount of sand removed every year by these sandsuckers. Instead of the fish roe being kept in a position where it would hatch, we lose the resultant new fish for lake Huron and other places every year. This process is seriously affected by the removal of this sand and gravel. There are companies who operate fleets of these boats and remove millions of tons of sand and gravel every year. One can readily understand the concern of these fishermen when they see it causing a disturbance to their successful fishing operations.

Everyone would concur in what the minister had to say when he introduced this resolution on March 21, as reported at page 2242 of Hansard. He said that the principal duties of the commission are as follows:

(1) to formulate a research program with a view of determining the need for conservation measures in respect of any stock of fish of common concern to the fisheries of Canada and the United States;

I think what I have just now said would be concerned with this particular research program. I continue to quote:

(2) to co-ordinate research and to undertake any research by the commission where necessary;

(3) to recommend appropriate measures to the contracting governments based on such research;

(4) to formulate and implement a comprehensive program for the purpose of eradicating or minimizing the sea lamprey menace.

There is no use enlarging upon what the minister said. The facts speak for themselves. I am sure we shall have some further information when we go into committee. I am sure that, because of these paragraphs I have just referred to, this act will bring about more co-operation between the government and the fishermen. I need give only one illustration. The success of this legislation will depend to a great extent on the co-operation of the shore fishermen in distributing small fry, and so on.

In my area we have an unfortunate situation. In Lambton the shore fishermen do not have proper facilities for launching their boats. We do have there quite a wide stream. This convention will deal properly with the plight of the fisherman, particularly with regard to streams that may have polluted water, and I hope that will include the one to which I refer and have mentioned in previous debates. Some consideration must be given to this branch of our economy so that something is done to provide aid in the areas where the fishermen do not have proper access to the lake. It is feasible and I know the economics will stand it, so I am sure that problem can be solved so the fishing industry of this country may be encouraged. We must provide for them the same facilities that we provide ordinary businesses, that is, access to their business operations. I hope that when this convention becomes operative this one stream, which is very wide and which at one time carried down sugar beet disease, will be kept open as part of the program for promoting a better and healthier fishing industry, not only in Ontario but in all Canada.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my appreciation of the provisions of this bill. Perhaps I should read into the record one of the sections of the bill so that hon. members who are not informed will know what we are talking about. Article I of the convention reads:

> This convention shall apply to Lake Ontario (including the St. Lawrence river from Lake Ontario to the forty-fifth parallel of latitude) Lake Erie, Lake Huron (including Lake St. Clair), Lake Michigan, Lake Superior and their connecting waters, hereinafter referred to as "the convention area". This convention shall also apply to the tributaries of each of the above waters to the extent necessary to investigate any stock of fish of common concern, the taking or habitat of which is confined predominantly to the convention area, and to eradicate or minimize the populations of the sea lamprey (petromyzon marinus) in the convention area.

It will not be necessary for me to place on Hansard the figures with respect to the depletion of the trout and whitefish in lake Huron; they have already been placed on the record by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. McBain), as may be seen at page 2242 of Hansard for March 21. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) also spoke on the resolution, and a few minutes ago the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy), who is situated right on lake Huron, also dealt with the matter.

I do want to inform the house how important it will be to the fishermen of lake Huron if the provisions of this bill are carried out. For the benefit of those who are not acquainted with the county of Huron, may I say that we have between 75 and 100 miles of shore line bordering the county on the southwest side. We have several small harbours that are used especially for refuge by small craft in time of storm. As the hon. member for Elgin has already told the house, lake trout and whitefish have almost disappeared owing to the presence of sea lamprey in these waters, as mentioned in the bill. No doubt they destroy all kinds of fish, but the fact that trout and whitefish have almost disappeared is evidence that the lamprey prefer the best we have, namely trout and whitefish.

With the assistance mentioned in the bill and the agreements to be entered into by the dominion and the province of Ontario, hundreds of Huron fishermen in a very short time, we hope, will be able to get a creditable catch of trout and whitefish in lake Huron.

We in Huron need a lot of money spent on our harbours, but that has nothing to do with this bill. At a later date, I shall have something to say on that. Men in Huron depend on fishing to make their living. This bill will help them greatly. I sincerely hope that when the bill goes to committee, if amendments are found necessary the minister will give careful consideration to them. Like our forests, we must conserve our fish if we are to continue to enjoy them as a necessary part of our diet.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSOLIDATION OF LEGISLATION—AUTHORIZATION FOR OPERATION OF TELECOMMUNICATION SYSTEM, ETC.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to consolidate the various enactments relating to Canadian National Railways into one statute, also, to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may operate a telecommunication system, to authorize officers and employees of the Canadian National Railways to act as directors of partially-owned companies, to authorize the company to construct short lines without specific parliamentary authority and to operate motor vehicles and further to make provisions for extinguishing charters of constituent corporations.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, the primary purpose of this proposed legislation is to consolidate the legislative provisions relating to the Canadian National Railways. These provisions are to be found in a number of statutes, the Canadian National Railways Act, Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, and various other laws which include legislation relating to railway financing and construction of branch lines, and even old acts relating to the Grand Trunk Railway. As it is often found necessary to refer to these provisions in order to determine powers and obligations of the company, the management has represented to the government that it would be of great assistance if these statutes could be consolidated into one. I am sure the advantages of such a step are so obvious to all hon. members that it is unnecessary for me to make any argument to convince them.

I should perhaps add that the decision to effect this consolidation does not result from any change in government policy concerning the Canadian National Railways. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, the primary purpose of this legislation is to consolidate the various legal provisions relating to the Canadian National Railways.

I should like to explain that it is intended also to effect the following changes in the various enactments applying to the company. First, it is proposed to give the Canadian National Railways authority to operate a telecommunication system. At present these powers are exercised by the railway through its subsidiaries, and it is thought it would be desirable if these powers were given to the parent company.

Second, it is proposed to authorize officers and employees of the Canadian National Railways to act as directors of partially-owned subsidiaries. Third, it is proposed to give the railway the power to construct short branch lines without specific parliamentary authority. Fourth, it is proposed to establish a simple procedure to extinguish the charter of any company comprised in the Canadian National Railways. Fifth, it is proposed to give to the railway the power to operate motor vehicles in conjunction with or in substitution for rail services under their management or control. At the present time this power is exercised through subsidiaries of the railway.

As I think it is manifestly in the interests of the railway that its charter be consolidated and that these additional powers as outlined should be given, I urge the committee to adopt this resolution forthwith.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the minister's statement has made it clear that considerable study will be required in order to consolidate these various statutes, and I am wondering whether he has in mind referring the bill to a committee of the house. It would seem that the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines would be a suitable committee to undertake this task. It is quite obvious that witnesses from the company should be called to explain at least some of the implications of this consolidating statute, and that of course can be done only if the bill is considered by a committee.

The minister has said that the railway company is to be given the power to construct short branch lines without coming to parliament. I would ask him to explain what is meant by a short branch line. In recent years several branch lines have been constructed by Canadian National Railways and also one by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in all cases the proposal was brought to the house. I think that is a very wise course to follow.

For example, there was the extension from Sherridon to Lynn Lake in northern Manitoba, and another from Terrace to Kitimat on the British Columbia coast. Then last year there was the extension to Chibougamau. Probably the minister has read or has been told that there was a great deal of controversy over the branch line from Beattyville to Chibougamau. Parliament also granted the power to build an extension from Chibougamau to St. Felicien in the Lake St. John area, and many of us felt that the railway should have completed the line right through to Lake St. John rather than merely going to Chibougamau in the first stage and then taking the position that it may be able to build the Lake St. John half of this branch line at a later date.

There was considerable feeling in the Lake St. John area against that proposal, and I think rightly so, because the plan of the government had the effect of tapping the Chibougamau district by the line from Beattyville, whereas I believe that area is served at the present time by a highway from Lake St. John. The question of access to the port of Chicoutimi was also involved.

The government faced some rather difficult questions over this proposed branch line, and there was considerable debate in the house and in the committee. I think the government was under some difficulty in justifying its policy with regard to that branch line in so far as it did not contemplate completion right through to St. Felicien at the time the line was extended to Chibougamau.

I am wondering whether the proposal to do away with the requirement that the Canadian National Railways come to parliament for approval of the building of branch lines is the result of the criticism last year. If that is so the proposal is without justification, because I believe it is wise to have both railways come to parliament for approval of the building of branch lines. Otherwise they would have the power to expropriate in order to put a line through an area without the consideration of parliament. I think that coming to parliament is the practice which has been followed in Canada for many years.

Mr. Marler: If my hon. friend would permit me to interrupt him I am sure it would make possible a curtailment of his argument. The short lines to which I referred a moment ago, as he will see in due course, are lines intended to serve industrial customers. The bill will provide for a limitation of six miles, so my hon. friend need not worry that we are trying to legislate to cover the St. Felicien branch line or others by merely calling them short branch lines.

If I may say one other word in connection with the suggestion made by the hon. member it is that the bill will be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the minister will explain to the committee why parliament should not sanction the building of branch lines even though they are only six miles in length. Surely the railways should come to this house for approval of the extension of their lines. As I said before, they have the right to expropriate property and six miles of line may be of extreme importance to many people, particularly if it is in a metropolitan area and I presume that that is the type of extension the minister has in mind.

