and brain fever set in. My father arrived, and from my raving gathered the terrible story of my desertion by Stanley, as he called himself.

"I shall never know how it all came about, perhaps. Violet, for it was a mystery from beginning to end; but while I lay ill on my sick-bed, ill to death, my poor father was found lifeless in a vile house in the city, murdered, with a knife thrust in his heart. No evidence was produced to prove who the murderer was, and today he lies in an unburied grave—my poor, poor father, who was so fond of his little Lena.

"But, Violet, I have never doubted how my father came to his death. He was so reckless on the track of my betrayer. He found him, and in an altercation was murdered by the man I afterward found was Harold Castello, a fast young man of Chicago. But I could not bring home his guilt to him, although I have been on his track ever since my recovery. But now all is different, dear, for you saw him commit the murder. You can help me to bring it home to him."

CHAPTER XXXII
Violet had been sobbing softly at the recital of her friend's sorrows, but now she lifted her fair head, and dabbing the tears from her eyes, answered, tenderly:

"I will tell you the whole harrowing story, Lena, for I was indeed the horrified witness of your poor father's death, and the memory of that scene will never leave me while life lasts! Lena pressed her odd little hand and waited anxiously for her to begin.

"I must tell you first how I came to be in Chicago at that time," said Violet. "You see, I was at boarding school, and last June our lady principal and her senior class formed a party to attend the World's Fair together for a stay of ten days or so. I wrote to Grandpa, and he readily gave his consent to the plan and enclosed me a generous check for expenses. On the first of June our party, consisting of Mrs. Maynard, our teacher, and ten young girls, arrived in Chicago, full of joyous anticipation over the wonderful sights we were to see.

"As you have been to the fair yourself, my dear Lena, I need not dwell on its glories, but only remind you that among the hurrying throngs that filled the immense palace on every hand, it was utterly impossible for such a large party to keep close together. Mrs. Maynard realized this the first day, and directed her young charges that in the event of getting separated from each other, we should all meet her at the closing hour at the Virginia Building, in order to go home together. We found this plan worked nicely, affording each a better opportunity to inspect the buildings that appealed most strongly to our individual tastes.

"On the sixth day of our attendance at the Fair we separated into parties. Mrs. Maynard and three girls decided to spend that day at the Woman's Building, two girls went to the Midway Plaisance, two more to the Electric Building, and two more to the Building of Liberal Arts and Manufactures. I found myself alone in the eager desire for a whole day in the magnificent Art Gallery.

"There seemed no possible harm in leaving me there alone, and Mrs. Maynard consented to my wish, saying, 'I can trust you, Violet, to meet me at the Virginia State Building at six o'clock.' 'Surely,' I replied, and then I turned away with the throng.

"I glanced up into the 'beige' dark eyes of the young man I had seen so often in the building that afternoon. I shrank with instinctive dislike, and was about to utter a nervous remark, and plunge out into the pouring rain, when a loud clap of thunder and a vivid flash of lightning made me draw back in terror, so great that I could not speak the words that trembled on my lips.

"This is dreadful!' exclaimed the young man, holding the umbrella carefully over my head to shield me from the storm. 'You had better draw back out of the rain, miss, and when it holds up I will escort you to the gates and find a carriage for you.'

"Oh, I cried, my anxiety loosening my lips, 'my friends are waiting for me at the Virginia Building! I cannot wait, for they will be uneasy over my delay.'

"At least take my umbrella!' he exclaimed, so kindly that I hesitated. 'I cannot for you of it, sir,' I replied. 'Then permit me to hold it over your head, if you must go,' he returned, gently, and drawing my hand through his arm, hurried politely down the steps.

We reached the Virginia Building, but it was closed and deserted. Mrs. Maynard and the girls were gone. 'They are probably waiting for you at the gate. I will conduct you to them,' said my companion, and we joined the straggled, hurrying throngs that were rushing toward the Biltmore seventh street entrance. Alas! in the twilight gloom, the pouring rain, and the rush and confusion, my friends were not to be found.

"I was wretchedly uncomfortable, my feet soaked, my heart heavy with an indefinable horror, that I thought was fear of a scolding from Mrs. Maynard, but which I realize now was an awful premonition of what was hence to come to me. I was to the very point of hurrying into tears when my companion said, kindly:

"It seems impossible to find your friends in this confusion, miss, and it would be better to take a carriage and go straight to your hotel, where you will probably find them awaiting you. I secured a carriage, and when I had named my hotel, he spoke to the driver, then sprang to the carriage by my side.

