Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no expense in it now.

Mr. MORPHY: Are the lawyers drawing these documents for nothing?

Mr. PUGSLEY: They have a form—

Mr. MORPHY: The banks do not take chances by drawing such documents in their offices, but depend upon their legal advisers. A chattel mortgage costs from four dollars to six dollars, according to its length.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: And more in the West.

Mr. MORPHY: I speak of what it is in the larger centres; I do not know what it is in the West. This Bill is not for the benefit of large ranchers alone. We have thousands of farmers who cannot to-day borrow a dollar on their livestock without too much expense for the small sum involved. The result is that the curb broker gets the benefit in large rates of interest. There is one feature of the Bill that, it occurred to me, should be considered. If there is no registration, it will be a serious thing in the case of farmers having different bank accounts. While farmers, as a class, are extremely honest, once in a while one crops up who is not above attempting a fraud, and, unless there is protection for the lending bank, he may deal with two or three banks. So, I think there should be some provision for filing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is exactly what we have been saying. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) would give the impression that this legislation would be a panacea, that under it the farmer will get all the money he wants from the bank. I do not believe that at all. To-day the bank that is prepared to loan to a farmer bases its loan upon personal credit rather than anything else. While the banks have regard to the prosperity of the farmer, they consider particularly his reputation for honesty and industry. We ought to be very careful when we seek to alter, as we now propose to do, the provincial laws with regard to a bill of sale. We must avoid interfering with the farmer getting credit in other directions. It is very important for the farmer in my own province, and I suppose the same is true elsewhere, to be able to get credit with others besides the banks. The man who buys stock from another farmer often gives his note for the stock. He needs credit with the storekepeer for flour, sugar, clothing, and other articles. If people know that a law has been brought into force under which a lien may be given to the banks without notice, I am afraid it will have the effect of curtailing the farmer's credit among other people from whom it is necessary for him to borrow in order to get along comfortably. The Minister of Finance is making a law which may be of benefit to the large farmers, but he does not confine it to this class but makes it apply to even the smallest farmers anywhere in Canada.

The minister himself recognizes by his Bill that it is desirable to give notice because he says: after the provincial legislatures have made provision for the filing of the mortgage—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: " If " and "after."

Mr. PUGSLEY: But it is the filing of a mortgage not in the form the legislature provides, but in the form the minister provides.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Read the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have read the Bill. The schedule is the form of mortgage. It is a little bit shorter and cheaper than the ordinary form of chattel mortgage which the legislatures have provided for. The banks, I suppose, will keep printed forms of this mortgage.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It will be cheaper than the ordinary chattel mortgage.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps it will cost fifty cents or a dollar less. But the bank could keep a form of the printed chattel mortgage, as it could keep the form of this mortgage, and the expense would be very little less. I have no objection to the form of chattel mortgage that the minister proposes to adopt. It is perhaps simpler and a little bit cheaper than the form the legislatures have adopted. But what I do object to is that under the proposed legislation adopting this particular form of chattel mortgage these secret liens can be given and bona fide securities seriously affected. If the minister would change that and provide that in any province where legislation along the lines suggested has not been passed the present law should prevail I think it would be all right.

But let me refer to the suggestion of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) as to what the minister must do to confer a real benefit upon the farmers; that is the introduction of a Bill providing for the establishment of farmers' banks. That is the way in which relief could be given. The minister stated at the last session of Parliament that the Government were earnestly thinking of this question. I think this might be an opportune time for the minister to tell us what has been the result of that thinking in which the Government were then engaged and if during the present session the Government will be prepared to submit to Parliament a Bill for the creation of farmers' banks. That has been done in the United States and it has accomplished wonders. It has greatly increased the production of the farmers. It is enabling them to get credit at a low rate of interest and they are buying agricultural machinery and stock and developing their farms and the result is proving enormously beneficial not only to the farmers alone but to the people generally.

Mr. CURRIE: Where is that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the United States.

Mr. CURRIE: It has just been in force about six months.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I am familiar with what has been going on there and I can tell my hon. friend that as a result of that legislation the farmers are enlarging their production enormously. That is a way in which the Government could confer a great benefit on the farmers, but I doubt very much if they will be able to do it by this law allowing these secret liens. It may result in the farmers being deprived of credit rather than enabling them to get additional credit at the banks.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Sir THOMAS WHITE introduced Bill No. 65, to amend the Bank Act.

Motion agreed to and the Bill read the first time.

RUMOURED POLITICAL DEADLOCK.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I should like, with your permission, to address a question to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) based on what I conceive to be two most important items in the morning paper. The first of these is one in which we all take great pride and it is to the effect that the Canadians at the front have taken an important place in the neighbourhood of Lens, marching through a shell-swept area as if they were engaged in manoeuvres. The second item that I conceive to be of importance is that in certain other operations nearer home than France—which, I hope, I shall not be offensive in designating as manoeuvres—there is a deadlock existing. The question I desire to address to my right hon. friend I address partly as one of the unambitious rank and file of this House and in some degree on behalf of an anxious, waiting, and expectant public, and, I think as well, in some degree on behalf of the men at the front. The question I wish to put is: Has my right hon. friend any communication to impart to the country or to the House as to whether this deadlock is likely to come to an end one way or another within a reasonable period of time? I suppose all deadlocks end some time, somehow, but I am perfectly sure that there is a great desire that this one should end one way or the other within a reasonable period of time.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I should be glad indeed to give my hon. friend (Mr. Clark), the House, and the country any information that was available but I hope he will regard me as not in the least wanting in respect for him, or in the desire to give all information possible, when I say that there is not at the present time any announcement to make.

PURCHASE OF CHEESE BY THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there has also been a little deadlock in regard to the matter of the purchase of cheese by the Imperial Government and perhaps I might make a statement on that matter because last week when unfortunately I was not able to be present in the House the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McMillan) made a statement which was substantially correct and I think my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) also put a question to the House which was answered by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) who, I noticed, in reading Hansard, stated that I would give further information if I had it. If you will permit me, I would like to give a very short review of the situation without which the present condition would not be very intelligible.

Last autumn the British authorities communicated with the Canadian Government with the idea of seeing whether it would be possible for them, in some manner or other, to secure the whole exportable surplus of Canadian cheese. We pointed out that as it was the close of the season it would be practically impossible to do anything and that if they did wish to achieve anything in that way another season it would be very desirable to commence in January or February when the Government here felt it would be quite feasible to make some arrangement which would be satisfactory all round.

Nothing of that kind, however, was done in January and February, and meanwhile the British authorities had commandeered, through the New Zealand Government, the whole of the New Zealand cheese output at a price of 19 cents f.o.b. In March, through the Prime Minister, who was then in England, there was a suggestion that we should secure the whole of the Canadian cheese output for this year by a process of commandeering. The Government, after thoroughly considering the whole matter, advised the Prime Minister and through him the Imperial Government, that we did not consider a process of commandeering cheese would be a very satisfactory method in regard to Canada, whose conditions were entirely different from those in New Zealand. We pointed out that New Zealand operated through a limited number of factories which were all not only manufacturing agencies but selling agencies as well, and that this system was an entire contrast to that in this country, where we have 3,000 factories and where the whole trade is done through cheese buyers and an organized trade. Therefore we said it would not be practicable to commandeer the cheese. Some correspondence went on by cable, and it was then suggested that a commission should be appointed, on which the British authorities would have one representative, with the idea of carrying out the suggestion we had made, namely that in any arrangement to secure the whole cheese production of Canada on satisfactory terms it would be desirable to operate through all the existing trade channels that had carried on their business from time immemorial here. As a result of that, a commission of three was finally appointed. The British authorities appointed Mr. James McGowan, and informed us by cable that he was sailing for Canada. It was quite obvious that nothing could be done until that commissioner arrived from England. Speaking from memory, I think he did not arrive until the middle or end of April. Meantime the cheese market in Canada had opened, and though there was no heavy demand, as not much cheese was being manufactured, yet the maximum price that had been fixed in England permitted a condition to exist which allowed competitive bidding on this side for the small business that was offered, at a price even in excess of that at last fall, and far in excess of the price at which the New Zealand output had been secured for the Imperial Government. Meantime the shipping problem was also growing very acute, and somewhat later the British authorities practically ceased permitting any space to be taken up by Canadian cheese from Canadian ports. There were reports that American and Canadian cheese was going by British and United States ships through American ports, and I think it probable that to some extent these reports were true. At all events, we advised the British authorities of those reports.

[Mr. Burrell.]

It is not necessary for me to say—because every member who has farmers engaged in the dairy business in his constituency has probably had many letters—that all manufacturers of cheese and cheese buyers were by this time, well on in May, becoming very uneasy for one or two reasons. They were uneasy as to whether it would be practicable to get rid of their cheese at all if no space was to be given to it, and they were also uneasy as to the price, th market was fluctuating, one day it was 26 and 27 cents and later down to 20 cents simply because there was only a nominal market, and the whole situation was uncertain and vexing. They were beginning to store cheese; storage space was being filled up; they did not know whether to manufacture to a large extent, and in short no one knew where he stood. I would say, in regard to the Commission and its relations with the Government, because there has been a lot of misconception, that obviously this Government could not be responsible for the price the Imperial authorities might be disposed to or could offer for Canadian cheese. It was our idea, so far as the Commission was concerned, to advance the legitimate interests of the cheese producers of this country and to facilitate the action of, and help the British authorities by arranging the very complicated conditions in regard to the purchase of a commodity like cheese in this country in order that it might all be done with the least possible friction and the greatest possible advantage to both Canada and Great Britain.

Then quite recently it was stated that the British authorities had decided to commandeer all cheese, whether from the United States, or Canada, or Australia, or New Zealand, or any other point, directly it arrived at British ports, and that they had changed their maximum price and were now putting on the market for civilian use, cheese at such a price as would permit it to be retailed at about 16 pence a pound, and naturally there was practically a suspension of business in this country, and nobody knew exactly what was going to be done.

May I assure the House that, in so far as this Government is concerned, every single fact connected with the whole matter has been placed in the fullest possible way before the British authorities, and we have taken this ground, that while we conceive it to be our duty as patriotic and loyal Canadians to assist the Mother Country in every possible way to get those food supplies which are so vital to Great Britain at this time, it was also our duty to conserve, so far as we could on right lines, every legitimate and fair interest of the producers of this country, and we wanted to achieve, if possible, both those objects. We pointed out also that if so low a price as 19 cents was likely to be fixed by the British authorities for Canadian cheese, they must not overlook the fact that in the case of such a commodity a very low price would simply result in the diversion of the raw material for cheese to other forms of manufacture that might be more profitable, and although the British Government might get all the cheese manufactured for whatever price they paid, because there was practically no other market, there was still the question of the amount produced, as with too low a price, the manufacturers would divert the raw material to other uses. We pointed out all of these things in the fullest way; we showed that our conditions were not like those in New Zealand, and that our trade conditions called for entirely different treatment. I understand that the British commissioner has now been advised by the Imperial authorities that he is authorized to do some buying at once in order to relieve the deadlock which has existed for some time past, and in this connection may I add that I have been particularly pressing upon the British authorities the vital necessity of making some move at once to relieve the congestion which existed, and to end the uncertainty which was practically paralyzing the whole business. As a result of this, I understand that the British commissioner has been authorized to go out and buy for a time at a price of 21¾ cents f.o.b., Montreal, which, if not as satisfactory as some of our cheese manufacturers hoped, is at least more satisfactory than the New Zealand price and is about 2 cents better to the factory than the average price of last year. Whether that condition will improve after a time, I am not in a position to say. I wanted to make this statement to the House in order to assure the members that, so far as we are concerned, absolutely no stone has been left unturned, not only to assist the British Government, but in every legitimate way, to protect the Canadian producer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Agriculture has given us a very interesting statement of the conditions surrounding the purchase of Canadian cheese. Was the question of the purchase of food supplies by the British Government one of the subjects dealt with, or was it under the control of the Imperial War Cabinet?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The question of food supplies was one of very great interest, but, so far as executive action was concerned, it was dealt with more particularly in a departmental way by conferences with the Board of Trade and, in the matter of transportation, with the Minister of Shipping. The proposals to which the Minister of Agriculture has referred were conveyed to us by a committee under the direction of the Board of Trade. At the request of that committee I transmitted those proposals to the Government here, in order that they, being in touch with the local situation, might give them such consideration as would be possible.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice), the House went into Committee, Mr. Rainville in the Chair, to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Judges Act to provide for the salary of an additional judge of the Supreme Court of Saskatchewan, $6,000 per annum, and to provide for the salary of an additional junior judge of the County Court in Ontario, $3,000 per annum; to amend section eighteen of the said Act by providing that a judge who is appointed or assigned to a district for the exercise of his ordinary jurisdiction therein and required by law at the time of his appointment to reside within that district shall not be entitled to travelling allowances incurred or made necessary by reason of his residing at any place outside of the district to which he is so appointed or assigned, unless his residence at that place be authorized or approved by the Governor in Council; and to make the provisions of subsections two, three, four and five of section twenty-eight apply to the Judges of the Circuit Court of Montreal.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill which it is proposed to found upon this resolution is rendered necessary, so far as its first two dispositions are concerned, by recent legislation of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Ontario. The legislature of the province of Saskatchewan has made provision for an additional judge of the Supreme Court of that province, and in compliance with that legislation it is necessary that we should amend our Judges Act. A couple of years ago the legislature of Saskatchewan remodelled the judicial system of the province by constituting two courts, a Court of Appeals and a Supreme Court. If that legislation, which was to have come into force by proclamation, had been made effective, the appointment of four additional judges would have been necessary. The provincial authorities, however, seemed to have altered their view, and have recently legislated providing for this additional judge of the Supreme Court. The additional county court judge in the province of Ontario is in the Timiskaming district, a new and growing district where the business has been increasing to such an extent that it has been found necessary to make provision for a junior judge.

Mr. PROULX: I understand that the appointment has been made.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. The salaries are not appropriated by the statute to individual judges. There happened to be vacancies, so that a salary was available and the need was so pressing that it was thought better to let some other vacancy stand and make an appointment to that particular district. The necessity of a judge in that district, therefore, requires us to provide for seventy-four county court judges instead of seventy-three.

The first of the other provisions of the resolution is to provide that judges who at the time of their appointment are by law called upon to reside within the particular judicial district to which they are assigned shall not be entitled to travelling allowances if their places of residence is changed subsequently to their appointment, unless the change is approved by the Governor in Council. This is to enable the Government to have some control over the rapidly increasing expenditure in the way of travelling allowances to judges, resulting from the fact that in some provinces the legislatures have changed the residences of the judges, removing them in many instances from places situate within their respective judicial districts to places considered more convenient.

The legislative power to fix a judge's residence, I think, indisputably rests with the legislature, but the fixing of salaries and of travelling allowances rests with this Parliament, and it has seemed to us that it would be well that the Government should not find itself in a position of having imposed upon it very considerable additional financial burdens merely because the legislature, for one reason or another, thinks proper to change the residence of a judge. We do not propose to say that in no such case shall the judge who has his residence so changed, have his travelling allowances, but we provide merely that he shall not have them unless that change of residence is approved by the Governor General in Council.

The last provision which the Bill contains, which is also one that would not have required a resolution, is to bring the judges of the circuit court of Montreal under the provisions applicable to county court judges throughout the country with regard to the procedure that may be required in the way of inquiry where complaints are made against judges. The present position is that the circuit court judges find themselves neither in the position of high court judges and therefore removable only by the Houses of Parliament, nor in the position of county court judges, of being removable by the Governor in Council after proper inquiry by means of a commission. We think they should be in one class or the other, and it is proposed to amend the law to assimilate their position to that of county court judges generally.

Mr. KYTE: I regret very much that the Minister of Justice has not been able to take up the question of the readjustment of salaries of county court judges in the province of Nova Scotia. This matter has been brought to his attention on several occasions by hon. members representing that province, and while from time to time legislation has been introduced which has resulted in increasing the salaries of judges elsewhere—although I may say that no general increase has been given—it is to be regretted that the minister has been unable to give some attention to this matter. We have in Nova Scotia a state of affairs that is very different from that which exists in Ontario. I observe that in this resolution there is a provision for the salary of $3,000 per annum for a junior county court judge in that province. I understand that in that province county court judges are in the enjoyment of certain perquisites which flow from other offices which they are permitted to hold. That is not the case in Nova Scotia, where a county court judge is limited entirely to the salary which he receives on his appointment. From time to time demands have been made from all classes of the Civil Service of this country for increases of salaries to meet the increased cost of living that has prevailed throughout this country for some years. I might say truthfully that the county court judge is about the only one enjoying a salary as low as $3,000 whose needs in that respect have not received some attention. The Minister of Finance proposes, in the course of a few days, to introduce legislation in this House for the purpose of increasing, substantially, I hope, the salaries of certain civil servants who belong to the Inside Service. It is also proposed by the Minister of Finance to provide in the Supplementary Estimates for an increase of salary to certain civil servants who are attached to the Outside Service. I can not understand why judges of the county court in Nova Scotia, whose salaries are by no means in keeping with the cost of living in that province, are not to receive some consideration. They are all gentlemen who, when they accepted their appointments, abandoned legal practices very much more remunerative than the salaries which they now receive. I speak more particularly of the county court judge who resides in the city of Sydney and who is the judge for the district comprised by the counties of Richmond, Cape Breton and Victoria. He has a very extensive criminal jurisdiction. In the city of Sydney his time is taken up almost every day in the year in hearing matters that do not properly fall to the adjudication of a county court judge elsewhere in the Dominion. We have no resident Supreme Court judge in the Island of Cape Breton, and the consequence has been to enlarge the jurisdiction of the county court judge as Master of the Supreme Court, so that his time is at least half taken up in adjudicating matters that in other sections of Dominion are dealt with by Supreme Court judges. I do not wish to make a special plea for the gentleman who discharges so efficiently and satisfactorily the duty of county court judge in the city of Sydney; my argument is equally applicable to all the other county court judges in the province of Nova Scotia. The Minister of Justice has always been good enough, when this matter has been called to his attention, to give us an assurance that it would be considered by him and that he hoped to be able to submit a comprehensive scheme to deal with all those judges who are suffering from the same grievance as are the judges of Nova Scotia. I again remind the Minister of Justice that judges of the county courts of my province are in a vastly different position from that of county court judges in Ontario, and I cannot quite understand why the minister is unable to deal with the situation in Nova Scotia, because he has been unable to formulate a comprehensive scheme to deal with county court judges in Ontario. The latter enjoy special perquisites from other offices they are authorized to hold, and, therefore, their position is not such an appealing one as that of the Nova Scotia County Court judges.

Mr. MARCIL: How will this legislation affect superior court judges in Quebec? A large number of judges who seem to have been appointed for outside judicial districts reside in the city of Quebec or in the city of Montreal.

Mr. DOHERTY: This legislation does not purport to be retroactive.

Mr. MARCIL: It will apply only to new appointments?

Mr. DOHERTY: It will apply only to the future, but its purpose is, at all events, to withdraw the temptation from a judge to seek to have the legislature move his residence outside of his own judicial district, which temptation is afforded by the fact that when he is moved out by the legislature, then, under the law as it stands at the present time, this Government finds itself obliged to pay him travelling allowance every time he goes to that particular district to which, by the statute of the province and by his commission, he is assigned. Recent events would justify one in saying that the power of the legislature in one of the provinces, at all events, to change the judges' residences has been exercised without any regard to the fact that by those changes they were imposing this additional financial responsibility upon this Government, and I may say that was done notwithstanding the fact that before their action was taken such result was pointed out to them.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister made a calculation of what this additional cost has been to the treasury as regards Quebec?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not made a detailed calculation, but I was very much struck with the figures, which quite recently were brought to my attention, of the amount paid in the course of a year in the way of travelling expenses to three or four of the judges with regard to whom the questions was asked, and that rather went to strengthen the impression made upon my mind by the legislation last session of the Quebec Legislature.

Changes were then made in the place of residence of not less than three judges of the Superior Court, centering them in the city of Quebec. Before that was done I was communicated with by the Attorney General of the province, and I felt that I had to concede that the legislature of the province had the right to determine the residence of the judges, but I pointed out that unless there were some major reason in connection with facilitating the administration of justice, weight ought to be given to the consideration that by this moving of judges they were adding to the expenditures of this Government in the way of travelling allowances. That representation does not seem to have carried weight, and the fact of the enactment of the legislation I refer to makes it, I think, quite clear that this Government should place itself in position to have some control over this expenditure. If, to-day, a legislature chooses to say that a judge shall live a thousand miles from the place where he exercises his functions, it automatically imposes upon this Government the obligation of paying the travelling expenses of that judge every time he goes up and down, and paying him also a living allowance while he is in the district in which his duties are performed.

Mr. BARNARD: I should like to say a word or two along the same line as my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) with regard to the salaries of the county judges in the province of British Columbia, and in doing so I would point out to the Minister of Justice, that not only do the county court judges in that province do the great majority of the criminal work of British Columbia, but their civil jurisdiction is also very considerably greater than the civil jurisdiction of the county judges of the province of Ontario. They have jurisdiction in contract cases up to $1,000 and in equitable jurisdiction and jurisdiction in court to an amount not exceeding $2,500, which I think is considerably greater than the province of Ontario. In addition to that the province of British Columbia has taken the stand quite rightly I think, that it is no part of their business to pay any portion of the salaries of the judges, that the judges' salaries should be wholly provided for by the Federal Government. The result is that they have refused to give anything in the shape of Surrogate Court fees or other perquisites to the county judges. In the larger cities, such as Vancouver and Victoria, and I am speaking more particularly of Vancouver, there are three county judges who sit continuously, except in vacation, from Monday morning to Friday afternoon. To expect a man to do that work efficiently, to keep up the dignity of his position, and live in a large city like Vancouver or Victoria on a salary of $3,000 a year, is I think unfair and unreasonable, and I submit that the minister would do well to take into consideration the whole question of the salaries of county judges. If Ontario chooses to put its County Court judges in a more favourable position than those of any other province, I suppose that is a matter that rests with the province of Ontario, but it certainly does not excuse this Government from paying a proper salary to the other county court judges throughout the Dominion who are doing just as important work.

Mr. McKENZIE: Of course this is an old story, for we have been talking to the minister about this matter for some years. I understand that a delegation of county court judges from Nova Scotia waited on the minister some four or five years ago, and I remember the minister telling me in conversaation after he had met that delegation, that he hoped to evolve some scheme which would satisfy to some extent the demands made by the judges. I am sorry the minister has not been able to carry out what he then intended, but I suppose he has had some good reason. I am not familiar with the salaries and conditions surrounding the office of county court judges in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I know something about the situation in Ontario, but nothing at all about the situation in Quebec, and as the hon. member for Richmond has pointed out, conditions in the province of Ontario in regard to county court judges are quite different from conditions in the province of Nova Scotia, and I think the minister should give some attention to the conditions in the province of Nova Scotia apart from the reflex influence which his action might have on some of the other provinces of the Dominion. In the first place the minister will find that the administration of that branch of the law is very much cheaper in the province of Nova Scotia than in any other province in the Dominion, by reason of the smaller number of judges. I understand that in Ontario there are two judges to each county. In Nova Scotia we have only seven judges to eighteen counties, which shows that when the province was divided up into districts care was taken to give a reasonably large territory and a reasonably large amount of work to each judge. Our judges in the province of Nova Scotia have a great deal of work to do. As the hon. member for Richmond has pointed out, we have no Supreme Court judges anywhere in the province of Nova Scotia except in the city of Halifax, and the legislature of the province have conferred wide jurisdiction upon the county court judges to enable them to perform a great deal of the work of a Supreme Court judge. If there is any difficulty about the setting aside of pleadings, of any contests of that kind, in districts remote from Halifax or in any part of the Island of Cape Breton, these cases, no matter how big the issue, are fought out before the county court judge. In the county of Cape Breton there is a very large foreign population, and I regret to say that for the last ten years the criminal business of that county has been simply enormous. Seventy-five per cent of that criminal business is dealt with by the county court judge, and handled very satisfactorily. Every one has such implicit confidence in his integrity and in his power to deal with these matters that except in extreme cases where he has no jurisdiction all these cases are tried before him. So that my hon. friend from Richmond was putting it mildly when he said that the county court judge was engaged on these cases perhaps half his time every day; as a matter of fact he is engaged every day in the week with no let up at all, and he is paid the very small salary of $3,000 a year. There is no part of Canada that has been more expensive to live in during the last four or five years, or since the price of foodstuffs began to go up so rapidly, than the city of Sydney, and I am sure that what may be said of the cost of living in Sydney is equally true of the other six districts of the province of Nova Scotia. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Richmond—and it is not necessary to tell the minister this—there are certain things expected of a man who occupies the position of a county judge. He is the first citizen of his locality; everybody so regards him; and he must live up to what is expected of him. I submit that it is the duty of the State, when it puts a man in the position to administer justice, to place him beyond temptation so far as money is concerned, independent in every respect, and able to maintain the dignity of his position. That, in some cases, the judges are not able to do on the meagre salaries paid them. It would not involve a very serious expenditure to grant a substantial increase to the judges of the Dominion, much less would it be serious if something were done to put these men in a position to be comfortable and to live in comformity with what is expected of them.

Mr. BURNHAM: I object on principle to a spirit which seems to pervade the life of this country. The hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) seems to regard it as necessary that there should be a fictitious glamour about the position of a judge. This is really not the case. It is the integrity and learning of the judge which carries conviction to the hearts of the people, not that he is able to put on a certain amount of style, not that he is able to wear purple and fine linen, or play cards, or use high class wines. I do not wish to play the demagogue in this matter, but I think this principle should be asserted. If we desire to make use of the education which we have received, which has continued from the very earliest times in history, let us make use of it. We find from year to year that there is an inclination on the part of the authorities to decorate. This system of decoration in itself carries no conviction, and we know it. Therefore, it should be cut out.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would say on behalf of the judges, that they would be willing to forego the decorations if they got decent salaries.

Mr. BURNHAM: And I say for the county court judges that they would not sell themselves for mere lucre, let alone the decorations. The man fit to be made a county court judge is a man with a high sense of duty. And it should be considered that there is such a thing as duty to the State. Let such a man be provided with a salary sufficient to keep the wolf from the door and to educate his children in a manner commensurate with a standard of life which we approve of. It should not be dangled before his eyes as well, as before the eyes of the great proletariat, that there is something so stupidly self-seeking about our lives that we cannot get away from it—this self-interest, this inclination forever to have as much money as we possibly can get. The idea that there should be a certain mock solemnity, about a judge means that a judge is to be regarded as the people of an African tribe regard their medicine man. That reminds me of a yarn I read in a book the other day, about a man who carried such great weight with the natives of Africa that he was able to go from tribe to tribe without a guard. And the reason was that he could take his teeth out and put them back again. Are we never to get out of this way of regarding our public life? Are we never to understand and realize that we have some duty to the state, some duty to humanity, outside of these miserable little things?

Mr. MARCIL: Would the minister explain the position with regard to the Circuit Court judges of Montreal?

Mr. DOHERTY: As the position now stands the Circuit Court judges of that particular court are neither in the same position as the County Court judges nor in the same position as the Superior Court judges with regard to their removability. The proposition of this Bill is to assimilate their position in that regard to the position of the county court judges throughout the country, and to place the Government in a position where, should the question arise, the Government will be able to deal with the judge of this particular court in the same way in which it is now in a position to deal with the County Court judges generally.

Resolution reported and agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY thereupon moved to introduced Bill No. 66 to amend the Judges' Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

House in Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Rainville in the Chair:

1. That it is expedient to declare that the Customs Laws have applied and do apply to the Crown.

2. That it is expedient to amend the Customs Act by inserting the following section immediately after section two hundred and thirteen thereof:—

"213A. If any imported goods seized in any building within one hundred yards from the frontier between Canada and any foreign country are forfeited according to law, such building shall also be seized and forfeited, and shall be forthwith taken down and removed."
—Mr. Reid.

Mr. REID: The object of this legislation is to place on the statute book a provision that goods imported by the Crown shall be liable to duty the same as goods brought in by a private importer. We have been collecting duties on goods imported by the Crown for some years.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend mean the Crown in the right of the Imperial Parliament, the Dominion Parliament or the Provincial Parliament?

Mr. REID: I mean goods imported by Canada and not goods imported by the Crown in the right of the Imperial Government. Imperial importations are exempt under the Customs Act.

[Mr. Burnham.]

Mr. PUGSLEY Does raw material, which the Imperial Munitions Board may bring in for the manufacture of fuse, pay duty?

Mr. REID: If it is imported for, and in the name of the British Government, it does not pay duty but if an article is imported to be manufactured by a private individual for the Imperial Government the duty is paid and we refund 99 per cent of it to the manufacturer the same as is done with regard to the duty on all other material imported and manufactured for export.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Munitions Board, I understand, have established a factory for the manufacture of fuses and it is necessary to import large quantities of raw material. Does that raw material pay duty to the Canadian customs or will it under this law?

Mr. REID: They would pay duty if they were manufacturing for use in Canada, but if they were manufacturing for overseas, or for the British Government, they would get a refund of the duty, or they would not be liable for duty.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Do they pay duty and get a refund or does it come in free?

Mr. REID: They get a refund.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then they do pay it?

Mr. REID: They pay duty and get a refund.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is the same as with another importer?

Mr. REID: The same as with any other importer. If the Imperial Government owned an industry in this country and manufactured goods for their own use, or if they bring in goods for their war vessels, say, at Halifax, and they are delivered to the British Government they do not pay duty. That is mentioned in the Customs Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that the Munitions Board are simply the agents of the Imperial Government and I speak of them because large quantities of material must be brought in. I understand the Minister to say that they pay duty on the goods and that the duty is refunded when the goods are manufactured and exported.

Mr. REID: The Imperial Munitions Board have industries in Canada that are manufacturing for them, and one case that came before me was that in which there was an industry manufacturing large quantities of explosives. The goods would come in and pay duty and the manufacturer would get a refund. We have assisted some of these manufacturers where the duties were very large by placing a customs officer in charge of the industry.

Mr. MACDONALD: In the making of shells the Imperial Munitions Board are really the agents of the Imperial Government. They have imported from the United States large quantities of steel which have gone to Canadian manufacturers to be turned into shells. Do these articles pay duty and is a refund made just the same as in the case of any other importer who manufactures the goods imported and exports the product?

Mr. REID: If the Imperial Munitions Board imported steel for the use of the Imperial Government it would come in free under the tariff.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the Munitions Board have to bring it in in the name of the British Government?

Mr. REID: It is really the British Government, and they import it in the name of, and for, the British Government. We give them that right and we place a customs officer in an industry to see that the goods are all exported after they are manufactured into shells.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the object of compelling the Crown in the right of the Canadian Government to pay customs duties if the revenue received is simply taken out of the treasury and paid to the Customs Department?

Mr. REID: It does not increase the customs duties because we are collecting duties now and we have been doing so for some years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Illegally?

Mr. REID: It is said illegally.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who said illegally?

Mr. REID: There has been a question raised as to whether goods coming in—

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is to remove doubts?

Mr. REID: To remove doubts. It does not increase the receipts of the customs in so far as goods imported by the Crown are concerned, for the reason that we have been collecting duty on goods imported by the Crown for some years. But a question has arisen as to whether the Crown in the right of Canada would have the right to collect duty. Therefore, to remove that doubt we are mentioning the Crown in the Act the same as we do any other importer under the tariff.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Crown would not be affected by the Act unless it was especially named. I was under the impression that some years ago an Act was passed which provided that in the case of certain departments, the Militia Department for instance, duties were to be collected on articles imported by them. Is there not some statute on the subject now?

Mr. REID: I remember the circumstance. Prior to the time that the hon. gentleman mentions, goods imported by the Crown came in free. But the trouble there was that some people were importing goods, such as American goods, and adding the duties, and there was the possibility of irregularities occurring. At that time the Government decided that in future duties must be collected on all goods whether imported by the Crown or not, and they simply notified the Customs and all other departments that they were to collect these duties in future. Although that order was given there was no Act on the statute book stating that the Crown must pay duty.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What has emphasized the necessity for this?

Mr. REID: The question has arisen because some of the provincial Governments took issue on the question as to whether goods imported by the Crown were dutiable. For that reason we feel that it would be better to place it in the statute so as to remove any doubt in the future.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is intended to apply to the Crown as represented by provincial governments?

Mr. REID: Or the Dominion. That is the main object for this Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend intend that goods imported by a provincial government, that is by the Crown in right of the province, will pay duty?

Mr. REID: I say they have always paid duty since Confederation.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is more a matter of practice, but has there been any law? The original idea in regard to the status of provincial legislature, as a lawyer knows, was that the Crown was not represented there. But I think the principle is also good that no Statute applies to the Crown unless the Crown is specifically mentioned. Why does my hon. friend want to have this legislation? What is the reason for it? Is it simply confirming the usage?

Mr. REID: The local Governments have always paid duty since Confederation, and some of them now claim that they should not have to pay. As the question has arisen whether the Crown should pay duty, the Government—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would that not be provided at the time of Confederation?

Mr. REID: At all events we see no reason why we should not place it on the statutes. It can do no harm, even if it does no good.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why, if there has been no question?

Mr. REID: There has been a question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister said that the provinces always paid on their importations. That has gone on for the fifty years of Confederation. I think it is in the British North America Act that the Crown as represented by the provinces must pay customs duties, because the right to collect duties was by that Act transferred to the Dominion Parliament. The minister says there has never been any question so far as the Dominion is concerned in respect to paying duties. It seems to me a little mysterious that this legislation should be introduced. Perhaps this is to cover the case of the open door on the island in the St. Lawrence where vast quantities of goods were brought in in the night free of duty, ostensibly for the Militia Department.

Mr. REID: I thought I had explained the matter. I say that the provincial governments have been paying duty since Confederation, but some of the provinces have raised the issue.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Which province?

Mr. REID: I cannot say, I think that two have taken issue.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister give any information which provinces?

Mr. REID: Manitoba is one, and I think Quebec. I do not know whether there is another or not. But these two at least have claimed that goods imported by the provincial governments should not pay duty, and the Justice Department took the position that probably we had better put an Act through making all goods imported for the Crown liable for duty.

Mr. MACDONALD: Am I correct in stating that there was some legislation on this subject some ten years ago? I have a recollection of some discussion on the subject when Sir Charles Fitzpatrick was Minister of Justice.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. REID: There was nothing on the Statutes. I have taken it up with the Justice Department and the Customs Department. There is nothing to show that goods imported by the Crown shall be dutiable. I think it was done by orders given to the several departments that goods imported by them must in future pay duty. But this question has been raised by some of the provincial governments, and the Justice Department—

Mr. MACDONALD: Is there any litigation pending about it?

Mr. REID: They ask for litigation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would not the minister think that he would accomplish his object if he said that goods imported for the Crown as represented by the Dominion or provincial governments shall be liable to duty the same as if imported by the ordinary individual? But to say as the minister does in this resolution, that the customs laws have applied—to make it retroactive—and do apply to the Crown, strikes me as peculiar, because it is the Crown that is imposing the customs law. The words are not applicable to what my hon. friend wants to accomplish, that is that goods imported by the Crown shall be liable to customs duty the same as those imported by private individuals.

Mr. REID: The Bill that I have prepared provides:

> The rates and duties of customs imposed by this Act or the Customs Tariff or any other law relating to the Customs, as well as the rates and duties of customs heretofore imposed by any Customs Act or Customs Tariff or any law relating to the Customs enacted and in force at any time since the 1st day of July, 1867, shall be binding and are declared and shall be deemed to have been always binding upon and payable by His Majesty, in respect of any goods which may be hereafter or have been heretofore imported by or for His Majesty, whether in the right of His Majesty's Government of Canada or His Majesty's Government of any Province of Canada, and whether or not the goods so imported belonged at the time of importation to His Majesty—

And so on.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is mighty different from the resolution.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend think it a sound principle, if an issue has been raised by the Crown as represented by a provincial government or in the right of a provincial government as to the right of this Government to collect duties on things imported by the provincial governments, to come in with legislation retroactive in its character and declare that to be the law which is not the law? I submit that we in this Parliament should not lightly enter upon any policy which would involve retroactive legislation, taking away any rights or creating any impositions or anything of that kind where the law did not permit of their existing before, and more particularly where we are dealing with another jurisdiction which, within its own powers, is as supreme and definite as the Federal one is in its jurisdiction. I do not think that legislation of that kind is right. Such legislation, before being submitted by the House, ought to be considered by a committee. The provinces affected ought to be notified and ought to have an opportunity of making representations, and Parliament should have an opportunity of hearing their views. In other words, we in this Parliament are assuming the right to impose upon another fully developed and constituted jurisdiction in this country exactions which were not provided for in the Confederation Act. We have come to the conclusion that it was not intended that these powers should be conferred by that Act and we are seeking to secure them in a retroactive way, without notice to these other jurisdictions. My hon. friend's legislation might be considered if it related to the future only, but it is a very serious proposition in its retroactive features. I think my hon. friend will be well advised to leave the legislation in committee until the authorities of the provinces which will be affected are given an opportunity to make representations.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Although I do not know very much of this matter, I understand from what has been said by the minister that it has been the universal practice since Confederation to receive payment of duties on goods imported into Canada by the Crown in the right of a provincial government. There has been no exception to that, as far as I know. Under the late administration, if I am not mistaken, it was questioned once or twice, but nothing happened; the duties were imposed and were paid. About ten years ago it was regarded as a wise course to insist on the payment of duties upon goods imported by any department of Government in the right of the Crown, and that has been carried out. It is desired, in the first place, to give effect to that course by declaration that it is sanctioned by the law. It would, of course, be quite incongruous that the Crown in the right of the Dominion should be paying duties on imported goods, while the Crown in the right of the provinces should not; or that the right to impose such duties should be questionable in the latter case when a universal practice sanctioned by law had been established in the case of goods imported by the Crown in the right of the Dominion. So it was thought best to sanction by this declaration a practice which has been uniformly carried out in the case of the provinces ever since Confederation, and, in the case of goods imported for the Dominion during the past ten years. The policy adopted by the late Government in that regard has been carried out by the present Administration since it assumed the reins of office. Further, it would seem undesirable that there should be general liberty on the part of the provincial administrations to import goods for all purposes free of duty, because it might—I do not say that it would—easily lead to abuse of that power. As we limit ourselves here, therefore, by the same restriction which we think should be applied to the provincial governments in the case of the importation of goods, it does not seem that there is any legitimate cause for complaint against the making of this declaration.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Have the provinces made any claim for refund of duties? How did the matter come up?

Mr. REID: At least two of the provinces have raised the question, suggesting that they did not think they should pay the duty.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did they demand a refund?

Mr. REID: They asked that the goods be allowed to come in free of duty. They claimed that under the British North America Act they were not required to pay duties on anything that they imported.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If under the British North America Act they are not required to pay, how could we provide otherwise? We could not amend the Act.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are not amending it. If any provision under the British North America Act applies to the case, the provinces will still be free to assert it, notwithstanding the passage of this legislation.

Mr. MACDONALD: I suggest that the Minister let the matter stand until after six o'clock, when he will let us know what provinces are affected. I am strongly of the opinion that a statute regarding this matter was passed about ten years ago in respect of the Militia Department.

At six o'clock, the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Rainville in the chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: This resolution is, of course, retroactive?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: On general principles, is that good legislation?

Mr. REID: As the hon. member was not in the House this afternoon when this matter was under discussion, I will explain it to him. The object of the resolution is that goods imported by the Crown shall be liable to customs duties, the same as goods imported by any private individual. Up to this date there has been on the statute books no provision that goods imported by the Crown are liable to duty, although duties have been collected for eight or ten years. I have not the exact date when the Customs Department was instructed by the Government to collect duties on goods imported by the several departments. Since Confederation duties have been collected on all goods imported by provincial Governments. In 1909 the then Nova Scotia Government took exception to the right of the Dominion Government to collect duties on goods imported by the provincial government, and the Dominion Government of that day took issue with the provincial government, and the matter dropped, no further action being taken.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Were the duties paid?

Mr. REID: The duties were paid at that time and thereafter, not only by the Nova Scotia Government, but by all the other provincial Governments. The Commissioner of Customs informs me that the Minister of Customs at that time brought the matter up in Council; that the Prime Minister of the day, now leader of the Opposition, agreed with his view, and that they took the ground that the position taken by the Nova Scotia Government was not in accordance with their interpretation of the law. The matter rested until 1916, when the province of Quebec raised the same issue as the province of Nova Scotia had raised, but I took the same ground as that taken by my predecessor, and no further action was taken by the Quebec Government. Later on the Government of Manitoba took the same position, and only a month or two ago the Alberta Government also brought up the matter, so that the situation has become a little acute in regard to arriving at a final decision as to what should be done. Section 125 of the British North America Act reads:—

> No lands or property belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable to taxation.

I took the matter up with the Department of Justice, and as the matter, no doubt, will go before the several courts of the country and the Privy Council for final decision, the Department of Justice advised me that I should have the statute amended so that goods imported by the Crown as represented, not only by the Dominion Government, but by the provincial governments, should be liable to payment of duty. They advised me that it should be declared that the matter is in the same position as it has been since Confederation, so that if the case came before the courts and it was decided that the position taken by the provinces was not justified, there would not be any possibility of a claim for the duties which have been collected from Confederation up to the present time. The Department of Justice also advised me that this amendment does not affect any rights in any other way than I have mentioned.

Mr. MACDONALD: In introducing this resolution my hon. friend has precipitated a very interesting constitutional point; and not in any political sense other than what is best as a matter of policy, I would like to point out how important it is that the House should give the matter serious consideration. During past years, and probably more particularly recently than at any other time, the provincial governments, in dealing with the particular agricultural matters under their control, have imported thoroughbred stock of various kinds for the improvement of livestock.

Mr. REID: Thoroughbred stock comes in free.

Mr. MACDONALD: Thoroughbred stock comes in free if imported for particular purposes, I assume. There are, however, other matters which pertain particularly to the functions of the provincial governments in dealing with matters, under the British North America Act, come under their care, and for the development of which they may be compelled to go abroad for the purpose of getting machinery or other articles necessary. As I said, speaking before recess, it seems to me that, under the old principle of law that the Crown is not affected by any legislation unless the Crown is particularly named, the right of the province to be free from taxation on importations, would be conceded.

Then there is section 125 of the British North America Act, which my hon. friend quoted, and which especially declares that no lands or property of the Crown, of Canada, or of the provinces, shall be liable to taxation. Now, unquestionably the tariff is a tax, and that being so, the proposition of my hon. friend to bring the property of the different provinces within the purview of the Customs Act is a subversion of the section to that extent. It seems to me that the advisability of a policy of this kind is worthy of the most careful consideration of the House. My hon. friend tells us that as a matter of practice this property has always been taxed in the past. I lay aside for the moment the consideration of the question of taxation of property of the Imperial Government, or of the Federal Government, because that does not seem to be in contemplation by the Act. I doubt the wisdom of the Federal Parliament entering upon a policy which involves taxation of the provincial governments through the tariff. If, as a matter of fact, the four older provinces of the Dominion did not in the earlier days have very heavy importations for this Government to tax, that does not prove anything in regard to the policy of the country. In the newer portions of the Dominion the provinces are entering upon lines of policy which involve importations. For instance, I think all the western provinces are engaged in operating a Government-owned telephone, and the tendency in certain of our provinces is undoubtedly along the line of Government operation of public utilities. The material used in the operation of these utilities has of necessity to be imported in some cases. So the question is becoming more and more important every day, and though we are here dealing only with the resolution—my hon. friend will later introduce a Bill—I would suggest to him the advisability of looking into this section very carefully, and I should like to hear from the Minister of Justice as to the constitutionality of legislation of this kind.

In the next place, while my hon. friend speaks of the Bill as being merely declaratory in its character, it is undoubtedly retroactive. While it merely purports to say that a certain thing has been the law, it seems to me that that is going a very long way, and although I have not given the deliberation to this question that I should like to give as a lawyer, I do not think my hon. friend should go so far as to declare that a certain thing has been the law. It is really retroactive legislation that my hon. friend is attempting to put on the statute book.

There is this third consideration which is worthy of attention. The province of Manitoba, according to my hon. friend, has raised the question whether they are liable to taxation on certain importations they have made recently, and the question of the right of the Customs Department to impose that taxation is now before the courts, or will be shortly. I submit that it is a matter of sound policy that this Parliament should not, as against provincial authority, undertake to declare what the law is in a question which is now sub judice, or which will shortly form the subject of litigation before the courts. It is only in the most extreme cases that Parliament or any legislative body should interfere in pending legislation. Having regard to the constitutional aspect involved, and the possible consequences, I think my hon. friend should hesitate before taking the position he does. Having regard to the development by the provincial governments of their operation of public utilities—and this subject has been under frequent discussion in the Railway Committee for a great many days—I submit that this resolution with all its ramifications is well worthy of the attention of hon. gentlemen before we should enter upon a policy which might give rise to grave constitutional questions as to our right to tax the provinces.

Mr. DOHERTY: As to the policy of imposing taxation upon property that may be imported by or for provincial governments I do not know that I desire to enter into a discussion of that at the present time. The fact would seem to be that though the Customs Act does not appear to specifically mention the Crown, everybody has understood that its provisions apply to the Crown in regard to its right to tax the provinces as well as everybody else, and so far as it is a question of policy in the carrying out of the Act all the successive governments of Canada, as I understand it, have acted upon the policy of collecting duties on importations by the provinces, just as on importations made by other people. With one or two exceptions the provinces all seem to have acquiesced in the view that the customs taxation did apply to them so it is not a question of entering upon a new policy of imposing duties upon the importations of the provinces, for that is the policy which has been consistently followed since Confederation.

The hon. member has referred to this legislation as being retroactive, and has further suggested that there is something unconstitutional in it by reason of section 125 of the British North America Act. The latter of those two questions is precisely the one which the provinces raise, their contention being that Parliament is without power to impose taxation upon them. I need not say that this legislation will not affect their rights in that regard in any degree. If Parliament is without power to impose taxation upon the importation of provincial governments, then the fact that we enact this legislation will not give us that power; we cannot lift ourselves by our own boot-straps, and the purpose of this legislation is not to endeavour to do that at all. It is necessitated by the fact that whether this Parliament has the power or not, the Customs Act, not having specifically mentioned the Crown on the principle which the hon. gentlemen mentioned, it might be open to any province to-day seeking to invoke exemption to claim that, even though it turned out that this pretension that Parliament had no right by reason of section 125 to impose customs duties were entirely unfounded, nevertheless, it should succeed on what might fairly be described as the purely technical ground, that Parliament had not as a matter of fact specified the Crown, and that even if it had the power it had not exercised that power. Now the purpose of this legislation is to anticipate the raising of that question, which so far as I know has never been raised.

The contention, so far as I know, has not been based upon that oversight in the legislation. It raises the broad question whether Parliament can impose custom duties upon the importations by the Crown in right of the provinces. Now, as I have said, no legislation of ours will affect the law upon the question of our power to impose these duties upon the property of the Crown. The full effect of this proposed legislation, if adopted, will be to put out of the way what, it seems to me may properly under the circumstances be described as the technical question, whether the provinces can escape merely because the Crown was not mentioned in the statute. It will enable us, if we go into Court, to go upon the real, substantial question, which is, whether Parliament can or cannot levy customs duties on the importations of these provinces, and to fight it out upon that real, substantial question, not leaving us exposed to the raising of this other pretension which, so far as I am aware, never has been raised, and which is purely technical, but which would prevent, possibly, our obtaining any decision upon the broad question. Now, that broad question is one that it is important to have determined. Whatever may be the policy of Parliament, now or at any time, upon the exercise of the power, it certainly is a matter of importance to have it made clear whether that power exists or not, and it is purely that power on the part of Parliament that is challenged by the province of Manitoba. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that we ought to set the law in such a condition that any issue that might be raised would turn upon this substantial question. As I have said, I am not aware that any of the provinces has based any claim upon the absence of mention of the Crown in the Customs Act, but on our part, as a matter of prudence, it seems to us wiser that we should make impossible the raising of that question, so that we may have the real, substantial issue alone dealt with.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me that it is unnecessary to pass this legislation in order to have the essential question raised. So far as the statement of the minister goes, there is nothing to indicate that a special case could not be raised under which the right to levy taxation by way of customs duties could be determined. It is extremely objectionable to enact retroactive legislation. It is contrary to natural justice and contrary to sound principle, and ought never to be resorted to unless to cure some grave injustice. That is the sound principle by which this Parliament ought to be guided. This is not a case in which the retroactive principle is used to right any grave wrong. When Parliament enacts retroactive legislation, that fact is always appealed to as a precedent by those who desire further legislation of the same character. Some time in the future, legislation of a retroactive character will be proposed, and the fact may be cited that in 1917 this Parliament declared in favour of such legislation. The minister says that none of the provinces have raised this question as to whether Parliament did impose taxation upon goods imported by the province. I suppose that in the past the question has not been very important; the duties levied have not been very great, and it has not been worth while for the province to raise the question. But, if they have wrongfully paid duties, then as between the provinces and the Dominion, they are entitled to get these duties refunded, and I do not think that Parliament ought to enact legislation which would take away that right of the provinces to a refund, no matter what the amount The minister says that the legal right of the provinces may rest upon two grounds—first, that this Parliament had no power to impose the taxation, and, second, that this Parliament has not actually imposed the taxation in that it did not include the Crown in right of the provinces, nor, of course, in right of the Dominion. And now the minister says that, for fear that the provinces, if they fail upon one ground may proceed upon the other, we are to take away the legal right which possibly they have—which we fear they have—to demand back payments from us. Ought that to be done? Have they a right to the refund of that money? If they have the right on the ground that Parliament has not imposed the taxation, and that the duties have been paid by mistake, then, it seems to me, Parliament has no right to take away whatever claim they may have to the refund of that money. If the provinces wish to raise the claim that this Parliament has no power to impose taxes upon the Crown in the right of the provinces, they will insist upon their right to bring in goods free of duty, and the Customs Department will resist; and that will raise the question, which question can be decided by the courts. There is therefore no need for retroactive legislation, and no need to take away the legal rights of the provinces, if they have any—and if they have no legal rights in the matter, this legislation is quite superfluous. But, if this measure is to be considered, the provinces should have notice of it, and should have the option of being heard before the Government or before a committee of this House. I believe that the point is well taken by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that retroactive legislation is at all times objectionable, and should never be resorted to unless to relieve some grave injustice. No necessity for legislation has been shown in this case.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Perhaps we could pass the resolution and have the Bill introduced, and the observations of my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) can be taken into consideration.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. REID introduced Bill No. 67, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY.

IMPERIAL MUNITIONS BOARD AND ORGANIZED LABOUR.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden for the House to go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I desire to direct the attention of the Government to certain grievances that organized labour in this country appears to have against the Munitions Board. At a meeting held in the city of Ottawa within the last few days, certain statements of fact have been disclosed which would seem to indicate that the Munitions Board is not treating organized labour with the consideration which, under the circumstances and conditions that exist to-day, it ought to be treated. The substantial grievances which the labour men allege are as follows:

"1—Violation of sanitary requirements — gross negligence in regard to the protection of the health of the workers, in camp and plant construction.

"2—Lowering the wage standards already established in different sections of the Dominion.

"3—Elimination of the eight-hour day and the introduction of the 10, 12 and 14-hour day, and seven-day week.

"4—The unnecessary dilution of labour by the introduction of female labour, before proper steps have been taken to utilize available skilled mechanics.

"5—Where dilution has occurred no general effort has been made to maintain the same standard wages as received by the men.

"6—Substitution of cheap, semi-skilled labour from rural districts for construction work, because of their willingness to accept less than the trades union rates.

"7—A declared policy of refusing to recognize trades union representatives in determining the wages and hours on contracts let by them.

"8—Challenging trades union officials to obtain reasonable conditions by use of their organized power instead of through negotiations which would result in strikes.

"The unanimous conclusion was reached that the time had arrived for the re-organization of this board on the basis of equal representation of labour with the employing interests."

This is the list of complaints which organized labour has against the Munitions Board at the present time. It is of the utmost importance that harmony between the Munitions Board and organized labour should exist. Since the outbreak of the war a very large number of munition plants have been established in Canada in which large sums of money have been expended for the purpose of supplying such munitions of war as are required by the allied countries. The rate of wages, it would appear, has not been kept up in proportion to the profits which have been obtained by the manufacturers of munitions. We do know that since the outbreak of the war this has been an extremely profitable industry to those who were fortunate enough to be able to engage in it. The question of adequate remuneration to those engaged in munition plants is certainly one that ought to receive the consideration of the Munitions Board and which, if not dealt with by them, should receive the attention of the Government. In all works under the supervision of the Government, for instance, all contracts that are let by the Public Works Department, there is a fair wage schedule which is a part of the contract. Under that fair wage schedule those who are employed on public works are entitled to a fair remuneration for their services. No distinction ought to be made between the relations existing between the Munitions Board and the Government than between the Public Works Department and the Government. Fair remuneration ought to be allowed those who are employed in munition works and reasonable hours of labour ought to be determined as constituting a day's work in that employment.

The reasonableness of the complaints which have been made by organized labour, it seems to me, will appeal to every hon. member of this House. The first one has reference particularly to the sanitary requirements which ought to be provided in these munition plants. I cannot understand how the Munitions Board could refuse to give ear to any fair representations that might be made by the labouring people with respect to that matter. It is certainly not one about which there should be any controversy if a substantial complaint is made on behalf of those people and it does appear to me that there is no reason why some such action should not be taken for the purpose of removing the grievances in that respect. I shall not go over in detail all the matters that have been referred to, the list of which I read at the beginning of my observations, and I shall do nothing further than impress upon the Government the desirability of having some action taken by the Munitions Board which will result in substantially meeting the complaints which are alleged by the representatives of labour. At this time it would appear to be desirable that the large body of our population who have enrolled themselves within the ranks of organized labour should receive a reasonable hearing and every substantial ground of complaint ought to be remedied.

With respect to the particular grievance that arises out of the employment of women in these munition plants, I do not assume that organized labour has any special objection to the employment of women provided it is not made the subject of competition in the matter of wages between the men and women who are employed. If women are able to perform the work that is required of them in these munition plants, I see no reason why they ought not to be employed. On the contrary I believe their service ought to be encouraged but their employment ought not to be considered a ground for reducing the remuneration of men employed in these plants. It may be argued that the demands made upon women in respect to their earnings are not as great as those on men and that they are not entitled to the same scale of wages, but if as a result the wages of the men were lowered then it is a substantial grievance. All through, the indictment which organized labour has drawn up against the Imperial Munitions Board seems to be one which is entitled to fair consideration, and I would urgently request, on behalf of those who allege these grievences, that steps be taken to give them a fair hearing and to accede in every reasonable way to any proper demands for which they have made improvement.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend has put forward his observations in a very reasonable and moderate way, and I shall at once direct the attention of the Imperial Munitions Board to what is urged. We, of course, have no control over the form of contract which the Imperial Munitions Board uses, nor over the prices that they pay for the munitions turned out. Some of these matters to which my hon. friend alludes have, however, come up, more particularly with regard to the question of wages. It has been the duty of the Minister of Labour from time to time to make representations to the Imperial Munitions Board with regard to certain matters, and I know that on at least one occasion the board did cancel a contract by reason of the unfair treatment, of which there was ample evidence, by the company's manager of persons in its employ. I think it is not going too far to say that the Imperial Munitions Board have given pretty careful attention to representations that have been made to them on these matters, and, so far as we can judge, they have endeavoured to improve the conditions when those conditions were not what they should be. The first indictment that is set forth in the memorandum is,

Violation of sanitary requirements, gross negligence in regard to the protection of the health of the workers in camp and plant construction.

I say at once, that there ought to be the most careful regard for sanitary conditions and for the health of employees, and if there is anything lacking in that regard I hope the Imperial Munitions Board will set themselves to redress it with the greatest possible expedition. I entirely agree that conditions such as are alleged here ought not to be allowed to continue. Another charge is,

Lowering the wage standards already established in different sections of the Dominion.

I would not venture to make any observation with respect to that until the answer of the Board with regard to it has been received.

I may say that in December, 1915, and again in March, 1916, I brought to the attention of the British Government the importance of having inserted in contracts made by the Imperial Munitions Board a fair wage clause such as obtains, I think, in the United Kingdom and such as is used in all contracts which are entered into by the Government of Canada. For some reason that I have never been able fully to understand or appreciate, it would seem that this has not yet been done. There was, however, a suggestion that the Government of Canada should adopt some such system as that which prevails in Great Britain with regard to wage conditions. We considered that very carefully and went into it at a number of interviews with representatives of organized labour. We came to the conclusion that such matters had better be dealt with in Canada along the lines which had been adopted by the late Administration and continued by the present Administration, and so we passed an Order in Council applying the Industrial Disputes Act to all disputes in connection with contracts made by the Imperial Munitions Board. We did that after a good deal of consideration and many interviews with the representatives of organized labour, and we did it in the belief, whether right or wrong, but which I think is sound, that it would be better for us in dealing with such matters to keep along the lines already tried and tested in this country instead of undertaking to establish an organization of a character of which we knew practically nothing, which, although it might suit the British Isles, nevertheless might not prove very satisfactory in this country. And so the course to which I have alluded was taken in the hope that it would afford a means for settling disputes with regard to various matters that continually arise in the relations between the employers and the employed in this country.

The unnecessary dilution of labour by the introduction of female labour, before proper steps have been taken to utilize available skilled mechanics,

I am not in a position, nor do I suppose is my hon. friend who has made the motion, to speak with any authority in regard to the facts. I believe a considerable amount of female labour is being availed of in this country, but nothing like to the same extent as in Great Britain.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I had the privilege of going through a very large munitions factory in Manchester, the Armstrong-Whitworth Company's works. I understood that in that particular plant, which is not by any means the largest plant and is only one of many operated by that firm, they employ 10,000 persons; and they told me that of the 10,000 not less than 3,000 were women. And, further than that, it appeared that the women were doing very important work and sometimes what seemed to be very heavy work. They were doing it, I believe, very satisfactorily, and I am thoroughly of the opinion that it would have been impossible for Great Britain to accomplish what has been accomplished in the production of munitions of all kinds during the past two and one-half years if it had not been for the employment of female labour there.

This report goes on to charge:

The substitution of cheap semi-skilled labour from rural districts for construction work, because of their willingness to accept less than the trades union rates.

It also alleges:

That there is a declared policy of refusing to recognize trades union representatives in determining the wages and hours on contracts let by them.

It further declares that there is a practice of:

Challenging trades union officials to obtain reasonable conditions by use of their organized power instead of through negotiations which would result in strikes.

All of these matters I think in fairness ought to be submitted to the Imperial Munitions Board and their answer asked. We shall be very glad, so far as the matter is under our control or within our power, to take it up with them. My hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Labour has done that many times already. I am very glad that my hon. friend (Mr. Kyte) has brought the matter to the attention of the House. It is more than his duty to do so, and it shall also be my duty to commend what he has said to the attentive and immediate consideration of the Imperial Munitions Board in order that we may learn what is to be said from their standpoint. I may add that I had a recent communication from representatives of organized labour with regard to the fair wage clause, and I have already dictated a letter to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom on that subject. I looked for the documents upstairs so that I might state the matter a little more fully, but I find that I have not at hand the communication from the representatives of organized labour. I shall, however, see that the communication which I have already drafted, after necessary revision, is sent forward at the earliest possible moment to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. Possibly, by means of his good offices and his immediate attention to the subject, we may obtain a better arrangement in the matter of wages than that which has prevailed up to the present time.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): I am glad to learn that the Prime Minister is establishing machinery under the control of the Government to deal with this subject. I was not aware that an Order in Council of the kind mentioned had been passed. Generally speaking, any branch of organized labour in this country comes within the scope either of this Parliament or of the provincial legislatures. I myself am in favour of organized labour, but I was always opposed to any organized labour that would not subject itself to federal or provincial laws. It is better that organized labour in Canada should come within the scope of our own laws and regulations than that it should be subject to the control of legislation or regulations made by bodies outside of the Dominion. I am sure that this Parliament recognizes the great obligations that we owe to labour in Canada, whether organized or not. It was within the power of labour and its leaders to cause a great deal of trouble by taking advantage of a time of stress and adversity to further their own interests, and it is much to their credit that they did not take any step in that direction. In Nova Scotia we have great iron and steel making industries which are right at the heart of munition making. Behind that are the coal miners, a cessation of whose operations would cripple our iron and steel plants. The stopping of many other activities directly and indirectly connected with the manufacture of munitions and other war supplies would have very serious effects. It is due to the workingmen, the labour classes and their organizations that this Government and this Parliament should afford any possible remedies or exercise any legitimate powers in response to claims that are proper and reasonable. I hope that the Minister of Labour will always be ready to lend a helping hand to the working classes as against any person, body or Government employing labour in Canada and that the working classes will find the machinery of his department ready to adjust any difficulties that they may encounter.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES: May I ask the Minister of Labour whether he intends to bring down a Bill along the lines of the Bill which I, as a private member, introduced to prevent the making of price maintenance agreements? The minister was not present when the matter was debated in the House two weeks ago to-night, but the Minister of Justice asked that the debate on my Bill should be adjourned on the understanding that it should be dealt with and referred to a special committee, either of itself, if the Minister of Labour did not bring down a Bill, or in conjunction with the minister's Bill if he did bring one down. Has the minister any information to give us on the subject?

Mr. J. W. CROTHERS: I am very sorry indeed that I am not able to inform the hon. member for Moosejaw when the Bill will be brought down. I shall be glad to inform him as soon as that has been determined.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the minister still uncertain as to whether there will be a Bill of that kind?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am still uncertain as to that also.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did I understand the Prime Minister to say that the provisions of the English Fair Wage Act
9 p.m. were applicable to munition workers in Canada?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The correspondence which I had with the Imperial Government in the autumn of 1915 and the spring of 1916 was with a view to urging upon them the desirability of including a fair wage clause in the contracts made by the Imperial Munitions Board. Some one had conceived the idea that the Government of Canada objected to the Imperial Munitions Board inserting such a clause in the contracts. I sent a memorandum stating in the most specific and definite terms that we included it in our own contracts and that we therefore could not possibly object to their doing the same thing. That did not produce any effect, and I repeated the statement in the spring of 1916 in order that there might be no misapprehension on the subject. I am now about to send a further communication on the same subject to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

Mr. MACDONALD: Up to this time no fair wage clause has been inserted in the contracts made by the Imperial Munitions Board?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand not, though I have no personal knowledge of that. On March 22 I addressed a communication on the subject to the Colonial Secretary, in consequence of a telegram that I had received from the President of the Trades and Labour Council of Canada, in which I urged attention to these considerations.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is a fair wage clause in contracts made by the Imperial Government in Great Britain.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So there is here.

Mr. MACDONALD: The complaint which the workers make is that while a fair wage clause is inserted in contracts made in England and in Canadian Government contracts as well, there is none in these contracts made by the Imperial Government in Canada. I was anxious to know, therefore, whether any conclusion had been reached in the matter, and whether the fair wage clause was being inserted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think it has yet been inserted.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

IN COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

Labour.—Combines Investigation Act, $2,500.

Mr. GRAHAM: We see a good deal in the press these days about the naming of a food controller. Some despatches say that the power is to be given to one individual; others tell us that the power is to be given to a commission. Could the Minister of Labour set all this talk at rest by telling us what he is going to do? If he has decided on appointing a food controller who is he to be, and what are to be his duties? If he has decided on having a commission, who are to comprise it and what are to be their duties

Mr. CROTHERS: The matter has received considerable consideration, but it has not yet been determined whether a commission composed of one or more will be appointed. I have no doubt that something in that direction will be done in the near future.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will either a food controller or a commission be appointed?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not able to go into all the details with my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a principle, not a detail.

Mr. VERVILLE: The minister should tell the House and the mass of the people whether he is going to do anything of that kind or not. The people have been expecting that a food controller will be appointed. When I say "the people," I do not mean only organized labour.

Mr. GRAHAM: The organized leaders.

Mr. VERVILLE: I might say "the organized leaders," as my hon. friend says. Prices are increasing all the time, and my hon. friend knows that either wages are not going up, or if they are, they are not keeping pace with the increase in the cost of the necessaries of life. The minister has been asked by members on that side of the House as well as on this that maximum prices on foodstuffs be established. The minister may believe that this is a radical thing to do, but these are times when one has to do radical things, and maximum prices should be established on the necessaries of life. There has been a demand from the people, not only in large cities, but in small towns throughout the Dominion, that a food controller or a commission be appointed. This is, perhaps, the last opportunity that we shall have to ask this question of the Minister of Labour as he may get through his estimates to-night, and it seems to me that he should tell us to-night whether it is the intention of the Government to take this step. As he has said, the matter has taken up a lot of his time and the Government have had it under consideration, but I do not want the minister to keep considering all the time until finally the cost of the necessaries of life rises to such a height that people will not be able to buy them. The minister should tell us definitely whether the Government are going to appoint a commission or some one to regulate the price of food. I do not know what the duty of a food controller may be, but if the question is one of controlling the quantity of food the workingman is to put on his table, I will tell my hon. friend that he should not do that. If, however, the question is one of controlling the prices of foodstuffs, I would ask the minister to tell us to-night what he is going to do so that the country will have the information.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am very sorry that I am not able to give my hon. friend a definite answer as to the exact moment or hour when a food controller or a commissioner of supplies or something of that nature will be appointed, or whether any will be appointed at all. The matter has received a good deal of consideration; it is open to further consideration, and when a conclusion is reached, it will be announced to the House.

Mr. VERVILLE: Does my hon. friend admit that there is at the present time a necessity for the appointment of a food controller?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not admitting anything of that sort just now. I have two or three reports here of investigations that have been made under the authority of the Order in Council which was passed on the 10th of November last concerning food, fuel and clothing. One of these concerning sugar is ready, and I will ask leave, perhaps to-morrow, to lay it on the Table. Another one is in regard to anthracite coal, and there are in course of preparation several others concerning cold storage commodities, canned goods, flour, and ice.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is there any report on bread?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, we are getting a report ready on bread and cereals, the producing and marketing of bread.

Mr. TURRIFF: Is there a report on water?

[Mr. Verville.]

Mr. CROTHERS: I am afraid that is too thin for my hon. friend.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member means the kind that is put in stock.

Mr. CROTHERS: I was about to say that it was not and is not, I think, believed or expected by any sane man that the administration of this Order in Council or of any other legislative enactment could or would suspend the influence upon the prices of the universal law of supply and demand, or neutralize the natural effects of the world-wide war, or of the world-wide shortage in food crops, or of the transfer of millions of men from productive to destructive employment, or of the wastage of scores of millions of tons of foodstuffs in the ocean. The administration of this Order in Council thus far has not accomplished any of these impossibilities; neither was it designed for such a purpose.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was it not designed even partially to neutralize those effects?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am just coming to that. The belief that the administration of this Order in Council or of any other legislative enactment could accomplish the impossibilities that I have mentioned would require as much credulity as the belief that a man could stay the incoming tide. We all know that the prices of food and other articles have gone up very rapidly, and we all know what the main causes of those increases have been. This Order in Council was designed to prevent undue and unnecessary accumulations of foodstuffs and other articles and the withholding of them from sale.

It was intended to prevent as far as possible the restraint of competition and the enhancing of prices, and in these respects I think the Order in Council has succeeded fairly well.

Clause 3 says:

(1) No person shall accumulate or shall withhold from sale any necessary of life beyond an amount thereof reasonably required for the use or consumption of his household or for the ordinary purposes of his business;

(2) Every person who shall at any time hold any necessary of life beyond an amount thereof reasonably required as aforesaid, and every person who shall hold for the purpose of sale, whether as manufacturer, wholesaler, jobber, retailer or otherwise, any stock-in-trade of any necessary of life, shall offer for sale the said excess amount, or the said stock-in-trade, as the case may be, at prices not higher than are reasonable and just.

That clause was intended to make it an offence to withhold from sale anything beyond what a man might acquire for his own use or for the ordinary purposes of his business. Any violation of that clause is punishable under clause 9, which says:

(1) Any person who contravenes or fails to observe any of the provisions of these regulations shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable upon indictment or upon summary conviction under Part XV of the Criminal Code to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, or to both fine and imprisonment as specified; and any director or officer of any company or corporation who assents to or acquiesces in the contravention or non-observance by such company or corporation of any of the provisions of these regulations shall be guilty personally and cumulatively with his company or corporation and with his co-directors or associate officers.

Mr. MARCIL: Has action been taken under this Order in Council in any one case?