What is the objection to having both the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. come to parliament for approval of extensions of that kind. If such an extension is not to be made on property they already own then the rights of other people are going to be affected. I should like to have an explanation as to why it is felt the railways should be given this right to build such lines without getting parliamentary approval.

Mr. Marler: If I am to enter into a series of explanations with each hon. member who might wish to make some comment on the resolution the debate will be more or less unending. I would prefer to try to give my explanations when the debate has proceeded further.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I believe the minister was correct when he said that the advantages of consolidating these various enactments into one statute are so obvious that he did not need to spend much time trying to convince the house that this step should be taken. I am sure we all agree it would be a good idea to have all the legislation respecting the Canadian National Railways in one place, at least so far as that is possible.

I was glad to hear the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, to which the minister has agreed, namely that after second reading this bill should be referred to one of the committees of the house so that it might be thoroughly studied.

I also was a bit concerned over the phrase in the resolution which suggests that short lines might be constructed without parliamentary approval. I confess that the minister has removed my concern to a considerable extent by making it clear that there will be a specific limitation in the bill as to what constitutes a short line.

The minister, in speaking to this resolution, said that it involved no change in government policy so far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned. It seems to me that there is one matter of policy, whether it be government policy or Canadian National Railways policy, which does need to be reviewed at the present time. I refer—and the minister knows that many of us in this house feel strongly about it—to the employment situation on the Canadian National Railways. This legislation is designed to take a look at the whole picture so far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned, and I suggest that one of the things sorely needed at the present time is some positive kind of assurance to those who work for this railway and are its mainstay that the terrible cloud of insecurity and uncertainty that hangs over them will be removed.

I am not asking merely for the kind of statement we have had from the minister and his predecessor from time to time, namely the hope that we are at the end of lay-offs on the Canadian National Railways. In fact I have upstairs a letter from one C.N.R. employee in Winnipeg who says that every time the Minister of Transport assures us there will be no further lay-offs, all the employees of the C.N.R. tremble. So often has that been said only to be followed by another lay-off that they do not want that kind of statement made again.

Mr. Marler: I am sure the hon. member is honest enough to admit that I have given him no such assurance.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Transport has not given such an assurance in his own name, but he will admit that he did place on record on the 7th of February the statement of one of the Canadian National vice-presidents that no further staff reductions were anticipated.

Mr. Marler: That is correct.

Mr. Knowles: The minister placed that statement on the record in response to a request of mine that he give the assurance that we were at the end of the lay-offs. However, what is required is not just the settling of a debating point between the minister and myself. What is required is not just another ministerial statement or vice-presidential statement or presidential statement. What is required is a policy with respect to this matter.

It used to be thought that if a man got a job with one of the railways in this country and got in a few years of employment and a few years of seniority and did a good job, he had a reasonable measure of job security. Now it turns out that even men who have 10 years' service on the railway, and who thought there was that measure of job security, face every week the uncertainty as to whether that employment will be continued.

We recognize that changes are taking place. We recognize in particular that there is a dieselization program now in progress, but surely something could be done, whenever a change-over such as that is being pursued, to recognize the rights of the men. After all, some of us feel that their rights are just as important as the concern which some people feel for capital investment, for the maintenance of equipment and for all the other factors which go into the running of the railway. It is our feeling that there is something lacking in government policy and in Canadian National Railways policy with regard to the employees of this great system. I strongly urge that this matter be gone into in the consideration of this legislation.

I am glad to know, as I have already said, that after second reading the bill will be referred to a committee. I note that the minister proposes that it go to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, rather than to the committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government. That means that a group of members different from those who generally look at Canadian National matters in committee will have a look at this situation. I hope some policy can be worked out in that committee, when it is considering this bill, which will protect in a way that is not now effective the rights of the employees of this railroad.

In addition to the lay-offs which are taking place and the insecurity which arises because of that fact, there are certain other matters of policy in relation to the railway that I think call for review at this time. Perhaps I had better suggest that you call it ten o'clock so I can go into those other matters the next time this resolution is called.

The Deputy Chairman: Before I leave the chair, I was going to ask hon. members to consider between now and the next time this committee meets on this resolution the wording of the resolution. I am making no ruling at the moment, but I am of the opinion that there may be a large number of matters connected with the operation of the Canadian National Railways which are not appropriate subjects for discussion under a resolution which says that it is expedient to consolidate the existing statutes and to make certain other provisions. I am not undertaking to rule at the moment. I am suggesting to all hon. members that because this resolution consolidates the statutes dealing with the Canadian National Railways, it may not necessarily open for discussion every phase of the operation of the Canadian National Railways system.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take whatever third readings are available, then continue this debate, and take second reading of the bill respecting Unemployment Insurance, and the second reading of the bill to amend the Blind Persons Act, and then move to go into supply.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Sixth and seventh reports of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. McCulloch (Pictou).

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES LIMITED—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. A press dispatch this morning indicates the probability that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited will be buying the gas distribution and manufacturing system in the city of Montreal from the Quebec hydro. Could the minister tell the house whether government policy still remains as announced on March 13, 1953, and confirmed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on March 18 of this year and again on April 5? As the minister knows, that announcement was to the effect that Canadian needs for natural gas must be met first before export is permitted. Would the minister also say whether there has been any change in the policy of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited in this regard?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge the answer to both questions would be in the negative. There has been no change in government policy in regard to the exportation of fuel, and as I understand it there has been no change in the policy of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

COAL

REPORTED CLOSING OF NOVA SCOTIA MINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I wonder if the minister could bring the house up to date on the statement which he made as reported on page 3070 of Hansard of April 22 to the effect that he had plans for keeping open colliery No. 1-B at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia. At that time he indicated that he was getting in touch with the president of the company as to the merits or otherwise of his proposal.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question today. As I stated yesterday, the difficulty at No. 1-B colliery is not primarily a problem of marketing but rather one of exceedingly high costs of production. This is a matter for the unions and the company to work out. My efforts have been directed to encouraging closer co-operation between the company and the unions with a view to lowering production costs to a point where coal can be sold competitively and the mines saved from closure. The people to whom I have talked have received my suggestion favourably and I am hopeful that they will be able to get together and work out their own salvation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED INTERVENTION TO SECURE RELEASE OF 16 POLISH WAR VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he has received from the Polish ex-combatants' association in Canada an appeal that the government intervene to seek the release in Poland of 16 war veterans who were leaders of the underground movement and who have served terms of imprisonment imposed under the present Polish government which have expired. If so, what action does the government propose to take on this meritorious appeal?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall having received any such appeal but I shall look into the matter. If such an appeal has been received I will reply tomorrow to my hon. friend.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

INQUIRY AS TO RESPONSIBILITY FOR DIKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture. In view of the uncertainty expressed recently by the head of the prairie farm rehabilitation office in Winnipeg with respect to the responsibility for the maintenance and inspection of dikes constructed by the P.F.R.A. along the Assiniboine river, would the minister make a statement to the house in order to clarify the extent to which the P.F.R.A. authority is responsible for the maintenance and inspection of such dikes?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of his question. The dikes along the Assiniboine river that are referred to were constructed in the first instance by the Department of Public Works as they were dikes on a navigable stream. Three or four years ago the Department of Public Works transferred the activities in connection with these dikes to the Department of Agriculture to be cared for through P.F.R.A.

The position is that dikes are built on privately owned farms along the river. The access to these dams or dikes is at the permission of those who own the lands or on request from the municipalities. We do go in and do the engineering and assist with the work of building dikes there. The word used here is "responsibility". We have no responsibility for doing the inspection after construction. That is done by the municipalities, but if request is made to P.F.R.A. for engineering assistance in connection with any repairs or maintenance that has to be done, then we are quite prepared to give that kind of assistance along the Assiniboine and elsewhere.

[Later:]

Mr. Zaplitny: With regard to the answer the minister gave in connection with these dikes, when the P.F.R.A. engineers on request of the municipalities make an inspection and recommend certain repairs or alterations, and these are carried out, at whose expense is that work done?

Mr. Gardiner: The work with which we have been associated has been carried out largely at the expense of P.F.R.A.; but as to what would be done in case repairs are required, I am not too sure, but they can get a report directly from our engineers when they are there.

GRAIN

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF EMBARGO ON EXPORT OF SELKIRK WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): While I am on my feet, I should like to say, with regard to the question that was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Pommer) having to do with Selkirk wheat, that there are only 3 million bushels of Selkirk wheat in western Canada. It takes about 40 million bushels to seed the crop, and about half of the area that has to be seeded will be in a district that was last year infected with rust, so that it would take in the neighbourhood of 20 million bushels to seed the area that was rusted. The government this year has therefore decided—and the action was taken by the wheat board—that they would not permit the export of this wheat, other than some 20,000 bushels which, I think, was supplied to the United States government. Any wheat which would be allowed to go out of Canada in future would result from dealings with the United States government.

