PAUL LAROON:

THE SCOURGE OF THE ANTILLES BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

PLOTTING AND COUNTER PLOTTING. WILE Paul and Mary were eating their supper, there was a scene transpiring in another part of the building that was not wholly unconnected with their interests. Marl Laroon had come up from the brig, though he had not come in a boat. He had administrated a powerful dose of opium to the old gunner, and as soon as the invalid was asleep, he had been set on shore for the purpose, as he said, of taking a look at the country. As soon as his boat had returned, and he had got out of sight from the crew, he had started for the

which the pirate captain now was, and he had one companion—the very woman whom we have seen at the young people's door, and whom Paul caught in the act. 'Now what have you heard?' asked Marl

'O, I heard lots,' returned the old negress Have you heard them speak of me?

Yes, mas'r -lots 'bout you. Paul said you asn't his farder, an Miss Mary, she said she war drefful glad. Den dey tole—or rudder Mas's Paul tole 'bout man 'board de brig as tele him for sartin sure wa'n't his farder, or rudder By Saint Paul !" uttered the pirate grind

Was it Dunklee?' asked Marl. No, no—dat wasn't it,' said Hagar, shak-ing her head, thoughtfully. Wasn't it Dumfreys?'

No, no. Ah, leoch um now! It was not Dumfreys, but it was Humphrey. Dat's

Hagar, he said, you have done well, and you shall be rewarded for it. You have served me more than you can be aware of. These vipers shall know whom they have to dea with. Mr. Buffo Burnington shall come have said and done, while we know all the thinks secure in his own mind. But we said be but never mind. He'll make excellent food for fishes!

sowl. I shall be here to-morrow night, and then you shall tell what more you have seen

Hagar promised to obey, and shortly after-wards the pirate captain left the place. He passed out through the garden, and from then ce he made his exit by way of a postern, and then hurried off by the upland path to the bay, which he reached about nine o'clock. At a given signal a boat came off for him and his patient was not yet awake, so he fancied there would be no trouble no account of poor

Ere long, after this l'aul had retired to his rest for the night, and amid all the wild hopes and fears that crowded on him, he forgot not to offer a prayer to Him who alone is able to

PAUL arose early in the morning, and he was not long in discovering that old Hagar was watching him very narrowly; but he appeared to take no notice of it, only looking out that she did not come near enough to annoy him; and she, when she found that the youth's eyes were upon her, seemed anxious to avoid him. Paul could see all this—he could hurt himself, and to have prevented that they see with what tenacity she kept her gaze upon him, and yet how uneasy she was in the work.
Of course he knew from this that the slave start off. He struck into a path which he start off.

Some three years ago she came to me and brought a small piece of crystal-like substance, and asked me if it was not diamond. I examined it, and told her it was. She had wiped it clean and rubbed it with dry pummice, and upon comparing it with the propersion of great value, and told her it would buy her freedom many times over. She told me she should not want her freedom so long as she could have me for a mistress, and after some the besitation she asked me if I did not hope at she thought there were many more diamonds where she found this. It was at some distance from here where the small stream which runs under our walls, eddied about a deep cavern in the side of the cliff above here. The youth gazed up into his companion's face with a puzzled, inquisitive look, and as the smile about the maiden's lips grew broader and warmer, his anxiety increased. Mary noticed it.

You would like to know what 1 mean, she said. 'Listen, and 1 will tell you: A mong the slaves here is a young girl—an Indian—who has ever manifested a great affection for me and who will run away to her own people during all this time. The fair prisoner at the

After breakfast our hero walked out into the garden with Mary, and having secured a specific core where the garden with Mary, and having secured a spot where no one could overhear them with south being seen by them, then devoted a few momenta to planning for the future. At the end of an hour Paul and Mary were seated in the very chamber where they had been watched by Hagar, but now they left their door open, and sat where they could see any one who should ascend the stairs. It was not five minutes after they were thus seated before Paul saw a black mass of wool appear above the balustrade, and in a moment with the such as the found that the voungest was the found that the vounges more they had passed under the arch, and the heavy portcullis came down with a low, grating sound.

At length they came to the point where Paul had resolved to land, and the boat was again laid in by the shore. The youth helped Mary out, and then he landed himself. The gold he had concealed about his person in teathern belts, and the diamonds were in a small bag which Mary carried. Turning to his crew, he said: 'Now, my brave boys, you will remain here and want for me until

THE night was quite dark, and as Paul and his companion struck into the wood path, the way became one of almost impenetrable gloom. Once at a distance of a few rods from the shore, he stopped. He could plainly bear the sobs of the poor fellows he had left behind and he knew how quickly they would have gone to the very ends of the "I take you!"

"I did not suppose you were all this while planning for such misery as you now show to me in prospect," returned Mary, more calmly than she had before spoken.

"That is all nonsense. I understand you very well. You have conceived a childish passion for Paul; but let me tell you at once that you shall never live to see him your husband unless I have first been laid in the ground."

I take you!"

left behind and he knew how quickly they would have gone to the very ends of the earth with him; but he could not take them now, and after listening for a moment he moved on again. Fortunately the path was a very clear one for it led to the wide opening where the horses were kept, and was consequently much travelled. In half an hour they reached the opening, and here Paul caught a horse. He had already concealed a bridle there, which he readily found, and as soon as the animal was prepared with his As Marl Laroon thus spoke he arose and left the apartment, and from the direction in which his steps sounded, she knew he had gone to Hagar's apartment.

Of course, Mary had been somewhat started on. The animal proved to be a kind and gentle one, and he kept the path without difficulty.

It must have been near midnight when the ment and misery to which the plan would reduce her, she shuddered fearfully, but she had yet much ground for hope, and in her prayers she prayed with much faith in her soul's salvation from the deep debasement the wicked man would cast upon her.

Time passed on, and the week was gone.

It must have been near midnight when the fugitives came to the open country that bordered upon the small bay where the fishermen's huts stood, and by this time the stars had begun to peep through the breaking clouds, but the moon had not yet risen. Paul rode at once to the rude pier where the lugger lay, but he found no one there. This fear. His next movement was to make his way to the cot where lived the man who was to have taken command of the lugger. He knocked at the door and it as soon opened by the man whom Paul most wished to see.
'How is this?' asked our hero, in Sparish 'You were to have everything ready for sail-

'To-morrow was the day set.' said the fisherman, scratching his head, and looking per-'To morrow !' uttered Paul, starting and turning pale. 'What do you mean