Mr. CROTHERS: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. MARCIL: Was any attempt made under this Order in Council to control the export of food. We have heard of large quantities of potatoes being sent to Cuba when potatoes were selling in Montreal at $7 a barrel.

Mr. CROTHERS: There is no provision in this Order in Council for preventing the exportation of potatoes or any other article.

Mr. TURRIFF: What is the Order in Council for?

Mr. CROTHERS: I told my hon. friend a moment ago that it was to prevent the accumulation and withholding of foodstuffs from sale, and the enhancing of prices. Those are the three objects we had in view.

Mr. KYTE: Has any result been accomplished in that direction?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not able to put my finger on any particular case. I wonder if my hon. friend would suggest that a police officer in the city, John Brown say, could put his finger on the number of burglaries that he has prevented by being on watch every night.

Mr. KYTE: If there were many burglaries committed, he would likely catch somebody.

Mr. CROTHERS: If John Brown could not point to any one, would my hon. friend suggest that the police should be abolished?

Mr. KYTE: If burglaries still continued on John Brown's beat, he would probably be dismissed and some one else be appointed who was more watchful.

Mr. CROTHERS: If my hon. friend knows of a case that comes within clause 3, it is up to him to prosecute and secure a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment for the man who has violated these provisions. My hon. friend smiles. I do not suppose when a crime is committed down in his county he writes to the Minister of Justice to prosecute anybody. As a lawyer he knows that under our constitution it is the duty of the provincial government to enforce the criminal or quasi-criminal laws made by this Parliament. It is no part of the duty of this Government to prosecute in the case of every crime committed in Canada.

Mr. KYTE: Does the minister contend that it is no part of the duty of this Government to see that grievances complained of are not remedied?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am speaking of clause 3 now. Wait until I get through. It is no part of the duty of this Government to enforce any of the criminal or quasi-criminal laws passed by this Parliament. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in power, enacted what was known as the Alien Labour Act, and they attempted to enforce it for a very short time, but they soon found that impracticable, and amended the Act, and never thereafter attempted to enforce it.

Mr. KYTE: That is what you had better do with your Order in Council.

Mr. CROTHERS: It was never provided in the Order in Council, and never intended that this Government should enforce its provisions; but it was provided in the Alien Labour Act that the Government should enforce it. They attempted to enforce it, and made a failure of it; I am not blaming anybody for that. The Act was amended and neither that government nor their successors have attempted to enforce it.

Mr. MARCIL: As Trade and Commerce come within the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament, any act in restraint of trade and commerce could be prosecuted by the Attorney General of Canada on behalf of the Government.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not remember any particular cases.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that it can be done, because under our constitution this Parliament has control of trade and commerce.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have not contended that it could not be done. I supposed this Government could ask an officer to lay an information against John Brown for stealing Tom Smith's horse, but the usual course would be for Tom Smith to get the Crown Attorney to prosecute, it being his duty to enforce those laws.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do I understand the minister to say that his department is quite inactive in cases of infraction of this Order in Council? If so, it follows that it was only child's play for many of my constituents to report certain cases to his department with a view to their being investigated and a penalty inflicted in the event of a violation of the Order in Council. Am I to understand that the department leaves it entirely to the provinces?

Mr. CROTHERS: I was coming to that; I am dealing with Clause 3 at the moment. I will give all the clauses that I consider material, and any others that may be desired. Clause 4, for instance, says:

The Minister of Labour may, by notice in writing under his hand or that of his deputy, require any person who operates, controls or manages any cold storage plant, packing house, cannery, factory, mine, warehouse, or other premises in which or in any part of which any necessary of life is prepared, manufactured, produced or held by such person for himself or for another, or who in any manner deals in any necessary of life, to make and render unto such minister, within a time set in such notice, and such person shall make and render unto such minister precisely as required by him, a written return under oath or affirmation showing in detail—

(a) the species and amount of any necessary of life held by such person at any indicated time or times, including any time preceding the making of these regulations, where and for whom said necessary is held, and if held for another, upon what terms held;

(b) the time when any or all of such necessary of life was prepared, manufactured, produced, acquired, or taken into possession;

(c) the cost of such necessary of life, including all charges and expenses of an overhead or other nature, affecting such cost;

(d) the price at which such necessary of life, if already sold, has been sold, or, if unsold, is held for sale;

(e) such other information concerning any necessary of life as the minister may require, including a full disclosure of all existing contracts or agreements which such person, or his principal or agent, may have at any time entered into, with any other person, touching or concerning the sale or resale prices of any necessary of life, or the period of time during which any necessary of life should be held, as bailee or otherwise, before sale or resale, or limiting the quantity of any necessary of life which should be sold to any one buyer or combination of buyers or within any limited district.

In addition, it is provided:

6. (1) If, after the receipt by the Minister of Labour of any return made to him or to any municipality in purported compliance with these regulations, such minister shall consider that any circumstances so justify, or if, after a return under these regulations has been required, none is made or none is made within the time set in the notice requiring such return or within such further time as the Minister of Labour may upon special application to him allow, the said minister shall have power to investigate the business and to examine the premises, books, papers and records of the person making or failing to make such return, as the case may be, and, for those purposes such minister may appoint an examiner or examiners and may authorize in writing any examiner so appointed to enter and examine the premises, books, records and papers of such person, and to take evidence under oath or affirmation of any person who such examiner may believe has knowledge relating to such matters as ought to have been included within a proper return according to circumstances.

(2) Every person who is in possession or control of any such premises, books, records or papers shall give and afford to such examiner admission and access thereto whenever and as often as demanded.

(3) No person shall in any manner impede or prevent or attempt to impede or prevent any such investigation or examination.

(4) Every person in any manner required by such examiner to give evidence under oath or affirmation touching or concerning the matters committed to such examiner for investigation shall attend before said examiner and give evidence whenever so required.

Mr. COPP: Have any offences under this clause been drawn to the attention of the minister?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think not. No municipality that has followed out the provisions of clause 5 has made application to us to proceed under clause 6. Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to what we have done in regard to inquiries as to sugar. Under the provisions of section 4, we have sent out questions to about three hundred wholesale men and refiners. I wish to give the House a sample of one of these questionnaires, as we call them, that we send out for return under oath:

Sugar.

You are hereby required, on or before the day of February, 1917, to make return in writing under oath to the undersigned, giving answers to the following questions propounded under authority of Order-in-Council No. 2777, dated November 10, 1916, of which a copy is herewith enclosed, and to obey under the same authority all directions of this questionnaire.

Minister of Labour of the Dominion of Canada.

1. When were you incorporated?

2. By what authority were you incorporated?
3. State name and addresses of your officers and directors?
4. State the various grades of sugar produced by you. Show as accurately as you can the cost of each thereof, including all overhead and other charges affecting cost, and the price at which you sell the same. If your prices vary in different places show such variation. Make your statement upon the basis of 100 pounds. Annex your answer as Schedule "A" to this questionnaire giving details as far as possible as demanded, supplementing, qualifying and explaining in such manner as you see fit by additional matter.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does not the minister think that he could have dealt much more directly and more effectively with the prices of sugar and other staple articles by simply passing an Order in Council fixing the price and prohibiting the export of the article? That would be better than these Orders in Council and questionnaires.

Mr. CROTHERS: Just pass an Order in Council determining how much every man in this city, for instance, shall charge for cheese, butter, eggs, tea, and other things? Is that the hon. gentleman's idea?

Mr. TURRIFF: They have done that in England.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am asking if that is the hon. gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. MACDONALD: I say that the hon. gentleman might have dealt much more briefly and effectively with the prices of staple articles by simply prohibiting the export and fixing a maximum price. How much better that would be than sending out people to ask questions who come back with nothing. For the hon. gentleman is back to where he was three weeks ago—he has not got anything more than he had at that time.

Mr. CROTHERS: The hon. gentleman cannot know whether I have any additional matter or not, until he has heard me through. I wonder whether he would suggest that we prohibit the export of foodstuffs to the Allies, in order that we may have enough here and so reduce the prices to the people of Canada? I do not suppose he would suggest that.

Mr. MACDONALD: But, as my hon. friend beside me has pointed out, the Government should long ago have prohibited the export of foodstuffs except to Britain and the Allies.

Mr. CROTHERS: This Government has taken measures under which wheat and wheat flour come in free from the United States and ours go free to the United States. The hon. member for years insisted that this Government should secure the free entry of our wheat and wheat flour into the United States, but now he thinks it all wrong.

Mr. MACDONALD: I will give the hon. minister, if he wishes it, a statement as to how wheat and wheat flour—

Mr. CROTHERS: Just a moment.

Mr. MACDONALD: Of course, if the minister objects—

Mr. CROTHERS: I have no objection to the hon. member asking a question, but I do object to his making a speech every two or three minutes.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman asked me a question.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think I put it in the form of a question. But I do say that for years the hon. gentleman insisted that the Government should arrange matters so that wheat and wheat products would come in free from the United States, and that our wheat and wheat products should go free to that country. Now, he suggests that we were all wrong in doing anything of that kind, that what we should have done is to prohibit the exportation of wheat and wheat flour to the United States. We did not do that. Perhaps we were all wrong in not doing it, but we did not. I want to show the nature of the questions we sent out in reference to sugar:

5. What amount of sugar have you on hand for sale? If necessary to answer by way of schedule annex your answer to Schedule "B," adding such explanations as you may see fit.
6. How does the quantity on hand for sale compare with what you had on hand for sale at an equivalent date of the years 1914, 1915 and 1916?
7. What was the amount of your gross business (a) in tonnage, (b) in price, for the year ending December 31, 1916? Answer with accuracy if possible. If not, give your best approximation.
8. Compare your gross business as to tonnage and value for the years 1913, 1914, 1915 and 1916. If necessary to answer by way of schedule annex your answer as Schedule "C."

—whereby, in consideration of your offer to such persons, firms or corporations of a discount from monthly or other purchases and certification by such persons, firms or corporations that, from and after any certain date to any other time, such persons, firms or corporations have not sold or permitted to be sold at a lower price than prices fixed and communicated by you from day to day, nor on more liberal terms than certain fixed terms, you will pay or allow to such persons, firms or corporations a discount of value in money. Annex your answer as Schedule "I."

14. Add as Schedule "J" any observations of a general or other character as you may see fit.

That questionnaire was sent out to three hundred wholesale men and refiners and a form of affidavit to accompany their replies was attached. We got replies and many of them were satisfactory as soon as we received them. But, a great many were defective. We pointed out by correspondence that they did not answer the questions fully, we required further information and we got it. After correspondence of that kind we got satisfactory answers from all of these men to whom we sent out the questionnaire. This is the form of affidavit that they had to make:

I, ..., of the ..... of ..... in the Province of ....., make oath and say as follows:

1. I am ..... to whom the questions to which answers are, in whole or in part, returned herewith, are addressed.

2. I have knowledge enabling me to say, and I do hereby say, that the answers given to the said questions are candid and true, that such answers are as complete as I can provide, and that I have made all enquiries and consulted all records reasonably necessary to enable me to answer the said questions truthfully and candidly as aforesaid.

Sworn before me at the ..... of ..... in the County of ....., this ..... day of ..... 1917.

Notary, Commissioner for taking affidavits, or Justice of the Peace.

As a result of these questionnaires and answers, we got a great deal of information which is contained in the report. I do not propose to read the report but I am going to put it on the Table and I am going to give a few facts from it which may be interesting to the committee. Section 5 of the Order in Council is in these words:

Whenever the council of any municipalicty shall declare by way of resolution that in its opinion excessive prices are being demanded within the limits of such municipality for any necessary of life, such council may, by notice in writing under the hand of its clerk or other authorized officer, require any person dealing within the municipality in such necessary of life, and locally situate therein, to make and render unto such council within a time set in such notice, and such person shall make and render unto such council, precisely as required by it, a written return under oath or affirmation, showing in detail—

(a) The amount of such necessary of life held by such person for sale or disposition within such municipality at any indicated time or times, including any time preceding the making of these regulations.

A part of the clause I have already read empowers the Minister of Labour to authorize an examiner to go and examine under oath any one in connection with any business and make him show his books. Some time ago, in order that a municipality might have all the means for an inquiry that I had, and within their own control, I sent out this circular to a vast number of municipalities:

Dear Sir:—

You will probably have a copy of the Order in Council enacted last November, concerning the prices of some of the necessaries of life, but for convenience I enclose you one.

It is sometimes said that under clause 6, as Minister of Labour, I have powers to conduct a more thorough investigation under oath etc., than has a municipality. You will observe that under that section I may appoint an examiner, and in writing give him all the power and authority that I myself could exercise. That municipalities may have at their hand all the power I have under that section, I want to tell you that where a municipality complies with clause 5 and by resolution asks me to appoint its solicitor or other official an examiner with all the powers mentioned in clause 6 naming the official so chosen, I shall be glad to clothe him therewith, that the investigation may at once go forward substantially under local control, and at its expense.

So that now the municipality desiring a further investigation, after sending forth the questions and getting the answers, may ask me and I will appoint some man chosen by them right on the ground, the solicitor of the municipality or other officer, who will have all the power of going right in and examining under oath and compelling the exposition of their books, thus getting all the facts in connection with the particular case they are inquiring into.

The sugar business, as hon. gentlemen will know, has grown to quite large proportions in Canada. In 1916, in round figures, there was 960,000,000 pounds of sugar refined in Canada, of a wholesale value of $47,473,000. In 1913, there was manufactured 606,466,000 pounds. In 1914, there was manufactured 665,000,000. pounds. In 1913 there was manufactured 640,000,000 pounds. The average cost in 1916 at the refinery was, for best sugar 5½ cents per pound, and for cane sugar 6⅔ cents per pound. There are in Canada six companies refining sugar and eight refineries. One of these companies is operating three different refineries. Five confine their operations exclusively to the refinement of cane raw sugar, and one refines both cane and beet sugar. One of these refineries is situated at Halifax, one at St. John, two at Montreal, one at Kitchener, one at Chatham, one at Wallaceburg and one at Vancouver, B.C. The Cuban crop of sugar controls the price of raw sugar in Canada. For the last three or four years the Cuban crop of raw sugar was, in 1913-14, 2,597,732 long tons; in 1914-15, 2,592,667 long tons; in 1915-16, 3,007,000 long tons; in 1916-7, 2,600,000 long tons. The crop of the whole world was , for the same years, for 1913-14, 18,740,000 tons; for 1914-15, 18,468,000 tons; for 1915-16, 16,592,000 tons, and for 1916-17, about 16,000,000 tons. Most of the cane sugar that we get in Canada, of course, is from Cuba. The price of cane has gone up quite a bit. There are several reasons for that. The answers we have received to these questions, which we have verified from other sources, show that the price of the material at the shipping point, the freight, the cost of discharging, the cost of delivery, all have increased. The price of raw sugar is twice what it was, it has gone up about 100 per cent. The freight from Cuba has gone up from 9 cents per hundred pounds before the war to 76 cents per hundred pounds now, more than eight times what it was before the war. Coal used by the refineries has more than doubled. Hydrochloric acid, which is largely used in refining sugar has gone up 300 per cent. The bags, packages, etc., have all gone up in price. Labour has gone up. Of these companies last year, one operated at an actual loss and another paid interest on the bonds only and no dividend whatever.

Mr. KNOWLES: What did the one in Vancouver make?

Mr. CROTHERS: I have no doubt it is given in this report, but I cannot say at the moment.

Mr. KNOWLES: If it is in the report it is not confidential?

Mr. CROTHERS: Oh, no, I am going to place it on the table. The average profit that the refineries had last year was one-fifth of a cent per pound. Of course there was a very large amount refined, and it amounts to a large sum in the aggregate, but it was only one-fifth of a cent per pound on the average.

I have another of these questionnaires which was sent out to wholesale men. I do not propose to read it. The answers are given here and the actual affidavit is here. If there was any suspicious circumstance or anything set forth in the affidavit or in the replies that did not seem perfectly satisfactory, we corresponded with the parties until we had what we considered a satisfactory answer, and the net result is that the refineries last year made one-fifth of a cent per pound on sugar, although the price was much higher than it had been a few years ago. I think the last price was 8⅝ cents wholesale, and the reasons I have given fairly explains this price. The principal item in the cost of refined sugar, as hon. gentlemen will all know, is the cane. The sugar cane has more than doubled in price since the war broke out, and, as I have said, the freight on sugar from Cuba has risen from 9 cents to 76 cents, coal has doubled, hydrochloric acid has gone up 300 per cent, and labour has gone up. These items will give satisfactory reasons, I think, for the increase in the price of sugar. It is sold to wholesalers at $8.35 per hundred pounds and retailers are selling it, some as low as 9 cents and some as high as 10 cents, so that the profit does not seem to be very exorbitant.

We have gone into the question of the price of coal. We sent out questions concerning coal, not so many or so full as in regard to sugar. We have endeavoured to get the condition at the beginning of each of the last four years and then to get a report from month to month, and we do get it now every month. We sent out to 250 of the principal coal dealers of Canada these questions, and they were requested to answer giving the number of tons of 2,000 pounds each in the yard on the first day of the month in 1916, of egg, stove, chestnut and other varieties of coal. That is for each month. Then they were asked to give the number of tons of 2,240 pounds purchased from each firm during the month and details of each purchase, giving the price per ton for each size at the shipping point, freight and unloading charges, the number of net tons of 2,000 pounds sold and delivered during the month and the price per ton at which it was sold, egg price, stove price, chestnut, and other prices.

These questions were sent to every large coal dealer in Canada, and satisfactory answers were received. We receive cards from them every month; we can tell the quantity of coal in store in Canada at the beginning of every month. Complaints have been made concerning the price of coal in St. John and Montreal. Coal has been sold in Montreal at $15 a ton in the central part of the city and at higher prices in the suburbs. Upon making inquiry, we found that a great deal of coal is sold in Montreal in little bags containing 15 or 20 pounds. These bags are sold at from 15 to 20 cents each, making the price reach from $15 to $20 a ton. The extra charge in Montreal for carrying coal up one flight of stairs is 25 cents, two flights 50 cents, three flights 75 cents, and four flights $1. Coal is very dear in St. John and Halifax, the price running as high as $13 and $14 a ton. The reason is that the merchants in St. John and Halifax buy not at the mouth of the mines, but in New York, because of their being off the line of railway, and they pay as high as $5 a ton for transportation. From the inquiries which we have made and from information received from other sources, we are able to say that the coal dealers in Canada have not charged exorbitant profits. We have been able to ascertain the cost of coal at the mouth of the pit and the cost of freight, and we can readily estimate the cost of discharge, delivery and overhead expenses. Usually the profits made by the dealers do not exceed fifty cents a ton; I think no one would say that that is exorbitant. Sometimes the profit is 65 cents a ton; sometimes 75, but in no case, I think, does it exceed $1.

Mr. COPP: Does the minister say that there is no hope that the people of St. John will get their coal at less than $15 or $2(a ton in the near future?

Mr. CROTHERS: When they shall be able to get cane sugar from Cuba at nine cents a hundred instead of seventy-six, there will probably be sufficient tonnage to carry coal from New York to St. John at a lower rate than $4 or $5 a ton. Tonnage is scarce, and if you ship by water you have to pay.

Mr. COPP: Is there no hope that the Government will do something in the near future to reduce the price of coal in St. John and Halifax?

Mr. CROTHERS: They say that hope springs eternal in the human breast. I trust that the member for Westmorland is not wanting in hope.

10 p.m. Mr. COPP: Has the minister any hope?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes. The war will not last forever, and when the war is over freight rates may be cheaper.

Mr. KYTE: Then the food controller will not be able to do anything in the way of reducing the cost of the necessaries of life. Is that the minister's conclusion?

Mr. CROTHERS: Not at all. The operations of the influences which bring about high prices cannot be suspended by this Parliament or by a food controller. I do believe, however, that the designs of this Order in Council can be carried out; the withholding of foodstuffs from sale at reasonable prices, the restraining of competition, and the enhancing of prices by artificial means.

Mr. KYTE: What section of the Order in Council prevents the accumulation of foodstuffs in cold storage warehouses?

Mr. CROTHERS: The report on cold storage, which is in process of preparation, will be ready in a short time. It will cover such commodities in cold storage as eggs, cheese, pork, bacon, ham, beef, mutton, lamb, halibut, creamery butter, dairy butter. An hon. gentleman on the other side said the other day that a certain firm was seeking insurance on $2,000,000 worth of commodities in cold storage, and that was set forth as an instance of the accumulation and holding of foodstuffs until prices went up. I have here information concerning the purchases and sales of one of the largest cold storage companies in Canada.

Mr. KYTE: Which one?

Mr. CROTHERS: I would rather not mention the names, unless my hon. friend insists. I will show them to him in private if he so desires. On February 24 last the firm to which my hon. friend refers had on hand in one place $2,145,368 worth of such foodstuffs as I have mentioned. In a month they purchased articles of this kind to the value of $2,427,439, and sold $2,242,290 worth. On the same day they had on hand in Montreal $682,487.09 worth of these articles. They purchased in a month commodities of the kind mentioned to the value of $465,176.61, and the value of the sales made was $484,899 18. On the some date they had on hand, at Winnipeg, $89,051.73 worth of these articles; the quantity purchased that month was $25,230.62; and the quantity sold was $50,698.29. The gross value of the commodities on hand, February 24, 1917, was:

Toronto	$2,145,368.18
Montreal	682,487.09
Winnipeg	89,051.73
Total	$2,916,907.00

When we have a firm doing as much cold storage business as this firm is doing, having over $2,000,000 worth of these commodities on hand, and buying in and selling out two or three million dollars worth a month, that does not show that it is holding back any commodities for an increase in price. This firm has a month's supply on hand at a time. This firm is at the present time turning over $3,000,000 a month; in fact, I am told that it is turning over a million dollars a week. The common idea that these commodities are hoarded up in cold storage for the purpose of keeping them there until prices go up is not well founded. One trouble, I think, is that we have not enough goods on hand. This firm, which is the largest firm of its kind in Canada, has only a month's supply on hand, and if it cannot buy any more goods, it cannot ship any more away, it is buying and selling every month. We have gone into these different commodities, sugar, coal, cold storage commodities, canned goods, and the report, on cold storage, is in process of preparation and will be ready in a few days. I am glad to say that so far as the prices of sugar and coal and the quantities of foodstuffs kept in cold storage are concerned, there is no reason for complaint. It is a very good thing for the people of this country to know what the conditions are, because statements that are not well founded are frequently made to them. One hon. member has said: Can you point to any article on which by your efforts you have reduced the price? I do not know that I can. I cannot point to any particular burglary that police constable John Brown has prevented by walking the streets of Ottawa, for the last five years, but it does not follow that we should abolish the police force of Ottawa. The refiners, the wholesalers, and the retail dealers know that we are on the job.

Mr. KYTE: Asleep on the job.

Mr. CROTHERS: No, we are not asleep on the job. I want to know if my hon. friend, by sleeping, could send out 500 of these questionnaires—

Mr. KYTE: Any office boy could do that.

Mr. CROTHERS—and get all the answers back and tabulate them, and if they were not complete ask for further information. I know that cannot be done by little work. A great deal of work is being done. Some days ago we wrote a firm at St. John, N.B., for some further information, and a day or two ago we received the following reply:—

St. John, N.B., May 29, 1917.

We are in receipt of your favour of the 23rd instant and note contents. The writer has been away or your letter would have been replied to before.

The discrepancies you notice between the prices we furnished you with and the American companies mines prices are easily explained:

In the first place we do not buy the coal ex mines, but f.o.b. vessel at tide water. We think the company's prices for April ranged at about $5.50 f.o.b. schooner at New York; but it has been for some time practically impossible to purchase coal from the companies and get vessels loaded promptly, and as vessels will not wait two or three weeks for cargo, it has been necessary to go outside to individual operators and pay two or three dollars a ton premium for spot coal. Our figures for April were made up of some coal purchased and shipped in March, but which did not arrive here until April and of one cargo purchased and shipped in April, the latter costing us,—coal, freight, insurance and cost of discharging approximately $11.65 per gross ton.

That is what the coal actually cost them per gross ton.

Since then prices have advanced and we have paid as high as $9.00 for coal, f. o. b. New York and $5.00 freight. The figures we sent you were the average of a number of cargoes and the reason the stove shows less than the egg is because we happened to get a little better price or a little lower freight on the stove we imported than on the egg size.

You will understand that these prices are fluctuating all the time. When we are able to charter a vessel we have to go into the market and secure spot coal; sometimes the premium we have to pay is greater than at other times and sometimes we can secure a little lower rate of freight than at others.

We are now landing coal that is costing us $14.50 per gross ton at our dock. At the moment we are selling at $14.00 per net ton; but we expect to advance the price in the very near future.

That is just a sample of scores of letters we are receiving every day from all parts of the country. When we receive an answer that is not satisfactory we ask for an explanation, and we get from other sources information to check up what we receive from these people, so that in the end we are satisfied we get the correct information. I do not desire to take up any further time in dealing with these matters that come under this item.

Mr. KYTE: I am sure that the people of this country will not receive very much encouragement from the explanation which the Minister of Labour has given this evening. The minister stands as the apologist of all those who have succeeded in forcing up the prices of foodstuffs in this country to a point which it is almost impossible for the ordinary man to reach. The conclusions of his observations are that nothing is done; nothing is to be expected, and nothing is possible. He expressed the pious hope that after the war conditions would be such that a reduction in the cost of food commodities might be brought about.

Mr. CROTHERS: I was speaking about the freight on coal. The hon. member is covering everything now.

Mr. KYTE: The minister was speaking about sugar and everything else. The minister and his Government, while expressing some desire to appoint a food controller, have to admit this evening that even although a food controller is appointed, he can accomplish nothing. The minister says that the conditions we have in this country to-day are conditions which have inevitably resulted from the war, and that therefore the Government is unable to do anything to relieve the situation. That is not the language of Mr. Hoover, who is the food controller in the United States. Mr. Hoover, in the last four or five weeks has spoken in many places; he has spoken before the legislature at Washington in support of a Bill to enable the United States Government to take control of these food products, and he has pointed out that in nearly every case proof is available that the increased cost of living is due to speculation and to the undue enhancement of the cost of foodstuffs by those who are engaged in the business of distributing them. In the United States there is, apparently a live Government, and a live minister who has charge of that particular situation. The Minister of Labour did not make any particular reference to the matter of flour. We know that some weeks ago when the question of flour was brought up in this House, the Minister of Labour, with a wave of his hand, endeavoured to assure the country that something was being done because he had sent Mr. O'Connor down to Montreal to make an investigation, but Mr. O'Connor returned, and instead of the price of flour going down, it went up until the United States Government took action to close the grain exchange in the city of Chicago.

The reflex result of that was that the price of flour was reduced to some extent in Canada. The Minister of Labour will not deny that the price of flour was boosted in Canada on account of the operations on the Grain Exchange at Winnipeg. That grain exchange has been closed, and I believe the Government has made some effort to eliminate the operations of the speculators, and as a consequence the price of flour has been reduced in some slight degree in the last couple of weeks.

The Minister of Labour has referred to the question of coal. The minister cannot have forgotten that the city solicitors of Montreal endeavoured to hold an investigation under the Order in Council for the purpose of reducing the exorbitant price of coal. They had not proceeded very far when they were faced with the difficulty of being unable to proceed by reason of not being able to prove that a conspiracy existed for the purpose of enhancing the price of flour, for in the opinion of the city solicitors unless a conspiracy were proved nothing could be done under the Order in Council.

I was rather surprised that the Minister of Labour ventured to produce his Order in Council again this evening. I think it is the third occasion on which he has read it to the House, but in no single instance has he been able to show that anything has resulted by reason of the Order in Council or from any proceeding taken under it. It is just as well that the Government cease talking about a food controller. There is no use in going to the expense of appointing a controller or a commission to control the price of foodstuffs, because we have the statement of the Minister of Labour this evening that no result will follow any activity in that respect, as the cost of everything in Canada is due to war conditions. But there are other countries at war, and the consumers of those countries fare very much better than we do, the consumers of Canada. In the United States the conditions created by the war are no worse than the conditions created by the war in this country, and the moment war was declared by the United States action was taken for the purpose of dealing with the question.

The price of onions had gone up enormously in the United States. It was stated that the price was due to the supply not being equal to the demand, and apologists for those who were responsible for increasing the price of that article came forward, just as the Minister of Labour has done to-night, with every explanation but the correct one. But the moment the food controller was invested with authority—

Mr. CROTHERS: Will my hon. friend allow me a question? Has not the hon. member been advocating in this House and outside that we should take action to enable the farmers to sell their products in the United States, so that they could get a higher price?

Mr. KYTE: They did not get a higher price in the United States. When our farmers could have realized a better price in the United States the Government refused to allow them to sell their product in that country. It was not until food products had become so high in this country that the ordinary consumer could scarcely buy them at all, that the Government allowed food products to be exported to the United States, when we were paying more for those commodities than ever before.

Coming back to the question of onions, the food controller in the United States held an inquiry and was able to put his finger on the cause of the trouble. While it had been reported that the high price was due to the supply not being equal to the demand the food controller discovered that large quantities were being warehoused in the United States; the manipulators gave out that the supply was not equal to the demand, and therefore the price had to go up. The moment the food controller took the matter in hand he discovered where the difficulty was, and the price of onions at once came down. There was a gentleman who really understood what his business was, and was really interested in producing results. All these matters which the Minister of Labour referred to are being dealt with in other countries and perhaps in no other country outside of Germany have prices gone up to the extent that they have gone up in Canada. As I said at the opening of my remarks, we in this country have to settle down to the conviction that nothing will be done to relieve the situation because the Minister of Labour either cannot or will not take action.

Mr. TURRIFF: I hope we shall not hear again hon. gentlemen opposite charging us on this side with wasting the time of the House, because thte Minister of Labour to-night has taken two hours simply to repeat, practically word for word, what he has already repeated in the House two or three times this session.

Mr. CROTHERS: You had better divide that in two.

Mr. TURRIFF: Whether my hon. friend wished to put us asleep, or out of business altogether, so that he could get his Estimates through I do not know, but the fact remains that though we have been sitting here for nearly four months and the high cost of living has been brought to the Minister's attention time and again in this House, not one single step has been taken by the minister to bring down to a reasonable level the price of any article of food used by the consumers of this country. Not a single thing has been accomplished. The minister indulged in a dissertation to-night about his Order in Council and his questionnaires. Why, any office boy would be dismissed if he sent out such a set of questions as the minister's. Since we have been discussing the cost of living in this House this session, the price of two main articles of food has practically doubled; I refer to flour and potatoes. All that the Minister of Labour has done has been to send Mr. O'Connor down to Montreal to ascertain the reason for the rise in the price of flour. After all these months have been wasted the minister tells us to-night that he does not know whether it is advisable to appoint a commission or a food controller to look into the whole question. He read his Order in Council clause by clause, and told us that everything was lovely, that prices were not too high, they could not be lower; and, as my hon. friend from Richmond says, he apologized for those who were manipulating the food supplies of this country and charging the people double prices. The Government apologizes for these food manipulators; it stands by them, and as much as says to them, "Go on, keep up the prices as high as the people of Canada will stand for. We will defend you on the floor of the House. We will not take any action to bring the prices down." That is the position of the Government tonight. The Minister of Labour says that nothing can be done. Certainly nothing is being done. I imagine this is the only country where the Government is absolutely powerless to do anything, and acknowledges it. Since this House met I venture to say that potatoes have doubled in price, and flour has almost doubled too. Did it cost any more to raise the potatoes that have been sold for such high prices in the last few months, than to raise the potatoes that were sold last fall? Did the wheat that produced the flour that brought from $13 to $15 a barrel only recently cost more to produce than the wheat that produced the flour that sold for $8 or $9 a barrel last fall? Not one cent. And yet this Government say they can do nothing to control the price of flour. In the meantime the people have to pay double the price for their bread. The Minister of Labour tells them he can do nothing. Everything is all right. The men who have been manipulating the market to the disadvantage of the labouring class and every other class have the sanction and even the benediction of this Government. The minister says: "It's all right, gentlemen; go ahead; squeeze the last cent out of the people who must have potatoes and bread." There is the position. And the bad feature of it, to my mind, is that the minister comes forward to-night and says: We can't do anything; everything is all right; the prices are moderate and you have to pay them: some time, after the war is over, some time in the future, dimly distant or near, conditions may change and food may be cheaper, but in the meantime nothing is being done and nothing can be done. Well, if the Government cannot do better than that, they ought to acknowledge that they are not capable for the job, and they ought to step down and out. No wonder they want a coalition. It is all well enough to discuss these matters here, but the millions of workers in Canada, who find it difficult to make ends meet and to provide food enough on their tables, see no possible prospect of anything better after the statement made by the Minister of Labour to-night. I think it is up to the Government, it is right up to the Prime Minister, to see that a change is made in the workings of the Department of Labour and that something is done to control and regulate the prices of food. One good able man in charge as a food controller would very soon stop the prices going up here, and in many cases would cut down prices that have been raised by means of manipulation, as has been the case with many food products. The minister tells us that nothing has been decided. After all these years and months they have not decided whether they will appoint a commission, or name a food controller, or do anything. Well, it is a poor lookout for the consumers of Canada when that is the position taken by the Government.

Mr. CROTHERS: If my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) could point to some country where a food controller, or commissioner of supplies, or government official of any kind, had reduced by his action the price of foodstuffs, it would be more to the point. But look on that picture and then on this. Until a few weeks ago the hon. gentleman was urging with great eloquence that wheat and flour should be permitted to go into the United States free because it was dearer there. Now, he finds fault with the price of potatoes because they have been allowed to go into that dearer market—

Mr. TURRIFF: I never mentioned potatoes—

Mr. CROTHERS: The hon. gentleman mentioned potatoes only a few moments ago. He complained that they have gone up in price. To a certain extent that is due to the fact that they have been shipped to the United States.

Mr. TURRIFF: I hope the hon. minister will allow me to put him right. I did not mention potatoes going to the United States.

Mr. CROTHERS: Then I beg his pardon; I thought he had said so. But we all know that potatoes have gone to the United States from Canada. And why? Because they are dearer there than here. Then, what about the food controller of the United States, who was to have reduced the price of everything in that country? But it is just the same old story—one day these hon. gentlemen are begging for conditions under which the farmer shall be able to get more for his wheat, and the next day attacking the Government because the farmer gets so much. It is the same effort to humbug the country. But it failed in 1911, and it fails now, and it will fail whenever it is tried.

Mr. MACDONALD: A little while ago the hon. minister was looking all over the world for somebody to tell him—

Mr. CROTHERS: I was asking the hon. gentleman to tell us some place where the prices of goods had been reduced.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the hon. gentleman will look at Australia he will find it there. There is a very ready remedy in the case of flour. We in Canada produce, possibly, 200,000,000 bushels of wheat, and our consumption is somewhere about 50,000,000 bushels. Why does not the Government undertake to commandeer the wheat that is necessary for our consumption in Canada at a fair price—

Mr. CROTHERS: Oh, certainly.

Mr. MACDONALD: Well, why don't they? —and deliver it at a fair price to the millers, and then regulate the handling of it by the millers, so that the people of Canada may get flour at a fair and proper figure?

Mr. CROTHERS: Would the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) agree to that?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD: Never mind the question—it is only the same old business of setting one opinion against another as a reason for doing nothing. What the people are concerned with, and what the hon. member for Assiniboia is concerned with, is how the plain people of this country are to get food at reasonable figures. The hon. minister talks about what the people will listen to and what they will not listen to. One thing they will not listen to is this veriest twaddle that the hon. minister has inflicted on this committee under pretense of dealing with the question of food prices. I say that, as to the price of the flour, it lies in the hands of this Government to commandeer the wheat necessary for consumption in Canada and to see to it that flour made from that wheat is delivered to the people at a proper price. That is a solution which any business man could work out.

Mr. CURRIE: There is nothing through which the poor people have suffered more than the high cost of coal, and I would like the hon. member (Mr. Macdonald), as a representative of the coal interests, to say whether he is willing that coal should be commandeered at so much a ton and sold to the people at a reasonable price?

Mr. MACDONALD: Why, certainly. If my hon. friend (Mr. Currie) thinks that this situation, serious as it is, can be met by a silly argument, or suggestion, of that kind, he is quite mistaken. I say that every article that enters into the home consumption of the plain people must be dealt with with a strong hand by this Government, and the country expects the Government so to deal with it.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman goes far afield from his own home for his illustration and argument on the subject of the high cost of living. He goes away to the Northwest and takes the case of wheat and flour. But why does not he speak on behalf of the poor people in his own province who were faced with the high prices of coal during this cold winter? I have never heard him raise his voice in a single word against the high price of coal until now when he has been challenged.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. member (Mr. Currie) has not been in the House very much this session; he has honoured us only occasionally—

Mr. CURRIE: I have been in constant attendance every day.

Mr. MACDONALD: Oh no, you have not. The hon. gentleman forgets just where he was. He need not worry about the consistency of my position in this matter; the problem of the high cost of living will not be met by any such argument as that.

Mr. CURRIE: There is no greater danger in this House than the presence of the hon. member (Mr. Macdonald), sitting here as he does, representing these coal interests, and yet he challenges the high cost of living. The people have paid high prices for coal in his own province and in Montreal. And why? Because the coal is charged for at two or three times former prices. But is the coal miner getting double or three times the pay he got before? No. The statements of the companies for which the hon. gentleman is solicitor show that he knows it.

Mr. MACDONALD: When the hon. gentleman talks about my being solicitor for companies, he makes a statement concerning which he knows nothing whatever and is absolutely unjustified and unwarranted. I will tell him whom I represent in this House. I represent three or four thousand coal miners, who have sent me here for twelve years to speak and act on their behalf.

Let me say to the hon. gentleman who comes here to wrestle with this problem and to indulge in personal matters of this kind, that the people of my constituency are aroused upon this question of the cost of living, they want some solution of it from this Government, and they will have it. The hon. gentleman speaks about the price of coal. The price of coal in the constituency from which I come is not greater than it should be, having regard to the wages that people should have in order to pay for the produce that is necessary to keep them alive. If the price of coal is greater in Montreal than it should be, and the minister laboured for over an hour to-night to show that it is not, all I have to say is that it is not the coal from Nova Scotia that is being consumed and for which this large price is being paid. Coal from Nova Scotia is not going to Montreal on account of the removal of facilities for getting it there. The coal consumed in Montreal is coal from the United States and not from Nova Scotia. Within the last three days I called the attention of the Government to the fact that it was impossible for Nova Scotia to send any coal to central Canada on account of the boats being removed. My hon. friend who always pretends to omniscience has something to learn in regard to that question. The price of coal in central Canada is not dependent on the price of coal in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. gentleman has just got right down to the point. I know where coal comes from that is supplied to that province, because I am a large purchaser of coal, and I know where the coal comes from that is supplied to the West. We have never heard the hon. gentleman who represents the coal interests of Nova Scotia ask the Government to take the duty off coal, although he is always hollering to have the duty taken off wheat and flour. Is he prepared to have the duty taken off soft coal? There is $5,000,000 paid every year by the farmers of the West for the duty on soft coal. Is he willing to forego that duty?

[Mr. Currie.]

Mr. MACDONALD: If my hon. friend wants to discuss the question, I will discuss it with him at the proper time. He talks about the coal consumed in Ontario. There is not a cent of duty on the anthracite coal consumed by the householder in Ontario.

Mr. CURRIE: Soft coal is very largely consumed in Ontario. The very bread that is baked in Ontario is baked with soft coal and that soft coal pays a duty of fifty cents a ton and more on account of the war. Yet, my hon. friend and his friends want to keep American coal out of Canada. Has he the honesty to say: I will forego the duty on coal if you will forego the duty on wheat? There is the East and there is the West in this country. My hon. friend represents the East. We have never heard him say a word about the duty on coal. He is quite willing to have somebody else's wool cut, but he is not willing to have his own, and he cuts a very sorry figure on this question.

Mr. MACDONALD: This is not the first time the hon gentleman has cut a sorry figure since he came back. It is very easy for my hon. friend to get up and try to create a diversion in order to help the Minister of Labour out of a hole. The Minister of Labour has signally and absolutely failed in his duty in dealing with this problem of the high cost of living. My hon. friend the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) need not think that in getting up and getting excited he is going to divert the attention of this committee, or this country, or this Parliament, from the main question before them as to whether the Minister of Labour has not absolutely and ignominiously failed in dealing with this great problem before the Canadian people.

Mr. CURRIE: The West needs coal and has to have soft coal and I ask my hon. friend now if he will be willing to have the duty taken off soft coal. We are anxious to know.

Mr. MACDONALD: If I had the responsibility I would deal with this question. My hon. friend is supporting a Government that has to deal with it and if my hon. friend wants the duty taken off coal he had better go to them to have it taken off. It is not the question of duty that is the issue here. It is the matter of price control in regard to which this minister has failed.

Mr. KNOWLES: The fact remains that, as my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has stated, there is a great need that something should be done in regard to this question of the high cost of living. What did we learn from the minister? The only thing we did learn was that nothing has been done and nothing will be done. That is all we ever have learned from the Minister of Labour. To-night he gives an exhibition which, in the classic words of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), might simply be described as bosh, an expression that seems to be parliamentary because it was used by the Minister of Railways not four days ago. The Minister of Railways and Canals has the advantage over the Minister of Labour in that he says more in less time and inflicts less suffering on those who have to listen to him than does the Minister of Labour. If the minister never laboured before, he might to-night be called the labouring minister. I do not know whether the minister endeavoured to obstruct his own estimates or not. If that was his purpose he succeeded absolutely. The Opposition is sometimes accused of trying to obstruct a minister's estimates but the hon. gentleman to-night obstructed his own estimates. His only purpose must have been to endeavour to tire us out so that rather than be penalized by the infliction of a speech such as he gave us we would allow his estimates to go through and get home out of here. But, we do not look at it in that way, and I am the less inclined to look at it in that way because of the outstanding way in which the minister deals with the whole question. Our complaint always has been that the hon. gentleman's friends, the middlemen, are making an improper and exorbitant profit, and we say that it is his duty to protect the producer at the one end and the consumer at the other, and to see that there is not an unjust tribute extracted by these middlemen. What does my hon. friend say? He says that the people of Canada in 1911 decided that the middlemen should be protected. If his words mean that, I say that the people of Canada decided no such thing in 1911.

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say that.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. gentleman stated as clearly as he stated anything that in 1911 the people decided for the very things he contended for, and against the things which we contended for. I make the statement that the people of Canada in 1911 did not decide what he says they decided. The people in his own riding wanted the Farmers' Bank subscribers paid, and he appealed to them on that issue and made promises, and on that he was elected. The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) was elected on the ne temere cry, and the Eucharistic Conference and all these cries were heard throughout Ontario and Quebec. The minister laughs just as he has always done ever since he took the position he holds, and which carries with it the duty of looking after the interests of labour and the interests of the consumer. He laughs as over a joke, although he holds this important position, and he gives no reason, no explanation when his delinquencies in regard to serious matters are brought to his attention. I say again that in 1911 the people of Canada did not decide that they desired that the middlemen should be protected. They did not decide that there should be less of a gap or spread between the producer and the ultimate consumer, because that issue in Ontario and Quebec was carefully kept away from them and was not made an issue of the election. The people decided to vote for the Minister of Labour because they wished their deposit money returned and their subscriptions in the Farmers' Bank cancelled. Yet, he tells us that they decided the trade question in 1911. Again, to use the classic words of his colleague, that is nothing but "bosh." What does the minister tells us in regard to this question of the high cost of living? It is a serious condition of affairs, says the minister. The minister has a dual responsibility, because he has the guardianship of the protected interests and the labour interests. Did my hon. friend protect the interests of the consumer? What did he say to my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) and my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) when they asked him when there was going to be some relief? He said, After the war is over you can buy cane sugar at the same old figure. Is that not a bright prospect to hold out to the people? What is the use of his regulations number, 13, 15, 14, 4 or 6, or whatever numeral it may be? He says hope springs eternal in the human breast, and we hope that some day the war will be over and that we will get back to old prices. Last year we did not think the war was going to be over, although some of us indulged in the hope that it would.

Mr. CROTHERS: All I was talking about —and I think my hon. friend from Moosejaw knows it—when I was speaking to my hon. friend from Westmorland, was freight.

Mr. KNOWLES: Really, I do not know.

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, that is the question he asked, when we were going to get any relief for tonnage.

Mr. COPP: No, not at all, that was not the question I asked.

Mr. CROTHERS: Hansard will show it is.

Mr. COPP: If Hansard shows that, it is absolutely wrong, because that is not what I asked.

Mr. CROTHERS: I remember quite well.

Mr. KNOWLES: I admit that freight has as close a relation to the question that was put to him as the Farmers Bank has to Reciprocity, and that is about as close as we expect the minister to get to anything. He does say, however, that when the war is over things will come back to normal and we can buy sugar and other things at the old prices. What is the good of wasting money on all these post cards that he has? What is the good of filling the department up with a lot of information such as he read to us in his most entertaining and fascinating style to-night? It is thrilling to listen to him, a rare treat to hear an address such as we heard, regulation 6, regulation 3, regulation 5, but that is not going to reduce the price of food even in the Minister's own estimation, and I think if he cannot seriously address himself to this problem, he should stop trifling with it. He laid down a principle I was sorry to hear him enunciate, because I do not want the minister to go so far that the Government would let him out. It would be a great loss to us on this side if anything happened to him. One of the greatest friends we have, in a political sense, is my hon. friend, especially among the labour people; a real asset is my hon. friend, and we certainly would not want to lose him. But I think if, I understood him his position is that he makes Orders in Council, puts them through, has them approved of by His Excellency, and then he says to the provinces: You go on and execute this and see that it is obeyed. If I understand him aright that is his position. If that is his position, the people of Canada may as well know that he is just trifling with this very serious state of affairs, just trifling, laughing again, because that is all he is doing if he does not address himself to the enforcement of these regulations and the actual bringing about of what he wishes to accomplish. Suppose the Minister of Customs took that attitude, that he simply passed his regulations or laws declaring that it is a criminal offence to smuggle, and then left the provincial governments to get after the smugglers and enforce the law. He would soon find that the customs revenue decreased and that the customs laws were not enforced. And may I not say the same of the Finance Minister? If he did not see that the banks and insurance companies behaved themselves, the result would be very serious. It is a common thing for him to make them obey the laws that have been put in force. And so, with the war upon us, with this great crisis upon us with regard to exorbitant prices, the Minister of Labour has not discharged his duty, not one-quarter discharging it, when he has merely made an Order in Council and has said: I am not going to do anything to have it enforced. I appeal to the minister to use some of the machinery in his department —and a very good department it is in many ways and no doubt he has many excellent officials, and no doubt he himself has a good fundamental knowledge of how it should be administered, through his legal training—I appeal to him to use some of that machinery and to say that from now on he will not only make the laws but compel people to obey them, and not say that it is up to the provincial governments. That does not satisfy the people of Canada. He does not do his department or the Government of which he is a member justice by saying: we will pass an Order in Council and let the provinces enforce it or not as they please. This is a matter of Federal concern and Federal administration, as well as Federal legislation.

My hon. friend also made reference to the food control in the United States. I do not think his reference was a very happy one because the food control in the United States has been appointed, and has been so lately appointed that you could not expect results from its appointment. But the very fact that in the United States they have decided to appoint a food controller shows that they are proceeding to do what they can to control exorbitant prices. But the Minister of Labour here has not decided that he will even take such a step as that. I say that so lately has the food controller in the United States, Mr. Hoover, been appointed, that there is no help to the minister in making such a comparison.

My main motive in rising is to urge the minister not only to make the legislation, Orders in Council and Acts of Parliament, but really to enforce them; and I am sure that he will find the provincial governments willing to co-operate, on whichever side of politics they may be, and in that way some good really may be achieved. I ask the minister if he will not take into consideration the matter of not only enacting these pieces of legislation but of enforcing them throughout Canada.

Mr. COPP: I certainly was much disappointed to realize that it is absolutely impossible to get any assistance from any agency with reference to the high cost of living as we have it to-day in Canada. The Minister of Labour says that hope springs eternal in the human breast. I still have hope that the minister is not expressing the absolute, decided, policy of the Government in doing nothing with regard to this very important matter. I am not here to quarrel with the Minister of Labour in regard to his department or his laxity here, there or elsewhere. But I do want to impress upon the Minister of Labour and upon the Government of this country the seriousness of the condition of affairs throughout Canada with regard to the high cost of living as it affects the ordinary common people of this country. When my hon. friend tells me, and I presume seriously, that it is absolutely impossible to reduce the price of coal to be sold and delivered to the common people of the city of St. John and other sections of distribution in my own province in the coming winter for less than $15 or $20 a ton—

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Would you allow the rich people to have it at the same price?

Mr. COPP: Yes.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: My hon. friend is not a demagogue?

Mr. COPP: I am not a demagogue. I say on behalf of the ordinary poor people of this country that if the rich man can afford to pay $15 or $20 for coal, I have not the same sympathy with him as I have with the poor people who cannot pay that price. And I can say to the hon. gentleman, and I say it as sincerely as I ever spoke, that if, during the coming winter, a number of the common people in the city of St. John and the city of Halifax and other cities throughout Canada have to pay $15 or $20 a ton for the coal which they burn, they are facing a coal famine in this country; and if they have to pay $15 and $16 and $17 a barrel for their flour, they are facing starvation. I still hope that the Minister of Labour and the Government of which he is a responsible member may yet see their way clear to change their view and do something. The day is not too late and the time not too far spent for them to do something in the interests of the people who must suffer during the coming year unless something is done to decrease the cost of living in Canada. I am not here to talk politics.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COPP: No. My hon. friends laugh. I am not here to talk politics in regard to this matter. I am speaking on behalf of men and families under the conditions throughout this country, and I know those conditions and hon. gentlemen opposite know them. I venture to say that there are a number of hon. gentlemen opposite who will agree with me that unless something can be done to decrease the cost of living in Canada a very large number of people are going to feel it and feel it very severely. I do on behalf of these people ask the Minister of Labour and the Government yet to consider carefully if some action cannot be taken that will, in some small degree, assist the people in regard to the reduction of the cost of living.

Mr. McKENZIE: The increase in the price of coal in Montreal and elsewhere in Canada is due, not to the putting up of the price by the coal companies, but to the increase in the cost of transportation, over which the man who produces the coal has no control. The Dominion Coal Company and the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company had steamers carrying their coal at reasonable cost, but these steamers have been taken from them and the coal is now put on board cars, the man who takes it away paying the cost of transportation. The coal producers should not be blamed for the cost of transportation.

Mr. CROTHERS: I was speaking of exclusively anthracite coal.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that even soft coal is extraordinarily expensive in some places. Steps should be taken to yard large quantities of coal at Montreal, St. John and other places. The member for Westmorland points out that a serious condition faces the people in the province of New Brunswick. When a grave condition prevailed in 1905, in the matter of hay, the Government came to the assistance of the people in Nova Scotia by giving them free transportation of hay from Mont-

11 p.m. real and other places in the West, for which they were very grateful. I will not object to any expenditure the Government may make in an effort to prevent famine. If there is to be conscription of men, no better conscription could be had than that of having the men work in the coal mines and produce enough coal to make the supply plentiful. Ample quantities of coal are available for mining; we have railway facilities under our control, and the question of the supply of coal is not a serious one if properly handled. Pulp, for instance, is no more a natural product of our country than is flour. Everything that enters into the production of pulp is found in our own country, and the same may be said of flour. It was alleged that the price of newsprint had gone beyond a proper figure, and the Government, under the War Measures Act, cut down the price to what the producers of the commodity say is too small a figure. If it is proper to cut down the price of newsprint, why not cut down the price of flour to a proper figure? If they are charging too much for wheat, why not cut down the price? If they are charging too much for milling, why not cut down the price and enable the people to obtain the staff of life at a reasonable figure? I appeal to the minister on behalf of thousands of coal miners, fishermen, lumbermen and farmers, who cannot get flour without paying $17 a barrel for it. When they were paying $6 and $7 a barrel for flour, the price was regarded as high; I do not know how they will be able to obtain sufficient flour at $17 a barrel. It would not be so bad if the minister could say that he had investigated the price of wheat and the conditions surrounding its milling, transportation and sale, and could announce that it was impossible to sell it at a lower price. But this is not the case. We were told not long ago that over a hundred million bushels of wheat were stored in various places throughout Canada. Before long we shall have a new crop. Is it not extraordinary that with that large quantity of wheat on hand, and with the prospect of another abundant crop in the near future, the price of wheat and flour should be so high? The matter of news print has been dealt with; why not take some steps in the matter of potatoes, flour, butter, fish or any of the other necessaries of life for which we are now paying too much? Why not bring the prices down within the reach of the poor man; or, at any rate, be able to tell him that we have done the best we could? The evidence submitted by the minister is not enough to satisfy me that proper effort has been made to make the necessaries of life as cheap to the poor man as possible, under the extraordinary conditions that now prevail. Arguments advanced in times of peace, plenty, happiness and contentment, are not applicable to these terms of stress and strain. Action on the part of the Government must be suited to present conditions. The people must be protected, even if, after the war is over, we should have to pay the men from whom we took the wheat, flour and other commodities for the benefit of the people. But do not let there be any suffering amongst the labouring classes and the poorer classes in this country if there is anything in the power of Parliament and of the people that can divert that suffering or produce better conditions.

Mr. CROTHERS: The proposition of the hon. member for North Cape Breton that we should get information and lay it before the members of this House and the people of this country is quite a reasonable one. It is only a few months since this Order in Council was passed. I have here a full report regarding the conditions as to the price of sugar, I have another in regard to anthracite coal, and perhaps my hon. friend heard me say that we had in process of preparation other reports concerning flour, the canneries and cold storage. I am going to lay all these on the Table; others will follow just as soon as we can have them completed, and we shall secure a great deal of useful information from every one of these reports.

Mr. LOGGIE: When the minister was telling us about the price of anthracite coal, I understood him to say that the reason for coal being so much dearer at St. John was the fact that the coastwise freight was $5—

Mr. CROTHERS: That was one item.

Mr. LOGGIE:—and also that coal was very dear at New York city. The minister gave that as a reason why coal was so much dearer at St. John than at Montreal. Am I correct?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes.

Mr. LOGGIE: That seems to me rather a far-fetched excuse. I do not doubt as to the facts of a particular case that may have happened in that way, but, as a matter of fact, to take coal from the pit-head to St. John cannot cost but very little more than to take it from the pit-head to Montreal; and if that be true, how can the minister make that an excuse for coal being so much dearer at St. John than at Montreal, if the rail freight from pit-head to St. John is practically the same as from pit-head to Montreal?

Mr. CROTHERS: The coal is not taken by rail at all.

Mr. LOGGIE: That can be done. People can buy it at New York. I beg to differ in a way from the minister. As a matter of fact, I know that until last year we never got a car of anthracite coal in my town; but last year we got anthracite coal by rail, and I cannot see why anthracite coal cannot be laid down at St. John by rail at practically as low a price as it can be laid down at Montreal. The difference the minister stated as to the values at St. John and Montreal is not real in fact; it may be so in some special case, but it is not as to actual value, because there is no good reason for such a difference. The difference in mileage is very small, and there is first-class railway communication west direct from St. John. I therefore cannot understand why there should be any great difference in the cost of haulage between the pit-head and St. John and between the pit-head and Montreal.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member knows that the rate from the coal mines in Pennsylvania to Montreal is governed by the water rate from Cleveland to Montreal, and that if he takes coal straight by rail to St. John, the freight is higher. If the hon. member is a shipper, he ought to know that fact.

Mr. GRAHAM: A little earlier in the evening a matter came up with reference to the application of the fair wage clause to the Imperial Munitions Board contracts, and some hon. members wish to discuss that question. As the only way we can discuss it is by keeping an item open, I would suggest that we let all go through except one.

Mr. CROTHERS: Leave the last one.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir Robert Borden moved:

That Sessional Paper No. 183, laid on the table of the House on the 1st June, instant, comprising reports from the several departments of the Government in respect to printing, etc., pursuant to a resolution of the House of the 18th May, 1916, be referred to the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament.

He said: The C mmittee on Printing last year made a very full report with regard to printing, and poir ted out that a saving in expenditure might be effected in several directions, which they enumerated. That report was referred to the several departments of the Government with a direction that as soon as possible after the opening of the next session a report or memorandum should be laid on the Table indicating to what extent it might be possible to carry out the recommendations of the committee, and in what respect, if any, those recommendations were not feasible. The reports of the several departments have been received and laid on the Table, and it is now proposed to refer them to the committee which initiated the matter.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I remember perfectly well the report on printing which was presented by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) last year. I thought at the time that it contained some very important suggestions which, if followed, would result in a saving to a very considerable degree. I have not yet seen the Sessional Paper laid on the Table on the 1st instant, and I would ask my right hon. friend to let his motion stand over until tomorrow.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Certainly.

Motion stands.

MINISTER OF MINES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM: For some reason I have received several telegrams urging the establishment of a separate portfolio of mines with a minister at its head, two of them, I think, coming from officials of the Mining Institute. W(uld my right hon.

friend say whether the Government are considering taking any action in that regard?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really have not given very much consideration to that in the immediate past. My hon. friend's experience in receiving telegrams on that subject is not an unusual one, for I have received a very great many communications on the subject myself during the last three or four years.

Mr. GRAHAM: But why should I get them?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Query.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Coming events.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I must permit my hon. friend to make any conjecture on that subject that he thinks desirable.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would direct the attention of the House to Order No. 21, referring to Bill No. 56 to amend the Bank Act. I introduced this Bill some little time ago. It has received its first reading and now stands on the Order Paper for its second. After introducing the Bill I found that it had been the practice to proceed with a matter of this kind, which is connected with Trade and Commerce, by resolution in the first instance. The same Bill now appears under Order No. 26, as Bill No. 65. I therefore beg to move:

That the order for the second reading of Bill No. 56, to amend the Bank Act, be discharged and the said Bill be withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the Government under consideration at the present time any measure looking to the national prohibition of the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage? Has the Government received certain communications which have been sent members? One letter stated that the legislation was to be introduced this session.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) has under consideration some suggestions that have been made to him on behalf of organizations throughout the country respecting an amendment of the Act which was passed last year. It is very likely that the suggestions placed before him embraced the wider question to which my hon. friend (Mr. Marcil) has referred. But with respect to both these matters, I am not in a position to make any announcement at this time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

SECOND AND THIRD DIVISIONS OF THE SERVICE

On motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Blain in the Chair:

Resolved,—That it is expedient

1. To repeal subsection two of section twenty-six of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, and provide that any person placed in the Third Division upon the coming into force of that Act, and who had theretofore passed the Qualifying Examination, may be promoted from the Third Division to the Second Division by the Governor in Council upon the recommendation of the head of the Department based upon the report in writing of the deputy head.

2. That sections twenty-nine and thirty and subsection one of section thirty-two of the said Act be repealed and that it be provided that in the Second Division the minimum and maximum salaries shall be as follows:—

In subdivision A, $1,600 to $2,100;
In subdivision B, $1,000 to $1,600;

that in the Third Division the minimum and maximum salaries shall be as follows:—

In subdivision B, $500 to $1,000;
In subdivision A, $1,000 to $1,300;

and that the minimum and maximum salaries for the positions of messenger, porter, sorter and packer and such other positions in the lower grades as are determined by the Governor in Council shall be $500 and $1,000 respectively.

3. That it be provided that the Governor in Council may grant an increase of one hundred dollars to any clerk in the Third Division of the Inside Service of the Civil Service and to any person holding any of the positions mentioned in section thirty-two of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, who

(a) is reported by the deputy head to be deserving of such increase; and
(b) is in receipt of a salary of less than one thousand dollars.

4. That it be provided that any person now serving in either the Second or Third Division of the Inside Service whose salary is less than the minimum salary for such division as proposed by the second of the preceding Resolutions shall have his salary increased to such minimum.

5. That it be provided that all increases granted under legislation to be based upon the third and fourth of the preceding Resolutions shall take effect from the first day of April, one thousand nine hundred and seventeen.

6. That it be provided that nothing in the legislation to be based upon these Resolutions shall prevent any person from receiving any annual or other increase that may be granted to him under any other Act.

7. That it be provided that any payments or increases authorized by any legislation based upon these resolutions be payable out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Owing to the conditions which have prevailed for some time past, and which have been accentuated during the last few months of the war, it has been considered expedient to bring down legislation to provide for the increases and other changes set forth in this resolution. When I placed the resolution upon the Order Paper, I was under the impression that under section 33 of the Civil Service Act it would be open to the Government to grant a minimum salary of more than $500. I find that that is not quite a correct understanding of the position, and I therefore have to suggest an amendment to provide that the minimum salary in subdivision A of the Third Division be $600 instead of $500. This minimum salary of $600 will also apply to the messenger, porter, sorter and packer class referred to in one of the provisions of the Civil Service Act. I have a further amendment to propose with regard to those in the Second Division, to the effect that the annual increase be $100 instead of $50 as at present provided. Substantially what is proposed is this: In the Third Division, the salaries in subdivision A, which are now from $900 to $1,200, will be from $1,000 to $1,300; and in subdivision B, where the salaries now are from $500 to $800, they will be from $600 to $1,000. We further provide, with respect to the messengers, porters, sorters, packers, and certain other positions in the lower grades determined by the Governor General in Council under the Civil Service Act, that the minimum and maximum shall be $600 and $1,000 respectively. It is further provided, in order to meet conditions as to the higher cost of living, that the Government may grant an increase of $100 to any clerk in the Third Division of the Inside Service, or to any person holding any other position mentioned in Section 32 of the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1908,—that is, messenger, sorter, or packer—who is reported by the deputy head to be deserving of such increase, and who has now a salary of less than $1,000.

The legislation will also provide that any person now serving in the Third Division of the Inside Service, whose salary is less than the minimum salary for such division, as proposed by these resolutions, shall have his salary increased to such minimum. That is, if a clerk is getting $500 he goes to $600, as that is the minimum which we provide. We propose further that the increases granted under this legislation shall take effect from April 1 last—that is they shall begin with the present fiscal year.

In order to meet what has been regarded by the Service and the Government as a grievance on the part of certain of the Service in the Third Division, who had passed the qualifying examination prior to the enactment of the present Civil Service Act, we provide that they may be promoted from the Third Division to the Second Division, upon the report in writing of the deputy head. I shall, if required, explain that more in detail when the section concerning it is under consideration by the committee. In order to provide for the amendments I have indicated, I beg to lay upon the Table the resolution in full, with the changes which I have suggested—namely, the minimum salary raised from $500 to $600 in respect to those I have named; and an increase of $100 per annum instead of $50 per annum in the Second Division.

Mr. MURPHY: Would the minister be kind enough to explain the application of subsection 6 of the resolution?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That means that they proceed as they do now, getting the annual increase to which they are entitled under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MURPHY: It will not prevent them from receiving any other increase?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. For example, a clerk receiving $600 will receive his $50 increase and he will receive in addition to that, if deserving, as I assume all or nearly all would be, $100; so that he will receive $750 or $150 over and above what he is getting now.

Mr. MURPHY: The phraseology seems to indicate some other Act than the Civil Service Act "under any other Act."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This will be the Act—the amending Act. The intention is that the present provisions of the Civil Service Act will continue to apply.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the minister be good enough to tell the House what the letter carriers will get by this resolution?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This applies to the Inside Service. I understand that the case of the letter carriers is under consideration by the Postmaster General. I stated some time ago that in so far as the Inside Service is concerned, we should deal with it by legislation and that in so far as the Outside Service is concerned, the matter would be dealt with in the Supplementary Estimates. Provision will have to be made in the Supplementary Estimates to the extent of the amount necessary to take care of the recommendations of the ministers with respect to the Outside Service.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the labouring classes, the carpenters, electricians and others receive absolutely nothing under this resolution?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This resolution is an amendment to the present Civil Service Act. Being an amending Act, it does not cover more than is covered by the present Civil Service Act. The case of those in the Outside Service as distinguished from the Inside Service will be dealt as it is now dealt with under existing legislation in the Estimates and upon the recommendation of the minister. Take, for example, a customs official; the Minister of Customs may bring before the Treasury Board, and through the Treasury Board to Council, a recommendation that $50 or $100 be added to the salary of that customs official. The money to pay for that increase is provided for in the Estimates. The Outside Service is always dealt with on the recommendation of the ministers through the Treasury Board by Council and by Parliament by assenting to the votes, which are contained each year in the Estimates.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does not the minister think that the better way to meet the increased cost of living would be by giving the Service all round a bonus of $100 and by raising the yearly increases from $50 to $100?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are many considerations arising in connection with this question. In the first place, there is a desire on the part of all of us to do justice to the Civil Service. On the other hand, we cannot lose sight of the public. The salaries of the civil servants run from $500 to $5,000. When we get up to salaries ranging from $2,000 to $3,000 and $4,000, they are fairly substantial as compared with salaries outside. It is in connection with the lower grades of the Service that the pinch comes. I think we must have regard to public opinion. I should doubt as to whether public opinion would be favourable to a wholesale increase in the salaries of civil servants. We have thought that we have reasonably met the situation—and I believe the Civil Service feel that we have done so—in dealing with the Third Division and with the Second Division by increasing the minimum and the maximum in the Third Division, by providing for annual increases of $100 instead of $50 in the Second Division and by dealing with messengers, sorters and packers in the way I have indicated. Having given the whole matter a great deal of consideration and having been in consultation with the representatives of the Civil Service, unless I am entirely misinformed, I think I am safe in saying that this Bill will substantially meet the situation as far as the Inside Service is concerned with which it purposes to deal. This does not mean that the Outside Service will not be dealt with. We are introducing legislation for the purpose of amending the existing Civil Service Act which applies only to the Inside Service and which is necessary to meet present conditions.

Mr. DEVLIN: There is only one more point and I shall have finished. I have received several communications in connection with this resolution and a good many along this line. Here is a man who writes to me and says that he was appointed in 1902, that he passed the qualifying examination in 1904, that in 1906 he was appointed to the junior second class, and that in the spring of 1908 he passed the promotion examination. In the spring of 1908 he had all the papers necessary for his appointment to the senior second class settled, but owing to a delay caused by the Treasury Board they were left on the shelf too long. The result was that on September 1, 1908, the Civil Service Act was passed and his papers were of no value. He was classed, as he then was, as a junior second class clerk and went automatically into class A of the third division. He was then getting $1,150. He got the $150 increase that was given to all the service at that time, but that only benefited him by the sum of $50, as that put him to the maximum of $1,200. He represents that he has lost $2,000 since.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: You mean that he cannot take the examination that would take him out?

Mr. DEVLIN: No. This particular man whose letter I read is in charge of a branch. He has a secretary and four clerks working under him and the clerks are receiving a higher salary than he gets. Others in the same department who have been working there 20 years are getting $1,200. I understand there are some such in the Post Office Department, others in the Interior Department, and others, again, in other departments. Will this resolution benefit that class in any way?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend will observe the first section of the resolution he will see that we propose to provide that any person placed in the third division upon the coming into force of the Civil Service Act, and who theretofore had passed the qualifying examination, may be promoted from the third to the second division by the Governor General in Council upon the recommendation of the head of the department, based upon a request in writing from the deputy head.

Mr. PUGSLEY: At what salary would he go in? At the minimum, he gets $1,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. The point is this: when the Civil Service Act was passed in 1908 there were men in the Civil Service who had passed the qualifying examination and some the promotion examination. I believe I am within the mark in stating that the Government of the day did not intend that these men should be obliged to pass an academic examination to qualify them for higher positions. Nevertheless, on account of the attitude taken towards the legislation by the Civil Service Commission, men in that class have found themselves obliged either to take the academic examination or to remain in that class, no matter what their office qualifications might be.

Now there are many men who have passed the age at which they could get up the work necessary to pass a stiff academic examination, quite the equivalent of university matriculation. I doubt very much if there is a man in this House who to-day could pass the matriculation examination, or even the entrance examination to the high school. I do not believe there is a man here who could pass the matriculation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would not emphasize that too much.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I doubt if even the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) could pass the matriculation examination. I do not mean to say that if he applied his intelligence, great as we know it to be, to study for say six months or a year he would not be able to get through—barely get through.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Does not my hon. friend think that the hon. member for St. John would persuade the examiners that he had passed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, I think if he tried to pass he would manage in some way to pass. At all events, it has seemed to us that this constitutes a real hardship. I am not blaming the Civil Service Commission. I am not passing any censure on them. No doubt they are discharging their duty as they see it, but it does seem to me that it is a real hardship that those men who had been in the service prior to the passing of the legislation should be forced to pass an academic examination to get out of that class, notwithstanding that they might be exceedingly competent in the duties of their office. Without elaborating too much on that, I may say that I have looked up the matter and I find that in all Civil Service legislation passed prior to that date, the rights of those in the service were observed; and, further than that, I may say that, so far as I can gather from the debates, it was not the intention of the late Government that these men should be compelled to pass an academic examination in order to get out of that class. In proof of that I propose to read to the House one or two extracts from Hansard. For example, the Hon. Mr. Fisher, who I believe had charge of the Bill, said in the debates of the session of 1908, on page 11378:

> The Civil Service is to-day established on certain lines; the men who have entered the Civil Service have entered it on certain conditions and are entitled to the consideration due to those who are in the place which they have attained to under certain laws, rules and regulations. We are proposing a new and more difficult entrance to the Civil Service, but we have to recognize the rights of those who are to-day in the service.