The question asked yesterday was as to whether we would permit the boundary to be opened so that Selkirk wheat could move now. I understand that the reason for the question is that most of those in the southern part of Manitoba near the boundary line have disposed of all the Selkirk wheat they find it possible to dispose of, and they have some in surplus. My understanding is that the Saskatchewan government has been paying the freight on Selkirk wheat. They have at least been giving considerable assistance in the movement of Selkirk wheat from where it happened to be to where it was needed. With the price which is being obtained from these quantities, which are not necessarily certified grades, the price is such that farmers can buy the wheat, and it is being bought in Canada. My suggestion to those who live in parts of Manitoba that have already been supplied as far as possible is that they get in touch with the authorities in Saskatchewan or with the provincial government in Manitoba and find where that wheat can be marketed. It is not our desire that it be allowed to go out of Canada, except to the extent that it is being helpful to some activities of the government of the United States. We hope that it will be seeded in western Canada.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY

COLLISION OFF BERMUDA BETWEEN "ALGONQUIN" AND "BUCKINGHAM"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to give the house a statement respecting the collision of two naval ships off Bermuda, in particular respecting the extent of damage and casualties, if any?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on Friday evening, April 22, during night manoeuvres off Bermuda, the destroyer escort Algonquin and the frigate Buckingham were in collision. I am advised that an initial assessment of the damage indicated that it was not serious in either ship. There were no casualties and neither ship was in danger. Temporary repairs are being effected at Bermuda. I am advised today that one or both of these ships expect to leave Bermuda tonight or tomorrow for Halifax.

PUBLIC SERVICE

FIVE-DAY 40-HOUR WEEK—STATIONARY ENGINEERS AND FIREMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre:) Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State? Can he say when stationary engineers and firemen employed by the federal government will be put on a five-day 40-hour week along the lines of his announcement of March 30?

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): I cannot give a definite answer to my hon. friend. I shall have to look into that again, because there were certain complications which did not make it possible to put this into effect immediately, but I will give a fuller answer later on.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPORTION OF ROLLING STOCK MANUFACTURED IN CANADA

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor) asked yesterday what proportion of the rolling stock required in the operation of the Canadian National Super-Continental train will be manufactured in Canada.

As the house knows, the Super-Continental is already in service, and I am informed by the management of the railway that all the motive power was purchased in Canada, also all the head-end equipment comprising 25 baggage and express cars and 22 coaches. Of the rear-end equipment, buffets, parlour cars, sleepers, etc., 45 were manufactured in Canada and 36 in the United States.

COMPARISON OF RUNNING TIME WITH THAT OF C.P.R.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if I might answer another question, yesterday the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) referred to the running time of the new transcontinental service on the Canadian National railway compared to that of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

The hon. member apparently was not aware that when the sessional committee on railways and shipping sat just prior to the Easter recess the president of the Canadian National Railways gave to the committee a full explanation of the difference in running time of the two new trains. In his explanation the president emphasized that the Canadian National is not engaging in a speed war. The new service was planned to achieve, at the least possible cost, a faster through passenger train service that at the same time would provide convenient inter-city service.

As hon. members know, the Canadian National line to the Pacific coast is longer than the other transcontinental line. In addition the management, in drawing up the schedule, took particular account of the intermediate towns and cities that they serve.

I think I may say that the main objectives in planning the new train were to offer a faster service and to arrive at reasonable hours at the principal cities and towns served by the railway.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSOLIDATION OF LEGISLATION—AUTHORIZATION FOR OPERATION OF TELECOMMUNICATION SYSTEM, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, April 25, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Marler—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to consolidate the various enactments relating to Canadian National Railways into one statute, also, to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may operate a telecommunication system, to authorize officers and employees of the Canadian National Railways to act as directors of partially-owned companies, to authorize the company to construct short lines without specific parliamentary authority and to operate motor vehicles and further to make provisions for extinguishing charters of constituent corporations.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, before the house rose at ten o'clock last evening I had a few words to say about the employment situation on the Canadian National Railways. I wish to express once again the earnest hope that at this time, when all the statutes repecting the Canadian National Railways are being reviewed, consolidated and re-enacted, serious consideration will be given to the position of those who work for this railway.

As hon. members in all parts of the house are aware, there is considerable concern on the part of many members at the lay-offs that have been taking place. Our concern is nothing compared with the concern of the men themselves. Many of us feel that this government-owned railway, and the government behind it, owe to these men who work for the railway something better than the uncertainty and insecurity that they have been facing in recent weeks, and the uncertainty and insecurity that hangs over them so far as the future is concerned. Other matters in connection with the operations of the railway are important. Capital structure is a subject to which we must give attention. The acquiring of the best possible equipment is important. The maintenance of the equipment is important. But it is also important, indeed more important, that consideration be given to the position of the men. Out of the discussions on this legislation I hope may come the formulation of a policy that will put an end to the lay-offs that have been taking place and will provide some protection for these people who carry the main burden of the load so far as the operation of the Canadian National Railways is concerned.

As hon. members know, figures have been placed on the record this session. We have had some difficulty in wording our questions so as to get the information that is available, but we have learned that there has been a considerable drop in total employment during this winter. We also know that notices have been given of still further lay-offs at Winnipeg, Leaside, Toronto and other places. This is an extremely important matter. As strongly as I can I urge that there be the formulation of a policy that will remove this insecurity and uncertainty with regard to the employment of Canadian National workers.

It also seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that at a time when Canadian National Railways policies are being reviewed in their entirety, some attention should be paid to the position of retired C.N.R. employees.

The Chairman: Order. May I at this moment express a doubt that we are reviewing Canadian National Railways policy in its entirety. It seems to me that this resolution refers to a measure to consolidate into one statute the various enactments relating to the Canadian National Railways. It seems to me that it is merely a consolidation and, in my opinion, it would not give hon. members the privilege of discussing Canadian National Railways policy in general. The resolution goes on to mention certain particular matters which are the subject of amendment. It seems to me that this debate might be more properly directed, first of all, to a discussion of the advisability or inadvisability of consolidating the statutes and, second, to the various particular matters which are mentioned in the resolution.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: If Your Honour is suggesting that discussion of detailed matters of policy should wait until we have the bill before us, I would not go out of my way to quarrel with you. But, sir, if you are suggesting that because all that is proposed is a consolidation of certain acts that are on the statute books we cannot discuss what is involved in the statutes that are being consolidated, I submit that I would have the right to take issue with you.

As Your Honour is aware, the deputy chairman of committees of the whole raised this point at ten o'clock last evening. Since then I have taken the trouble to do a little bit of homework on the point and, if I may say so, with respect, I think some confusion arises because there are citations in May, particularly in May as revised by Campion, which suggest that consolidating acts are dealt with expeditiously and without discussion of the details of the various acts being consolidated. I would point out, however, that that is because in the United Kingdom—unlike here in Canada—there is what is known as the consolidation of enactments (procedure) act, 1949, under which it is possible for statutes of the parliament of the United Kingdom to be consolidated in what is referred to in May as an expeditious manner. I therefore suggest that the citations in May which limit discussion of bills that consolidate do not apply to this parliament because we have no such measure. We have no provision that puts consolidating acts in any other category than that of any bill that comes before parliament.

All I am saying is this. If you agree with me I will leave the matter until a later date. If you feel that this discussion should wait until we have the bill before us and if it is understood that when the bill is before us we can discuss on the bill any of the matters referred to in the bill, I have no objection to waiting until that occasion. But if there is any suggestion that we cannot discuss what is in that bill, perhaps that will be a point for further discussion when the time comes. I wonder whether Your Honour could indicate whether it is your view merely that this discussion should wait until the bill is before us or whether it is your view that these matters should not be discussed at all.

The Chairman: Hon. members will know that in our practice, on discussion of the bill, it is the principle of the amending bill, not the principle of the bill which it is proposed to amend, which we are allowed to discuss. One might say that the same consideration might be applicable to discussion of the resolution which precedes the bill.

Hon. members will recall that standing order 58, subparagraph 2, reads as follows:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

This is an interesting and rather important point. In one light, it might be considered that an amending bill which merely consolidates various enactments which now appear in different acts is nothing more or less than a renumbering of certain sections. I do not think that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would argue that if an enactment were being amended by the insertion of a new clause and the later clauses were being renumbered, he would have the privilege of debating the principles of all those later clauses.

I should like to give the matter further consideration before making a definite ruling. As I said, the point is important, interesting and probably rather new. But in one light, I do not believe that a mere consolidation statute opens up the entire original acts for discussion at this stage. As I say, I would not wish to rule too definitely on the point without giving the matter mature consideration, but at the moment my feeling is that a consolidation is little more than a renumbering. It would be difficult to see how a consolidation should properly open up the entire act to discussion, bearing in mind the well-known principle which I first stated, namely, that it is the principle of the amending bill which is discussed. The hon. member will of course realize that there are other and perhaps better opportunities to discuss the subjects which he has indicated he might wish to discuss at this time.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I view your ruling as a very reasonable one and I will not pursue these matters at this stage. I will raise them again later. However, I should like to suggest that, before a ruling is made as to what our rights are on second reading of the bill, further study might be given to the question. I would even be so presumptuous as to suggest a reference to May, fifteenth edition, pages 478, 543, 647 and 739. In the light of these references in May, I would also suggest that reference might be made to chapter 33 of the statutes of the United Kingdom, 1949, which is entitled "Consolidation of Enactments (Procedure) Act, 1949". Incidentally, I would point out that later in today's business there is on the order paper second reading of a bill which, while it makes some changes, is a consolidation, a re-enacting of a statute that has been on the statute books since 1940, namely, the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, assuming, if I may, that your present ruling relates only to the debate at this resolution stage and that any ruling regarding what can be discussed in the debate on second reading will be deferred until that time, I am prepared to save my remarks until a later occasion. The minister knows what the main subjects are, namely unemployment and the pensions of retired C.N.R. employees.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I was most interested in what you said a minute ago about the discussion that should take place on a resolution preceding a bill. May I respectfully suggest that the resolution is the cornerstone of the bill itself. Originally such a resolution was introduced before the bill was drafted in order to give all members an opportunity to make suggestions for the better drafting of the bill. This is why I find discussion of the resolution so important. I do not know whether or not the bill has been drafted but valuable and constructive suggestions could be made by members and listened to by the minister and the government, as the result of which the tenor of the bill could be entirely different from what it would be if such a discussion had not taken place.