"Oh, sir, this is not a good party. You need not accompany me, I replied, in strange haste to get rid of my handsome escort. 'I beg your pardon, but I had better see you safely with your friends, he replied, so gallantly that I feared I had assumed discourtesy, and let him have his way. After all, I reflected, I really had no grounds for dreading him.

"While we drove along the rainy streets, he told me that his name was Adelbert Stanley, and that he lived in Chicago. I returned his courtesy by giving him my own name, and added the particulars of my visit to the World's Fair with my teacher and friends.

"By this time we had reached our destination. The carriage stopped, and Mr. Stanley handed me out, and led me up the steps of a large, gloomy-looking house that in the still pouring rain I did not notice bore no resemblance to my hotel. But when I was led along a broad hallway so richly furnished apartment, I started about me in sudden alarm.

"This is not my hotel! the room is perfectly strange to me! I cried, starting toward the door in haste to get away. 'No, no, there is no mistake in the hotel. A wandering servant has simply shown you to the wrong room. Please remain here quietly a minute while I have the mistake rectified,' returned Mr. Stanley, with a pleasant smile, as he went out, leaving me alone and half-terrified in the room."

CHAPTER XXXIII
Lena Everett was listening with breathless interest to every word that fell from the lips of Violet. The full roll of incident pouring through the curtainless window of the other-worldly night-room, showed her face strained and eager, her brown eyes dilated and gleaming.

"But a word came from her partner's lips to break the thread of the speaker's narration; she was too eager to come to the climax. 'Violet took a long, sobbing breath, and continued:

"I waited impatiently for about ten minutes when Mr. Stanley suddenly returned, followed by a servant with a would-be better to take a carriage, and go straight to your hotel, where you will probably find them awaiting you. I assumed, said, when you named my hotel, he spoke to the driver, then sprang to the carriage by my side.

"Oh, sir, this is not a good party. You need not accompany me, I replied, in strange haste to get rid of my handsome escort. 'I beg your pardon, but I had better see you safely with your friends, he replied, so gallantly that I feared I had assumed discourtesy, and let him have his way. After all, I reflected, I really had no grounds for dreading him.

"While we drove along the rainy streets, he told me that his name was Adelbert Stanley, and that he lived in Chicago. I returned his courtesy by giving him my own name, and added the particulars of my visit to the World's Fair with my teacher and friends.

"By this time we had reached our destination. The carriage stopped, and Mr. Stanley handed me out, and led me up the steps of a large, gloomy-looking house that in the still pouring rain I did not notice bore no resemblance to my hotel. But when I was led along a broad hallway so richly furnished apartment, I started about me in sudden alarm.

THE ACADIAN.

WOLFVILLE, N. S., OCT. 7, 1898.

Editorial Notes.

Our town council appears to be moving with extreme caution in the matter of the curfew ordinance.

The regular quarterly meeting of the Wolfville Board of Trade will be held on Monday Evening, Oct. 10th, at the town hall.

We would suggest that a meeting of the Kings Co. Prohibition Convention be held at an early date.

We note by contemporaries that an attempt is being made in some parts of the province to introduce politics to quite an extent into the approaching municipal elections.

There seems to be considerable difficulty in getting the exact returns in the prohibition plebiscite, but the fact that in all the Dominion a substantial majority has been given for Prohibition should be most satisfactory to those who love "this Canada of ours."

The vote polled may not have been a large one, but when considered in the light of the conditions attending the election, it is very gratifying to prohibitionists.

Town Council Meeting.

The meeting of the town council on Wednesday evening was a short and unimportant one. The regular routine business of the month was transacted.

By-elections.

The following by-elections will likely take place the last of this month: ONTARIO. Late representatives.

The Advance Station Sheet of the Nova Scotia Methodist conference for 1898, has been published.

American House Scooped.

Wolfville had another blaze last week. On Friday evening about half past nine o'clock the American House was discovered to be on fire, in the west end of the top story.

How Residents of Wolfville.

The Dorchester correspondent of the Standard-Post writes that paper the following paragraphs which will be of interest to Wolfville readers:

How Kings County Voted.

Returning officer Curry held his declaration court on Monday at the court house. The returns showed a majority for prohibition of 3388, the vote by districts being as follows:

The total vote polled was 5206. At the plebiscite of 1894 the majority for prohibition was 2921, the vote being 3,170 for, and 249 against, a total of 3,419 voting.

These Pills cure not by purging the system as do ordinary medicines, but by enriching the blood and strengthening the nerves.

When a man's vitality is so low that he has to be carried to his bed, and when he is unable to get up, it is a sign that his system is so weak that he needs a tonic.

Without a Precedent. Not every eminent and renowned character has become eminent and renowned for doing what no one else ever did.