And then in the Senate Sir Mackenzie Bowell, at page 1600 of the debates of 1908, referring to the third class clerks, asked:

> Will that officer be compelled to go before the new Commission and be examined again before he can be promoted?

The Hon. Mr. Scott, representing the Government in the Senate, replied:

> I think not. It would not be fair. I do not think the Bill is intended to be ex post facto; it is intended to be prospective. The Act will not go into force until September, because it will take some time to organize under it. It is quite impossible to fathom exactly where it will lead to, but I think I am quite safe in saying that an official who is now qualified for promotion could not be disturbed.

Then, Mr. Fisher, in dealing with the provision of the Civil Service Act which provided that men of this class might be eligible for promotion with or without examination, said:

> With or without examination, as is determined by the regulations of the commission.

Then he goes on to say:

> The principle adopted is to leave to the Commission the way in which they would obtain their information on which to base their certificate of qualification. They may do that on the record of the clerks in the department without making any examination, and they might on it give a certificate of qualification for a promotion. Or they might not think that conclusive, and they might prefer to hold an examination. They might also think it better to hold a competitive examination. They would not hold a competitive examination unless the head of the department nominated two or three different clerks in it for promotion.

It is perfectly clear to me that when the Civil Service Act was brought down, following the practice that had been adopted in previous legislation of the sort, it was the intention of the Government that those who were in the third class in the Service should be eligible for promotion without having to pass a stiff examination, that is to say, if they had passed the qualifying examination. There has undoubtedly been a great deal of feeling in the Civil Service that there has been an injustice to that class. I think there is substantial ground for that feeling. I do not pass any adverse criticism upon the Civil Service Commission. They, no doubt, as I have said, are carrying out their duties as they think they ought, but the fact remains that under that Civil Service Act a number of very capable men have been denied promotion because they have not been able to take the academic examination. I have taken the trouble to make inquiry among deputies on whose judgment I feel I can rely, and they tell me there are many cases indeed of hardship in which men such as the man referred to by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, well qualified men, cannot get out of that class because they cannot take a stiff academic examination.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How would this work out? I know a man who has been thirty years in one of the departments in the position the minister speaks of. He has three boys, I believe at the front. He is getting $1,200 after thirty years' service, being at the maximum of the third division. Under the resolution of my hon. friend, as I understand it, he can be promoted to the second division. That is the intention. But where would he go in the second division? You see the minimum of the second division, subdivision B, is $1,000. If he goes into the second division, unless the minister makes some provision, he cannot go in at a higher salary than he is now receiving, $1,200. Therefore, though he would get an increase in the future, he would get no immediate increase, and I understood one idea the minister had, in view of the present condition of affairs, was to give these junior clerks some immediate advantage to the extent of a couple of hundred dollars.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Up to $1,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is not intended to go beyond that? Then the case of the clerks to whom I referred and whom my hon. friend has in mind—there are seventy or eighty of these who have been a long time in the service—would get no immediate benefit. The only advantage would be that they would get promoted to subdivision B of the second division without passing an academic examination.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is the only benefit these men would get.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The benefit they get is that if they are recommended by the head of the department and by the minister, they are put in precisely the same position as if they had passed an academic examination. In other words, they are eligible for promotion as positions are vacant to which they may be promoted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They get no immediate benefit.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They get no immediate benefit except this, that if they remain in the third division, we have extended the maximum of the third division, as my hon. friend will observe, to $1,300.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Can the minister say approximately to how many individuals these resolutions would apply and how many in each class; and also the total amount approximately of the increase in the Budget under these resolutions?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will try to find out how many are in the Third Division and how many are in the class which we have just been discussing, namely, those who were in the service prior to 1908. My recollection is that about 400 who were in that class prior to 1908 may now be eligible for promotion if recommended by the deputy minister and the minister, without passing an academic examination. I will have the information when we are in committee after the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why should not a man who is by this measure promoted from the Third to the Second Division, and who has been for years at the maximum salary of $1,200, receive the new maximum of $1,300?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think we could provide for that in the Estimates.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would not do that; I would make it general.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would not think it desirable to lay down a general rule as to the amount a person should receive upon moving from the Third to the Second Division. Under the present Act the salaries of those in the Third Division run from $500 to $1,200, and in the Second Division from $800 to $2,100. The same anomaly, therefore, if there is an anomaly, exists under the present legislation; it has never been drawn to my attention that there was any hardship. I am rather of the opinion that promotion could take place to an equivalent salary in the Second Division; I will look into that point.

Mr. MORPHY: The minister has not been been any too generous to what might be called the under-class of the service. Having regard to the present cost of living, I do not see how any one, especially if he be a married man with children, can live on $600 a year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We are giving him more.

Mr. MORPHY: You are giving him more if he deserves it and if it is within the power of some one to say that he deserves it. I think the minimum salary might reasonably have been placed, without any qualification, at $800. If a man in the service is any good at all, he should get at least that amount. at all events during the time through which we are now passing. Further, I apprehend that in the Inside Service there are many young single men, physically fit, who ought to be at the front. Does the minister give me to understand that these men are to receive increases under this proposed legislation? Is the measure to be applied to men who, instead of fighting their country's battles, are staying here and drawing their salaries while the boys are dying at the front? And does this increase apply to the men who bravely went from the Civil Service to the front? Are they watched and protected? Does the fact that they have gone to the front prejudice their position? These things appeal to me very strongly. I could not help but feel impressed that this measure would have the effect of raising the salaries of some young men who should be doing their share in the country's cause. If I am wrong, I should like to be put right, but these are my sentiments and I think that they are deserving of consideration by the Government.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend regards the minimum salary of $600 as too small. Some of those who entered the service are quite competent, others are entirely untrained. Very often these are young girls.

Mr. MORPHY: Messengers, packers and sorters are not young girls.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am speaking of the third division; I will speak later of the class referred to by my hon. friend. In the opinion of some of the ablest deputies whom I have consulted about the matter, even $500 is a fair salary, having regard to conditions that prevail outside, for many at least of the young people who come into the service, and who have no practical training. On the other hand, that amount is, of course, not enough for a grown man, especially one who has a family, to subsist upon. We are regardful of that situation, and even at the risk of paying $600 to some of those whom I have mentioned—young, unqualified, not practically trained—we have determined, in view of the prevailing cost of commodities of all kinds, to make $600 the minimum salary for the third division. This, of course, applies to those clerks of whom I have been speaking. We have provided further—and I think this will apply to practically all in the third division—that for the present year the Governor in Council may give them $100 to meet the existing conditions. In addition to that, they get the annual increase of $50 provided by the statute, so that a clerk who is now getting $600 will receive this year $750.

Mr. MORPHY: May receive, I should say, if he has somebody to get him a proper entré.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think that the ministers can be depended upon to see that the Act is fairly administered. We are establishing at $600 the minimum salary of that class, which includes messengers, packers and sorters, and the maximum at $1,000. The existing legislation provides a minimum salary of $500 and a maximum salary of $800. They also receive the $100 increase and the statutory increase of $50 as well, so that a messenger who received $600 last year will receive $750 this year. As to safeguarding the rights of those who have gone overseas, I think that there are Orders in Council which have regard to those rights. It goes without saying that anyone who is overseas and whose position is being preserved for him must, when he comes back, be given as good a position as he had when he went away.

Mr. MORPHY: The minister thinks there are Orders in Council?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am positive that there are Orders in Council. Unless I have the documents in front of me, I do not like to commit myself definitely, because I want to tell the truth, but I believe that is the position. At all events, the hon. member may be assured that the Government will have in mind the right of those who have gone overseas to take up, when they return, as good a position as they would have had if they had remained here instead of doing as they have done, going to the front and offering up their lives.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Are the civil servants who are serving at the front receiving the statutory increases the same as those who remain at home? I am told that they are not.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am speaking again from recollection, but with some positiveness. I believe that this is the situation. At first, when a civil servant enlisted, it was provided that he should receive the salary which he was getting in the Civil Service. I think the annual increase was overlooked. My recollection, and my advice from my colleague here (Mr. Crothers), is that an Order in Council was passed to provide for the statutory increases being given.

Sir SAM HUGHES: To those at the front?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: To those at the front, so that they will find themselves when they come back in the same position as they would have been if they had not enlisted. If that has not been done, I can say it will be done, but I think it has been done.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If it has not been done, it will be done.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am informed that a third Order in Council dealing with civil servants has recently been passed, under which a civil servant if he enlists receives no portion of his salary. Is that the case?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think an Order in Council of that nature has been passed, but that was in view of the compulsory service legislation which is about to be brought down.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is not passed yet?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: At all events that point does not seem to be relevant to this matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is peculiar that the Government should pass an Order in Council in view of legislation that has not yet been considered.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In regard to enlistments from the Civil Service, I have been informed by Civil Service representatives that the total enlistments from the Civil Service at Ottawa are 981, and that the total enlistments from the Civil Service outside of Ottawa are 2,827, making a total enlistment from the whole service of 3,808. That is stated to be an incomplete return, as no records of new enlistments have been received from several departments for some weeks past, and there is one department in which there is no complete record. This legislation applies to all who are at present in the Civil Service. If the compulsory service legislation is passed, as I believe it will be, then the Civil Service will be subject to its provisions just the same as individuals outside of the Civil Service. The Civil Service, it seems to me, is in the same position to-day as the rest of the community; that is to say, there has not been compulsory service enforced by the Government; the enlistment so far has been voluntary; it has been open to a member of the Civil Service, as it has been open to any one outside, to volunteer or not to volunteer, and this resolution which I have brought in applies to the Civil Service as it stands to-day, those who have enlisted and those who have not enlisted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is a most extraordinary thing for the Government to pass an Order in Council discriminating, from the date of the passing of the Order, which I understand was about a week ago, against civil servants who may enlist, irrespective altogether of the coming into force of any compulsory service. I have seen it stated in the papers, and I am told it is true that an Order in Council has been passed providing that those members of the Civil Service who enlist after the passing of the Order shall not be entitled to receive any portion of their salary. That Order in Council has been passed altogether irrespective of compulsory service, and indeed I think it is an extraordinary assumption for the Government to pass an Order in Council the effect of which is to discourage civil servants from voluntary enlistment, and to state that that Order is passed in view of a compulsory measure which may or may not be passed. If I were a member of the Government I would not like to assume what the House of Commons or the Senate might do; I would rather wait until the measure was explained to Parliament and until Parliament had taken action with reference to it. The effect of this Order in Council is to say to every civil servant: If you enlist after this Order is passed you will be discriminated against; you will be treated in a different way from that in which other civil servants have been treated. It is in effect the Government saying to every civil servant: We do not want you to enlist. If my information is correct we have three distinct and contradictory provisions in regard to the Civil Service. We have one class of enlisted civil servants, who receive not only their military pay, but their full Civil Service pay; we have another class of enlisted civil servants who receive their military pay and the difference between their Civil Service pay and their military pay, and now, under this last Order in Council, we have another class of enlisted civil servants who will receive simply their military pay, and who have been deprived altogether of their Civil Service pay. It seems to me that is an extraordinary state of affairs to have three different provisions relating to the same class of boys who may enlist for service at the front.

While I am on my feet let me ask the minister why he makes this provision in paragraph " 3 " of the resolution:—

> That it be provided that the Governor in Council may grant an increase of one hundred dollars to any clerk in the Third Division of the Inside Service of the Civil Service and to any person holding any of the positions mentioned in section thirty-two of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, who
> (a) is reported by the deputy head to be deserving of such increase; and
> (b) is in receipt of a salary of less than one thousand dollars.

I know some seventy or eighty men who have been in that division of the Civil Service for 15, 20 or 30 years, and who, by reason of their long service, have risen to the maximum of $1,200. Why should not an increase be given to such men who have been so many years in the service and who have families? I know men who are receiving only $1,200 a year, who have sons at the front, and who, by reason of the high cost of living, are really in a state of distress. Yet they cannot get any increase at all because they have reached the maximum of $1,200, while a young man without any family, or a young woman who may have been but a few years in the service, will immediately receive an increase of $100, simply because, by reason of the short period of service, his or her salary is less than $1,000. Why is that distinction made?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The reason is that the man who has been those years in the service receives a salary of $1,200, which, having regard to conditions outside, is a fairly substantial emolument. We are dealing with cases of hardship which arise in the Civil Service in cases of salaries under $1,000. If a man is receiving $1,200 a year he is better than a man who is receiving $700. There is more reason for granting an increase to a man who has only $700 a year than there is for granting an increase to a man who has $1,200 a year. My hon. friend is mistaken in his assertion that the man with a salary of $1,200 gets no increase. We have increased the maximum from $1,200 to $1,300.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He does not receive that immediately?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: He will receive the annual increase this year. That is another point in connection with the service, and it answers the question that has been raised: Why not an increase over the whole service? It must not be overlooked that under the provisions of the Civil Service Act those who are in the first division, with a salary from $2,100 to $4,000, receive an annual increase of $100; that is, the man with $2,100 this year gets $2,200 next year, and every year he is $100 better off in salary.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Where is that provided in the resolution?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is in the Act, which is not affected by this resolution.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought it was $50.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is $100 in the first division, and $50 in the lower divisions. My hon. friend has referred to what he regards as the extraordinary anomaly of some members of the Civil Service receiving both military and civil pay, while others receive only their Civil Service salary if that is greater than the amount of military pay they would draw, and he also referred to the latest Order in Council. I am unable to speak authoritatively at the present time with regard to that Order in Council.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps the minister would bring it down.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would suggest that my hon. friend ask the Prime Minister with regard to that Order in Council; it is not immediately under consideration by the committee. With regard to the other two classes, when the war broke out we decided that those who enlisted from the Civil Service should receive both their civil and military pay. That was a generous action on the part of the Government, possibly over-generous, but I think at that time nobody imagined the war would extend over such a long period, or would develop on the scale it has. Many of the large companies in this country did the same thing. I think it was not believed by any one that our expeditionary force would grow from 30,000 to 50,000, to 200,000, to 300,000, to 400,000, or 500,000. Having regard to the size of the expeditionary force which it was then thought we should send overseas, the Government thought it proper at that time to do what many of the large companies were doing, namely to pay those who enlisted their full civil pay in addition to their military pay. Afterwards, when recruiting went on on the scale it did, we came to the conclusion that the civil servant would be put more on a par with those outside if he was paid only the amount of his civil pay, if that should be in excess of his military pay. That appeared to be a fair dealing with the situation, and the expense runs into a very substantial sum of money indeed. That was the position up to the time the Order in Council was passed which my hon. friend has referred to, and about which I suggested that he speak to the Prime Minister, as I am not sufficiently familiar with its terms myself.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps the minister would ask the Prime Minister. He is nearer to him than I am.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not wish to discuss the Order in Council now, as it is not immediately before the House, but I will have no objection at all to bringing his suggestion before the Prime Minister.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought that perhaps the Minister of Finance, being so prominent a member of the Government, might be able to get the Order in Council with less difficulty than I could, as it would take some time to get it by a formal motion. There are undoubtedly very great anomalies in regard to the pay of enlisted civil servants, and I think it is important that we should have this Order in Council.

Mr. J. L. CHABOT (Ottawa): As one of the members representing the city of Ottawa, where a large number of ladies and gentlemen are employed in the Civil Service, I desire to offer my thanks to the Government as well as to the Minister of Finance for their determination to do something to assist the civil servants, especially those of the lower grades. I think the proposal of the Minister of Finance is a fairly generous one, but I am sorry that he has not seen fit to increase the minimum salaries, especially in sub-division B of the third division, and also the salaries of messengers, porters, sorters, packers and such like. I think the minimum salary should have been made $600 or $700 instead of $500.

I wish to say a few words regarding the repeal of subsection of 2 of section 26 of the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1908. Personally, I have always looked upon that subsection, not merely as a hardship, but even a cruel measure, against the men who had been working in that class for many years. When that Act was put into force the men who had passed the qualifying examination were debarred from further promotion because they were unable to pass an academic examination such as few men in this House could pass without long preparation, and I am exceedingly glad that this subsection is going to be repealed.

I also hope the Minister of Finance will not overlook the claims of the men and women of the Outside Service, who are working for a very low salary, and are certainly entitled to as much consideration as members of the lower grades of the inside service. I am sure the Outside Service here and elsewhere are performing their duties just as efficiently as are the members of the Inside Service, and I venture to hope that the Government and the Minister of Finance will not overlook their just claim for an increase. They have to live in the same place as the inside servants, and the high cost of living affects them just as much as it does the inside servants.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF: A civil servant who joined the first contingent would get both civil and military pay. Will this increase apply to him?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. TURRIFF: Does not the minister think that will cause some ill feeling? There may be two men side by side, one getting only the military pay and the other both military pay and say $1,200 a year. Now the Government proposes to increase the pay of the man who is getting $1,200 more than the man beside him, and does not increase the other man's pay. That does not seem to me to be reasonable, and I think it will cause a great deal of dissatisfaction. Those civil servants who first enlisted are getting quite a big bonus over those who enlisted later. This seems to be a case of "For he that hath to him shall be given; and he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath."

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Personally I do not like to deprive any soldier of any emolument that he is receiving at the present time. There is this to be said for those who are receiving double pay. These men went forward on that understanding, and it does not seem to me that it would be just or proper to revise the conditions under which they enlisted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No one is suggesting that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: After all, I do not think the public interest is likely to suffer if these men who went forward with the first contingent, or shortly afterwards, and are in receipt of the double pay, are given a little more than possibly what on a strict business basis they might be entitled to. The same remark would apply to those who went forward on the understanding they would get their civil pay if that were in excess of their military pay. To meet the point raised by my hon. friend, about having to go to the deputy to obtain this increase, I would be willing so far as I am concerned to amend subsection A of section 3 if in the opinion of the committee any hardship is likely to result therefrom, and allow the Governor in Council to grant the increase upon the recommendation of the minister. If there is any considerable opinion in favour of it, on the part of the committee, I am willing that this should be done, but I believe that the matter is in good hands, that the Act will be administered fairly, and that no hardship will result.

Mr. TURRIFF: The minister evidently misunderstood the tenor of my remarks. I do not want to prevent the man who comes under the Order in Council from getting an increase. But why not give an increase to the man beside him, who is getting from $600 to $1,200 less?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That does not arise under this resolution.

Mr. GRAHAM: This Government seldom does anything that pleases me, and when it does I feel like making note of it. I am not sure that the Civil Service Act has hampered this Government as much as it hampered its predecessor. I find, for instance, that section 21 has been overworked by this Government. That is the section that provides that a person may enter the Civil Service without passing an examination, on the ground of having some technical qualifications. The action taken by the minister in allowing civil servants to be promoted from one class to another without passing an examination which he calls "academic," I think, is a good one, particularly as it applies to the old employees. A good deal of nonsense is talked about Civil Service examinations—at least I think so. I always imagined, until I was enlightened on the subject by a few months' practical observation, that promotions would largely remain as they were and would be made on the recommendation of the deputy minister. Speaking practically, if I had my way, promotions should be altogether upon the recommendation of the deputy, he acting on the recommendation of the head of the branch in which the civil servant is employed. It is all very well to have an examination, but it may be that the individual who is least competent to pass an academic examination may be the one best fitted from the practical point of view for promotion. The same applies in any business; any one can apply it in his own office. While, generally speaking, it is better to have a high standard of education, yet education and practical qualifications are not always united in the same person. I found that in several cases when I was in charge of a department. The person who could pass the examination had to have the promotion, while the one who could not pass the examination was, to my mind, better qualified for the position. "But," you say, "will that remove political pull and influence?" There must be a certain amount of confidence in a department, just as in a business establishment. The deputy minister must be a man in whom the Government and the public have confidence, one as well able to judge of the ability of officers of the department as the heads of branches under whom they work. Not many agree with me, perhaps, but I would go so far as to say that all promotions ought to be on recommendation, not of the minister, but of the head of the branch, countersigned and approved by the deputy minister. My hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Morphy) rather thinks that this power should be removed from the deputies. I think if he were at the head of a department, or sat at the council board for a time, he would change his mind.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. member misunderstood my views. I think the minimum salary should be fixed.

Mr. GRAHAM: I was referring to promotion, not salaries. A member of the Government is human; the members of this Government are exceptionally human so far as their friends are concerned. I am afraid that if the two members from Ottawa, whom I see here to-day and working very hard, both attacked the minister at once the minister could hardly repel them, he could hardly withstand their seductive influence. If the authority were in the minister's hands, he might suggest the promotion of an individual whom the deputy would not recommend on his or her qualifications. Leave it in the hands of the deputy minister, and it will be near enough to the minister, while at the same time the minister will not be liable to the charge of exercising political preference as he would be if the matter were left in his own hands.

Mr. CHABOT: I would go further than the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). I believe it would be in the interests of the country if the civil servants, Inside and Outside Services, were entirely under the control of commissions and beyond the pale of politics, both in regard to appointment and promotion.

Mr. FRIPP: I have had some experience, as hon. members know, with regard to the Civil Service. I agree with the hon. member for South Renfrew that it would be the greatest mistake in the world to do away with the recommendation of the deputy minister. It would mean that the members for Ottawa for the time being would be deluged with requests from members of the Civil Service. I believe that it is in the interest of the Civil Service that promotions should be made on the recommendation of the deputy minister. My five years' experience leads me to believe that it would be in the interest of the Service if the civil servants were removed from politics and disfranchised. That is my judgment. If the minister would go that far, and not allow the civil servant to vote or have any interest in the country politically, I think it would be to the interest of the civil servants as well as to the interest of the country at large. At present, there is a certain influence unnecessarily brought to bear on the members that I think should be avoided. I certainly think that the resolution, on the whole, is in the interests of the civil servant as well as of the country. Let the deputy minister recommend the increases. I am sure the civil servant himself will be perfectly satisfied to allow that recommendation to decide whether he is entitled to the increase or not. With regard to the members of the Third Division who are to be promoted without passing an academic examination, there are between four and five hundred men who have reached the maximum of their class and cannot get out of that division, and who are earning $1,200 a year. They have certainly been under great hardship for some years past, particularly since the high cost of living has attacked us all. We all know that the man on salary is particularly hard hit by the increased prices. Another point to be remembered is that the civil servants cannot, like our trades unions, demand increases; they must depend altogether upon the generosity of the government of the day. I hope the House will accept the resolution as it stands. I am sure it will be acceptable to the Civil Service and that they will do their duty all the better as civil servants in consequence of the legislation that it is now proposed to pass.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I also am in favour of the Civil Service of this country, both inside and outside, being taken absolutely out of politics and put under the administration of a commission. I believe that all recommendations as to the promotions of civil servants should come from that commission and that there should be no outside influence as to appointment, promotion or anything else. I was under the impression that we had attained that some years ago when what we considered to be a sweeping Act was put through this House and we established a Civil Service Commission of some character. Just what it is now, I do not know. But I am convinced that public opinion is in favour of taking the Civil Service, outside and inside, away from political influence and putting it in the hands of a board, non-political in character. I believe that appointments and promotions should be made absolutely from the point of view of the Civil Service, and I believe in treating fairly and paying decently those who are in the service. I believe that reasonable promotion ought to be provided for and that when promotion does take place it should be on merit and on the recommendation of a responsible officer of the department, such as the deputy minister or the officer in charge of the branch.

Mr. CURRIE: There is just one word I wish to add to this discussion. The idea of putting the service entirely under a commission is all right, but there is one objection to it as the system is carried out now. I think that the Government should take steps to see that appointments to the Civil Service are more equitably distributed. I have no objection to my hon. friends from Ottawa getting a fair proportion of the appointments, but as nearly as I can make out sixty or seventy per cent of the appointments to the Civil Service in Ottawa—and now it is getting worse—it is eighty or eighty-five per cent—are of people belonging to the city of Ottawa. There are other men and women in other parts of the country who are entitled to a look-in in the service. I took up the matter of finding out who were in the Inside Service when the patronage of my riding came under my purview, and on looking over the whole list I found that there had been just one man appointed to the Inside Service from North Simcoe in thirty years. I have no doubt there are other ridings in a similar position. I do not believe in this policy of the pork barrel, especially when the hand that goes into the pork barrel is only one hand, but I think we ought all to get a fair trial and that some new rule should be adopted by the different departments so that young men and women, and especially returned soldiers from other parts of the country outside of Ottawa might have a fair share of the jobs in the Inside Service.

Mr. BURNHAM: The finest Civil Service in the world is the Indian Civil Service and appointment to it is altogether by examination. There is no such thing as recommendation. The most influential man in England could not get an appointment to, or promotion in, the Indian Civil Service unless he passed the examination and got the proper standing. The door is open to the least influential person in the country if he has brains, aptitude and fitness. This business of recommendation is absurd. That there should be a difference between the conduct of the Inside and Outside Service is something that I cannot understand at all. Surely it is only reasonable that a commission should be allowed, without regard to partisanship or political preference, or anything of that sort, to manage the affairs of the service in such a way that those whose ability and fitness are indicated by their examinations should receive the preference. It seems to me strange that it should have been taken for granted that an examination must be on some abstruse mathematical problem or some extraordinary question in geography or history that a person might not be able to answer although he might have the aptitude and business for the work he undertakes. The examination ought to be of such a character as to have some reference to the man's employment. Surely it is not beyond the power of human brains to launch something of that sort. At any rate, we are not following out the best examples in other countries where the system has been worked out satisfactorily. It cannot be said that political recommendations by members for the Inside or the Outside Service—of course it is not for Inside Service now—are in any sense to the advantage of the country.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Of all the absurdities of the present system one of the most conspicuous is that the men who happen to be the members for Ottawa should have the patronage of recommending people for appointments to a great service that should draw its candidates from all parts of the Dominion. We are creating by this partisan and political system a professional class of civil servants resident in the Capital. The service is administered largely on the recommendation of the local members and not with regard to the public interest. Again I desire to say that it is high time, especially in these critical war times when we wish to get value for every dollar that is voted by this House, that the administration of the Civil Service, outside and in, should be absolutely non-partisan and should be in the hands of a competent commission, and should not be the subject of political patronage. I am prepared to endorse what has been said by the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) in regard to the Indian Service, from the very limited knowledge I have of it. Everybody knows that in England they have a much better administration of the public service than we have here, that the examinations are fair, that there is reasonable promotion, and that, most important of all, those in the service are not discouraged by the knowledge that unfair preference will be given to another member of the service by reason of political influence. That is the most disheartening thing in a service of this kind. By political influence people can get preference, better salaries and advancement over those who are perhaps doing better work but who have not the necessary political influence. Surely, it is time to bring all this to an end and instead of patching up this Act as we are doing now—and it is only being patched up now in order to do justice to the lower grades of the service—we should take the service out of politics and put it in the hands of a commission where it will be fairly and justly administered. The commission should present to Parliament, or to the minister, a report reviewing the whole condition of the service, suggesting improvements and, if in times like this they think it is necessary to increase the pay of the service, recommending it to us. This would be an intelligent way of dealing with the matter.

Mr. CHABOT: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words in reply to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) and the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean). I am sure they are labouring under a misapprehension in so far as the political power and authority of the Ottawa members is concerned. They could not at all have exaggerated, if they had attempted to describe, the tribulations and vicissitudes that we have to undergo with regard to the duties to be performed in connection with the appointment and recommendation of men and women to the Outside Service only. We have nothing to do with appointments to or promotions in the Inside Service than any other hon. member of this House because since 1908 all appointments to and promotions in the Inside Service are supposed to be made by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GRAHAM: That word "supposed" is a good qualification.

Mr. CHABOT: Not only "supposed" but should be made by the Civil Service Commission, which was appointed by the late Government. With regard to outside appointments, probably the Outside Service in Ottawa is more varied and more extensive than it is in any other constituency in Canada and that may be the cause of so much trouble for the gentlemen who happen to represent this city when their party is in power. As I said, I agree with the hon. member for York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) that all civil services should be directly and absolutely under Civil Service Commissions, either under the present Commission, numerically increased, or a separate Commission outside of politics altogether. If that were done I am satisfied that this country would get a more efficient service.

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: If it is put forward that these promotions are to be political, I would keep a party ledger and I would make it the duty of the whips of the party in power to keep a ledger for each constituency, having regard to the population of the constituency.

Mr. GRAHAM: Why not the card index system?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Hold on now—and I would say that it would be their duty to see that outlying counties get their share of this patronage, if it is to be patronage. So I protest against it on two grounds, not only do I think it unfair and that it should not exist, but if that system is to be maintained, it should be maintained on the basis of a fair distribution of these offices among the outyling constituencies as well as in the large centres, like Toronto, where there is a great deal of patronage in connection with the Outside Service. A large portion of that Post Office patronage might be fairly distributed to other ridings adjacent to that city. I do not advocate either of these things. I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chabot) that the Outside Service should be taken out of politics and administered by a Commission.

Mr. TURRIFF: I should like to emphasize the remarks made by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) that the Civil Service should be disfranchised. That is a position that I have taken ever since I have been a member of this House. It seems to me that there is no good reason why they should not be disfranchised. It does not injure anybody, and if a civil servant does not wish to lose his franchise it is easy for him to drop out of the service. I would even go so far as to say that we should not disturb the franchise of any man or woman now in the service, but that we should make a start and provide that from this time forward any man or woman accepting service under the Government should know that he or she no longer had the franchise.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Like the judges.

Mr. TURRIFF: Exactly. I think it would be a good move, a move in the right direction. I should like the Minister of Finance to give that phase of the subject some consideration. I should like also to emphasize what was said by the other member for Ottawa (Mr. Chabot), that is that the Outside Service should be put in the same position as regards recommendations for appointments as is the Inside Service. The fact that the Inside Service was taken away from politics and put in the hands of the Civil Service Commission relieved members of a great deal of unpleasant work, and it would be very much better to put the Outside Service in the same position. You would certainly get a better class of civil servant, and it would be to the general advantage not only of the Civil Service, but of the country as well.

Mr. CURRIE: After all is said and done, the question of putting the Outside Service under a commission would simply mean turning the offices over to one party. That would hardly be fair because, as matters stand now—I am speaking as a member of this House—the party that left office in 1911 seems to be largely possessed with the idea of getting office, and every day I am receiving letters from members of that party who opposed me in the last election asking for offices. If they were disfranchised, I suppose it would be all right, but the Tories do not get any office, they never get within gunshot of an office with this commission, and the Outside Service is their only chance.

Mr. MARCIL: Will my hon. friend tell us how many new appointments this Government made since they came into office?

Mr. BRADBURY: The commission makes the appointments.

Mr. MICHAUD: I read in this resolution that any person may be promoted from the Third Division to the Second Division by the Governor in Council upon the recommendation of the head of the department based upon the report in writing of the deputy head. I remember that when the Civil Service Act was passed in which a deputy minister recommended himself for an increase of salary of $1,000 and left a poor employee in his department, with a large family, at his former salary. That civil servant has been at the same salary for the last eight or nine years. I believe that in this particular case the deputy minister should not have anything to say, in so far as recommendation is concerned, because a great many civil servants will suffer by not getting the proper recommendation from the deputy minister.

Mr. BURNHAM: I cannot understand why some members of this House wish to disfranchise the civil servants. To my mind, that indicates very little faith in humanity. It is a very retrogressive step. If Parliament is going to endorse such a theory as that, that men accepting trifling positions and doing work commensurate with them, earning their salaries, are to be disfranchised because they are not supposed to have a due and proper interest in the country, then they are like those people who were employed by the Byzantine Empire or ancient Rome, they are practically made eunuchs of, as suspicion is at once cast on them. I think it is most unworthy position for any one to take.

Mr. TURRIFF: I did not propose that.

Mr. MURPHY: With the view of expediting the passage of the hon. minister's resolution and later on of the Bill to be founded upon it, I should like to make a suggestion to him. The suggestion is based upon an occurrence in the House some weeks ago, of which I am certain my hon. friend has a recollection. He will recall that when the estimates were first under discussion this year attention was drawn to the fact that certain Orders in Council had been passed, the effect of which was to abrogate certain sections of the Civil Service Act. One Order in Council in particular was mentioned as having been brought to the attention of the Returned Soldiers Committee. That is an Order in Council taking away from the Civil Service Commission the right of appointment to this Third Division and placing that right altogether in the hands of the minister of the day. A request was made at that time that a return or statement should be submitted to the House showing how many departments—how many ministers in other words—had availed themselves of this privilege, and to what extent the privilege had been taken advantage of in each department. I submit that that information should be before the House and the committee before we proceed in any event, with the Bill to be founded on this resolution. We ought to be in possession of that data before we discuss the Bill on the second reading.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have forgotten the circumstance.

Mr. MURPHY: I will send Hansard to the minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When the Bill is in the committee, after the second reading, I will endeavour to get the information.

Mr. DEVLIN: I was called from the Chamber, and on my return I heard the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) speaking against the disfranchisement of the civil servants. I want to place myself on record immediately as saying that I think every civil servant who is qualified ought to have the right to vote. The proposal to disfranchise the Civil Service is repugnant to me as taking away from the liberty of the citizen. Simply because a man happens to be working for the Government is no reason why he should not have the right to vote. There are two ways, however, of disfranchising civil servants: one by taking away their vote, and the other by muzzling them. A practice was in force—I hope it will not be continued at the next election—of dismissing a man simply because he voted for one party or for another. I have in mind instances of investigation into the conduct of officials, who were suspended or dismissed if their conduct did not tally exactly with the party view. In reading over the report of an investigation which took place in my county—I wish to speak particularly of matters of which I have certain knowledge—I found that a certain gentleman said to a friend whom he had in his drawing-room one evening after a meeting, that after all he thought Laurier was not a bad fellow. That is all he said; that was all that was brought out before the investigating commissioner. Had he said that I was or was not a bad fellow, and that, accordingly, he should or should not vote for me, I would not mind; but it seems absurd that he should lose his position simply because he said that the leader of a party was not a bad fellow. That is what I call muzzling the civil servant and, therefore, disfranchising him; because if you take away his position by reason of his having voted a certain way, in effect you practically take away his vote. I agree with the member for West Peterborough that every civil servant ought to have the right to vote as he sees fit, I care not what party is in power.

Mr. CURRIE: Would the hon. gentleman go further and say that the civil servant has the right to go on the public platform and to canvass?

Mr. DEVLIN: In three elections which I have run I have never made a complaint as to how any postmaster or civil servant acted during the campaign. I recognize that he is a citizen with rights similar to those which I enjoy, and that he is entitled to exercise those rights. The practice has prevailed around this part of the country, and I have never once complained of it. I do not see why a civil servant, as well as any member of this House or any man who does not work for the Government, should not get on a public platform and give expression to his views.

Mr. WRIGHT: The gentleman who opposed my hon. friend in the last election was the only person who had any reason to make complaint. I do not suppose there was any opposition on the part of civil servants in his riding.

Mr. DEVLIN: I said that in the three elections which I ran I had never made any complaint.

Mr. GERMAN: If civil servants pass the qualifying examination why should it be necessary that they be promoted to the Second Division only on the recommendation of the head of the department? I should think that no such recommendation would be necessary.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No one is entitled to be passed into the Second Division unless there are vacancies in that division. If there are one or more vacancies in the Second Division the question arises as to what persons in the Third Division who are eligible for promotion shall be recommended for the positions. One would think that the best official to recommend them is the deputy minister. The fact that a man has qualified for promotion does not mean that he is ipso facto promoted. Promotions, therefore, to vacancies occurring in the Second Division through death or otherwise are made from the lower division on the recommendation of the deputy, concurred in by the minister.

Mr. GERMAN: I understood that the classification of employees into various divisions was a matter more of salary than of position. A person drawing a salary as clerk in the Third Division cannot draw the salary of a clerk in the Second Division, but I should think that it would not be necessary that there should be a vacancy in the Second Division in order to allow a clerk to draw the salary of the Second Division.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They can draw only the salary which is within the limits of their class. The salaries of the First Division are higher than those of the second, and the salaries of the Second Division overlap, to a certain extent, those of the third.

Mr. GERMAN: That is by reason of persons having, by examination, passed from one division to another?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: By reason of promotion from one division to another.

Mr. GERMAN: If a person in the Third Division passed an examination qualifying him for a position in the Second Division, I think that he should automatically get the salary of the Second Division.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is entirely mistaken.

Mr. CURRIE: In the Indian Service and in the British Service, promotion is based upon seniority, not upon the recommendation of a higher official. Has that principle been recommended here, or does the promotion of a civil servant depend entirely upon the deputy minister? Suppose that for one vacancy there are three candidates, one of whom has been in the service a year longer than the other two. Does that man get the position, or does the promotion depend altogether upon the recommendation of the deputy? One of the grievances in the English Service was that higher officials always had the say as to whether promotion should be made or not. In the army, seniority is recognized right through. The senior man always takes the command or the appointment—and that applies from the youngest soldier up.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What happens in our Civil Service is this: when vacancies are to be filled, the deputy considers those members of his staff most deserving of the appointment. He then makes a recommendation to the minister, which is passed on to the Council.

I do not think those in seniority are necessarily considered as being more eligible for a position than others. A good deal might be said in favour of that, but a man might be in the service for 20 years and be exceedingly incompetent, while a man who had been in the service but two years might be competent for the position. Qualifications being equal, I think the senior man should have the position.

Mr. CURRIE: In all other services outside this Canadian service there is an absolute rule that in the filling of an appointment the senior man gets it, and I think the minister ought to consider that question seriously because the deputy minister can tyrannize over a man and can keep him back for ten, fifteen or twenty years, even if he is a good employee, simply because the deputy has some grudge against him. The rights of seniority are the only rights of any kind in the service.

Mr. COCHRANE: What about fitness?

Mr. CURRIE: Fitness is tested by examination. If a man cannot pass the examination, that settles the question of his fitness. If he has passed the examination, then the question of whether he should receive an appointment or not should depend on the question of seniority. That is the only fair way of dealing with the matter.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I find I have available the information asked for by the hon. member for St. John, and I should like now to place it upon Hansard. I find that there are in the messenger grade, 452 employees. I am speaking now of the Inside Service to whom this legislation applies.

Mr. MARCIL: All in Ottawa?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In Ottawa. There are 1,778 in the Third Division. There are 2,678 receiving $1,200 or less per annum. There are 1,758 receiving more than $1,200 per annum. The average salary of all permanent employees is $1,398. The total number of employees in the Inside Service including deputies, is 4,473. When the Bill is in committee after the second reading, I shall have an estimate showing the amount of increase in expenditure involved in connection with this legislation.

Mr. MARCIL: On the lines of what the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) has just said, I have in mind an official who is in subdivision "B" of the Second Division, and who was placed at the maximum of his class when the Civil Service Act was passed; that is, he was then receiving a salary of $1,600 a year. That is a good many years ago, but he has been left at that salary ever since; there has been no promotion for him, and there does not seem to be any promotion in store. A good many others in the same branch have been promoted, but this man remains where he was. He has not been put into the class above, and I understand, before he can go there, he must be recommended by the chief of the branch, and that recommendation must be concurred in by the deputy minister and the minister. The minister will agree there is a case of hardship there.

5 p.m.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There may or there may not be.

Mr. MARCIL: This man has been there for nine years; others have received increases of $50 or $100, and others have gone into higher classes, but this man still remains where he was when the Act was passed. I have personal knowledge of this matter. Does the minister not think that this man, having been placed at the maximum salary of $1,600 for years, and having satisfactorily fulfilled the duties of that office, and now finding himself without any advancement, is not being treated fairly?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am quite unable to pronounce upon a case of an official whom I do not know, and as to whose qualifications I have no information except the statement of my hon. friend. I should imagine, if this officer is a close personal friend of my hon. friend, that he would be intellectually qualified for an advance. What I think should be done in a case of that kind is for my hon. friend to bring the matter to the attention of the deputy or the minister, and it can then be looked into, and if any injustice has been done, it might be remedied.

Mr. MARCIL: Apart from any question of favour, I think it is a matter of justice. There must be many in the same position as this man, and that is the reason why I drew the matter to the attention of the minister.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

Sir THOMAS WHITE thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 68, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

EXPENSE OF PARLIAMENTARY SESSIONS.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: With the consent of the House I should like to revert to motions. Some time ago the House passed a resolution moved by Mr. Northrup, appointing a committee to take into consideration and report on the cost of parliamentary printing and other matters. That committee met to-day and it was the opinion of both sides who were there represented that it would be advisable to join with the Senate in that investigation and report. As the Senate is to meet to-night and may adjourn thereafter, I should like, if there is no objection, to get this resolution up to the Senate before they adjourn to-night. I therefore move that we revert to the order for "Motions."

Motion agreed to.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER thereupon moved:

[Mr. Marcil.]

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to appoint a committee to act with that already chosen by this House to consider and during the present session to report the total cost, including incidental expenses, of each session of Parliament, and the best way, if any, of reducing the same.

Mr. CURRIE: The joint committee of the House and the Senate on Printing have had this subject before them for several years. They have been continually endeavouring to reduce the cost of printing and other matters in connection with this Parliament. Recently another committee was appointed by the House to take up this very same question. I do not think any matters will come before this new committee that could not very well be taken up by the Committee on Printing, unless possibly such questions as the pay of officials of the House and matters of that kind. I should like to ask the minister whether he does not think it would be well to let the one committee do the whole work, so that there would be no overlapping.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think this new committee probably goes further than the old committee. As the committee has already been appointed by the House and is going on with its work, there is something to be gained and nothing to be lost by associating the other House with it.

UNIVERSAL RADIO SYNDICATE, LIMITED.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Hazen (Minister of Marine) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Blain in the chair:—

That it is expedient to repeal the Ocean Telegraph Act, chapter fifty-two of the Statutes of 1913, and to authorize the repayment to the Universal Radio Syndicate of the balance remaining unpaid of any deposit made by the syndicate with His Majesty, after deducting any money due by the syndicate to His Majesty.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the minister kindly explain?

Mr. HAZEN: In 1913 this Parliament passed an Act called the Ocean Telegraph Act, confirming an agreement entered into between the Government and the Universal Radio Syndicate, Limited. Under the agreement that syndicate was established one radio station in Canada and another in Great Britain for the transmission of messages at rates not above certain specified amounts, and the Government agreed to issue the necessary license for that purpose. The syndicate, in pursuance of the agreement, deposited £10,000 with this Government. Of that amount £5,000 was to be returned to the syndicate when it had expended $50,000, $25,000 of which was to be expended in Canada. The balance was to be repaid to the syndicate upon the completion of the proper and necessary equipment and the satisfactory operation of the stations in the United Kingdom and Canada, the Government allowing interest on the deposit at the rate which the banks allowed the Government on any deposits they might have. The syndicate had the right afterwards to become an incorporated company. The syndicate has made the required expenditure of $25,000 in Canada, and under the terms of the agreement $25,000 has been returned to them. It is represented that owing to the outbreak of war the syndicate has been unable to float a company to operate and take over the stations, and acquire all the necessary apparatus. As a matter of fact, the syndicate has now gone into the hands of a liquidator. Before this occurred, however, as the syndicate was in urgent need of money, it was ordered, after consultation with the British Post Office, that the Governor in Council should lend to the syndicate the sum of $15,000, this loan to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent and to be repaid on May 1, 1915. An official test of the service was conducted on January 27, 1915, and established that the operating speed and general performance of the station was not up to the standard called for by the agreement. Payment of the balance of the deposit was accordingly withheld, and there is now $10,000 of the deposit in the hands of the Government. The syndicate is now quite unable to carry out the terms of its agreement, and the Governor in Council has refused to exercise the power under the agreement of purchasing the station. At the present time the Governor in Council is making use of the station in Canada, which is situated in Newcastle, N.B. It is now proposed by this legislation to return to the syndicate the balance of the deposit, which in round figures amounts to $10,000. The syndicate started with the idea of having a station in Canada and another on the west coast of Ireland. The Canadian station is at Newcastle, in the county of Northumberland, on the Miramichi River, and the other station is at Ballybunnion, on the northwest coast of Ireland. The syndicate has gone into the hands of a liquidator, and it is represented to us that arrangements have been made by which the Marconi Company will take over the stations at Newcastle and Ballybunnion and spend whatever money is necessary to equip them thoroughly, not only for transatlantic business but for communication with the West India Islands as well.

But while this Act remains on the statute-book it is impossible for the liquidator to make this arrangement with the Marconi Company. I am assured that arrangements have been made by which, as soon as this Act is repealed, the station will be taken over by the Marconi Company and put into a condition of great efficiency and made a most valuable means of transatlantic and other communication. The Government has nothing invested in this station. The amount of $10,000 was only as a guarantee of good faith on their entering into the agreement and being granted their license. The concern owes the Government nothing. It seems only reasonable, therefore, that this sum of $10,000 should be paid on the repeal of the Act to enable it to proceed as I have suggested. The agreement was made with this syndicate through the instrumentality of the Post Office Department. This matter came to the notice of the department when our late friend, Mr. Casgrain, was Postmaster General. He stated that there was no officer in the Post Office Department with special or technical knowledge of wireless matters; and, as there are in my department several officers who do understand these things, as for instance the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service and Mr. Edwards, who looks after our wireless and is an expert in this line, he would be obliged if my department would take it over, hear what the representative of the Postal Company had to say, and deal with the case as might be necessary. So the matter came into my department, and that is why I, instead of the Postmaster General, introduce this resolution. Having taken the matter up, and having had my officials go into it thoroughly with representatives of this company and of the Marconi Company, I shall be ready to introduce a Bill on the subject when this resolution passes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The resolution does not seem to be open to very great objection except on this point, that, apparently the ten thousand pounds—

Mr. HAZEN: Dollars.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, the original £10,000 deposited with the Government was for a purpose which has not been carried out. I understand that the Government still have $10,000 in their hands, and I would suggest to my hon. friend that it might be well not to pay that money over until, at all events, the arrangement is made with the Marconi Company for the performance of the service. This is the first I have heard of the matter, and perhaps my hon. friend will allow the committee to rise now, with a view to sitting again when there is a fuller attendance, as possibly some hon. members may desire to speak on this subject. Meantime the agreement that has been referred to might be brought down.

Mr. CURRIE: Has this syndicate any connection with the German Telefunken company which handles wireless?

Mr. HAZEN: I think not.

Mr. CURRIE: I understood at the time that it was part of that concern. However, I do not see any reason why the resolution should not go through and the agreement be brought down on the second reading of the Bill. That would expedite the matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That might do.

Mr. HAZEN: The Act to be repealed was assented to in June, 1913, and the agreement for the radial telegraph communication is embodied in the Act, so that any hon. gentleman who wishes to look at this agreement has only to turn to the statute. Perhaps I did not make it clear that the $25,000 went back to the company because they had fulfilled the bond. They were to have $25,000 returned to them when they had spent $50,000, half of it in Canada, and the money was returned because they had fulfilled the conditions. Then, as they had difficulty in carrying on operations, it was decided to lend them $15,000 which came out of the remaining $25,000. The suggestion that the hon. gentleman makes is one for consideration. We might pass the resolution with the understanding that when we go into committee on the Bill I shall be able to say whether I think the course proposed desirable or not, and it can be discussed.

Resolution reported and agreed to.

Mr. HAZEN moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 69, to repeal the Ocean Telegraph Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY.

PROPOSED MINISTRY OF FISHERIES.

On motion of Right Hon. Sir George Foster for Committee of Supply:

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. CLARENCE JAMESON (Digby) moved:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "In the opinion of this House, in view of the food shortage with which this country is confronted, and for the purpose of materially increasing the resources and food supply of Canada, a Department of Fisheries, under a separate minister, should be forthwith organized.

He said: It is obviously the duty of any member of this House to bring to the attention of the Government and of the country any project the adoption of which he conscientiously believes will add to the resources or food supply of Canada during the serious years with which we are confronted. This being so, I desire to present to the House very briefly the opinion which I entertain regarding the absolutely essential action to be taken by this Government in order to render vastly more productive an important source of food supply, namely, the fisheries of this country.

For many years the reports which successive ministers have laid upon the table of this House have reiterated the statement that the fisheries of Canada are the most extensive in the world. So far as possibilities are concerned, that statement is absolutely correct. The geographical position of Canada in that respect is unsurpassed.

> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both east and west.

But, in so far as results are concerned, the departmental statement is, unfortunately, entirely misleading. If we consider the value of the product of fisheries of certain other countries, we find the following. I give the results in round numbers, because I am no more fond of statistics than is this House:

United States	$76,000,000
Great Britain (before the war)	75,000,000
Norway, in 1915	50,000,000
Japan	45,000,000
Canada, in 1916	35,860,000

Looking more closely at the reports of the Canadian fisheries, we find the following results:

	Value of Products.
1916	35,860,000

The increase of 75 per cent on the face of it, might perhaps appeal to the casual reader of the report as being fairly satisfactory. But, it is a fact—I do not know how broadly it is recognized—that within the same twenty years the average market value of Canadian sea foods has advanced over 67 per cent. Consequently the increase in the production of sea foods of Canada within that time has been rather less than 8 per cent, which is much more than made up by the increase in the quantity of salmon taken in the British Columbia fisheries. The capital invested in the fisheries in 1896 was $9,826,000 and in 1916 it was $25,855,000, and the cost of operation has proportionately increased during the same period. In other words, it has been of late years costing us $2.50 to produce the same quantity of sea foods that in 1896 we produced at an expenditure of $1.

It is not a pleasant thing to contemplate, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that in so far as production is concerned, the fisheries of Canada have practically stood still during the past twenty years. This has been due, in the main, to four things—lack of attention, lack of appreciation, lack of vision, and lack of intelligent, progressive policy. Instead of $35,000,000, the fisheries of Canada should to-day be yielding $60,000,000, and in five years they could be made to produce $100,000,000 annually. We all remember, not so very many years ago, when the wheat fields of the West first yielded a $100,000,000 harvest. What a great shout went up from the people of the country, and how the newspapers, East and West, commented on the splendid achievement. But, we had waited 25 years and had expended hundreds of millions of dollars in building railways and elevators to make that result possible. Are not $100,000,000 drawn from the harvest of the seas of equal economical value to this country? Mr. Speaker, they are not only equal but more so, because the wheat fields of the West require cultivation, while the sea fisheries do not. Why have we not recognized and profited by that obvious fact? The reason is because the fisheries have always been neglected; because they are to-day, and have been for years, a mere adjunct of the Naval Service Department, which in turn, is an adjunct of the Marine and Fisheries Department under one minister. No man, even though he be a demi-god, could successfully conduct the fisheries of Canada as at present organized. One naturally asks why this is so. Sir, the answer is not far to seek. In the first place, how is the time of a minister of the Crown occupied? Let us take the case of a reasonably industrious minister; one who spends six out of the seven days of the week toiling away in his office in the Capital. One full day at least of the week is occupied in answering correspondence; one full day in the week is occupied in receiving delegations and callers; two full days in the week are occupied at Council attending to matters pertaining to other departments; one day in the week, perhaps, is devoted to matters of general policy, and, possibly, politics; while if this House is in session, one full day in the week is spent in this Chamber, leaving at best one full day in the week devoted to attending to the special duties appertaining to his department. I would like to digress just for one moment to point out that, aside from agriculture, the chief items of our annual production in raw material in 1915 were:

Lumber	$61,919,000
Coal	32,111,000
Nickel	20,492,000
Gold	18,977,000
Pulpwood	15,590,000
Copper	17,460,000
Silver	13,228,000
Pig iron from Canadian ore	1,715,000

Being for the most part under provincial control and under the especial care of many provincial departments of Government, they were in the main very well cared for. The fisheries of Canada yield $35,000,000, according to the departmental blue books, and in what relation do they stand to the Federal Department of Marine and Fisheries? Let us turn to the list of services in that department, and we will find that they number 37, of which the fisheries is one. I think I should read the list:

List of Services Attended to By Marine and Naval Service Departments.

Lighthouse Construction and Maintenance, Lighthouse Board, Dominion Steamers,
Harbour Commissioners,
Harbours and Harbour Masters,
Wreck Statistics and Investigations,
Wreck and Salvage Contracts,

Which of these 37 services of the department is it that occupies the minister's one available day of the week? The fisheries, as I have pointed out, is the one single productive service in the department. Do you suppose the fisheries get the minister's one available day for the week? If you will excuse me the expression, the fisheries do not get a "look-in." Who looks after the fisheries branch? Not the minister, because the minister has not the time; not the deputy minister, because his time is otherwise fully occupied. It is the superintendent of fisheries, a man with little authority, and a man who cannot make any recommendation in the matter of policy, I venture to say, unless specially requested to do so. In any case his time is fully occupied by the thousand and one details of his department which arise daily. Hence the fisheries do not get, and cannot get, fair play in the department, and, in my opinion, they do not get fair play in this House. Few members take any interest in them, while the discussion of any matter pertaining to the fisheries is the signal generally for a thinning out in the attendance of this Chamber. Let me give an illustration. Last year, upon a resolution introduced by myself, a committee was appointed to investigate the spread in price of sea foods in Canada. That committee held twelve sittings. The minister never attended a single session of the committee. I am quite prepared to admit that his time was otherwise fully occupied. The deputy minister never attended a single sitting of the committee, and I am prepared to admit that his time also was fully occupied. The superintendent of fisheries was there and rendered excellent service, but, as I have pointed out, he has no authority. That committee made a report which was presented to this House. That report was to have been discussed on the last day of the session along with the reports of the committees on pensions and public printing. That was the arrangement; I made it myself with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine. But it was never carried out, because the first named committee, quite unnecessarily I think, occupied almost every moment of the time.

I repeat, therefore, that the fisheries of Canada, which could be made to produce $100,000,000 per annum, have been neglected and ignored for years; both by the department and this House. Just here I will make the observation, if I may be permitted, that my experience in this House has forced me to the conclusion that economic questions do not invite that consideration to which I think they are entitled. That has probably been due to the fact that our political problems have been vexed and perplexing, and that the natural wealth of the country has been great and its development rapid, if not feverish. But the time is coming, if, indeed, it is not already here, when economic questions will engage the attention of this Parliament, and when mere questions of party and of the respective and relative advantages of the "ins" and the "outs" will be pressed back into second place. There are those in this country who desire to see the Dominion rounded out by bringing Newfoundland into the Confederation family. The ancient colony has not hitherto shown any great anxiety for the union, and I am not certain that she can even be induced to become a war bride. Many reasons are given for her indifference in this respect, but I think at the heart of it all is the fact that the great majority of the male population of Newfoundland are engaged in the fisheries, that almost $11,000,000 of her annual export of $14,000,000 is derived from the fisheries. They are opposed to Confederation, I think, because they say· Our fisheries have advanced while those of Canada have practically stood still; why should we exchange a policy of progress, development and growth for one which is just the reverse? And why is it that the fisheries of Canada are in that unhappy position? The reason is that they have never had the first care and attention of the head of the department nor, under present conditions, will they ever get it and the two problems of economical production and economical distribution have been unsolved. In this condition of affairs one naturally asks, what is the remedy, what can be done? In my opinion there should be organized a Department of Fisheries with a separate minister responsible to this House and to this country. The fisheries of Canada are surely big enough and extensive enough and important enough to warrant this. A Minister of Fisheries would find his time fully occupied for several years to come in grappling with and solving of the two great problems of economical production and economical distribution of sea foods in this country. Such action is furthermore necessary in order to reassure the fishermen and the fishing interests of this country. It is certainly necessary in order to command attention and respect for the fisheries of this country in this House. Above all things it is necessary in order to secure respect for the fisheries and the fishing interests from the transportation companies and concerns operating in Canada. So long as the present system is continued the present conditions will prevail, and this country will fail to reap tens of millions of dollars which might, under proper conditions, be drawn from the harvests of the sea. I am not charging this Government with especial negligence in this matter. They are merely following, or I might say perpetuating, the policy which they found upon coming into office, a policy which, indeed, has been pursued by all governments more or less indifferently since Confederation. But, Sir, to-day with the highest authorities gravely assuring us that the world's food supply will be seriously impaired during the years which are even now upon us; with Professor Cudmore of Toronto University pointing to the fact that the world's wheat harvest of last year was about 960,000,000 bushels less than the year before with men of the calibre of Lord Shaughnessy telling us that if we are to survive economically we must get out of the habit of thinking and acting in ruts; with the hon. the Minister of Finance praying for greater economy on the one hand and the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce preaching increased production on the other, I say, with this array of unquestionable testimony before us as to the necessity of the hour, would it not be little short of criminal for us to stand idly by and fail to avail ourselves of the almost unlimited supply of sea foods at our very door? We cannot do it organized as we are; we can do it by proper organization without involving additional expense. Therefore I say to this Government, as to men charged with the gravest responsibilities, organize a Department of Fisheries, place the portfolio in the hands of a man of ability, courage and vision, from within this House or from outside of it, I care not which, nor am I particular as to what his political antecedents may be—and support him in carrying out a policy which is calculated to meet the national requirements.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, in rising to second the motion of the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson), I wish to say a very few words. It is not my intention to quote any statistics or to go into any details in the general argument or suggestions which I purpose making. First, I wish to emphasize and to support the statements of the mover of the resolution as to the food value of fish. I think the food value of fish is now admitted by all, and the only thing that we lack in this country is a due appreciation of the quantity of this food material that lies at our doors, ready for use and proper exploitation. My hon. friend has pointed out that the annual fish production of Canada, which is valued at approximately $35,000,000, can be doubled, and, perhaps, trebled. There is no question that fish is an excellent substitute for meat, the cost of which has so abnormally increased. A movement was recently set on foot in the Motherland to increase the consumption of fish with a view to reducing the consumption of meat and helping to bring about that economy which is so necessary under present conditions. That fish, therefore, is of great value as a food cannot be disputed, and my hon. friend deserves commendation for bringing to the attenion of the House the matter of the exploitation of our fisheries.

The administration of the fisheries is practically an appendage of the Marine and Fisheries Department. I would not for a moment reflect upon the Minister of Marine and Fisheries by saying that the Fisheries Branch of his department is not properly administered. Without question, the minister has given his best services to that work, so far as he has been able to do so. But many matters of importance come under the jurisdiction of the Marine and Fisheries Department. There is the control and direction of navigation in Canada, a matter of very great importance indeed. The matter of pilotage is also an important one, the regulations in connection with which require constant revision and supervision. The administering of the great harbours and their foreshores is also part of the duty of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. These matters, together with the administration of naval affairs, now occupy a very large part of the minister's time. I do not think that the House, or the country, expect one minister to assume a task that is beyond the capabilities of one man. That principle was recognized by the House; it has been recognized since war broke out by the appointment of an assistant to the Minister of Militia and of another, I think, to the Minister of Finance. I am not suggesting that in this case an under-secretary would fill the bill, because the administration of the fisheries is sufficient to occupy the full time of a minister appointed for that special purpose.

Another thing which must not be forgotten is that Great Britain built up her position as a naval power upon the fisherfolk of the British Isles, who form the first line of defence of the United Kingdom, as the fishermen here form our first line of defence in Canada. A few years ago the Maritime Provinces, and particularly the province of Nova Scotia, contributed to the seafaring element of our population the finest class of men produced by any nation. Two or three years ago, sixty-five per cent of the captains sailing in and out of the port of Vancouver came from the province of Nova Scotia. Through the failure of the governments of Canada during the last thirty or forty years to take steps in regard to the matter—I am referring now more particularly to governments preceding this one, though the condition still prevails to some extent—the fisheries of the coast have passed largely into the hands of Japanese or foreigners. Twenty years ago one would see scarcely a single Japanese fishing in northern British Columbia or north of the Fraser river, but to-day a large majority of those fishing on the Pacific coast are Japanese. It is not my desire to reflect on the Japanese, but I contend that it is the duty of Parliament and of the people to conserve for British citizens, native-born if possible, this valuable franchise of the right to fish.

Mr. HAZEN: Are not many of these Japanese British subjects?

Mr. STEVENS: The minister's suggestion is quite right, but the point is that these people have become British subjects simply for the purpose of securing a fishing license. On the Pacific and Atlantic coasts the fisherfolk form, as I have said, our first line of defence, and if you build up a strong, intelligent and prosperous community of fishermen along our coasts, the result will be an immense benefit to the country not only in the way of production, but also in the way of defence in time of war. A commander of one of the British cruisers a few months ago told me that when he was in the service on the Canadian Atlantic coast there passed through his hands several hundred recruits from the Maritime Provinces and Newfoundland who were as fine a class of men as could be found. I mention this merely to show the value of these men to the country. The greatest service is being rendered to the Mother Country to-day by mine sweepers in the seas surrounding Great Britain, manned by the crews of the trawlers of England's great fishing fleet. This will impress the House with the necessity of building up the fishing communities on our sea coast and the undesirability of allowing our fisheries to drift into the control of aliens or of nationalities that are not as sympathetic with us as we should like. I do not wish to criticise the minister of the department, but I do submit that our fisheries are of sufficient importance to justify the establishing of a separate department for their administration, that department to be in charge of a minister of the Crown. Not only would this be a step in the interest of the production and distribution of food, but it would build up among the fisherfolk along our coasts a race that will maintain the traditions of the fisherfolk of our Empire.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I stated the other evening that it was my intention when the Fisheries' Estimates came before the House, to make a statement regarding the activities and progress of the department during the past year. It was suggested by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) last year, that I should make such a statement, and I always like to accept a good suggestion no matter where it comes from. In view of the fact that the fisheries question has been brought before the House this afternoon by my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson) on the motion to go into Supply, it occurred to me that this might be even a more fitting time to make the statement that when the Fisheries' Estimates come before the House. I think this is especially desirable in view of the fact that the Marine and Fisheries Committee after a number of meetings during last session made a report to the House which contained many valuable suggestions. I regret to say that I was not able last year to attend the meetings of that committee, for the reason that in addition to the work of my own department which, according to the hon. member for Digby, embraces almost 37 departments, I had thrown upon my shoulders during the session the work of the Department of Agriculture to a considerable extent, as the Minister of Agriculture was suffering from injuries sustained during the burning of the Parliament buildings. In addition to that I was also acting as chairman of the Pensions Committee. With all these duties on my shoulders, I regret to say that I found it impossible to attend the meetings of the Marine and Fisheries Committee last year. As I have said they made a very valuable report to the House, and their suggestions have been given every consideration by the department, and I propose now to let the House know just what action we have taken in regard to them, before discussing more particularly what was said by my hon. friend from Digby and my hon. friend from Vancouver City (Mr. Stevens) this afternoon.

Unfortunately it is still no easy task to afford adequate protection to the fisheries that require it. Hence, a great deal of the department's work is essentially of a negative character. While this work is of the utmost importance, and is exacting on time, the affirmative side,—the doing of things to increase the knowledge of the fishermen in the life history of fish, to enable them to catch more fish, to prevent them losing valuable time, to encourage the better handling of fish, so that the fishermen will get more for their catches and the public a better article of food, to provide better facilities and cheaper rates for the transportation of fish, to bring to the attention of the public the value, cheapness and general excellence of fish as food, and the keeping up and increasing of the supply of certain kinds of fish by artificial hatching—is from year to year receiving more attention.

Last session the Select Standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries made an exhaustive investigation into the spread in price of sea foods. The valuable report and recommendations and evidence procured, which were submitted by the committee to the House, will still be fresh in the minds of the members. The recommendations made have been acted on by the department, and as far as possible they have been effected. It may be best to cite the recommendations and summarize the action taken thereon. The first recommendation was:

1. That inspection of transportation of sea foods, and organization of the distribution thereof, be undertaken by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, somewhat along the lines already inaugurated by the Department of Agriculture in respect to certain farm products.

A young man, Mr. Leonard, of St. John, who has been brought up in the fish business, and who is consequently familiar with the requirements in transportation, was appointed inspector on the 1st July last, and was continued in such position until the end of September. His headquarters were at Mulgrave, Nova Scotia. The Canadian Government railways did everything they could to facilitate his work, including furnishing him with transportation, good for express or freight trains, so that he was not only in a position to see and direct the handling of shipments of fresh fish at the very important shipping and transhipping point, but was enabled to accompany shipments from place to place and see the conditions at other important shipping points. On the whole he found conditions fairly satisfactory. Following suggestions made by him, the railway arranged to make some improvements for the icing of refrigerator freight cars and the marking of such cars on the outside so as to minimize the danger of their being disconnected from the train at switching points, and so delayed in reaching their destination. It will be remembered that it was regarded by some as necessary that refrigerator express cars should be available for local shipments as well as for through shipments. Experiments made by the inspector proved this not to be so. Fish packed in a liberal supply of ice reached their destination to points in the Maritime Provinces in perfect condition when forwarded in ordinary express cars. It is not considered that it will be necessary to again employ an inspector, at least for the present. The second and third recommendations were:

2. That the express facilities be so improved as to insure daily transportation of sea foods from the east by means of the chilled car service.

3. That the refrigerator car service for the transportation of sea foods be so improved as to render it available on express trains.

In order that the conditions and requirements might be most perfectly understood by both sides, last spring a conference was called by the department of representatives of the railways, express companies and fish merchants. It was of a highly satisfactory nature, and resulted in a clear understanding of the difficulties on both sides. The railway undertook to overcome as far as possible, the obstacles to the more general use of the refrigerator fast freight service, and though it has made consistent earnest efforts in that direction, it must not be overlooked that the movement of troops and war equipment has necessarily seriously handicapped such efforts.

The putting on of a refrigerator express service was subsequently taken up with the manager of the Canadian Government railways. It was found that the existing refrigerator cars are really not safe for use on fast passenger trains, and apart from the undue cost of new cars at the present time, they could not be speedily built. It was arranged, however, that the railway would insulate a portion of one of its large express baggage cars for fish transportation and run a weekly refrigerator service from Mulgrave to Montreal, shipments from Halifax being consolidated at Truro, and if it transpired that this was used to such an extent as to require additional space, further cars would be so arranged. This service was in operation up to the end of November. While it was the best that could be done at that time, it has not proved fully satisfactory. Apart from the lack of proper rolling stock, the heavy loading of the passenger trains involves serious difficulties. Were the express shipments and mails sufficient to warrant special trains, the difficulty would be minimized. This question is being kept in the forefront by the department.

The fourth recommendation was:

That the consolidation of shipments for different points in the express refrigerator car, on the basis of carload express rates, to the farthest point, and the opening of car in transit to set down fish at different centres en route, would materially aid prompt and economical distribution of sea foods.

The express companies, after full consideration of this recommendation, intimated that they are unable to comply with it.

The fifth recommendation was:

That a carload lot express rate, substantially lower than the L.C.L. rate, should be fixed on sea foods from the east.

The companies maintain that the existing L.C.L. rate is as low as a C.L. rate should be, and that they therefore cannot reduce it.

The sixth recommendation was:

That the minimum freight carload quantity, on the Government railway be reduced from a new scale of 24,000 pounds to the former scale of 20,000 pounds, in the case of fresh sea foods, and from the new scale of 30,000 pounds to the former scale of 24,000 pounds in the case of cured sea foods.

The railway agreed to do this, and it was put into effect early last summer.

The seventh recommendation was:

That transportation companies should give special attention to the movement of cars containing perishable food commodities, to secure delivery thereof without deterioration.

This matter was taken up with the railways, and, as previously indicated, in fast freight shipments the cars are being specially marked on the outside, and every care is to be taken of express shipments.

The eighth recommendation was:

That an exclusive express service operated by the Government be inaugurated on the Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island sections of the Government railways, as a preliminary to any general scheme for the nationalization of express business in Canada.

As this is a matter for the Railway Department in the first instance, it was referred to the minister of that department, who will no doubt be in a position to state what conclusion has been reached.

The ninth recommendation was:

That the fish diet be made a special feature on the Intercolonial dining cars, the price not to exceed the cost and expense of serving the same, as shown by the evidence.

(Note.) This would be in line with the policy of certain important railways which make a special feature of food products peculiar to the country traversed by such railways, tending to increase the consumption and advertise the product.

While the Intercolonial Railway has not made a low rate on fish in its dining cars, it is specializing on fish, and calling attention to it by special menu cards.

The tenth recommendation was:

That an active publicity campaign be organized by a competent person to promote an increased demand for sea food in Canada.