Whether the bill is a condensation, compilation or totally new legislation makes practically no difference because constructive suggestions in the house shall always be welcomed by the government as well as by the whole membership of the house. In the first place, hon. members know that at Westminster there are not enough seats for all members of the House of Commons and therefore members very often speak in turn. Some speak on the resolution preceding a bill, others on second reading, others on the bill in committee, and others on third reading of the bill. This is one of the reasons why the numerous readings are so important and cannot be dispensed with.

Naturally this is an opinion I am offering. The other day I was called an expert on procedure, which I deny completely. I have never claimed to be an expert on parliamentary procedure. I have been here for 31 years, and for 29 years I have had the opportunity to express my views freely in the house. But in my humble view experts in parliamentary procedure are dangerous people who make procedure difficult to understand in order to pose as the only ones who know anything about it. It is a very dangerous mentality. I speak as a member of parliament who has been here for a great number of years and who has done his best to establish a relation between what he had to say and what was before the house. That is one of my understandings of the few main rules that relate to discussion in the house.

Turning to the resolution now before us, it is one of the most important that has come before us this year. It is no less than a compilation of all the laws that concern the Canadian National Railways. There was so much legislation about the Canadian National Railways that some of the statutes we find in the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1952 are still separate one from the other. As a preamble to what I am going to say, I should like to remind you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee of what has happened with regard to the Canadian National Railways. First of all we had the Intercolonial which was managed by the minister of railways and canals himself. He had full authority with regard to the railway. Then there were some new railways that were built and which were bought by the Canadian government. During the first world war the Grand Trunk was purchased. Then the Canadian Northern was purchased and Mr. Gutelius was put in charge not of the Intercolonial Railway but of the Canadian government railways which included the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern. There was a lot of misunderstanding between the employees of the old Intercolonial Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Northern Railway.

Mr. Gutelius came from the United States to manage the Canadian government railways. Then he was succeeded by Mr. D. B. Hanna, a gentleman who had been with the Canadian Northern in the first place. He took charge of the Canadian government railways. It happened during the Borden-Meighen regime. As soon as the Liberals came to power in 1921 propaganda was started by the Conservative newspapers to the effect that the Canadian National Railways should be free to decide their own policies without any interference by the government. The idea behind that propaganda of the Conservative press was to prevent the Conservatives who were managing the railway from being replaced by Liberals. It was done for a political purpose, in order to maintain complete Tory control of the Canadian government railways. Then, Sir Henry Thornton came. He came with a good reputation because during the war he had been in the British Isles doing some excellent work in transportation. He was quite exacting. He wanted to be appointed chairman of the board of directors and president of the railway, two positions that are entirely different and cannot be associated together in a practical manner. The legislation was changed and a new act was passed. Sir Henry Thornton became president of the railway and chairman of the board of directors.

According to the Canadian National Railways Act, chapter 40 of the Revised Statutes of 1952, the Canadian government railways or the former Intercolonial Railway, the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Northern system, formed the Canadian National Railways and the governor general in council may nominate not less than five nor more than seventeen persons to be directors of the Canadian National Railways. These directors shall be and are hereby incorporated as a company under the name of the Canadian National Railway Company, not the Canadian National Railways system, as Mr. Gordon stated before the committee the other day.

One should also draw attention to the fact that no stock ownership shall be necessary to qualify a director. The directors, therefore, represent not only the government of Canada but the people of Canada at large. They are there to fulfil a duty, which is a duty of control of the management of the railway.

Now, sir, the board of directors is entirely different from the management officers, with one exception which is that the chairman of the board of directors is also the president of the officers of the railway. The board of directors is as follows: Chairman, Mr. Donald Gordon, C.M.G., LL.D.; Mr. Wilfrid Gagnon, C.B.E.; Mr. J. A. Northey; Mr. H. J. Symington, C.M.G., Q.C.; Mr. R. B. Brenan; Mr. B. L. Daly; Mr. W. J. Parker. With regard to the officers, their names are mentioned in letters that are easier to read than those of the directors, and are contained on the first page of the last report of the Canadian National Railways. They are, Mr. Donald Gordon, C.M.G., LL.D, president; law, Mr. MacMillan, Q.C.; operating, Mr. S. F. Dingle, vice-president; the vice-president of the western region, Winnipeg; the vice-president of the central region, Toronto; the vice-president and general manager, Atlantic region, Moncton; the vice-president and general manager of the Grand Trunk Western Railroad, Detroit; the vice-president of personnel; the vice-president of purchasing and stores; the vice-president of research and development and the vice-president of traffic. There is a president and ten vice-presidents whose duties are entirely different from the board of directors.

I appreciate the good work that the Minister of Transport has done since he assumed that high office. His knowledge of the law makes him familiar with all the intricacies of the management of the Canadian National Railways. The Canadian National Railways is a big company, a company with an income and expenditure, on the average, of $600 million a year. I have some sympathy for Mr. Gordon, and I expressed it to him before the committee. I said I thought he was working too hard. On March 31 last, Mr. Gordon said:

> No man works harder; no man has more frustrations, and no man has more fun than I have.

This shows that he has a complex character, but a happy disposition. I quote the following from the committee report:

> If you come here it is in order to permit the members of parliament to help you, and we can do so only inasmuch as we know the facts.
> Mr. Gordon: Quite so, yes.
> Mr. Pouliot: If you did not tell us much, if we knew nothing, then why should you come here?
> I thank you for the information you gave us about the sale price of the hotels. It is the most important statement you have made since you were president and chairman of the railway.

The directors appointed by the government form the board which constitutes the company itself.

Mr. Knowles: I rise to a point of order. I am sure the hon. member for Temiscouata will realize that I support his right to go into these matters of detail to which he is referring because they relate to Canadian National policy, but I think I am entitled to ask for a statement from Your Honour as to where one draws the line between the kind of detail that I wanted to mention and the kind of detail to which my hon. friend is referring. I do not object to what my hon. friend is doing, but when he is finished I think I should be permitted to come back and debate in some detail the matter of Canadian National pensions.

Mr. Pouliot: If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word on the point of order. I was very much surprised to hear my hon. friend object to what I am saying.

Mr. Knowles: I do not object at all.

Mr. Pouliot: It is not because he has capitulated before the Chair has rendered its ruling that I have to follow his example. My hon. friend knows a lot about splitting hairs with regard to procedure. He does it all the time. I am not splitting hairs, I am speaking of the law that we are consolidating here. What I am saying is entirely relevant because if we cannot speak of the law with which we are to deal, we might just as well gag everybody in this chamber. On this occasion my hon. friend has been too quick. He knows too much about Beauchesne, and not enough about the law itself. He knows too much about small things, and he forgets the essentials that I bring to his attention as well as to the attention of the members who form this committee.

Mr. Knowles: If this is the way you treat me when I am on your side, what would you do if I were against you?

Mr. Pouliot: If my hon. friend is on my side, why does he object to what I say? I say that here we are to deal with legislation that affects a concern owned by the people of Canada and which has an income and expenditure of approximately $600 million a year, and which is faced with a deficit that Mr. Gordon wants the country to make up.

Mr. Low: Go ahead and tell us your story.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Order. In view of the point of order which has been raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, perhaps I should say a word before the hon. member for Temiscouata proceeds. I did not make any definite ruling when I rose before. I merely, I hope, expressed doubt as to the advisability of proceeding with a general debate concerning the Canadian National Railways on a resolution intended to introduce a measure to consolidate the various enactments, of which hon. members will understand there are a great many.

I think this situation is clearly distinguishable from the one which faced us earlier in this session with regard to the Defence Production Act, when the amending bill cut off the expiry date and therefore re-enacted the entire Defence Production Act for an indefinite period. I think hon. members will appreciate that this situation is different from the former one.

However, I have made no ruling and therefore I cannot say that the hon. member for Temiscouata is out of order. I intend to give the matter mature consideration because, as I said, I think it is an interesting point. Similarly, if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre chooses to rise later on, we will have to deal with that as it comes.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, there is more wisdom in what you have said than in all the judgments of King Solomon.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear; now everybody is happy.

Mr. Pouliot: He deserves it.

The directors appointed by the government form the board which constitutes the company itself. Their duty is to control the management of the company by the president, the ten vice-presidents and the other officers of the company.