In view of the fact that the demand for fish is expanding so rapidly as to make production a real problem, it was considered best to defer action on this matter for the present.

The eleventh recommendation was:

That the department have made, for demonstration purposes: (a) An inexpensive refrigeration box, suitable for use in retail fish stores, in which fresh fish can be attractively displayed without risk of deterioration; and (b) a portable refrigerator, suitable for use in the distribution of sea foods in towns and cities; and that plans and specifications thereof, with estimate of cost, be furnished by the department upon application.

After considerable experimenting the department devised a cheap but attractive and efficient showcase. The names of companies in different parts of the country prepared to manufacture it, and the prices, were procured and pamphlets descriptive of it were prepared and distributed to the trade, and intimating that on application the names and prices of such companies would be given or, if preferred, working plans and specifications would be furnished free to any one desiring to have a case built locally. The wholesale fish firm of D. Hatton Company of Montreal, has recently informed the department that it has 200 of these show cases built, and that it is distributing them amongst the retail trade.

Up to the moment no practical appliance of the character suggested, has been devised, and none can be found to be in use anywhere. The twelfth and thirteenth recommendations were:

> That the existing scale of Government aid in the transportation of certain sea foods by express be for the present continued under regulations as to methods of shipments, and that the steps already taken to promote the packing of herrings by the Scotch method are approved, and that special attention be given to the development of this branch of the industry.

These have been complied with.

With regard to the improvement of lakes and other waters that have been to some extent depleted I may say that fish breeding is being extended as rapidly as feasible, and is being continuously conducted with greater efficiency. The benefits are so well known as to require no argument. The salmon rivers of the Atlantic coast are steadily improving. The Great Lakes were never more productive than at present. Lake Winnipeg, which some years ago was in a serious condition, is quite recovered, and has more fish than for many years past.

The Fisheries Exhibit at the Toronto Exhibition was again given last year, and a restaurant operated in connection with it. I think hon. members who have seen this exhibit will agree that exhibit has not been allowed to suffer by repetition, new features being introduced each year. It was again awarded a gold medal. The patronage of the restaurant was limited only by its capacity. Day after day it was necessary to close the doors at times. Over 37,000 meals were served during the twelve days of the fair. In the year before, the number of meals served was about 25,000. Last year the number was 37,000 as I have stated, and had we had more accommodation, which it was impossible to procure, a still larger number would have been served. We believe that these meals of fish, well served in splendid condition, and at moderate prices, will have the effect of making the value of fish as a food better known in Toronto and in western Ontario generally. Men engaged in the fish business in Toronto have informed me that, as a consequence of this exhibit and restaurant, their business has shown a very considerable increase during the past few years.

While the full information necessary to enable an analysis of the fisheries for the fiscal year which has just closed is not available, one for the calendar year, which can be made up, so far as the sea fisheries are concerned, from the monthly bulletins published by the department, may be of value and interest. Apart from any difference that may exist from year to year, in the number of men and vessels actually engaged in fishing, there are natural conditions which affect the volume of production and which have to be duly considered when comparing the results of one year with another. For example, our salmon production is affected by the phenomenon of a big run occurring on the Fraser river every fourth year, growing gradually less in the following years till it reaches its poorest stage in the year preceding the next big-run year. Our hook and line fisheries for such fish as cod, haddock, hake, halibut, etc., on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts are dependent on a supply of herring for bait, so that a scarcity or abundance of that bait fish immensely affects the output, of the line fishermen.

The dogfish is always with us,—in vaster numbers in some seasons than in others—devouring edible fish and destroying gear to such an extent as to stop operations at times. The somewhat erratic appearances of the mackerel and herring masses and fish of their kind on our coasts produce varying results from year to year. Finally, by limiting the number of fishing days, or permitting operations on the greatest possible number of days in the course of a season, the weather conditions affect the production of all kinds of fish, perhaps more than any other natural agent.

The season of 1916 was characterized by several adverse conditions. There was a general scarcity of men, particularly on the Pacific coast, owing to enlistments; the poorest salmon year in the cycle of four on the Fraser river occurred; there was an abnormal amount of unfavourable, foggy weather on the Atlantic coast; the spring herring fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence was much curtailed owing to ice remaining on the coast till a late date; and the summer and fall herring fishery all over the Atlantic coast was practically a failure. Considering these adverse conditions, it is not surprising to find the production of some of the chief kinds somewhat below that of the year before. Compared with 1913, however,—a pre-war year,—the production of cod, haddock, etc., and such fish as remain fairly constant on the grounds, was very much greater during 1916. The marketed value of the product in the year 1915 was the greatest in the history of our Canadian fisheries, reaching a total of $35,860,708, which exceeded the total for the pre-war year of 1913, by $2,652,960, notwithstanding the fact that 1913 was a big-run year on the Fraser river. So far as the incomplete figures for the past season permit us to arrive at conclusions, it would appear that the record value of our fisheries in 1915 has been substantially exceeded in 1916.

Looking at the figures for some of the chief kinds, we find that the quantity of lobsters landed in 1916 was 2 per cent greater, and the value 21 per cent greater than in 1915. Compared with 1913, the increase in quantity is 10 per cent, and in value 11 per cent, the prices paid by the canneries in 1913 being somewhat higher than those paid in 1916. The quantity of cod, haddock, hake and pollock taken in 1916 was 7 per cent less than in 1915, but the value was 14 per cent greater. The slightly diminished landings of those fish were due partly to the fact that there were not so many Lunenburg vessels engaged in the bank fishery, and partly to a scarcity of bait during the best part of the inshore fishing season. Compared with 1913, however, the catch of 1916 was 24 per cent greater, while the value was greater by 52 per cent.

The quantity of herring and mackerel landed in 1916 was 25 per cent less than in 1915, and 32 per cent less than in 1913. The value, however, did not fall to the same extent, as prices were from 50 per cent to 100 per cent above normal. The total catch of halibut in 1916 fell below that in 1915 by 8 per cent, but there was an increase in value. Compared with 1913, the catch of 1916 was 13 per cent, and the value 60 per cent greater. In the year 1913, however, American vessels had not begun to land their catches at Prince Rupert.

The sardine fishery resulted in a decrease of 11 per cent in quantity, but an increase of 37 per cent in value when compared with 1915. Comparing the past season's catch with that of 1913, we find an increase of 100 per cent in quantity and 167 per cent in value. The movements of these small fish like the movements of all the herring kind, are uncertain, and as they are captured almost entirely by fixed appliances, the fluctuation in the quantity taken from year to year is consequently considerable. The value has increased much in keeping with that of other canned products since the outbreak of war.

The smelt fishery, owing to lack of ice on the rivers, was not so productive as usual, the falling off in 1916, compared with 1915, was 6 per cent in quantity, but there was an increase of 22 per cent in value. Compared with 1913, the catch of 1916 was 14 per cent less, while the value was 16 per cent greater.

Complete returns of men and material employed in the fisheries during 1916 are not yet at hand, but a comparison of the number of fishing bounty claims paid in the past season with the number paid in the preceding year indicates that fewer vessels, fewer boats and fewer men were engaged in the fisheries of the Atlantic coast. In 1915 bounty was paid on 13,926 boats and to 24,670 boat fishermen. In the past year the numbers were 12,350 boats and 21,700 boat fishermen, with a few late claims likely to come yet. In 1915 bounty was paid to 6,107 vessel fishermen in vessels aggregating 23,638 tons. In the past year there were 5,450 vessel fishermen in vessels aggregating 20,150 tons to whom bounty was paid, with a few late claims also likely to come in.

Our boat fishermen and those who fish in inshore waters now find the motor-boat indispensable to the success of their operations. It gets speedily to and from the fishing grounds quite independently of winds, tides, and, in a great measure, weather conditions. Also, it permits operations over a greater range of fishing grounds than was possible with the old sail boat. We do not know exactly how many motor-boats were used in the fisheries of 1916, but the figures for 1915, and the preceding four years, are illustrative of the rapid advance made in the use of such craft. In 1911 there were 5,580 motor fishing boats in the whole of Canada; in 1912, 5,911; in 1913, 8,700; in 1914, 9,302, and in 1915, 11,097.

Improvements are constantly taking place in the handling and manufacturing of cured fish of all kinds. The proportion of the inshore catch of cod, hake, etc., that is dried is annually growing less, while that used fresh and cut for the boneless trade is increasing and bringing enhanced values. In the pickled fish trade, through the stimulus of the Fish Inspection Act, increased attention is being given to the production of better packages and to improving the grade and quality of the pack. We are now using in the salt mackerel trade an iron-hooped hard wood barrel superior to that used in any other country. Manufacturers of the finnan haddie, which is the mainstay of the smoked fish business, have within the last four or five years greatly improved its palatableness by realizing that too much salt and smoke applied to a fish that is really intended for almost immediate use are apt to curtail its consumption.

Looking at it all over, the production of our fisheries in 1916 is very gratifying. This gratification is mingled with regret, however, because of the reported loss of 23 fisherment while pursuing their calling on various parts of our coasts. In view of the preparations that are being made for the coming season, and of the fact that this is the big run year for salmon on the Fraser river, we may look upon it as quite within the range of the probabilities that the value of the output in 1917 will reach the $40,000,000 mark.

INSPECTION OF FISH.

The past season is the second in which inspection has taken place. There were in all 7,213 barrels of herring, alewives and mackerel presented for the brand. Of that number 2,688 were refused the brand, because of either poor quality of fish, bad grading or inferior barrels. In the previous year, 1,328 barrels were presented for the brand, of which 117 were refused. The number presented for the brand and the number refused the brand by districts were as follows:

In the district of H. H. Mann, Cape Breton Island, 305 barrels were presented, of which 31 were refused owing to poor packages. In the district of R. Gray, Halifax, Guysboro, and Antigonish counties, N.S., 1,493 barrels were presented, of which 575 were refused, because of too light salting and bad grading. In the district of A. R. Hilts, Lunenburg county westward and round to Kings county, N.S., 1,744 barrels were presented, of which 238 were refused for bad grading. It was ultimately discovered that 400 barrels of this lot had deteriorated in quality and after a re-examination the brand was removed before final shipment. In the district of T. Doyle, Magdalen Islands, Prince Edward Island, and part of the Gulf shore of Nova Scotia, 91 barrels were presented, of which 62 were refused because of poor quality and bad grading. This officer devoted much time at the Magdalen Islands endeavouring by practical demonstration to improve the fishermen's methods of splitting, cleaning and curing their mackerel, and while improvement undoubtedly resulted, he found that the fish generally were not cured entirely up to the standard required for the brand. In the district of C. Hubbard, Restigouche county to Kent county, N.B., 1,817 barrels were presented and 31 refused, owing to inferior packages and the poor quality of the fish.

In the district of A .O. H. Wilson, Charlotte, St. John, Albert and Westmorland counties, N.B., 1,763 barrels were presented, of which 1,720 were refused because of leaky barrels and the poor condition of the fish.

Mr. McKENZIE: How many were presented?

Mr. HAZEN: 1,763 in that district and 1,720 were refused.

Mr. McKENZIE: Only a few were accepted.

Mr. HAZEN: Only a few were accepted. They were in poor barrels. I understand that the difficulty is now being overcome and that next year fishermen will have no trouble, owing to the improved methods of the coopers in getting good barrels so that the fish can be properly preserved and can be branded, and so command higher prices. In the district of A. O. H. Wilson, Charlotte, St. John, Albert and Westmorland counties, N.B., 1,763 barrels were presented, of which 1,720 were refused because of leaky barrels and the poor condition of the fish. The brand was taken advantage of by 73 separate packers against 16 in the preceding year. In the course of the year, 67 merchants and packers, including a number of individual fishermen, applied for and received instruction in herring-curing in the Scotch style.

The summer and fall herring fishing last season was little better than a failure on the Atlantic coast, and as a result not more than 30 packers actually cured herring in the Scotch method. Of these, 22 presented their pack for inspection and the brand. Fifteen cooperages which produce barrels in considerable quantities, applied for and received instruction in Scotch barrel making. These were located as follows:—1 in Ontario, 2 in New Brunswick, and 12 in Nova Scotia. A number of scattered individual coopers, who make a few barrels for split herring, were also visited, as they could be located, and instruction given them. Perfection in barrel-making has not yet been reached, but many of the coopers are now turning out a really good barrel.

It should be kept in mind that the amount or value of the work performed by the inspecting officers, cannot be measured by the actual number of barrels presented to them for the brand, because inspection is not obligatory. Hon. gentlemen will remember, when the Bill was passed it was made permissive, it was at the option of those who were doing the packing as to whether they would have inspection or not. As the demand for almost any kind of fish is abnormal at present, it frequently happens that a packer, after benefiting by the visits and instruction of our officers, ships off his fish without waiting for the officer to return and brand them.

In addition to the instructions contained in the Act and its regulations, the department in the beginning of last year issued to the trade pamphlets of special instructions in barrel-making and curing in the Scotch method. Prior to the fishing season and during its progress, each officer visited packers, barrel-makers and dealers within his district and kept before them the merits of the inspection system and endeavoured to persuade packers to cure their fish in accordance with the requirements of the Act. Instructional pamphlets will again be distributed to coopers and packers for their guidance this year, while practical demonstrations in barrel-making and curing will be continued.

HERRING FISHING OPERATIONS.

In the course of the past summer, the department fitted out one of its steamers with herring drift-nets, for the purpose of endeavouring to locate the herring schools off shore in the Atlantic, and to catch them at a time when the fish are in the best condition for curing for the best markets. It is difficult for one boat to accomplish much in the course of one short herring season. A considerable amount of success was met with, however, notwithstanding a general failure in the herring fishery, and much valuable information secured concerning the size and quality of fish on the different grounds worked over. The boat began operations about the middle of May, and continued till the latter part of August. Fishing grounds extending from off Victoria county in Cape Breton to those off Shelburne county in Nova Scotia, were operated on. In all, 388 barrels of herring, and 5,622 barrels of mackerel were secured. June and July were the best months. Herring were scarce in August, and dogfish very plentiful. A detailed report of the quantity and quality of fish taken on the various fishing grounds has been printed and distributed to those in the trade who are concerned in the business.

DAILY BAIT REPORTS.

For the purpose of assisting masters of fishing vessels to locate bait supplies during the cod fishing season, the department operates a system whereby definite information concerning bait along certain stretches of the Atlantic seaboard is collected by the local fishery officers and despatched daily, by telegram, to certain important sea ports, and there posted up. The number of ports selected as receiving stations is necessarily limited, in the interest of economy, but through the courtesy of the Halifax daily papers, in which the telegrams are published each day, the smaller fishing centres also derive the benefit of direct advice as to available supplies of bait. Copies of all telegrams received at the receiving stations are mailed to the department at the end of each week, by which means the work is closely followed and checked. During the spring of the past year, ninety telegrams were sent from the Magdalen islands, Souris, P.E.I., and Queensport, N.S., to Canso, Halifax, Lunenburg and Riverport, N.S. During July and August, 195 telegrams were sent from Little Bras d'Or, L'Ardoise, Canso and Musquodoboit Harbour, N.S., to North Sydney, Canso, Halifax, Lunenburg and Shelburne, N.S.; also from Lockeport, N.S., to Canso and Halifax, N.S.; from Shag Harbour to Halifax, Shelburne and Lockeport, N.S. From the beginning of September to the end of November, 66 telegrams were sent from Campobello, N.B., covering information from the counties of Charlotte and St. John, N.B., to Digby, Yarmouth, Pubnico and Clark's Harbour, N.S. The information contained in the telegrams was of much benefit to line fishermen who were in search of bait, by directing them to where supplies were available, and to net fishermen who had bait to sell by bringing purchasers to them.

As will be seen from the foregoing, considerable is being done to educate the fishermen and encourage them in the adoption of better methods, but some definite and comprehensive system of technical education all along the lines connected with their work is needed, and the matter is receiving attention, in order that everything may be in readiness to begin work as soon as possible after the return of peaceful days. Fishermen have not had sufficient pride in their calling, and too often their sons have been encouraged to take up other vocations. There is consequently a shortage of skilled fishermen, and just at a time when they are urgently needed. When the war is over, it would be a good thing if skilled fishermen from desirable European countries wishing to immigrate would come to Canada. They would find splendid opportunities here, and I think it will be admitted that we need them for the proper development of this industry, which offers employment to so many people.

This afternoon the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson), who moved a resolution that it was desirable that the Department of Fisheries should be established under the control of a separate minister who would devote his entire attention to the encouragement and development of the fisheries alone, said that, in his opinion, the increase in the growth of our fisheries had not been satisfactory. If I recollect correctly, he told the House that $75,000,000 was the value of the fisheries in the United States, while the value of the fisheries in Canada last year was $35,000,000. I think my hon. friend ought to bear in mind that the conditions in the two countries are not similar. I do not think that the comparison which my hon. friend makes is one that justifies or bears out his contention. We must remember that the United States to-day is a nation of about 100,000,000 people, that the American fishermen have a market for their fish right at their very doors, that the industry there has been much longer established than in this country, and that there are a great many more men engaged in it than are engaged in fishing in Canada. If he compares our population of less than 8,000,000 with the American population of nearly 100,000,000, he will see that our production of $35,000,000 worth, which will be increased this year to $40,000,000 worth, is not an unfavourable one for Canada. There is no doubt, as my hon. friend stated, that Canada's fishing grounds are the most extensive in the world. We have on the Atlantic coast about 5,000 miles of sea coast, running from the Ste. Croix river around New Brunswick and Nova Scotia up the gulf of St. Lawrence. We have on the Pacific coast some 7,500 miles of sea coast, not counting indentations and many of the bays, and we have also in Ontario and in the western provinces, very extensive fresh water lakes in which many fish like whitefish, sturgeon, pickerel and others of very considerable value are to be found. There is no doubt that as the development of the country proceeds, as the number of our fishermen increases and as a greater market for their product becomes available, there will be a much larger production of fish than there has been in years past. In making that assertion, may I point out that from the year 1886 until a few years ago, little or no progress was made in the Atlantic fisheries. My hon. friend is disposed to attribute this circumstance to lack of proper attention by the department in charge. While it is true that there was very little progress in the Atlantic fisheries during the time referred to, it is fair to bear in mind that the conditions prevailing before 1886 were much more favourable to the Atlantic fisheries than the conditions during many years following that date. From 1854 until a year before Confederation a reciprocity treaty had been effective under which fish and the products of the fisheries were admitted into the United States markets free of duty. In 1872 the Treaty of Washington was entered into, which again gave the freedom of United States markets to our fishermen. This treaty remained effective until 1885, and its provisions were much more important to our fishermen at that time than they would be now. Again, the mackerel fishery was at its zenith during the years prior to 1886. The quantity of mackerel taken then was nearly three times as much as the quantity taken now, the value being nearly double. Moreover, the general conditions in the country from 1886 onward for a number of years were not such as to afford much opportunity for the rapid development of our Atlantic fisheries. No doubt the pickled fishing industry could have been greatly developed under proper conditions, but it was a difficult matter to find capital ready for investment in that direction, and the competition of a well-established business from Europe had to be met and overcome. Under the Fish Inspection Act, applied three years ago, and which has been in operation two seasons, the necessary steps to develop this industry are now being taken.

My hon. friend points out that the original department was the Department of Marine and Fisheries. No doubt the work of that department has enormously developed since its inception a year or two after Confederation. A judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who was Minister of Marine and Fisheries from 1896 to 1902 said the other day that the department, from what he saw of it, must have ten times as much work to do now as it had during his time. Other work has since been added to the department. Some years ago the work of the St. Lawrence ship channel was administered by the Department of Public Works, but when Mr. Prefontaine was Minister of Marine and Fisheries that work was transferred to that Department. Then, it was provided by the terms of the Naval Act that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should be the Minister of Naval Affairs. I assume it was thought at the time that there would not be very much work in the Department of Naval Affairs. That was the case for a time, and that was the reason why we divided the department. When I came into the department I found the Marine and Fisheries Branch very much overburdened with work, while the Naval Service Branch had not nearly so much to do. For the purpose, therefore, of equalizing the work, the administration of matters pertaining to the Fisheries was handed over to the Department of Naval Service. The Fisheries Department administers the Fisheries Protection fleet and the Fisheries Patrol fleet, both of which services logically come under the Department of Naval Service. There is no doubt that the work has enormously extended. While that is the case, I think the hon. member for Digby jumped at too hasty a conclusion when he intimated that the work of the Fisheries Department was being neglected and had been neglected ever since the department was formed. He asserts that during all these years, even when the work of the department was not so extensive, proper and adequate attention was not given to the development of our fisheries. I shall not argue that much more cannot be done than has been done, but the fisheries officers of the department—I know them intimately—are very capable men indeed. Mr. Found is wonderfully well informed with regard to fishery matters, is a most energetic official and active in the discharge of the duties of his position. The same may be said of Professor Prince, a scientific man connected with the Fisheries Department, as well as the other fishery officers.

During the past five years great attention has been given to the development of our fisheries with the result that many waters that were being rapidly depleted a few years ago, have been replenished with fish. There has been also an increase in the salmon fisheries of the Atlantic coast, and in many other directions considerable development has been attained. This is true in respect of all branches of the fisheries, with the exception of the oyster industry, which, unfortunately, for quite a number of years showed a steady diminution. I am glad to say, however, that under arrangements made between the Federal and the Provincial Governments, barren bottoms are being leased for replanting, and the chances are that along the coast of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, as has been the case in United States, a great development of that industry will take place, with great benefit to the oyster fishermen and to those who have been enterprising enough to put their money into the work of development which is now going on.

I am not prepared to discuss whether or not there should be another department to take charge of the fisheries. My hon. friend has suggested that the reason why Newfoundland does not come into the union is because they fear that sufficient attention will not be paid to their fisheries. I think that is the first time that reason has been suggested; I always understood that other reasons induced a great many of the people of Newfoundland not to look favourably upon the idea of a confederation with the other provinces of British North America. I sincerely hope that that idea is disappearing, because I think it would be a splendid thing for Newfoundland, for Canada and for the Empire, if Newfoundland should eventually come into the union, situated as it is at the mouth of the St. Lawrence and at the very entrance to the heart of Canada. I do not think my hon. friend can find the slightest justification for the argument that he has put forward in this respect. It may be that fishery matters in Canada can be treated with greater energy. One of the difficulties encountered at present is that a great many men have gone away to fight and there are not as many men available to engage in the industry as there were some years ago. At present there is a market for all the Canadian fish that can be produced. The home market is increasing. People at points distant from the sea-board, owing to the campaign of education that has been taking place, are beginning to appreciate in greater degree the value of fish as a food. In view of the high price of meat of all kinds, fish will doubtless be sought more than it has been in the past. Moreover, our fish are being sold in increasing quantities in the American markets, and large quantities of Canadian fish are being sent over to Great Britain not only for our soldiers, but for the purpose of feeding the civil population as well. The reason for that is that in Great Britain the condition of affairs is such that many of the trawlers in the North sea have been driven off the waters, some having been torpedoed, others havings been taken over by the Admiralty. When I was in Great Britain a few weeks ago, I was talking to a gentleman in Grimsby, one of the largest fishing centres in that country, and he told me that from the port where he lived there had usually, in normal times, been 36 trawlers sailing out into the North sea, but that at the present time there were only five trawlers engaged in the fishing business. As a result, there is not the same supply of fish from home waters or from water contiguous to Great Britain for sale in the different markets, and there is a market there for Canadian fish, for the use not only of our soldiers but of the civil population as well. I asked that gentleman whether it was likely that the trade in frozen fish in Great Britain would be permanent, and his idea was that it would not; that after the war, when the fishing industry in Great Britain again assumed its normal condition, when the trawlers were all in commission again, bringing in fish daily for distribution throughout the country, it would be unnecessary for the British to have frozen fish brought from Canada, as they would have an ample supply for themselves. I think it is perfectly clear that the consumption of fish in Canada must and will develop, and year by year people are realizing, through instrumentalities such as the Toronto Exhibition, the distribution of literature, the discussion of this matter in Parliament, the discussion that goes on in the press from time to time, the value of fish as a food. When conditions again become normal, no doubt there will be an enormous development of our fisheries on our sea coasts and on our lakes. It is most gratifying to know that in lake Winnipeg and in our Ontario lakes where the fish were depleted years ago, the result of the fish breeding hatcheries has been that more fish are to be found in those lakes to-day than during the past generation.

My hon. friend (Mr. Jameson) has done good service in bringing this matter to the attention to the House. As he said, it is not often we have a discussion in this Parliament on an economic question. We can discuss this matter without any prejudice and without any idea of gaining any party advantage, because we are all only too anxious to develop the great resources of the country, to make them as valuable to our people as possible and to preserve them as far as we can for the use of future generations.

After the war there will possibly have to be a very general change in regard to the departments of Government, and probably this House will have to consider the desirability of having a naval department standing by itself with a separate minister entirely apart from the minister who administers the Department of Fisheries. We may find it necessary to do as has been done in Australia, where the system has been adopted of having a defence minister, who administers both the War Department and the Naval Department. To-day my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) stated that he has received letters suggesting that a separate Department of Mines ought to be created under a minister, for the purpose of developing the mining industry of the country. These suggestions are all, of course, subject to consideration, and I for one am not prepared to say that they do not carry weight, but at the same time we must bear in mind that for a country with a population of less than 8,000,000 we have a large Government as it is; we have some 17 or 18 ministers and more than that number of departments because some ministers preside over more than one department. The whole question is one that cannot be determined simply on a resolution of this character dealing with one department of the Government; it will have to be dealt with from a more general standpoint when the war is over.

So far as my department is concerned, as my hon. friend has pointed out to-day, it is finding a great deal of work to do and has more subjects to deal with than any other department of Government. A great deal of additional work has been thrown on our shoulders, not only in the Naval Department, but in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, as a consequence of conditions that have been created by the war. I would like to pay this tribute to the men and women in my department with whom I am working every day: for I have always found them anxious, ready and willing to undertake that extra work, and cheerfully to do what they can, under the abnormal circumstances that exist, to keep the work of the department up to the mark and, as far as possible, promptly to deal with all questions that come before the department. As minister of the department, I cannot, as my hon. friend says, give my entire attention to the fisheries or to any one branch of the department. Not only has a minister the duties of his department to attend to, but he has to attend to his work in Parliament; he has the affairs of his constituents to attend to—and that is not a small work when he represents a large constituency—and he has also to give time to certain political questions that have to be considered from time to time. Canadian ministers do what ministers do in England: The departments have permanent heads who are men of capacity and ability, and the different branches of the departments are presided over by men of ability. The different matters that come up for consideration have to be thought out by the permanent heads of the department, and then those matters are submitted to the minister who has to use his very best judgment in coming to a conclusion according to the facts presented to him. No minister can spend his time in digging up those facts for himself or in classifying them; he has to depend on the judgment of others, and in many cases men in this country and in every other country are called upon to preside over departments concerning the work of which they have had no previous knowledge. That is so in Great Britain. The Earl of Derby is called to be Minister of War; Sir Edward Carson, a lawyer, is made First Lord of the Admiralty, and Mr. Bonar Law, a man who in his earlier days was engaged in the iron business, becomes Chancellor of the Exchequer. The same thing prevails in this country. You cannot have for Postmaster General a man who has always been a postmaster and who has had a knowledge of postal affairs, and all a minister can do is to do as a judge does, to bring his intelligence to bear upon the different questions with which he has to deal, obtaining from those who are acquainted with the work of the department, the best knowledge they can lay before him and obtaining the best views that he can get, and then to make up his mind. Other men might possibly be able to do more work than I can perform; but there is a limit to what any man can do, and I know that in my department at the present time, so far as my officials are concerned and so far as I myself am concerned, every minute of our time is occupied. When conditions become more normal, a distribution may be made that will be more in the public interest; but I do not wish to admit for one moment that my predecessors in office neglected the interest of the fisheries, and, so far as I am concerned, I desire to say that every attention that is possible under existing circumstances has been given to the development of the fisheries, and if I can rely on the judgment of my fishery officials more work of development has taken place during the past four or five years than in many years previously.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the minister on his new departure. I am sure that his address has been listened to with a great deal of interest by members on both sides of the House. It has often occurred to me that it would be a good thing that when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries asks for his Estimates for the year, he should make a statement of the work of the past year and the policy that the department intends to pursue for the year to come. The minister has adopted that suggestion. While we listened with interest, as we always do, to his smooth and persuasive speech some of us were not a little disappointed that he has not been able to work out a more progressive policy. I sympathize with the attitude taken by my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson) that the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and especially the Fisheries Branch has not been conducted vigorously in the past, and has not done the work that the country expected it to do. My hon. friend from Digby intimated that the colony of Newfoundland had kept out of the Union for fear their fisheries would be neglected if they joined this Dominion. I do not know whether that is the case or not, but I cannot help feeling that the fishing interests of the province from which I come would have been in much better shape than they are in to-day if they remained under local control. Other industries in the province of Nova Scotia have made splendid progress. We have been able to develop a great coal mining industry, a very important fruit industry, as well as a great agricultural industry. All of these are under the control of a vigorous local Administration. On the other hand the fishing industry, which is really one of the most important in our province, has been marking time for practically half a century. In the last report of the Marine and Fisheries Department you will find that there has been no increase during the last 30 years in the value of the fish caught. But that does not tell the whole story. During that period there was really a decrease in the quantity of fish caught, but on account of the higher price the total value of the catch kept up to the level of thirty years ago. Now that is not a very good record, especially for the provinces of Nova Scotia which is the great fishing province of eastern Canada. Whatever progress has been made has been made largely in the province of British Columbia, where the salmon and halibut industry have been developed. The fact that the total value of the fisheries of Canada show an increase is due to the progress that has been made in British Columbia, and not because of any progress in the Maritime Provinces or in Quebec. I attribute the development of the industry on the Pacific coast partly to the fact that the railway express companies have dealt with the transportation question in a vigorous manner. There the Dominion Express Company as a means of transportation has been very successful; but our experience has been different in eastern Canada. The remedy that my hon. friend from Digby suggests is to appoint a Minister of Fisheries. I do not know whether that will be of any great value. I think it would be quite suffiicent if a little more life could be infused into the present minister. If he would only show a little more vigour and enthusiasm, introduce necessary reforms in the department, I think we could get along very well with one minister. But the minister must give his officials a lead. I do not object to the proposal of my hon. friend from Digby, but I do not think it is the best remedy. The situation requires something more, and I think it could be met by the present minister if he would only show more energy and conduct the department on business principles.

My hon. friend has referred to the fact that last year the Marine and Fisheries Committee held a number of meetings and carefully investigated the fisheries of this country, but, as my hon. friend from Digby pointed out, we were not honoured with a visit from the minister during the whole session. The committee in their report made certain recommendations, which the minister has gone over very carefully to-night, indicating to what extent they have been carried out. He failed, however, to show that anything substantial has been done. An attempt was made to do something in the way of inspection. A man was sent to Mulgrave we are told for two or three months to look after shipments from that point. The minister withdrew the man and never expects to send him back again. That was a very abortive attempt in the direction of inspecting shipments. Everybody knows that fish is the most perishable article on the market. No other article begins to decay so quickly, and it is therefore of the utmost importance to have the best transportation facilities. There should be a cold storage at the terminals, and quick transport by refrigerator cars; the fish should be got to the market in good condition and with as little delay as possible. Without these facilities the fishing industry cannot be developed. The minister's attempt at inspection was so ridiculous that nobody will regard it as a final attempt. We shall not be satisfied until something more is done.

I need not point out to the House that the fishing industry is capable of very great development. My hon. friend from Digby pointed out that for the capital invested, no Canadian industry gives such a large return. The industry has a capital invested of about $25,000,000, which includes wharves, warehouses, and all appliances on land as well as the boats, vessels, and nets that are used on the sea, and that investment of $25,000,000 brings in a yearly return at present of $35,000,000. I do not think that can be said of any other Canadian industry. There is no reason why that $35,000,000 could not be enormously increased, doubled or trebled, in fact, with proper facilities. We have assisted many other industries in this country by bonuses. We have spent from $16,000,000 to $20,000,000 in bonusing the steel industry, and as a result a great industry has been built up in this country which otherwise we probably should not have had. The fishermen are self reliant and they are not asking for anything of that kind so far as I know. What they are asking for is a chance to carry on their business; they want the facilities for developing the industry, not a cash bonus.

The greatest question of all is transportation. We cannot develop the fishing industry unless we can improve transportation from the place where the fish is caught to the market. My own constituency affords a very good illustration of that fact. About twenty years ago the town of Canso in my constituency was carrying on a fishing business in the old-fashioned way. They had no proper means of sending fresh fish to market because at that time there was no daily boat connecting the town of Canso with the Intercolonial at Mulgrave. The consequence was that they were unable to develop the trade and they had to sell it in the old-fashioned way, either dried or pickled.

This condition of affairs was brought to the attention of the former Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, and he was asked to do something to enable the fishermen of Canso to ship their fish by the Intercolonial railway to Montreal. The Government of which he was a member gave a small subsidy, $5,000 per year to aid in placing a steamer on the route between Canso and Mulgrave. A steamer was secured, and the business immediately began to grow, as the following figures showing the shipments actually made, will demonstrate:

Comparative Shipments of Fish via Intercolonial Railway From Mulgrave.

Year.	Tons Fish Shipped.	Value.	Railway & Express Charges Paid.
1891	162	$ 11,340	$ 1,134.00
1895	790	69,900	4,805.00

1915	6419	481,425	72,371.77
1916	7116	569,335	90,434.04

Add to this the shipments from Canso by water:

	Value.	Freights.
250 tons fish oil	$ 12,000	$1,200
75 tons fish glue	9,000	360
350 tons fish fertilizer	12,250	1,750
1100 tons fish	77,000	5,500
1775 tons.	$110,250	$8,810

This is one of the best illustrations you can have of the development that might be brought about on the coast by giving the people a chance to transport their fish to the market. The trade shown in the figures I have just given could not have been built up without a daily boat to Mulgrave, or without refrigerator cars on the Intercolonial railway.

There are just two questions that have to be dealt with: the first is transportation, and the second is the market. We have not a very extensive market for fresh fish in Canada; our cities have not grown to enormous size as yet. We cannot get up a very large fish trade either on the Atlantic coast or on the Pacific coast if we are to be confined altogether to the Canadian market. There are two markets open for the Canadian fisherman, the Canadian and the American. It is much more important for the people on the coast of Nova Scotia to reach the Boston market than to reach the market at Montreal. We are very glad to be able to reach the market of Montreal, and it is a good market, but it will never develop the fishing industry in large degree; we must be able to reach also the United States market if we are to develop a great fishing industry on the Atlantic coast. I made the suggestion to the Minister of Trade and Commerce two or three years ago, that he should do something in the way of getting a fast fish boat to ply between the ports of Nova Scotia and Boston. My proposal, I am sorry to say, was not adopted. Boston, let me say, is one of the greatest fish markets in the world; I suppose that there is no other in the world so large, except, possibly, Grimsby in England. From Boston, fish are transported to New York and other great cities of the coast, and to all other points in the United States this side of the Rocky Mountains. We reach that market from Yarmouth at the present time by a regular steamboat service and a good industry has been built up from that point, just because they have the transportation facilities. If we had some way of collecting the fish along the coast—and that is a matter for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to think about—we could forward a very much larger quantity to the American market than we are forwarding now by way of Yarmouth. There are other points on the coast where fish could be collected, such as Halifax, Mulgrave, and Sydney, where the Intercolonial touches. The Intercolonial has never been progressive in this respect. If my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) could persuade the Minister of Railways to do something to develop the fishing industry, he would be helping the fishing industry and also helping to build up business for the Intercolonial. I have shown you how, by the investment of $5,000 in a small subsidy, the Intercolonial is now reaping $90,000 a year for the freights on the fish that are brought to the railway at one point by the subsidized boats. Canso and Queensport are not the only places where that development could take place; equally good results could be gained at other points if facilities were given. This is work I should expect my hon. friend to do, but which he has not done. I think his address of this evening will be disappointing to the fishing interests of the country. He has given us a long speech covering statistics which we could read in the blue book, but he has not outlined any policy to build up the fishing industry. At the investigation of last year, to which he referred, a great deal of information is brought out. The report of that investigation was printed in the form of a book of 300 pages. It covered a great many suggestions from the committee, but no substantial attempt has been made to carry them out. In order to show this committee how backward the transportation facilities are between the Atlantic coast and the city of Montreal, I wish to read an extract from the evidence of Mr. A. H. Brittain. Mr. Brittain is managing director of the Maritime Fish Company, and also chairman of the Transportation Committee for the Canadian Fisheries Association. The committee were discussing the matter of the transportation facilities between the Atlantic coast and the city of Montreal, and certain questions were put to Mr. Brittain which he answered. The report of the evidence on that point is as follows:

By Mr. McKenzie:

Q. In regard to the question of transportation, do you think that the fast freight is a practical proposition from the railway standpoint?—A. Yes, I believe it is. I believe that the fast freight will eventually take care of the business that has grown up from the express service. But we cannot do away with the latter. Even with the fast freight service we shall still need the express service; we want both.

Q. Do you think the supply of fish in the Maritime Provinces would not be sufficient to require a train every second or third day?—A. No, not a train, we have not as yet got the consuming population.

Q. The problem from the railway standpoint is how to care for the balance of this trade needing a fast freight service.—A. I would not suggest that the railway companies should make up fish trains at the present time; I would not care to have that go down as a suggestion from me. What I do suggest is, that the refrigerator service in connection with the express service at the present time, study the advantages of fast freight in connection with shipments of fish; and last, but not least, that the effort be made to try and make arrangements with the express companies—from the east I am talking of—to put one end of the car into such shape that it would be used as a refrigerator and not left open for any ordinary express matter. As I explained before, in the summer time the cars are hot, they arrive in Montreal with no ice in them, and the shipment itself high and dry. In the winter time the cars, owing to the steam pipes with which they are fitted, are so hot that the fish arrives with no ice on it, and when it gets to Toronto it is also high and dry. There is the same difficulty in the winter as in the summer.

By Mr. Kyte:

Q. Then they are not refrigerator cars?—A. No. We have no refrigerator service from the east for less than carload lots by express.

You would hardly believe that such is the case, but here is the statement of Mr. Brittain that after forty years' experience with the Intercolonial service between the Maritime Provinces and Montreal we are not yet able to send a box of fresh fish to Montreal from Nova Scotia in a refrigerator car by express. That is the situation, and yet my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries does not see any way of remedying it. You can send a carload by fast freight. That system was introduced by the last Administration, it is continued and has been instrumental in building up a fine trade, but if you want to send a box of fresh fish to Montreal or to any other place from the Maritime Provinces by express you have to put it into an express car and mix it up with dry goods or other articles, like ladies' bonnets, or anything else that the express people have to carry. The car is heated in order to keep the express man warm during the winter and the consequence is that before the fish gets any distance on the way to Montreal the ice has melted and the fish is liable to be in such a condition that it is unfit for use. That is the condition of the express service and my hon. friend confesses that he has not been able to do anything to remedy it. I am not giving you my own statement for this, but I am giving you the statement of the managing director of the largest fish company in eastern Canada on this same point. I would also like to read you an extract from the address of the president of the Canadian Fisheries' Association, held in Montreal on the 17th February of the present year and published in the Canadian Fisherman. The president, Mr. D. J. Byrne, who is a prominent man in connection with the fish trade of Montreal, delivered an address, from which the following is an extract:—

It is an absolute fact that the full development of the fish trade in Canada and the development, as well as the increase for home consumption has been seriously retarded by obsolete methods of transportation which are still in vogue and which it has been our constant effort to improve. We should insist that Railway and Express Companies carrying perishable fish products provide up-to-date equipment for the purpose, because in no other way can the home market be developed to its fullest extent and it is quite safe to predict that when fresh fish can be delivered at consuming centres in the best possible condition the demand will increase to an extent which cannot be hoped for without these necessary improvements.

I would strongly recommend that the incoming Executive Committee spare no effort to secure the improved facilities and proper service from the various transportation companies handling our products, from which they derive large revenues. I suggest that the assistance of the Naval Service Department of our Federal Government be again enlisted with this object in view.

It is, therefore, the opinion of the president of the Fisheries' Association that our methods of transportation between the Maritime Provinces and Montreal are obsolete and as a result we have not been able, with these methods, to build up anything approaching a great fishing industry. Still the minister seems to be quite satisfied with these methods. I do not know whether we can do anything more to convince him or not, but in looking over the list of recommendations made by the special committee of this House on fisheries, I cannot find that very much has been done. The first of the recommendations which was made is one in regard to inspection. An abortive attempt was made at Mulgrave to do something in the way of inspecting shipments, but my hon. friend seems to have abandoned the idea of doing anything more. The second is:—

That the express facilities be so improved as to ensure daily transportation of sea foods from the east by means of the chilled car service.

Nothing has been done in the direction of improving the express service from the East.

3. That the refrigerator car service for the transportation of sea foods be so improved as to render it available on express trains.

That has not been done.

4. That the consolidation of shipments for different points in the express refrigerator car, on the basis of carload express rates, to the farthest point, and the opening of car in transit to set down fish at different centres en route, would materially aid prompt and economical distribution of sea foods.

I have heard it questioned whether that is a practical proposal or not, but at all events there has been apparently no investigation and no attempt to carry it out. The next is:—

That a carload lot express rate, substantially lower than the L.C.L. rate should be fixed on sea goods from the east.

That has not been done. Recommendation No. 6 has been carried out, but No. 6 simply recommends that the old quantity be restored. It is:—

That the minimum freight carload quantity, on the Government Railway be reduced from the new scale of 24,000 pounds to the former scale of 20,000 pounds.

That was the proposal and that has been done. I never saw any good reason for increasing the minimum carload quantity and there was so much opposition to the increase that my hon. friend apparently secured the consent of the railway department to the proposed reduction. For this we must give him credit.

8. That an exclusive express service operated by the Government be inaugurated on the Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island sections of the Government railways, as a preliminary to any general scheme for the nationalization of express business in Canada.

My hon. friend has made no reference at all to any attempt to deal with this important recommendation.

I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that after this committee had devoted most of a month to investigating this matter to the best of their ability and had brought in their recommendations, they were unanimously adopted by the House of Commons. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should have attempted immediately or as soon as possible to carry them out. Most of them are very practical suggestions but no attempt has been made to comply with them and no satisfactory explanation has been given to show why they have not been complied with.

I might refer to the apparent disregard of the department of the interests of fishermen on the question of salt. This question arose during the present season. It became known last winter that the freight rates were so high that it would be difficult for the merchants on the coast to secure salt enough to carry on the fishing trade and as early as February last correspondence was opened with the Department of Trade and Commerce asking the Government to do something in the way of providing tonnage to carry salt across the Atlantic so that the fishing industry could be carried on. The fact is that little has been done, and it transpires now from evidence that has been placed before the House by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) that transport ships have been coming across the Atlantic empty in connection with the work of the Admiralty and that some of these ships have been carrying mud ballast from the other side and that it has been costing $1.25 a ton to discharge this ballast out in Bedford Basin. With proper foresight these ships could have come over with salt instead of mud and there would have been plenty of salt available to carry on the fishing industry. If the minister had been alive to the interests of the fishermen he would not have allowed a circumstance like that to have taken place but he would have approached the Admiralty and seen that tonnage was secured in order that the fishing industry might have a sufficient supply of salt for the season.

I hope that, even if we do not succeed in getting a Minister of Fisheries alone, we may be able to get some kind of progressive policy from the department as at present organized. The minister could do a great deal that he has not done. He has, I believe, capable and energetic officials, some of whom are as good men as he could find anywhere but these officials want a lead from himself. The minister is the man to whom we have to go with our complaints and criticisms, and he is the man who is responsible for the administration of his department, and not his officials. I trust he will bestir himself and take steps to put into practice the recommendations of the Fisheries Committee looking towards the development of this important industry. A programme has been outlines by the committee which contains, I think, the principal things that are required at the present time. It is results that we want, and want them now; we do not want to wait for them too long. My hon. friend has been in office for six years, and I am sorry to say there is really not very much that he can show of a progressive nature that he has attempted or accomplished. I am not opposed to the proposed addition to the Cabinet but I am not inclined to swap horses now when we are crossing the stream, I would rather have some results from the present minister and I hope that, after the discussion to-night in which it has been again drawn to his attention that the transportation facilities are in such a backward state, he will endeavour to do something to have them improved.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, I have been greatly interested in the addresses of the hon. member who introduced this resolution (Mr. Jameson) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The subject has been very fully dealt with by the minister and by the hon. member for Guysborough. It is not a new subject to this House, and I shall not go over grounds that have been traversed in the years that are gone by. I wish to say a few words on this great subject of fisheries, and as a preliminary I would say that the fishing industry and the fish products of Nova Scotia have never had a fair show in this country, have never been fairly brought to the notice of the consuming people of Canada beyond the province itself. There is a large market for fish in the various cities of Quebec and Ontario, but we have not been in a position to put that excellent product in its inviting condition and with its proper tasting qualities before the people, as it has been injured in transit as a rule, and what is a most palatable and excellent article when it leaves Nova Scotia, becomes stale and distasteful and uninviting before it reaches the table of the consumer in the central provinces. To overcome these difficulties should be our principal object. It is, of course, interesting and encouraging to be able to say that we have the fish in abundance. When people launch upon any enterprise, it is well to be sure that they have in abundance the article with which they propose to deal. Sometimes men launch their capital upon mining speculations only to find after they have spent it that the mineral which they expect to find is not in their property. We are far past that stage, so far as the fisheries of Nova Scotia and all of Canada are concerned. The fish are there in abundance and of the very best quality. It so happens that I represent a section of the province of Nova Scotia which is the home of fisheries on a very large scale. So in discussing fisheries I might be accused of being local in my observations because I talk of matters in my own constituency; but I do not think that makes it any less important to talk about those things and to present them, because a very large section of the very cream of the fishing grounds of the province of Nova Scotia happens to be along the coast of the island of Cape Breton of which Cape Breton North and Victoria forms a part. As I have said, it is encouraging to be able to tell the minister and the Government that we have the fish. We have it in tons and millions of tons, and anything that we have caught of the fisheries in the province of Nova Scotia is but touching the fringe of an unlimited quantity that is available there. So much then for the quantity that is there. As the minister has pointed out, from the western coast of New Brunswick along the whole coast of that province, the province of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island and up to the frozen north is one continuous fishing ground of the richest and best quality. The fish is there, there is no question about that. The next thing, of course, is that the fish must be caught. Let me say to the minister that it is useless to think of making a development or an advance along these lines without the expenditure of money. We must all take our share of responsibility for putting the money at the disposal of the department in order to find the facilities to catch the fish and place it on the market. I think that all Ministers of Marine and Fisheries in this country since Confederation have been a little too timid about the amounts of money they should have and could have expended in connection with the development of the fishing industry, and I hope that the present minister and future ministers will enlarge their ideas in that respect and spend more money. I may be asked, what are you going to spend the money for, what are you going to do with the money? And I may point out, as has already been pointed out, that while it is certainly not the duty of the Government to send out men in boats to catch the fish, it is the duty of the Government to make the building and harbouring of boats and the going to and from the fishing grounds as safe and convenient as possible. These are things that must be done by public money, that cannot be done by the enterprise of the fishermen alone. In the county from which I come, along the north coast of Cape Breton, we have very extensive fishing grounds, but they are along a forbidding rugged rocky coast with very few harbours. The money that has been spent in the development of those harbours and in the building of breakwaters has resulted in substantial benefit to the fishing industry. Though there is yet much to be done, we have been able to use larger boats, go further out into the sea and obtain bigger catches. Millions of tons of fish have been carried away from the very doors of our fishermen by American vessels, taken to a foreign country and sold, the profits that should be made by ourselves going to foreigners. The minister must get money from the public coffers for the development of the harbours and the encouragement of our own fishermen as well as of those whom we can induce to come from Newfoundland to develop our fisheries if the conditions are at all favourable.

After the fish is caught, proper facilities must be available for getting it to market as speedily as possible. The centres of trade and of consumption must be put in touch with the places where the fish are to be obtained. The minister need not apologize for spending money for this purpose. The fishing industry can never be developed at Canso, for instance, a great fishing centre, by the use of a single boat running from Canso to the Intercolonial terminus at Mulgrave. The only way of solving the difficulty is by extending the railway to those points. Every inch of the coast line of Cape Breton should have railway accommodation, because the whole coast abounds in fish, and the greatest discouragement to the fishermen is the lack of transportation. The development of the harbours in the northern part of Victoria county has brought about good results. Two large American concerns have been doing business in that part of the country since the opening of the harbour of Ingonish, as a result of the appropriation of moneys voted by the late Administration. In getting these moneys for the development of harbours and breakwaters, I was regarded by many hon. gentlemen as spending money for the purpose of getting votes. I am sorry to say that that is the manner in which many members of this House view the expenditure of moneys for the opening of harbours and the building of breakwaters to serve the needs of our fishermen. But, as I say, one of the results of the opening of the harbour of Ingonish has been the activity of these great concerns, the Gorten-Pew Company of Boston and the Thompson Company which have amalgamated, and the firm of Collis, Jones and Whitman. They handle hundreds of tons of fish every year, paying for them readily, saving a great deal of labour and enabling the people with whom they deal to obtain the fish in better condition than they could otherwise secure it. The provision of proper facilities for the catching and the marketing of fish cannot be made without an expenditure of money and a more active interest in the matter on the part of the minister. The Railway Departmen have dealt with the transportation of fish as they would with passengers who had smallpox; the fewer they had and the quicker they got rid of them, the better they liked it. I fear that the minister regards all this discussion and the time which it takes up as a nuisance, and something that he would be glad to be rid of. But the only way to get rid of it is to make proper provision for the development of the fisheries, one of the most magnificent industries of Canada.

Last year and several years before, I asked the minister to make provision for bait along the coast. In the small colony of Newfoundland the Government provide steamboats with cold storage facilities that carry an ample supply of bait for the use of the fishermen. No doubt, headquarters are provided which supply the steamers with bait from time to time. We have nothing of that kind. Surely we can do what the Government of Newfoundland, a country with a small population, can do. In the county from which I come, at certain seasons of the year when fish are practically running in on the shore in tons, the fishermen have no bait, and they suffer to that extent. Money devoted to development along the lines which I suggest would be well and profitably spent. Places should be established along the coast of Cape Breton and elsewhere in the province of Nova Scotia where bait could be obtained at any time by the fishermen. It is of no use to say that the fishermen themselves should establish these places; they have not done it in the past, and they will not do it now. If the minister, then, will take some steps to make it easy for the fishermen to catch the fish; if he will provide facilities for bringing that fish to market and take such other steps as I have suggested, he will be doing a great service to the people and will justify the expense of the department over which he presides.

Mr. W. S. LOGGIE (Northumberland, N.B.): I have listened with much interest to the remarks made by the minister with regard to the fisheries of Canada during the last year. I regret that what to my mind was the most important recommendation made by the Committee on Marine and Fisheries last year was passed over by the minister with this remark, that it was found that the recommendation was not required because the fish arrived at destination packed in ice, and in good condition. That remark may be true in the months of April, May and June, but from my experience I can say that during the hot months of July and August fish do not arrive at destination properly preserved in ice, and that if compartments of the car were set aside and ice chambers used, the fish would arrive in much better condition. But that is really not the important part of the recommendation. It was clearly brought out before that committee that deterioration was very much greater in the winter season than in the summer season, and that matter was entirely passed over by the minister. On a previous occasion I have stated in the House that I can send a carload of fish to London, England, and it will arrive there in good order, whereas if I send a box of fish from my town to the city of Montreal during the winter season, I cannot expect it to arrive at Montreal in good condition. Why? Because frozen fish are placed in heated cars, and when they come into contact with the heat of the car, the frost is drawn from the fish and you can never get them back into proper condition, and unless they are consumed immediately, they deteriorate very quickly. The recommendation to which I have referred is the most important part of the recommendation of the Marine and Fisheries committee; yet the minister tells the House to-night that that recommendation was found not to be required at all. The minister instanced the fact that they put an express car on the route once a week. If I am not corerct, the minister will kindly correct me. I do not remember that he mentioned the day in the week that this car was put on the route, but he said that it started from Mulgrave and picked up the freight from Halifax. I do not wonder that the car was taken off; I claim it is quite impracticable to put a car on once a week and expect that to satisfy the needs of the trade or to enable the producer to place fish in the market from day to day as is required. The shipment of fresh fish by express must not be provided on only one given day in the week. It is true, I will admit, that perhaps Tuesday would be the best day of the week for the shipment of fish, but one car a week will not meet the requirements. Nothing else will meet the requirements except a car north on each of the six days in the week, and that car provided with a compartment where ice and salt can be put in the chamber so that the car may be kept cool. That is more important in the winter season than in the summer season, and yet the minister never referred to the matter at all.

Another thing that is most important for our fishing industry is markets, and to-day we have in a foreign market that is friendly to Canada a considerable demand for salted codfish, but the duty on these goods entering that country practically prohibits our using that market. I think therefore that the Department of Marine and Fisheries should suggest to that country that they might reduce the rate of duty or perhaps permit that commodity to enter free. Let me give an instance. At one time codfish went to the markets of France and word came back that those fish were subject to a duty of forty-five francs per hundred kilograms, or about four cents per pound. That is something that the Department of Marine and Fisheries or the Department of Trade and Commerce might take up in the interest of the fishing community of this country, especially at this time when the fishermen of France are not able to frequent the waters of St. Pierre and Miquelon, and when we would not interfere with the French fishermen if we had access to their market at a reasonable rate. If the Department of Marine and Fisheries would take up that matter, they would be doing something to aid and foster the fishing industry.

The minister informed us that the recommendation regarding the 20,000 pound car was undertaken, but he did not tell us whether the rate per hundred pounds was increased thereby. It is all very well for the railways to reduce the minimum carload from 24,000 pounds to 20,000 pounds and to increase the rate per hundred pounds. The minister did not tell us that the matter worked out in that way.

Let me refer just for a moment to what the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) referred as something that would encourage the industry perhaps as much as anything the Government could do.

I am glad to see the Minister of Railways in his seat on this occasion, because the remarks I have to make apply more particularly to his department. I know of nothing that the Government could do that would assist the fishing industry more than to take over the branch lines that are feeders for the Intercolonial railway and operate them as they should be operated. That would be a great boon to the fishing industry. Let me illustrate what I mean. On the Caraquet railway four or five weeks ago some eight or ten boxes of frozen fish were sent by the Dominion Express from Shippigan to Montreal. That railway took about four days to carry the fish from Shippigan to Bathurst, a distance of less than 100 miles. By the time the fish arrived in Montreal they had deteriorated and were practically of no value. The operation of that railway has caused the loss of a considerable amount of fish. Last March several carloads of frozen fish were sold to Montreal, Toronto, and American markets. The railway was blocked with snow at the time, but the shipper hoped that the line would soon be cleared and that he would be able to get a refrigerator car in which to ship the fish. Day after day passed and no car came. At last the weather commenced to get warm, and then the fish could not be marketed. The goods are still in the freezer because the railway could not place a car at the shipper's disposal. The Government could give no greater encouragement to the fishing industry than by seeing that the feeders to the trunk line are properly managed. I want to congratulate the Minister of Railways for assenting to the proposition that the Government railways should come under the Railway Commission; that would be a boon to the fishing industry. At present the branch lines are constructed under provincial charter, but I hope the Minister of Railways will soon announce that he is going to take over and operate the branch lines and feeders in the interests of the fishing industry and of the people in the territory which they serve.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think that was promised six years ago.

Mr. LOGGIE: It has been promised for a long time. I said to some of the subordinates of the railway a short time ago that it takes two men to make a bargain and I suppose that one of the reasons why these lines have not been taken over is because they have been unable to come to an agreement as to price. The line is constructed of light rails, and small engines are used. The equipment is not able to cope with the rough weather experienced in the winter season, and it is alleged that the Government would have to rebuild the road. We are talking about spending money in the interests of the fisheries.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is the whole of that road in New Brunswick.

Mr. LOGGIE: The whole of it is in Gloucester county.

Mr. McKENZIE: And the Minister of Marine does not look after it.

Mr. LOGGIE: When the warm weather comes we cannot sell frozen fish in any market practically. There are exceptions to that; for example, in the United Kingdom, in the month of August, when their salmon fishing is over, they will use our frozen fish. There is quite a demand for our Atlantic sea salmon in England in the month of August, but, as a rule, you cannot market frozen fish where fresh fish are available, and therefore it is in the interests of the industry that facilities should be provided for placing the goods on the market at the proper season.

I just wish to say a word or two regarding the lobster fishing industry. The present season is some three weeks late. Weather conditions on the Atlantic coast have been such that the season that should have opened about the 5th of May did not open until about the 25th of May. The season properly opens on the 25th of April and packers get to work about the 5th of May. On account of the bad weather this season, which delayed them until the 20th of May, they will probably have a very short pack. I have always been opposed to extending the season, but in the interests of increased production I think the minister might well consider extending the season this year, when the matter is brought before him in the regular way. I have frequently told the minister that after the packing season closes a considerable amount of pilfering goes on. I have pointed out that to him year after year, and he has always replied that his officers say that it is not going on. I want to repeat to-night that it is going on. Within the last few days, when I was home, I was told that these men get a few traps and hardly use them at all during the season, but keep them for pilfering after the season has closed, when the lobsters are more plentiful and can be caught at considerably less expense. If the minister cannot stop illegal fishing after the 1st of July then he ought to let everybody fish. Close fishing down for a month and then let everybody have the same chance. It is unfair to allow these men to engage in illegal fishing all along the coast, and it seems to be increasing every year. A market is found for the goods if there is any demand for them, although I have no doubt that many exporters would prefer to have nothing to do with them. But once the goods are packed they find a market. I am not prepared to say just how that is done, but I told the minister privately last year how I thought it could be done. If the minister will see that the close season for packing lobsters is observed, I think he may be able to maintain the industry, but if some men are to be allowed to pack while others cannot, I say let him change the season; let us all pack for two or three weeks in the fall. The minister ought to put it on a business basis, and give those who have a large amount of money invested the same chance as those who fish for lobsters out of season.

I do not know that I need take up the time of the House any longer. I have talked along these lines on former occasions, and have perhaps referred to-night to one or two matters that I did not mention before. But the field is a great one. The possibilities of our fisheries are vast, and it behooves us to take care of the industry. It is true that the deep sea fisheries are not so much in danger as the coast fisheries. There are now being introduced in the waters of the St. Lawrence steam trawlers. What effect that will have on the fisheries, of course, I do not pretend to foretell. We always have felt that it was dangerous to have the trawlers come within a certain distance of our coast. But they do it in the North Sea, and many of these vessels come from Gloucester and Boston on our own coast, and so I suppose it is only fair that the same should be allowed from Canadian ports. I know that the industry in that line has been increased and, I believe, successfully. One argument in favour of the trawling system is that the operator is sure of a catch, whereas if you go out with hand lines or trawling with hooks, there is great risk from the weather. This means that the supply thus secured is uneven; sometimes there is too great a supply of fish, and sometimes none at all. With the trawlers the market can be supplied more regularly. Perhaps it is not out of place that they should be allowed.

Another industry that, I think, might possibly be developed to some extent, is the herring industry. If the minister would try to facilitate the drifting for herrings at certain seasons of the year and in certain waters, the results would be beneficial. It is alleged that there is a small herring, fat and suitable for the market in the months of July and August. I am not informed on this subject myself, but I have understood that traps are allowed for herring all the summer season on the Prince Edward Island coast. The traps are put out in the spring and kept out until the fall, a nominal fee of $15 being charged. But in some sections there seems to be objection to these traps. I do not say that they should be allowed in the rivers, but I do not see why they should not be allowed in the outside coast. Certainly I cannot understand why there should be objection to them in other places, when they are allowed on the shores of Prince Edward Island.

I was very glad to hear the minister's address, and I have taken the opportunity to mention a few points in that address to which I take exception. I hope the subject of express facilities will be taken charge of by the minister, and that he will not say to the House again that these facilities are not needed. I know from personal experience that the recommendation on this subject is the most important made by the Marine and Fisheries Committee.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester, N.B.): I had not intended to take part in this debate, but some remarks made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) force me to say a few words. First, and more particularly, I wish to speak of the lobster fishery. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries no doubt will remember that my hon. friend (Mr. Loggie) and I have not always agreed as to the close season, nor as to the size of fish to be taken. I see that my hon. friend is coming to the ideas I expressed some years ago, and I take advantage of that fact to urge upon the minister still more strongly if possible the importance of the points for which I have contended. I have always objected to the extension of lobster fishing into July, and that for two reasons. In the first place, it tends to prevent the reproduction of the lobsters, and in the second place the fish caught in July are not of the good quality which Canada is expected to give to the world.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What about the regulation size?

Mr. TURGEON: It is too small. I have always asked that the minimum size be not less than nine and a half or ten inches.

Mr. LOGGIE: There is no limit at all in our waters.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have understood that in Nova Scotia the limit was three inches.

Mr. HAZEN: There is no limit, not on the south shore.

Mr. TURGEON: I have always contended that the size should not be less than nine and a half or ten inches, the same that is put upon fresh lobsters to reach Boston and New York. On the other side of Nova Scotia, where there is no object in taking fish of a smaller size, because they have to go to that market and will not be received if of less size than the regulation calls for, they get fish of nine and a half to ten inches, just as we have been getting them of seven inches for the last fifty years.

I believe in limiting the catching of lobsters to the large fish, and I believe that there should be an open season in the fall. This year, the season has been backward for fishing, as for everything else, and so the lobster season in our district will hardly cover more than a month. I admit that my hon. friend (Mr. Loggie) who is one of the largest dealers, perhaps the largest dealer, in the Maritime Provinces, is in danger of having his profits curtailed, nevertheless, I believe in sticking closely to the fishing season. But I have always advocated, as he knows, that lobster fishing should be permitted in the fall, say from the 15th or 20th of August until the latest date when it can be carried on. I have always said that the reason why the packers were opposed to this was that when they closed down after the spring season they did not want to resume. But I have always maintained that it would be to their advantage to have no extension of the spring season, but to allow fishing in the fall. More fish would probably be taken in the fall season than are secured now for the May and June pack. It is said that fishing in the fall would be precarious because of the storms in September and October. But we are more apt to have storms even in June on our shore, and more severe storms, than in the early months in the fall. To allow fishing in September will be a compensation for those packers who may not have been able to secure the quantity they calculated upon, and it would also make it unnecessary in many cases to carry over for another year large quantities of cans and boxes.

I am very glad that hon. members supporting the Minister of Marine and Fisheries have called attention to the needs of the fishing industry. There are many ways in which that industry can be helped. We are not asking for a bonus, but we do ask for shipping facilities, particularly on the railways that carry our fish to the Canadian market, and also in the improvement of harbours, wharves and breakwaters, so that deep-sea fishing may be increased along our shores, especially in these years when our fish are required for Great Britain and the allied nations.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the indulgence of the House for a moment while I offer one or two observations with respect to the subject under discussion. No doubt the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) presented the amendment which he has made to the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply for the purpose of calling the attention of Parliament to the necessity for some further, and more vigorous action, on the part of the Government towards the development of the fishing industry throughout Canada. The object of his amendment is one that is to be commended and anything that can be done, or any discussion that is called for by such action on his part that will result in more remunerative employment and wider markets for our fishermen ought to be commended and supported by the members on both sides of this House.

We well remember that in 1911 the issue upon which the election was decided was that of reciprocity. Commissioners representing this country negotiated an agreement with the Government of the United States which resulted in opening to the products of Canadian farmers the large and remunerative markets of the United States. While that agreement was defeated in the election of 1911, it is within the knowledge of this House that quite recently one part of the reciprocity arrangement was put into operation by Order in Council passed by this Government which opened the markets of the United States to the products of the Canadian farmers in the West. But, that market is still closed to the products of the Canadian fisheries. Having regard to the importance of opening the United States market at this particular time to one great branch of our industry, I think it might quite logically follow that the Government should have taken some steps to have opened a free market in the United States for the fisheries as well. The reciprocity agreement provided for the free entry into the United States of the products of the farm and the products of the fisheries and it would thus have conferred a distinct benefit upon the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces.

There is another item which enters into the fishing industry and which also came in for favourable treatment in that agreement. I refer to the article of salt. One of the greatest hindrances to the successful prosecution of the fisheries of the Maritime Provinces during the present season is the difficulty the fishermen have in obtaining an adequate supply of salt. Owing to the want of tonnage it is extremely difficult to obtain salt from the markets which heretofore have supplied it to our fishermen. Under the reciprocity agreement salt was to have been admitted free to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces but that agreement having been defeated, our fishermen are still under the necessity of paying a duty of 7½ cents a hundred pounds upon all salt imported. No greater stimulus could be given our fishermen by the present Government than to take immediate steps to remove the duty on salt. A very serious situation confronts our fishermen. The price of salt has increased fourfold during the last three years and I do know that many fishing communities in Nova Scotia have decided to abandon the salt fishery this year owing to the extreme difficulty of obtaining the salt that they require in the prosecution of their industry.

There is another matter that was to have been dealt with by the reciprocity agreement and that was the amendment of the regulation known as the modus vivendi by removing the license fee which heretofore had been imposed upon American fishermen coming into our ports for the purpose of purchasing bait, taking on supplies or shipping their fish to their own markets. A license fee of $1.50 per ton is exacted upon all American fishing vessels coming into our ports for the purpose which I have mentioned. The reciprocity agreement contained the following clause:

> The Government of Canada agrees that, until otherwise determined by them, the licenses hitherto issued to United States fishing vessels under the provisions of Section 3 of Chapter 47 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, granting to such vessels certain privileges on the Atlantic coast of Canada, shall continue to be issued and that the fee to be paid to the Government of Canada for such license by the owner or commander of any such United States vessel shall hereafter be one dollar per annum.

A very large business developed along the coast of Nova Scotia previous to the imposition of this license fee in the supplying of bait to the American fishing vessels and a large trade also was developed by the merchants along the coast in supplying these vessels and their crews. The imposition of this license fee has resulted in these vessels keeping away from our ports. When their outfit is exhausted, instead of coming to the ports of Nova Scotia to refit, in order to avoid the payment of the license fee, they return to their own ports and this large business which could be built up by our merchants on the shores of Nova Scotia is interfered with.

There is another consideration which is very important in respect to this matter. It is well known that the fishing fleet of the United States is largely commanded and manned by Nova Scotia fishermen. These men are obliged to leave their homes along the shores of Nova Scotia in midwinter or early spring and to go to the United States to take their positions as masters or crews of these fishing vessels. They come to the waters of the Maritime Provinces, particularly those of Nova Scotia to prosecute their industry but they are unable to visit their homes for the purpose of transacting any business or of renewing their supplies for the reason that they are prohibited by this license fee. During recent years a very large proportion of the American fishing fleet is made up of what is known as auxiliary fishing boats. This license fee under the modus vivendi does not apply to fishing vessels of that class so that no share of that part of the fishing business, which has gone to the United States, and which has grown up enormously within the last 15 or 20 years, accrues to the advantage of the people of Nova Scotia.

The object of the resolution which the hon. member for Digby has introduced is to find some means of increasing the product of the fisheries of Canada. There is no better way in which we can enlarge the output of the fisheries than by seeking freer and larger markets. Whatever may be said to the contrary by hon. gentlemen opposite, the fact remains that to a great extent our best and largest market is that of the United States. The abrogation of the treaty of 1818 has been asked for time and again by hon. members sitting on this side of the House. That is still a very live question and I for my part cannot see how any advantage can possibly accrue to the fishing industry of Canada by preserving the terms of the treaty or by preserving the modification of the treaty as embodied in the terms of the modus vivendi. I stated a moment ago that American vessels are not permitted to enter our ports for the purpose of obtaining supplies or prosecuting the fishery to the advantage of the people of Nova Scotia. But a different condition of affairs exists on the coasts of British Columbia.