As no stock ownership is necessary—and this is very important—to qualify the directors, these are the trustees appointed by the government to look after the management of the company by the officers whom they appoint, including the president, and for whose management they are responsible to the government.

I hope I have made myself clear. I hold no grudge against Mr. Gordon, or any other officer of the company. I am on talking terms with all of them. On the other hand, I want the minister to have full and complete authority over the management of the railways by its officers. And if the directors are not fulfilling those duties, then they should be dispensed with. The duty of the management is to follow the instructions of the minister; and the board of directors has the duty to look after the management of the company by its officers. Have I made myself clear on that?

To my mind the other doctrine is all wrong. I had occasion to discuss this matter before the committee in 1952. As reported at page 44 of the proceedings of the committee on railways and shipping, my learned and distinguished colleague from Greenwood said:

> Now, I would like to ask you this question: is it a matter of policy to keep the board so small? I am sure that Mr. Gordon would agree with me in general that it is a good thing for an executive head to have as much in the way of fresh ideas from outside as he can get. I don't mean the directors should interfere with management,—

I completely differ with him on that.

> —but I merely mean that you get fresh views if you have a fairly wide range of people on the board, I would have thought; and I would like to know whether that conclusion was arrived at as a matter of policy. It seems to me that you deprive yourself of the advantage of outside views.

To that Mr. Chevrier answered:

> In the first place, these members of the board of directors are permanent, they are not employed in an advisory capacity.

That is clear. He continues:

> They are appointed by the governor in council to administer the affairs of the railways; and while there have been representations from time to time to increase the number on the board, the government has not seen fit to change it.

The point of view of the hon. member for Greenwood, who is now sitting across from me, was that the number of directors was not large enough, and that they were there to advise Mr. Gordon. My point of view, as I expressed it later at the same sitting, is that we must look after quality instead of quantity, that the president of the railways should get authorization of the board of directors to make any decision, and that there was no use having a larger number of directors if they were to be treated like school children by the president of the railways, who happens to be chairman of the board of directors.

That was my point of view, and it was entirely different from—indeed it was opposite to that of the hon. member. Then the report of proceedings goes on in this way:

> Mr. Pouliot: What would be the number that you would suggest?
> Mr. Macdonnell: Well, Mr. Pouliot, I did not have it in mind to suggest any particular number, I was just dealing with the general idea of the possibility of a greater representation on the board of directors.
> Mr. Pouliot: You are going on the assumption that the more numbers you have on the board the better will be the results. Speaking personally, I am for quality and not for quantity. The purpose of the board of directors is to advise the management, and, as I see it, the more advisers we have the more difficulties we may expect.

The meaning of the word "advisers" was different in the mind of the hon. member from what it was in my mind. I could have used the word "controllers". Then the report continues:

> Mr. Macdonnell: Not with a man like Mr. Gordon; he keeps the directors in their place.

How could the hon. member have spoken in that way? Does a man who is as highly paid as the president of the railways, and chairman of the board of directors, ask for their advice? Does he ask for their consent when he has an important decision to make? No; his duty, according to the hon. member—and he is satisfied with it—is to keep them in their place.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. member permit a question. Does he never permit any room for facetious remarks? I apologize for having been facetious when I said "Mr. Gordon kept the directors in their places".

Mr. Pouliot: My hon. friend, I believe, is one of the best read members of the house and he should not try to explain a mistake he has made in speaking. He is somewhat similar to one who makes a blot of ink on a letter and then tries to erase it. The result is that it looks worse and finally he must rewrite the letter. I think the hon. gentleman should rewrite his letter. I have great respect for him as I think he is one of the finest men around Ottawa, even in Carleton county.

But I do say to him honestly that our conception and understanding of the management of the railway is entirely different from his. His idea is to leave Donald Gordon alone to boss the show; my idea is to take control of Donald Gordon, to let the directors hold him by the hand to prevent him from falling into the same excesses that were the downfall of poor Sir Henry Thornton. Imagine how great Sir Henry Thornton would have been if he had not been the sole boss of the Canadian National Railways for many years. He was alone and his extravagances were notorious. He used to change the curtains and rugs in his house every time he had a visitor of note. There was no check on him. Mr. Bennett had some difficulty with him. He brought him before a committee of the house with regard to extravagances in connection with his private car and so on.

I do not know whether Mr. Gordon was speaking humorously or not, but he said in Montreal that he was a hotel keeper, that he was a banker, that he was a railway man, that he was a caterer; there was not a thing that he was not. One should be more modest; one should realize that it is impossible for one man to manage a big company like the Canadian National Railways.

I had occasion to say this to Mr. Gordon before the committee. I felt that I should say that as a member of parliament because it was my duty to do so for the good of the country. It was my duty to prevent him from making a faux pas because a faux pas in connection with such a large concern may mean a loss of millions of dollars to the country. Will he be engaged again or will he not? I do not know.

If the law is to be changed I hope it will not be done in the way some books on procedure have been put out by Pepper, scissors and glue. It is very easy to cut up sections of the law, paste them on a piece of paper without any changes and then say that it is an important compilation. I am reminded of some books on procedure that have been quoted quite often in this house. Pepper was a messenger here, and everybody knows what scissors and glue are. It was Pepper, scissors and glue.

I hope that the compilation of the Canadian National Railways legislation will be different from many of these works by the experts which we might call Pepper, scissors and glue.

I should like to make one constructive suggestion. I make one only so it will not be forgotten. If I made many, some of them might be overlooked. My suggestion is that we make the management of the Canadian National Railways as efficient as any department of government. How could it be done?

Mr. Low: Only that?

Mr. Pouliot: This is one to start with; I will have others later on. I wanted this one to be digested thoroughly before I made others.

Mr. Low: But you want it improved from that point upward?

Mr. Pouliot: I am making one suggestion and if my hon. friends have others they will be welcome to make them. If they are good they will be accepted and if they are not good they will have to console themselves.

How is it possible to do this? The only way to do it is to notify Mr. Gordon that before his services are hired again for a certain number of years he will have to be only the president of the Canadian National Railways for a term and then the board of directors will have to fulfil their duties and give instructions to Mr. Gordon instead of receiving instructions from him.

I hope I have made myself clear about this. The time of the house is very precious and I do not intend to take up too much of it. I hope that what I have said is clear and I hope I have converted the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) to my idea of parliamentary responsibility as applied to the Canadian National Railways. This would be a great step forward in connection with the finances of the Canadian National Railways.

If the directors are reluctant to take this step and assume the responsibilities of their office, I suggest to the minister that there is one thing he can do, that is to appoint the members of the House of Commons who have been on the railways and shipping committee to be directors of the Canadian National Railways. We would then have a board composed of members of all parties. It would be non-political and there would be an opportunity to improve the management of the railway. Having said that, I will reserve any future occasions for making more constructive criticisms.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the various points of order that have been raised and to your own comments thereon and I do not think I am any less confused now than I was before they were made. So, if I should happen to be out of order in what I wish to say, I would ask that you call my attention to the fact. I do not think that I will go any further afield than the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has gone. I am not going to talk about Mr. Donald Gordon; I am not going to talk about a good many things which he has mentioned, although I would say, with regard to the recommendation that he makes, his desire to have the Canadian National Railways become as efficient as any government department, I do not know where that leaves us. Most of us on this side of the house have claimed for a good many years that the most inefficient business in the country is the various departments of the present Liberal administration.

However, to deal with the resolution before us, it states "that it is expedient to introduce a measure to consolidate the various enactments relating to Canadian National Railways". The resolution goes much further than that, of course, and I do not know how we can confine our discussion to those matters that are now within the scope of the law, because I notice that there are five other matters that are to be dealt with in the new bill. These five are as follows: Firstly, the bill will authorize the company to operate a telecommunication system. Secondly, it will authorize officers and employees of the Canadian National Railways to act as directors of partially-owned companies. Thirdly, it will authorize it to construct short lines—I do not know whether that is complementary to the telecommunication system, but I fancy it means short railway lines—without specific parliamentary authority. The fourth is authority to operate motor vehicles, and the fifth makes provision for extinguishing charters of constituent corporations. There are five matters beyond the consolidation of the laws relating to the Canadian National Railways.

I should like to ask the minister a question, but before doing so I do want to comment on one part of this resolution, that dealing with the construction of short lines without specific parliamentary authority. Once again here we are getting away from the authority of this parliament and centralizing authority in the government. Here, of course, it is within the company, but the company is a crown company. We in this group are entirely against the centralization of power. That is one of the basic principles of the movement for which we stand. The only authority that we recognize is the authority of the people. That being so, the only way the people can exercise their authority and the only way they can express themselves in the exercise of that authority is through their parliamentary representatives. If we depreciate the authority of this parliament, then we are depreciating the authority of the people of Canada.

The minister may rise and say that this is only a little thing and it only involves short lines. It is like the old question, how long is a rope? I do not know what "short lines" means. You can think of the term shortness only in comparison. If you compare it with the national system from Halifax to Vancouver, then a short line could conceivably be 500 or 600 miles, but if you consider a short line as being a spur track to shunt some railroad cars on, it is a different matter.

Mr. Marler: If the hon. member will permit me, I said last night when, I believe, the hon. member was not in the house, in referring to short lines, that we were thinking in terms of lines not exceeding six miles in length?

Mr. Fulton: Will that be written into the bill?

Mr. Marler: Yes.

Mr. Hansell: I am glad to hear the minister say that. We do not have the bill before us, and it is understandable that we cannot discuss its contents to any extent, but even six miles is a reasonable length, and I do not think we should quibble much about it. However, it depends largely on where that six miles is. It could be between two provinces; it could be a tunnel; it could be something that will divert traffic in a corporate city. There may be a variety of things for which we are saying we are going to give authority to the Canadian National Railways.

There is another point here that is extremely important. I understand that the Canadian National Railways have the power of expropriation. If they have that power, and if we give them the authority to build a six-mile railway extension without reference to parliament, what are we doing? We are giving them the authority to expropriate almost anything that might be in their way, in order to build that six miles or less of railway. However, perhaps we will have to deal with that when the bill comes down; and if we do not like it we will have to vote against the clause.

There is a very general question which I should like to ask the minister in connection with the Canadian National Railways. I should like to ask him, does this resolution preceding the bill give the Canadian National Railways anything that it does not give comparable railways?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that the question is a little too broad for me to answer in any simple way. If we are talking about the subject of the short lines or branch lines, I might perhaps give him this explanation, and at the same time reply to the question which my hon. friend from Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) raised last night. As I understand the terms of the Railway Act, which applies of course to the C.P.R. and other railways in Canada, the situation is that, if any of these railways desire to build a branch line not exceeding six miles in length, it may do so with the approval of the board of transport commissioners. The Canadian National Railways is in the position where it does not enjoy that power, and it must obtain, as the law stands at present, the approval of parliament. If I might point this out to the hon. member for Macleod, I should like to emphasize that that approval at the present time deals with two aspects: first of all, the power or capacity to build a particular line; and, second, the provision of the necessary funds in order that the railway may make the expenditures. The fact remains that, even after the proposed change is made, the Canadian National Railways will still require the approval by parliament of its budget in order to dispose of the funds necessary to carry out the construction. Perhaps I have not answered fully the question which my friend the hon. member for Macleod has just asked. However, I think it would be extremely difficult for me to compare the whole structure and powers of the Canadian National Railways with those of other railway companies in Canada.

Mr. Hansell: Perhaps we can wait until the bill comes down and then ask questions.

(Translation):

Mr. Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, the debate at the resolution stage affords me an opportunity of acquainting the house and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) with a project calculated to promote the growth of the city of Alma, county seat of Lake St. John, and also to provide the Canadian National Railways with an additional source of revenue.

One of the clauses of the bill to be introduced following this resolution provides that the Canadian National Railways will be authorized to build short lines without specific parliamentary authority.

By virtue of these new powers, then, the Canadian National Railways could extend the present line from St. Gedeon to St. Joseph d'Alma, thence back to Hebertville Station to continue on to Jonquiere and Chicoutimi.

The route followed by this road was that of the first of our railway lines, constructed some 75 years ago to answer the needs of colonization. The parish of St. Joseph d'Alma had barely been established then, its population was only a few hundred and a small lumber industry had just been set up.

Since then, the Saguenay-Lake St. John district has expanded wonderfully. Lumber companies were first in their efforts to further the industrial growth of the Lake St. John district. At present it boasts six mills producing wood pulp and newsprint. Aluminum followed and gave its powerful impetus to the industrialization of what is commonly known as the Saguenay kingdom. The town of Alma, situated in the very heart of the Lake St. John district, has not in the least trailed behind other towns of the Saguenay with respect to that development. What was a tiny village 75 years ago has become an industrial and commercial centre numbering nearly 15,000 people. It is the home town of most of the workers of the Riverbend mill, which produces nearly 700 tons of newsprint a day and employs 800 people. The aluminum smelter of Isle Maligne employs 1,200 workers who live in the towns of Isle Maligne, Naudville and Alma.

That community of close to 20,000 people is served by a modern hospital and a 1,000-watt radio station. Last year the Department of Transport recognized the importance of the town of Alma when it authorized the Boreal Airways Ltd., to use it as a stop-over on the Bagotville-Chibougamau flight, and has granted generous subsidies for the building of a municipal airport. Quite recently the Department of Public Works, realizing the fast growth of the chief town in the Lake St. John district, decided to put up a modern building to accommodate federal public services.

I am not asking the Canadian National management to "blaze the trail" or even to follow suit. All I am asking is that they recognize the rapid and steady development of that important industrial community which gives them more than a quarter of all the revenue from the Lake St. John line, with its outlets into Quebec and Montreal.

People who contribute such a substantial revenue to the Canadian National Railways should benefit from lower transportation rates and to have available within their district, or rather at their doorstep, a railway ensuring a fast and convenient passenger service.

Because the hon. Minister of Transport has never failed to give my requests his kind consideration, I hope that, when conferring upon the authorities of the Canadian National Railways the supplementary powers provided in the bill, he will ask the company to give top priority, among the short lines contemplated, to the extension of the railroad going from St. Gedeon to the town of Alma and thence to the station of Hebertville. The national railways will find it an additional source of revenue, while the population of the industrial centre formed by Alma, Naudville, Riverbend and Isle Maligne will be pleased to see that their long-cherished dream will at last come true.

(Text):

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are one or two references that I want to make to this resolution, especially arising from the remarks made by the hon. member for Temiscouata who, in his analysis of the situation on the Canadian National Railways, asked for the restoration to parliament of its right to examine the Canadian National Railways affairs and to ascertain whether or not the will of parliament was being carried out.

That has been a stand that we in the official opposition have been taking for a long while. We have emphasized the need for the restoration to parliament of a power which was once exercised but which in the last few years has fallen into disuse. The loss of this power has become a serious matter. In the present session on several occasions we in the opposition have endeavoured to secure information with regard to the Canadian National Railways, but without much success. I mention these things because they indicate that some amendments should be brought in when the consolidation of the Railway Act is made in order to restore to parliament a power which it does not possess today because of the stand taken by the members supporting the government.

I mention just one or two recent examples as indicative of the degree to which the concealment of information with regard to the Canadian National Railways has become a way of life. Indeed, blackouts and secrecy have been imposed on parliament in recent months respecting the Canadian National Railways. That was not the course followed in earlier years. I was impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Temiscouata as he demanded that information be available to parliament. I went back for a moment to February 14 last when I made a motion in this house with a view to securing information for parliament and the people with regard to Canadian National Railways. That motion read as follows:

> For a copy of all letters and communications since the 1st day of August, 1954, written by the minister, deputy minister or any officials in the Department of Transport to the Canadian National Railways, or any officer or official thereof, concerning the leasing of or intended leasing or management agreement of the Queen Elizabeth hotel in the city of Montreal to the Hilton Hotels Corporation.

That was a reasonable request asking for information as to what the Canadian National Railways is doing with Canada's money. As the hon. member for Temiscouata said, the Canadian National Railways asks parliament for the money. When it has deficits, the people pay. But when information is asked for, the people are denied it. I was interested in noticing the vote on that occasion. I find that my friend the hon. member for Temiscouata on that occasion joined with his colleagues and voted against the giving of information to parliament on that motion. I am glad he has changed his attitude.

Mr. Pouliot: May I interrupt my hon. friend? I should like to give him an explanation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. Pouliot: My hon. friend does not happen to be a member of the committee on railways and shipping. When Mr. Chevrier was minister of transport some years ago he asked the members of the committee if they wanted to have some information concerning the salary paid to Mr. Gordon. No member of the committee, including myself—perhaps I was wrong—agreed to ask for the information. That constituted a precedent, and until the committee changes its practice it is no use to ask for information when the committee does not want to have it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, all I can say is that the explanation scarcely covers the situation. Indeed, it complicates the simplicity that I endeavoured to incorporate in the attitude taken by my hon. friend on that occasion. However, I must say we welcome the hon. member to the support of the ranks of those in the house who do ask for information from the Canadian National Railways. We do so because of the fact that the experience of the last couple of years has not been conducive to the building up of the morale which is so necessary on the part of the Canadian National Railways.

I ask the minister to go from one end of the country to the other, and he will find that the employees of Canadian National Railways today live in fear. They feel themselves thwarted and frustrated because of the lack of direction being exercised in reference to themselves. They realize there will be layoffs but they would like to have some understanding of the policy that is being followed in the administration of the Canadian National Railways Act. They would like some message that would tell them there is going to be an end to this haphazard policy under which men are laid off without any apparent reality and without any consideration of their services in the past.

It took us months to find out that some 8,000 men had been laid off in three months. The records of Hansard are replete with questions asked by members with regard to layoffs, and the explanations given by the minister scarcely indicate there is that efficiency that should characterize a great organization such as the people's railway. Over and over again the answer has been that it is impossible to give the information because it is going to be so difficult to bring together the numbers laid off in the various divisions. When the question is asked how many men have been placed on part-time employment the answer again—and seriously given—is that Canadian National Railways does not have the information. That is not good enough. Surely the minister will take this opportunity to give assurance to these employees, something of hope, something of the policy, something of what they may expect.