At Prince Rupert there is a large fishing industry which has been developed in recent years, and which is carried on largely by fishing vessels that come up from the port of Seattle. These fishermen are allowed to fish off the waters of British Columbia. They can come into Prince Rupert and ship their fish to the United States market without paying the license fee which prevents vessels coming into the ports of Nova Scotia. I cannot understand why that distinction is made, and why privileges are granted to the fishing industry of British Columbia that are denied to us in Nova Scotia. The fishing industry would be very largely increased in Nova Scotia if a change were made in these regulations and the license fee entirely cancelled and the right given to fishing vessels of all nations to come into our ports to buy supplies. There is a very large demand for fish now in the British markets owing to the curtailment of fishing operations in the North sea. I am informed that buyers from the British markets go over to the United States and contract for the purchase of large quantities of fish which are caught by American vessels and taken to American seaports. We do not find that in the province of Nova Scotia we are sharing the advantage of this large expansion in the British consumption of fish from this side of the ocean as a result of the war. I am informed that the Department of Marine and Fisheries have been considering the question of the removal of this license fee under the modus vivendi with the authorities at Washington. I do not know whether or not that is correct. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries will no doubt be good enough to give any information to the House that he can possibly give at present, but I for one would be very glad to learn, in the interests of the fishing communities of Nova Scotia, that some step was being taken by the Government to abrogate the treaty of 1818, and to remove from the statute books the modus vivendi which prohibits American fishing vessels from coming into the ports of Nova Scotia. A very large trade would be developed in Nova Scotia through our merchants doing business at the seaports if they were permitted to supply freely to these fishermen all goods necessary for them in prosecuting their fishing voyages. Not only are our fishermen prohibited from getting a very large market for fresh fish by supplying these fishermen with bait, but our merchants are deprived of the opportunity of furnishing other supplies to vessels, such as rubber boots, clothing, oilskins and underwear. This prohibition results, as I said, in diverting the trade which should belong to the merchants of Nova Scotia to the supply houses in Massachussetts, and at the same time it has a very deterrent effect upon the development of our fisheries in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. ARTHUR B. COPP (Westmorland): I rise to discuss this question, which is of great importance to the fisheries in my own particular locality. I do not rise for the purpose of supporting the motion of my hon. friend particularly, because I do not want to support it in either of the two cases in which it may have been offered to this House. If it was a new policy that was intended to be adopted by the hon. members opposite with regard to having a new portfolio in the Cabinet we on this side would have little to say in regard to such a policy. But if it is a matter of voting want of confidence in the Minister of Marine and Fisheries I would not want to subscribe to it unless the hon. gentleman coupled the whole Government with the motion. I would not want him to single out my friend from New Brunswick in a vote of want of confidence in that hon. gentleman. If it included the whole Government I might be induced, in some manner, to consider the matter at least more carefully.

The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) has brought to the attention of this House an important matter in regard to the fishing industry of our country. It has been discussed very largely by gentlemen on this side of the House in relation to both the deep sea fisheries and coast fisheries. I was rather surprised during the course of the discussion to-night when I picked up a report recently issued on lobster fishery conservation in Canada by Mr. A. P. Knight. As I am particularly interested in that branch of the fishing industry, in which a large number of fishermen are engaged on the shores of my constituency and of all New Brunswick as well as Nova Scotia, I was astounded to learn that during the last nineteen years the lobster fisheries have decreased a little over 100 per cent. My hon. friends opposite speak of the increase in the value of the fisheries. Is is very easy to have the value increase as the price goes up, but the quantity is decreasing all the time, according to this report, and while I realized that there had been a decrease in the lobster catch in Canada, I had no idea that it had decreased to such an alarming extent as it has. My hon. friend from Digby, in discussing this matter this evening, made the statement that there was a good deal of dry rot, or that the Government or the department had got into a rut and that it was time it was taken out of this rut and put on a more businesslike basis, and more attention given to the different matters put before the department. I do not know whether that is a correct expression, whether the department is in a rut or what is the reason, but, during the two or three years that I have had the honour to have a seat in this House, I have looked into fishery matters to some extent and read the reports that have been made from time to time. I have read the reports made in regard to the fishing industry of this country back for years and years, and the recommendations that have been made. Things of that nature have been brought before the people, but it does seem to me for some reason or other, whoever may be to blame, whether it is the minister over the department or his officials under him or whether it was because there was no one who had the information or knowledge, or whether the industry is something in a class by itself calling for new scientific research, there surely seems to have been a very great deal of neglect if I may use that term, in regard to the protecting of the lobster industry of this country. I notice that some years ago, twenty years ago for all I know, the lobster hatcheries were established in this country. There had been hatcheries for different kinds of fish all over Canada, and the lobster hatchery was introduced. I know that in my county we looked forward with great anticipation of the lobster hatchery being a good investment, and we hoped that the lobster catch would be very largely increased because of the hatcheries. I see by this very latest report by Mr. Knight, who is apparently an authority on this question, that instead of the lobster hatchery having been a benefit it is a menace to the lobster industry, and he lays down the principle that the lobster hatchery must be done away with and some other arrangement or scheme entered into. I have not been able to read the whole of this very interesting report and the tables set out in it. He says:

> What is to be done? It is useless to look to the hatcheries as a means of replenishing our depleted waters. Rather are they agencies of destruction than of conservation.

That is a statement by one who has made a study of this matter very recently, and if that is so, surely we have lost a great deal of time besides wasting a great deal of money in the effort to replenish our lobster fisheries. According to the report made by Mr. Knight, the lobster catch has been decreasing year by year, and if some steps are not taken to prevent it, sooner or later the industry will disappear altogether.

Mr. HAZEN: I think the member for Northumberland could assure my hon. friend that in the straits of Northumberland, in the vicinity of Point Sappin, there was the largest catch of lobsters last year that had been obtained in forty years.

Mr. COPP: Would that in any way disprove the statements made in the report of this official appointed by my hon. friend?

Mr. HAZEN: It is a fact that the catch was so large that they could not handle the fish in the factories.

Mr. COPP: Is that because of the lobster hatchery?

Mr. HAZEN: I am not saying why; I am simply stating the facts.

Mr. COPP: I am not speaking in a critical way; I am simply seeking information. In a report on the subject, the inspector of fisheries in that portion of the province, Mr. Morrison, says that the lobster industry, which had fallen off to an alarming extent during the previous two years, was showing signs of improvement. But while that is true with regard to lobsters last year, there has been a falling off of $94,469 in the value of the herring catch. There has been a falling off also in the mackerel catch, and the smelt catch has shown a falling off of $122,000. Cod also has shown a decrease.

I wish to refer to a matter that is very dear to my heart, and that is the shad fishery. I do not think they have the shad fishery in other parts of Canada as we have it in the province of New Brunswick. A few years ago it was a valuable industry along the St. John, Kennebecasis, and Petitcodiac rivers, the Bay of Fundy, the Dorchester and Sackville rivers, and, I believe, in your own constituency, Mr. Speaker. These districts were teeming with shad, which could be bought a few years ago at $3.50 a half barrel. Now, however, it is difficult to get shad at all, the cost being as high as $15 a half barrel. It seems to me that this valuable fishery could be saved to the people of that locality. Some floating shad hatcheries have been established on the St. John river, but something has been left undone that should have been done to keep up the fisheries along our rivers. I sincerely trust that the minister having heard the remarks of the member for Digby, will get out of the rut and, with his officers, do something to make our supply of fish as plentiful as it was in the past. If he will promise to take action, we will not vote for the motion of want of confidence, in which case he will be allowed a few weeks to try to do something in the interest of the people.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) has been called from the Chamber, and before leaving he intimated to me his desire to withdraw the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member have leave to withdraw his amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Jameson) withdrawn.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

THE ROSS RIFLE.

Mr. TOBIN:

Referring to the statement of the Hon. Member for Victoria-Haliburton on page 439 of Hansard, February the 2nd, as follows:—

"Mr. Carvell: Would the right hon. gentleman let me know whether he found out during the dinner hour who it was that ordered or was responsible for the reduction of the Ross rifle from '462 to '457 in 1910?"

"Sir Robert Borden: I stated at the time that my information did not come from the Department of Militia and Defence, but that it was reliable. I have asked the Deputy Minister to produce absolutely accurate information on that point, which I shall give to the Committee."

"Sir Sam Hughes: I understand that it was on the recommendation of Colonel Harkon, the expert adviser to the Militia Department under Sir Frederick Borden. The Standing Committee on Small Arms was never consulted."

1. Was this statement of the member for Victoria-Haliburton, in regard to the reduction of the chamber of the Ross rifle, from .462 to .457 in 1910?

2. Is there any report in the Militia Department from Colonel Harkon recommending the change in the Ross rifle referred to?

2. If so, what measures does the Government intend to adopt in the premises?

Mr. CROTHERS: 1. No. That answers the second question.

GOVERNMENT WHARF AT GASCONS.

Mr. MARCIL:

HONOURABLE ROBERT ROGERS.

ROYAL COMMISSION APPOINTED.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the 28th day of May, the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) addressed to me a letter which I desire to read to the House and which is as follows——

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I respectfully ask the right hon. the Prime Minister to speak a little louder? We cannot hear one word back here.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I had said that on the 28th day of May the hon. the Minister of Public Works addressed to me a letter which I desire to read to the House and which is as follows:

Office of the Minister of Public Works.
Ottawa, May 28, 1917.

My dear Sir Robert:—

Some time in the summer of nineteen sixteen, the present Government of Manitoba appointed a Commissioner, Mr. A. C. Galt, to make investigation and to report to them with regard to the construction of the Manitoba Agricultural College. This work was undertaken and a very small proportion done while I was Minister of Public Works for that province. Mr. Galt has made two reports—one some time last January and the other two or three days ago. In these reports he has chosen to reflect on my conduct as such minister, and it is only as regards those portions of the reports in which he so reflects that I feel justified in drawing the matter to your attention.

[Mr. Burrell.]

While making his investigation on the subjects covered by his first report, Mr. Galt telegraphed me to Ottawa on September 12 last, informing me of certain evidence which he evidently regarded as requiring answer on my part. I at once went to Winnipeg and appeared before him and gave full explanation of the subject covered by his telegram and answered all questions put to me. It was manifest to me then from Mr. Galt's demeanour and remarks that he purposed sparing no effort and rejecting no means, however unfair, of doing me all the injury in his power. I therefore, from that point forward, took little or no interest in the proceedings of his Commission, being absolutely certain not only that my own conduct in the premises had been straightforward and in the public interest, but that, though it would be a waste of time to make any attempt to influence the purpose of Mr. Commissioner Galt, there would be no difficulty later in exposing and establishing before any fair and competent tribunal both the true facts of the case and the malice of this commissioner. I did, however, subsequently inform Mr. Galt that I was prepared, though in Ottawa, to answer any summons in the same way as if it were served on me in Manitoba.

As regards the proceedings subsequent to the first report, and as regards the subjects covered by the second report, in respect to which Mr. Galt is pleased to reflect on my public conduct, you will be surprised to learn—I say this knowing that you are not acquainted with Mr. Galt—that I was never informed by the Commissioner, directly or indirectly, of any statements in evidence affecting me in the slightest degree, nor was I offered any opportunity whatever of making explanation or defence. It is quite true that no explanation or defence, however complete or however substantiated, would have affected in the least Mr. Galt's determination, but this fact cannot be offered as an excuse on his part for abandoning and indeed prostituting the most elementary principle of British justice—that it is a fact, however, does, I think, fully establish the predetermination and malice of the Commissioner.

As soon as I was informed of the contents of each report, I made full and public denial of every allegation contained in them, affecting myself. This denial I now reaffirm.

I believe I am entitled to a full and fair investigation by a tribunal of high standing of all matters contained in these reports, reflecting in any way on my public conduct. Though I have not yet been able to obtain a copy of the evidence, I cannot believe that any evidence could have been given substantiating the reports so far as they allege breach of duty on my part. I ask that such a tribunal be appointed in order that it may be known whether there was such evidence, and if so, to make full and complete inquiry and report as to whether, if any such evidence was given, the same was true.

Yours sincerely,
R. Rogers.

To that letter I gave the following reply on the 30th day of May:

Ottawa, 30th May, 1917.

Dear Mr. Rogers,

I beg to acknowledge your letter of the 28th instant. I have taken into consideration the action which you request with respect to the reflections upon your conduct as a member of the Provincial Executive of Manitoba, which are set forth in the reports of Commissioner Galt. I shall bring your request to the attention of Council forthwith so that your representations and the course which should be taken with regard to the matter may be considered by all the members of the Government.

Yours faithfully,

The Honourable
Robert Rogers, M.P.,
Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa.

The subject was taken up and considered in council, with the result that it was referred to the Minister of Justice, who yesterday presented a report to council upon which an Order in Council has been passed and approved by His Excellency. I shall now read that Order in Council:

Certified copy of a Report of the Committee of the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 6th June, 1917.

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a Report dated 4th June, 1917, from the Minister of Justice, stating that the Honourable Mr. Justice Galt of Manitoba, who was appointed a Commissioner by the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba on 15th July, 1916, to investigate and report upon certain matters of concern to the local Government, has, as the Minister of Justice is informed, in pursuance of his said Commission made two reports, the first dated 26th January last, and the second, dated 25th May, by which reports the Commissioner makes certain findings or observations reflecting upon the honour or integrity of the Honourable Robert Rogers, presently Minister of Public Works of Canada, in connection with the said matters above referred to and his actions in regard thereto, at a time when he was Minister of Public Works of the said Province of Manitoba, and that Mr. Rogers avers that all such findings and observations and the said reports in so far as they in anywise affect him prejudicially are unjustified in fact and not upheld or established by the evidence or facts in proof before the Commissioner.

Mr. Rogers also complains of lack of notice, and that as to some of the findings in question he was not afforded an opportunity to give or present evidence before the Commissioner, and moreover he challenges the impartiality and intent of the Commissioner upon the matters under consideration so far as they affect Mr. Rogers. In these circumstances Mr. Rogers asks for a full and fair investigation by a tribunal of high standing of all matters contained in the aforesaid reports reflecting in any way upon his public conduct.

The minister being of the opinion that the situation as thus presented invites further consideration recommends that the Honourable Sir Ezekiel McLeod, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, and the Honourable Louis Tellier, a retired Judge of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec, be appointed Commissioners under Part 1 of the Inquiries Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1916, Chapter 104, for the purpose of reviewing and considering the evidence taken before the said Commissioner Galt in the execution of his commission aforesaid, and his said reports and findings thereon, and of reporting for the information of Your Excellency in Council whether, there was evidence before the said Commissioner Galt to sustain or support the findings of said Commissioner as set forth in his said reports in so far as they reflect upon or prejudicially affect the honour or integrity of Mr. Rogers or the honesty of his dealings or transactions, the said hereby appointed Commissioners to have power should they find that there is any such evidence, to make such further inquiry and take such further and additional evidence as may to them appear necessary for the purpose of enabling them to determine and report upon the truth or falsity of the evidence so by them found, any further evidence so taken and the determination of said hereby named Commissioners thereon to be also reported; and that the said Honourable Sir Ezekiel McLeod and Honourable Louis Tellier as such Commissioners shall moreover have all the powers in the execution of their said Commission which are mentioned, enumerated or provided for by the said Part 1 of the Inquiries Act and the Act amending the same of 2 George V, Chapter 28, intituled "An Act to amend the Inquiries Act".

The Committee concur in the foregoing and submit the same for approval.

Rodolphe Boudreau,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

There is nothing further to add except that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) has requested of me that, pending the investigation, he shall be relieved of all administrative duties in connection with the Department of Public Works, and that the administration of the department shall be taken over by myself or by some other minister, and I have acceded to that request.

Right hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I think the correspondence and the Order in Council which has just been submitted to the House require some comments on my part. I would say that the letter addressed by the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) to the Prime Minister is absolutely derogatory to the honour of the bench of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The letter refers to Mr. Justice Galt, not as Mr. Justice Galt but as "Mr. Galt." Mr. Justice Galt acted, not in his capacity as a judge, but he was selected—as the hon. gentlemen who have just been named in the Order in Council, Sir Ezekiel McLeod and Hon. Louis Tellier, have been selected—on account of his judicial capacity. It is to be remembered, Sir, and it cannot be forgotten on this occasion, that the complaint of the Minister of Public Works of unfairness by Mr. Justice Galt to him arose largely, if not altogether, and I would say altogether, from the insult which was poured upon the head of Mr. Justice Galt by the Minister of Public Works. The Minister of Public Works was called upon to give evidence before the commissioner. He had the right to be summoned, and he appeared. And, Sir, in the public press and in his evidence to Mr. Justice Galt's face he called him a grafter.

Mr. BEST: Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: For what reason was he called a grafter? Because he accepted duties similar to those which have just been delegated to Sir Ezekiel McLeod and Hon. Louis Tellier, justices of the High Court. If Mr. Justice Galt was a grafter—which I resent, I do not know Mr. Justice Galt, I never met him in my life; he is a judge of the bench, that is all I know—but if he can be called a grafter for having accepted the duties which he discharged, Sir Ezekiel McLeod and Hon. Louis Tellier can also be called grafters equally; there is no difference. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Public Works asks that gentlemen of high standing shall be appointed to make a further inquiry. The tribunal which is being constituted by the Government to investigate this matter is of no higher or of no lower standing than the commission which was presided over by Mr. Justice Galt; it is exactly the same. I do not know Mr. Justice Galt, but I understand that he is a judge of integrity, in good standing in his profession, and that his honour has never before been impugned. Before he was appointed to the Bench he was not active in either political party. Under these circumstances, if any new tribunal is to try the Minister of Public Works, it should be a committee of this House. There are two methods of making public investigations, either by a committee of this House, the High Court of Parliament, or by members of the Bench, who are selected because of their legal standing and because they are supposed, by the very character of their office, to be above reproach. If the report is to be condemned because the commission was presided over by a judge of the Supreme Court, the new inquiry should not be carried out by a commission of the same kind.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not disposed to discuss the character or qualifications of Mr. Justice Galt on this or any other occasion, unless a necessity which I cannot now foresee should arise. As I understand it, the judges who are to perform this duty are not to accept fee or honorarium for it. My right hon. friend challenges the action we have taken and challenges the reflections which have been made upon Mr. Justice Galt in the letter written to me from the Minister of Public Works. I should like to remind him that on a certain occasion one of his colleagues who sits beside him used infinitely stronger language, if my memory is correct, with regard to Mr. Justice Landry of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, and he did so without any reproof from my right hon. friend. I am perfectly willing to contrast the action which we have taken in this matter with that which my right hon. friend took on that occasion. Findings had been made by a commission of which Mr. Justice Landry was a member. Those findings reflected seriously upon a member of my right hon. friend's Government. The matter was brought to the attention of Parliament, and it was urged by a motion in this House that such a finding should not be disregarded. My right hon. friend ignored the whole matter and voted down the motion, the precise words of which I have not before me; no consideration to the finding was given by him, and the then Minister of Public Works retained his position in the Government and continued to administer the affairs of his department. It seemed to me, when the matter was brought to my attention by the present Minister of Public Works, that such a course as was on that occasion pursued by my right hon. friend could not be followed or sanctioned with advantage to the public interest. I thought it my duty, therefore, to comply with the request made by the Minister of Public Works and to entrust the examination of this evidence and any further hearing that might be desired, to two members of the Judicial Bench, one of whom is on the Bench at present and the other of whom has retired. Both are absolutely above reproach. I may add that the Minister of Public Works informs me that he is not acquainted with either of these two judges, and that, so far as he knows, he never met either one or the other of them.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY HON. ALBERT SEVIGNY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ALBERT SEVIGNY (Minister of Inland Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I see in the morning papers a report which reads as follows:

Ottawa, June 5.—An extraordinary position of affairs was revealed in a return made this evening in a volume of correspondence between the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Commons and Hon. Albert Sevigny, and between the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Justice Department, with regard to a quantity of valuable effects removed from the Speaker's chambers at the House of Commons early in 1916 by Hon. Mr. Sevigny during his tenure of office as Speaker. It appeared that Hon. Mr. Sevigny had removed a number of handsome pictures and works of art——which, by the way, is not true.

a Victrola and a quantity of high priced records, with other ornaments and furniture and had them sent to Quebec.

Col. Smith wrote Hon. Mr. Sevigny several times apparently without getting any response. He then wrote a sharp letter to Hon. Mr. Sevigny, pointing out that he must know that these goods should be in the custody of himself as Sergeant-at-Arms, and that he was responsible for them. Yet in face of repeated requests Hon. Mr. Sevigny had continued to retain them, etc.

This article, published in the Montreal Gazette this morning, is absolutely false; there is nothing in the papers which were submitted to the House yesterday to sustain those assertions. The facts are as follows. As everybody knows, the Speaker's Chambers were destroyed by fire last year when I was Speaker of the House of Commons—and, by the way, I may be permitted to say that my monetary losses as a result of the fire amounted to about $1,200. Last year when the House prorogued as there were no quarters for the Speaker, I asked the officers of the House if there would be any objection to sending to Quebec certain effects which were in Ottawa at the disposal of the Speaker of the House of Commons during the recess. No objection was raised at the time by any of the officers of the House, and, accordingly, instructions were given that certain effects be sent to Quebec. A list of those effects was made by the Serjeant-at-Arms, and they were sent to Quebec by the Serjeant-at-Arms. On January 8 of this year, I was invited to join the Cabinet and the next day I had to go to Dorchester for my re-election. I was there until the end of January. When I came back I was sick for several days, and when I came to my office in Ottawa I was very busy with my departmental business. When I was asked for the first time by the Serjeant-at-Arms to send back those effects, I told him, in a letter of which a copy was submitted to the House yesterday, that I would send them as soon as I should be back in Quebec. I wrote a second letter to the Serjeant-at-Arms in which I repeated that. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that my intention never was to keep those effects and that they were returned to the Serjeant-at-Arms in perfect order.

ALLEGED COMPULSORY RETIREMENT OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN: I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Customs to an article which appears in an Ottawa paper, as follows:

Windsor, June 5.—Information has been received here by local members of the internal revenue and other branches of the Civil Service to the effect that within a short time—a few weeks at most—the Government will announce a plan for compulsory retirement of all civil servants who have been in the service more than thirty-five years, their places to be filled with returned soldiers who are unfit by reason of wounds and illness from filling their ordinary vocations.

I wish to ask the minister if there is anything in that report, or if such a plan is likely to be carried out?

Mr. REID: There is nothing in it. I never heard of it before.

FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENT BETWEEN BRITISH GOVERNMENT AND CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

On motion of Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance), Bill No. 47, to facilitate certain financial arrangements between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and for other purposes, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blain in the chair.

On the Preamble:

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As I explained upon the introduction of this Bill to the House, its object is to enable the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to lend its credit to the Imperial Treasury by issuing collateral trust bonds payable in currency—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In what currency?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Canadian, United States, or British, against outstanding securities of the company, payable as to principal and interest in sterling, which have been, or which may be, acquired by the Imperial Government. Legislation is necessary because the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will do this to facilitate the financing by the Imperial Treasury and not for its own railway purposes. I am advised that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has statutory powers to issue these new securities, if issued for railway purposes, but as the purpose is to facilitate the Imperial financing, it is necessary to obtain legislative authority to issue these collateral trust bonds, which are to be delivered to the Imperial Government in exchange for sterling securities which it has acquired or may acquire on the London market. The transaction is necessitated by reason of the exchange situation to which I have frequently referred in this House. The British Government has been acquiring sterling securities in London. Those sterling securities have in the past been used as collateral to loans which the Imperial Government has been making in New York for the purpose of supplying funds to meet its expenditures in the United States. Among other securities which have been or which will be acquired are the sterling securities of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and of certain of the companies whose lines are leased by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, principally, I may say, the four per cent debenture stock of the Canadian Pacific. The position, therefore, is that the Imperial Government has acquired this stock and other securities. As these securities are payable in sterling, they are not available as collateral or for sale on this side of the Atlantic, and the Imperial treasury has requested the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to issue collateral trust bonds in exchange for these sterling debentures, the collateral trust bonds to be payable in currency so that they may be used for an issue on this side of the Atlantic, or as collateral for such an issue. I have already explained to the House that no such issue is an immediate prospect, and I have stated further—and this has been brought to my knowledge—that although no such loan is in prospect, the Imperial Government has requested the Canadian Pacific Company to proceed with this legislation, in order that, should occasion arise, this power may be available.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not know that this matter requires any discussion at all. As my hon. friend says, it is a question of exchange. It is rather mysterious to me that the bonds which are to be replaced are sterling bonds. I would have supposed that such bonds were the very best security in the world. Is it the intention that sterling bonds of say £1,000 are to be exchanged for bonds in dollars?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is one of the mysteries of financing that I do not understand.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My right hon. friend is quite correct in stating that there is no higher form of security than the sterling security, but sterling securities cannot be sold to advantage on this side of the Atlantic.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that a few days after the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made an announcement in regard to this matter at a meeting of the shareholders, it was stated that the arrangement had fallen through and that the British Government had made other arrangements.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When the matter was first announced, it was the intention to proceed with a loan in New York for a large amount, I think, two or three hundred million dollars, but on account of the declaration of war by the United States against Germany, it was not deemed expedient to proceed. My hon. friend probably knows that the American Government is now issuing its securities for the purpose of financing Great Britain and the Allies. There is no intention of bringing on, in the near future, any issue of these securities, or any Imperial issue with these securities pledged as collateral. It may not be necessary to do so at all. My hon. friend is right in stating that that was adverted to at the meeting of the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific, but notwithstanding that, as no one can tell what the future will bring forth, and as the sum involved is large, it is deemed advisable that this power should be available in case it might be desired to exercise it.

Mr. MARCIL: I asked the question in order that the minister's explanation might be placed on Hansard.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Might I recall to my hon. friend that in times past and not far distant either I was taken to task very sharply by some hon. gentlemen whom I think I see now on the other side of the House, for stating that I preferred the Yankee dollar to the British shilling. Now that my hon. friend has shown by his free wheat measure that he prefers the Yankee dollar to the British shilling, I do not know what will happen, and I think I had better warn him not to go too fast or he may land himself in trouble.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry that my right hon. friend, who is an old campaigner and politician, not to say statesman, takes these matters so much to heart. Why should he advert to them in time of war?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the word "currency" imply the right to issue in gold? Of course, this is a matter of internal arrangement by the company, and they are the best judges of what they desire.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Currency includes gold. The currency of the Dominion, for instance, includes Canadian gold, British sovereigns, and American gold. Currency in the United States would include American gold as well as American note circulation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is true, but the company would have the right to pay in paper money if the word currency was used and not the word gold; I think my hon. friend will admit that. If these bonds were payable in currency of the Dominion of Canada, then the company would have the right to pay in paper currency, in which case the bond would not have the same value as if the payment was made in gold. But of course this is a matter of internal arrangement, and the company are the best judges.

Preamble agreed to, and Bill reported.

PENNY BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) Bill No. 55, to amend the Penny Bank Act, was read a second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—withdrawals for investment in Government securities, and application of interest.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This legislation is to enable the Penny Banks to invest their funds in Dominion Government securities subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance. These banks are voluntary organizations whose object is to encourage savings by school children, and others of slender means. They are not banks under the Bank Act, and deposits by any one individual are limited to $300. At present under the Act relating to Penny Banks their funds must be deposited with the Post Office Savings Bank, and interest is allowed at the rate of 4 per cent per annum under a special arrangement with the Government. We have been requested to authorize the banks to invest in the Dominion War Loan issues, and as there seems to be no objection I have introduced this legislation. There is this safeguard, that any such investments are subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance, and of course the security is just as good as if the funds were invested in the Post Office Saving Bank.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The bonds are to be deposited with the Government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, that is a safeguard that my hon. friend will find in the Bill.

Mr. MARCIL: How many of these banks are there in Canada?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are two, the head office of the larger bank being in Toronto, with branches in thirty-four centres. The other bank is a smaller organization at Chicoutimi. The Penny Bank of Toronto has on deposit in the Post Office Savings Bank $370,000, and the Penny Bank of Chicoutimi $13,000.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Grant to the National Battlefields Commission, $52,100.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has anything been done since last year in this matter? Is it proposed to add anything in the way of improvements?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not at present. The understanding is that the present works should be maintained, but that no new works shall be undertaken.

For maintenance of the National Battlefields Park, $46,200.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How is this to be expended?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I should have to get the report of the commission, in order to give my hon. friend full information. I am not able to speak from memory. We have provided the amount requested by the commissioners for maintenance, on the understanding that new works would not be undertaken, but that they would do their best to maintain the works at present existing. That does not mean that we should not complete the works, if it were found more convenient to do so, having regard to the financial situation.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have no fault to find with the commission. It is a fine commission, and I am sure that every dollar will be spent economically, but I would like to let the item stand.

Item stands.

Mr. KYTE: Has the Battlefields Commission jurisdiction over the national monuments? I understand there are certain places in Canada where historical events have occurred, which are taken charge of by the Government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This commission has not jurisdiction over that matter.

Mr. KYTE: What particular
4 p.m. body has jurisdiction?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think any particular body has jurisdiction.

Mr. KYTE: I saw a statement some time ago that certain portions of territory in the western part of Nova Scotia, for example the site of the original settlement of the Acadians at Grand Prè, were to be taken over as a national park. Is that matter in contemplation by the Government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no official knowledge of any such action. I think the report is probably premature.

Grant in aid of Canadian general council of the Boy Scouts' Association, $5,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How is that money expended?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: By the Association, which has for its objects and purposes the Boy Scout movement. We pay the amount to the Association.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the Association numerous?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it is very large, and has grown a great deal. How large it is, I am not prepared to say.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The grant is made to the Canadian general council of the Boy Scout Association. Is that a numerous body, and where is it located? Is it in Toronto, Montreal or Ottawa?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think that that item had better be allowed to stand. I apologize for not having information today. The Minister of Agriculture has just come in, and we will be glad to take up his estimates, and when we reach this item again I shall be able to explain it more fully.

Item stands.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Department of Agriculture—Patent record, $30,000.

Mr. TURRIFF: Is this item for the printing of those books which are distributed monthly?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. TURRIFF: I think that it would be a good idea if the ministers would cut that item in two, and only print about one-tenth the number of books at present printed. They are scattered round broadcast, and I do not suppose that one person in a hundred who receives these books ever opens them. I have been getting them for about thirty years, and they are no good to me. Anybody who wants to get the information contained in the patent record can get it on going to the Patent branch of the Department of Agriculutre. To my mind, it is one of the most useless bits of expenditure undertaken by the Government.

Mr. BURRELL: There may be something in what my hon. friend says. That idea has been advanced a good many times in the last twenty years or so, and on the other side there have been a good many arguments advanced why it should be printed, and why the circulation should be as large as it is. These books are sent, free of charge, to the members of the Senate and the House of Commons and the libraries. Sixty-six different libraries in England get them, ninety-four libraries in Canada, fifty-four in the United States. There is an exchange list of seventy-nine and a Government free list of thirty-one, and the British colonies and foreign colonies, fifty-seven, free, making altogether 381.

Mr. MARCIL: How many are printed?

Mr. BURRELL: Twelve hundred copies per month. This amount includes all the necessary cuts, drawings, etc.

Mr. TURRIFF: It seems to me that they are printed unreasonably often. Why could they not be printed quarterly or semi-annually? It is not necessary, even for anybody who is interested in patent matters, that a list such as this should be printed every month. Twelve hundred copies a month, costing $30,000, means that we pay over $2 for each one of these books. I have been getting these books for thirteen years, and I have never had five cents of value out of them, because this is not in my line; I do not understand it; I am not interested. A great many members must be in the same position as I am. Sending it to libraries may be all right, but you might cut the issue away down and it might be issued less frequently than monthly.

Mr. BURRELL: Do you suggest cutting out the copies to the members of the House and the Senate?

Mr. TURRIFF: I would move that the members be cut off and the members of the Government also.

Mr. BURRELL: We will bear that suggestion in mind.

Mr. KYTE: I think the suggestion is entitled to consideration. It is very rarely that a member or a senator has occasion to refer to the list, and if he has occasion to refer to it he can get a copy.

Mr. BURRELL: The patent office is a profitable institution in the sense that last year the cash receipts amounted to $227,000, or $10,000 over those of any previous year; so that apart from the expense of the Patent Record and of the civil administration concerned with patents, there is still a very large amount credited to the Receiver General from the patent office. I shall be very glad to bear in mind what my hon. friend says about cutting down the issue of the Patent Record.

Mr. TURRIFF: We have been long enough in the House to know what a minister means when he says he will bear something in mind. He gets his estimates through and he never takes any action. But in that my hon. friend is not any worse than his colleagues or his predecessors.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is hard upon ourselves.

Mr. TURRIFF: It may be hard upon ourselves, but it is a fact nevertheless.

Mr. BURRELL: I am not competent to say at the moment whether all members and senators should have it or not. When I tell my hon. friend that I will bear his suggestion in mind, what I mean is that I would like to inform myself, by consulting the Deputy Commissioner of Patents as to the precise character of the objections to the proposal and to ascertain whether there might be something to be said on the other side. My hon. friend would not expect me to say offhand what should be done and therefore I was not at all hypocritical in saying that I would bear his suggestion in mind.

Mr. TURRIFF: I imagine the deputy who gets an extra $1,000 on account of the patent branch would not like to see the expenditure cut down. I never knew a deputy yet who was anxious to have the expenditure cut down. That depends on the minister. If it is going to be cut down my hon. friend will have to take hold with a strong hand and overrule his subordinates. This is one of the things in which economy might be practised without hurting anybody. Supposing we spend $15,000, instead of $30,000, issue these books once in three months and cut off a lot of the supply, the saving would be worth while.

Mr. BURRELL: I think there is a good deal in what my hon. friend says. I would like, however, to feel satisfied that every one of my hon. friend's fellow members and senators took the same view. If that were the case, there would be no hesitation.

Mr. McKENZIE: As one member who has been receiving this paper for a very long time, I can corroborate what my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) has said. I have never regarded it as anything else than a bulky nuisance coming to the office and which had to be thrown away.

Experimental Farms—Maintenance of Central Farm, and establishment and maintaining of additional branch Stations, $850,000.

Mr. BURRELL: This is practically the same vote as last year.

Mr. TURRIFF: What is being done to find out how to handle the question of rust on wheat? Last year Canada lost about $100,000,000 and I understand that the average loss per annum in the United States is about $150,000,000. Last year was the first year in which we had a very general and severe loss of wheat from rust and it was only about the second time that we have had any serious infestation of rust in the West. I remember that ten or twelve years ago we had more or less rust but it was nothing like as severe as it was last year.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: In 1904.

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes. I understand that scientific men are finding out a good deal about it. I understand from one of the professors in Winnipeg that the rust spores can only be carried over from one year to another on a certain shrub, the barberry bush, and it appears that in the province of Manitoba there are only about 350 of these bushes.

Mr. BURRELL: There are more than that.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is my information, although it may not be correct. This professor also stated that it was possible that some other plant or shrub than the barberry might carry over the spores from one season to another, but so far all the research that has been made has failed to discover any such bush. I understand also that the spores are so extremely light that, for instance in an absolutely still room with the doors and windows all closed and with no current of an air, a spore will take an hour to fall a distance of four feet with the result that they can be carried hundreds of miles by the wind. It has been noticed that in the two seasons in which we have suffered badly from rust in the western provinces it has been after we have had a great deal of south wind, which has brought the spores up from the more southern part of the continent. I know that the American Government is spending a large amount of money in the effort to find out some way to handle this plague, and probably in the end something will be discovered by which we will be able to control it. I remember when smut was with us a very serious menace in the West and the cause of a loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars to the farmers. Now scientific men have discovered how to deal with smut, and the farmers are able to guard against it. I have no doubt that the same thing will occur with rust. It is such a very serious matter that I think the department would be justified in spending some money in the effort to guard against this disease.

Mr. BURRELL: I agree with everything my hon. friend has said in regard to rust, and the figures he has quoted of the losses caused by it are the same as the estimates we have had. As we considered it such a serious matter, we prepared some time ago for the erection of two field laboratories, one at Indian Head and one at Brandon, on our experimental farms. We were anxious to secure the very best man to take charge of this work, and I finally heard of Mr. W. P. Fraser, assistant professor of biology at Macdonald College, as being the most competent man on this continent in reference to diseases of this kind. I discussed the matter with Dr. Harrison, who was very loathe to lose Mr. Fraser, but I represented to him the importance of this investigation, and finally Dr. Harrison agreed, and Mr. Fraser entered our service at a fairly good salary, and is now in charge of this branch of our work. I may say that when I applied to the American authorities in the effort to secure a first-class man, I was informed that I need not go outside of Canada as Mr. Fraser was the very best man on this continent. We have a number of very skilled men on fungus diseases in the department, as we have greatly enlarged this branch of our service during the past three or four years, but for this investigation we desired a man of pre-eminent ability, and I have every reason to believe that in Mr. Fraser we have secured such a man. I may say that we have printed 100,000 copies of a poster about two feet by three feet showing the disease in all its phases and giving the best methods of combatting it, so far as we know. This has been very generally distributed, and I hope my hon. friend has received a copy of it.

Mr. MARCIL: Where are the different stations to be located?

Mr. BURRELL: The vote always reads in this way. We allow a certain amount of leeway for the establishment of new stations. We are rather holding back in the matter since the war, with the expectation of strengthening and developing the work in existing stations and with the expectation also of the establishment of a considerable number of illustration stations. We have taken forty or fifty acres of the land of some progressive farmer in a certain district, and then, under our direction, he has carried out various methods of planting and handling his soil. I think that we supply seed to a certain extent. This has furnished an object lesson to all farmers in the district. I think, strictly speaking, it may be regarded as provincial work, but we took it up in 1914 owing to the drouth in Southern Alberta and Saskatchewan, because we had evidence there that a large number of the newer settlers had no scientific knowledge of the proper handling of the soil and the warding off of the danger of drouth. We have established something like thirty of these illustration stations. We have also made a start in Quebec, and have ten or twelve stations in that province, and one or two in the Maritime Provinces. We shall probably do a little more in that line this season. Whether we shall establish more experimental farms this year, I would not be prepared to say. We have a great number of places which are under the impression that they have been promised stations, or have had promises to look into the matter, and at the same time I think our work is sufficiently heavy, especially in view of the immediate necessities of the war, to cause a little halt in the establishment of experimental farms.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister is anxious to increase the production of the country.

Are the experimental stations in Quebec all over the province or in what localities are they?

Mr. BURRELL: The ones actually established are in Châteauguay, Drummond, Champlain, Bonaventure, Rimouski, Missisquoi, Chicoutimi, Dorchester, Verchères and Labelle.

Mr. OLIVER: There are two experimental stations in the Peace river country, one at Vermilion and one at Beaverlodge, two very important and very widely separated sections of the country. In view of the fact that the great Peace river country is now in process of development and is attracting the attention of settlers more than any other part of the prairie west, it is in the public interest that such experimental and illustrative work as has been carried on in these two localities should be amplified and extended so as to establish as thoroughly and as rapidly as possible to what extent the climatic conditions prevailing in that country are adapted to agricultural production. The great possibilities of advantage in the establishing of these experimental farms or stations are most evident where a new country is in process of occupation and where everything in the line of agriculture is necessarily experimental. The experiments carried on by the Government at the general expense may be the means of saving enormous losses to the settlers in their work of development and corresponding losses to the country, which benefits by their successes and loses by their failures. The Vermilion settlement and experimetal station is three or four hundred miles further north than the city of Edmonton. There has been an agricultural settlement at that point for many years, and a large area of that district is reputed to be suitable for settlement. Vermilion is in the neighbourhood of north latitude 57, and it goes without saying that farming there may be subject to conditions not generally understood in latitudes below 49. While there has been a sufficiently continued and successful production at Vermilion to demonstrate the agricultural possibilities of that country, in the expansion of settlement throughout the possible agricultural area the difficulties to be encountered might be successfully solved in advance at a farm or station more fully equipped than the present station at Vermilion. I am not at all belittling the importance of the station or the work that it has done. But a new condition has arisen through the railroad reaching Peace River town and the establishing of regular steamboat communication on the river; Vermilion is within the reach of the pioneer settler as it was not two years ago. This condition justifies the amplification of the good work that has been carried on at the Vermilion station and the fuller development of that work by the department.

Somewhat the same argument applied to the work on Grande Prairie at Beaverlodge. The large, progressive and successful settlement on the Grande Prairie has been established only five or six years, and during so short a period the conditions can not have been tried out by the pioneer settlers to the fullest extent. I suggest, therefore, that on the Grande Prairie, in the Beaverlodge locality or elsewhere, it is in the public interest that the department amplify and develop the work that they are now carrying on, with a view of discovering and of demonstrating the agricultural possibilities of the Grande Prairie country and the adjoining prairie areas of the Upper Peace river, as distinguished from the Vermilion settlement, which is on what we call the Lower Peace river. These widely separated districts differ both in latitude and in altitude, the Vermilion settlement being at a lower altitude and a higher latitude than the Grande Prairie settlement, which occupies a position comparatively near the foot of the mountains, and is at a fairly high altitude. I do not suggest that the station at Beaverlodge was unwisely placed, but it is desirable that the work be amplified because owing to the possibilities of the country, the large influx of settlement and the differences in latitude and altitude, the results at Vermilion are not conclusive in regard to Grande Prairie, nor is the work at Grande Prairie conclusive in regard to Vermilion. The two sets of experiments are necessary in order to give the full development that is desirable to that great Peace river country.

Mr. BURRELL: I am not disputing at all the force of a great deal of what my hon. friend says; in fact, I cordially agree with what he says. What he says in regard, for instance, to the district he has been touching on is practically equally true of all our north country from Quebec right through to British Columbia.

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. BURRELL. It is true in certain portions. There is a great deal of immigration, for instance, into British Columbia.

Mr. OLIVER: The returns of the Interior Department, which are very conclusive, state that there is no comparison between the quantity of settlement going into the Peace river country and that going into any other equal area in the North country.

Mr. BURRELL: I am not prepared to dispute that there is more settlement going into Peace river country. I am informed that there is a good deal of immigration going into all these newer districts, and I have no doubt—and I expect my hon. friend will agree—that much of that north country will prove far more adaptable to agriculture than we have any idea of at the present time, and I quite agree that all this work is valuable. It is a tremendous territory to deal with and expand and find the right places, and to initiate and establish any work of this character. I think, however, it is quite within the bounds of probability that we shall do some further work of that kind, and if we do, it is quite likely that we shall do some in that important district to which my hon. friend refers. The Grande Prairie district is already a considerable settlement; there are difficulties in it to be met, and I quite agree that any work of that kind would repay itself a hundred fold or four hundred fold. I will bear in mind what my hon. friend has said.

Arts and Agriculture—Branch of Entomology, $20,000.

Mr. KYTE: Who is in charge of that department?

Mr. BURRELL: Some years ago the Botanical and Entomological branches were simply divisions of the Experimental Farm system, but the entomological work of this country began to develop so much and there were so many important problems that were not directly associated with the Experimental Farm work that we came to the conclusion we had better establish a separate Entomological Branch, and Dr. Hewitt, who was at the head of the division when it was in the Experimental Farm system, was made its head. He has capable officers under him in almost every province studying out the different problems, establishing field laboratories and working out the histories, not only of injurious pests, but of friendly insects that keep down the predacious ones. For instance, we get from some part of the country reports of some new pest that becomes established which we could not study on the farm and the combatting of which is of vital interest to farmers over a large section. My hon. friend probably knows about that moth which is now in Nova Scotia and which has cost the eastern United States $6,000,000 within the last twenty or thirty years.

Mr. KYTE: Has the department any report as to the progress made in fighting the ravages of the brown-tail moth in Nova Scotia?

Mr. BURRELL: We have pretty full reports, and I think on the whole we have been able to keep a fairly satisfactory check on it. This is a work of enormous importance and of very great value. We are endeavouring to combat the ravages of this moth in two or three different ways. We are keeping a staff of men travelling all the time through the orchards and fields of the country, destroying its nests and eggs and in two or three different laboratories we are breeding insects which prey on the brown-tail moth both in the moth form and in the larvæ form.

Mr. ROSS: What is the line of cleavage between items 44 and 45? What has been done in the county of Middlesex in regard to this branch? Who is the expert and what has he been doing?

Mr. BURRELL: The difference between items 44 and 45 is that item 44, the Branch of Entomology, deals with all general questions of insect pests and insect life injurious or beneficial to the farmer, and item 45 deals with those phases of the work which come under the operation of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act. Under that Act, we are dealing with the brown-tail moth, for instance, and with various forms of entomological and botanical work. After practically making it impossible in Europe to grow white pine, this disease of white pine blister rust has been imported into this country and is threatening the existence of our white pine, which is worth about $200,000,000. We are beginning to do a great deal of valuable experimental work to endeavour to combat the work of that disease; that is done under the Destructive Insect and Pest Act. My hon. friend probably alludes to the fact that we established in 1913 one of our field laboratories at Strathroy for the special study of all insects injurious to plant life. We are carrying on work there that will be of benefit to the whole district.

Mr. ROSS: What has the expert there accomplished in connection with that work?

Mr. BURRELL: When my Estimates are up again, I shall, I hope, be able to give that information.

Mr. ROSS: What is the expert devoting his attention to in particular?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Reverting again to the question of rust, which comes more properly under this head, although the blame is laid on the barberry bush, the fact remains that that bush is with us all the time, but that rust comes only once in ten or twelve years. Can the Government, through their Director of Experimental Farms, or otherwise, furnish us with any information as to what effect the rust, which was so severe last year, will have on this year's crop? Will this rust remain in the soil causing any trouble, and what will be the effect of sowing seed that has been rusted? Those are questions that the farmers in our country are asking to-day.

Mr. BURRELL: Although I am not thoroughly familiar with this particular fungus, I understand that the rust is not transmitted through the seed. In a lot of these obscure fungus diseases the spores may be lying dormant in the seed, only waiting for favourable climatic conditions to develop. Last year conditions in Manitoba were extremely favourable to the development of this fungus. It is quite true that the barberries that harbour that particular rust are rather a source of danger. Some years ago the Department of Agriculture in Ontario, recognizing the danger, passed legislation for the destruction of all barberries. But the barberry bush, not only the purple kind but others, is a highly ornamental plant, and so many protests were made that the Government made the law operative only with the good will of the municipalities; that is, if a certain number of people in a municipality wanted the bushes destroyed the law was enforced. The consequence was that the law became a dead letter. In the West conditions are a little different, because there are comparatively few barberries, although I imagine in cities like Brandon, Winnipeg and Moosejaw both forms of the barberry would be hardy enough to live. They are highly ornamental, and a man with a beautiful hedge of them would be sorry to see them destroyed. So far we have hesitated taking any such action, although that may later on be desirable. We are having Mr. Fraser inquire into this question, and if we come to the conclusion that it is in the interests of the farmers to eliminate the barberry entirely from the western country, we shall have no hesitation in recommending such action.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: What about the rust lying dormant for ten or twelve years?

Mr. BURRELL: Like all other forms of disease there might be a certain percentage of rust there all the time, but climatic conditions might be such that it would not develop until the twelfth year.

Mr. BRADBURY: Could nothing be used in the ground to kill the rust?

Mr. BURRELL: There is a great deal of obscurity about this disease. It may be entirely dormant for several years, only to break out when conditions are favourable.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: In 1904, when the rust was not nearly so severe, the next year's crop was hardly affected at all. Has the minister been able to find out whether the failure in the wheat crop last year was entirely due to rust? I do not profess to have any scientific knowledge on this question, but I am strongly of the opinion, and it is also the impression of the farmers in my district, that rust was not the only cause of last year's failure. We had a very great deal of snow, and a very late spring. We could not get on the ground to sow until unusually late in the year. I think the season had never been so late before. Seed that should have been sown on the 1st of May was not sown until the 1st of June. Then came splendid growing weather, plenty of rain and moisture, and lots of warm weather, and the grain grew very quickly. The wheat had never looked better, and every one thought it would run from 40 to 45 bushels to the acre. I never saw longer heads, but when they were shelled only three or four shrivelled kernels would come out. The impression was that the grain grew very quickly, but had very little root. Furthermore, we did not have very many hot winds last year, as we had in other years. Our people do not believe the failure was due entirely to rust, but that there was some other blight on the crop.

Mr. BURRELL: My information is that the failure was almost entirely due to rust, and that there was very little blight indeed. Wheat at certain stages of its growth is more immune than at other times from a violent attack of rust, but if the development of the rust fungus happens to coincide with a particular period in the growth of the wheat the grain may be damaged very seriously. My information at present is that last year's failure was due to rust, but I hope, before another year, to have further information on this fungus.

Mr. GRAHAM: One of the troubles in Ontario, and I suppose in other provinces, is the weed pest; I refer particularly to mustard and daisies. I think there is enough land in Ontario covered with these weeds to supply wheat for the people of all the province. So long as I can remember, the Ontario Government has been experimenting with methods for killing weeds. When the farmers' organizations held their meetings regularly I attended them all, and I have been told time and again that a certain solution had been discovered which, if applied at a certain time of the year and in a certain way, would kill mustard. But next year the mustard would come up just as thick as ever on the next farm, if not on the one where the solution had been used. Has anybody really discovered a death blow to these pests? We are talking about increased production these days, and if some way could be discovered of eradicating these weeds, I think on the land thus cleared in Ontario we could grow enough wheat to feed all the people of our province. Surely if the Federal and Provincial Departments of Agriculture took up this question, some way could be found of killing these pests so that they would stay killed with proper care. I am afraid the Ontario Government has not been successful in this direction, although I am told that in some cases their efforts have met with success. But wherever you go in the country to-day you can see these weeds in abundance. Has the Federal Department of Agriculture taken any action along this line, and if so, are their efforts likely to meet with success?

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend has not, like myself, been engaged in farm work for a great many years. The weed problem is a very old one, and if my hon. friend thinks we can develop a specific for killing all weeds he is going to be very much mistaken. It all depends on the personal equation. A good farmer who knows how to handle his land by rotation of crops, and keeps it in good shape, is not going to be very much troubled with weeds. When we first bought the Experimental Farm it was absolutely infested with every kind of weed known to the province.

Mr. GRAHAM: How is it now?

Mr. BURRELL: Pretty good. I have been in districts in my hon. friend's province and found conditions different. I can go into one district and find a farm seeded down with bad weeds, and I can go to another district, where the farmer kept his farm in good shape with a rotation of crops, and I will find the farm perfectly clear of weeds. It is the personal equation and the knowledge of how to handle crops that counts.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is there any solution which, if applied every season, would kill wild mustard and daisy?

Mr. BURRELL: No.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: What about dandelions?

5 p m.

Mr. GRAHAM: They are very bad; they are in the category with daisies; they spread themselves out and kill everything in sight. My hon. friend says it is the personal equation that counts, and of course that is the big factor in everything. Canada is not so infested with the Canadian thistle as with other weeds. They have been experimenting in the provinces with a solution which they say, if applied, will kill these weeds, but the weeds are still growing. It strikes me that, as a result of our scientific investigation, there should be something found that would kill these weeds. The spraying of fruit trees, done regularly, kills the insects, and consequently the development and the production of fruit is greatly assisted. Is there not something which could be used against the other pests in the same manner? If the Agricultural Department could devise something really effective, they would be doing more for development and production than they have yet accomplished.

Mr. BURRELL: We know that insects on fruit trees can be killed by spraying, but there you are treating animal life which is existing on vegetable life. I do not think the spraying of weeds has been found to be very satisfactory, and I understand they are largely giving it up, because in that case you are dealing with a more persistent and hardier type of vegetable growth than cultivated plants. The weeds have survived through hundreds of years, and it is a case of the survival of the fittest. The mustard seed will retain its germinating powers in the ground longer than any other seed known. There is nothing on earth to kill the mustard and daisy except a systematic course of good farming, rotation of crops, and breaking up of the ground. It is a question of labour and intelligence to clean out the weeds, and I do not think you can manufacture any specific that will do that work.

Mr. MARCIL: I have heard farmers say that placing manure on the land makes matters worse.

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, if it is not handled properly; the manure may be full of weeds of the worst kind.

Mr. MARCIL: Could the minister give me the name of the farmer in Bonaventure who tried the experiment last year?

Mr. BURRELL: E. M. Legallis.

Mr. MARCIL: And the results were satisfactory?

Mr. BURRELL: It is only the first year, and it would be hard to say. I should like to say a word to the hon. gentleman from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) who asked me about the brown-tail moth, because it is just as well to have one or two facts on record. The work is being done from Fredericton where we have our station, We are doing scouting work in connection with the brown tail moth all through New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and, in spite of the spread of the moth from the United States to these provinces, we think we have it well under control. In New Brunswick we have men employed all winter. Infestation exists in the counties of Carleton, York, Sunbury, Queens, Kings, and Charlotte. In Nova Scotia five counties: Hants, Kings, Annapolis, Digby, Yarmouth and Shelburne, are all more or less infested, and the southern part of Quebec is being scouted for the brown tail moth, though no infestation has been found. Through the courtesy of the United States Department of Agriculture who have been importing parasites of the gipsy and brown tail moth from Europe and Asia, and we have continued the breeding of parasites of one of the predaceous beetles. We have colonies of these insects established in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec. Since the work began four years ago, we have reared, collected and imported into Canada over 100,000 insect enemies of the brown tail and gipsy moth. The gipsy moth has not yet reached Canada. It is forty or fifty miles south of the line, but by importing and breeding these parasites which live on the gipsy moth, we hope to have a valuable ally in preventing it being established in the country at all.

Mr. KYTE: How is the scout system carried on?

Mr. BURRELL: We have been co-operating with the provinces. The provinces have given a certain amount of men and we have given a certain amount of men. Year after year we have had men who have been very active and energetic doing this work, and we thought it better to continue the same men, in preference to having new men, who would have to be taught each year.

Mr. KNOWLES: What has been done to protect against rust in the West? In a word, has the minister made any progress in the way of giving out information, so that farmers may get rid of the rust in their wheat?

Mr. BURRELL: As a matter of fact, we have only started to work. We have established two laboratories, one at Brandon and one at Indian Head, and engaged the services of the very best man on the continent, Mr. W. P. Fraser, formerly of Macdonald College, has gone to take charge of that work and carry on the investigation. He will work out every phase of the life history of the rust, and the best means to combat its ravages. We have also issued about a hundred thousand copies of a poster which gives an absolutely life-like illustration of the rust in all its forms, with directions and suggestions so far as we are familiar with the matter at the present time. Our actual investigation work has not gone very far, because Mr. Fraser only went out there lately. We hope to have a good deal of valuable work done in the course of a year.

Mr. KNOWLES: Could you make any recommendation as to one class of wheat seed less liable to be attacked by rust than another?

Mr. BURRELL: I have been informed that they have been giving a good deal of attention to that in the States, but, so far, they have not been able to come to any conclusion as to one particular variety more free from it than another.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was it not the case that last year Marquis wheat was freer in the ratio of one to ten from rust than Red Fife?

Mr. BURRELL: No, not any freer than the other.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, yes.

Mr. BURRELL: From rust?

Mr. KNOWLES: From rust. I would say that there would be ten fields of Red Fife rusted to one of Marquis last year.

Mr. BURRELL: It may be possible that the reason is, as I explained to my hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner), that rust will attack wheat at a particular stage of its growth more especially if the rust fungus is also at the proper stage. These two conditions being present, the attack is very much more vigorous. The Marquis wheat may develop at a different time in a particular district and the rust may develop later and in this way the wheat might escape attack. But, speaking generally, through the western country there has not been this difference which my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. KNOWLES: It does not necessarily follow that Marquis comes in the dangerous season as it is earlier than Red Fife.

Mr. BURRELL: That is probably true but any grain that is sown earlier and that develops earlier will probably have a greater tendency to escape owing to the greater vigour of the plant.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the department has knowledge that Red Fife is more likely to come in the danger zone in regard to time why not advise the farmers of that?

Mr. BURRELL: Everything that is known to the experimental stations has been communicated to the farmers in the circular to which I have referred.

Mr. KNOWLES: When I asked the minister he stated that there had been no information given to the people as to the difference between one kind of wheat and the other.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Was there any difference between Red Fife and Marquis in regard to liability to attack from rust?

Mr. KNOWLES: The difference was about ten to one in favour of Marquis.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: In our country I do not think there was any difference between Red Fife and Marquis.

Mr. KYTE: Are the wheat growers in eastern Canada troubled with rust to the same extent as the western wheat growers are?

Mr. BURRELL: Very seldom.

Mr. KYTE: More wheat is being grown in eastern Nova Scotia and Cape Breton than ever before. If there is any way to guard against the attack of rust it would be well to give warning to the wheat growers and any information which the department may have should be communicated to them with the view of affording protection against that particular pest.

Mr. BURRELL: Wheat in the eastern provinces is very seldom attacked. There may be some climatic conditions under which it may occur. Any information we get in the West that is of value to the East will be distributed.

Mr. KNOWLES: Are not the local experimental farms in Alberta going into this question very fully? There is one at Carlsholme, and there are local branches at other points. Are they not carrying on investigations, and if so, does not this department collaborate with them?

Mr. BURRELL: I cannot tell my hon. friend to what extent they are making a special study of this particular rust. We have had some little correspondence with them, but I understand they are practically leaving this special work to us. We have the very best man who can be got on the continent in Mr. Fraser, of Macdonald College. He is acknowledged in the United States to be the best man on this particular class of disease, and we are willing that he should give his whole time to the study of this rust.

Mr. KNOWLES: Apart from this important gentleman who is giving his time to the study of the rust question, who is the chief botanist?

Mr. BURRELL: That is under the Director of Experimental Farms.

Mr. KNOWLES: What are the duties of the chief botanist? What is his name? I have forgotten his name; he is a German.

Mr. BURRELL: There is no chief botanist at the present time. The Director of the Experimental Farms is acting as chief botanist.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is a doctor something—I know the gentleman, but I forget his name.

Mr. BURRELL: I suppose my hon. friend is alluding to Mr. Gussow, who was placed in the department by Mr. Fisher about eight years ago.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is of no importance when he was placed in the department. I was not alluding to who appointed him, and I do not care.

Mr. BURRELL: He is not the chief botanist.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is his office?

Mr. BURRELL: He is acting in the department, but not in the responsible position of chief botanist.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is his position?

Mr. BURRELL: He is carrying on laboratory work in the laboratory at the Central Experimental Farm.

Mr. MARCIL: What is the increased acreage under cultivation in the West this year?

Mr. BURRELL: Our information is that there is about eight or ten per cent less wheat under crop throughout the West this year, but that is more than made up by the increased acreage of barley and oats. In Southern Alberta, I understand, there is a little more wheat than last year. The increased acreage throughout Canada will be seven or eight per cent.

Mr. OLIVER: There is another variety of wheat I have heard spoken of as being exceptionally early—Prelude. Is any experimentation going on in connection with that wheat with a view of finding out whether it would escape rust or not?

Mr. BURRELL: I do not know that we can say anything as to its exemption from rust. We are carrying on some work in regard to Prelude, and the director tells me that we are carrying on a lot of work in our northern stations. The wheat that my hon. friend speaks of is very much earlier than Marquis. It gives very good results at Fort Vermilion, in the Peace River country.

Mr. COPP: I would like to revert for a moment to item 43, as I was not in the House when it was taken up. I see by the Auditor General's Report that at the farm at Fredericton, which is the only experimental farm in my province, the expenditure for the year ended March 31, 1916, was $42,618.87. I would like to have some information with regard to the crops under cultivation, the yield per acre, and the position and condition of that farm at the present time.

Mr. BURRELL: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend that information in detail, because all these reports are in process of compilation now as to the exact acreage, character of the crops that are grown, and the experiments that have been carried on. I may say though that about 300 acres are under crop now.

Mr. COPP: Something like $1,966 was received from the sale of stock in the year 1915-16. That seems to be the only revenue from that farm. With an expenditure of $42,000 on a farm that has been established for some years, we might expect some considerable return to help meet the cost of maintenance. The general expenditure on these farms should be repaid to a certain extent, and quite a large extent, by the proceeds of what is sold.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend will find a full statement of the returns from all the farms at page A-91 of the Auditor General's Report. My hon. friend's argument is often made in connection with experimental farm work in all countries, and at first sight it seems reasonable, but it is based on an entire misconception of the whole nature of the work of experimental farms. What my hon. friend says would be absolutely true of a demonstration or model farm, but no experimental farm on earth ever should pay; if it did pay it would not be an experimental farm. That is a safe proposition. In order to have a farm pay by the selling of animals and crops it would be necessary to devote all of the acreage and all of the labour to the production of articles for sale, but an experimental farm is worth nothing unless it can do what an individual cannot do, owing to the great expense, that is to make thousands of experiments of all kinds to eliminate those that have been shown to be useless after a number of years. But if one experiment is successful it will justify the experiments carried on for many years. Let me take a familiar illustration, that of the Marquis wheat, referred to by the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles). Untold thousands of dollars were spent by the late Government and the preceding Government in the effort to produce a wheat that would be an improvement on the Red Fife. Thousands of experiments were made with little plots of ground at the farm here, crossing different varieties, and thousands of these were absolutely useless in so far as the value of the resulting variety is concerned. But by crossing a Himalayan wheat with the old Red Fife, out of a great many hybrids produced, one was so promising that it was replanted and tried next year at all the stations. After a few years the type became so fixed and its advantages so apparent that it was given a name, Marquis, and put into general use, its great advantage being that it ripened ten days earlier than the old Red Fife. That quality has made it of incalculable value; I venture to say that the originating of that variety has paid many times over for all the cost of all the experimental farms since the first establishment of a farm in 1887. There have been thousands of experiments in grains that were not of such great value. What is true of grain is true of cattle and plants and all kinds of fruit. So I repeat that no experimental farm can ever pay or should ever be expected to pay, and that the return from the sale of crops is a bagatelle, and must be, in comparison with the cost of administration.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend seemed to take it for granted that I was arguing against experimental farms.

Mr. BURRELL: No, but I thought you laid undue stress on that feature.

Mr. COPP: I did not intend to do that. Would the minister give us some information as to the manner in which the results of the work at the farms are disseminated among the farmers?

Mr. BURRELL: That information is distributed by bulletins; circulars and reports, and successful results at one farm are incorporated in further research work at all the farms. Then our men from each farm visit the other farms and bring back information to those in their district. That is in addition to the visiting of the farms by farmers to see what is being done.

Mr. COPP: I understand that the farmers get no information from these experimental farms.

Mr. BURRELL: I am informed that several thousand people from different parts of the province visited the Experimental farm at Fredericton last year.

Mr. COPP: I think my hon. friend has been misinformed. A farmer's picnic is held there occasionally, which is attended by about a score of people. The Experimental Farm is, no doubt, doing splendid work in the way of getting information for those who are running the farm and for those who live nearby, but complaint is made that the information is not spread among the farmers throughout the province as it should be.

Mr. BURRELL: We have the names of a good many thousand New Brunswick farmers on our mailing list. The farm at Fredericton is comparatively new, and there has not been time to develop the experimental work which may be expected within the next five or six years. We shall gladly add to our list any names that are sent in; my hon. friend is right in saying that the people should have any information that is of value to them.

Mr. COPP: I would suggest that my hon. friend get a list of the members of agricultural societies throughout the province and use that as an addition to his mailing list.

Mr. BURRELL: We have already done that.

Mr. KNOWLES: We have on the prairie a very destructive weed known as wild oats. Does the department issue bulletins containing plain talk to plain men as to how to get rid of that weed? The only method that I know of is too expensive for the average farmer.

Mr. BURRELL: As far as I know, we have no special bulletin dealing with that particular weed. A very excellent book, however, was issued many years ago on the subject of weeds, of which a larger edition is now available. This book probably deals with all destructive and injurious weeds, and sets forth the best methods of treatment.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister, the next time he comes with his estimates, bring with him such a publication or circular, or an extract therefrom, dealing with wild oats? It is absolutely impossible to get rid of this weed by the ordinary summer fallowing.

Mr. BURRELL: I will bring a copy tonight.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Can the minister give us any information as to what success attended the establishment of the parcel post system in the way of encouraging the shipment of agricultural products? In the United States, poultry, butter and many other farm products are regularly carried by mail, the United States Department of Agriculture taking a great interest in the matter. I believe that in many cities in the United States cold storage departments have been established in the post offices to facilitate the proper handling of agricultural products of a perishable nature.

Mr. BURRELL: I know that the development of the parcel post system is expected to enable people to ship various products of the kind mentioned by my hon. friend. I think, however, that my hon. friend would secure fuller information by bringing the matter up when the Post Office Estimates are under consideration. I could not tell my hon. friend off-hand to what extent the parcel post has been made use of in the carrying of agricultural products.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Post Office Department is not specially interested in the distribution of agricultural products, but the Department of Agriculture ought to take a special interest in that work, and I am surprised that my hon. friend cannot give us the information. I should think that he would be deeply interested in ascertaining what benefit the establishing of the parcel post system has been in the way of encouraging agricultural production in Canada. When the parcel post system was authorized by Parliament it was anticipated that a great benefit to the farming community would result, and that the consumer and the producer would be brought closer together. Unfortunately, the Postmaster General is engaged with matters connected with recruiting and is not here to give us the information. Can the hon. minister not tell us whether the farmers are availing themselves of the parcel post for the shipment of their products? Does not the minister think he should give us this information, which, I am sure, would be received by every one with great interest.

Mr. BURRELL: I am most happy to convey to the House any information that I can secure, but I frankly confess I do not know to what extent farmers throughout the country have availed themselves of the parcel post system for the shipment of their products. After all, many of these matters have been dealt with by the different provincial legislatures, and until recently absolutely nothing was done in the Department of Agriculture in regard to marketing. It is only within the last two or three years that we have begun to pay any attention to the larger marketing possibilities such as livestock, and we have created a market for that purpose. During the regime of my hon. friend no attention was paid to such matters and he cannot expect me already to have such a mass of information that I can give in detail what every market gardener or farmer throughout the country is doing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not expect the minister to give the House information as to what all the farmers throughout the country are doing, neither do I expect that the country will accept as a good answer to the question as to what this Government is doing, the statement that the old Government neglected its duties to the farmers.

Mr. BURRELL: I am simply pointing that out.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This country is advancing and we expect a progressive Government to do its full duty, even although the former Government was not just as progressive as it might have been. I do not know whether it was or not, but it did the best it could. We are, however, getting new ideas these days, and we have to-day an example in the neighbouring republic of the wonderful development which has taken place in connection with the parcel post system. Why should that not take place in this country? It is a matter of great surprise to me that the minister should say: I have had this important work going on for only two or three years, and I am not able to tell the House and the country what are the results that have flowed from it. The minister says that if he can get the information, he will do so. That is very laudable. When will the minister give us the information?

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend, knows perfectly well that he cannot pin me down to giving an exact date. I am very sorry that my hon. friend is so deeply pained over this matter. I can only tell him what I told him before, that I will have my officials look into the matter, and whatever we can do in the way of getting information or assisting in this matter will be very gladly done. Unfortunately, in view of all the nice things my hon. friend has said, this Government is not perfect. Rome was not built in a day.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If there is in the world one thing in regard to which I can agree with my hon. friend, it is that this Government is not perfect. That statement will meet with full approval throughout the country. Even if this Government is not perfect, will the minister promise, that if we do not detain him to-night, before this session is over, he will place before Parliament a statement made by himself in conjunction with the Postmaster General or the acting Postmaster General of what has been the results of the inauguration of the parcel post system in the way of bringing about and encouraging that close intimacy of contact between the farmer as the producer and the city-man as the consumer that will enable the one to get a more ready market for perishable products and the other to receive those products upon reasonable and fair terms? As I have said, the Department of Agriculture in the United States has taken charge of the matter there in conjunction with the Post Office Department, and it is giving great encouragement to the farmers.

There is another thing in regard to which a good deal could be done through the Department of Agriculture, particularly in connection with the Experimental Farms and that is to send instructors and educationists around to the different farms to visit the farmers in their homes and look into the farm work they are doing, give them practical instruction with regard to poultry raising, the raising of crops and fertilising. There are a hundred ways in which the farmers could be encouraged. It should not be necessary for the farmers to travel one hundred or two hundred miles to experimental farms in order to receive instructions, but those who are engaged in practical work upon the experimental farms ought to be instructed to go to the farms and take up the work in the different counties, have the soil analyzed and give the farmers information as to what soil will produce the best crops, and as to what kind of fertilizer it is best to apply in connection with the soil in particular localities. It is along those lines also that the Agricultural Department in the United States has done such splendid work, but we hear of nothing of that kind being done in Canada. All the minister has said this afternoon is that the old Government has not done much; that we are not perfect; that we have been at work only a few years, and that the country must not expect too much from us. Governments do not remain in power forever; my hon. friend may find himself engaged in other occupations before very long, and he may regret that he did not go to work actively and make hay while the sun shone and accomplish something effectual for the benefit of agriculture in Canada.