They find it difficult to understand expenditures being made that seem unjustifiable. Let me mention one that was referred to recently. At a time like this when the railway is running into a deficit, the employees find it difficult to understand why two private cars should have to be repaired at a cost of $130,000 each. They ask: Why is this period chosen? Why are we chosen to be the ones upon whom the management of Canadian National Railways depends to wipe out the deficit? Why should there be such expenditures? Why should there be an expenditure of $20 million on a hotel and yet when we try to find out how it is going to be operated we are told it is not in the public interest to give the information?

Some change must be made in the act to restore to parliament what the hon. member for Temiscouata said should be restored, the power of parliament to find out and to ascertain, and not have that power restricted to the right to inquire with no right to the information. What about the answers that have been given to questions recently? I have a number of them here. As found at page 3116 of Hansard of April 25, the hon. member for Wellington-Huron asked the following question:

> By Ontario districts, how many employees of the car department of the Canadian National Railways have been laid off during (a) the year 1954; (b) the months of January, February and March, 1955?

This was the minister's answer:

> Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the hon. member and explained to him that the Canadian National Railways do not assemble employment figures by districts, and in consequence it is not possible to answer the question as asked.

It is time they did. We have asked for such information for months but we have been met by a stone wall of secrecy and blinders have been placed upon parliament by the subterfuge of the excuse that they do not keep the records that way. As a matter of fact, I suggest to the minister that he ascertain the exact facts from the Canadian National Railways. From my own knowledge each district reports each week as to employment in that district. This was the rest of the answer:

> If the hon. member would care to rephrase his question, the management will give the employment information that is available.

Rephrase simplicity? Hansard is full of answers like this, and they are causing a feeling among Canadian National Railways employees today that there is something seriously wrong somewhere. Let me give another example. At page 2992 of Hansard of April 20, the minister made a statement with respect to lay-offs at Winnipeg. He said:

> The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre yesterday referred to staff reductions by the Canadian National Railways at Winnipeg and other places and put the following question to me:
> "How does he square the lay-offs now taking place with his statement in the house on February 7 that no further staff lay-offs were anticipated?"

This is the answer:

> If the hon. member will reread Hansard of February 7 he will find the opinion there given was that of Mr. J. R. McMillan, vice-president of the railway in Winnipeg, and not that of the Minister of Transport.

That sounds to me like a facetious play on words and not the kind of information to which the railway employees of this country are entitled. Let me go on. On February 28 last I had a motion before the house which was in the following terms:

> For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the minister or Department of Transport and the Canadian National Railways relative to a question placed on the order paper in the name of the mover of this matter on the 28th January last, the purpose of which was to ascertain the number of section and maintenance men, office staffs, etc., who have been laid off by the Canadian National Railways during the periods particularly set forth in the said question.

You will remember what the answer was, Mr. Chairman. The answer was that such information was not procurable because the Canadian National Railways did not keep the kind of books that would give the information—and that on a railroad as large as the Canadian National. That aroused the employees everywhere throughout the country. If the railway does not have such records it is time they started to keep them. Certainly they spend enough money on staffs to be able to furnish that simple information.

On March 7, as found at page 1762 of Hansard, the following question was asked by the hon. member for Royal:

> 1. How many hourly rated employees of the Canadian National Railways were laid off between January 1, 1954 and December 31, 1954?
> 2. How many monthly rated employees "official capacity" of the Canadian National Railways were laid off between January 1, 1954 and December 31, 1954?

This was the answer by the minister:

The management of the Canadian National Railways advise that in order to answer the question as asked it would be necessary to secure information from divisional, district, regional and headquarters offices and require a special staff . . .

Then he went on to refer to the number of employees in the employ of Canadian National Railways at the several periods. I think, Mr. Chairman, when the minister introduces these amendments he should give consideration to bringing back to parliament the right to find out whether or not things are as they should be on the Canadian National Railways. The minister may say the committee does that. We have heard that story before. I have read almost all the committee reports, and the evidence taken. I noticed this: Whenever a question is asked that might furnish information which officials of the Canadian National Railways regard as not being in the public interest, and so often the public interest is apt to clash with the interests of officials of the Canadian National Railways, the information is not given.

Sir, I suggest, and I do so in the most serious way, that this is the picture of Canadian National Railways employees across Canada today. They are disturbed. They do not know where the axe is going to fall or when. They are afraid to get in touch with a member because so often they say, "We dare not do that." Much of the information comes in from sources that are anonymous, and therefore the information has to be checked. I ask the minister to say something to those railway employees that will restore their morale at this time.

Let me give you a recent example. Strong complaints have been made about R. F. Welch Limited—I think that is the name of the company. Mr. Gordon gave his promise that the things complained of would cease after March 31, but he did not say what year. Since March 31, 1,000 people who have been recently brought into Canada have been placed on two extra gangs out of Calgary, according to my information. What about the men who have been laid off? Why were they not given an opportunity, those who would be fitted for that work, to take this employment? A promise was given by Mr. Gordon that this was going to stop, that the injustices resulting from the hiring agreements of that company would be a thing of the past. Within the last two or three days one of the union representatives has been in touch with me concerning this question, and he simply requested that the matter be placed before the minister, and justice and equity asked for those who have been diligent and loyal servants of the Canadian National Railways.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Everywhere across the country there is fear. There is nothing that destroys morale more quickly, whether it is in corporations, in homes or anywhere else, than fear. I ask the minister whether he will do something to remove these clouds of fear that today hang over the Canadian National Railways employees, and give them a message of hope. At the same time he could once more give parliament the right to have information which, however concealed behind expressions such as have been used in recent months, is available and is simply being denied to parliament, as I see it, by the officials of the Canadian National Railways because they are afraid to have the information available. It is not going to help their competitors. How will it help their competitors to know how many employees have been laid off? The competitor allows it to be known how many employees have been laid off. Do that, and I say to the minister he will do a great deal to change deficits into surpluses. Today they fear. Today they are frustrated. Those are not of the elements that together give the cohesive unity and co-operation that will bring about at least a closer approximation of revenues with costs than has been the case during the last year.

(Translation):

Mr. Villeneuve: Introducing as it does legislation providing for an extension of the powers of the Canadian National Railways, particularly with a view to allowing the company to construct short lines without special permission, this resolution provides us with an opportunity of dealing with a subject which is of great interest to the northern part of the constituency of Roberval, which I represent in this house.

At the present time, this part of my constituency, including the municipalities of Dolbeau, Mistassini, St. Stanislas, St. Eugene d'Argentenay, Notre Dame de Lorette and Ste. Elizabeth de Proulx, plus part of this last named community and four others situated in the adjacent constituency of Lake St. John, is served through Dolbeau where the Canadian National Railways terminal is situated.

The economic advantage of a railway line and station to any community is well known. The value of such facilities can only be appreciated, in fact, by those who are deprived of them. Mistassini is in that case. Its trade, its postal service, its tourist facilities, the projected establishment of small industries, the existing industries and its agriculture, in a word, the economy of Mistassini in general is seriously handicapped by the lack of a railway.

The Mistassini area holds a population of 4,000 people, 3,000 of whom live in the town of the same name. Its economic life is based on forest products and the paper mill of the St. Lawrence Corporation, on trade of various kinds and on agriculture. A railway would strengthen the economic situation of the Mistassini area and would enable its industrious people to show what they can do. Ten years ago that district was contributing little to the economy of the district but its geographical location enabled it to assume an ever-increasing importance.

The bringing of the railway to Mistassini would require a two-mile extension of the line and the building of a bridge across the Mistassini river, which separates Dolbeau from Mistassini.

As they are made of wood and are more than 25 years old, the Dolbeau station and freight and express sheds are in need of major repairs, and as this project would probably mean the shifting of that station and those sheds to another part of the town of Dolbeau, the Canadian National should not miss the opportunity to rebuild those buildings which are out of date and not in keeping with such a fair town.

Fully aware of the needs of Mistassini and of the projects made for the future of that fast growing town, which now enjoys all essential services except those of railway transportation, I rely on the sympathetic consideration of this government and the Canadian National Railways for this project which I am anxious to see carried out, as are all my fellow citizens from Mistassini.

Mr. Knowles: Thanks to the hon. member for Temiscouata, Mr. Chairman, and those who have followed him, perhaps I can now conclude the remarks I sought to make some time ago. I agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert that we have been having far more difficulty than should be the case in our efforts to obtain figures about lay-offs on the Canadian National Railways. However, we have been able to get some information. The figures we have obtained cannot be described as the numbers that have been laid off. But since we have been given levels of total employment at certain periods we can, by a process of simple arithmetic, determine what the net decrease has been. That does not take into consideration any additional numbers who may have been hired and fired in the meantime.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Or those retired.

Mr. Knowles: That is right. In the light of the figures appearing at page 2102 of Hansard for March 17, 1955 it appears that between August 1954 and January 1955 there was a drop in employment on the Canadian lines of the Canadian National Railways to the extent of 7,758 persons. It is a figure of that kind which makes the matter of lay-offs by the C.N.R. a serious one.

On that same page there are figures for the western region; and I note that in that area nearly half of this decline in employment has taken place. In that same period, from August 1954 to January 1955—and I understand all of these dates are at the middle of the month —there was a decline in employment of 3,844 persons.

I agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert that we should be able to get information far more readily than is the case. But even more important than getting the information is to have a stop put to this trend of lay-offs which is so serious for the men affected, as well as their families, not to mention the community as a whole.