Mr. BURRELL: Amongst other things that I shall not regret, if I have to disappear from public life, is the great pleasure of meeting my hon. friend. The stage lost a great asset when it lost my hon. friend. I do not think he does his great intelligence justice when he speaks about what has not been done in the way of agricultural work. As a matter of fact, the work of agriculture around the farms and of visiting the farmer and giving him instruction has had greater impetus given to it by means of what we have done in the last two or three years than anything else that has taken place in Canada, and at the present time every province, under the Agricultural Instruction Act, is receiving an appropriation, a large part of which is devoted to this express purpose. It is most valuable work. In Ontario, something like $100,000 of the agricultural appropriation is given for the development of the work of the district representatives, who are gentlemen such as my hon. friend suggests, starting in the agricultural colleges and then going around the different counties telling the farmers exactly what my hon. friend suggests. In Quebec and in every other province of Canada, that work has been developed. We have not done it to the extent that has been suggested, simply because, as it is educational work, we have endeavoured to co-operate, as far as possible, with the provinces and to let them do that special form of work, although we do a limited quantity of it. I am sure my hon. friend, with that great want of charity which animates his person on all occasions in this House would not want to do even a minister sitting on the treasury benches an injustice in the remarks he makes.

Mr. BURNHAM: If the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) will read a book called the Distribution of Food Products, issued in 1916 by Professor L. D. H. Weld, the greatest authority on that subject in the United States, he will find that the whole question of distribution of farm products is gone into in every particular, and for those localities that are close to each other, under proper climatic conditions and in suitable times of the year, the parcel post is condemned as absolutely unsuitable for the carrying of farm produce.

Mr. PUGSLEY: With all deference to the gentleman to whom my hon. friend from West Peterborough refers, I do not see how that should be. If it be the case, of course, we ought to know it, because that was one of the great advantages held out to the people of this country in connection with the expenditure that would necessarily be incurred in establishing the parcel post system. I would not for a moment think of doing any injustice to the minister.

If anybody ventures to ask the minister a question, or to criticise him, he thinks some injustice is being done. Why, we are here for the very purpose of criticising matters in respect of which we think objection should be made. I am quite disposed to recognize all that the department has done, but I think that very much more might be done along the lines which have been suggested.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As I may be said to be the father of rural mail delivery in Canada, I might, perhaps, say that when it was introduced in this country, in 1908, we followed the example of the United States Post Office Department, and if my hon. friend from Peterborough will read their reports as to the object and results of the parcel post and rural mail delivery he will find that the service was established in the United States on a cheap popular basis, primarily for the benefit of the farmers. The Hon. Mr. Wilson, who was formerly Minister of Agriculture in the United States, was in office at that time and he published a report on parcel post and rural mail which I commend to my hon. friend, and in which he states that by the establishment of rural mail delivery the farmer has been brought nearer to the large centres, and that real parcel post, not the sham we have in this country, will solve the problem of distribution of farm products. During my tenure of office as Postmaster General parcel post was not on the raw basis which has since obtained in this country; it was then only in the experimental stage. I do not begrudge the extension of the service that has taken place, although I am afraid it has increased the expenditure of the department to a very great extent. I do not begrudge it, however, because it is in the interest of the farmers that they should be brought nearer to the urban centres and should have the advantage of getting the newspapers and agricultural papers and the many bulletins on farm work which are distributed amongst the farmers here, I suppose, just as is done in the United States.

Mr. BURNHAM: What about the daily market reports?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The market reports are published in the daily papers, in just the same way as fishing intelligence is sent all over the country. Although the expenditure on rural mail delivery has increased to a remarkable extent, I am in favour of that channel through which to reach the farmers as I believe it is in their interests. Mr. Wilson used that channel in the United States, and I think he was the propelling influence in establishing rural mail and cheap parcel post in that country.

We all remember the discussion which took place in this House some years ago in regard to parcel post. I then ventured to predict that the tentative attempt made by the then Postmaster General, Hon. Mr. Pelletier, would be absolutely futile, and so it has proved. Although several officers have been appointed in the several cities of the Dominion to look after parcel post, parcel post as they have it in the United States really does not exist in this country. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has always been courteous with members of this House, and has always been ready to take into consideration any suggestion a member might make in the interests of the farmer, and I think this is a question which he ought to tackle with the Post Office Department and with the Government generally. Give the farmers of this country cheap parcel post, and you will have practically solved the problem of distribution.

Mr. BURNHAM: Where parcel post for eggs and other perishable produce fell down was with the consignee. Who is going to guarantee payment by the consignee?

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my hon. friend will read the reports of the United States Post Office Department, if not the last one the one immediately preceding, he will see that the system has worked very satisfactorily there, and is earning large profits for the Post Office Department.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

For the development of the dairying industries and the improvement in transportation, sale and trade in food and other agricultural products, $155,000.

Mr. BURRELL: I promised the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) to refer to the work being carried on at Strathroy, and I shall put the information on Hansard. The statement of the work is as follows:

Entomological Laboratory at Strathroy, Ont.

The chief work carried on at this laboratory is a thorough study of white grubs and their control. These insects feed on the roots of grasses, destroying permanent pasture, corn, etc., and are also very destructive to potatoes. Strathroy was selected primarily on account of the large acreages of corn and potatoes grown in that region. This investigation on white grubs is being carried on in co-operation with the Bureau of Entomology of the United States Department of Agriculture with a view to covering the whole area in which damage from white grubs occurs, thereby obtaining the fullest possible information. In Canada we are investigating these insects at Ottawa, Strathroy, Ont., and Treesbank, Man. Already facts have been secured which enable us to advise farmers as to the best rotations to use and cultural operations to avoid injury from white grubs in districts where they occur. The adult insects, known commonly as June bugs, are also injurious to shade trees, and large outbreaks occur every three years. This year they will be abundant in Ontario and farmers are being warned accordingly. By investigation outbreaks can be foretold. The officer in charge of the Strathroy laboratory is Mr. H. F. Hudson, who has been absent on military service overseas from November, 1914, to April, 1917. He was wounded and rendered unfit for further service and has recently returned to his former work at the laboratory. A temporary entomologist carried on the investigation during his absence.

The laboratory, like all other entomological laboratories, serves as a local bureau of information and assistance for the surrounding region, and Strathroy serves the farmers of Western Ontario.

The hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) asked what we were doing in regard to transportation. We are practically carrying on the same methods as in previous years, namely, we guarantee two-thirds of the cost on cars for butter from starting point, and pay up to $6 for icing charges. On cheese we give no guarantee as to the earnings, but simply pay $6 towards the icing.

Mr. GRAHAM: Have you any record as to whether the production of cheese this year is low or high as compared with last year?

Mr. BURRELL: It is very similar. There was an enormous production last year on account of the very favourable conditions for our dairying, and at the present time conditions are just as favourable. There are certain difficulties in regard to labour, but we are looking forward to a very big production.

Towards the encouragement of cold storage warehouses for the better preservation and handling of perishable food products, $50,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: I observe a decrease in the vote, which would seem to indicate that not as many may take advantage of the aid as last year.

Mr. BURRELL: The reason is that in the initiation of the system the cost was very great. In the last few years many of the heavier payments have been falling off, and there have not been as many cold storages established, because the territory has been pretty well covered. Speaking from memory, we have only established three or four during the last four or five years, and in some of these cases, where the expenditure was very heavy, they have almost entirely completed their payments.

Mr. GRAHAM: Under this heading, it would not be inappropriate to ask the Minister of Railways whether the Government, in view of the discussion which has taken place, and in view of the admitted increasing very high cost of living, has given serious attention to the suggestion that the Government take over the cold storage enterprises of Canada, and operate them for the public good at the least possible cost. Even while we were discussing it the other night, the price of bread went up one cent a loaf, notwithstanding all the promises made by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. BURRELL: But it went down again. My hon. friend realizes, as well as I do, what an enormous proposition that would be to consider very seriously, because the cold storages scattered all over the country, apart from those assisted by the Government, represent a vast amount of money, and it would be very difficult for the Government to operate them. We are getting a lot of information in regard to the matter, and that has been done very largely under the Order in Council passed recently and which is being administered by the Minister of Labour. The Government is investigating the whole subject much more thoroughly than ever before, but I doubt whether it would be advisable to take over the whole cold storage system.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It seems to me, as the Government is seriously considering the nationalization of the railways that it would be far easier at the present time to nationalize the cold storage system of Canada. I think the high cost of living has reached such a mark that the people are expecting the Government to do something in this line. What are the regulations at present governing those cold storages at Montreal, Toronto, London, Winnipeg, and other large centres? Is there any authority on the part of the Government to release some of the food after a certain time, or can the owner of the cold storage establishment keep those products for what length of time he chooses? Really, the time has come when the Government should consider the question whether the food should not be released from cold storage. A charge is made against the cold storage—I do not say it is true—but the time has come when the Government should consider whether or not the cold storage plants should not be nationalized. Food has reached such a price that people cannot live in a reasonable way. It is impossible for a man who has a fixed income of, say, $1,000 or $1,200, and who has a family of three or four children, to live and provide for his family. This is a very serious question, and I would like my hon. friend to tell the committee whether the Government really intend to do something in the matter. I am not revolutionary, I am not socialistic, I do not wish to grab any other man's property, but in view of the crisis through which we are passing, is it not time for the Government to seriously consider the propriety of nationalizing the cold storage system so that food may be released for the consumers at a reasonable figure?

Mr. BURRELL: The question which my hon. friend has raised is a very big one indeed. Even if, as he suggests, food in the cold storages were released, it does not follow that the conditions to which he has referred would be in any way relieved. If you were to take out the relatively small amount of food in the cold storages all over the country to-day, it would keep the population going but a very short time. A comparatively small amount of the food that is used is put in cold storage, and if the cold storages were actually abolished it is questionable whether food would be cheaper. I cannot believe that it would be very much cheaper. This is a very intricate question. We are to be provided with full information on this question, and that information will be laid before the House. But, in the meantime, I may say that taking over all the cold storages is almost like taking over a commercial line of business which involves going into every city and town of this country and practically conducting a business operation which would involve the Government in endless difficulties, and, in a sense, would involve it in more difficulties than the nationalization of the railways. You are taking hold of an ordinary business concern, dealing with the question of supply and demand with regard to all conceivable kinds of products, buying and selling, and I think my hon. friend, if he were to look into some of the difficulties surrounding that proposition, would realize that it is a very big one indeed. I am quite aware that the cost of living has gone up to a point where it is pressing on a great many people, and pressing very hard, and I need not assure my hon. friend that the Government, as well as every thoughtful individual in this country, is giving the whole matter an immense amount of consideration. But the difficulties are not such as this or any other Government can solve very readily. I am fairly familiar with what has been done in Great Britain and, to some extent, in France, Italy, and even Germany, with reference to the question of food control, but the difficulty has been so great that even where they had taken action they have had actually to reverse the action that they had taken. They have found immense difficulties. They are finding them in the United States. They are taking great powers but they admit that it will be very difficult to exercise those powers. The real reason is not that which has been touched upon by my hon. friend so much as the absolute world shortage of food supplies. In the present condition of Canada, as well as of the United States, the cost of the production to the farmers, owing to the tremendous shortage of labour, has been contemporaneous with the mounting cost of food supplies. The increased cost of production and the diminished amount of the product are to my mind almost entirely responsible for the increased cost of food and the increase is general. In every country in the world, the cost is the indicator really of the world's resources, and although it is true that here and there the speculative element may enter into the question of cost, yet, on the whole the mounting cost is an indication of the shortage that exists in every particular commodity. I am quite sure that throughout the world, and in Canada as well, that condition that my hon. friend alludes to is more directly traceable to the shortage of supplies and to the decrease in production than to any other cause. However, I can assure my hon. friend that we are giving consideration to this question.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have here the index table showing the increase in the cost of living for the average family. According to the statistics gathered by the Department of Labour in sixty cities in Canada, in April, 1914, the cost for the average family was $7.51 per week. That is very low. In April of this year the cost had risen to $10.77 per week and, with the addition of coal, wood, lighting and rent, the total is brought up to $17.34. I have a list of the prices of various commodities. It is simply appalling and I do not know what the people can do to maintain themselves and to be cheerful under these circumstances. I do not wish to make any appeal that would savour of demagoguery, but I must say that it is a serious situation. The Government and Parliament are about to consider the nationalization of railways, and that is a very important question that demands an early solution, but is it not a fact that the question of food and the nationalization of cold storage is far more important than the nationalization of railways? You will have riots in this country next winter, you will have bread riots, if the Government do not take a firm hand now to control food. I was also referring a moment or two ago to rentals and the price of coal. I wish to give this warning. About ten days ago I was in New York attending a meeting as a director of a railway company which has subsidiary lines in Canada. The president of the Delaware and Hudson Railway Company, which takes care of most of the coal transportation from Pennsylvania to Canada, said to me: "I am amazed, Mr. Lemieux, to find that at this date we have not half of the coal transportation to Canada that we had last year or the year previous. What are you thinking about in Canada? You will suffer next winter if you have not your coal." But that is aside from the question. I simply wished to refer to that conversation to show that if the Government do not take with a firm hand the control and transportation of fuel and the control of food, they will have a very serious situation to contend with in Canada. It is the duty of the Government to see to it that such conditions do not arise. I am very sincere. The Government should take hold now of the cold storage situation and, if need be, make terms with the companies that are controlling the cold storage establishments; otherwise you will have riots in this country. I hope they will not occur but if the cost of living increases a few notches more, you will remember what I said this evening in the House. I do not wish that to happen, and I hope the Government will be patriotic and firm enough to boldly take this question in hand and settle it according to the best interests of the people.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: Would the minister give us some information about the exportation of food and especially of farm products to the United States and other countries? Has any action been taken by the Government? I am informed that along the north shore of the St. Lawrence river for the past few days dealers from Maine and Vermont have been going to the farmers and inducing them to sign contracts at a stipulated price for all their products for the coming year, eggs, fowl, sheep and cattle. I appreciate the difficulty of controlling such a situation, but I should like to know if the minister is informed of the facts and if any steps have been taken or are contemplated.

Mr. BURRELL: I have not heard of this matter. There is nothing under our present system which would prevent American dealers purchasing in Canada under such conditions, and making contracts with any farmers who wished to enter into them. I had not heard of the circumstances, but I shall make inquiries.

Mr. McCOIG: In the section from which I come there seems to be a very strong feeling that the Government should take some action to regulate the cold storage systems of this country, and I join with the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) in saying that the Government should not hesitate a moment to see that storing of food supplies in the different cold storage systems of Canada is regulated in some way. If the cold storage plants are allowed to continue to purchase at the present prices and to fill up their plants it simply means that the prices the consumers will pay next winter will be exorbitant, and the prediction of the hon. gentleman that there will be riots will be fulfilled. I feel satisfied that the Government do not wish that to occur. I had it drawn to my attention the other day, notwithstanding the statement made by the Minister of Labour, that in the different cold storage systems mentioned to me there are $4,500,000 worth of goods. The plants named to me were the Lindsay cold storage, Flavelle Bros. of Peterborough, the Harrison and Kincardine cold storage plants and the Harris Abattoir of Toronto, a subsidiary company to the William Davies Company. If that is true, and I feel satisfied it is, it is sufficiently important for this Committee of this House to investigate before we proceed to pass more money for this purpose. If there is to-day in the cold storage systems I have mentioned over four and one-half million dollars worth of foodstuffs, what will it mean next fall? It means that, with the price that is now being paid to the producer for eggs, forty cents at the farmer's door, the price will be at least double that to the consumer next winter. Eggs are only one commodity. There are other necessities of life concerned, and I feel that we would be justified in asking to have this item stand until the officers of the department investigate the statement I have made. I feel that the Department of Agriculture and the minister himself must feel that there is something radically wrong with the cold storage systems of this country when they are reducing the estimate by over $100,000. If the estimate is to be reduced by over $100,000 it must mean that the department are not in sympathy with the methods being adopted by the different systems, and this is a further reason why we should ascertain whether the statements that have been made are correct or not. If they are correct, then it is up to this Parliament to take some drastic action and see that the consumers of this country are not held up as they are reported to be. There seems to be some foundation for the different resolutions that are being passed by consumers, by the labouring men and the people generally, throughout Canada. They feel suspicious that there is something radically wrong, and if such is the case, I believe that we would be doing only our duty in asking to have this item stand pending further investigation.

Mr. STEELE: This question of food supplies and the cost of living is one that seems to be continually with us, but I think it is about time that the members of this House and many of the people of the country should begin to take a sane view as to the causes of the high cost of living and of the supply of food. I might say that if the proposition of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) should be seriously considered by the Government, they would find many of the cold storage men in Canada delighted with the prospect of having their cold storage plants taken over, because to-day many of them, and I speak now not of the larger ones of which I know nothing, but many of the medium and small cold storage plants, present a prospect of being white elephants on the hands of the owners. I can tell the minister that there is a cold storage plant in my riding, one of the very best in western Ontario, that he can take over any day at his own valuation—and the owners will be delighted to get rid of it. We talk of the high cost of living, but it seems to me that the old Adam remains in us yet, that we are not willing to take the blame that should lie upon ourselves, but want to cast that blame on this person or that person, or any person who will not resent it. Some people blame it on the farmer; when they have no other person to blame the poor farmer is attacked. I want to say to-night that the farmer is producing dairy food supplies to-day at a cost of about 75 per cent more than three or four years ago, and if the price has increased, surely the farmer is entitled to at least the increased cost of production. Then there are efforts, such as we have had here to-night and as we have had many times this session, to lay the blame on the cold storage people. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) has just given us a statement which he says he has received that there are $4,500,000 worth of food supplies in the cold storage plants of this country at the present time.

Mr. McCOIG: That was in five which I mentioned.

Mr. STEELE: Then take the plants to which he refers. I regret that there are not $25,000,000 worth of food supplies in these plants at the present time. And why do I say that? The fact that there is only $4,500,000 worth of goods in these plants clearly indicates the alarming shortage of meats and dairy produce. $4,500,000 worth of goods would mean 10,000,000 dozen eggs, having regard to the present prices. How long would 10,000,000 dozen eggs last the people of Canada? I venture to say that if no more goods were placed in these cold storage plants during the period of a month, they would be empty at the end of that time. Undoubtedly prices next fall will be higher than they are to-day, not because the cold storage plants are hoarding food products for higher prices, but because they are unable to get them in sufficient quantities for an ample storage to provide for the shortage which must inevitably come next fall and winter. The farmers of western Ontario to-day get 40 cents a dozen for eggs, whereas they got only 30 cents at the same time last year. In fact, the cold storage men are indifferent as to whether or not they put eggs into cold storage. They are unable to export their eggs as they did to some extent last year, because they cannot get any guarantee of transportation across the Atlantic. For several reasons they are afraid to store goods under present high prices, because they know not what may happen before next fall which may subject them to great loss. They are paying considerably more for butter also than they did this time last year. I see nothing in store for us, therefore, except very much higher prices for dairy produce next winter than prevailed last winter.

Hon. gentlemen talk as if cold storage, particularly as relating to eggs, were a new system. As far back as I can remember, and long before that, eggs were preserved in the summer, when they were cheap, for use in winter, when they were expensive. Many hon. gentlemen will remember the old-fashioned method of pickling eggs and putting them in vats; thousands of dozens of eggs were preserved in that way. The preservation of eggs, therefore, did not originate with the cold storage plant; it is simply the method of preservation that has changed.

The remedy for the high cost of living rests not with the Government, although possibly the Government can do something. It rests not with the cold storage people, although possibly they can do a little, too. Nor does it rest with the working man, nor with the man of moderate means, who, after all, is the only man who during the last eight or ten years has been practising economy. The people of the other classes have been living most extravagantly; we are to-day living most extravagantly. An American authority on this subject recently said that there is no reason why every family, excluding, of course, the classes which I have mentioned, should not be able to reduce the cost of their foodstuffs by at least 50 per cent, and at the same time nourish their bodies just as well. Look in our restaurants, our hotels—yes, in our homes—and see the waste of food that takes place from time to time. There is an opportunity of saving foodstuffs; there is a means by which we can reduce the cost, because as the supply increases, prices are reduced. The most effective way of reducing the cost of living and of increasing the supply of foodstuffs is by avoiding waste and extravagance. But the selfish spirit naturally asserts itself. We would rather criticise the Government or the cold storage people than practise self-denial and disappoint our appetites and desires. Individual cold storage concerns may be deserving of criticism, but instead of criticising them as a class, we ought to encourage them. I would almost go so far as to say that the Government ought to give them a little assistance in their efforts to provide against the scarcity of food which must ensue during next fall and winter.

Mr. GLASS: The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), supported in his view by the member for West Kent (Mr. McCoig), advocates the nationalization of cold storage plants as a panacea for all the ills resulting from the high cost of living. To my mind, the member for South Perth (Mr. Steele), has expressed a sound view as to the chief cause of the rise in prices. The waste of foodstuffs is not confined to Canada; in the United States the annual waste runs into many millions of dollars. If an educative propaganda were encouraged amongst our people along the lines of the conservation of foods and the avoidance of waste, a large amount of food otherwise lost would be preserved and the shortage in food supplies thereby diminished. There are one or two large cold storage plants in the city of London. In an address given on Saturday last to a women's organization in that city, the manager of one of those institutions, referring to the charge made against them of hoarding foodstuffs and making enormous profits, said that the profit on their output last year was not more than one per cent. No one can honestly say that this is an exorbitant and unreasonable profit, having regard to the risks involved and the amount of capital invested in a business of that kind. This gentleman stated also that on January 1 last, every egg in their plant had been sold and that from that time until the new supply of eggs was brought in by the farmers, they had to import their supplies from the United States. I do not appreciate the argument that the nationalization of cold storage plants will remedy the difficulty. I rather agree with the member for South Perth, that a further increase in the cold storage plants might be of benefit to the community. Cold storage is a kind of balance wheel to equalize prices by conserving goods during the months of plenty so that they may be available during the months when very little is produced. Last winter a farmer who had a large number of hens said that during a period of three months he had not received $2 worth of return from the eggs laid by hens which during that period had cost him over $200.

Neither nationalization of cold storage plants, nor all the legislation this Parliament can pass, will make the hen lay in the cold winter months. There are seasons of plenty and seasons of scarcity, and the best policy to pursue is to give the greatest possible encouragement to preserving our cold storage plants so that the cost of perishable commodities may be kept at a reasonable rate during the lean months. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) alluded to the quantity of food stored in these few cold storage plants, and he very rightly said that he wished the quantity had been considerably larger than it was. I agree with him that four or five million dollars worth of food products stored in these cold storage plants, which are the largest plants in the country, is not an exorbitant amount. The output of one of the five plants to which he alluded amounts to $3,000,000 a month or $36,000,000 a year. If the output of the other four plants is in proportion to that of this plant, then the quantity of food in cold storage in these plants is not unreasonable; in fact, it is considerably less than it might reasonably be expected to be. The important thing for the Government to ascertain in relation to these cold storage plants is not the quantity of food stored in them; it is the quantity of food products which have been hoarded for such a length of time as to become waste. I do not know whether the Minister of Agriculture or the Department of Labour or any other department receives information as to the quantity of food in cold storage from time to time, but if it be found that these cold storage plants are hoarding food for such a length of time that it deteriorates to such an extent as to become useless for food, then the question is serious, and the Government should take steps to prevent such hoarding. It cannot, however, be profitable for cold storage plants to commit such a folly as to allow their commodities to go to waste. The basic cause of the whole matter is want of production. The other night when I attended a meeting of the farmers in my district, they were referring to the Government's campaign of production and to the encouragement the cities were giving to production, and they made this significant statement from which we cannot get away: You may sow the seed; you may till the soil; you may increase the acreage from which production is to be derived; but if Providence does not favour you with the proper weather, the work will be in vain, and it is beyond the power of human endeavour to prevent that. The farmer, however, must take the view that the fact that such a calamity may occur, does not relieve him of the duty he owes to his family, to himself, and to the Empire, to prepare as much land as he can and to seed it, and having done his part to that extent, he will have done his duty. In all parts of western Ontario there is this year a very largely increased acreage prepared for crop and seeded; there is a spirit of optimism prevailing amongst the farmers of that district, and they are endeavouring to produce all they can. There is also a spirit of patriotism or of appreciation of the need of increased production in the business communities of the cities and towns, and the statement was made the other day that already in the province of Ontario 6,000 boys from the high schools are voluntarily serving on farms in that province. The question may be asked: what help can a lad of fifteen be? But, the experience of last year when these boys worked on the farms under the same conditions has shown that they have given the farmers satisfactory service, and the farmers who had those boys last year are among the very first to ask that boys from the high schools be sent out again. They say they prefer the continuous summer service of a good lad of fourteen, fifteen, or sixteen years of age, as the case may be, to the short term of service of a clerk from the city. In the city of London a number of business men have volunteered to release their employees for service on the farms, and that has been encouraged by local organizations such as the "Patriotism and Production" organizations or "Greater Production" organizations, as the case may be, and these organizations have been backed by the Canadian Club, Rotary Club, and so on, and the business men are thoroughly alive to the necessity of doing everything possible to ensure this year's harvest. If we are favoured by Providence with suitable weather, I do not entertain the serious view of my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) as to the possibility of riots, at least in that part of the country. There is no doubt, however, that eggs and butter and produce of that kind will be higher during this winter. Eggs purchased at 36 cents a dozen in that district are going into cold storage now, and they will necessarily be re-sold in the fall or winter months at a higher price, but that does not mean that that produce will be forced up to an unduly high price. What would happen if those eggs were not put into cold storage? The fact that the price is high at present is a boon to the farmer, but I do not know that he is any better off than he was when grain and other food which he has to feed to his poultry were cheaper. We have to face the condition of things that exists, and as putting eggs into cold storage is not going to reduce the production of eggs, the only factor of interest is whether these eggs being put into cold storage are going to be destroyed for use as food. That would indeed be a serious calamity and it would affect the price. I would rather say, with my hon. friend from South Perth, that the Government might assist the matter by giving the greatest possible encouragement to cold storage plants instead of destroying them, and I do not see how the nationalization of cold storage plants is going to affect the price of food.

Mr. OLIVER: The committee must have been struck by the solution which our two hon. friends have offered to the problem of the high cost of living, namely: Do not eat so much.

Mr. STEELE: Do not waste so much.

Mr. OLIVER: To my hon. friend from South Perth I would say that if he feels he is too extravagant in his expenditure, that is his affair, and I should be glad if he would speak for himself and not include me in his suggestion, because I have no guilty feeling along that line at all. I do feel, however, that I pay more for what I get than I ever did before, but I do not admit that I am getting more than I ever did before or more than I am entitled to. I do not suppose that the principle of cold storage as an economic proposition needs any defence at the hands of anybody. No one is attacking the economic propriety of the cold storage system. Neither is anybody suggesting that the farmer should not receive as high a price as he can get for his products. If I correctly gathered the sense of the suggestions of my hon. friend from Rouville and my hon. friend from Kent it is not to the farmers' prices or to the use of cold storage that exception is taken, but the question is raised 9 p.m. as to the manipulation of prices by or for the benefit of those who control the cold storage plants. That is the question at issue in the high cost of living that is interesting to members of Parliament and to the country, and to which they desire to call the attention of the Government. If the consumer only pays what the producer got, plus charges for carrying and other services rendered, nobody has any fault to find; but if the consumer pays what the producer received plus charges for carrying and other services rendered, and also an exorbitant profit, the result of the manipulation of the market, then there is cause for complaint, and we desire to draw the attention of the Government to the possibility of the existence of that condition, and demand correction of it at their hands.

We have had a sufficiently startling instance of manipulation of food prices during the last few months with regard to western wheat. It has already been stated to the House that the wheat left the farmer's hands at a price of from $1.20 to $1.80 per bushel, but the consumer has to pay for that flour on the basis of $3 a bushel or over. The farmer does not get that price, but the consumer pays it. Service was not rendered for that difference in price; it is simply a matter of manipulation resulting in financial benefit to those who are in a position to control the supply of wheat. What has occurred so markedly in the case of wheat is, we believe, occurring every day with regard to those foods which are the subject of cold storage. We believe that the opportunities that necessarily come to those who control cold storage operations, not necessarily the owners of the plants, are taken advantage of by those in control of cold storage operations, in the manipulation of prices for their own benefit and to the cost of the consumer. There are many questions facing the people of this country at the present time. I think everybody will admit that to the city dweller at any rate the high cost of living is one of the most pressing problems he has to face. That being the case, it is the business of the Government of this country to take such measures as can be taken for the purpose of securing an amelioration of that condition. Now, if it is the fact that five cold storage plants in the province of Ontario handle the amount of food that they are said to handle per month, it must be quite obvious that practically the whole food supply passes through these plants and is subject to manipulation at the hands of those in control of the plants.

Mr. STEELE: Do I infer that my hon. friend thinks the people of this country make use of only $4,500,000 worth of such goods per month?

Mr. OLIVER: What I say is that $4,500,000 of such goods per month is a very important part of the food supply of that section of the country where those plants are operating, and I am satisfied that the operation of those plants in large measure fixes the price of food to the people of that part of the country, just exactly as the manipulation of wheat last spring fixed the price that my hon. friend has to pay for the flour he buys to-day. It being an admitted fact that such a large proportion of the food supply passes through those plants and is therefore possibly subject to undue manipulation for the benefit of those who control these operations, these plants being under the responsibility of this Government, and many of them, I believe, receiving aid in actual money from the treasury of this country, it is the paramount duty of the Government, and I would say even before this item passes, to satisfy this House and the country whether or not there is such manipulation of prices of the food products going through these cold storage plants. This question of the high cost of living is with us; it is here now; it is pressing, and it will become more pressing from day to day. If there is an actual scarcity of food in the country then that scarcity makes the food supply still more and more susceptible to manipulation for the profit of those who hold and control it, and therefore makes it still more necessary that there should be an investigation of the facts of the case.

My hon. friend from Middlesex said that if it should be the case that food is unduly withheld from the market for the purpose of enhancing the price, that would be an abuse. Surely it would be an abuse, and it is an abuse that is known to have occurred in the past, when the conditions of stress that prevail to-day did not obtain. We ask that in the conditions of stress that exist to-day this country be given the guarantee of the Government that such a condition does not now exist—a guarantee that there is no holding up of the food supply of the people for the purpose of unduly enhancing the price, either by causing undue waste or simply by holding back the supply, thereby causing the people who eat three times a day to pay more for the food they eat. I urge upon the minister that he appreciate the importance of this question to the people, and that under the authority that is vested in him—and it is vested in him by the act of this House—he take measures to satisfy the House and the country that there is no undue manipulation of the food supply under pretense of giving it the economic advantage of cold storage.

Mr. BURRELL: This question has been discussed from time to time. While I do not agree with some of the remarks made in connection with cold storage, I am free to admit that there are some elements of speculation in it, as in everything else. I do not consider four and a half million dollars worth in these large storages a very formidable quantity, because, as a matter of fact, that quantity would only feed the people in the country for one day. In the United States there are enormously greater cold storages than in this country. In Boston the biggest cold storage in the world is situated, but it has been estimated that if you distributed the whole of the contents of that cold storage among the people, it would last only four or five days. So that, having regard to the food supply of the people, the quantity in these cold storages is very small. My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McCoig) mentioned several cold storages but he was astray when he referred to the cold storage at Lindsay, because it was burned down last year. Practically all the contents of that cold storage were sold in England by the farmers at a reasonable price, and they were glad to get that market. We want to encourage our export trade to Great Britain, and a considerable portion of the large amounts in all the cold storages of the country is held for export trade till such time as is best for delivery. I am not disputing the soundness of my hon. friend's proposition that this matter should be investigated. I desire to repeat that, under the Order in Council passed under the War Measures Act some time ago very great powers were given to the Minister of Labour to investigate this particular subject, and I understand that he instituted an examination into the cold storage systems of the country as to when the stocks were put in, at what price they were held, and all the details. If this information is withheld by them, he has the power to compel them to furnish it. When he gets that information it is the purpose to enforce such regulations as will meet the suggestions of my hon. friend. While I do not agree with all my hon. friend says, I am anxious that any existing wrong should be remedied.

Mr. OLIVER: When was the work of collecting this information begun, and when may it be expected to be finished?

Mr. BURRELL: Perhaps the Minister of Labour can answer. The cold storages we have subsidized and over which the Government has control is very limited, and this vote of $50,000 only applies practically to those who are finishing up their payments, which have been spread over six years. I think most of them have completed the payments.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A vote was passed by my hon. friend's predecessor in office in regard to cold storage in connection with butter. Is that still in existence?

Mr. BURRELL: That is in the other vote and is for the establishment of cooling apparatus.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was it taken advantage of last year?

Mr. CROTHERS: In answer to the question asked by my hon. friend from Edmonton, the Order in Council to which reference has been made, was passed on the 10th November. We at once proceeded to get ready to make the inquiries authorized by that Order in Council, and the work of sending out questions was begun in the latter part of December. Last night or the night before I gave the House samples of the questions sent out to the different wholesale and retail men and manufacturers. We first took up anthracite coal, which appeared to be a more pressing matter than any other. That was followed by questions in regard to sugar. We asked questions runing back for four years, as to the quantities on hand at a particular date, the cost, the amount of sales during that year, and we required them to send us a monthly statement as to the quantities on hand, what it cost them, the quantities sold and the prices at which these quantities were sold. For instance, we sent out 300 questions to the leading dealers in anthracite coal throughout the country. We got returns from them under very searching forms of oath. Sometimes these returns were not very satisfactory, and we required further and better answers to the questions. After correspondence, we received what we believed to be satisfactory and truthful returns. We are getting monthly returns now of the quantity of coal each man has on hand at the beginning of the month, what it cost him, how much he bought during the month, and what he is selling it at. I went into details in regard to sugar the night before last. We came to the conclusion that the profits on sugar, for instance, were not unreasonable, averaging generally about fifty cents a ton to the retailer. We got the price of coal at the pit's mouth, the freight on it, the cost of delivery, the cost of overhead charges, and so on, and checked the answers we got from each individual by information we had at our disposal from other sources. It is well known that the chief element governing the price of sugar is the cost of the raw material, which has gone up in price 100 per cent since the beginning of the war. The freight on sugar from Cuba has risen from nine cents to seventy-six cents a hundred pounds. The coal used in connection with the refineries has doubled in price. The chemicals that they use in refining sugar have gone up 300 per cent. Bags and packages have gone up in price. Labour has materially increased since the beginning of the year. Two of the refineries in Canada made no profit at all. One was operated at an actual loss. Another made only sufficient to pay interest on the bonds. On the whole, their profits amounted, on the average, to about a fifth of a cent a pound on sugar, which would not be regarded as a very great profit. The last price fixed for sugar was $8.35 a hundred to the wholesaler. Sugar is being sold by the retailer in a great many cases at 9 cents and in some cases, at 10 cents a pound, the man having paid $8.35 per hundred for it.

As to cold storage, we have gone into that question very thoroughly. The hon. member for West Kent (Mr. McCoig) a few nights ago, made a statement in the House that a certain company, perhaps the largest in Canada, operating cold storage, was seeking insurance on commodities aggregating in value about $2,000,000. That seemed to be a large sum of money. I am informed by the president of the company that that statement had no foundation in fact, that they are insured every day according to the amount they have in store, and that it varies from day to day. I have a full statement of that company's business. They have three concerns, one in Montreal, one in Toronto and one in Winnipeg, and we have the particulars of all their business, including beef, bacon, pork, cheese, butter, eggs, fish, and some small articles. We have the details, and we have the amount they actually had on hand at the time the statement was made up. The last statement we got was about the first of April, showing the quantity they purchased every month, the amount on hand, the details of the quantities of these different articles purchased and on hand, the prices they paid and the prices at which they are selling them. This evidence shows that if they had $2,000,000 worth of commodities on hand, that would be a very small amount for them and would not last them for half a month.

Mr. McCOIG: If they had $3,000,000 of stock on hand it would not be surprising that they should ask for $2,700,000 of insurance, because that amount of insurance would not be out of proportion.

Mr. CROTHERS: The president of the company informs me that they had never made application for $2,000,000 of insurance at the same time.

Mr. McCOIG: The statement was not made that they were asking for that amount from any one company, but that they were placing that amount of insurance on their stock with different companies in proportionate amounts, not one amount.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am told by the president of the company that it is not so at all, that they have not asked for insurance to that extent at any particular time from any company or any number of companies. They are insured from day to day as the amount in the storage varies, and it would not likely vary to the extent of $2,000,000 in a day. That company is one that, I am told by the president, does a business amounting to about $1,000,000 a week. According to our last report their business for a month amounted to about $3,000,000. We have every month a statement of the amount bought, the quantity in hand and the selling price. They were turning over about $3,000,000 a month at the time of the last statement, and I am told by the president now that they are turning over $4,000,000 a month; so that $2,000,000 worth of stock on hand would be only half of what they required for the next month. They are largely exporters. I laid on the Table today a report from the commissioner who has been devoting his attention to these inquiries. I laid on the Table reports, which will be found very interesting, concerning anthracite coal and refined sugar. The commissioner has in preparation a report touching cold storage, which will cover every cold storage in Canada. Others will have reference to the canners, flour, ice, bread and potatoes. These reports will follow at no distant date. If hon. gentlemen have time to look over these reports they will find them very interesting. I think they ought to be printed and sent out to the people, so that they will see what the exact facts touching cold storage and all these other commodities I have mentioned are. We are satisfied that there is no such thing as withholding in cold storage for the purpose of enhancing prices in the future. Prices are so high now that the keeping in cold storage of a large quantity of these commodities would become useless and would not be warranted. We have a provision in this Order in Council prohibiting the withholding from sale, or accumulation, of any quantity more than a man requires for his own use or for the ordinary purposes of his business. He is bound to sell to the public. Perhaps the committee will bear with me while I read again what I read the night before last—clause 3 of this Order in Council. It is in these words:—

No person shall accumulate or shall withhold from sale any necessary of life—

That is defined as including food, fuel and clothing—

—beyond an amount thereof reasonably required for the use or consumption of his household or for the ordinary purposes of his business;

(2) Every person who shall at any time hold any necessary of life beyond an amount thereof reasonably required as aforesaid, and every person who shall hold for the purpose of sale, whether as manufacturer, wholesaler, jobber, retailer or otherwise, any stock-in-trade of any necessary of life, shall offer for sale the said excess amount, or the said stock-in-trade, as the case may be, at prices not higher than are reasonable and just.

Mr. McCOIG: Has there ever been a conviction under that clause of the Order in Council?

Mr. CROTHERS: There has been no conviction under it in so far as I am aware, but there is nothing to prevent my hon. friend from West Kent, if he knows of any violation of the section, proceeding with the prosecution of a man for such violation.

Mr. McCOIG: I called the minister's attention to a tobacco case and the minister told me to tell the man who was affected to go ahead but refrained from doing it himself. It is for the Government to do it.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not remember receiving any letter from the hon. gentleman concerning tobacco, but I have no doubt it is true if he says so. But tobacco does not come within the provisions of this Order in Council.

Mr. OLIVER: Is tobacco not a necessary of life?

Mr. CROTHERS: It may be but it is not covered by the term "necessaries of life." That term simply covers food, fuel and clothing. My hon. friend (Mr. McCoig) thinks the Government ought to proceed to prosecute. He knows very well that it is not the duty of this Government to proceed, in so far as criminal, or quasi criminal, laws made by this Parliament are concerned, except where the violation of such laws affects directly the revenues of the country. It is the duty of the provincial governments to enforce the criminal law made by this Parliament. If a farmer in my hon. friend's constituency had one of his horses stolen he would never think of writing down to the Minister of Justice at Ottawa, or to the Minister of Labour, to ask him to prosecute John Brown for stealing his horse. He would go to the county crown attorney of Kent whose duty it is to look after such matters. If there has been any violation of the law concerning tobacco, it is up to the local authorities to prosecute. No Government has ever undertaken to prosecute in such cases. Fancy this Government undertaking to prosecute somebody in Nanaimo, Vancouver Island, for violating the provisions of this Order in Council in regard to milk. As I said a moment ago, that is the provision to prevent withholding. Under section 9, provision is made for prosecuting in a case of that kind.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: Referring to section 6, when that Order in Council was passed, it would have been much better if the Government had named a commission or to make inquiry in all Canada as they have done in the United States on entering the war. Such a commissioner would take an inventory of each item in cold storage and make a report to the Government. The minister said a few moments ago it is the duty of the provincial government or the municipality to take up that question. I do not think so. I think that this Government, before passing the Order in Council, should have named a commissioner to make an inquiry not only in one or two cities but throughout the whole country. That was the duty of this Government, not of the provincial government or municipality.

Mr. CROTHERS: I shall be glad to come to my hon. friend's question in a moment. I was about to show the provision of clause 9 which might be applied in case of a violation of clause 3, which I read because the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) raised the question. Clause 9 is in these words:

(1) Any person who contravenes or fails to observe any of the provisions of these regulations shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable upon indictment or upon summary conviction under Part XV of the Criminal Code to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years, or to both fine and imprisonment as specified; and any director or officer of any company or corporation who assents to or acquiesces in the contravention or non-observance by such company or corporation of any of the provisions of these regulations shall be guilty personally and cumulatively with his company or corporation and with his co-directors or associate officers.

There is a provision in this Order in Council that no prosecution shall be held anywhere without the consent of the Attorney General of the province. In case of a violation of this section 3, I think it is quite clear, that a man having a cold storage plant would be bound to sell at a reasonable and just price to men to whom he would be selling in the ordinary course of business. I do not think he would be obliged under that clause to sell to a private individual, as he is not a retailer, but I think he would be compellable to sell to a wholesale man at a reasonable and just price, and he would be violating the provision of that clause if he withheld more than was necessary for his own use or for use in the ordinary course of his business. I might call the attention of my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Martin) to a few words in subsection 2 of section 3. One of the officers of the city of Montreal pointed out the difficulty of proving the excess amount referred to in that clause. The gentleman criticising that clause lost sight altogether of the words "or the said stock in trade." It is not confined to the excess that he would have over and above the amount he would usually have in his possession in the ordinary course of business or for the use of his own family; he is bound to sell not only that excess but the stock in trade, so that if a man in the ordinary course of his business was selling coal and refused to sell a portion of his stock in trade at a reasonable price, he would, I think, be clearly violating that provision of the clause, and with the assent of the Attorney General of the province, the municipality could proceed under section 9 to his prosecution.

Now as to the question raised by my hon. friend from Montreal: Section 4 of this Order in Council authorizes the Minister of Labour to make investigations all over the country, not in any one particular place, and section 5 authorizes the municipality to make an inquiry touching matters affecting its own people. While we have not confined our investigations entirely to such larger questions as affect the whole Dominion, it was thought well to give the municipality power to inquire concerning matters within its own boundaries, and that it would not be practicable for us at Ottawa, for instance, to inquire into a complaint at Nanaimo as to the cost of milk there. And so section 5 was provided in these words:

Whenever the council of any municipality shall declare by way of resolution that in its opinion excessive prices are being demanded within the limits of such municipality for any necessary of life, such council may, by notice in writing under the hand of its clerk or other authorized officer, require any person dealing within the municipality in such necessary of life, and locally situate therein, to make and render unto such council within a time set in such notice, and such person shall make and render unto such council, precisely as required by it, a written return under oath or affirmation, showing in detail—

I need not give the details of the questions they are thereby authorized to ask and to compel answers under oath. If these answers come in and are not satisfactory, the municipality, under section b of section 5, may apply to the Minister of Labour to press the investigation further, and further investigation may be made by the Minister of Labour himself or by any one whom he authorizes in writing to take evidence under oath and to require the dealer to produce his books and all that sort of thing under section 6.

But I have notified all the large municipalities in Canada, including the one my hon. friend has the honour to represent, the city of Montreal, that if they comply with section 5 and request me by resolution of the council to authorize one of their officials, the city solicitor or any other official of the municipality, I will authorize him under section 6 to proceed with the fuller examination that I am authorized under that section to make, and any such officer so authorized by me in writing could call witnesses, examine them under oath, compel the dealer to produce his books and investigate the whole matter, and so the officer of the city of Montreal or any other city would have the investigation under his own control. That is in connection with matters that affect a city alone. A municipality is not given authority to investigate these larger questions that affect the whole country, we invesigate them. As I said, we have not confined the power of investigation to our own department; we thought it convenient to authorize the municipality to deal with matters within its own boundary. For instance, we have a great many complaints about the cost of milk and bread. Unless we had a staff of officers of about 100 or 200 we could not undertake to inquire into these questions in every city, town and village in Canada. We give each municipality that power, and some little time ago I proposed to enlarge their powers because some of them said it was necessary to examine witnesses under oath and make the merchants show their books. I notified them by circular letter that, as I was authorized under section 6, I would confer that power on any officer of the municipality whom they might name so that they might proceed in these investigations without any further reference to us. It is easy to say that this Government ought to do that sort of thing, but we do not do it, it is no part of our duty to do it. It is necessary to get the consent of the Attorney General before prosecution can be made, as, for instance, under the Lord's Day Act. No prosecution under that Act can be made without the consent of the Attorney General of the province in which the offence is said to have been committed. So it is under these regulations. I think that the facts regarding cold storage are not generally known. I hope to be able to lay on the Table in a few days a full report concerning cold storage. I shall ask the House to have it printed, together with these other reports, in order that they may be circulated. I am sure that they will throw a great deal of light upon these questions, which the people naturally do not know so much about, because they have not the time or the opportunity to inquire into the details.

Mr. McCOIG: The Minister of Labour has read the Order in Council which has been passed regulating cold storage companies and other concerns that hold foodstuffs to the disadvantage of the consumers. The minister admitted that no convictions have been made under this Order in Council. He assures me that any person who has been held up by the food trusts can take action. But the common people cannot conveniently take action against large corporations, for they would get into lawsuits and incur a great deal of trouble and expense. The high cost of living and the storage of food supplies should be regulated by an officer of the Government. The Government appointed officers to enforce the war tax measure, which is not of as much importance to the common people as this Order in Council. The officers appointed in connection with the war tax measure were sent around as detectives to purchase articles in a kind of sneaking manner, under circumstances not creditable to them or to the Government. These officers purchased drugs and other small articles from merchants in the back concessions and in the outskirts of small cities and towns with a view to securing convictions for lack of compliance with the Act.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend represents a constituency in which beans are grown to quite a considerable extent. I understand that beans are now selling at $5 a bushel.

Mr. McCOIG: May I correct the minister? They are selling at $10 and $12.

Mr. CROTHERS: All the better for my argument; I remember when they were selling at 45 cents. Would my hon. friend desire this Government to pass an Order in Council prohibiting any farmer in his constituency from selling beans at a higher price than $3 a bushel?

Mr. McCOIG: The minister seems to be wandering. I was not talking about beans or the price of beans.

Mr. CROTHERS: Will the hon. gentleman answer the question?

Mr. McCOIG: The question does not bear on this subject. For my part, however, I shall be delighted, if the minister will give me the assurance that we will get even $3 a bushel for our beans, to put in thirty acres this year instead of fifteen, as I had intended.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is no answer to the question.

Mr. McCOIG: I do not understand the minister's point.

Mr. CROTHERS: I thought I made it plain. Do you desire the Government to pass an Order in Council fixing the price of beans to the farmer in West Kent at any amount you may think fair, say, $3 a bushel?

Mr. McCOIG: If the minister will let us know how long he will guarantee to do that I will soon give him an answer—in respect of beans, wheat, or anything else. If he will make himself energetic enough to assure us a price of $3 a bushel for beans, $2 for wheat, or any other reasonable price for the commodities we produce, and guarantee that they will not go into cold storage, or into the hands of speculators, and that the consumers will get them at the difference between that price and the cost of putting the produce on the market, we shall be satisfied.

As I was saying, the Order in Council sounds good. But I am pointing out that the Government have appointed officers to enforce other measures—in a manner not creditable to this Parliament or to the Dominion. Under the War Measures Act grocers handling patent medicines are compelled to put a two-cent stamp on every 25-cent article sold. A number of such officers as I have referred to were appointed by the Government in connection with the war tax measure. Would it not be much better to appoint officers to see that the terms of this Order in Council are properly enforced? The Minister of Labour, who has the patronage in the southwestern part of Ontario, will not be proud when I assure him that I have here a summons sworn out by Hermann J. Dager, an officer of this Government. This gentleman went into a store in the back part of the city and bought 25 cents worth of health salts from the boy who was employed to deliver parcels, the storekeeper and his clerk being absent. He then proceeded to lay information against the storekeeper before a police court magistrate for non-compliance with the war tax measure, and had the man fined $50, $25 of which went to the officer himself. In another case he bought a 25-cent bottle of electric oil from a girl who was employed as a clerk. He fined eight storekeepers on the back streets of the city of Chatham and a number of storekeepers throughout the county of Kent. One storekeeper whom he fined $50—$25 of which went to himself, the rest I know not where—was a man who had one son killed at the front and whose other boy, who had been running the store, had gone overseas. The minister may smile, but is he proud that the officers of the Government are taking advantage of the people in that manner and causing hardship among so many small storekeepers in different parts of the country? The fact is that a minor matter is looked after by certain officers who are engaged to prosecute offenders, while the enforcement of regulations in connection with a matter of vital importance to the people is left to private persons. That is the position exactly, and that is why I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Labour to the state of affairs. If he is serious in regard to this Order in Council he will see that officers are appointed to enforce it.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think my hon. friend displays very good logic. One moment he says that we ought to appoint officers to enforce this Order in Council; the next moment he says that officers that are appointed act very improperly.

Mr. McCOIG: No. I said you could get officers to enforce this law, but you could not get officers to enforce one more vital to the people of this country.

Mr. CROTHERS: I explained a few minutes ago that this Government does enforce the laws concerning the revenues of the country and those laws only. We enforce the Customs laws and the Inland Revenue laws. This legislation refers to another department of Government. I know nothing about the gentleman to whom the hon. member refers as an officer and I did not recommend him. It is, however, necessary to have some penalty for enforcing that law putting a tax on certain kinds of drugs, and if a man violates that law, he is subject to the penalty imposed by the statute. If I remember aright, my attention was called to one extreme case, and after I looked into it, the amount of the fine was refunded. The better course for my hon. friend from West Kent (Mr. McCoig), instead of making charges against the Minister of Labour, who has absolutely nothing whatever to do with the enforcement of this war tax, would be to lay a complaint before the Minister of Inland Revenue, and the hon. member would then put himself in a position to get a remedy if anything improper had been done.

Mr. VERVILLE: The Minister of Labour to-night has, as usual, read the whole Order in Council, and we now know it practically by heart. Would the Minister of Agriculture state the rate that is charged for eggs in cold storage per dozen per month?

Mr. BURRELL: I did not know that my Estimates were coming up to-night, and as my special officer has left town, I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend the figure to-night, but I will give it before I get through with my Estimates. We do not receive information as to the rates except in those plants which receive subsidies from the Government. In those cases, we fix the rates, and if there are any complaints, and if on investigation we think the rates are improper, we alter them, and we have done so from time to time. There is a special tariff for each warehouse that has been subsidized.

Mr. VERVILLE: I do not know the exact rate that the cold storage plants may charge to-day, but not long ago I gave to the House the rates charged for storing eggs and many other commodities. The rate on eggs at that time was one and one-half cents per dozen per month including insurance, and while the rate may have been increased somewhat since then, it cannot have been increased to a very great extent. It is easy enough for my hon. friend to calculate the amount of profit these cold storage people are making when he knows the exact rate of storage, and he will find that the profit on eggs and many other commodities in cold storage is exorbitant. Some years ago I stated in the House that cold storage plants are absolutely necessary. When they were first organized, they were organized for a good purpose, namely, to preserve in cold storage a certain quantity of goods that would be of use to the people in certain months of the year, and some of those cold storage warehouses were subsidized. Instead, however, of using their plants for this purpose, these cold storage people have exploited the public at large, and I believe the Minister of Agriculture, although he may not have the exact figures, must know something about that matter. The minister switched us off a moment ago to the Minister of Labour, and, of course, the Minister of Labour spoke in regard to something else altogether; he spoke of coal, sugar and other things which do not go into cold storage. Last year the best cold storage we had was the home of the poor working man when coal was $15 a ton.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Is that cold storage under the control of the Government?

Mr. VERVILLE: The Minister of Labour states that, according to his information, the price of coal is not too high having regard to the increased cost of production and so forth. Anthracite coal was sold last year at fifteen dollars a ton, and that coal did not cost any more then, and perhaps a good deal less, than it does to-day. Why then are the dealers allowed to sell coal at such a high price? My hon. friend says that in the fall we shall be able to buy coal at a reasonable price, but we shall have to wait until then to see whether it is the case or not. I have more confidence in the Minister of Agriculture in regard to the question of foodstuffs, because he studies these questions, than I have in the Minister of Labour who seems to switch off every time. If we say that the cost of living is too high and ask for the appointment of a food controller, the Minister of Labour will read the Order in Council for about an hour and that is about all we get out of him, but when I address myself to the Minister of Agriculture, I really believe he is going to do something.

Mr. CROTHERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. VERVILLE: The minister did not say that the other night because he said he was against it—

Mr. CROTHERS: Against what?

Mr. VERVILLE: Against appointing a food controller.

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. VERVILLE: Is the minister in favour of appointing such an officer?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes.

Mr. VERVILLE: Well, we have gained that much information in twenty-four hours. As regards the Order in Council granting power to municipalities to investigate, the minister has appointed a commissioner to look into the matter of the high price of potatoes. The commissioner started at Ottawa, and I am informed that he found a case against one of the potato dealers, but I understand he was prevented from proceeding. I understand the head of that large institution, the potato trust, if you call it such, happened to be somebody from New Brunswick, who, it was reported, should not be touched. The price of potatoes, however, is still advancing.

The other day my hon. friend sent somebody down to Montreal to find out why the price of flour had increased to $15 a barrel, but we have not heard anything more about it. My hon. friend says he has sent out questionnaires to all the big companies and cold storage plants in the country, but before the replies come in it is very likely that we shall have another crop and probably two. I am informed by the city attorney of Montreal, who is a pretty good lawyer, I believe, and by the chairman of the committee that was appointed in Montreal, who is also a member of the Board of Control, that the city can compel these cold storage plants to make a sworn statement as to the goods in their possession, but I am very sorry to have to say that I would not accept those statements even if they were sworn to. The men in the cold storage business are no better informed than the men outside, and the reports of the cold storage companies are absolutely contrary to the reports that have been made on these plants by those who are not financially interested in them. I would not think of giving the names of those who gave me that information, because they would not hold their positions for twenty-four hours. A statement from the cold storage company itself might be all right, but you will probably find that they have forgotten to state certain facts. The plan I would suggest is this. The minister should get some official of the department to go right into the cold storage plant and make a thorough investigation. He would then have information that he could rely on. I think that would be far better than sending out these questionnaires, because I can tell him it will be a long time before he gets the companies to send in correct answers. Prices are going up all the time, and the people are suffering more and more; the minister must admit that. I expect the minister will ask me whether I would be willing to see wages reduced, so I will tell him now that I would be quite willing to see a reduction in wages if a corresponding reduction were made in the cost of living. I think if my hon. friend sent officials from his department into these plants at Montreal, Toronto and other large centres he would be surprised at the reports that they would make to the department.

I think I was the first to bring the cold storage question before the House some years ago, and in the following year I think the hon. member for Selkirk introduced a Bill, which the Government took up and passed, to prevent food remaining in cold storage plants for more than a certain period. Whether that law has been lived up to I do not know, but perhaps the minister does. I repeat again that the only solution is to send some one connected with the department directly into these cold storage plants to make a thorough investigation, and action should be taken by the Government as soon as their reports are received.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am reluctant to take so large a share in this discussion of my colleague's estimates, but since my hon. friend has referred to me so often I think I ought to say a word or two in reply. I am afraid I did not make myself clear when I was on my feet a few moments ago. I said that under this Order in Council I am authorized myself to make a thorough examination of witnesses under oath, to compel dealers to produce their books, and all that sort of thing; and not only am I authorized myself, but I am authorized to authorize anybody else to do it. I have invited the city of Montreal and other large cities to appoint a man—

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: Paid by the city. Why did not the Government do it themselves? It is their duty.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think it is our duty. As I was saying, I have suggested to the city authorities of Montreal and other large centres that at their request I will under the authority vested in me by clause 6 of these regulations authorize an official of the city to make that investigation. Now my hon. friend from Maisonneuve says that the city could not rely upon any affidavits that might be sent in. If that is the case, all the city has to do under the offer I made recently is to ask me to authorize the city solicitor or any other official to make the investigation, to examine witnesses under oath, to compel the dealers to show their books, and to get all the details desired, and I shall be delighted to do it. So what is the use of blaming the Government for not making an investi-

10 p.m. gation and starting proceedings? If my hon. friend from Maisonneuve will only exert his influence on the council of the city of Montreal, I have no doubt he will succeed in getting a man appointed who will have authority not merely to accept written affidavits, but to examine witnesses under oath and compel dealers to show their books and give all the information required. Is there anything more we can do?

My hon. friend has spoken about the price of coal. Personally, I do not know about the price of coal in Montreal, but I may say that last winter, in January or February, when the weather was pretty cold, I saw a press despatch that high prices were being charged in Montreal for coal. Without any application from anybody, I sent a wire to the Mayor of Montreal asking if there was any truth in the report, and I got a reply. Then I suggested that he should send a city official here, as it would only take a few hours, and we would give him any information we had gleaned from our own investigations, and assist him in every way possible. But he did not do it; he may have had good reasons for not sending anybody here; I am not finding fault with him for that. But surely he has no fault to find with us over that matter. I am told that the practice obtains in Montreal of selling coal in very small quantities in little paper bags containing ten, fifteen or twenty pounds. Selling it in little bags, 2,000 pounds of coal would aggregate $15 a ton, or, perhaps, $30, as some hon. member suggests. If there is any extortion the Order in Council provides a remedy under Section 3. I think my hon. friend, the mayor of Montreal, should call the attention of the officer who wrote criticising this Order in Council to the fact that his letter shows that he lost sight entirely of the words " or of stock in trade."

Mr. MARTIN: I think the hon. member does not know the gentleman.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have not the advantage of an acquaintance with him, but his letter shows that he had not in mind at all the provision in this clause making it obligatory upon the dealer, not only to sell the excess over and above the ordinary amount of business, but to sell the stock in trade. He only dealt with the other question.

Mr. VERVILLE: If an officer were appointed by the minister under the Order in Council and if he were paid by the city, how would he be under the jurisdiction of the Government?

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say he would be under their jurisdiction.

Mr. VERVILLE: I am asking, would he be under their jurisdiction?

Mr. CROTHERS: Power would be conferred on him under clause 6.

Mr. VERVILLE: But he would not be under the jurisdiction of the Government?

Mr. CROTHERS: That is not material. The clause provides for an officer of the municipality; he would still be an officer of the municipality.

Mr. VERVILLE: Suppose that officer made a report, stating there was stock in trade over and above what was necessary, then application would have to be made to the Attorney General to prosecute him?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes.

Mr. VERVILLE: I desire to avoid all that machinery. I am not speaking for Montreal alone, but for all cities and towns, I think it should be in the hands of the Government, because they are powerful and can accomplish the object in view. It is a question of trade and commerce, and the Government alone has the power to deal with it. It should be under the Department of Trade and Commerce, or under my hon. friend's department, because it has been given to him to look after. I may be mistaken, but it sounds more sensible to me that the matter should be under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Government.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister stated that he investigated in regard to sugar, coal, and potatoes. Would he kindly state if he investigated as to the price of flour?

Mr. CROTHERS: I stated, amongst other things that there was in process of preparation a report concerning flour, canned goods, and iced and cold storage commodities. I laid two reports on the Table today, and will present others in the near future.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The municipal council of a city could not thoroughly investigate the question as to flour. Supposing the council of Montreal appointed some one to ascertain whether the price of flour in Montreal was reasonable or unreasonable, the grocer from whom the flour is bought would say: "I had to pay so much to the miller." Suppose he buys flour from a manufacturer in Montreal, that manufacturer would say, "I had to pay so much for wheat, which is controlled by the speculator upon the Winnipeg grain exchange." Therefore the man in Montreal would have to be acquitted at once, because it would be said that he was simply charging the price which was regulated by circumstances which were beyond his control. It seems to me that to effectively carry out any law for the regulating of food prices, and reducing the cost within proper limits, you must have some authority which has jurisdiction throughout Canada. The official must have jurisdiction, not only in the place where the finished product is sold but in the place where it is manufactured. The jurisdiction must be throughout the Dominion. It seems to me the point raised by the hon. gentleman from Maisonneuve that it was the duty of this Government to carry out this law to regulate food prices, and reduce them to proper limits, is one for the Dominion of Canada to deal with, as pertaining to the whole country. It is absurd, in my judgment, to call upon the municipality to investigate, when it can only make a half investigation, and cannot thoroughly investigate the matter. Bituminous coal is sold in Halifax by the wholesale dealer. Suppose a complaint were made against a man in Halifax by the city council of Halifax, and the dealer says, "It costs me so much for my coal down at the mine in another county." That is altogether outside the jurisdiction of the city council of Halifax, and, therefore, if the price charged at the mine were so high that there was not more than a reasonable profit accruing to the dealer in Halifax, the city council would be powerless. You must investigate the whole question. The food controller, or the authority investigating, must look, not only to what has taken place at the point of production, and must consider the nature of the transaction between the wholesaler and retailer. The hon. minister says this is like the administration of the criminal law. I say it is not, because when Parliament enacts a criminal law, ordinarily nothing further is done. The whole machinery for the administration of that law is left in the hands of provincial authorities, but in this case the Government takes charge of a portion of the machinery, and it appoints people to investigate. It passes an Order in Council and it says to Montreal, "If you will name anybody, we will appoint him," showing that the Government is taking control of the matter ,or pretending to take control of it, but it is only a pretense to the people of Canada that they are doing something to control food prices, and it is seeking to throw on the municipalities the duty of making an investigation, knowing full well that they have not the machinery to make a thorough investigation, and that, after all, the most that will result from it will be that the Government will be able to make the excuse that they give to the municipalities the power, when they know perfectly well that the duty rests upon the Dominion. Another feature of it is that no criminal proceedings can be taken without the authority of the Attorney General, throwing in the way of the prosecution another difficulty. The minister likens it in that respect to the provision in regard to the enforcement of the law relating to the violation of the Lord's Day but he knows perfectly well that the conditions are entirely different. The reason for putting in that provision was that, throughout Canada, different views are held with regard to the observance of the Lord's Day. In some provinces the view as to the observance of the Sabbath is very different from the view in other provinces, and it is thought better that the Attorney General of each province, being cognizant of the public sentiment in the province, should be called upon to give his consent, so that it could be fairly inferred that public opinion was behind the prosecution for violation of the Lord's Day Act. I would ask my hon. friend what was the result of his inquiry as to the cost of coal at St. John. Anthracite coal in St. John is selling at $14 a ton, with open water between the city and point of production at the anthracite coal mines in Pennsylvania. In asking this question I do not want it to be understood that I am charging the dealers of St. John with demanding excessive prices. It may be that it is the result of the conditions governing transportation and the cost of production. I only ask the minister what the result of the investigation was.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The item before the committee is:

> Towards the encouragement of cold storage warehouses for the better preservation and handling of perishable food products.

I would like to remind the committee that the price of flour, the cost of coal and the observance of the Lord's Day Act hardly come within the scope of this item.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That may be true, but it would be an extraordinary circumstance if, after the Minister of Labour has been dealing with all these questions, one should not be permitted to pursue the matter further, but that the discussion should be shut off at this point. I would hope that my hon. friend would not press his point of order, because if time is consumed now in getting information, it will not be necessary to consume time at a later stage. But these questions must be answered before these Estimates are passed. They will come up at some stage, and it is very much better to have the discussion go on in a friendly way and have the information given now.

Mr. CROTHERS: I will be very glad indeed to answer my hon. friend. Our information is that the coal dealers in St. John do not buy their coal at the pit's mouth owing to the circuitous routes of the railways, but they buy it from dealers in New York city. Sometimes they are obliged to buy it from what are called independents in New York, that is dealers who are outside of the regular dealers. Sometimes they have to pay a very exorbitant price for coal in order to load a vessel. I think they have paid as high as $14 a ton in New York city in order to get a load hurriedly. But they do pay in New York city between $5 and $6 a ton for anthracite coal, and owing to the shortage of tonnage, for bringing it from New York city to St. John, they pay as high as $5 per long ton freight. When they come to sell by the short ton they have to get $13 or $14 a ton for it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They would not pay more for the short ton than for the long ton, surely.

Mr. CROTHERS: No, but they buy it by the long ton.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That brings it to $10 for the long ton, and they sell it for $14 per short ton.

Mr. CROTHERS: To figure it out, if I remember aright, a short ton of 2,000 lbs. costs the dealer in St. John $12.94. It will be $14 for the long ton and $12.94 for the short ton. That accounts for the high price of coal in St. John and Halifax.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How does the minister get $14? He said that they paid $5 per ton for the long ton.

Mr. CROTHERS: Between $5 and $6.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That would make $11 for the long ton in St. John.

Mr. CROTHERS: They sometimes pay as high as $12. My hon. friend need not quibble about a cent or two a ton. I said that they did not always buy it for $5 a ton. I said that they had sometimes to pay as high as $12 in New York. But they get it in New York usually for $5 or $6 and they pay $5 a ton freight. They do not always pay $5 a ton freight; sometimes they get it for $4. These prices vary. But we are satisfied from the figures we have from the dealers, and the information we have from other sources that the prices they are charging for coal in St. John are not such as to give them exorbitant profits owing to the abnormal conditions.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I wish to repeat what I said before that. I do not think the dealers in St. John are charging any exorbitant prices. But the trouble is that the Government have not adopted a policy of building ships and providing transportation. I am glad to hear what the minister has said. The coal dealers in St. John are a very honourable class. But it does seem a dreadful situation that in St. John, facing the anthracite coal fields and with water carriage between the two, our people should be compelled to pay this high rate. I would almost think the Intercolonial could bring coal down by rail from Quebec, by way of the Quebec Central and the Bangor and International. Now, in regard to cold storage, just one word further—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What gentleman says "hear, hear?" Is it the hon. gentleman who tried to stop the committee from working?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: If the hon. gentleman asks me, I would say that I was trying to encourage him to deal with the question before the committee instead of the dreadful condition he pictured in St. John in regard to coal.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman need not grow impatient. I do not wonder that he wants to get the minister away from this question as quickly as possible, but he will not be able to succeed for a moment at all events. In regard to the cold storage question, the Order in Council is so drawn as really to prevent any effective operation. It does not affect sale to the consumer because the consumer has no right to buy from the person having goods in cold storage. The person having goods in cold storage sells to the wholesale dealer or to the retail dealer, but not directly to the consumer. Therefore, no matter what the price may be, the ultimate consumer would not have any complaint under this Order in Council. Who is going to proceed against the cold storage warehouse? It is not the retailer, because the higher the price he pays to the warehouseman the higher the price he charges to his customers. If the retail dealer is complained against under this Order in Council, all he has to say is: "I had to pay so much to the warehouseman, his prices were high and I was entitled to a reasonable profit; therefore, there can be no complaint against me." The retailer is not likely to enter into litigation with the warehouseman because he desires to keep his relations friendly with the person from whom he buys.

All he has to do is to tack on a little higher price to the consumer to meet the extra price that he is paying to the warehouse man or to the wholesale dealer, and so he suffers nothing. He gets a larger price and a considerably greater profit from the family to whom he ultimately sells the goods. All this shows that it is necessary for the Government to take charge of the whole situation, to thoroughly investigate the prices charged by the warehouse men, the quantity of goods kept in stock, the prices which these goods cost before they were put into the warehouse, and to consider what would be a reasonable charge for the warehouse man, and then, through a food controller, to see that these foods reach the consumer at a reasonable and fair price. I have not time to go more fully into the Order in Council, but I am sure one has only to read it to see that the Order in Council itself and the mode in which the Government propose to enforce it are such as are calculated to render the Order absolutely nugatory and incapable of producing the slightest effect in reducing the cost of food.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: The minister says that he sent a telegram to the mayor of Montreal in February. I think it was at the end of March.

Mr. CROTHERS: Oh, no.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: I may be mistaken. And he said that I did not answer it.

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say that.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: I answered the telegram, but I did not send an attorney to Ottawa.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is what I said.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: Our attorney said to us that we did not need it, we were asking in that telegram for power to make an inquiry and that is what we did the day after. I believe, if my memory serves me well, that a report of that inquiry was sent to the Government. We found that the trouble in respect to coal was not the fault of the small dealer, but the fault of the big dealer in the city of Montreal. I remember very well that last fall the Board of Commissioners and the council of the city of Montreal passed a resolution asking the Government to place an embargo on the export of different articles such as potatoes. Potatoes last fall cost $2 to $2.75 a bag, and in the spring they cost $4.50 a bag. We made that request but we received no answer. I think that the only thing to do, and I think this is the duty of the Government, is to follow the example of the United States and to name a commissioner to inquire throughout the entire country into the quantity of the different necessaries of life, and to control the price so that nobody will make an undue profit at the expense of the population. That was the duty of the Government, and that is what the Council and Board of Commissioners of the city of Montreal thought last fall. I was answering a letter written to me, I think by the Department of Agriculture, and I suggested in my letter that the only remedy or possible means to give satisfaction and to reduce the cost of living to the citizens of different cities in Canada was to put an embargo on the export of certain foodstuffs. To that letter, which I signed myself, we received no answer. That was the only course which would have given good results. We had an example about a month ago from the President of the United States. It was the duty of this Government to take similar action long ago. But we know very well that since this Government have been in power they have been the friends of the trusts, and we could never obtain any relief from them.

Mr. LALOR: Does the Government of the United States control the price of coal in the United States, or has it done anything to control that price?

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: The first thing they did was to name a commissioner on the cost of foodstuffs. When the time comes to look into the question of the price of coal, they will undoubtedly adopt the same course that they have adopted with regard to the cost of foodstuffs.

Mr. LALOR: I inferred from the hon. gentleman's remarks that they did control the price of coal, and I asked if that were true.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: I am not informed as to that. But the United States having as President such a man as President Wilson, I am sure they will adopt a similar course. But having such people as we have at the head of our Government, they do nothing at all in support of the big city of Montreal in matters of this kind. You are always working on political lines. That is shown by the question you have put to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig), asking him if he would be willing to recommend a maximum price of $3 a bag for beans. That means that you try to set the farmer against the citizens of the big city in order to make political capital for the next election—it is nothing else. The country should be administered in the interests of all the people, and the Government should not try to make political capital out of such questions as this in order to get back into power. I do not rise frequently in this House, but you know that you have not done your duty towards labour, not alone in the city of Montreal, but in the whole of Canada. Take the question of increasing Civil Service salaries. You are recommending increased salaries for the big people who are getting $4,000 and $5,000 a year, but when we were asking you to increase the salaries of letter carriers, who get from $750 to $800 a year, you did nothing at all. Who is the man who most needs an increase of salary if it is not the man who is working 365 days a year——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: —and for whom the cost of living is just the same as it is for the man who gets $5,000. But for him you do nothing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: Raise the point of order and the chairman will decide.

Mr. BURRELL: I hope I appreciate the remarks of my hon. friend who has just sat down, and I am not disputing, it is not my place to dispute, the sincerity of his motives in discussing the interests of the large number of people in the city of Montreal over whom he officially presides.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: I was speaking for the people throughout the whole of Canada, not in Montreal alone.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend was, of course, speaking more particularly of Montreal. I may say that my conception of the duties of a Government, or of anybody else, in this matter is to look on the question in such a way and to solve it in such a way that the best interests of the consumer are really served while, at the same time, the interests of the producer is served. That may seem a paradox, but I do not believe that this country will ever be on a sound basis if the interests of the consumers are ever considered to an extent that will make it unprofitable for people to go into production. The best thing that can be done in the interests of the consumer is to make agriculture so productive and profitable a calling that more people will go into it and so increase production. My hon. friend raised a question that I should like to touch on because it illustrates my meaning, the question of potatoes. My hon. friend said that he wrote, I think to me, and he takes the ground—

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: I was answering a letter of the Agricultural Department, I do not know if it was from the minister.

Mr. BURRELL: My hon. friend takes the ground, and I think a great many people took the ground at that time, that in respect to the mounting price of potatoes, which were getting very high indeed, it was the business of the Government to put an embargo on the exportation of potatoes from Canada to the United States or any other country, or else that they should fix the price at a lower figure than it then was in order that the consumers might have potatoes within their reach. I want to lay this down as a maxim, and I believe it is absolutely true, that if at a time like that, when potatoes were scarce not only here, but equally so in the United States—if anything they were more scarce in the United States because they were 70,000,000 bushels short in the potato crop last year, and Cuba was also very short—we had placed an embargo on the export of potatoes the effect would have been to discourage the growing of potatoes in Canada. The growers in this country had built up, in some years at a very small margin of profit, a large business. The farmers of the province of New Brunswick had gone largely into the potato business and had built up a trade with Cuba and the Untied States which they were trying to increase, and incidentally they were supplying potatoes to consumers in this country as well. Owing not to speculation, but the shortage in United States and Cuba, the price of potatoes went up until it reached $7 a barrel. I believe that it would be a fatal mistake, however, to put an embargo on potatoes unless the necessity were extremely pressing, because the result would be the discouraging of production and a proper resentment on the part of the farmer, who would say: Last year I raised thousands of bushels of potatoes and sold them at a loss; this year, when I have a good crop, you deprive me of that profit which would make up for some of the losses which I have sustained.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Did the minister observe any resentment among the farmers of England when the British Government fixed the price of potatoes?

Mr. BURRELL: They did not fix a maximum price. The British Government have departed from the old established theory of not protecting the farmer. Recognizing that cheap food at all hazards is not the best thing in the interests of the consumer, they have guaranteed a minimum price of potatoes to the farmer of $30 a ton. I fancy that if the Government had asked the House to sanction a regulation guaranteeing the farmers $30 a ton for their potatoes during two years, my hon. friend would be the first to say that it was an outrage that the taxpayers should have to make up to the growers $20 a ton when their potatoes were worth only $10 a ton, as they were two years ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Nobody suggests the fixing of an unreasonable price. What has been argued from this side is that the Government at the beginning of the war should have fixed a minimum price for certain number of years in respect of such important foodstuffs as wheat and potatoes, which would have given a guarantee to the farmers, and, at the same time, a maximum price within which the farmers would have been obliged to sell. That would have been satisfactory to both consumer and producer.

Mr. BURRELL: The fixing of minimum and maximum prices upon certain commodities is a matter far more complicated and difficult than the hon. gentleman imagines, unless he has given profound study to the question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It requires some courage to do it.

Mr. BURRELL: It is not altogether a question of courage; fools sometimes rush in where angels fear to tread. In Germany they rushed in with maximum prices, and they later had to go back on that policy, because of its tendency to discourage production. In Italy a similar policy also broke down. In England they have not been doing the drastic things that some people think they have been doing. They have made some mistakes. They settled upon two meatless days in each week, but they had to depart from that because of the rush on bread and cereals. As a rule, countries which have attempted to deal in an arbitrary way with matters affected by the laws of supply and demand have failed to attain the objects which they set out to accomplish. I believe that it would have been a mistake to place an embargo on potatoes at the time referred to, because it would have had a tendency to discourage production. It was folly for people to eat potatoes, unless they were wealthy, and used them as a luxury, at the high price which that product attained two months ago. It would have been cheaper and more economical to use rice or other commodities. As far as Canada is concerned, it was better that she should have $7 available for productive work in other directions than have a barrel of potatoes. The situation was not so severe, to my mind, as to require such a drastic remedy as the establishment of an embargo. A telegram was read in the House the other day from the Eastern Townships that potatoes could not be got at any price, but I had a letter the other day from a gentleman in Sherbrooke who said that there was no difficulty in obtaining potatoes in that district at a reasonable price—about $1.50 a bushel, I think.

Mr. GAUVREAU: At this time the potatoes will turn bad in three weeks.

Mr. BURRELL: I am speaking now of the securing of potatoes in ample time for planting; this letter was received about four weeks ago. I had similar communications from Nova Scotia. One man wrote me that he had purchased 100 bushels for seeding purposes at $1.50 a bushel. This shows that the course suggested would not have been a wise one. Speaking generally, I think that any Government should go slowly in the matter of fixing arbitrary or maximum prices or imposing embargoes. Such courses should not be followed unless the necessities of the case are abundantly clear. My hon. friend referred to the United States. While the United States has appointed a food controller, Mr. Hoover, they have not taken any definite action; they have not even got their legislation through. The Secretary of Agriculture for the United States, with whom I have been in constant touch, kept me informed of all the proposed legislation and all their discussions, which I have followed with a great deal of interest. Mr. Houston himself said in the course of his remarks that he regarded the fixing of minimum and maximum prices as a course so important that it should only be employed as a very last resort. So far from exercising those powers in the United States, they have not even obtained them. They are asking, however, for very large powers, and rightly so. As my hon. friend says, we are living in abnormal times, and it is well that these powers should be in existence so that the remedy may be available when it is shown to be absolutely necessary under certain conditions. After all, we are all striving for the same thing—not to discourage production. The cost of production has gone up 100, 150 and 200 per cent, and it is vital to the future of Canada that no producer be discouraged in his efforts. At the same time, I know that every member is desirous also of trying to secure the best conditions for the consuming population, who are facing hard times, and to eliminate wild speculation or manipulation—which, I think, does not exist to the extent that some people think it does. In regard to the imposition of these arbitrary measures, any Government should move very slowly if they are going to move at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister speaks of the necessity of encouraging the producer. Would he say that this was not more than a reasonable encouragement to a flour manufacturer? I read from the statement of the Minister of Finance on page 1957 of Hansard, where he says that the Government tax for the year 1915, when the tax was only 25 per cent of the excess profits, was $380,000 on one milling company. According to that, the excess profits of this flour milling company, after allowing for their earning the usual dividend of 7 per cent on all their investments, would be $1,520,000. Does the minister think that is an ordinary profit which ought to be encouraged? The minister says that he is informed that the price of potatoes has gone down to $1.50 a bushel. Just the other day in my own city seed potatoes cost $8 per barrel. I bought some seed potatoes for myself, and I have the bill for them.

Mr. REID: A barrel would hold two and one-half or three bushels?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it is two and one-half bushels. The bill was for four barrels of potatoes for seed, $32. That does not confirm the statement of the minister.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: I have been informed that speculators are going through the different counties and buying up the crop of potatoes before they are taken out of the earth. If that be the case, the Government should stop that speculating. These speculators are also contracting for supplies of eggs, and they will control the prices in the fall. The minister says that it is our duty to encourage the farmers; it is not the farmer who received the profit; it is those speculators who start six months ahead and gather in all that the country will grow and then fix the price. That is what is going on in Montreal, and the minister should take note of what I have just said, and if it be true, he should stop that speculation. The minister says that the dealers are now trying to sell the potatoes at $1.50 per bag. They were holding the stock, and would not give us a bushel of potatoes unless we paid $4 a bag. From twenty-five to fifty cars of potatoes were allowed to freeze on the tracks at Montreal because the dealers preferred to have them freeze to lowering the prices. I do not want to throw the blame on the Government, but they should stop this speculation for the coming crop.

Mr. LALOR: I would suggest to the mayor of Montreal that he should follow the example of the mayor of New York, who now, I notice through the press of New York, is offering one dollar per bushel for all the potatoes that can be grown in the state of New York, so that he can sell direct to the consumer in New York potatoes at a reasonable price.

Mr. C. A. WILSON: That suggestion might apply to the Government.

Mr. LALOR: That price may seem fairly high, but that is what the mayor of New York is offering. As regards the price of coal, when hard coal is sold in the city of St. John at $14 a ton, but I would like to know, and I have not heard through this discussion, any suggestion as to how this Government can control the price of coal. We buy that coal in the United States, and regardless of what the mayor of Montreal may say, the Government of the United States have so far not attempted to control the price of coal in that country. I am a very large buyer of coal for manufacturing institutions with which I am connected, in particular one in my own town where we use about five carloads of soft coal a week, and to-day we are advised to buy that coal now and not wait until later to buy it, because, if we do, we shall have to pay a much higher price for it. It costs us 35 cents per ton to deliver soft coal from the mines of Pennsylvania to our town, and that coal is costing us to-day in the neighbourhood of $9 a ton, over $8 anyway. How can this Government control the price and give us our coal cheaper? We used to buy that coal at $2.60 a ton. The price is controlled by the mine owners of the United States, and the United States Government has not interfered with them in any way so that I cannot see how this Government can be held responsible for the price of coal in Canada. Will the mayor of Montreal or the hon. member for St. John tell us that the local dealers are charging exorbitant prices for coal and making exorbitant profits?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think any one on this side of the House has argued that the Government can control the cost of coal in the United States, but it has been suggested by some hon. members that the dealers in Montreal and other cities have been charging more than is fair. Whether that is true or not, I do not know; my complaint has always been that the Government ought to build vessels for the coastal trade of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hon. gentlemen need not laugh at that. That is a pretty serious matter and ought to be attended to. I only state it because the Minister of Labour said that he would investigate the situation. Before very long, the United States Government will take charge of the coal produced in that country. We, on this side of the House, are arguing that it is the duty of this Government to take control of the necessaries of life, particularly those which are produced in Canada, such as flour

Mr. LALOR: I think I understood the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite correctly and I understand that they are complaining of the price of coal in Canada. The hon. member for Montreal, St. Mary's (Mr. Martin), complains that in the city of Montreal coal is being sold at too high a price. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has raised the same argument, but at the same time—and I hope it was not on account of the votes of the coal dealers—he said that he did not think that the coal dealers were charging too much.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I referred to the cost of transportation.

Mr. LALOR: The price of coal is regulated by the price at the mine and the freight added to that, and I doubt if there is a coal dealer in Montreal to-day who is making over fifty cents or a dollar a ton profit on the coal he sells. I am not speaking of the coal sold in 25 or 50 pound lots. I think we should be absolutely fair in this House whoever happens to be in power, and not try to raise questions to influence the minds of the consumers when there is absolutely no reason for it. We have no control over the price of coal at the mines, and hon. gentlemen opposite know that just as well as we do, but the question is being discussed in this House day after day. I agree with the Minister of Agriculture that in order to get our farmers to produce more grain and grow root crops they must be encouraged, and you cannot encourage them by stepping in and controlling prices. I represent a farming constituency, and I believe the farmers of this country are entitled to the world's markets for the products of the farm. It is not all fair sailing for the farmers of this country. How about the thousands of acres of fall wheat that were ploughed up last year and which brought nothing to the farmer? How about the fall wheat in Ontario to-day that will not show over 50 or 60 per cent of a crop? Farmers are entitled to every cent they can get for the products of their farm.

Mr. McMILLAN: Does my hon. friend think that they did not get enough for their cheese at 21¾ cents a pound?

Mr. LALOR: That is a very good price, but if cheese is worth 25 cents a pound they deserve to get it. They are entitled to the price the world's markets give them for cheese. If you are going to control the product of the farm you must also control the product of the mine and factory, and if you are going to do that you must control wages.

Mr. OLIVER: You should not have commandeered the wheat.

Mr. LALOR: Was not the wheat that was commandeered last fall in the elevators and not in the farmers' hands?

Mr. OLIVER: The farmers owned a great deal of what was in the elevators.

Mr. LALOR: That is quite contrary to the arguments of other hon. gentlemen opposite who said that the wheat in the elevators belonged to the speculators. The hon. member for Edmonton represents a farming constituency, and he should be the first man in the House to stand up and say a good word for the farmers.

11 p.m. If the prices in this country are not high enough to pay the farmer, the prices must go up.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: We are going to tax the people for that and we will do it.

Mr. LALOR: I read a statement recently made by Mr. Hoover, controller of food in the United States, and he is absolutely opposed to fixing a maximum price for food products. He says it has been a failure wherever it has been tried.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does he not say that with proper control prices could be brought down by about 60 per cent?

Mr. LALOR: In England they do not fix a maximum price but a minimum price, and anything the farmer can get above that minimum he is entitled to; and that is all you can do in this country in fairness to the farmers. I want to be absolutely fair; I do not think there should be an absolute runaway market for the products of the farm, but the farmers are entitled to a fair price for their products. After listening to the arguments in this House day after day I cannot see that a food controller would do much good, or how prices could be brought down, because prices are controlled by the world's markets.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN: The hon. member has pointed to the action taken by Mayor Mitchell of New York in regard to potatoes. The Mayor of Montreal has not the same power as the Mayor of New York. Last year I suggested to the Board of control that we should vote $250,000 for the purpose of buying potatoes. We had no right to do that; it was quite illegal, but I was ready to take the responsibility in order to sell potatoes to the consumers at cost price. We did everything that was possible, so my hon. friend need not point to Mayor Mitchell as an example to me. It was illegal for us to take this action, but I thought the legislature would ratify it. The council, however, did not support me.

Mr. BURRELL: In regard to the potato situation my hon. friend will be glad to know that the high prices this year—and high prices are always a stimulus—have resulted in a greater acreage than last fall. I do not think there is much danger of any one speculating in the crops of the province of Quebec, because that would be an extremely wild type of speculation. I think my hon. friend can be hopeful that the efforts of the farmers and everybody else this year will result in very much more satisfactory conditions.

Mr. COPP: I understood the minister to state the potatoes were selling in Nova Scotia at $1.50 a bushel.

Mr. BURRELL: Yes, near the city of Halifax. I was shown a letter only a week or so ago in which it was said that over 100 bushels was bought for seed at $1.50.

Mr. COPP: That must have been an isolated case, because within the last twenty-four hours I have learned that a league has been formed by the citizens of Amherst to go without potatoes in June so that the people may have enough for seeding.

Mr. BURRELL: We may be thankful that there are enough left for seed. As it is getting late, I would suggest that we pass this item, and that the committee then rise.

Mr. OLIVER: The statement made by the Minister of Labour as to the information he was gathering with regard to cold storage warehouses was so diffuse and so voluminous that I was not able to gather what he was really doing, and I think we should thoroughly understand just what is being done before this item is passed.

Item stands.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Thursday, June 7, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

INSURANCE ACT OF 1910.

PROPOSED NEW ENACTMENT.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 53, respecting insurance.

He said: This legislation is rendered necessary by a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in what is known as The Insurance Case, which was decided in March of last year. The Bill repeals the Insurance Act of 1910 and re-enacts it with certain amendments. The amendments are of two classes: First, those which are necessary to remove from the existing Act the features which have been ruled by the decision of the Privy Council in The Insurance Case to be ultra vires, and, second, those considered necessary to meet changed conditions which have arisen since the passing of the present Act and to remove serious defects which have come to light in the course of its administration. The decision of the Privy Council to which I have alluded is the culmination of considerable litigation which has from time to time during the last twenty years concerned itself with the question of the constitutionality of the Insurance Act. The point as to the constitutionality of the Insurance Act, however, never came up squarely in the course of the litigation to which I have referred. It arose incidentally from time to time, and as a result of the doubt which was cast upon the constitutionality of the Act, a reference was made by the Solicitor General of Canada to the Supreme Court to determine the question. The Supreme Court gave its decision, and the case was afterwards appealed to the Privy Council. In 1909 it was held by Judge Lett, sitting as magistrate in the city of Montreal, that the Insurance Act was ultra vires and that it was not possible to enforce the penalties provided by the Act for infractions of the law. As a result, the administration of the Insurance Act was practically paralyzed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: On what ground?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: On the ground that it was ultra vires of the Dominion Parliament.

Mr. GRAHAM: What particular part of the Act was declared ultra vires, and to what part of the case did it refer?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The case was the King vs. Willis Faber & Company, who, unlicensed, had been soliciting insurance and collecting premiums in violation of a provision of the Act as in force at that time, which is now section 4 of the Insurance Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The magistrate held that the license could be issued only by the provincial government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It was held that the legislature of the Dominion, in requiring a company or person to obtain a license before carrying on the business of insurance in Canada, was ultra vires of the Dominion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That matter belonged to the provinces only?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not sure as to what further was decided, but that was the point so far as Dominion legislation was concerned. There was no appeal from that decision, and the result was that the administration of the Insurance Act has been practically paralyzed ever since because of the impossibility of enforcing the penalties provided for infractions of the law. The matter came squarely before the Privy Council as to the constitutionality of sections 4 and 70 of the Act. Section 4 of the Act is as follows:

> In Canada, except as otherwise provided by this Act, no company or underwriters or other person shall solicit or accept any risk, or issue or deliver any receipt or policy of insurance, or grant any annuity on a life or lives, or collect or receive any premium, or inspect any risk, or adjust any loss, or carry on any business of insurance, or prosecute or maintain any suit, action or proceeding, or file any claim in insolvency relating to such business, unless it be done by or on behalf of a company or underwriters holding a license from the minister.

In other words, the Act prohibits any company or person from carrying on the business of insurance in Canada without obtaining a license from the Dominion Government. I should explain that that section applied not only to companies incorporated by the Dominion Parliament and to persons throughout the Dominion, but to companies incorporated by the provinces carrying on business outside such provinces. The Privy Council decided that section 4 was ultra vires of the Dominion Parliament. The terms of its decision in that connection are as follows:

> Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that the majority in the Supreme Court were right in answering the first of the two questions referred to them in the affirmative.

That is to say, the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court, afterwards confirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, was that sections 4 and 70—the latter being the section providing penalties for infractions of the Act—were ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada. Although the question asks whether the sections are ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada, and specifically inquires as to whether "any and what part or parts of the said sections" are ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada, the Privy Council has contented itself with stating that sections 4 and 70 are ultra vires. The result is that the validity of sections 4 and 70—and, by consequence, of the whole Insurance Act, because section 4 is a basic and fundamental section of the Act—is impugned by the decision of the Privy Council.

The Privy Council has not stated whether any particular provision or provisions of section 4 of the Insurance Act are intra vires; it simply states that section 4 is ultra vires, but it is to be gathered from the context of the judgment of the Privy Council that the Judicial Committee is of the opinion that it is beyond the powers of Parliament to require a provincially incorporated insurance company to obtain a license from the minister, even if the company extends its business to provinces other than that by which it was incorporated. I may say that the existing Act, that is to say, the Insurance Act of 1910, withdraws from its application the provincially incorporated company which restricts its business to its own province, but requires it to obtain a Dominion license in the event of its extending its business beyond that province; that is to say, under the Dominion Act of 1910, a provincially incorporated company doing business solely within its own province was not required to obtain a license, but if it extended its business beyond the confines of its province, then by section 4 of the Insurance Act it was required to obtain a license from the Dominion Government. The most important change in the new Bill, therefore, arising out of the constitutional question—and I am discussing the constitutional question and the amendments necessary to meet the decision first—is the withdrawal from the application of the Act of all provincially incorporated companies save those which voluntarily obtain a license from the minister. Just let me repeat that. The new Bill, now before the House, excludes from its operation provincially incorporated companies whether they carry on their business solely within the province or beyond its jurisdiction. It seems to be necessary that they all should be excluded in order to come within the requirements of the judgment of the Privy Council. In order to meet the case of provincially incorporated companies which may desire voluntarily to take out licenses under the Dominion Insurance Act, provision is made in the Bill whereby such companies, if they elect to come in, are regarded as Canadian companies for the purposes of the Act.

I think I can summarize in a sentence what I have said as to provincially incorporated companies. The effect is that unless a provincially incorporated company voluntarily seeks a license under the Act, it is completely exempt from the provisions of the Act; but if it seeks and obtains such a license, it becomes a Canadian company, and so becomes subject to the Act to the same extent as those Canadian companies originally incorporated by Parliament.

There is another question of an important character involved in the decision of the Privy Council and dealt with in this House, and that is as to whether the Dominion Parliament has jurisdiction to require a foreign insurance company—and by "foreign" I include British—to take out a license even in a case where a company desires to carry on its business only within the limits of a single province. The answer which the Privy Council gave upon that side of the case was that it was "within the power of Parliament, by properly framed legislation"—I am reading from their lordships' decision—to impose such a restriction as it appears that such power is given by section 91 of the British North America Act, which refers to the regulation of trade and commerce and to aliens. In other words, their lordships say that by properly framed legislation the Dominion Parliament may enact legislation of an authoritative and binding character upon foreign insurance companies, and they found that jurisdiction upon section 91 of the British North America Act, which, of course, in the division of subjects between the provinces and the Dominion, allocates to the Dominion the subjects of trade and commerce and aliens. The suggestion, however, of their lordships that the Dominion might do this by properly framed legislation is an intimation that the existing legislation is inadequate, and therefore the sections of the Bill now before the House which require British and foreign companies to obtain a license under it are so worded as to show that the power assumed is taken under the heads which I have mentioned, namely, trade and commerce and aliens. This Bill, before being brought before the House, has received the most careful consideration on the part not only of the Insurance Department, but of the Deputy Minister of Justice and of outside counsel, in order to bring its provisions within the judgment of the Judicial Committee in the insurance case, and strictly within the powers of enactment of the Dominion Parliament. That is all I have to say upon the constitutional aspect of the matter. All the constitutional changes are to be found in sections two to twelve, inclusive, of this Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: The question as to the right of locally incorporated companies to do business in other provinces than that in which they are incorporated has been back and forth before the courts for a number of years, and it has also been before the Privy Council. I am not familiar as to how that question stands now, and that question is involved in the question that the minister is now discussing. Suppose an insurance company, incorporated by the province of Ontario, starts to do business in the province of Quebec, would this Government have a right to give that Ontario incorporated company a license to do business in the province of Quebec? I understand the minister has taken power by this legislation to give that Ontario company such a license. I would be afraid that we would have no jurisdiction to enable a local company that has power to do business only in Ontario to go into Quebec or any other province to do business there.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry that owing to the noise in the Chamber I have not succeeded in making myself heard by my hon. friend. Under the existing Insurance Act, which is the Act of 1910, the Dominion Parliament, by section 4, assumed jurisdiction under which it required a provincially incorporated company doing business outside of the limits of the province incorporating it to take out a Dominion license.

That has been held to be unconstitutional by the decision of the Privy Council in the Insurance Case. In the new Bill, which repeals the old Act and which is now before the House, the Dominion Government will have no jurisdiction over a provincially incorporated insurance company doing business within the province which incorporated it, or doing business outside that province; but a provision has been inserted in the Bill whereby if a provincially incorporated company voluntarily submits itself to the jurisdiction of the Dominion, it may be licensed.

Now I come to the other amendments which, while they are of an important character, will probably not prove contentious. They have been introduced in order to remedy defects which have disclosed themselves from time to time in the administration of the existing Insurance Act. Without going into details, I may indicate the amendments in general terms as follows. The definition of "explosion insurance" is enlarged to include insurance against damage caused by bombardment and other damage incidental to war. There has been a considerable demand for protection against these hazards, and the amendment here made follows amendments made in many of the laws of the United States.

Then there is an amendment under which a license may be granted for any of the six classes of insurance mentioned in the existing Act, excluding life insurance, and by providing that subject to the approval of the Treasury Board additional classes may be added the total number of classes combined in any license however, not to exceed ten. The old section was found to be cumbrous and difficult of interpretation. It was our intention two years ago, when I introduced legislation on this subject, to have this part of the Act amended.

There is also an amendment to the present provision which prohibits a company empowered by its charter to transact at least life insurance and fire insurance from obtaining a license for any class of insurance in Canada unless it has a paid-up capital of at least $300,000, a surplus at least equal to 20 per cent of the paid-up capital, and unless the market value of its stock is at a premium of at least 20 per cent. As many British companies are operating on a capital of less than $300,000, but maintain a very large surplus, this section of the existing Act has been found to operate somewhat unfairly in debarring these companies from obtaining licenses in Canada. A British insurance company, for instance, with a capital of $200,000 only and a reserve of $500,000 would be debarred under the present Act simply because its paid up capital was less than $300,000. That is an anomaly which we are removing in the present legislation.

Mr. CARVELL: What limit do you make?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The amendment provides that such companies which have an unimpaired capital may on complying with such conditions as may be required by the Treasury Board, including the maintenance of deposits in excess of that ordinarily required, obtain licenses under the Act. The maximum amount of excess deposit which may be required is left at $200,000, as in the existing Act, but the minimum excess deposit of $50,000 for a license for fire or life insurance, and of $10,000 for a license for other classes has been removed. I may say that this has been done upon the recommendation of the Superintendent of Insurance who has gone into the matter carefully. It seems to me to be on the whole a wise amendment.

Then provision is made to permit of contracts of fire insurance and automobile insurance being combined in a single policy.

There is a further provision prohibiting any company from issuing a financial statement including in the surplus of the company the amount of the subscribed or paid up capital, unless the amount of such subscribed or paid up capital is specifically stated and mentioned as included in the surplus. It also requires that a statement containing figures showing the amount of the subscribed capital shall also show the amount paid thereon, and if the statement shows the authorized capital, it shall also show the subscribed and paid up capital. The amendment is designed to abolish the practice, somewhat common, of issuing financial statements showing huge surpluses to policyholders, which surpluses are made up almost wholly of subscribed but unpaid capital. For instance, a company may have a subscribed capital of $2,000,000, but a more or less worthless set of shareholders. Now if that company shows in its statements to the public its subscribed capital, we are making it show its paid up capital, also the idea being, of course, to protect the public.

Then there are some important amendments arising out of conditions disclosed at the time the Union Life Insurance Company became insolvent and was wound up. The House may remember that the Superintendent of Insurance became liquidator, and as the result of reinsurance effected with the Metropolitan Life a great catastrophe was averted. There were some 150,000 or 160,000 policyholders in that company. It carried on "industrial" insurance. We found that the present Act does not lend itself to insistence by the Superintendent of Insurance upon reinsurance. It is very difficult when a company becomes insolvent to force the directors to take the action which is necessary to protect the policyholders. The action that is indicated in most cases of that kind is clearly reinsurance, but there was no provision in the Act of 1910 empowering the Superintendent of Insurance or the minister to say to the directors of the company in a clear case, after every opportunity has been given to put the company in a solvent condition, "Now you must reinsure." We are now taking power to do that. It was found in connection with the Union Life that it was possible under the existing Act to make improvident contracts extending say over a course of twenty years. If the company was thrown into insolvency the holder of that contract would rank for the value of his contract with other creditors upon the proceeds. It was felt by the Insurance Department and by the Government that there should be legislation to prevent the entering into of contracts of that kind, and there is provision in the present legislation to meet that situation. It relates, of course, to contracts burdensome to companies.

Then we have a section which deals with the powers of investment of insurance companies. In section 58 it is provided, in subsection 2, that any provincial company which obtains a license under this Act and which has unauthorized securities among its investments, shall dispose of the same within five years from the date of the issue of the Dominion license. Under the present Act provincial companies obtaining a Dominion license probably retain the powers of investment granted by their provincial charters. It is now proposed that such companies obtaining a Dominion license shall have their investment powers curtailed or enlarged to conform with the provisions of the Act.

That is to say, if a provincially incorporated company, by its own voluntary action, submits itself to the jurisdiction of the Dominion, then its power of investment must be curtailed to conform to the investment requirements of the Dominion Insurance Act. There are other provisions which limit the power of a Canadian company to invest in the stock of any other company which is transacting, or authorized to transact, the same class of insurance. That is to prevent interlocking, so to speak, of directorates and businesses. Then we have the further protection to policy-holders, and to the public, in that we have provided that the directors of the company shall be responsible for the replacing of certain unauthorized investments. It has been specially drawn to the attention of the department and to the minister that directors will, notwithstanding the plain terms of the Insurance Act, make unauthorized investments, and the Superintendent of Insurance does not become aware of it until the damage is done. Under the present Act, there appears to be no effectual provision for dealing with directors who make such unauthorized investments, and we have attempted to remedy that in the present Bill.

There is another important amendment, relating to hail insurance companies. Some of these companies have been carrying on business without proper safeguards, so far as the public is concerned. I do not make a sweeping statement, but I say that some of them at all events carry on business without providing an adequate reserve fund. In this Bill there is provision that Canadian companies shall accumulate their profits until a reserve fund is established equal to at least 50 per cent of the premiums received during the preceding calendar year. That is a necessary safeguard in the interests of the public, and especially of the farming community who take out hail insurance.

There are further provisions in the new Act, giving the Insurance Department and the Treasury Board greater share of control over insurance companies in the organization stage. Without going into details, I may say that these safeguards are similar to those thrown around the organization of banks, under the Bank Act. Hon. members may recall that that subject was discused pretty fully before the Banking and Commerce Committee on the last revision of the Bank Act, and subsequently in the House.

This is an important measure, involving the re-acting of the present Insurance Act, with the amendments which I have indicated. I should not have brought it down this session, the House being engaged principally in business arising out of the war, save for the fact that the administration of the Act is paralyzed on account of the doubt cast on the entire legislation by the decision of the Privy Council. I may say, further, that it is not possible to accomplish what we have in mind by a mere amending of the Act, because it has been necessary to define terms and use phraseology not used in the existing act, and as a result we have been obliged to bring down a Bill covering the entire field.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand the minister's declaration to mean that a company incorporated by a provincial legislature is fully authorized to carry on business within the province, without any control from the Dominion?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Without a license, report, inspection, or anything at all?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is the position.

Mr. MARCIL: I am very sorry to hear that, because it is contrary to the public sentiment in Quebec and is a very bad provision. I think, if all insurance companies were made responsible to the Dominion it would be in the public interest.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time, and referred to the Select Committee on Banking and Commerce.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT RESPECTING INSURANCE.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No.

54, to amend the Criminal Code Respecting Insurance.

Mr. GRAHAM: Explain.

Mr. DOHERTY: This Bill is in reality the complement of the Bill which has just been read the second time on the motion of the Minister of Finance. Substantially, this Bill makes it an offence under the Criminal Code for any person to engage in the business of insurance, unless he has obtained, or is acting on behalf of a company which has obtained, the license provided for in the Bill which has been read the second time. There is just one enacting provision; the others are details. The reason this matter is dealt with by an amendment to the Criminal Code is, perhaps, to be found in the observation which the hon. gentleman from Bonaventure just made in connection with the other Bill, namely, that it is a matter of general public interest that there should be effective supervision and control over the business of insurance throughout the Dominion of Canada, and so important was it that there should be that control effectively exercised, and so much was the public exposed to serious deception, entailing serious loss and damage, if there were not that control, that it would be a perfectly proper thing to look upon it as a public wrong—in other words, a crime—for a company to carry on that business without subjecting itself to the supervision and control provided under the Insurance Act. It may be said that that might very well be provided in the Insurance Act. I am not prepared to dispute the soundness of that proposition, but it was thought well, in view of some things that were said in the course of the litigation to which the Minister of Finance has referred, to make it quite clear that Parliament, in taking upon itself to make it an offence to carry on the business of insurance otherwise than in conformity with the provisions of the Insurance Act, was dealing with the matter as a public wrong, and that, in enacting legislation providing for punishment Parliament should avowedly and expressly proceed under its power to deal with the criminal law. I do not desire to suggest that the same argument might not have been made, and perhaps just as effectively, if these provisions had been embodied in the Act itself. But it was thought wiser, in view of past experience and the result of previous legislation, to take every precaution that could be taken to meet the suggestion that the legislation might perhaps be open to question as coming under any other powers of this Parliament, by making it quite clear that Parliament, at all events as far as its views of the matter and the manner in which it approached it might bear upon it, looked upon the matter and dealt with it as a proper subject for criminal legislation and in the exercise of its exclusive power to deal with the criminal law.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What was the charge against the individuals who were brought before Judge Leet and in regard to which he said that this Parliament had exceeded its authority?

Mr. DOHERTY: They were prosecuted under section 4 of the Act of 1910 which required the issue of a license and prohibited the carrying on of insurance or soliciting insurance risks, or adjusting of risks, or taking part in the insurance business by insurance companies except under a license under the Dominion Act, or by persons acting on behalf of these companies, or others holding licenses under the Dominion Act. Judge Leet held that there was no power in the Dominion Parliament to require the taking out of a license in order to entitle one to carry on the business, and, in his judgment, there being no such power under the British North America Act, it followed that nobody might be liable to the penalty for carrying on business without the license that was required. I am speaking now, in so far as that particular case is concerned, only from memory, but I think that when the judge dealt with the case the question that arose simply was whether it was within the power of the Dominion Parliament, in the exercise of the authority conferred upon it to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce, to undertake to regulate the carrying on of the insurance business in a province. Looking upon the enactment itself as resting on that power, and in his judgment such legislation not being in the exercise of the power for the regulation of trade and commerce, he held that disposition to be ultra vires and in consequence dismissed the complaint. As my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) said, that case never went any further, but I think the fact that the case had been brought and judgment had been rendered was one of the matters taken into consideration which led to the question of the validity of the two provisions of the Insurance Act under which that prosecution was brought being submitted to the courts for determination. The whole matter was disposed of by the Supreme Court and finally by the Privy Council upon a reference by this Government to 4 p.m. the Supreme Court in the first instance of the question of the constitutionality of this particular section, and the fact that this judgment had been rendered by the magistrate was, I think, one of the many other circumstances which led the then Government to consider that it was a proper thing to have the question submitted and decided.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What was the final judgment rendered by the Privy Council? There was so much noise that I could not hear the Finance Minister.

Mr. DOHERTY: As the Minister of Finance pointed out, the Privy Council held, affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court, that section 4 of the Act of 1910 was ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada, that the Parliament of Canada had no constitutional power to enact section 4 which prohibited the carrying on of the insurance business generally save by companies obtaining licenses from the Government of Canada or by persons acting on behalf of such companies. The Privy Council held that in that general enactment the Parliament of Canada had exceeded its powers. I have not before me the text of the judgment, or the reasoning that leads up to this finding, and which is endeavoured to be met in the provisions of the Bill which has just passed its second reading.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I repeat that there was so much noise, and the accoustics of this House are so bad, that I could not hear. But, I understood my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, to say that their lordships of the Privy Council had expressed the opinion that this Parliament would have the power to pass properly framed legislation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was dealing with the question of foreign insurance companies carrying on business in Canada. Their lordships expressed the opinion that the Dominion Parliament, under its jurisdiction as to trade and commerce and aliens, could pass legislation requiring such companies to take out a license before they could carry on business in Canada, and their lordships expressed the view that the Dominion Parliament could do that on properly framed legislation. That seemed to imply that the legislation at present existing, that is to say, the Insurance Act of 1910, was not properly framed. In this Bill they have endeavoured to so frame the legislation as to bring it within the terms of their lordships' judgment. In the section dealing with foreign insurance companies Parliament assumes jurisdiction by special reference to its powers under section 91 of the British North America Act relating to trade and commerce and aliens. With regard to provincially incorporated companies, their lordships' judgment appears to be clear that the Dominion Parliament has no authority over these.

Mr. GRAHAM: What I have to say might properly have been said when. my hon friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) had his Insurance Bill before the House. We seem, by this judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to have got the insurance business into somewhat of a muddle. I am srory, that is the position. It strikes me that the better way, on behalf of the public, is to have the insurance business controlled by one head and that head the Insurance Department of the Dominion. Under this decision we seem to have five different standards. We have the provincial company operating in the province in which it has got its charter; we have the company with a provincial charter operating outside of its own province; we have the foreign one operating in one or two provinces; then we have the federal one operating anywhere in Canada. The difficulty is a bit serious. The company with a federal charter is subject to all the restrictions of all the Insurance Acts passed by this Parliament and it must be admitted that these restrictions, while necessary, are quite severe in some instances. That is, while they protect the public, they hamper some businesses that might be considered legitimate by the ordinary business concern but are not so considered on account of the ramifications of the business of an insurance company. Now we have the provincial company operating in competition with the federal company without these restrictions. It strikes me that it would be almost necessary, if it were possible, for the provinces and the federal authority to get together and arrive at some basis of restriction which would be incorporated in all the Acts because if that be not done, two companies side by side and doing business with the same people may be operating under different Acts altogether, which would not be for the public good and certainly would not be for the good of the companies. The provinces, of course, under section 92 of the British North America Act, have the right to impose licenses where a company is operating within their borders, whether it be a federal company or a provincial company. Each province, generally speaking, has given to municipalities in it the right to impose further taxation, so that the federal company finds itself now in the position of having to take out a license with the Dominion, another with each province, and another with each municipality, making the company that has a federal charter a much more expensive institution to conduct than the one that takes out a provincial charter.

There is another question that strikes me as important, and perhaps the minister has provided for it in his Bill. Under the present Act, no company gets credit in its report for re-insurance in another company that has not a federal license. Now the question will arise immediately, will this Bill provide that re-insurance in a provincial company, though it has not a federal charter, will be credited to the company taking out that re-insurance when it comes to make its report to the Finance Department. It is a serious matter, particularly to younger companies. I suggest to the minister that this is something worth thinking about in arranging the details of this Act, because he can readily see that many provincial companies may have charters, and I am inclined to think that they will in many instances confine themselves to the provincial charters, as the provincial restrictions are not now as severe as those imposed on federally-incorporated companies. Before the Bill goes into committee, I would suggest to the minister that he think that matter over, as it is one of vital importance.

There is one more point, which the minister and I have discussed privately, that is the valuation of securities held by these companies. Under the present system of the department, which has prevailed for very many years, when the valuation of securities comes to be made at the end of the year, the market values at the time the report is made are taken as the basis of valuation. Under present conditions, with the war on, some securities fluctuate very materially. Take a municipal security purchased some years ago when the rate of interest was low. Now that security is gilt edged, there never will be any default; when it matures it will be paid, one hundred cents on the dollar. Under the present system only the price that the security would bring in the market at the present time is allowed by the department. One can readily see that with the present demand for money, the Dominion Finance Minister himself being a competitor in the money market, the price of money has very materially increased, and the municipal or other security of the company paying a small rate of interest is naturally low-priced; while its intrinsic value remains the same, it has perhaps depreciated ten points or fifteen points in market value, and the company holding that security has deducted from its assets the loss in market value of this security. I rather criticised that method of making the valuation before the war, but surely it is worthy of consideration at the present time. We might consider whether, under all the circumstances, that rule could not be deviated from as liberally as possible, because the minister can see, perhaps better than any person else, that a young company will show a loss perhaps from the fact that its investments are gilt edged municipal securities, whereas if it had invested in other securities not of the same intrinsic value it might show a gain because of the present fluctuations in the value of such securities. I suggest to the minister that in the framing of his Act he should endeavour to find some means of meeting that difficulty, because the situation may become quite serious if carried to an extreme. At my request, the minister has had a line added at the bottom of the annual report pointing out the re-insurance in foreign countries, so that notice is taken of it; but it is not included in the totals, and people lose sight of that—particularly a competing agent always forgets to read that line to his prospects.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. DOHERTY: I move that this Bill be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee. As I pointed out, it really is a complement of the Insurance Bill proper, and I think it can be most conveniently dealt with at the same time and by the same committee.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX AMENDMENT.

Bill No. 57, to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, Sir Thomas White, read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 2—unimpaired reserve, rest and accumulated profits at beginning of accounting period to be deemed capital while used as such:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What is the effect of this section?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When the business profits War Tax Bill was under consideration last year, we determined that it would be just to include as capital, unimpaired reserve and accumulated profits. The question has been raised during the past year by one or two firms as to whether, instead of determining the amount of capital at the commencement of the accounting period as including capital ordinarily so-called, unimpaired reserve and accumulated profits at that date, the computation should not be made also in respect of the profits earned from month to month or even from day to day. When the Bill was under consideration it was regarded as proper to fix the date at which accumulated profits might be taken as capital as at the beginning of the accounting period. The provision is not a very important one, but it is desirable in order to give effect to the intention of Parliament when the Bill was passed last year.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I asked the question because I have been communicated with by some firms interested in the matter. They were afraid that under this provision they might have to pay taxes more than once upon the same capital; that there would be overlapping from one year to another. I apprehend that this will not be the case?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No.

UNIVERSAL RADIO SYNDICATE, LIMITED.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 69, to repeal the Ocean Telegraph Act. He said: I explained this proposed legislation when the resolution upon which it is based was under consideration. Under the Ocean Telegraph Act, which was passed in 1913, an agreement between the Governor of Canada and the Universal Radio Syndicate, Limited, was confirmed. Under this agreement the syndicate was to establish one radio station in Canada and one in Great Britain for the transmission of messages at rates not to exceed certain stated amounts, and the Government agreed to issue the necessary license for that purpose. The syndicate deposited £10,000 with the Government, £5,000 of which was to be returned to the syndicate when it had expended $50,000, $25,000 of which was to be expended in Canada. The balance was to be repaid to the syndicate upon the completion of proper equipment and the satisfactory operation of the stations in the United Kingdom and in Canada, the Government to allow interest on the deposit at the rate which the banks allowed the Government upon its deposits. The syndicate also had the right, under the agreement, to be thereafter incorporated. They made the required expenditure, and $25,000 of the deposit was returned. Owing to the outbreak of war the syndicate was unable to float a company to operate the stations and to acquire the necessary apparatus. The syndicate being in urgent need of money, the Governor in Council, having regard to the value of a second transatlantic radiotelegraph service, and after consultation with the British Post Office authorities, loaned the syndicate, at their request, the sum of $15,000, to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent and to be repaid on May 1, 1915. An official test of the service which was conducted on January 27, 1915, established that the operating speed and general performance of the station was not up to the standard called for by the agreement. Payment of the balance of the deposit was accordingly withheld. The syndicate is now quite unable to carry out the terms of its agreement, and the Governor in Council has refused to exercise the power under the agreement of purchasing the station, though at present use is being made of the station in Canada, which is situated in Newcastle, N.B. It is now proposed to repeal the Act and to return to the syndicate the balance of the deposit, less the amount due for the loan made by the Crown.

There are only two sections in the Bill, one repealing the Act and the other authorizing the return of the amount of the deposit now in the hands of the Government. The company is now in the hands of a receiver, but the Marconi Company have made arrangements with the receiver to take over the station, thoroughly equip it and make it first-class in every way. Before doing so, however, they wish us to repeal this Act, to relieve the station of any lien we may have upon it, and to return the balance of the deposit which is in our hands. To accomplish this is the purpose of the Bill.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): Mr. Speaker, personally I am glad that this legislation has been introduced by my hon.

friend, and I will support it very cheerfully. The Marconi company has an excellent reputation throughout the world, and I believe the Marconi system, firmly established in Canada as it is in Europe, will result in giving cheaper rates for the transmission of messages between America and Europe. I am not surprised that the Poulsen system has not been a success. When that legislation was introduced in 1913 by the former Postmaster General, Hon. Mr. Pelletier, I ventured to predict that he was moving too quickly in the matter, and that the Poulsen system, from what I had heard in Europe at the time I was negotiating for cheaper cable rates, was far from being up to the mark. He chose, however, to proceed with his legislation, and he promised us wonders as the result of the establishment of that system in Canada, but the net result of his efforts have been that we have had no system at all and that there has been the old cable monopoly. The Marconi system will, I believe, be a real benefit, and will tend to bring about a reduction in the rates. We need competition in this regard. The Administration of which I formed part, is responsible for the reduction in cable rates which took place between Great Britain and Canada. It was at our request that the cable companies gave first the cheap rates for the press, secondly the cheap week-end rates, and thirdly, the deferred cables, which also mean a reduction in the rates; but I said that at that time that if we could make arrangements with the Marconi company, we would create such a competition in Canada in the rates between Canada and Great Britain that before long the consumers would feel that the expense of corresponding by means of Marconigram or cablegram was not too great.

I am glad that this matter has been transferred from the Post Office Department, which apparently has no head at the present time, to the care of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, because he is most progressive and he stands very firmly for British connection, and one of the aims I had when I advocated cheap cable rates was the promotion of closer connection between Canada and the Mother Country. We have in Western Canada especially, and also in Eastern Canada, a large proportion of British immigrants, and this country will, in the years to come, receive a large influx of immigrants from the British Isles. Although the postal rates have been increased on account of the war, they will be reduced again to the penny standard; and whilst we have cheap postal rates, yet for the benefit of our British immigration we should have cheap Marconi and cheap cable rates also. One of the men who worked most energetically in favour of those cheap rates was the late Sir John Henniker Heaton who sat for 24 years in the British House of Commons, and who was called the Postmaster General-at-Large of the British Empire. Through his efforts and through the efforts of my predecessor, Sir William Mulock, penny post was established, and afterwards the question of cable and Marconi rates came before the Imperial conference each time it met. The House will remember that on many occasions resolutions more academic than practical were adopted by the House, and I do not know whether at the conference which the Prime Minister attended this year a similar resolution was adopted to that adopted on previous occasions. At all events this is a step in the right direction, and I hope my hon. friend in granting this privilege to the Marconi company will see to it that the work is proceeded with, that the rates are duly controlled by him, and that such measures are taken that the consumers in Canada shall benefit by those rates.

I happen to know the gentlemen who are interested in the Canadian Marconi Company, and I may say that they are most responsible, they belong to the best elements in our business community; and I dare say that under their leadership we shall have before long a really cheap rate for correspondence by means of Marconigram between Canada and Europe, and that in this way we shall establish a competition which will bring the cable companies to their senses.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I remember when the legislation was introduced in this House by the late Postmaster General, and I heard my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) address the House on that question. I also spoke, and I took the stand then that, instead of making a deal with this private company, we should devote our efforts and our energies to the establishment of a cheap state-owned or Empire-owned cable system with a view to a better service between the mother country and America. I said further that I had no doubt at that time that this company, which had entered into an arrangement with the Government which arrangement has now fallen down, was, at bottom, in alliance with the great cable monopoly that controls the service in every part of the world.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is quite possible.

Mr. MACLEAN: A report has been presented by the commission, of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) is a member, in favour of an Imperial cable system. We have such a system now between Australia and Canada, and for years we have been asking for an Empire-owned system between Canada and the mother country, and all the time somebody is putting it off. This proposal which was introduced some years ago and which has now failed according to the statement made here to-day, has proved this, that it was for the purpose not of giving good service, but of blocking for a time a publicly-owned service.

Instead of adopting the report of the Royal Commission we are now dealing with another privately-owned company; the problem will never be solved in that way. I think the minister in introducing this legislation should acquaint the House with the report made by the Royal Commission, of which Sir George Foster was a member. The report shows that by reason of the war and the increase in trade there should be an Atlantic cable owned by the state. That is where the paying traffic is. Whenever anybody proposes public ownership of a public utility the invariable answer is: Try it out in some outlying place. We tried out a cable on the Pacific at great cost to Canada and the other contributors to the proposal, though ultimately, I believe, it proved successful. Canada owes it to herself, and the Mother Country owes it to herself, to have no more transactions with privately-owned cable companies, but immediately to build our own cables, or as soon after the war as possible. If we are in a position to-day to hold our own in this war and control the cables, it is not because of any prevision on the part of Canada or the Mother Country. Most of our cables are privately-owned, but they happen to land in the Mother Country, and very properly the Mother Country has taken possession of them. I think it is the case that the cables of the world are practically owned by a large corporation in the United States, probably the same corporation that controls the Bell Telephone. The great menace to the world to-day, especially in these times of war, is that the entire cable service is in the hands of private corporations. It has been repeatedly brought to the attention of the House that it would be in the interests of Canada and the cause we have at heart to bring these utilities under public ownership. I pointed out many years ago that the greatest monopoly in the world at that time was the Eastern Cables Company when it was controlled from England. It had great influence with the bankers' institutions and with the British Government, and in every other direction. There would always be two or three directors who were ministers of the Crown in the Mother Country. Up to to-day that company has absolutely succeeded in preventing the inauguration of an Empire-owned cable between the Mother Country and Canada. There are cables to-day between Canada and Newfoundland and the Mother Country but they are owned by the great monopoly which is controlled from Boston ,and no effort is being made to break that monopoly. It is practically the strongest in the world to-day, stronger, perhaps, than the metal combine with headquarters in Germany.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are two or three cable companies; are they all under one control?

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: They are all under one control. There is a telephone, a telegraph, and a cable monopoly in the United States, and they are all under one management, and that management is outside of the Empire although they do the Empire's business. We are continuing to trifle with this question. I wish I had the report of the Royal Commission here. Has the minister a copy of it?

Mr. HAZEN: Not here.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: It was distributed in blue-book form to the members only the other day. In any event the commission reported in favour of an Imperial cable service. We all know that the merit of a publicly-owned cable service is that it gives a wide service at cheap reates; it does not exist to make profits, but the privately-owned cable has been used largely for profits and not for service.

I approve of what the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) did when he was Postmaster General to get a reduction in cable rates, but he did not proceed in the right way, and we are not proceeding in the right way to-day. If we wish to serve the Empire we must get control of the cables. There is cheap telegraphy in parts of the world to-day because of State ownership, and if we wish to strengthen the Empire and bind it together I know of no more effective way than a state-owned cable system, for the reason a cheap cable service is of great importance in the forming of public opinion. What is the ruling force in the world to-day, and what will be the ruling force when this war is over? It is public opinion. And you can only get an immediate transfer of world-wide public opinion by a cheap cable service placed at the disposal of the press for the transmission of news and of opinion. But we have not got it yet. For some reason there is always some private company coming along to paralyze the effort for a national system of cables. What I said when this matter was first introduced in the House is confirmed by the report of the Royal Commission, which has reported in favour of a world-wide system of state-owned cables. At present we are dealing with the Marconi Company. That may be a good company, but it has been on the boards a great number of years now, and it has spent a great deal of money, and you never know when they may fall into the hands of a bigger combine. There is no protection to the public at all, except the splendid protection afforded by control of the landing stations.

What was done in the United States? There was a great wireless system direct between Germany and the United States. Probably it was privately owned. Some sort of censorship was exercised over it by the American Government, but nobody knows to what extent that wireless system was used against us, and we never shall know until the war is over. But the day came when the American Government took hold of the landing station and the apparatus in the United States, and that has probably had a great influence on the war. But we are still continuing to deal with private companies; we are letting them make money, and every now and then we get terms and concessions from them, but we are not getting what we ought to get. We talk about winning the war, and taking care of our interests and strengthening our world-wide influence, but we shall not make any headway until we avail ourselves of public ownership of the cables. Until we do that, we have not learned the lesson, and we shall not achieve any substantial results.

Again I urge upon the Government not to be a party in any sense to helping the private companies. Let us have public ownership, public control, and public construction of cables for the benefit of the Empire and for the benefit of the business of this country. It does not cost much to build cables. There is at least one great cable-layer in the service of the cable companies, and probably more, and there are great plants which make a business of manufacturing cables. But they are all in private hands; they are all in collusion; they are all interlocked in one way or another. Perhaps some of the great newspapers have been in the combine. One cable for the relief of the world was started by newspaper influence, but it fell into the hands of the combine. That is the situation to-day.

In this war the great wireless service was in the control of the enemy, the office in the United States was in the control of the enemy, and wireless messages were being sent for the benefit of what proved to be the enemy, and we do not know yet what happened, because the American Government cannot expose what they discovered going on in that wireless service for the benefit of people who proved to be the enemies of the United States. I think that out of this situation, and out of the good understanding which has been reached between Great Britain and the United States, the time has come—and this is the time—to have a publicly owned wireless service, and to take advantage of any and every different line of service, to get them into the hands of the State and the Empire. We must prevent an enemy, or a foreign country, controlling this service. The business itself can be best developed by public ownership and public direction, and by making it part of the great system of Imperial communications. That French word "communication" is a good word, in that sense which applies to all this great service, and public communications of that kind ought absolutely to be in the control of the post office. I hope we shall soon have the land lines in this country. If there is to be such a service, and a distribution of public opinion daily by means of a cable service, it must be done, not only by state-owned cables, but by state-owned land lines, and right in our own country. We propose to improve the service for our papers by having a state-owned line in Canada, or by the Government leasing the wire from one of the private companies. Why not do away with this roundabout method and be up to-date and progressive, by having public ownership of these things? I have been in this House more than twenty years, and have been advocating public ownership for that length of time, but there is not much headway made yet, and there is no promise of headway in this measure introduced to-day. There is no mention of that splendid report I referred to in favour of the state ownership of the cables and wireless. There is always the hidden hand of the cable monopoly, putting up proposals of one kind and another for new devices and new patents that somebody is to own. The state is to subsidize, but the state is not to control. Let us get rid of all that. We have to get rid of it to maintain our position and to have the organization that Germany has. Do hon. gentlemen think Germany would ever build wireless lines throughout the world and give control of them to private companies, or allow private companies to have control over them? No, they would own them themselves, and we ought to have them. It is not to the credit of Great Britain to-day that all the cables that serve that country happen to be owned by corporations in the United States. It is true that all the cables and all the land lines in America, outside of our Canadian lines—and they interlock with these—are owned by American monopolies, and they join together in this raid on public ownership of cables. That is the condition to-day, and it will continue. The result will be that we will make no progress. The time has come for us to stop making concessions to any privately-owned company, and not to turn any kind of property over to them, but to take it for the state, if we put any money into it. I do not suppose we can do much just now, but I want to look at that report of the Imperial Commission, and see how strong the recommendation is for state ownership of the cables. This is the time to begin, and having that report already in hand, I would suggest to the minister that he consult his colleague who is a member of that commission, who heard the evidence, and was a party to the finding made in favour of state ownership of cables covering the whole Empire. Let us have the cheapest possible transmission of messages for the Government in carrying on its business, for the press in diffusing information, and in so strengthening public opinion that it will be able to express itself every day on every great question so emphatically that an autocratic government like that in existence in Germany to-day will have to bow to public opinion and cease attempts to bring the rest of the world under its domination. That is the game of Germany to-day. She has not succeeded, and it is because we have protected ourselves, that we have not been at the mercy of these cable systems, and that they have not been used against us. We do not know even yet, by reason of our censorship, that we are protecting our own interests, because this private interest has run all through the world, just like that metal monopoly which centres in Germany and runs through the world. It has had a bad influence in the way of creating this great world-wide munitions industry. You will find that the same metal monopoly played its part in connection with the manufacture of cables. They have the factories that make the cable lines, and the ships that lay the cables, and the conspiracy goes on. We subsidize them, and never bring them to book, but allow them to continue. In view of these facts and our experience, and the report made by the Imperial Commission, I would like to hear from the Government at the very earliest day, that it is their intention to work out the recommendations of that report, and to have a public-owned cable system, and on the Atlantic to begin with—whether, by wireless or cable under the sea, I do not know, probably by both. There may be new inventions, but certainly the time has come when the state ought to own them. We ought to take over the land lines in Canada. With state-owned land lines and state-owned cable or wireless service on the Atlantic—we have a state-owned cable on the Pacific—we will show what state ownership can do in this matter. See how quick the Americans, in regard to their naval organization, have been to adopt the wireless telephone system, which is probably the greatest invention of the day. American warships, by reason of certain stations that have been built in the United States using wireless, have been in a position to deliver messages by 'phone, and to recognize voices, I believe, for 20,000 miles over continents, across seas and in every direction. If there are inventions which would cheapen the service and protect the State and Empire, is it not time we had them, instead of leaving them in the hands of private corporations who seek to make money and who happen to be in the United States?

It is a good thing that to-day the United States is in with the Allies. It also has control of a lot of these companies. It is by grace that we have had that protection and not by reason of state foresight. I say again, as I said before, that the time has come for state ownership and there should be no more transactions with private companies. This particular transaction is a proof of what I said four years ago, when the Bill went through the House, that it was in substance a stall-off and a postponement of the time when the wireless system should be developed by the state. That has proved to be the case and no headway has been made. We are just as far ahead to-day as we were twenty years ago when the question first came up.

Mr. LEMIEUX: With your leave, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to my hon. friend—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I know.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman may put a question but he is not permitted to speak again.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wanted to make an explanation to my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean). My hon. friend seemed a little surprised at my attitude to-day having regard to the attitude I took when the Ocean Telegraph Bill was introduced a few years ago by Mr. Pelletier, then Postmaster General. My hon. friend states that then I advocated state ownership while to-day I do not offer any objection to a private company. I still stand for state ownership in this matter of cables and if it were not during the war I might perhaps urge upon the Government the necessity of having a state-owned cable under the Atlantic ocean. I wish to say further, that I suspect, as my hon. friend does, that there was some Ethiopian in the fence when that Bill was introduced by Mr. Pelletier. The Poulsen company has no standing in Europe to-day while the Marconi company is the only company that has made any progress in the matter of wireless telegraphy. If I support the Bill introduced by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, it is because I happen to know the personnel of this company. It is composed of men of substance and men of the highest financial and business standing. I think this country, as all civilized countries, owes a debt of gratitude to Marconi for the many lives he has saved on the wide ocean since he established his system for the equipment of steamships. Mr. Speaker, I am done, but I wish to remind my hon. friend that the rates for cables and wireless will now be controlled by the Railway Commission. The other day, when my hon. friend was away, I moved before the committee revising the Railway Act, that the rates on cables and wireless should be under the control of the Railway Commission, the motion was adopted and I hope the recommendation will be adopted by the House. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the indulgence.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—Ocean Telegraph Act c. 52, 1913, repealed:

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Four years have elapsed since we were promised a great service and this promise has not been fulfilled. What does the Government propose to do? Will the minister having charge of this Bill say whether he has read, or consulted with his colleagues in regard to, the report made by the Imperial Commission on the public ownership of cables?

Mr. HAZEN: This Bill is introduced after having been submitted to the consideration of my colleagues in Council. It is submitted with their approval, and, as it involves the return of money, it must have, and it has, the approval of His Excellency the Governor General. It simply seeks to repeal the Act of 1913 because the Poulsen company have failed to carry out the agreement they entered into. Their works—on which a very large sum of money has been expended—the company now being in liquidation, are to be taken over by the Marconi company which will make the necessary expenditure to make the plant and appliances efficient, and the work of transmitting cables from Canada to Ballybunnion on the north-west coast of Ireland will be carried on. It is represented to me by the gentleman who represents the Canadian Marconi, and in whose bona fides I have every confidence, that the company will expend at least $100,000 on improvements to the plant at Newcastle in New Brunswick and another large sum on the improvements to be made at Ballybunnion, and they expect within a short time, with the improvements that they contemplate making, to be able to render very efficient service. The passage of this Act will in no way interfere with the consideration of the larger question referred to by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) in regard to Government ownership of a cable line from Canada to Great Britain. As I understand it, the Post Office Department of Great Britain was not willing to consider in 1913, the establishment of another cable, in view of the amount of money that was involved; but with this wireless system it was hoped that the country would get a system that would be of very great value without costing the country a single dollar. Up to the present time this has not cost the country a dollar and with the improvement to be instituted by the Canadian Marconi company they hope to be able to give an efficient wireless system across the sea. I agree with a great deal of what my hon. friend has said regarding this question, but it does not seem to me that the time when the efforts of the country are being strained almost to the breaking point for the carrying on of the war is the time to consider such a large expenditure as would be involved in the proposal suggested. This is one of the great questions that ought to be considered. I myself am in sympathy with the idea of a cable line between Canada and the Mother Country that would be owned and controlled entirely by the British and Canadian Governments.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I have listened with great interest to what the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has said. But, again, I point out to him, with reference to what he has said to the effect that for some reason the Imperial Government was not prepared some years ago to go into this enterprise because of the expense, that it is the big monopoly that whispers this into the ear of the Imperial Government and every other Government. It urges the enormous expense of going into this business in order to avoid a disturbance of its monopoly. We were told that four years ago when we struck out the monopoly and when we wanted to get cheaper rates. We have not got them but we have this report now from the Imperial Trade Commission which is printed in an English blue-book and the information in which is being circulated through the press. The cost is not so much and the cable will pay from the start if you put it where the paying traffic is. The paying traffic is between America and Europe. It would not lose a dollar. Even if we stepped in and cut the rates in two, the interest on every dollar of the investment would be paid twice over. While I accept the explanation of the minister, I am still looking for some initiative in the direction which we undertook four years ago but in regard to which we have not accomplished anything as yet.

[Mr. Hazen.]

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries), the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

That it is expedient to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act, chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1907, as amended by chapter thirty-eight of the statutes of 1910, and to provide, that all fish and shellfish canneries shall be inspected, and all fish and shellfish packed in cans shall be subject to inspection during the whole course of preparation and packing, and marked and labelled as prescribed; that the canning of any particular fish or shellfish unfit for human food may be stopped at any time, and that all fish and shellfish used for canning shall be sound, wholesome and fit for human food, and unsound or unwholesome fish or shellfish may be seized on view by any inspector; that the size and contents of lobster cans and the designation of British Columbia salmon shall be as prescribed; that canneries not complying with the law may be closed; that no person shall offer or accept for export or shall export any fish or shellfish subject to inspection unless the requirements of the Act to be based on this resolution and of the regulations regarding inspection and marking have been complied with, and proof is furnished as to inspection and marking; that all canned fish or shellfish imported into Canada shall be labelled as prescribed, unless imported to be exported again; and that any can of fish or shellfish not so labelled or marked before being offered for sale shall be forfeited and may be seized.

Mr. HAZEN: About two years ago, the administration of the Meat and Canned Foods Act, so far as concerns canned fish and shell-fish, was transferred from the Agricultural Department to the Department of Naval Affairs by Order in Council. It was felt that the carrying out of the operations of the Act so far as concerned fish and shell-fish would be better done under the administration of the department which has charge of the fisheries. The work has been carried out up to the present time by the fisheries inspectors throughout the country without additional salary. It has been found that in connection with their ordinary duties it is quite possible for them to inspect the different canneries, having regard to the provisions of the Meat and Canned Foods and Fish Act. But our experience during the past two years has shown that the Act requires a number of amendments to make it adequate for the fish canning business, and it is for this purpose that I am asking the House to adopt this resolution and a Bill to be founded on it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the meaning of the reference to the British Columbia salmon?

Mr. HAZEN: The statement that they are to be as prescribed, means as prescribed in the Bill. That refers to the fact that in British Columbia there are a great many varieties of salmon, the cohoe, the humped back, the spring run and the dog salmon. We are going to change the name of the dog salmon and the humped back salmon. The names by which they are now known have actually had an adverse effect upon their market value. People think that fish with such names must be inferior. We are going to classify them in a different way. In another Bill, to amend the Fisheries Act, we intend to change the name of the dogfish. That fish is an excellent article of food when canned, yet no one will eat it in our country, and if it were canned and placed on our markets no person would buy it. In the United States they are now canning the dogfish in very considerable quantities as an article for human food. They have changed its name by resolution to the greyfish—it is a fish of a greyish colour—and we propose in a Bill amending the Fisheries Act to change the name of dogfish to greyfish so that there shall be one name in universal use on this side of the Atlantic ocean, a name that will not convey an objectionable idea.

Mr. KYTE: Is not the minister perpetrating a fraud upon the public?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think so. A rose by any other name will smell as sweet, and I think the dogfish will smell much sweeter as a greyfish than as a dogfish.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is it not a Shakesperian fraud? What's in a name?

Mr. MARCIL: Is the minister going to authorize the canning of dogfish?

Mr. HAZEN: There is no objection to it under the existing law. The objection is a practical one, that if you can it and call it dogfish no one will buy it.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any canning done now under the name of greyfish?

Mr. HAZEN: Very little I think. There have been some experiments. One beneficial result of the canning of this fish will be to reduce its numbers. It is at present a very serious menace to all other varieties of fish, as it is very voracious, being in fact a small shark.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why does the minister propose to specify the size of the lobster cans? Is that done with respect to other fish?

Mr. HAZEN: I think that the sizes of cans for other fish are prescribed now.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Have the lobster canners been consulted?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes. Before the amendments were finally decided upon, copies of a draft Bill were sent to those engaged in the industry and the amendments have been under consideration of the department and of the Fisheries Advisory Board for nearly two years. Both the department and the board strongly recommend the adoption of these amendments and they have been decided upon in the light of the criticisms received upon the original draft to which I have referred.

Mr. SINCLAIR: To whom were they sent?

Mr. HAZEN: I venture to say that all of those engaged in the industry in a large way received copies.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Have the Fishermen's Associations made any recommendations to the minister?

Mr. HAZEN: The Fisheries Advisory Board, of which a large number of fishermen are members, have very strongly reported in favour of the Bill.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understand that the Fisheries Advisory Board is a departmental body.

Mr. HAZEN: It is appointed by the department and is composed of men who, serving without remuneration, meet two or three times a year and consult with the officers of the department with regard to practical fisheries questions.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will this proposed legislation require the presence of an inspector in each canning factory?

Mr. HAZEN: It does not involve any additional expense. The work can be done by the present officers of the department.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: How can that be, having regard to the terms of the resolution?

Mr. HAZEN: I think that our officials have time enough to do it. I will give more information on that subject later.

Mr. MACDONALD: In my county we have four fishery inspectors and at this season of the year about 25 factories are in operation. Is it intended that those inspectors, within their own divisions, shall assume these duties, in addition to those which they already perform?

Mr. HAZEN: The language of the Bill is not that the factories shall be inspected, but that they shall be subject to inspection during the whole course of preparation and packing. It is open to any inspector at any time to go to one of these factories or canneries and see that the work is being properly done. The Bill does not require that he stay there and watch the whole operation.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is his duty now, under the Act.

Mr. HAZEN: It is not the duty of our fishery inspectors now. When the Act was passed it had no reference to inspection under the Canned Foods Act, which was placed under the administration of the Department of Agriculture. Our inspectors were appointed for other purposes. The administration of that portion of the Act which has regard to the fishing trade having been placed under the administration of our department, it is necessary for us to pass an Act giving our inspectors additional power with regard to the inspection of these canneries.