I wish also to join in the protest made concerning the way in which the Canadian National Railways circumvent collective agreements with certain unions by contracting work out to R. F. Welch Limited. This is a serious matter. As hon. members may recall, I have asked the Minister of Labour in the house if his department could not go into this matter in some way. However, when I suggested that a commission of inquiry be established the minister replied that he did not feel there was anything his department could do. Meantime, employees of the Canadian National Railways doing this kind of work, and doing it under collective agreement, find that they are by-passed by a company which goes outside the terms of the agreement, when the work is let out by contract to the R. F. Welch company.

I wish also to say a few words about the policy of the Canadian National Railways with respect to its retired employees. Like the hon. member for Temiscouata, I feel I should relate my remarks to the legislation before the house. One of the acts to be consolidated is the Canadian National Railways Act; and I find that under the provisions of that act, by cross-reference to the Railway Act, the Canadian National Railways may set up and administer its pension plans. As hon. members know, there are a large number of retired C.N.R. employees on pensions that are ridiculously low. Again, if reference is made to Hansard, this time at pages 1762 and 1763 of March 7, 1955, it will be found that there are still ten retired C.N.R. employees on pensions of less than $25 a month. In addition, there are 3,209 on pensions of only $25 a month. The tables on these pages are exhaustive, and I shall not attempt to repeat all the figures given.

However, may I say by way of summary that it appears there are a total of 19,460 retired C.N.R. employees who are on pensions, and that of that number there are 7,008 who are on pensions of less than $40 a month. Bearing in mind the fact that 3,209 are receiving only $25 a month, I suggest the time is long overdue for an increase in the pensions of those who draw only the basic pension, and for an adjustment in the pensions of those who are in the lower and middle brackets.

I regret the new Minister of Transport finds that he cannot say anything concerning these retired employees that is different from what his predecessor said. The main reply given to the associations who appear before the government from time to time is that these pensions are given and their amount determined by virtue of a contract. The argument is put forward that other persons who are drawing pensions under the terms of certain contracts are not having their pensions increased; and the question is then asked: Why should the government or why should the Canadian National Railways take action of that kind?

If it were true that no other group of pensioned employees had received any increase after going on pension, it would still not excuse the government from giving a lead in the matter. But as hon. members know, there are a number of instances where retired employees have been given increases even after going on pension. Certain levels of government in this country, as well as in other countries, have taken action along this line. For instance, in the last two or three months the retired teachers in this province of Ontario were given increases in their pensions. As a matter of fact the Canadian Pacific Railway makes a very slight addition to the pensions of those who are in the low brackets. I admit the supplement is small, and I admit also that the amount is taken off when the pensioner reaches the age of 70 and goes on old age security. But at least there are these examples of other employers who are trying to do something for their retired employees who are suffering because of what has happened in the meantime to the cost of living and to the value of the pension paid to these people.

After all, it should be recognized that if the Canadian National Railways is a great institution today, it is partly because of the work being done by those who are now its employees and partly because of the work of those who have been its employees in the past. I submit it is not fair to these faithful servants of this government-owned railway, who have served in years gone by, to ask them to continue on pensions of the amounts I have repeated this afternoon.

I strongly urge the Minister of Transport to take a new look at this matter. I do not blame the minister, coming new to this portfolio, for following in the footsteps of his predecessor for a little while. A great many problems have been thrown on his doorstep, and there are many strings he has to pick up, with the result that it is only natural that he would carry on along the lines followed by his predecessor. The fact remains however that he is the person who is finally responsible, and that he is the person who is in parliament and who is answerable to members of parliament. I suggest therefore that he should take his own fresh look at the situation with a view to understanding just how serious the situation is for these people, and that he should try to find some way to do something about it, either by persuading the Canadian National Railways to act in the matter or by persuading his cabinet colleagues that the government should act so there would be brought about an increase in the pensions of these people who are in the lower brackets.

There were some other matters about which I wished to speak, but because so much time has been lost I shall only mention them in passing. I think it has not been good for the morale of Canadian National employees generally; I think it has not been good for the standing of Canadian National Railways in the eyes of the Canadian people, that the C.N.R. should have sold four of its institutions to be turned over to private hands. I refer to certain hotels and summer resorts. Likewise I feel that way about the decision of the management of the railway to lease the Queen Elizabeth hotel in Montreal to the Hilton chain. I have had a great many letters about these matters from citizens of Canada who wonder how these things gibe with the loyalty the Canadian government and the Liberal party are supposed to have to the principle of public ownership involved in the ownership by the people of Canadian National Railways.

These matters have been debated at length in this house, but I wanted to register my protest against what has been done in the context of steps that have been taken which have the effect of lowering the morale of Canadian National personnel and which affect the prestige and standing of the Canadian National Railways in the eyes of the Canadian people. So far as I am concerned and so far as the members of this group are concerned, we are proud of the fact that we have a publicly owned railway system such as the Canadian National Railways, including not only its railroad operations but its various subsidiary operations. We do not want that excellent system to suffer in the way that we feel it has been suffering recently.

To me the things we have been discussing today are exceedingly important. I refer to the matters I have just mentioned in passing, and particularly to the pension position of those who are already retired and to the uncertainty and fear of losing their jobs that hang over so many of the employees. In the name of the prestige which the Canadian National Railways deserve in this country I call upon the government to review these matters and do something about them, particularly to raise the pensions of those in the lower brackets and to put an immediate stop to the lay-offs that have been taking place.

(Translation):

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, like the previous speakers, I must say that the consolidation into one statute of the various enactments relating to the national railways is a step in the right direction; however, there are some parts of the present resolution which, to my mind, are a cause of serious concern, and this prompts me to protest against anything in the resolution which would remove from the control of parliament certain activities of the management of the Canadian National Railways. In my opinion, a member from the province of Quebec cannot help noting the more or less favourable attitude of the Canadian National Railways towards our province.

Among the Canadian provinces, Quebec is the one with the least trackage having regard to its population and, after Newfoundland, the province with the least trackage having regard to its area. In view of this treatment inflicted upon the province of Quebec, whether deliberately or not, by the management of the national railways any legislation which could remove from the control of parliament certain activities of the management of the national railways cannot but cause concern.

We have a case in point in the now famous Chibougamau railway matter; the policy of the C.N.R. management has brought great financial losses to the lake St. John district. In fact, because the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railroad has not been built, a $20 million refinery, which was to have been erected at Chicoutimi, will not be built—

Mr. Marler: The hon. member should be more serious!

Mr. Balcer: Well, I received my information from a mining engineer who is well conversant with the matter; he has met the promoters of the refinery.

He told me that when those people saw that a railway line was being built from Chibougamau to Beattyville and that the mining companies of Chibougamau could use the smelters at Noranda, well, those people abandoned their project of investing nearly $20 million in such a refinery. If such a large smelting plant had been built, it would have provided employment for a large number of people in Chicoutimi. My hon. friend from Roberval (Mr. Villeneuve) may find that funny, but I think that the people of Chicoutimi, as well as those of his own constituency and elsewhere, have been able to see for themselves that the Canadian National Railways had lost the pioneering spirit which should characterize such an enterprise.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Balcer: Yes.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): Has the hon. member read that part of the report of the Eastern Smelting Company—the company which intended to build the refinery at Chicoutimi—where it is stated that the refinery project was dependent on the securing of a contract from the United States defence department?

Mr. Balcer: I shall be pleased to listen to the hon. member if he will make his own speech when I am through with mine.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I have read the report, even if you have not.

Mr. Balcer: I have not read the report, but I have information which might be as interesting as that in the possession of the hon. member.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I prefer the information coming from the directors of the road. You would do well to answer my question.

Mr. Balcer: If the hon. member wants to talk about railways, he will have that opportunity in the course of this debate. Still, as I pointed out in my opening remarks, I protest against any bill as a result of which parliament would be deprived of control over the activities of the management of the Canadian National Railways.

Quite recently we have been aware of certain mistakes which have aroused strong criticism throughout this country, particularly the well known case of the Canadian National hotel in Montreal. That question was discussed at great length in the railway committee. I do not wish to labour the point, but it must be admitted that there has been quite a lot of violent criticism directed at the Canadian National Railways. That is why I consider it absolutely necessary for parliament to continue and increase its control over the management of the railway, and that it should even be able to force them to give any information desired at any time.

Since my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has very ably stated the relevant facts, I shall not cover the subject again.

As a representative of the province of Quebec, I deem it my duty to take this occasion to ask the government to urge the authorities of the Canadian National to extend the total length of their railway lines in the province of Quebec in a proportion commensurate with our population.

The Canadian National now has a wonderful opportunity to contribute to the development of the province of Quebec through the construction of a railway on the north shore, whose mining and forest resources are practically limitless and where it would be possible to develop nearly seven million horsepower. If the Canadian National did its duty there, that part of my province would undergo a much greater expansion. It is, of course, an important undertaking; I trust nevertheless that, even if not the first year, but in the not too distant future, the Canadian National Railways would benefit to an extent which would enable them to overcome their financial difficulties.

Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to make these few remarks in order to protest against any attempt on the part of the government to withhold from the supervision of parliament anything which has to do with the management of the Canadian National Railways.