Mr. SINCLAIR: There are about 150 miles of sea coast in my constituency and along the harbours there are 25 or 30 packing places. Only two inspectors are available to cover that whole length of coast, and if an inspector were to spend a day or so in each of the factories, about the best he could do would be to call about once a month. Even then he would be doing a great deal of travelling and be kept very busy. The inspection, therefore, will be very perfunctory indeed; inspection during the whole course of packing cannot be done by the present staff of officers.

Mr. HAZEN: They have really done no inspection in the past along these lines.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The inspector calls at the lobster factories to see that the law is carried out; that the canning place is kept clean, and that seed lobsters are not packed. I do not think that the present staff of officers can do any more than that.

Mr. KYTE: Were not certain regulations passed by the department some years ago fixing the standard with respect to the equipment and care of lobster factories, and were the inspectors not asked to carry out these regulations?

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. HAZEN: I think there was something of that kind.

Mr. KYTE: This resolution provides that all fish and shell-fish canneries shall be inspected; I assume that that is being done now. While the fishery officers in Nova Scotia are, no doubt, efficient in the discharge of their duties, I scarcely think that they are sufficiently expert to carry out the duties imposed upon them by this resolution. The lobster factories extend over a large territory, and the fishery officers find it rather difficult to get over the ground within the fishing season. I can scarcely imagine that one fishery inspector would be able to carry out very effectively in his district the regulations provided by this resolution. While the employment of additional inspectors for this work is not contemplated by the minister, I assume that he has in mind the increasing of some of the salaries of the fishery officers who are to discharge the duties mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. HAZEN: I shall go more fully into the details when we are in Committee on the Bill. Before the Bill comes to its third reading I shall consider whether it is desirable that this matter be referred to the select standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries. The subject might receive fuller consideration in that way than it would be the Committee of the House.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Hon. J. D. Hazen thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 73, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Hazen (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Rainville in the Chair:

Resolved,—That it is expedient to amend the Fisheries Act, chapter eight of the statutes of 1914, and to provide that no one shall operate a fish cannery for commercial purposes without first obtaining an annual license therefor on payment of the prescribed fee; that the provision requiring that in British Columbia the site of any reduction works engaged in the manufacture of oil or other commercial products from sea-lions, sharks or dog-fish, is not to be within fifty miles of any other reduction works used for a similar purpose, shall be repealed; that fish guards in British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, shall be provided where the minister may deem necessary in the public interest; that no one shall leave any port or place in Canada to fish outside the territorial waters of Canada for fish the catching of which is at such time prohibited in the territorial waters of Canada opposite to or nearest the place where such person proposes to fish, and no one shall bring into Canada any fish caught outside the territorial waters of Canada when fishing therefor is prohibited inside the territorial waters of Canada opposite or nearest to the place where the same was caught, or shall bring into Canada any vessels, boats, nets, fishing gear, implements or appliances used in such fishing, but the rights granted to the citizens of any foreign nation by any treaty or convention shall not be thereby affected; that the name "dog-fish" shall be changed to "grayfish," and that when the minister so requests, full and particular returns shall be furnished by every fish-curing or canning establishment or fresh fish business, fishing vessel, weir or trap owners.

Mr. HAZEN: The object of the resolution is to make certain amendments to the Fisheries Act. The first section of the Bill that I purpose introducing has reference to the licensing of fish canneries. It is to be provided by that, that:

No one shall operate a fish cannery for commercial purposes without first obtaining an annual license therefor from the minister. Where no other fee is in this Act prescribed for a cannery license, the annual fee for each such license shall be one dollar.

At present the Fisheries Act requires salmon canneries and lobster canneries to be licensed; it does not require licenses from any other class of fish canneries. The canning of clams is now being carried on to a small extent, there being, I believe, about half a dozen such canneries in this country. There are a number of sardine canneries, and the canning of haddock, herring and other fish is being conducted in a small way, but gradually growing. The object of this requirement is to have all canneries properly enrolled so that the department can adequately follow their operations. The Meat and Canned Foods Act applies to them, and the fishery officers are required to see that its provisions are carried out. The fee is merely nominal, so that there will be no objection from that standpoint. This requirement was recommended by the Advisory Board, and its object is to place all canneries on the same basis as lobsters and salmon canneries, by requiring them to take out a license and putting them under the control of the department.

The second section refers to the question of fish guards, and that is a subject that applies to the provinces of British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, where at the present time it is absolutely obligatory under the Act for all irrigation ditches to be screened. In places where irrigation works are being carried on and irrigation ditches running into streams or into canals, it is necessary that there shall be a screen placed at the outlet of the irrigation ditch for the purpose of preventing fish from the stream or canal from going into the ditch and thereby being destroyed. Several of these ditches are so located that they are not dangerous to the fisheries, and as screens need to be under constant supervision to prevent their becoming clogged with debris, the existing requirements put the owners to much useless expense and trouble. The amendment leaves the requiring of such screens with the minister, as is the case regarding the fishways in dams throughout the country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is there any danger of that in the Yukon?

Mr. HAZEN: The Yukon is mentioned as one of the places where there are irrigation works, but I must say that until I saw this memorandum, I was not aware that any such works were being carried on there, and I would not think it was at all likely. As it is now, it is obligatory that these screens be placed in all those ditches, and it has been found that in a large number this serves no good purpose. Therefore, we want the matter to be left so that screens will be put in those ditches where necessary, and that owners of land and ditches where screens are not necessary, shall not be compelled to go to the expense of putting them in.

The object of the third section is to enable the department properly to control regulative fisheries which are partially conducted outside and partially inside territorial waters. Our Act and regulations cease to be effective at the outside limit of the territorial waters, but by preventing boats leaving the shore to fish outside at a time when they may not fish inside, or of bringing to shore fish taken outside at a time when such is not permitted inside, the position can be controlled.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the minister state what kind of fish that refers to?

Mr. HAZEN: During certain seasons of the year, there is a close season for lobsters; no one can fish for lobsters during that time within the territorial waters of Canada, that is to say, within three miles from the shore. But there is nothing to prevent any one from going outside the three mile limit and carrying on fishing operations, thereby greatly injuring the fisheries at a season of the year when lobsters are in what is known as the soft state, that is, when their shells are not completely formed, or when they are breeding.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Would not those lobsters be liable to seizure when brought into a harbour?

Mr. HAZEN: That is the situation. Up to the moment we have not actually found it impossible to prevent fishermen from fishing outside when they may not fish inside, but such is being talked of more and more, and it is desirable that we should have the necessary power to prevent it. Although we have prevented it there may be doubt that we have the legal power to do so; we want to make really lawful what we have actually been doing for the protection of the fisheries in that section.

Mr. COPP: Will the minister say whether, under the present law, he is not entitled to seize fish caught outside the three mile limit?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Men are constantly being fined for having lobsters in their possession out of season.

Mr. HAZEN: There is very grave doubt as to our right to seize such fish. The next section refers to dogfish. Dogfish is now admitted to be a good fish, but its name is against its being commonly used. In the United States the name has been legally changed to "grayfish," and it seems desirable that this name should be adopted in Canada as well.

The next section is to assure the obtaining of correct statistical information. All the information contemplated is at present being procured by the fishery officers, but as it is not obligatory on those engaging in the industry to furnish it, sometimes it happens that it is delayed or that difficulty is experienced by the officers in procuring it. There is nothing new in the information asked for, the provision merely making it obligatory that such information shall be furnished so as to enable the officers to get it without trouble. So far as the lobster fishery is concerned, such information has been for years required by law, but it is not required by law with regard to other fisheries.

The last section is merely to harmonize the section with section 4 hereof, by substituting the name "grayfish" for "dogfish."

It might be desirable also to have this Bill referred to the Committee on Fisheries, so that perhaps more careful consideration might be given to it than is usually accorded a Bill in Committee of the whole House.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is there any scientific reason for this name? Is there not a fish called the grayfish?

Mr. HAZEN: There is a grayling, which is a small sporting fish, and is caught, I believe, quite extensively in the streams and lakes of British Columbia. Then there is a fish found in New Brunswick, in Loch Lomond, as to which scientific opinion is divided as to whether it is a grayling or originally a salmon, that got locked in those waters and has since deteriorated in size. This new name has been adopted in the United States.

Mr. SINCLAIR: How are you going to compel people to use this name?

Mr. HAZEN: I think they will soon get the habit.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Do I understand that the regulation as to the quantity of fish caught is to be compulsory?

Mr. HAZEN: The idea is to make it compulsory. I will read the section as proposed:

> The owner or manager of every fish curing or canning establishment or fresh fish business, and the captain or owner of every fishing vessel, and the owner of every fishing boat, fishing trap, weir or other fishing instrument in Canada, shall, at the request of the minister or a fishery officer, furnish a true return covering the period specified by the minister or such fishery officer, of the whole or any one or more of the following particulars:—
>
> (a) All fish caught;
> (b) All fish bought;
> (c) All fish packed or canned;
> (d) The value of the fish caught, bought, packed or canned;
> (e) The number of fishermen employed;
> (f) The number of shore workers employed;
> (g) The number and value of the fishing vessels and boats employed;
> (h) The quantity and value of fishing gear used;
> (i) The number and value of buildings and fixtures used;
> (j) Such other details and particulars as may be required by the minister or such fishery officer.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is any penalty provided for not filling in the return?

Mr. HAZEN: There is a provision in the Fisheries Act providing penalties for violations of the law, and I think that would cover the case my hon. friend mentions. I may say that these changes are recommended by the fishery officers.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has this information to be given under oath before a magistrate?

Mr. HAZEN: There is no provision at present requiring the information to be given under oath.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

Mr. HAZEN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 74, to amend the Fisheries Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 67, to amend the Customs Act.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): May I ask whether the Government of Manitoba have been advised of the intention to introduce this measure, and whether there has been any correspondence with them in regard to it? Otherwise, it seems to me, this Parliament should not be called upon to take away from the provincial government of Manitoba the legal right which it now possesses. The enactment of retroactive legislation of any kind is objectionable, and can only be justified in extreme cases for the purpose of removing an injustice of some sort. I think that retroactive legislation which expressly declares its intention to be the taking away of existing legal rights should be most carefully considered. The Crown in right of the province of Manitoba has certain privileges and rights, and has had them ever since Confederation. Speaking the other night my hon. friend said that a certain practice had grown up and that the question of the legal status of the province in regard to payment of duties to this Government had not been raised. One can very readily understand that. In early Confederation days public ownership of public utilities was not thought of, and the imports of any one province for any particular purpose would be infinitesimal, and naturally the question of the payment of duties would not be raised. But as the years went on the provincial governments assumed various powers, and their importations have necessarily increased. In Manitoba, for instance, they have a government telephone system, and the whole trend of legislation, particularly in the West, has been in the direction of governmental control; consequently there have been importations of goods which in the older days would not have been thought of. So much for the general principle.

My hon. friend also told us in the debate on the resolution that the Manitoba government and two other provincial governments had previously raised the quesiton, and that again recently the Manitoba government had expressly asserted that they were not called upon to pay these duties, and that there was no right under the law to make them pay them. This Bill expressly takes away from them their right of action.

Mr. REID: Oh, no.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then what is the object of the Bill? I rose more particularly for the purpose of ascertaining whether this legislation was being passed behind the back of the province of Manitoba. I certainly think the Attorney General of the province should have been notified; the ordinary courtesies as between governments require that that should be done.

Mr. DOHERTY: This Act is declaratory, and, so far as it is declaratory, it declares what the law was in the past, and I suppose, therefore, may have applied to it the word "retroactive." The hon. gentleman complains of this provision being made retroactive, and he explains, in his argument in support of his attack on the retroactivity of this measure, precisely why there should be no objection to the retroactive provision. This measure is retroactive only in so far as it enacts that the Customs Act is to be read as applying to the Crown. It is not retroactive at all in any other respect.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is a pretty important respect.

Mr. DOHERTY: That happens to be the point which this province raised, or on which it contended it was not liable. The hon. gentleman says they did not do it in the past, because they had small importations, and it was not worth while. It is only as to the past that it will be retroactive. It is not retroactive for the growing commerce, which is coming in the future. The hon. gentleman claims there was not any object in raising the question in the past. It is only as to those cases in the past where the provinces themselves, as the hon. gentleman explained, did not think it worth while to raise any question, that this enactment will be retroactive. All that it will do, in so far as it is retroactive, will be to prevent the province raising a question they never thought about raising for the purpose of recovering back from the Dominion money which they paid voluntarily. They quite acquiesced in the right of the Government to collect this money. The real, substantial question which arises between the provinces and this Dominion is whether there is power in Parliament to impose customs duty on importations made by the Crown in the right of the province. Who is right or who is wrong in that question will not be affected in the slightest degree in this legislation; because, as I pointed out the other evening, we shall have no more power to impose taxation on the Crown, if this be taxation, and we shall have no more power to collect customs duties from the Crown in the right of the province—if that power is vested in us under the British North America Act—because we mention it here, than we had before. As regards the substantial question at issue between the provinces and the Dominion, this legislation will not alter the position one iota. If, before this legislation, Parliament had no power to impose duties on imports into the provinces, it will have no right now. The purpose of this legislation, so far as it is to take effect in the future, is to place the question beyond doubt, that to the extent that Parliament has power, it is exercising that power to impose duties upon importations by the Crown. The retroactivity of the measure produces only this result: that the province will not be entitled to demand a refund upon a ground that it never dreamt of raising, and which it has not raised to the present day, but bases the argument upon the purely technical pretext that the Crown was not mentioned in the statute. The province will not be entitled to demand from the Government a refund of the customs duty, which, in the past, the province has paid, as the hon. gentleman says, because the duties were not worth talking about. I do not know whether that is correct or not. Whatever their reasons were, in the past they paid voluntarily, without raising any question.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Has Manitoba refused to pay the customs duty?

Mr. DOHERTY: Manitoba proposes to bring in certain merchandise, and claims that it comes in free of duty. The contention of the province of Manitoba will not be affected in the slightest degree by the retroactivity of this legislation. I am informed by the Minister of Customs that that is what has taken place just now, and it will be covered by the Act when it becomes law. So that this bugbear of retroactivity amounts simply to this: we come now to provide—and in our opinion it is necessary—that our duties should attach to the importations of the Crown, and especially mention the Crown, in order that, when we are dealing with this particular matter, the provinces will not be enabled to say to us, "Technically you had no right, because the Act did not mention the Crown, and we want our duties back."

Mr. SINCLAIR: Have any of the provinces imported any goods duty free in the past?

Mr. DOHERTY: So far as I can ascertain, duties were paid upon whatever dutiable goods the provinces imported, and they raised no question until this particular point came up, save on one occasion, in 1909, and at that time the contention on the part of the Government making the claim was not accepted by the then Government of Canada, and, if I understand rightly, they submitted to the law. They have always paid duties in the past.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend not think, in view of the apparent conflict that would exist between the federal and provincial authorities in this connection, that some time should elapse before the Bill is passed, and that there should be some official correspondence between the various provincial government so as to apprise them of the danger?

Mr. REID: I do not think we should postpone the operation of the Act for that reason. The provincial governments, when they were importing goods, claimed that under section 125 of the British North America Act, they should not pay the customs duty. We replied, of course, taking issue with them as was done in 1909 and again in 1916. They then asked for a fiat. I am advised by the Justice Department that there should be a provision that goods imported by the Crown are dutiable, and it has been the practice for many years to treat them as dutiable. The Dominion Government has been importing goods and duties have been collected for a number of years, but still the law does not say the Crown shall pay duty, and the same system has been in force, in so far as the provincial governments are concerned since Confederation, and yet there has never been a provision in the Customs Act that the Crown should pay duty. As I understand, the issue is now being raised. It made no difference, so far as the Dominion Government was concerned, if any question were raised, because it would be one department as against another, but now the provincial governments, which are the Crown also, raise the issue, and, as I understand it, the issue will be tried ont in the courts.

It is the duty of the Dominion Government to put itself in a proper position when the issue comes before the courts. Then, when we have on our statute book the provision that goods imported by the Crown for the Dominion or the provincial governments are liable to customs duty, the question will be tried out before the Privy Council as to whether we have the right to collect customs duties on goods imported by the Crown in the right of the provincial government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You want to bar action by the provincial governments?

Mr. REID: No, they have the right to take action without the consent of the Dominion Government. This does not prevent them going on with their action exactly the same as if the statute had not been passed. But the Privy Council will decide whether we can legally collect the duties after having placed on the statute book a provision that provincial governments are liable.

Mr. MACDONALD: Although you admit that you cannot collect now because the Crown was never mentioned in the Tariff Act.

Mr. REID: I do not admit anything of the kind. I say that we can, but at the same time they have raised the issue that we cannot. To put ourselves in a proper position when the issue is raised before the courts we ask that a provision be put on the statute book that the Crown is liable for duty.

Mr. MACDONALD: And that it has always been liable?

Mr. REID: As far as the retroactive part of it is concerned, if the Privy Council decides that the British North America Act entitles us to collect duties on goods imported by a provincial government for the reason that we have inserted in the Act a provision that they are liable, then the provincial government may come back with a claim from Confederation up to the present time, because at the time of Confederation we had not mentioned in the Act that the Crown should be liable for duty. The British North America Act, having been interpreted by the Dominion and provincial governments in a certain way up to the present time, and no one ever having raised the question that is raised now, if the Privy Council decides that we have that right, it does not seem fair that the provincial government should then come along with an action simply because it was not inserted in the Customs Act at the time of Confederation that the Crown should be liable.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The question seems very simple. I remember a case that arose in the time of the late Government. The question was raised by one of the provincial governments as to whether they were liable for duty on goods imported by them. They claimed that they were exempt. We thought that in these modern days the Crown, like everybody else, should pay duty. The provincial government paid and the matter rested there. This Bill is to make it clear and certain that the Crown is liable, like every one else?

Mr. REID: That is it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Very good; I agree with the Bill altogether, but if you have collected moneys in the past illegally, or if you have exercised powers which you ought not to have exercised under the law, what reason is there why you should not refund the money? You cannot keep the money that you are not entitled to. The Government cannot give such a bad example to the community.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time, and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—Duties payable on Crown's goods.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would suggest that my hon. friend allow the Bill to stand. The title of the Bill as introduced gives no indication of its purport; it is called simply a Bill to amend the Customs Act. If the minister intituled it a Bill to take away the rights of those provinces who have paid customs duties on goods imported for the Crown in respect of the provinces, that would have given some indication of its purport. But who would imagine that in a Bill to amend the Customs Act this retroactive provision would be inserted, intended to take away rights which may have accrued during the last fifty years, ever since Confederation?

I do think my hon. friend would be well advised to allow the Bill to stand for a short time in order to give an opportunity for the provinces interested to be heard. I am told by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that he has communicated with the Government of one of the provinces affected, but there has not been time to obtain a reply. It may be that no objection will be made, but it is a serious matter to pass retroactive legislation. The Prime Minister seemed to recognize the other night the force of that objection and said he would think it over and see whether our views could be met. The difficulty about retroactive legislation is that while it may not do any particular injustice in the present case, perhaps ten years from now somebody may come to Parliament with some measure retroactive in its character, and when objection is made it may be said: why in the Parliament of 1917, with a careful member like the Minister of Customs, retroactive legislation was introduced; the Prime Minister approved of it, it must be all right, as he would not think of doing anything wrong. It has a bad effect, it is injurious and unwise legislation which should never be resorted to except where it is absolutely neccessary in the public interest.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is not bad legislation in this case.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is in this case. My hon. friend says it is necessary in the public interest to take away the rights of the provinces. I cannot agree. I would like to agree with the Minister of Finance but I cannot in this case. Am I to understand that the Prime Minister has not given favourable consideration to the objections made? If it is intended to press the Bill through the committee to-night, I shall feel it my duty as one member to interpose any possible objection that can be raised.

Mr. REID: I explained the situation just before six o'clock when the hon. member was not in. I have discussed the measure with the Prime Minister since it was up a short time ago and with the Justice Department again, and we feel that it is not doing an injustice to the provinces. Let me again explain the Bill as I understand it. This is an old question. In 1909 the Customs Department heard of this matter for the first time, when the deputy provincial secretary of the Nova Scotia Government addressed a letter to the Prime Minister in which he raised the question. He said:

[Mr. Pugsley.]

I am directed by the Provincial Secretary to inform you that the customs authorities here have been claiming and collecting duties on goods belonging to and imported by the Government of Nova Scotia. It is submitted that the property of the Crown as respects the province is not subject to taxation, and the Provincial Secretary would be glad to have your views on the question.

The following reply was sent to the Provincial Secretary by the Commissioner of Customs:

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th instant respecting customs duties on goods belonging to and imported by the Government of Nova Scotia. In reply, I am to state that goods imported by or for the Provincial Government are subject to duty under the Customs tariff.

We heard nothing more about it until last year when the question was again raised by the Quebec government and the same reply was sent to them. The matter rested there for a while, when the Manitoba government raised the question and we took the same stand, in each case having laid the matter before the Department of Justice. Now lately the Alberta government—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Have they been notified of this legislation?

Mr. REID: Not of this legislation, no.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You propose to take away their rights without notice?

Mr. REID: The Manitoba government have asked for a fiat. They wish the matter to be decided by the courts which means, of course, that the Privy Council will decide whether the Dominion Government have a right to collect duties on goods imported by the Crown through a provincial government. The Department of Justice take issue with the interpretation placed by these provinces on section 125 of the British North America Act. The Nova Scotia government has not decided to take this matter to the courts, although it has been before them since 1909, when they first raised the question. I do not know whether the case will ever go before the courts, but if it does, the Dominion Government feel that they should be in a position to have the case placed before the Privy Council in the clearest possible way. The Department of Justice say that, although we have been collecting duties on goods imported by the provincial governments as well as by the Dominion Government, yet it has not been stated in the Customs Act that duties imported by the Crown are subject to customs duties.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Therefore they have been illegally collected on two grounds.

Mr. REID: Not necessarily. We say not illegally. We interpret section 125 of the British North America Act as meaning that the provinces are not entitled to import goods free of duty. The reason we want this legislation is to have it in the Act that the Crown must pay duty. Then, when the case comes before the Privy Council, that is one point that must be decided, whether a provincial government is liable for duties under the Customs Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is all right for the future.

Mr. REID: Yes. As for the past, from Confederation up to the present, that is the interpretation which both the Dominion and the provincial governments have placed upon section 125. Nova Scotia did raise the question in 1909, but immediately dropped it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Alberta and Manitoba have raised it.

Mr. REID: They are raising it now. If it is decided that we are within our rights in collecting duties upon goods imported by the provincial governments, as we have done since Confederation, the provinces have no right to ask that they be reimbursed for the duties that we have collected in the past.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Their claim might be supported on two grounds, one of which you wish to legislate from under their feet.

Mr. REID: The Justice Department advised me strongly that this is the position we should be in if the matter goes to the courts.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We assume that the gentlemen who occupied the position of Minister of Justice in the past were aware of that most ordinary principle of law that the Crown is not bound unless it is expressly named. Parliament has never provided that the Crown as represented by the provinces should pay duty on goods imported by the provinces. Parliament, therefore, has recognized that under the Act of Confederation it is not right to compel the provinces to pay customs duties. The right of the provinces to reimbursement would rest on two grounds: First, that Parliament had no authority under the British North America Act to impose the tax; second, that Parliament during the fifty years since Confederation has not imposed the tax. The question is about to be raised in a court, and the minister is frightened. He thinks that, although the provinces may be wrong in their interpretation of the provisions of section 125 of the British North America Act, yet, because Parliament never provided that the Crown should pay taxes, the provinces may be entitled to recover their money. He asks the Minister of Justice, therefore, how to get around this. The Minister of Justice says: a very easy way to do it is by passing retroactive legislation taking away the rights of the provinces and declaring that the position shall be as if fifty years ago Parliament had made the Crown in the right of the provinces liable to the payment of customs duties. The minister purposes doing this without setting forth in the title of his Bill anything indicating its design and without giving the public the slightest intimation of what the proposed legislation is intended to accomplish. Nor does he notify the parties to the litigation of what is proposed.

Mr. REID: There is no litigation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend says that some of the provinces applied for a fiat; does that not mean litigation? A person having a claim against the Crown presents a petition to the Minister of Justice asking for a fiat. If the Minister of Justice thinks the case should be dealt with in the Exchequer Court, he recommends to the Governor General the granting of a fiat. The fiat is granted, and the proceedings are thereby commenced. If this were a matter as between private parties, Parliament would never intervene by passing legislation without giving both parties an opportunity of being heard. Yet the minister, because his party has a majority in this Parliament, proposes arbitrarily to take away the rights of the provinces by enacting this retroactive legislation, without the provinces having the slightest intimation of what is intended or the slightest opportunity of being heard. This proposed legislation is of a most objectionable character, and should not be passed. If my hon. friend's whole desire is to raise the question, let him enact this law for the future; then if the provinces import any goods they will have to rely solely upon the provisions of section 125 of the British North America Act. Any other course than this is absolutely unjustified, and I am sure would not have been recommended to Parliament by any Minister of Justice in the past.

Mr. DOHERTY: There never was a case which more clearly called for retroactive legislation, or more amply and completely justified such a course, than this. I should like to take my share of the indignation which the hon. member for St. John has poured upon the Minister of Customs. In justice to the Minister of Customs, I may say that he did not come to me and ask me for a way around this. I am entirely responsible for the suggestion of the legislation that has been condemned in such unmeasured terms—and I am not in the least ashamed. The provinces never raised this question at all; never suggested it; never had it present in their minds.

Mr. MACDONALD: How could you tell?

Mr. DOHERTY: If they did, they kept it in their minds and concealed it. They put forward only one contention: that they were not liable to pay duties under section 125. In the correspondence looking to a fiat or to some other method of legal proceeding, they never suggested this ground in the slightest degree. Since Confederation, Customs Acts have been passed applicable to all importations without exception. Importations by the Crown were not specifically mentioned, but, notwithstanding that fact, the Crown in the right of the Dominion clearly understood and admitted that the duties applied to themselves and to the Crown in the right of the provinces, and the provinces as clearly understood that, because they paid the duties without demur.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it not true that it is only within the last few years that the Crown in the right of the Dominion has begun to pay customs duties, and was it not a matter of expediency so as to show what were dutiable goods that came into the country? I venture to say that for forty years the Crown in the right of the Dominion never paid a cent of duty.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am told that about ten years ago the Crown in the right of the Dominion began to pay customs duties. I referred to the Crown in the right of the Dominion having paid, but it is not from that that I deduce that the Crown in the right of the Dominion believed they had a right to impose the duties. I believe they so understood from the fact that they collected the duties. Of course, the Crown in the right of the Dominion paying the duties is a mere formality in any event; that is a matter of the Crown in the right of the Dominion taking money out of its right hand pocket and putting it into its left. As to the question between the Crown in the right of the Dominion and the Crown in the right of the provinces, there is just one Crown after all, and the distinction is one between the Dominion revenue and the provinces being subject to contribute to that revenue.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is not the ground upon which the courts found that where the Crown is not expressly named in an Act of Parliament, the Crown is not bound, based upon the idea that Parliament did not intend to include the Crown?

Mr. DOHERTY: That is what it is based upon.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It was not the intention of Parliament to include the Crown.

Mr. DOHERTY: I assented when the hon. member said he assumed, but actions speak much louder than mere assumptions, and the hon. gentleman says that the Ministers of Justice knew that that statement ought to have been in the Act, and that because they did not put it in we must take it for granted that they did not intend to do so. Marvellous to relate, we must take that for granted of all of those successive Ministers of Justice with the assent of all the successive ministers, their colleagues, including the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), who sat in a Government the Prime Minister of which authorized the writing of a letter, in 1909, to say that those duties were legally collectable and refused to recognize the claim of the provinces. It is a serious imputation of bad faith upon the gentlemen who conducted themselves in that way for the hon. member to say: Oh, they knew all the time, and they fully intended all the time that there should be no liability. I say that their actions talk; I do not make such an imputation upon them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was speaking about Parliament.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman's distinctions are exceedingly fine. The hon. gentlemen is speaking of Parliament, but when he was speaking of what Parliament intended, he found it necessary, in order to demonstrate what Parliament intended, to fall back upon the argument that the successive Ministers of Justice knew that that statement ought to be in express terms; and that they did not put it in the Act and put the matter to Parliament in that way, therefore, says the hon. gentleman, Parliament deliberately intended not to include the Crown. Let me point out to him that the actions of all those successive Ministers of Justice shows what is the real fact, that it was the purest and merest oversight. Oversights have occurred in other cases, and I have not the slightest doubt that this was a pure oversight, and the action of all the successive Governments of the Dominion, including all the successive Ministers of Justice, show that it was an oversight; that they were not doing what the hon. gentleman said; that they were not, with the knowledge that omission left the Crown out, asking Parliament to pass Acts that were not to apply to the Crown. What happened was that there was this oversight, but the whole line of action shows that the intention was that those duties should be applied; and it is as fair to assume that Parliament knew that those duties were being applied, as it is to assume an intention based upon a purely technical rule of law, and, I think, will bring us to the truth. The matter was one of public notoriety; everybody knew it and everybody acquiesced in it. We must assume that successive attorneys general of the provinces knew that very simple rule, and still the provinces all acquiesced in it, and everybody recognized that this was a proper thing to ask for on the part of the Dominion Government and a proper thing to pay on the part of the provinces. And, now the hon. gentleman rises in indignation——

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister is aware in making his argument, which will practically serve as an estoppel, that it was not until 1895 or around that date that it was settled as a matter of law that the Crown existed is connection with the provincial Government. It was not until the maritime bank case was decided by the Privy Council and it was held that the Crown was present in provincial governments and that the Lieutenant Governors were not merely officers of the provincial governments. My hon. friend's argument, therefore, could not apply until after that was settled.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is about twenty-two years ago. And in the first place, might I suggest that the judgment of the Privy Council was known. Does the hon. gentleman not think there were some lawyers and some attorneys general and some Ministers of Justice in this country who knew what the law was before the Privy Council came to a decision. The Privy Council did not make law; it decided what the law was, and I myself had the pleasure of knowing a large number of very distinguished lawyers in this country who had not the slightest doubt that the Crown was a part of the legislatures of the provinces. It would have been remarkable, seeing that was the law, that we should at that time have produced no lawyers who knew it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Supreme Court of Canada decided the other way namely, that a lieutenant Governor was merely the representative of the Governor General.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Supreme Court of Canada made a mistake. We are being condemned because it is to be assumed that every Minister of Justice knew the law and had his mind on it and therefore did a particular thing. That is the argument of the hon. member for St. John. The hon. member for Pictou wants us to be condemned because we must admit that before 1895 all the attorneys general of the different provinces did not know the law or were mistaken about the law. I cannot see any great force in that argument, and I think it is a remarkable fact that if their acts rested upon a mistake in 1895, we have never, down to the present day, or to this moment, had a breath of suggestion from the provinces that they were not liable because the Crown was not mentioned in the statute.

They have not suggested that, and it is on their behalf that it is suggested now for the first time in this Parliament. This proposed legislation results from the fact that it was thought wise when the provinces raised one particular contention, resting their claim entirely upon that, and when because they raised that there was the possibility of our being brought into court, to guard against their ever raising this purely technical ground of which they had never thought and have not raised up to the present day. I entirely fail to see why there is ground for indignation because we propose to close the door against people coming now with belated claims to recover money which the Crown in the right of the Dominion collected in the past in perfect good faith, and which the Crown in the right of the province paid perfectly willingly. That is all we are seeking to do by the retroactivity of this legislation. To give sanction to what everybody understood to be the law, we are going to declare that the law was what everybody understood it to be.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And what my hon. friend does not think it was.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think there was an oversight. I want to give the hon. gentleman the full benefit of what he said and repeated a great many times. The provinces may have a right, upon a pure abstract technicality, to recover back money that was collected from them in good faith by the succeeding governments of this Dominion, and which they paid perfectly willingly and quite voluntarily. Technically, they may have the right to do that, because what they understood to be the intention of the law, what this Parliament and the Government of Canada understood to be the intention of the law, was by oversight inadequately expressed. The indignation is all because these provinces are having the door closed to their raising a claim to recover money that was collected quite honestly and paid without question, always leaving out the question of the power of this Parliament to impose those duties, which does not come into this legislation at all. What we propose to do is simply to give the sanction of this Parliament to everybody's understanding of the law during that long period of years, and not to leave the door open to the questioning of the application of that law so understood merely because there may be a technical ground upon which all these things that were done in the past in perfectly good faith might be disturbed. That, to my mind, is the ideal case for declaratory or retroactive legislation. This does not prejudice any right of the province in the future. It does not prejudice any right of any province to recover anything that it has paid upon the one ground which no province has ever invoked as entitling it to recover—on the ground that under the British North America Act there is no power in this Parliament to impose the tax.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend seems to forget that the people of these provinces are not estopped by any failure there may possibly have been on the part of their government to assert a right. My hon. friend forgets the principle that the Crown is never estopped.

Mr. DOHERTY: I never talked about estoppel at all. It was the hon. member for Pictou who interpreted my words as referring to estoppel. I never claimed anything as resting on an estoppel at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sure the minister was perfectly well aware that the Crown was never estopped by delay or by laches. What its rights ever were, unless they have been released in some way, those rights still exist. The minister says that the governments of these provinces legally and properly paid what they ought to have paid, and that the claim that they might recover is purely technical. I fail to understand upon what ground the minister bases that contention. Either the provinces have the right to this money, or they have not. If Parliament has never imposed a tax upon them, surely their right to recover is not technical. Bear in mind that it is not the governments of these provinces who are to be debarred from their rights by this legislation; it is the people.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is the people of this Dominion whose rights we want to protect.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is the people of the provinces who make up this Dominion, and to my mind it is scandalous for the Dominion Government to take advantage of its paramount power of legislation to take away the rights of the provinces. I am surprised that for such a comparatively small amount as is involved, a few thousand dollars, this Parliament will be called upon to exercise its paramount power of legislation and take away a right which may exist on behalf of the people of the provinces. That is not technical; it is substantial, and I care not whether any of these Governments has failed to put its claim on the two grounds. If there are two grounds, the fact that a Government has failed to put its claim on both grounds ought not to prejudice the people of the province. The men who are acting to-day are acting on behalf of the people of those four provinces, Alberta, Manitoba, Quebec and Nova Scotia. Now what have the people of those four provinces to do with the omission on the part of men who happened to be in the Government ten years ago, to put their claim on two grounds? If they have a claim on two grounds, what right has this Parliament to take away the claim, absolutely valid and absolutely legal, which they may have upon one ground, and say they must rest their case entirely upon the other ground? This Parliament has no right to do that, just because it is all-powerful, and that is the only ground upon which the Minister of Justice can put it. He can say, "We are all-powerful. Under the British North American Act we have the power to take away rights which exist to-day in the provinces; we can alter our Customs Act; we can pass a law to-day and make it run back for fifty years and say that that which has not been the law for the past fifty years shall by the Act of this Parliament to-night be deemed to have been the law." Yet the minister says that is purely technical. Although the people of these provinces may have the right to get their money back, because, forsooth, some of those who represented them in the past did not put their claim on two grounds, the minister says, "We will deprive them of one ground, which we fear is a perfectly legal and valid ground, and see that they do not recover on that ground at all events," simply because they did not put forward their claim as they might have done.

Notwithstanding all my hon. friend has said, I am unable to see why this legislation should be passed. If this Parliament wants to legislate that the provinces shall in future pay duties on goods which they import, let it legislate for the future. Then as to any duties which may be exacted in the future, the provinces will have to rest their claim upon one ground only, namely, upon the provisions of section 125 of the British North America Act. But if they have two grounds which they have a right to avail themselves of in the courts of the land, surely this Parliament ought not to take away their rights. It is proposed to do this without notifying the provinces—doing it behind their backs. This Parliament has no right to do that. Retroactive legislation is most objectionable under all circumstances, and can only be justified by the gravest necessity; and surely the mere fact that the Government thinks that there may be a few thousand dollars which, as the result of the litigation may go to the people of these four provinces, is no ground for the Government resorting to an exercise of its power and asking Parliament to pass legislation extending back fifty years.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am surprised at the lack of information on the part of the Government in regard to the concrete cases which brought about this legislation. I quite agree with my hon. friend beside me that this Parliament has full power and authority to state who shall pay the duties, and who shall not pay the duties. I believe that the Crown, in the right of the Dominion Government, could stipulate by whom the duties should be paid, but it seems to me that, when the minister introduces legislation, retroactive in its nature, the least that we might expect from the Government is that some regard should be shown to the provinces. If there is one thing which the Federal Parliament should avoid it is litigation with the provinces. It seems to me the provincial and Dominion Governments should have most happy relations and should avoid conflicts. We all know in the past from what small causes arose the very stringent fights which took place between the Ontario legislature and the Dominion Government. We know how long these cases lasted, that they went to the Privy Council; in fact, the result of those cases was the creation of a party of provincial rights in Ontario. In such a small matter, when everybody conceives that the Government can state who shall pay the duties, it seems to me we should avoid giving the legislation any retroactive effect. I do not refer to the correspondence of 1909, but can the minister tell me what were the concrete facts which brought about this legislation? Has there been notice given by the minister to the various provincial governments that this legislation would be brought down this session?

Mr. REID: I have not given the provincial governments any notice that it was my intention to bring this legislation before Parliament during the present session.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What are the concrete facts which cause this legislation?

Mr. REID: The reason that I am putting the measure through this session is this, as I stated: In 1909 the matter came first before the Government of the day, and the right hon. leader of the Opposition, then Prime Minister, took issue. The provincial government did not raise any further question, and the matter dropped. It was then brought up last year by one of the four governments, and I sent the same reply, word for word, that was sent by my predecessor in 1909. The matter again dropped, and then another provincial government brought the matter up, and the Manitoba Government stated that they wished to take issue with the Dominion Government; that is, they wanted a fiat. Of course, they could proceed in the Exchequer Court, and it would not make any difference whether they got a fiat from this Government or not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Was there any entry made in the customs in Winnipeg in regard to this matter?

Mr. REID: Yes, they made an entry.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They imported what?

Mr. REID: They imported a gas producer —that is the way the item is described— in August, 1916. The duties were $404.80, and when it came in they took issue on paying the duties on that machine.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the minister any record of the grounds on which the Manitoba Government based their objection? Was it simply that they were not bound to pay the duty, or did they base it on section 125?

Mr. REID: On section 125 of the British North America Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Have you their letter to that effect?

Mr. REID: Yes. The letter reads as follows:

Winnipeg, Aug. 23rd, 1916.

The Honourable, the Minister of Customs,
Ottawa, Canada.

Re Gas Producer Plant at Souris, Man.

Sir,—

On the 10th inst. I wrote the Commissioner of Customs, Ottawa, in regard to a charge of $404.80 duty on a gas producer plant which was purchased by the Provincial Government of Manitoba in England and was entered through Souris in Manitoba.

Payment of the $404.80 was made under protest as the contention of the Provincial Government of Manitoba is that no duty is chargeable on said gas producer plant.

The province of Manitoba now wishes to make a formal demand for the repayment of said $404.80 from the Dominion Government on the ground that section 125 of the British North America Act prevents the Dominion Government from charging such a duty on such a gas producer plant owned by the Provincial Government.

In case of your refusal to pay back this $404.80 I take it your department will be glad to have the matter passed on judicially. The province of Manitoba will at once institute proceedings in the Exchequer Court of Canada to recover the said sum paid for duty.

I shall be glad if you will indicate your decision in the matter as early as possible.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

John Allen,
Deputy Attorney General.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Suppose they had two grounds of objection, and only put forward one, surely you would not take away the other ground? The substantial point is that they say they are not liable for the duty. Suppose they have a dozen reasons, and only put forward one, they are entitled when they go to court, to raise the dozen grounds.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman asked why I was putting the legislation through this session. The case referred to arose in August last, and I submitted the matter again to the Department of Justice, and consulted my colleagues in council. The provincial government stated in their letter that they would like to have it tried judicially. I do not want to have it tried judicially, because I take it for granted the matter is settled; but if they do proceed, the Department of Justice says that, in order to have the question tried as to whether we can collect customs duties from the provincial government this provision should be in the Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is not the real issue whether, under the then existing law, this Government had the right to exact duties from the provincial government? Whether they base their claim on one reason or a dozen reasons there are only arguments that apply.

Mr. REID: We claim that we have had the right to collect these duties since Confederation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You admit by this statute that you think you had not the right.

Mr. REID: No, we do not; we claim that we have always had the right to collect duties under section 125.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Well, then rest on the law as it is.

Mr. REID: No, I will not rest on the law as it is. I am not a lawyer myself, but as a layman I think I am entitled to my own opinion and it is that in order to have the matter decided in the Privy Council it is just as well, and it will probably assist our case, to have on the statute book the claim that the Crown is liable to duties.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Of course, that will assist you because you have taken away one ground of action which the provinces had against you.

Mr. REID: Well that is something the Department of Justice and members of the council think should be done. Why, make it retroactive?—the hon. gentleman may ask. We are only declaring in the statute that the law, as interpreted by the Dominion and Provincial governments since Confederation, has been that the Crown was liable to pay duties.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This would bar them from their action.

Mr. REID: No; if the Privy Council decide that the provincial governments are not obliged to pay customs duties, no customs duties will be collected, our declaratory act will have no effect and they will have a claim for any duties which have been paid since Confederation. On the other hand, if the Privy Council declare that we have a right to collect duties on goods imported by the provincial governments, I do not think that it would be fair that they should have a claim simply because this declaration was not put in the Act at Confederation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then the Bill assumes that you have collected duty illegally?

Mr. REID: I do not interpret it in that way because it has been admitted by the Dominion and provincial governments that that is not a proper interpretation but that it is the result of an accident or a technicality.

Mr. MACDONALD: No, it is not a technicality.

Mr. REID: It was a technicality in that it was not put in at that time to make it plainer. However, we are all acting in the interests of the whole people, both the Dominion and the provincial.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You are not acting very much in the interest of the provincial Governments.

Mr. REID: I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. There is only one ground of difference in the committee, as far as I can see. There is no objection to this Bill going through and having effect from the present time onward but the whole objection appears to be that it should not be made to apply to all time since Confederation.

9 p.m.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It should not interfere with existing rights.

Mr. REID: I claim that if the Privy Council decide that we cannot collect duties from now on, after it has been recognized since Confederation that we were entitled to these duties, it would be better to have this clause put in.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is rather difficult to follow hon. gentlemen in dealing with this matter. I fail to see where the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) or the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid), have met the point made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). What is the position of the Government on this question as declared by the Minister of Justice? He says: "We have had the right to collect customs duties on goods imported by the provincial governments from Confederation down to date because they have never objected to it until within the last few years." The Minister of Justice, in dealing with the point that I called his attention to, made no answer when I suggested to him that it was only within a period of twenty years—not fifty years—that it has been settled as a matter of law that the Crown is present in the provincial legislatures.

Mr. REID: Previous to 1895, do I understand the hon. gentleman to say, the provincial governments did not consider that they were a part of the Crown?

Mr. MACDONALD: It was so urged by those who were advocates of the belief that the Confederation Act had created in this Federal Parliament a certain central authority and that the governors of the provinces were simply Dominion officials and as such were not authorized to exercise the prerogative of the Crown. It was decided by the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Lenoir and Ritchie, known as the King's Counsel case, that the provincial governments had no right to appoint these counsel as the King was not present in the provincial legislatures. So that when my hon. friend says that the provincial governments did not raise this question during the whole period of fifty years, I say it was not until twenty years ago that it was decided absolutely that the Crown did exist in connection with the provincial legislatures. Only then could they be aware that the Crown in right of the province was exempt from the provisions of the law if in the law it was not specially named. My hon. friend says that if the provinces did not raise this question before they ought not to be permitted to raise it now.

Mr. REID: No, they can raise it now.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend says that if they do raise it now they ought to be met by an Act of Parliament which declares that for the last fifty years the Crown has contravened the Customs Tariff Act and therefore its right is taken away. Does the minister propose to pass this retroactive legislation to say that because a particular province did not sit down and prepare what might be called a petition of right, or a statement of claim in which their legal position is maintained and set out, they cannot raise the ground and it does not meet the point? If litigation is taken they could raise this ground, together with the general ground that it falls within section 125 of the British North America Act and that therefore the duty could not be collected or imposed. They might raise both of these grounds or any other ground that these litigants would have the right to raise. This country has no right to pass retroactive legislation to anticipate the remedy which Manitoba, or any other province might seek to have in court, and to declare to have been the law in the last fifty years that which was not the law. It is useless for my hon. friend to say it was a technicality and an oversight. Either it was that the Crown in right of the Dominion for fifteen years deliberately taxed the Crown in right of the province, or it was not. I was surprised to hear the Minister of Justice argue upon that point. The Minister of Justice knows very well that the principle which declares that statutes do not apply to the Crown unless it is especially named, is not a technical principle at all. Very important and far-reaching rights rest upon that principle. No Parliament from 1867 until to-day has undertaken to declare that the Crown's name should be mentioned in a tariff Act. If the province of Manitoba wants to import goods, tractors or engines in connection with their agricultural or experimental farms or apparatus for the use of their telephone system or any other public work, they have a right at this moment, as I understand the law, to import them without having to pay customs duties. My hon. friend by this legislation is coming in to say that, although they had imported such machinery last August, they must pay duty now. That is ex post facto legislation, it is retroactive, and it takes away the rights of the province. For that reason I object to it. I submit further that this question having been raised, as the province of Manitoba is seriously raising it, the minister should have advised the proper authorities of that province of the fact that this legislation was being introduced so that we could discuss it intelligently and be in a better position to decide whether what appears to be obnoxious and improper retroactive legislation should be placed upon the statute book. I think the request of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), that the Bill should stand over until the views of the governments of Manitoba and Alberta can be ascertained, is well founded.

Mr. McKENZIE: I submit to you, Sir, and to the Minister of Justice, that the rights of the provinces and the rights of those who are governed under the British North America Act should be settled by the courts, if necessary by the Privy Council, through the proper interpretation of the British North America Act, and not by any Act that we might pass in interpretation of it. The rights of the provinces and the rights of the Governors of the provinces are fixed and established by the British North America Act, and it is by the interpretation of that Act that any doubt that may have arisen as to the rights of a province should be determined. We should not attempt to give that Act any twist or turn, or to make it anything different from what it was when it left the hands of the Imperial Parliament. We should submit it to the courts as it has been submitted in every other case where it has had to be interpreted, in its purity. We should not pass an Act interpreting it and then send the two to England to be passed upon. I submit that it is no argument to say that because a local Government or any other body has been making a mistake for forty or fifty years they are thereby forced to continue making that mistake, or to continue to pay out moneys which they should never have paid. I remember a very interesting case in Nova Scotia relating to a lockup at Spring Hill, which was tried before Sir Robert Weatherbee, one of the most distinguished lawyers in this country. The people of Spring Hill had been using a lockup for twenty-five years a building which really never was a lockup. Sir Robert in his facetious way said: It is argued before me that the people of Spring Hill made a mistake twenty-five years ago; that they have persisted in that mistake for twenty-five years, and that therefore it has become legal. Of course he swept the thing aside as being nonsensical and not worthy of legal argument. As Sir Robert Weatherbee then said so, I think we should hold now. The Minister of Justice should advise that it is no argument to say that because the provincial governments took it for granted that any demands made upon them by the Federal Government were right and, without looking into the law, paid the demands made upon them, and then when they came to look into it and found that they were making a mistake during all this time, the Dominion Government could set up what is practically a plea of estoppel.

Returning to the Act itself, the words "tax" and "taxation" are used everywhere where reference is made to the collection of duties. The word "tax" is used in section 91 of the British North America Act. In giving the powers of this Parliament, it says:

The raising of money by any mode or system of taxation.

The word "taxation" is usually understood in the provinces and elsewhere as the ordinary taxes. When we talk about taxation, we very seldom think of customs duties. But in the British North America Act, duties are spoken of as a tax; they call it "tax," they do not call it "customs duties." Then we have the power under section 91 of the British North America Act to get money by any mode or system of taxation. If that was the only thing in the Act, no doubt we would have power to tax any property that was held in the right of the Crown. But section 125 says:

That no land or property—

The word "property" there includes everything that could be stolen.

No land or property belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable to taxation.

The word "taxation" is used there. In section 125, the word "taxation" has the same meaning exactly as in subsection 3 of section 91; and if we are going back to the intention of Parliament, we must take it for granted that the intention of the Imperial Parliament in the beginning, in 1867 when they passed this Act, was that any property held by the Crown in right of a province or any property held by the Crown in right of the Dominion, was not subject to any tax whatsoever, either by customs or otherwise. Therefore, if any tax has ever been collected by this Government from the provincial governments upon any property that they may have been importing that ordinarily would be subject to taxation, they were collecting it in good faith, I presume, but by a mistaken conception of the law. I wish to point out to the Minister of Finance, as a constitutional lawyer and a man who has to do particularly with finances, that to me, who do not profess to be a great constitutional lawyer, it is very clear that under the Act the Government has no authority to levy any tax upon any property belonging to the Crown, in the right of either the province or in the Dominion; that subsection 3 of section 91 simply used the word "taxation":

The right of raising of money by any mode or system of taxation.

Therefore, taxation covers everything, any way in which we may get money. If that is all that was in the Act, we could, I suppose, tax anything. Section 125 says:

No land or property belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable to taxation.

The word "property" applies to anything that has tangible existence or value; anything that can be used or appropriated. Instead of giving a long list, therefore, of things exempted, the farmers of the Act used the comprehensive word "property." The gas producing machine or engine that was imported into Manitoba certainly is property and, being owned by the province in the right of the Crown, is exempt from taxation, including customs duties. The Government, then, had no right to collect duty upon it. The proper thing to do when we discover the true meaning of a law is to forget the past and to proceed with a proper administration of that law.

Mr. REID: The hon. gentleman contends that the provincial governments have the right under the law to import goods without paying duty. When the right hon. leader of the Opposition was Prime Minister, he and his followers took the ground that the provincial governments should pay duty on these articles. The only way to settle the matter once for all is to have the Privy Council interpret the Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: But it should be settled upon a proper interpretation of the original Act, not upon an Act now introduced.

Mr. REID: This does not change the Act at all.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then what is the good of it? Are we playing with legislation? Have we so much time that we can pass legislation that has no purpose or object? If we have the right to collect duties upon property entering Canada for the provinces, we have that right by virtue of the power conferred upon us by the British North America Act. Let us have the matter interpreted by the courts, if there is any doubt about it, but do not make it more difficult by passing this Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: This Bill does not touch the British North America Act or its interpretation.

Mr. McKENZIE: Inferentially it does.

Mr. DOHERTY: Not inferentially, directly or indirectly. The great object of the Bill is to make it quite sure that the only question upon which the case will go to the courts and ultimately to the Privy Council shall be the interpretation of the British North America Act. It would be a childishly absurd contention that this Parliament, by any legislation of its own, could in any degree affect the powers conferred upon it by the British North America Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister tell the committee briefly what the Bill is for?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is for the purpose of declaring that the present Customs Act does, and that the Acts passed since Confederation did, apply to the Crown.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then you are asking Parliament to make a false declaration.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member for St. John does say such crushing things. He has told the member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) that we are doing a frightfully wicked thing. But has he not made it clear to the member for North Cape Breton that we are not touching the British North America Act; that our wickedness is all directed to the Canada Customs Act?

Mr. McKENZIE: I never said that stupidity was wicked.

Mr. DOHERTY: You did say that the member for St. John said that the proposed legislation was wicked.

Mr. McKENZIE: The hon. member for St. John has made the matter so clear from the standpoint of a constitutional lawyer that it is almost unnecessary for me to speak about it. The Minister of Justice says that it is necessary to pass the Bill now under consideration in order to arrive at a proper interpretation of the British North America Act and to assert that we were right during the last fifty years in collecting these duties.

Mr. DOHERTY: Not at all. This Bill simply seeks to make the Customs Act read as though these words were in it: "This Act shall apply to the Crown." It goes no further than the Customs Act of Canada; it seeks simply to have the Act read as including words to the effect that it shall apply to the Crown. That is what everybody thought it meant; we want to make the law square with what everybody did and understood respecting it. I repeat that the Bill does not in any way affect the British North America Act or its interpretation. We shall have to determine what power this Parliament had under the British North America Act; this Bill says nothing about that. What the Bill seeks to make clear is that Parliament exercised whatever power it did have.

Mr. McKENZIE: I perhaps understand the situation a little better, but it does not change the viewpoint at all. The Customs Act must find its constitutional foundation and right in the British North America Act, and if the Customs Act has gone any further than it should go under the basic principles of our constitution, to that extent it is ultra vires and of no effect. We must take for granted that the able constitutional lawyers who were in this Parliament at the time of Confederation and at the time that the Customs Act was drafted and put through this House were fully cognizant of their powers and authorities under the British North America Act, and that the Customs Act was passed in conformity with those powers. We have, therefore, no business now, by this new legislation, to import into the Customs Act anything but what was in it at that time, and we have no business to put any interpretation upon the Customs Act. The Minister of Justice says that this Act does not give an interpretation of the British North America Act, and I agree with him in that, but it does give an interpretation as to what may be regarded as the outcome or product of the British North America Act, and if either in the one case or in the other we are going beyond our rights to legislate, we have no right to do so, and the question reverts to the same point: what are the rights of the provinces under the British North America Act? The Customs Act does not alter the situation at all unless that Act comes within the purview of powers intended to be conferred upon this Parliament. That is exactly where I stand, and I submit that this legislation should not be introduced at all until we get a decision of the Privy Council on the point. We have an illustration of this in the Bill that was introduced in this House this afternoon by the Minister of Finance. There was a dispute about the constitutionality of the Insurance Act, and as I understand it, the minister did not bring any legislation before Parliament to patch up the dispute; he waited until an interpretation was given to the matter by the Privy Council, and he then introduced legislation to implement so far as he could what was decided by the Privy Council. The same line of action should be followed in this case; if we are mistaken about an interpretation, we should apply to the courts and get the proper interpretation and after this is received, if it is necessary to change the legislation for the proper and practical carrying out of the Act, then let us get further legislation, but let us not go guessing about the matter now. In fairness and equity, it seems to me there should be no taxes upon the provinces. Take the simplest proposition where we have common jurisdiction and authority. Take agriculture, in which there is a jurisdiction that is held in common by the provinces and by the Dominion. If the Dominion Government introduce into this country a herd of cattle or stock for breeding purposes, they do not pay any customs duty, or they simply pay it from one pocket into the other, so that they really have the advantage of paying no duty. The Department of Agriculture of a province may be doing exactly the same thing, but under the interpretation which is sought to be put upon the law, they have to pay duty. From the beginning the intention of the Imperial Parliament was that goods coming into the country in the right of the Crown should not pay duty, and it was a mistake right along to be collecting that duty from the governments of the different provinces. Perhaps they can recover that duty. I do not know whether the same principle that would apply to the individual would apply to the Crown. If an individual pays any money by mistake of law, he can never get it back, and I presume the Crown would have the right to raise that point, although perhaps it would be a technical objection and would not be worthy of the Crown when it is the Crown on the one side and the Crown on the other. I am not saying a word as to whether these moneys should be paid back or not. I am glad to have an opportunity of expressing my views with regard to the real interpretation of those points of the British North America Act and of the right of the provinces and the Dominion under them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Justice made a statement a moment ago which, I think, calls for some remarks. He says that everybody since Confederation has thought that the Customs Act applies to the Crown as represented by the provinces. I wish to deny that most emphatically. The only evidence he has given us of that is that in the statement of protest presented by one or two of the provinces they mention section 125 as exempting them from taxation. Surely that does not prove that the people of the different provinces from which duties have been illegally exacted have assented to the view which the Minister of Justice now puts forward. Take the case of New Brunswick. My hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) has called my attention to the fact that only a few months ago that province imported a large quantity of road machinery, and I have no doubt upon that they illegally paid duty. They have not made a claim on any particular ground to get that money back, and I presume the officials paid it because their attention was not called either to the omission of the Crown from the Customs Act or to section 125 of the British North America Act. This Government has illegally imposed a tax against the people of the province of New Brunswick in respect of a good many thousand dollars worth of goods which they have imported for the purpose of public improvement. I presume it will also be found that in respect to fertilizers, which the government of New Brunswick has been importing, this government has exacted customs duties illegally. It is said that the province no doubt has the right to recover that money as conditions are to-day. The province might rest its claim upon two grounds: first, that the Customs Act does not apply and has not professed to apply to the Crown, and secondly, that under section 125 of the British North America Act, this Parliament has no right to impose duties upon the provinces respecting goods imported by them. Have the people of New Brunswick ever waived their rights? Are they estopped? The Minister of Justice says everybody has thought that the law was as this government is now attempting to make it, but the people of New Brunswick have never expressed an opinion upon this point, either through their government or otherwise, and they can to-morrow put in a claim to recover these duties. Does this government say to them: Although you have two grounds on which to base your claim, we are going to legislate one of those grounds away from you? The minister says: Oh, the people of New Brunswick have always thought that the Customs Act applied to the Crown. There is no evidence whatever of a waiver of whatever legal rights they have to-day to recover that money, and, as a representative of that province, I protest in the strongest manner possible against their rights being taken away by this legislation. The only ground upon which this government can take their rights away is that Parliament has the paramount right to do this injustice to the people of that province, if it chooses to do so.

I wish to prove what I said a moment ago, namely, that the legislation is false upon its face, and this Government is asking Parliament to declare and place upon record what is known to be absolutely contrary to the truth. These are the words of the Bill.

The rates and duties of customs imposed by this Act or the Customs Tariff or any other law relating to the Customs, as well as the rates and duties of customs heretofore imposed by any Customs Act or Customs Tariff or any law relating to the Customs enacted and in force at any time since the first of July, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, shall be binding,—

That is all right for the future.

—and are declared and shall be deemed to have been always binding—

That is a false statement. They have not been binding for thirty years.

—and are declared and shall be deemed to have been always binding upon and payable by His Majesty, in respect of any goods which may be hereafter or have been heretofore imported by or for His Majesty, whether in the right of His Majesty's Government of Canada or His Majesty's Government of any province of Canada.

I say that is a declarataion which this Parliament ought not to be called upon to make. It is declaring that this Customs Act has been binding on the Crown in the right of the province. But the Minister of Customs knows perfectly well that it has not been binding; he knows that this Bill has been introduced because the Justice Department has told him that by reason of the Crown not being mentioned he has no legal right and never had a legal right to collect these duties. The Minister of Justice, as one of the best lawyers in the country, knows that this Customs Act has never been binding upon the Crown in the right of the province. Without suggesting there has been any doubt on the part of the minister himself or the deputy minister on the subject, and knowing perfectly well that these duties have been illegally exacted from the provinces, he is asking this Parliament to-night to take away the legal rights of the people of those provinces, and prevent them from having an opportunity of making a claim which they would raise upon both grounds. He is endeavouring to prejudice the people of the province making a claim against the Government by reason of the legal exaction of these duties.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will not the minister permit this legislation to stay in committee until we hear from the Manitoba government on this question? As they have raised the issue I think the House ought to have the advantage of hearing their views, and the province should be given an opportunity of presenting them before Parliament comes to a conclusion on the matter.

Mr. REID: I cannot see any object in allowing the legislation to stand. My duty is, of course, to look after the interests of the Dominion so far as my department is concerned. The government feel that this legislation should be passed in the interests of the Dominion. We cannot hope to gain anything by communicating with the provincial government. They will simply say, as they did in their letter that they ought not to pay the duties. We are anxious to get our legislation through as soon as possible, and as an opportunity has been given for every hon. gentleman to express his views, I see no object in allowing the legislation to stand.

Mr. MACDONALD: On account of its retroactive character this is not an ordinary measure. Whenever a Bill is introduced, whether by a private member or by the government interfering with vested rights or retroactive in its character, the House should be seized of all the merits of the case before it comes to a conclusion. It is upon that ground, a very reasonable and just ground, I think, that I ask that the measure be not pressed now. If the minister has confidence in his legislation, he can have no objection to waiting to hear from the provincial government on this matter.

Mr. REID: I cannot see what is to be gained by holding this over, as we have all the information before us that we can possibly get. It is simply a question of law, and if the provincial government wish to proceed with the case, they can of course go to the Privy Council.

Mr. PUGSLEY: After you have taken away their rights.

Mr. REID: I do not think we are taking them away, nor does the Department of Justice.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the Bill for them?

Mr. REID: The Government have considered this Bill carefully, and are satisfied that it does not interfere with the British North America Act. An opportunity has been given to hon. gentlemen to express their views, and I can see no reason why we should not advance the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should just like to call the minister's attention to what the Supreme Court always does in a matter of this kind. If any question comes up affecting the rights of any province, they always insist on notice being given to the province, but here we are legislating behind the backs of the provinces. Remember, it is not individuals that the provincial governments represent, but all the people of all the provinces, and the people of the provinces will feel aggrieved that this legislation is passed behind their backs, with no opportunity being given to them for expressing their views.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have every respect for the arguments that have been made, but I think I ought to say frankly just how it strikes me. The contention that there is any wrong or injustice being done to the province in this matter, it seems to me, is so clearly and manifestly futile that I should be ashamed to delay the legislation to hear them argue that there was an injustice. In the second place, I am satisfied that there is no argument that they could put before us, and nobody whom they could get to put that argument before us with greater skill than has been done here this evening. For these reasons I quite understand why the Minister of Customs does not feel disposed to consent to delay this legislation.

Mr. COPP: I think that the suggestion of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that this legislation should stand over until the provincial government is heard from is a reasonable and proper one. I do not propose to make any argument on the legal aspects of this case, because that has already been done so ably by my hon. friend from Pictou and my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). It seems to me that there must have been a feeling in the minds of the hon. gentlemen opposite that the provinces have some claims. There may be some question about it, but it must appeal to them that the provinces have some claim in regard to this matter, and they are apparently taking the position: "What we have we'll hold"; we have this amount of money, small though it be, but a principle is involved; we have collected this amount of money for years from the different provinces in duties on goods imported, and to make sure, we will pass an Act and hold what we have. That does not seem to me to be a reasonable proposition. I am not prepared to say which of the hon. gentlemen who have argued the legal matter is right, and it is more or less of an invasion, in my opinion, of provincial rights, and, therefore, it should not be decided hurriedly, in an ex-parte manner, by this Parliament. And they say: Although the provinces may have some rights, we will remove the foundation of all the claims that they have made. I understand that some of the provinces have already made claims on the Government, that they have paid duties they should not have paid, and that they should be reimbursed this payment made by mistake. Four provinces, I believe, have already made claims in regard to the return of duties paid by them. I know full well that the province of New Brunswick last winter entered into a large contract with a firm in the United States for road machinery. Since that time the Government was defeated, and the succeeding Government continued the contract, and I think part of the machinery has been delivered, and the present Government will stand in the shoes of the late Government. Irrespective of the question as to which is right and which is wrong in regard to the legal aspect of the case, it seems to me it is an infringement of and interference with provincial rights, and, that being so, I think the provinces should be consulted and given an opportunity to state their case before the committee in a different manner, presenting their views to us.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is the meaning of the last five lines of the section? It seems to be an anomalous proposition. My hon. friend declares that he proposes to institute a tax upon the provincial governments of Canada, and to declare it was the intention of Parliament that they should always be taxed. The last four lines read as follows:—

> Nothing herein contained is intended to impose or to declare the imposition of any tax upon, or to make or to declare liable to taxation, any property belonging to His Majesty either in the right of Canada or of a province.

The imposition of this tariff on property brought into Canada by any provincial government is an imposition of a tax. Why have these anomalies, taxing at one end of the section, and declaring that they are not taxed at the other end?

Mr. DOHERTY: In no part of the section do we impose a tax on the province or the Crown. We declare the Crown to be subject to the legislation; we do not declare any right on the property of the Crown. We propose to collect the duty from the Crown when the Crown makes an importation, and we collect it without regard to the ownership of the property. Perhaps hon. gentlemen have not fully realized that customs duties are imposed upon the man who imports, and he will have to pay them if he imports another man's property, just as much as if he imports his own property, and it is true, with regard to the individual, that there is a lien or right imposed upon the property itself to secure the payment of the tax or duty. In so far as the right upon the property may possibly be interpreted to be a tax on the property, we have no intention of imposing any obligation on any property which belongs to the Crown, but all that we want to do is to make applicable to the Crown, as to every other person, the obligation to pay a duty when goods are brought into this country, no matter to whom they belong.

Mr. GERMAN: Is the duty not a tax?

Mr. DOHERTY: We will argue that question before the courts, but assuming for the moment that it is, the question remains, is the duty on a man's importation, without regard to any ownership in him, and a duty which he would be liable for without owning any goods whatsoever in this world, a tax on property? I do not propose to answer further questions on this phase of the matter. Let me point out that questions as to what the correct interpretation of the British North America Act is are absolutely irrelevant to this Bill, and it might not be quite fair to answer them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is this not intended to be a parliamentary interpretation of section 125 of the British North America Act or to assist in the final interpretation of that section?

Mr. DOHERTY: Most assuredly it is not intended to be. If it were intended to be, I would say it was one of the most awful failures I ever heard of.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the meaning of it?

Mr. DOHERTY: The intention is to make it perfectly clear that we do not intend to create any obligation upon the property of the Crown. I might answer it better by saying that it means exactly and precisely what it says, and the hon. gentleman who is asking the question, who understands the English language perfectly, knows the meaning of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have heard judges, when they could not understand the language of a provision, state that it meant exactly what it said.

Mr. GERMAN: If the province of Ontario should import a thousand tons of steel for some public purpose, that thousand tons would be the property of the Crown as represented by the Government of the province of Ontario. The British North America Act says that the property of the Crown shall not be subject to a tax. Does my hon. friend propose now to impose a duty, which is a tax?

Mr. DOHERTY: We do not propose to impose any duty, tax, or anything else on that thousand pounds of steel. We propose to say that whoever imported that steel shall pay a duty of so much, and the amount of that duty will be determined on the value of the importation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is the meaning of section 2, which says:

> If any imported goods seized in any building within one hundred yards from the frontier between Canada and any foreign country are forfeited according to law, such building shall also be seized and forfeited, and shall be forthwith taken down and removed.

Mr. REID: There are buildings close along the frontier, which parties use for storing goods which are brought in there in violation of the law, and there are some buildings partly on one side of the line and partly on the other. The United States Government has on its statutes a section which reads as follows:

> If any store, warehouse or other building shall be upon or near the boundary line between the United States and any foreign country, and there is reason to believe that dutiable merchandise is deposited or has been placed therein or carried through or into the same without payment of duties, and in violation of law, and the collector, deputy collector, naval officer, or surveyor of customs, shall make oath before any magistrate competent to administer the same, that he has reason to believe, and does believe, that such offence has been committed, such officer shall have the right to search such building and the premises belonging thereto; and if any such merchandise shall be found therein, the same, together with such building, shall be seized, forfeited and disposed of, according to law, and the building shall be forthwith taken down or removed.

Our officers tell me that there are parties who use buildings in that way and that they rush goods over to the other side when the officers are coming or when they have information that they are smuggling. We are putting this clause in and it is similar to the clause in the Act on the other side of the line in the expectation that it will make it more workable between the two countries.

JUDGES' ACT AMENDMENT.

Bill No. 66 to amend the Judges' Act—Mr. Doherty—read the second time and the House went into committee on the Bill, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

On section 1—appointment of puisne judge:

Mr. MARTIN: What is the salary of the judge now?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no change in the salary. This is to add one to the number of judges in Saskatchewan as provided for by the provincial legislature.

On section 2—appointment of county court judge:

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the minister ever thought of making some provision, of course, in conjunction with the provinces, to have the county court judge in districts where there is very little litigation going on transferred to districts where their services might be required instead of appointing new judges? We all know that litigation has fallen off in the last few years in many localities. I am told it is so in Ontario and I know it is so in my own province. In some districts the judges have a good deal to do while there are other districts where they are comparatively idle, and instead of appointing additional judges and putting the country to a great deal of expense, they might be distributed and in this way the work could be done.

Mr. DOHERTY: This matter was adverted to by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) on the resolution introducing the present Bill. I explained then that some two or three years ago I had taken the matter up with the then Attorney General of Ontario and had represented to him the desirability of acting on the lines suggested by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). At the time there appeared to be a disposition to listen favourably to what was suggested, but it has not resulted in any action. I did say, in response to the suggestion of my hon. friend from South Renfrew, that I would again take the matter up to see if something could be done on that line. As far as there is any addition here to the judiciary of Ontario, it is of a judge in Timiskaming which is a new and growing district.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved the adjournment of the House.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 10.05 p.m.
